RELIGIOUS freedom is the soul's declaration of independence.

ONLY that which is purely secular can be truly non-sectarian.

HE who would be like Christ, cannot make himself a judge of his brethren.

"LORD, what shall this man do?" is a question the Saviour refused to answer. Nor will he answer it now.

IF the Sabbath is the Lord's day, why take it out of the Lord's hands, and make it subject to state regulation?

HE who makes it his object to set other people straight, is very sure to set himself looked in the attempt.

IF the "Christian" state should want to join the Christian church, how could the Christian church consistently refuse?

THE modern "reformer" is willing to try almost any scheme for the reformation of his low-beings, except that of setting a good example.

It would be time well spent if a great many people in this country would learn the distinction between the terms "secular" and "godless."

It is the object of the civil law to keep men civil; but when a person undertakes to make men moral by civil law, he himself becomes most uncivil.

As regards the "civil Sunday," it is to be remarked that it is singular indeed that a secular institution should have sprung from a pedigree wholly religious.

THE church should remember that when she is joined with one of the powers of earth, it will be proper for her to change her name. If she wishes to retain her name, she must remain single.

The "Infallible" State.

At the late National Reform convention in Philadelphia, Rev. David McAllister, a leading exponent of National Reform ideas, spoke of the state as being "the infallible interpreter of and the active agent in applying moral law." This he said was the conception and aim of the National Reform movement.

Let us look for a moment at this "infallible" state.

Where shall we find it? Where is there any record of one, or where is there one that claims to be infallible at the present time?

There is none; but Dr. McAllister doubtless does not claim that there ever was an infallible state or even that there is one in existence now. Yet the National Reform idea is that the state is to become "the infallible interpreter" of moral law.

But how is the state to become infallible? If it never was infallible in the past, and is not infallible now, how is it to acquire infallibility in the future?

Is it to acquire this by being made the "interpreter of and active agent in applying moral law"?

The Religious State.

NOBODY in this country is, professedly, in favor of a union of church and state; but there are a great many people here who say that the state ought to be religious.

But how is the state to be religious without favoring a church? And what attitude will the church maintain toward the state when the latter professes religion?

Will the church stand off and forbid the state to come within her fold? How would it look for the Christian church to forbid a Christian to unite with her?

When therefore the state becomes Christian, how can the Christian church consistently close her doors against the state?

The Proper Thing.

A CONTRIBUTOR to the Christian Herald a short time ago, writing from Washington, D. C., a historical and descriptive sketch of the church which President McKinley attends, took occasion to state as though it were a very remarkable thing, that when at church Mr. McKinley partakes of the communion, kneeling at the altar "with the humblest member" of the congregation.

Why this should be considered by anybody as remarkable, is the point to which we would call attention. As a church member he who is the president, is but plain William McKinley. And as a church-member there is no distinction, in standing, between him and the humblest member. The only thing that could consistently be expected, then, is just what was seen, that in his place as a church-member he should receive the communion with the humblest member.

But what is really expected by entirely too large a class of people is that when a church-member is elected president of the United States, or is chosen to some other position in the state or nation, he shall carry with him in the exercise of his privileges of church-membership all the distinction, dignity, and officialism that attaches to him as an officer of the state.

Therefore they expect a governor of a State to be a governor in church and as a church member, and to be addressed as "Governor" by his church brethren; a judge of a court, they expect to be a judge in church as a church member, and to be addressed as "Judge" by his church brethren; and a president of the United States, they expect to be president in his place in church as a church-member, and to be addressed as "Mr. President" or "Your Excellency" by his church brethren.

But this is altogether a mistake. It is nothing else than that insidious ever-lurking spirit of the union of church and state that is always begging for permission to manifest itself. No; though in the White House, or in the Capitol, or as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, William McKinley is "Mr.

President" or "Your Excellency," yet in his place in church as a church member, he is only plain "Brother McKinley."

The country is to be congratulated in that Brother McKinley recognizes this vital difference and so disappoints the aristocratic expectations of spectators, by kneeling at the altar and receiving the communion "with the humblest member."

Loyalty to Country.

THE Boulder (Col.) News thinks that we do not believe in loyalty to the country in which we live, and as regards such loyalty says:—

"Being loyal does not mean that one must go to war whenever the call comes or that he must indorse all the abuses that may exist, or bad laws that may be enacted. He may devote himself to the country by removing those abuses, securing the change or repeal of bad laws, or in any way than he thinks would better the condition of the people."

This is true; and we never meant to be understood as advocating anything to the contrary. This is the loyalty we believe in exactly. He who is loyal to God will be loyal to his fellow men; and this means loyalty to country in the best and truest sense.

That Flag Salute.

WE did not imagine, when we devoted some space to the subject of the flag salute in our issue of November 25, that we were considering anything more than a local issue. But we were not long in discovering that we had touched a chord which awoke responsive echoes all over the country:

This is very significant. The flag salute is neither local nor accidental. The Boulder incident is but the outcropping of an influence that is at work all through the land. Since noticing that, the news comes that the same salute is being practiced in the Iowa State Normal school, where the young people are trained in the art of teaching, the design being that the graduates as they go out to teach shall introduce the salute in their respective schools. In Pennsylvania the same influence is at work, and experiences similar to those in Boulder have already occurred. Thus the forces are gathering for an attack upon the principles of religious freedom in the public schools; and this will bring the test of loyalty to principle right home to parents everywhere. They will not need to wait till they shall be brought before the courts for breaking Sunday.

But who knew that all this was brewing in our midst?

That Flag Salute.

WE did not imagine, when we devoted some space to the subject of the flag salute in our issue of November 25, that we were considering anything more than a local issue. But we were not long in discovering that we had touched a chord which awoke responsive echoes all over the country.

This is very significant. The flag salute is neither local nor accidental. The Boulder incident is but the outcropping of an influence that is at work all through the land. Since noticing that, the news comes that the same salute is being practiced in the Iowa State Normal school, where the young people are trained in the art of teaching, the design being that the graduates as they go out to teach shall introduce the salute in their respective schools. In Pennsylvania the same influence is at work, and experiences similar to those in Boulder have already occurred. Thus the forces are gathering for an attack upon the principles of religious freedom in the public schools; and this will bring the test of loyalty to principle right home to parents everywhere. They will not need to wait till they shall be brought before the courts for breaking Sunday.

But who knew that all this was brewing in our midst?

That is the question. Who knew that the enemy was quietly stealing a march upon the friends of freedom? Did you, reader, know it? And now that it is known, how do you feel about it? Will it pay to know what is going on in this great contest of the principles of liberty and of despotism? or is it the better way to wait and be confronted suddenly by the issue when you are not prepared to meet it?

You had not expected the issue to come in this way? Of course not; that is just the point. For you may be sure of this: the issues which you will be called to face in this contest will not come as you expect them to come. You must be prepared for them not as you expect them to come, but as you do not expect them.

WHEN the civil law undertakes to suppress immorality, it finds no logical stopping place short of the Inquisition.

The Vital Question.

THE Boulder (Col.) News says that in objecting to the flag salute in the public schools, the SENTINEL has made a mountain out of a mole hill. It says that we "totally misapprehend and misinterpret the spirit of the whole matter;" and this statement it explains by saying that the salute—"We give our heads and our hearts to God and our country"—"was not intended to be taken in a narrow, technical sense, not as a declaration of conversion or religion, but as a general expression of reverence for deity and loyalty to country."

Now this salute consists of a statement so plain and simple that it had not occurred to us that it could be taken in a "narrow, technical sense." When an individual says he gives his heart to God, we take the expression as meaning just what it says, with no thought of anything technical about it. How would it do as a defense in a breach of promise suit, to plead that although the defendant did say that he gave his hand and heart to the complainant, this was not meant to be taken in a narrow, technical sense, but only as a general expression of esteem?

But aside from this, it should be noted that the real point involved in this matter is not the question of what was meant by the originators of this salute. It is not the question of their motives in introducing it into the schools, or of what good they thought it would accomplish. Doubtless their motives were excellent; we do not question these in the least. Nor is it probable that they themselves saw in it any confession of religious belief; at least, it is quite possible that they did not. But the question is, What did they actually do? What does the flag salute actually require, and what is its real effect?

We are quite ready to believe that the authors of this salute did not know that their gun was loaded, and did not mean to shoot anybody. "I didn't know it was loaded" is a very common excuse; but the question is, What was the actual result? Beside this, the mere question of what was intended sinks into insignificance.

The News goes on to say that the word "God" in the salute "does not necessarily mean the God of the Bible; it may mean the god of nature, or nature itself, as some put it—even the pagan's god, if there should be a pagan in the schools." Well, well! How many gods do the Boulder school authorities want the children to give their hearts to? How many different gods do they believe in themselves? Do they believe that all gods are on an equality, so that the children may with equal propriety be required to give their heads and hearts to any one of them? If not, which one do they mean shall be honored by this flag salute? These are points concerning which the public may well ask for explanation.

If the salute does not mean anything definite, or if it does not mean what it says, it would better be dropped for that reason alone. And if it does mean what it says, then it is a direct invasion of the domain of conscience, whether its authors intended it as such or not.

Accept Our Thanks

WE desire to extend our thanks for the missionary effort that has been put forth during the past month in behalf of the SENTINEL, and the good lists of subscribers that have been sent in. They have been similar in size and number to those sent in under our special offer last August, and accompanying them have been words of the warmest appreciation of the paper, and the deepest interest in the cause it represents.

The effort is not confined to any particular locality, but has been general. A young man, going to school and clerking in a store nights and mornings, sends in a nice list from Oregon; a man in Wyoming forwards us a list of twenty-five, eight of them taking our Premium Bible; another from Florida sends a dozen or more, and a friend of the paper in Iowa forwards us a list of seventeen subscriptions secured in one day. These cases might be multiplied almost indefinitely, but this will suffice.

We assure our friends, one and all, that we appreciate their efforts, for it shows that they are keenly alive to the situation that confronts us.

During the coming year, the SENTINEL will endeavor to keep fully abreast of the battle it is waging, and deliver its notes of warning so clearly, so earnestly, yet with such tenderness and good will toward all that men and women everywhere will be led to see, acknowledge, and accept as truth the principles for which it contends.

ELDER J. SANBORN, of Sparta, Wis., one of the old-time and warm friends of the SENTINEL, sends us several subscriptions, his own renewal with the number, and says: "Of course I cannot do without the SENTINEL. It is so good and always stands for the right."

"We Have No King But Cæsar."

On that fateful day when Pilate had exhausted nearly every resource at hand, in unavailing efforts to save Christ from the power of an angry, infuriated mob, he ventured a last, evasive objection to their demands, in the question: "Shall I crucify your king?" A concert of voices from the chief priests quickly returned the answer: "We have no king but Cæsar." John 19:15.

Jesus had been dragged by an excited populace before the civil ruler of Judea on charges of a trivial nature, yet they had asked that the sentence of death should be passed upon him. Pilate, suspecting that all was not right in their representation of the case, took the prisoner aside, and questioned him relative to the charges preferred.

Finding no cause of condemnation in him, the governor gave a verdict in accordance therewith to the people, who would not receive it. Finding that they could not compass their ends by legal process, the frenzied priests claimed the right, by a religious law of their own, to punish the object of their hatred. Said they: "We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God." That is to say, their law regulating religious belief and practice, called for the death of their victim, and therefore the civil power ought not to prevent them from executing its demands.

This opened a new phase of the controversy to Pilate, and gave him no little anxiety. From what Christ had revealed of himself to the governor when privately examined, he saw that religious malice alone lay at the bottom of the priests' demand for the blood of Christ. However much he might desire to release the innocent victim of their hatred, he realized that he would not be able to do justice in the matter, without making himself odious in their eyes. Being at that time, too, held under suspicion by the emperor, on account of some irregularity, he feared that, if he offended these fanatical priests, they might accomplish his political overthrow.

Thus timid and undecided, the governor was greatly embarrassed. An earnest appeal, just received from his wife, "Have thou nothing to do with that just man" (Matt. 27:19), coupled with the conviction forced upon his conscience by the private interview with Christ, made him hesitate. He well knew what would have been the right course to take, but his political standing was in the balance. The crafty priesthood fully comprehended the situation, and, taking advantage of the opportunity, quickly exclaimed: "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend; whoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar."

This effort was well-timed on the part of the priests, and had its effect on Pilate. The priests saw this also, and were determined to follow up the advantage thus gained. In reply to the governor's next appeal for them to consider Christ as their King, they vehemently cried out: "Away with him, crucify him." Then came the final question from the governor: "Shall I crucify your King?" The answer returned settled the controversy, by deciding Pilate to give Christ into the hands of his accusers. In that the priests covertly insinuated that the governor was not loyal to the emperor. "We have no king but Cæsar," said they thus intimating that Pilate had, or was about adopting, another king than Cæsar in the person of Christ.

It seems easy to see from this distance the inconsistency of Pilate's course, in violating every principle of justice, and his own conscience as well, in yielding to the clamor of the Jewish priests for the life of Christ. Although the Roman civil law assumed control of men's consciences, yet this judge of the Roman tribunal saw no cause of action against the victim of priestly malice. Notwithstanding this, the mob spirit of the occasion forced the point against the decision of the judge, making him yield to their unjust demands.

Strange as it may seem to some, this was but the legitimate result of religion united with the civil power. By this union, the priests, to whom was committed the administration of religious rites, carried that influence with the civil power that, when a covert threat was made, the civil magistrate gave over to their frenzy, one in whom "was no sin." No being could be nobler or purer, yet he was sacrificed to the hatred of fanaticism, for no other consideration than that the one in whose power it was to release or condemn the accused, feared the intrigues of religious leaders, in whose hands was the power of political preferment, or national disgrace.

The power of mischief, maintained by the priesthood of that day, was not peculiar to the spirit of the Jewish religion. Had the priests followed in the way that faith pointed, their disposition would have been merciful, gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, as was the Source from whence the religion emanated. Ex. 34:4, 5. Where, then, was the difficulty? From whence was their cruel spirit, if not from their religious faith?—It was from the adulteration of their religion with human power, sustained by earthly tribunals. The adoption of this substitute neutralized every element of the refining and ennobling power of God, and left their religion destitute of every heavenly constituent. It thus became subject to the caprice of finite, erring minds, wrought upon by the basest passions of fallen human nature.

It was the same element which is responsible for the spirit of the Dark Ages. Men did not then ruthlessly destroy others, who differed with them religiously, simply because they were Catholics. Protestants of those days acted the same as Catholics when opportunity presented itself. The cruelty then practiced in the name of religion was not the product of Christianity, but the lack of it; not because of Christianity, but in spite of it. The state and the church being united, civil laws were made to maintain the church, of which advantage was taken to coerce the consciences of those who dissented from the dogmas of the church. In other words, men persecuted their fellow men because they were human, and yielded to their own passions of evil, in spite of their profession of goodness.

It would be just the same now, were the state to legislate in behalf of the church, for the reason that human nature has not changed. Give men the power now, and they would use it just the same as others before them have used it, namely, to break down every one who opposed their peculiar ideas of religion. Men grasp for power everywhere,—in religion, as well as in the state. If they cannot secure it in one way, they will in another. The fact that Christ never gave his power in the interest of coercion, and will not grant it now for that purpose, is the reason that ambitious churchmen apply to the state for a power which they may wield as they will.

The power of God is not for man to control in any way, but is designed to influence, guide, and control him. He may not use the power, but the power may, and will use him, if he permits it; otherwise it leaves him alone. If professing Christians would be satisfied with God's disposition of his power, they could not become arbitrary, and desire to control others in religious matters. It is only when self asserts its desire to control some power in the interest of religion, that he resorts to civil government for it; and when it is secured, he can use it only in a human way, which is far from divine.

The reason for this is plain. When fallen man, who needs God's power for assistance by the way, and should be subject to it, attempts to take control of that power himself, by which to force others to terms, who are likely to be as near right as himself, he thus essays to rise above, and break away from his Master, and like all servants armed with power, becomes arrogant and cruel. It was at this point where the Jewish priests exclaimed: "We have no king but Cæsar," and so severed the last link which had united them to the rule of heaven. Will the people of this nation learn lessons of wisdom from the history of the past?

Church and State in the Society Islands.—No. 1.

BY B. J. CADY.

ONE hundred years ago, the first missionaries from England landed in this group of islands and began missionary operations. They found a strong race of people, much larger than the average European. These people were kind in general, and very sociable, so much so that the islands were named "Society Islands."

They worshiped the spirits of the dead who had been noted as men of renown in olden times, so had many gods or objects of worship. They offered human sacrifices, but were not cannibals.

The king and priests were the leaders in all things pertaining to civil and religious matters. The kings were looked upon as belonging to a higher order of men, as some of their forefathers were supposed to have been deified; and to have performed many marvelous feats. The story is told of one who drank whole rivers of waters, with the gravel and stones in the river beds, and of another who threw a spear from one island to another, a distance of 130 miles. It is said that on its way, the spear passed through a mountain of an intervening island, leaving a tunnel through the mountain.

The priests were in subjection to the king, and usually used their influence to help to carry out the wishes of their ruler. It is said that when the king, for most any petty cause, should become jealous or angry with a man, the priests would see that it was necessary to offer a sacrifice to appease the wrath of their god, so would start out in search of a human sacrifice. They would enter the house where the king's enemy was, seize and kill him, and drag his dead body to the marae, which is a large heap of stones. The corpse would be cast upon the stones, where it would remain until destroyed by sun, wind, and rain.

After fifteen years of toil, the missionaries saw the first fruits of their labors. In time the king of the largest island embraced the new religion, and traveled with the missionaries from place to place, trying to get the people to accept the new white man's religion. We are told that some of the first ones who embraced the Christian religion were very earnest, devoted men, and that there was a great change in their lives for the better.

The first missionaries were men with but little means, and received but little from their native land to help them. They had not been reared in luxury, but were men of faith, who believed that God had called them to preach the gospel to those who were in darkness. After a time, more new missionaries came to the islands, some with more education, and with new, and what was supposed to be broader, ideas as to how the work should be carried forward.

Guns and various weapons of warfare were brought to the islands, and when the heathen became jealous and wished to destroy the new Christian church, weapons of warfare were placed in the hands of the Christians, so that they might be able to combat with the heathen about them. After a few battles, the Christians conquered the heathen, and gradually all adopted the form of Christianity.

The missionaries then thought it would be well to establish their religion by law, and laws like the following were enacted:—

"Jehovah is King of all kings; by him the princes rule and the people have peace."

"All who break these laws are to be treated the same."

"Only church members are entitled to hold office in the government."

"People are not to bathe, wash clothes, or cook food between the hours of 9 A. M. and 3 P. M., on Sundays."

"Those who do not keep the Sabbath (Sunday) are to be fined."

"No new religion is to be allowed on the island. If missionaries of another faith teach their religion in this land, and will not refrain from it, they with their converts must be banished."

I visited one district where they had recently made a new law, that, unless ill, every man, woman, and child must attend church on Sunday. If one failed to reach the church, he was fined twenty cents. I asked the cause of the new law, and was told that their meetings had been very poorly attended for some time, but that since the law had been passed, there had been a good attendance every Sunday. One said, "See how many there are here to-day." I should think that there were about 150 present, while there was only an average of about ten in attendance before the law had been made. I asked, "What do you do with the money raised by fines?" They replied, "O we keep it until there is enough, and then we are going to have a feast." I asked who was to superintend the feast, and was told that it was the church, but that all were attending meeting so faithfully then that it might be a long time before they would have enough money to buy the needed things.

It can be readily seen that the object of the laws to which I have referred, was to help the church. It may have been thought by the originators that the native people needed all the help that could be given them by the government. So they had laws made to prohibit them from doing what they looked upon as sin. It was as much as saying: "We look to the Lord to be our God and ruler, and we want this island for the Lord. There is no room for what we call the devil here. So do not bring any other religion to this place, or we will have to cast you out, for ours is the true gospel, and yours is false. We do not want you to teach your erroneous views to our people, for they might believe them and be lost."

And it was virtually saying to the islanders: "We know what you ought to do to serve God. Now you must do what we tell you that God wants you to do, and if you fail, we must punish you by fines so as to keep you from doing what we believe to be wrong. Do as we tell you to do, and you will be saved. If you do not, we shall punish you so as to make you do right that you may be saved."

It is to be remembered that the missionaries were the principal ones in getting these ideas expressed in the laws. The object of this article is not to condemn the promoters of these laws, but to consider whether this is the right way to make Christians. If this is the way, we would naturally expect to see quite an improvement in this people during the past 75 years. I wish in another article to give a brief history of the working of the church in the Society Islands, and will let the reader judge by the fruits borne by this church as to the propriety of trying to make Christians by law.

Protestants Surrendering the Reformation.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

WHEN the government of the United States began, all was done that was possible to make this nation what every nation ought to be.

It recognized the self-evident truth that "all men are created equal; that they are endowed with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The noble men who wrote the Declaration of Independence, from which the above is quoted, knew that these rights could not be secure in this country any more than in those which existed before it, unless steps were taken to prevent any church or all churches together having any part in the conduct of its affairs.

They recognized the fact that religion is a matter that pertains to the individual, and that where this is not the case, any profession of that kind on the part of the people comprising the government must be at the best hypocritical, and that it must work injustice to those who may be honest and God-fearing.

Accordingly this principle was incorporated into the Constitution, in the First Amendment, which reads, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

This is the principle of Protestantism. In the Augsburg Confession and at the Diet of Spire, in the sixteenth century, the true relation of the church and the state was clearly set forth.

It must follow, therefore, that any attempt to change this feature of the Constitution, and to use the power of the state for the enforcement of religion of any kind, is a square denial of the Reformation, a declaration that its cause was unrighteous, and ought never to have been. But the Reformation was aimed directly against the papacy. Therefore to say that the Reformation was wrong is to say that popery was right; and, consequently, that as Rome never changes, it must still be right.

It would not of course be a matter of surprise to see Catholics themselves contending for this. They could not do otherwise, and still be Catholics. But that there should be those who are professedly Protestant who stand with Rome upon this ground is not only surprising but alarming.

That this is so, no one who is acquainted with the history of this nation in recent years, can question.

For nearly fifty years there has been a regularly organized association—the National Reform Association—which has had for its object the changing of the Constitution, demanding that, at least, certain features of the religion of Christ be enforced by human enactments.

It is not to be understood by the above statement that this association openly espouses Romanism, or that they acknowledge that their work is really Romanistic.

But it must be understood that in prosecuting their work they have felt the necessity of, and have been glad to seek, the coöperation of Roman Catholics.

Thus a leading National Reformer—Dr. Scoville—says, "We may be subjected to some rebuffs in our first proffers, and the time has not yet come when the Roman Church will consent to strike hands with other churches—as such; but the time has come to make repeated advances; and gladly to accept coöperation in any form in which they may be willing to exhibit it. . . . It is one of the necessities of the situation."

Any rebuffs to which they might be subjected from the Catholic Church would not be because the Catholic Church is opposed to their work. Far from it. They would be only blinds, as it were, until they felt the time was ripe for an alliance to be affected without danger to themselves. This would be when this reform(?) work should become more widespread, and become more firmly engrafted in the Protestant ranks.

The above, from Dr. Scoville, was uttered in 1881. Eight years from that time—1889—the Catholics felt free to express themselves. At the Congress of Catholic Laymen of the United States, then assembled at Baltimore, they said: "What we should seek is an en rapport with the Protestant Christians who desire to keep Sunday holy. . . . We can bring the Protestant masses over to the moderation of the Catholic Sunday."

On this question of Sunday it was felt, on the part of each, that they could, as Archbishop Ireland, in 1893, expressed it, "stand together in demanding the faithful observance of Sunday."

Now the Catholic Church repudiates, and always has repudiated, the work of the Reformation, denouncing those who uphold it, as heretics, and up to within a few years ago denounced the Constitution of the United States.

Why is it then that Catholics are willing to unite with these Protestants in the way that is proposed? How can Catholics do this without stultifying themselves in their opposition to the Reformation? The answer is easy. It is because these Protestants, in their zeal for Sunday and Sunday laws, have surrendered all that the Reformation stood for.

Catholics know this, but do Protestants?

It must be conceded that a great many, if not all, Protestants, who are thus engaged are true Christians, men and women who really love the Lord, and who, in this thing, think they are doing God service.

However honest they may be, they are nevertheless, not only striking a blow at the foundation of this nation, but, as before pointed out, are repudiating the Reformation.

With the progress that has been made, by both Protestants and Catholics, how long will it be before the dire work will be completed? Surely not long.

WE shall print an extra number of papers of this issue, believing that in many communities where the question of the introduction of the flag salute in the public schools is being agitated, it will be a good missionary document to place in the hands of teachers and school boards. The price is one cent a copy. Order through your state tract society.

We believe the answer will be an emphatic No.

NEWS, NOTES AND COMMENT

WITH real Oriental simplicity, the Chinese minister at Washington, Wu Ting-Fang, in laying before the government a protest against the high-handed action of the "Christian" Powers of Europe, has inquired why these Powers do not partition Turkey, a country that is always causing trouble, instead of turning their carving knives upon China, a country that has always lived peaceably with her neighbors and minded her own business. The Chinese minister, it would seem, has not been educated in Western ideas to the point of understanding the ethical principles of "Christian" diplomacy, as practiced by the nations of "Christian" Europe.

FROM the standpoint of one not trained in diplomatic distinctions of right and wrong, there is much force in Wu Ting-Fang's inquiry. He says he can see no justice in China's being carved up like a Christmas cake to be disposed of by the Powers. To see the justice of the proceeding, as the Powers view it, it would be necessary to remind him that China has no army and navy capable of seriously resisting the carving process, whereas Turkey can put into the field nearly a million of well-armed men, whose fighting qualities all Europe understands and respects. It would be necessary to explain to him how very wrong it would be, from a diplomatic standpoint, to begin the work of partitioning Turkey under such circumstances, however proper and laudable the proceeding might be in itself.

IT is really a question for serious consideration in this country, how much deference is to be paid to the opinion of a human individual, when that individual stands in the position of a minister of the gospel. Vastly more depends upon the attitude of the people in this respect, as regards both their material and spiritual interests, than many of them are aware.

IT is an evident fact that there are some prominent clergymen in this country who want their opinions received by the people with a good deal of deference. Their prosperity in the sphere which they have marked out for themselves, depends upon it. Their goal is that of popularity, rather than piety. Wishing their names to be kept prominently before the public, they put forth, at intervals, statements that will be regarded by the people as sensational. If nobody paid any particular attention to their utterances, or held them as being worthy in themselves of more than a passing notice, they would of course not accomplish the object for which they are intended. It is only the deference which the people have been led to pay to them, as if they came from some supermundane source, which makes them of practical effect.

FOR example, we note that Dr. Lyman Abbott has again come before the public with some utterances on the mission of Christ to the world, which are treated by the New York dailies as sensational news. "I do not believe," he says, "that Christ came to afford men an escape from torment, or to get men into a place of bliss;" and also, "I do not see why an agnostic cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." Now, of course, Dr. Abbott has a perfect right to hold these opinions and state them to anybody he pleases; but why should they create a sensation merely because Dr. Abbott spoke them? Why should the utterances of any clergyman, merely as such, be regarded as in the nature of important or startling news? They are not important or startling if they are not true; and who knows that they are true? They did not come from any ultimate source of truth; and until the ultimate source of truth is examined, to see what is there said on the subject, they are to be taken merely as the opinions of the one who uttered them. There is no reason whatever why they should be taken more seriously.

THE ultimate source of religious truth is the Word of God. The important question to consider is, then, not what some man has to say on the subject, but what God has said on the subject. What does the Bible say, for instance, concerning the mission of Christ to earth, and the things requisite to salvation? It is just as easy to know this as to know what Dr. Abbott or any other man says about it. Why, then, should not the people know what God has said concerning the matter, and when they know it, take his word as settling the matter fully for all time? To do anything less than this is to indicate a lack of faith in God.

AND this is where the seriousness of the whole matter comes in. For it is a very serious matter not to have faith in God. It is a very serious matter to look no further than to the words of some man for our knowledge of spiritual truth. That is popery; and because the world was led to do that, the world went into the Dark Ages; the world suffered immeasurable loss in both its material and spiritual interests. And to do the same thing now means decay and death in both spiritual and temporal affairs, just as surely as it ever did in the past. Faith in the Word is the great quickener now as truly as it was in the era of the Reformation, or at any other time. There is a broad meaning in the language of Christ recorded in John 6:63, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life."

THERE is an example left on record in the Scripture for the people to follow in this matter. It is that of the "noble Bereans." They heard the preaching of the Apostle Paul; but they did not accept what he said as truth merely because it was Paul who spoke it. They simply "searched the scriptures daily, whether those things were so." If the people would only adopt this course to-day with respect to the words they hear spoken from the pulpits, it would spoil a great many sensations and some reputations, but would be immeasurably to their own benefit in every way.

Seventh-Day Adventists and the Public Schools.

[THE following, setting forth the views of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Boulder, Col., on the subject of saluting the flag in the public schools, has been sent us with the request that it be given space in the columns of the SENTINEL. As much criticism has been heaped upon the Adventists, because of their stand in this matter, it seems entirely proper that this request should be favorably received.]

DURING the last few weeks, as is well known to the people of Boulder, there has been much agitation and discussion, both in a public and a private way, of the relations the Seventh-day Adventist church of this city sustains to the Boulder public schools. Nor has the discussion of this matter been confined alone to our own city, but has extended to Denver and neighboring towns, and even gone outside the State. In many instances the erratic utterances and statements of irresponsible parties, and of those outside the Seventh-day Adventist Church, have been accredited to this organization. In view of this it seems but reasonable that the Seventh-day Adventist church of Boulder should state to their neighbors and fellow citizens their true position on the school question.

In the first place, Seventh-day Adventists are in no sense opposed to our system of free public schools, nor are they in any measure whatsoever opposed to the government under which we enjoy our present freedom. Among all the nations of antiquity, and of medieval and modern times, has there arisen no government of man so noble in its purposes, and so true to the principles that should underlie just and wise government. It is in this country, as expressed by Dr. Josiah Strong, that the two great ideas of which the Anglo-Saxon is the exponent—civil and religious liberty—have had their fullest development. For these noble principles our forefathers gave their fortunes, their honor, and their lives. Hence, for the American flag, as representing these great basal principles, which lie at the foundation of our national existence, every loyal heart must hold the highest respect. And of these high and exalted principles, for the defense of which our nation was established, the system of our free public schools was designed to be the great conservator. Ignorance and free government are incompatible. Both cannot exist together on the same soil. Hence, for the maintenance of true principles in the home, the church, or the state, education becomes an essential factor. This education may be imparted in the grades, the high school, and the university; or it may be given in private, church, and denominational schools. Into the hands of a truly educated people may be safely entrusted the important interests involving the integrity of social and political life.

But while the Seventh-day Adventists of Boulder most firmly believe in the principles above stated, they cannot but feel that the requirement of the public schools in Boulder in respect to the so called flag salute is a violation both of the spirit and of the letter of these principles. They believe in God, but they do not believe that the attendance of their children at the public schools should be conditioned upon the open avowal of this belief. It is not the right of any State, of any court, of any school board, to require from any American citizen, or from the child of any American citizen, a recognition of God. Every citizen of Boulder, whether he be Christian, Jew, infidel, or pagan, is entitled to the privileges granted by our system of free public schools, and he is entitled to these privileges without any declaration on his part of his belief or disbelief in any deity. Civil government and the system of education provided by civil government should not, nor can they of right, deal with the religious beliefs, views, or prejudices of the individual members of the commonwealth. In doing this they usurp the prerogatives of Deity, and do that which Christ or his Spirit never attempts. Faith in Christ and sincere adoration of the supreme Being must spring from love and not fear, from volition of the will and not force. And while Seventh-day Adventists hold for the principles represented by the stars and stripes the highest reverence, and for the American flag as representing those principles the deepest regard, while they hold in the highest esteem those who fought and bled and died that to us might fall the heritage of freedom's blessings, they still feel that it is not the province of our public schools to require from the pupils a pledge of their heads and hearts to the maintenance of that flag. This is contrary to the spirit of freedom which the flag represents.

Seventh-day Adventists are uniformly law-abiding citizens. They believe in the support of the government by taxation, and by every laudable means consistent with Christian life; but in principle they are non-combatants. They believe that it is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong; better to leave to God the avenging of every just cause than to take vengeance into their own hands. The Christians of Europe, of Asia, of Africa, are as much the children of God and members of the household of faith as are the Christians of America. With their understanding of the requirements of the gospel of Christ, the members of the church could not enter conscientiously upon any warfare, either public or private, in an individual or national sense, to maim, kill, or destroy their fellows.

Hence, the objection of the Seventh-day Adventists to the flag salute should not be construed as antagonism to the flag or to the government the flag represents.

The church wishes to say in conclusion that for the larger portion of the agitation and controversy over this question in Boulder the church or its officers are in no way responsible. Aside from the publication of an article in the Camera, of this city, by the elder of the church, neither the church nor its officers have authorized, nor been parties to, the publication, in any paper whatsoever, of a single word on this question. And the church does not wish to be held responsible for the undignified representation of this question by others, nor as being governed by personal animosity or feeling, nor as desiring to excite public sympathy in behalf of its cause. Principles are above men, and above personalities, and it is for principle only that the Seventh-day Adventist church of Boulder should contend. And the church trusts that this expression of its conscientious convictions on this question, and not the representations of others, may be taken as voicing its true sentiments.

The above paper was adopted as expressing the sentiments of the Seventh-day Adventist church of Boulder at their regular morning service, Saturday, December 18. Of the two hundred present, there were but three opposing votes.

FRANCIS M. WILCOX, Elder,
MRS. GEORGE PEASE, Clerk.

A PLAN has been devised at the Vatican, it is reported, for remedying the falling off in "Peter's pence," which has of late been causing the papacy some concern. It is that of placing in every Catholic Church throughout the world a statue of St. Peter, together with an alms box, bearing an appropriate inscription. It is characteristic of the papal religion that it appeals to its adherents through the outward senses.

It Stands Alone.

THE AMERICAN SENTINEL is the only weekly paper in the world published wholly in defense of the principles for which it stands. Can you afford to be without its weekly visits?

MR. F. OTTO SENN, of St. Louis, Mo., in remitting for a nice club of subscriptions to the SENTINEL, expresses himself this way: "I am a reader of the AMERICAN SENTINEL, and support it only because I think it patriotic, and because it is the only religious paper I know of which recognizes and advocates the rights of free-thinkers and non-believers. I wish it continued success and prosperity."

Studies in French History.—3.

"JUST see my new note-book, Charlie," said Max Smith, as the boys and girls were gathering in the pleasant classroom.

"Why, Max! you here? your brother Jack said last week, you had no notion of coming."

"Well, I had n't, at first, but fact is, Jack came home with his head full, and he just talked me into it; so now I'm going to learn just as much as ever I can from now on."

"Good; and I see Joe Palmeto and his sister Maggie are coming,—and if there are 'nt two, four, six, more!"

"Well, I didn't think a plain talk about history would ever draw those Barnaby boys," said Max. "I'm sure I'm glad of it," he continued, "I feel sorry for those boys, anyway. It's little help or encouragement they get at home."

"You know Mr. Barnaby didn't keep his pledge last winter hardly long enough for the ink to dry."

"Mother says a fellow can't break off a bad habit unless God helps him," said Max reverently, "and I guess she's right."

By this time the little audience was seated. Professor Carman's first words were those of cordial welcome to the new comers, and a kindly greeting for them all.

"I am glad to see so many note-books; for this lesson will, I think, contain many points of interest."

"Where were we at the close of the last study? Yes, Edna, I'm sure you know, but I will ask Robert Billings to answer."

"I believe Constantine professed to be converted," replied Robert, with a quick glance at his note-book. "Let's see; he was a Roman emperor, wasn't he?"

"Yes; and this was about the first part of the fourth century."

"But now we will just go back a little, and mention the people called 'Franks,' whom we begin to hear about some 150 years before this. They were very warlike tribes of Germans who came over into Gaul, and gave the people no end of trouble. A Roman general by the name of Aurelian, who afterward became emperor, tried to get rid of them, but he found it no easy task; finally, as they kept on coming, they were grudgingly allowed to stay. Those were troublous times. It was at about this period that the Huns, a ferocious tribe from Central Asia, headed by Attila, called the 'scourge of God,' attacked the frightened people of Gaul."

"The path over which he marched with his ruffianly soldiers was red with the blood of his victims. Finally, at the battle of Chalons he was glad to retreat from the Romans. But so evenly matched were the two armies and so frightful had been the loss of each, that the Roman general did not think it wise to follow him."

"I remember hearing papa read about Attila, once," said Florence Ray, "and I think he called himself the 'Hammer of the Universe.'"

"Yes; it was a dreadful title and well earned. Well," continued the professor, "the Roman Empire fell A. D. 476. That's right. I'm glad to see so many using their pencils."

"After that the Franks had things pretty much their own way, and the country of Gaul began to be called 'Francia,' on account of them."

"I've been wondering all this time, Professor," said Charlie White, "how the name of France came to be given to Gaul, and now I see."

"We will now begin with Clovis, the first of the French kings, which you may write in your note books under date of 481 A. D.; but do not forget that although he was a French king, he did not at first really possess any of the country we now call France; so, really, he was only king of the Franks. He came to the throne when he was only fifteen years old."

"Can you think of any other king mentioned in history who was still younger than this?"

Julia March, who was quite a Bible student, answered promptly that Josiah was only eight years old when he was made king of Israel.

"Good. Well, when Clovis was twenty years old, he fought the battle of Soissons against the Romans, and being victorious, this put an end to Roman rule in Gaul."

"King Clovis was very revengeful in his disposition. Once when a foolish Frank displeased him by breaking a vase which the king wanted to preserve, he waited a whole year for his revenge, and then killed him with a battle ax, saying as he did so, 'So you did to the vase at Soissons.' I am sure you will all agree with me that King Clovis needed to be converted. He did profess conversion a while after this, but from his conduct we fear he was not wholly free from the folly of paganism."

"We must remember that these German conquerors of Gaul, for a number of hundred years were really as much German in heart and language as ever even though they lived in their conquered territory. So we ought hardly to think of them as French."

"Finally, King Clovis married the beautiful niece of the king of Burgundy. Her name was Clotilda, and she was a Christian. But the term 'Christian' in those days did not mean as much as it does to-day. People were called Christians if they had renounced paganism, even though they still held many of its errors. The uncle did not like to give his niece to a pagan, but he did not dare to refuse the great king who had defeated his relatives, the Romans."

"When a little child was born to them, Queen Clotilda had her way, and the little fellow was christened, as the custom was. Afterward, when the child died, its pagan father declared that this was the reason."

"At last, because he was successful in a great battle against the Germans, he kept a vow he had made, and was baptized. This occurred on Christmas day, 496 A. D. Now the people began to pull together more than they had done. King Clovis was keen enough to see that the church had begun to be a very important element of power; so he made the bishops his best friends. Then he began to think of enlarging his dominions."

Joe Palmeter was getting wonderfully excited. His eyes were shining, and Professor Carman saw that he wanted to ask a question.

"Well, Joseph, what is it?"

"Why, I don't see how or why the bishops and preachers could help King Clovis very much. I should think soldiers would be the best help to get territory."

"That's the way it ought to have been; but we see that the church and state were on terms of the closest intimacy."

"Well," said Julia March, "I thought Christ said at one time that his kingdom was not of this world."

"So he did; but they paid small heed to that in those days; in fact, in all ages of the world there have always been some who have ignored his teachings in this respect."

"The king soon became master of Burgundy, and now his ambitious eyes were turned toward the Visigoths in the South. They did not believe in the same form of Christianity that Clovis did since his baptism, and so the foolish king made this an excuse for fighting them, which was indeed a poor manner of bringing them to his way of thinking."

"Now King Clovis was getting to be so famous that he must have a capital. So he fixed upon a little village named 'Lutetia,' originally, but the Romans had given it the name of 'Paris.' This was about 500 A. D."

As those who had note books hastened to write this down as a good point, the teacher said:—

"Now as I see my half hour is up, I will dismiss you. But will ask you at the next study to mention the points which most impressed you to-day, and it will help you to fix the facts in your mind."

"I'm so glad I came," said Florence Ray, on the road home that afternoon.

"Yes," said Edna Phillips, "I'm going to coax Johnnie to attend next time."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Why ought not the state to enforce morality?

Does the church need the support of the state? If not, why?

Is the saying true that "the state can do no wrong"?

Why is it not true that "the voice of the people is the voice of God"?

"A Mouth Speaking Great Things."

"How far had we studied in the prophecy about the horns, Charlie?" asked Mrs. Ross.

"O, away down to the rise of the horn with eyes like a man, and a mouth speaking great things."

"When was this horn established?"

"In 538 A. D., when Justinian's decree, which made the bishop of the church of Rome the head of all the churches, was carried into effect by subduing three kings, and by crowning the pope with the tiara. But, mama, what does it mean that the horns had eyes like the eyes of a man and a mouth speaking great things?"

"Eyes like the eyes of a man," would indicate the far-reaching policy of the papal system. Just think, Charlie, of the organization of the church under the pope. It is a vast secret order. Through the confessional the priests obtain a controlling influence over the people who are taught to look to them for the absolution of their sins, and you know, dear, that when we give our very heart's thoughts to any one, we bind ourselves to that one by the strongest of ties. This is the reason that God invites us to make him our confidant."

"But, mama, doesn't the Bible tell us to confess our faults one to another?"

"Yes; in whatever we have injured another. But David says, 'Against thee, thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight.' We can forgive faults; but sin is an assault upon God, and he alone can forgive sin. But the point of our talk, Charlie, is that through the confessional the people give themselves through the priests to the pope, and keep him posted as to the movements of men, and again the pope gives to the people his commands, so that the church becomes a vast organization to carry out the will of one man. No wonder the pope has been the arbiter of nations and has brought kings to his feet. The history of ages proves that the papal system is controlled by a very far-reaching wisdom, and evidences of craft are abundant and startling."

"Of course, you know, Charlie, that I am only mentioning this to show you that there is a higher wisdom than the far-reaching wisdom of the papacy, which has foreknown and foretold the movements of men and nations. It is not that I feel any bitterness toward the Catholics. In fact, I am sure that many of them are living up to the light they have better than I have lived up to the light God has given me, and are therefore more acceptable in his sight. But it is the system we are speaking of, and not the individuals that are involved in it. Behind the system is the wisdom of that old serpent, whose power to deceive dragged down principalities and powers from heaven. Lucifer declaring, 'I will be like the Most High,' is heard speaking through the mouth of this papal horn."

"O yes, mama, he had a mouth speaking great things. Now tell me what fulfils that point?"

"You may read the first part of the 25th verse of Daniel 7."

"And he shall speak great words against the Most High," read Charlie.

"Now you may turn to 2 Thess. 2:3, 4. What did Paul say must arise before the day of Christ's second coming?"

Charlie read: "Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped; so that he as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

"Now, Charlie, what is counted the greatest treason in earthly governments?"

"Why—why—let me see. In my old Reader there is a speech from Henry Clay, or some other orator, where he says, 'Charles I had his Cromwell and George III,'—and then some one called out 'Treason.' It was at the first agitation over the question of setting America free from England's rule. Of course, Cromwell was against the king, and took his throne."

"That's it, Charlie, and George III found a parallel experience in America's setting up a new ruler and deposing him. Now the apostle describes a power who will show himself in the temple of God, to take the place of God. Over the door of the Vatican at Rome is written an inscription in Latin which, translated into English, is 'Pope Pius IX, the best, the highest, and God on earth.' The title on the crown is 'Vicarius filii Dei,' or vicegerent of the Son of God. 'Lord God the pope' is another well known title. The claim to infallibility, that is, that the pope cannot err when speaking in an official way, puts him on a level with God. But where does this exaltation of the pope come from?"

"From self," said Charlie. "He opposeth and exalteth himself."

"Jesus says, 'He that humbleth himself shall be exalted.' And again, 'Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God, and in due time he shall lift you up.' You have given a very good answer, Charlie. Now tell me if you can see any personal reason as to why God has pointed out the pope as one who opposeth and exalteth himself."

"Why, I don't know, mama."

"It seems to me that the pope simply stands as an example of the outworking of self. Charlie, what is the temple of God? Please read 1 Cor. 6:19."

Charlie read: "'What? know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own?' Why, mama, each one of us is God's temple."

"Yes. Now when the pope through his decretals sets aside the rule of Christ, does away with his precepts, he commands the obedience of the people, steps into their souls, usurps the throne of God in the heart, and sits as God in the temple of God."

"O, mama, what a dreadful thing!"

"Yes, Charlie, it is dreadful; but wait, dear, we have each one been guilty of the same thing. Have we set aside Christ's precepts? Have we let self rule in our own hearts? Have we exalted self above God, and let self sit in the temple of God showing himself to be our God?"

"O mama," said Charlie, "I didn't know I had made a pope of myself before. What shall I do?"

"Humble yourself under the mighty hand of God. Give self up to Christ, and let him subdue the usurper and cast him out. Yield your will up to him who bids you to learn of him meekness and lowliness of heart."

"I see so many dreadful things in my life, mama. I am just full of the papacy. I've been trying to be at the head of everything in school, and, O mama, I never saw how sinful I was before. Why, I have had the mouth speaking great things. O mama, its just as natural as can be to be a pope."

"So it is, Charlie. 'Catholicism is the religion of human nature,' some one has said. But now, dear, let us not take the next step into its mystery, and do penance and go into purgatory. Rather let us kneel down, confess our sins to the Lamb of God, who taketh away all guilt, who will impart to us his spotless righteousness, and reveal himself through us day by day as we trust in him."

Mrs. Ross and Charlie knelt to pray, and though tears were on their cheeks, a happy light filled their eyes as they arose. Mrs. Ross went to the piano, and they both joined in singing—

"Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee."

The American Sentinel for 1898.

THE AMERICAN SENTINEL is in the field to be that which its name implies,—a sentinel, to give warning against the foes which threaten the sacred rights and liberties of the people.

As such, there is every evidence that it has a most important field of usefulness before it in the year 1898. The dangers against which it would warn the people are not imaginary, but are dangers which have already appeared in tangible form; dangers which have been met and fought in the halls of Congress, in the courts, and before the legislatures of the States.

A zealous but misguided element of the people are bent upon substituting false and despotic principles of government for those upon which this government was established by the wise and liberty-loving statesmen who gave it birth. Within recent years there have been some sharp conflicts fought for the preservation of these principles in American government, and success has, in a measure, attended the efforts of the SENTINEL and the men who have stood as champions of the liberties of the people.

But the crisis is yet to come. And now, the forces whose aim has been the subversion of the principles of free government, have returned to the attack, reinforced by associations which have suddenly sprung up within the church, numbering millions of members. This very month petitions are pouring in upon Congress, calling for a recognition of God in the national Constitution and for a Sunday law for the District of Columbia.

Stirring times are before us; and now, as never before, it is necessary that the AMERICAN SENTINEL should lift up its voice like a trumpet and sound an alarm throughout the length and breadth of the land. The enemy have inaugurated a campaign of education by means of National Reform literature, which they purpose to have scattered everywhere by the Christian Endeavor and kindred societies, calling for the enforcement of Sunday laws and other religious legislation by Congress and by the States. Upon this line the battle for civil and religious liberty must now be fought. Now, as never before, literature bearing the truth upon this great subject must be set before the people.

It is our aim to make the SENTINEL for 1898 a most effective agent for this work. A varied corps of contributors has been secured, which includes those of long experience as writers and speakers upon these themes. No pains will be spared to fill the paper with live matter, and keep it in touch with the latest developments of the times.

The SENTINEL will be illustrated with original drawings, made expressly for its use. We feel sure this will be a feature that will be appreciated by all.

A new head will appear on the first issue for the new year, which we think will be pleasing to our readers generally.

Altogether, the aim of the publishers will be to make the SENTINEL for 1898 just what it ought to be to meet the emergency that has come upon the country. The SENTINEL offers every person a chance to work, and now is the time to do it.

"OVERCOME evil with good."

THE devil can be respectable, but he cannot be pious.

It is love alone which opposes sin, but not the sinner.

THERE is no right way of doing a thing which is wrong in itself.

REFORMATIONS which are wrought by the ballot are phenomenally short-lived.

HUMAN nature can change human law; but no human law can change human nature.

THERE can be "political righteousness" when there can be righteousness without faith.

THE preservation of individual rights is the sole object of all proper human legislation.

A PERSON needs only to carry out his natural instincts to become an oppressor of his fellow men.

How can it be expected that the preachers will be united on politics, when they are so hopelessly divided on religion?

ALL wrong and all error are on one and the same side; and will be found so at the end, whether they appear so now or not.

If it be true that "the voice of the people is the voice of God," there is no escape from the conclusion that the Lord frequently changes his mind.

MAN often aspires to be what God has always refused to be—a dictator. If God had designed that man should be ruled by a dictator, he would not have provided him with a conscience.

A Papal Authority on Christmas.

THE following from the Catholic Standard and Times, of January 8, ought to be interesting reading for all Protestants:—

"M. C., on behalf of a Protestant friend, asked: 'What proof have we that Christ was born December 25?'"

"St. Chrysostom, in a Christmas sermon, December 25, 386, says: 'The Romans who have celebrated this day as the anniversary of our Lord's nativity have transmitted it to us (the Greeks) from ancient tradition.' Ancient authorities are not agreed on the date; the church has, however, the right to appoint any day for the special commemoration of a mystery or great religious event. The acceptance of the Roman date by all Christians shows not only the supremacy of that church, but also the fact that tradition must be relied on in many cases. The name of the festival itself is Catholic in the extreme, made up, as it is, of the words of Christ and Mass."

Probably there are few, if any Protestants so ignorant and superstitious as to believe that Jesus Christ was born on December 25; and even if that were the correct date for the event, no logical reason could be drawn from the fact for celebrating the day in the manner which is followed throughout Christendom. This, as may be easily shown, is based upon ideas distinctly pagan. The whole institution, as it now stands, is a monument of tradition. And in following tradition, the religious world is following Rome. Of this there can be no question.

The "reasons" which this papal authority gives for the celebration of December 25, are as good as any that can be given; indeed, they are the only ones that can be found for it. But what Protestant is willing to accept them as a basis for his own practice? It is pleasant to give and receive gifts; but why should this not be done according to Scripture rather than according to tradition? It is high time that every person who takes the name of Protestant should cut loose from tradition, and cease from any practice which declares the supremacy of Rome.

Righteousness By Law.

THE Jews sought righteousness by the works of the law—so the epistle to the Romans tells us—and they failed to obtain righteousness. And the fact that they sought righteousness in this way is the reason, we are told, why they failed. Rom. 9:30-32.

Yet there was nothing the matter with the law. It was the law which God gave them, and was just as good a law as God himself could make. It cannot be claimed that any legislature of men can enact a better one.

If, then, the Jews, who were scrupulous observers of God's law in outward conduct, and had great zeal for it, could not through it become righteous, how can it possibly be that righteousness can come through a human law which is imposed upon people against their wills?

Is righteousness to come by the law, or can it come by faith only? It really seems as though the situation warrants the asking, in all seriousness, for an answer from the churches to the question.

If the churches still believe that righteousness can come only through faith, why are they uniting their forces in a great movement to control the politics and shape the legislation of the country?

Setting Others Straight.

WE have been criticised for speaking against the work of the "Societies for Setting Others Straight;" the ground of the criticism being that the SENTINEL is seeking to do this very thing itself.

Our critics are mistaken. One man cannot set another man straight, nor can any set of men do this. This the SENTINEL knows and is trying to get the people to see.

An individual can be set straight only by the Word and Spirit of God.

And what the SENTINEL aims to do is to persuade those who think they can and ought to set other people straight, to leave this work in the hands of the agencies

God has established for that purpose; and to warn the people of the results which will follow if this is not done.

This is why the SENTINEL opposes religious legislation, and any effort to unite church and state.

If it were not for the continuous efforts made by religious societies all through the country to set other people straight by legislation, the SENTINEL would have nothing to say.

The Law of Christ.

"THE National Christian Citizenship League," we are officially told, "aims to do two things. One is to unite all who believe the will of God should be done on earth in practical opposition to the enemies of his will. The other is to teach the people that society, business, industry, and all government must be obedient to the law of Christ."

From a Christian standpoint, there are two objections to these two things at which the Christian Citizenship League aims. One is that Christianity does not oppose men, even the enemies of God's will; it opposes only sin. The other is that the law of Christ is not a law of force.

"Bear ye one another's burdens," wrote the Apostle Paul to the Galatians, "and so fulfil the law of Christ." But what is it that leads us to bear one another's burdens? Is it force or love?

To say that "society, business, industry, and all government must be obedient to the law of Christ," is to say that all these must be actuated by the principle of love. But in such a case, force is powerless. Love does not come in that way.

To use force in fulfilling the law of Christ, would at once rob that law of all its divinity.

Which is the Worse?

It is admitted on every hand that a union of church and state in this country would be a very bad thing.

That is, it would be very bad if the state should become joined with one of the churches or denominations professing the Christian religion.

But the surprising thing in connection with this is, that while the people are against this thing, as constituting a union of church and state, they are quite generally in favor of a union of the state with religion, as represented by the churches in general.

If it is wrong for the state to unite with one church alone, is it right for the state to unite with all the churches?

If even marriage between church and state is wrong, what must be said of church and state polygamy?

"KEEP the church and the state forever separate."—U. S. Grant.

Dangerous Models.

THE Endeavor Herald remarks:—

"The old Puritans would have made good members of our citizenship committees. They had the courage of their convictions, and advanced to the attack of anything which they regarded as evil with a confidence of victory that is inspiring."

Thus the Endeavorers adopt the Puritans as their model and their ways as their example in the matter of citizenship. And then they think themselves very much outraged when we say that their Endeavor citizenship movement means the union of church and state with its essential accompaniments—religious despotism and persecution!

There is nothing truer nor more palpable in history than that the principles of government and citizenship of the "old Puritans" were essentially theocratical, and their practices therein essentially despotic and persecuting. With them and in their government no man could be a citizen of the commonwealth except he be a member of the Puritan Church. Members of other churches were persecuted to death. All this is notorious. And it is equally notorious that as to government and citizenship these are the only principles that received any recognition from them. And yet the Christian Endeavorers who now propose to remodel citizenship and reform the nation, adopt these same theocratic, despotic, and persecuting Puritans as their model, and publish to the American people that "the old Puritans would have made good members of our citizenship committees;" and declare that the way in which these old Puritans did these things "is inspiring"!

Any governmental or citizenship movement of which the old Puritans would be a good part, is surely only to be dreaded by everybody who has any respect for either Christianity or humanity. And any inspiration that can be derived from either their principles or their practices can be nothing short of an inspiration to oppression and persecution, to death and destruction.

It has been well remarked that "if we are to be fitted by the past, it is essential that we should study our history honestly and impartially. We cannot be true to ourselves if we begin by being false with our predecessors. If we credit them with motives they did not feel and could not have understood; if we claim for them things which they never accomplished; if we defend their indefensible acts; if we seek to prove them in the right when they were in the wrong in their behaviour toward others,—it will follow that we will deal likewise in our own case, and prove dishonest and tricky as a nation and in our personal transactions." "We regret to read of the banishment of Quakers and the expulsion of 'papists' from soil procured for the settlers by one of the best papists and best men that ever lived. But the American patriot's cheek never kindles with shame till the story of the New England Puritans is told. Theirs alone is the dishonor of the torture, the mutilation, and the scaffold."

No man will ever be better, nor ever do better, than his chosen model. So long as "the old Puritans" shall be the chosen models of the Christian Endeavorers in government and citizenship, it is certain that every movement that they make in matters of government and citizenship will be a positive menace to free government and American citizenship, and is to be dreaded and opposed as such. And as just now the Christian Endeavorers are the leading and controlling influence among the National Reform elements of the country, so long as they hold "the old Puritans" as their models, they need to be carefully watched by the whole American people, in the interests of true Christian and civil liberty. The Individual vs. the Masses.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

WHENEVER we lose sight of the divine ideal, we begin to drop below the level of success, especially in handling the Word of God and dealing with souls. Satan is always anxious to make us think that we can improve on the old methods which Christ employed, or that the times have so changed that the old ways must be changed to suit them. He is very anxious that the "good things" which are ground out in the study of the average preacher should get before the people; he believes in a gospel that will draw and a crowd that can be drawn this way and that. He has so far succeeded in popularizing the gospel that it has come to be a serious problem how we can get rid of the crowd, to which the truth can never mean anything, and find the individual who is starving for it.

We hear a great deal about "reaching the masses." "The masses" is as illusive as a swamp full of will-o'-the-wisps. It may seem to be just within reach, but "when you put your hand on it, it isn't there." What belongs to "the masses" belongs to no man.

To send the gospel to the masses is like shoveling sand into the sea. Before any man can become a true witness for the truth or a soul winner, he must get the idea of the masses out of his head, the word out of his vocabulary, the hunger for the crowd out of his heart, and come to recognize the individual in all his aloneness. Truth is a turnstile that has a way of its own of dealing with the crowd. It may pack up against it by the thousands, but must come through one by one.

Christ came to save a lost world by saving the lost individual. The multitude followed him and hung upon his words, but were reduced to individuals by the glance of his eye and the touch that healed. It was always one by one that he reproved, comforted, and pardoned. No man is ever truly saved until he recognizes himself, in his relation to God, as entirely separate from every other individual, and that Christ died for him alone; that he is the man who made necessary all the expensive work of redemption. He will never be "firm in the truth" until he learns to stand alone with God and be strong and glad in his companionship and satisfied with his approval, until in fact Christ is to him "all and in all." To have the witness of the Spirit that his ways are pleasing to God must be to him the end of desire, his crowning joy, before he is ready to meet the Lord, either at resurrection or by translation. It is very necessary that this should be thoroughly understood by any who are called to promulgate any great principle. The broader the principle the more necessary that it should be firmly planted and rooted in the individual mind and heart. I heard a minister say once, "I did not preach the sermon I intended this morning because it was too important to throw away on the small congregation." He had utterly lost sight of the ideal congregation in this popular craze for the crowd.

We need, in these last days, for the promulgation of the momentous principles which have been committed to us as a people, to cultivate the mother instinct which never can see more than one at a time, and that one for the time being, as long as her eye is on him, to her, like his Lord, "the chiefest among ten thousand, the one altogether lovely."

Just as long as a man thinks of himself as a part of a crowd he is useless, if not dangerous; for he will never be able to pass through any crisis where manhood and integrity are needed. A series of evangelistic temperance services had brought a throng of men out of the saloons into the church; they came almost in a body; it was a wonderful thing to witness. All went well for months, but on the Fourth of July one of the number in a little town where he had found work was tempted to drink, and fell. The word was carried quickly to the rest of "the crowd" who were "celebrating" in a decorous manner, suited to the day and the new life they were living. It struck them, as a ball might strike a row of bricks standing on end. Before night a large proportion of them were lying around drunk in the old haunts. They had gone down one after the other, until, at last, one who had learned what it was to be a man in his own right and to stand alone with God, refused to go down; and stood as a kind of break-water to a remnant who were yet sober, and so gave them time to rally their senses; and also gave them a testimony that salvation personally applied meant something.

To come into the church for the purpose of getting help is, sooner or later, to become disappointed, discouraged, and to apostatize in heart if not in outward appearance. There is no help in the church, excepting for the man who comes into it as the arm has come into the shoulder, by natural growth, and for service to the whole body. Then nothing can hinder him from being helped. As he exercises the gifts that are in him for the edification of the body of Christ and for the rescue of the lost, he must thrive, and grow up into spiritual manhood.

As time passes on rapid wing the need grows that we should each find the soul that we must win,—that we should seek out the lonely and desolate ones, who are, here and there, waiting for the truth with which we have been so richly laden, to the end that we may dispense it as liberally as we have received.

Which Shall We Believe?

THE Christian Citizen, for December, in speaking of the prospective time "when the initiative and referendum are applied to municipal and State politics," says:—

"Then the voice of the people, which is the voice of God, will be heard."

So said the old pagans of ancient Rome, and to them, as far as it can be traced, the statement owes its origin. Upon their authority it rests. But the Bible says that the voice of God is heard through "holy men of old," who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

Which shall we believe, the pagans of ancient Rome, or the Bible?

The True Reformer.

A TRAVELER is one who travels, and not one who stays at home and writes books of travel. A worker is one who works, and not one who enjoys seeing other men work. So a writer is one who himself writes, and a reformer is one who reforms himself, and not, as seems to be the popular idea, one who sets himself the task of reforming everybody else after his ideas. It is true that the work of a real reformer does not end with himself, since everybody, however humble, has an influence, and so his example, coupled with precept, invites others to reform. But no man has any claim to the title of reformer who simply devises schemes for others to carry out. "Come!" is the watchword of true reform. "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come."—Sel.

SOME would-be reformers might save themselves and others a good deal of trouble, if they would remember that theories based upon an ideal state of things will not always fit the world in which we live.

AN increasing light of scientific discovery does little, if anything, to dispel the darkness of religious superstition. The amazing prevalence of such superstition in the world to-day is sufficient evidence upon this point.

MR. W. J. DESMOND, of Ronceverte, W. Va., writes: "I inclose subscription price of the SENTINEL. I would rather be deprived of some of the comforts of life than to do without my dear little friend, the AMERICAN SENTINEL."

Is State Interference in Religion Upheld by God?

THE question of civil jurisdiction in moral matters is becoming one of deep and widespread interest in religious circles. Arguments as to its fitness, both for and against, are advanced with much earnestness and warmth by those in high positions, but without permanently deciding the question. In fact, every point in the controversy appears to assume various phases, under the treatment of partisan logic, and is fast becoming a factor in political strife. Already many view the matter as a party principle, rather than a question of fundamental truth.

With such, reason is brushed aside, and truth is forbidden a part; expediency outweighs every other consideration. Professing alliance with God, they do not ask whether his attitude toward such problems in general, favors their cause or not. A goal is to be reached; and if it is not attained in one way, another must be devised by which it can be.

But, strange to say, all those who favor coercion in religious matters by application of civil law, profess to be working in the interest of God's cause. But does God uphold such work in the interest of religion? He has done infinitely much to bring men to walk in his ways, even to giving his only begotten Son in their behalf, but has he ever given his sanction to compulsory measures in holding men to the path of right? The only absolutely reliable history of the early church will give the facts in this line, and we may rest assured that as he viewed the case then, he will regard it now, since "with him is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

We need not trouble to search the records of the Old Testament, where the special interpositions of God in behalf of his people are so plainly set forth; that may be considered as going too far back. But let us note one case in the Christian church where the civil law was being applied in behalf of religion, and see which side of the controversy God supported.

About twelve years after the death of Christ, the king of Judea took a hand in the religious controversy of the day, and by virtue of his civil authority put to death James, a prominent disciple of Christ. Seeing that this act was approved by the Jews, whose political support he greatly desired, he proceeded to please them further by having Peter, another prominent worker in the infant church, apprehended and put in prison, intending to deliver him over to the will of his religious enemies, immediately after Easter. Acts 12:1-4.

The record of this case reveals that human nature has changed little, if any, in some respects, since that early day. It has ever been demonstrated that men can be induced to go to great lengths, even to doing unreasonable things, through the enthusiasm which it is possible to excite in some large gathering. What they had not courage to do under ordinary circumstances, they will do under the stress of excitement, especially where religious fervor is wrought up to a very high pitch. It was this way when Christ was to be sacrificed to the demands of the Jewish priesthood. The occasion of a pass-over gathering was waited for, when crowds of ignorant, yet enthusiastic pilgrims would be assembled from all parts of the country, and a general excitement could be aroused in favor of taking his life. It required no less an occasion to inspire the nerve to carry out a design so treacherous and diabolical as the sacrifice of the sinless Christ. The priests were reminded of this, too, by the Saviour at the moment of his arrest. Said he, "When I was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched forth no hands against me; but this is your hour, and the power of darkness." Luke 22:53.

This was a point well understood by Herod, and one which he intended to make count in his arrangement for the immolation of Peter. The apostle was, therefore, held in prison, not to await a legal decision in his case, for his fate had been decreed from the moment he was placed under arrest. But Peter was kept there simply in anticipation of the time when the king could not only be reasonably sure that the multitude would sustain his murderous intent, but that by destroying so prominent an enemy to the prevailing religion, in so public a manner, he also might gain a wider political influence among those whose religion he had so signally upheld. The plot was, indeed, a deep-laid one, but was destined not to mature, because of an interference which had not entered Herod's calculations.

Peter, lying in the inner prison, chained to a soldier on either side, and with a strong guard at the door of the prison, was supposed to be safely in the grasp of the civil power. Indeed, on the last night of his confinement, no doubt was entertained of the apostle suffering on the morrow at the hands of an excited populace. Everything was ready for the autodate, and there was great expectation on the part of those who were preparing to witness it. But on the very eve of the anticipated tragedy, an arm was outstretched to stay and frustrate the plans of the civil power. In answer to the united prayers of the church for deliverance, God sent an angel from heaven to strike off the prisoner's chains, and lead him forth to liberty.

It surely cannot be said that, on that occasion, God took the side of Peter, and against the civil decree because the form of religion which was sought to be upheld by coercion was not heaven-born. No, indeed; for the Jews received their forms of worship directly from God. And although the measure about to be executed was highly pleasing to the chosen people of heaven, yet God opposed it with the might of an angel of light. It may be suggested, however, that God's attitude on that occasion was solely because his people had forsaken his ways. Exactly so. Had they retained the spirit by which they were called to be God's people, they would not have been found uniting with the civil power to destroy a fellow man, simply because his religious convictions did not coincide with their own; and the same is true to-day of any people who claim, as did the Jews, to be specially favored of heaven. The very fact of their uniting with the civil power to restrain others in the matter of conscience, is the best of evidence that they, too, like their prototypes of old, have wandered from the ways of Him who said, "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world." John 12:47.

How much more Christlike it would be, if all professed Christians would unite to save sinners, a work which God upholds, rather than to call upon the courts of the land to condemn them, a work which Christ affirms he did not come to do or sanction. It has been the work of Satan from the first to find fault with and condemn others on religious lines. Should God uphold the civil power in doing the same, he would thus sustain Satan in his work, and so divide his kingdom against itself, which would bring about its speedy dissolution. We may, therefore, rest assured that God is not in any move looking toward the church sustaining the civil power in making statutes to regulate forms of religion.

J. O. C.

MR. J. N. DEVEREAUX, of Parker, S. D., a warm and appreciated friend of the SENTINEL, sends us twelve subscriptions to the paper, with this note appended: "I am sorry the list is not a larger one, but it is the best I could do. When I was in the army during the late war, I sometimes would catch a sentinel asleep on guard, but I must say I have never caught the AMERICAN SENTINEL napping. It always gives the alarm in season, but the sad feature of the situation is that the majority will sleep on heedless of the warning till it is too late to do them any good."

Church and State in the Society Islands.—No. 2.

BY B. J. CADY.

It is said that the natives of the Society Islands improved in every way for the first few years after embracing Christianity, but as time passed by, formality took the place of true, Christian devotion.

About fifty years ago, the French took possession of two of the largest islands, doing away with their religious laws. Every one was left free to do and believe as he pleased, so long as the civil laws were not violated.

GROUP OF NATIVE CHILDREN.

One might fish, trade, buy or sell, stay at home, or attend church upon Sunday. It soon became apparent that many had refrained from work and had attended church on Sunday more from fear of the laws of the land than that God would be displeased with them. As soon as the law was repealed, church members, and nearly everybody, would not only cook, but do their marketing upon that day.

In Tahiti, Sunday is the great market day, when it is customary for all who live near enough to go to the market in the morning, some to sell and others to buy. It is the day of all days when the people spend their time in festivities. Many go to church in the morning, and then spend the afternoon and evening in drinking and making merry, going through with all sorts of old, heathenish performances.

Raiatea, one of the largest islands of the group, has stood out against the French government until only a few months ago. The people of this island have looked upon themselves as better than their brethren who were under the French laws, because they had laws against work of any kind upon Sunday. I remember of seeing a stranger on the island, who was not a believer, but wished to attend one of the religious meetings in the adjoining district. He arose Sunday morning, and traveled to the place of worship, reaching it a little before meeting time. As he was preparing to take a bath in the river before going into the church, an officer informed him that it was against the law to bathe at that time; that he might wash his face and hands, but that he could not take a full bath until after four o'clock that evening. He also stated that this law was made to keep people from doing anything that would detain them from church.

It is customary in these islands to have a watch meeting at the church New Year's eve, to bid adieu to the old year and welcome the new one in. I attended such a meeting on the island of Raiata three years ago. There everything was church and state fully united, and they looked forward to the time when the Lord would cast the French into the sea, or destroy them in as marked a manner as he did the enemies of the Israelites. The time was occupied by exhortations, prayer and singing. Each district represented had its own choir, and only one choir was to sing at a time. About nine o'clock their pastor appointed a certain choir to sing a hymn. There was a misunderstanding, and two of the choirs began singing different hymns at the same time. They were requested to stop, but could not be induced to do so, as each wished to be the one to sing. So they continued singing for nearly thirty minutes. By this time nearly the whole congregation of about one thousand were on their feet, and they were preparing to have a pitched battle in the church to settle the difficulty. Through the efforts of their queen and others, peace was at last restored, but it took until about 11 o'clock for them to get settled down so that they could go on with their meeting.

On Sunday, a meeting of another denomination was held on board a ship in the harbor, and the queen and some of her friends were invited to attend. She accepted the invitation, but, upon returning to land, found officers waiting to impose a fine against her for attending a meeting which was not conducted by their own church.

Can the government, by passing religious laws, make better citizens and Christians? It certainly has failed in these islands, as is acknowledged by all who are acquainted with what was the Raiatean government. It is apparent that all these religious laws only tended to give the people a very poor idea of what true Christianity is. It was all form and no practice. The result is that the people poorly realize that they are responsible before God for the way they live, for they considered it their chief duty to do as the rulers directed them in religious matters. As the French took possession of the islands, religious laws were abolished. When they were no longer restrained by the law, but few attended church, and fishing and all kinds of work were done by them on Sunday. A native church member portrayed the matter to me, telling how that now they have no religion, as many of the people are busy with other things Sunday, and do not attend church. I asked why it was so. She replied that there is no law now for bidding them to work on Sunday, and that they had not kept it since the law was repealed. I then asked her if she thought that they would refrain from labor if they had another Sunday law. She thought that would be all that was needed to get the people to keeping the day properly again.

But, who would they obey, God or the government, if they were to keep Sunday simply because the government would fine them for working upon that day? If men will not obey a plain command of God, but rest upon a certain day because the government commands them to do so, can God look upon that as obedience to his law? No; it is simply obeying the law of the land: for when men obey because the state commands, they do it not in respect for God, but for fear of temporal punishment. The tendency of all such laws is to make professed Christians, who have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof.

What God wants is men who are true to him, even though all the world may be against them. Where are the Daniels of to-day, who will serve God in the face of a frowning world? Where are the Pauls, who will give their lives to living and preaching the gospel, and give up the idea of making Christians by passing religious laws in the governments of the world? Christ says, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." But we are not doing to others as we would have them do to us, when we try to compel them to do what we wish them to do. Such attempts have always resulted in evil, and always will.

The author of Christianity says, "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

Significance of the Proposed Religious Amendment to the Constitution.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE Constitution of the United States is in perfect accord with the Protestant idea of church and state contended for in the Reformation. One reason, why such separation was provided for was because it was then recognized that it was "impossible for the magistrate to adjudge the right of preference among the various sects that profess the Christian faith without erecting a claim to infallibility which would lead us back to the church of Rome."

With but few exceptions, the people comprising this nation are either Catholics or Protestants—the large majority being Protestants.

Every well-instructed Catholic knows how and when Protestantism originated. He knows that in the sixteenth century there were those, who, loyal to the Word of God, in the strength and power of Jesus Christ, dared to stand up and protest against the Romish doctrine of the union of church and state.

But it is a question as to how many of those who call themselves Protestants know how and when Protestantism originated. For certain it is that at this present time there are millions of professed Protestants who are stultifying themselves and denying the principle from which they derive their name.

That they are not conscious of this is evident, for there are many already who have come to a true understanding of the work in which they were engaged, and have renounced it.

Now, if a person does not know what Protestantism really is, how can he possibly know what Romanism is?

That being so, when such a thing happens, and it has happened, that Roman Catholics and Protestants work together for the same object, one may depend upon it that the Romanist will decidedly have the best of it, for he is not working in the dark. He knows exactly what his principles are, and he knows, too, that Romanism and true Protestantism cannot possibly agree any more than it is possible for light and darkness to mingle together. The one is the inveterate foe of the other.

Consequently, when a professed Protestant unites thus with the Catholic, the latter knows full well that the former has ceased, in reality, to be a Protestant, if indeed he ever was one more than in name.

When it is remembered, as stated above, that the one reason why the union of church and state is forbidden in the Constitution, is because it is impossible for the magistrate to adjudge the right of preference among the various sects that profess the Christian faith without erecting a claim to infallibility which would lead us back to the Church of Rome; and when it is remembered, too, that Protestantism is a protest against the Catholic principle of union of church and state, the question may well be asked, Can a person be a Protestant and indorse any effort that might be made to have the Constitution changed with reference to this matter of church and state? Decidedly not. He may be a Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, or anything else, but he would not be a Protestant.

Now there are in this country millions of Protestants (so-called) who are laboring hard to have the Constitution changed, and to have the Christian religion incorporated into the fundamental law of the land.

Year after year, Congress has been besieged and petitioned to legislate in behalf of religion, notwithstanding that Congress is expressly forbidden, by the Constitution, to have anything to do with religion—for or against. For in the very nature of things it could not legislate in favor of one religion without legislating against some other.

Will those Protestants who are thus engaged in this work stop and consider what they are doing before they get so far along that they cannot retrace their steps? Will they take the Word of God and ponder its pages upon this particular question? for God has spoken plainly regarding it, and pointed out the inevitable result of such a movement as that they have undertaken.

THE only trouble with the numerous wise schemes for the reformation of society that are being everywhere heralded, is that they will not "work."

DR. BRUNO WILLE, a "free thinker," of Berlin, was recently sentenced to a week's imprisonment at Gratz, Austria, for "publicly holding up to contempt the Christian religion." It is safe to say that the act of imprisoning a person on such a charge does more to hold the Christian religion up to contempt than anything that was done by Dr. Wille.

THE difference between civilization and Christianity, which seems not to be very clear in many minds, has been illustrated in a melancholy way out in Kansas, by the recent action of four Pawnee chiefs, or as perhaps it might be better to say, by the actions of their wives. Just what the conduct of the latter was in every case, we are not informed; but it was such as to bring their husbands into the United States Court with a petition for divorce. What an unwonted incident is this to be chronicled in the history of the red man!

ONE of the strongest cases, we are told, was that made out by Pipe Chief, who averred that his conjugal partner wanted to spend all his money on fine dresses, and refused to associate with squaws who were not in her set. The untutored mind of the chief probably did not understand the high precedent which Mrs. Pipe Chief had for her conduct in this respect. He did not comprehend the fact that in this she was only imitating the conduct of ladies in the highest circles of civilized society. Perhaps it would have made no difference to him if he had. At any rate, the fact remains that from his point of view, such conduct was more intolerable than anything which belonged to the ways and customs of savagery. And who can say that his point of view may not be nearer the truth than the highly artificial standpoint from which is derived the unwritten social law of the "best society"?

It may not be that "society" would be willing to admit it, but it is a fact susceptible of proof that this most "sacred" and carefully followed part of the code of "high society," stands or falls with the case of Mrs. Pipe Chief, of the Kansas plains. For if it be right for the ladies who move in the circles of civilized society to spend money regardlessly for fine dresses and refuse to associate with people not in their set, as everybody knows that they do, who can take exception to a similar course on the part of those with whom their own civilization comes in contact? Is not a good example worthy of imitation? If it be proper to have a social "four hundred" in New York City, why is it not proper to have a social four hundred, or forty, as the case may be, in Pawnee society on the Western plains? It really seems as though civilized "society" were bound to come to the rescue of Mrs. Pipe Chief, and vindicate the propriety of her conduct in this matter.

THE divorce court, it is almost needless to remark, is a necessary adjunct of civilization. The nearer we approach the dividing line between civilization and savagery, the less do we see of this institution. In making use of it for the purpose of annulling the matrimonial relation, the Pawnee chiefs have taken a step which distinctly favors of transition from the ways of barbarism to those of civilization; and in developing a passion for fine dresses, and "cutting" squaws not in her set, Mrs. Pipe Chief shows a still further advance toward civilization's "higher" ideals. But what have fine dresses, social "sets," and divorce courts to do with Christianity?

CONTACT with civilization in many instances marks the red man's decadence. But contact with Christianity can never be otherwise than elevating and ennobling.

Is there a pious way of doing things that are wicked? We might conclude that there is, from many things that are said nowadays by some who occupy the position of religious teachers of the people.

FOR instance, the pastor of a church in Oakland, Cal., is quoted as having addressed the following to the managers of the race tracks at the neighboring town of Emeryville: "I request you to consider and inform me of your opinion as to the possibility of having a Christian day at the races. This, of course, would preclude drinking and gambling." It would seem that this pastor is bent on supplying the floating phrase, "pious horse race," with a definite basis of fact.

It may be that this California pastor has been wrongly quoted; but the words are so well in accord with the religious spirit of the times that there is little reason to doubt the correctness of the report. There is a "pious" way of conducting fairs, lotteries, "donkey" sociables, etc., in the basements of the churches, and why, on the same principle, should there not be a pious way of conducting a horse race? There are worse things than horse racing, which it is commonly believed can be done in a Christian way; for instance, the taking of human life in the heat of battle. Certainly it is worse to kill a man convicted of no crime than it is to race horses. And if Christian people can do the one, and remain Christians while they are doing it, there can be no reason why they cannot, as Christians, engage in the other.

THE only thing really surprising about the pastor's request is that he should think it necessary to exclude drinking and gambling. No one questions, of course, that drinking and gambling are wrong, as ordinarily indulged in. But if they are done not in a worldly manner, but in a pious, religious way, can any one object to them then? Why have a "Christian day" at the race track, and not also a "Christian day" at the bar and gaming table? In the fairs and lotteries which are now so frequently held inside church doors, we have an illustration of how gambling can be done in a "Christian" way; and if a bar were set up inside the church edifice, where everything would be very respectable, and people of good church standing might come and drink in a quiet and moderate way, would this not also be compatible with Christianity? If a thing can be made very respectable, is there anything to hinder its becoming pious?

IN all ages of the world, men have sought to shield the workings of their carnal propensities behind the idea that such acts were all right and even laudable when done in the name and under the cloak of religion. It was considered proper to hate people, and even to kill them, if it be done from a "pious" motive. If a person had committed an offense against religion, he was given a religious trial, conducted by prelates of the church, and then, if convicted, it was deemed quite proper even to burn him at the stake, care being taken to keep up the religious appearance to the last by holding a crucifix before the condemned and filling his ears with religious exhortations. It was even thought quite proper to execute "heretics" without the formality of a trial, when the church or the pope approved such work as being a "pious" undertaking. And since it is true that men have often found a way to "sanctify" the passion of hatred, even as manifested in the taking of human life, it is only natural that they should find ways to "sanctify" other carnal passions whose outworkings are less serious in their results.

BUT the truth which is invoked by every manifestation of this baneful delusion, is that such passions of the natural heart as prompt men to indulge in horse racing and gambling, or any other form of worldliness, are never so dangerous, never so wicked, never so detestable, as when clothed with the forms of piety.

A Catholic Bishop on Church and State.

New York Independent, December 23.

BISHOP SPALDING, of Peoria, is one of the ablest and best equipped bishops in the American Catholic Church. We therefore listen with especial interest to what he has to say of the effect in the Catholic countries of Europe of having the church supported by the state. Speaking of the religious and moral lapse of the Italians who come to this country, he says:—

"They have been led by unfortunate circumstances into indifference and even antagonism to the church. In the first place, the means and opportunities of public worship have been provided for them without their being called on to bear their share in the expense. And, since what costs us nothing we care little for, they have become callous, and have relaxed somewhat their hold upon the vital faith which is nourished by generous deeds and unselfish devotion."

This is sound American doctrine; and we cannot understand why Catholics and Anglicans who find the absolute divorce of church and state so admirable in this country should so deprecate religious independence in England or Italy.

Religious Liberty in the Argentine Republic.

BY L. BROOKING.*

THE following is an article from El Faro, a periodical in the Argentine Republic, under date of Nov. 1, 1897:—

"LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE.

"The national Constitution will shortly be submitted to a constituent convention with the object to effect in it certain urgent reforms. Among these reforms figures that of liberty of conscience, which until now has been prevented by the second article that says, 'The Federal Government sustains the Roman Catholic apostolic religion.' There is being signed with much enthusiasm a petition asking for the suppression of the said article. This petition says very judiciously, 'The separation of church and state is to-day a constitutional precept of the most civilized new countries. The United States of America, a model religious country, owes to it a great part of its strength, its freedom, and active ideas; and Brazil has adopted it conjointly with (the formation of) the Republic. The separation of church and state is a guarantee that we owe even among ourselves to liberty of conscience, and a highly needful measure in this country to which flow men from all schools and of all religions. If they are to be fertile for our intellectual and moral development, it will not be by the privileges which some of them enjoy, but by the necessity which all see to strengthen themselves with the practice of good and truth. The abolition of the calculated cost of worship is a wage of liberty for the actual official church, and a sign of respect to the right that the Catholics have of paying the cost of the religion in which they alone believe."

Noble words these because they are true; and had that been the principle since their independence, how much purer and nobler would the lives of many of our brethren in those countries have been, as they would have had a purer standard than that of the state-supported clergy. I say "brethren" because "God hath made of one blood all nations," and they can accept the word that brings comfort to us; "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life."

* Late missionary to Argentina.

Religious Liberty in Chile.

In July, 1897, the Roman Catholic bishop of Iquique, Chile, published and caused to be posted on the doors of the Catholic church in that city, a circular, of which, says the Converted Catholic, the following is a translation:—

“TO CATHOLICS:

“Those married persons whose marriages have not been performed by the church, until this is done:—

- “1st—Cannot receive the sacraments;
- “2nd—Nor be god-parents;
- “3rd—Nor be witnesses in marriage ceremonies;
- “4th—Nor be inscribed as members in the religious societies, nor receive the scapulars;
- “5th—Nor have charge of any duty in the church;
- “6th—Nor can funeral honors be celebrated for them;
- “7th—Their names shall be erased from every society and religious association;
- “8th—In the baptismal records, their children shall be counted illegitimate;
- “9th—They are public sinners;
- “10th—Their names shall be recorded in an especial book for the preceding end.”

And this same church poses in America as the champion of civil and religious liberty; and what is stranger still, a great many Protestants seem actually to believe that it is the truth.

The Church and the World.

BY M. E. KELLOGG.

AN English Congregational minister, Dr. Barry, has lately expressed the belief that “the church must be separated from the world while it seeks to save it.”

The sentiment expressed in these words is so self-evidently true, that no further words of commendation or approval can add anything to it. The doctor further elucidates his idea by comparing the present condition of things to a drowning man and a would-be rescuer. He says: “The danger is that the drowning man will clutch the rescuer and both will sink. It must not be so with the church. The church must clutch the world so firmly and lift it up, but not be dragged down by it.”

This, of course, is but to say that the church in its efforts to reform the world must not allow the world to deform the church.

Another thing ought to be no less apparent. If the church remains separate from the world, it cannot have any union with the state, whether that union be avowed or is only a tacit agreement. The state represents the world; it is the world in an organized capacity. Hence a union of the church with the state is the strongest kind of a union of the church with the world.

But the church has no mission to the state, or to the world as a whole, only as it has a mission to every person in the world. The mission of the church is to individuals.

“If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with me.” “Whosoever will, let him come.” The church, by the power given her of God, is equal to this task of saving individuals. The apostles saved no world—no nation as a whole—but they were remarkably successful in saving men.

A few hundred years passed, and the church conceived the idea of saving men by wholesale, by nations. The church seized the world, at least the Roman world, and tried to save it by uniting itself to the Roman state. There was a mighty pull, but the church gave way, and was dragged down to the level of the Roman world, and her fair robes were indelibly smirched. The same plan has been tried over and over again in different countries at different times, always attended with the same lamentable results.

The reason why God saves men individually and not by nations is very apparent. The salvation of men depends upon their individual wills, and each person must exercise his own will. Hence, in the offer of salvation, God appeals to individuals.

There is in the gospel power to save those who believe and submit their wills to God. Had God commissioned his church to seize the world and save it as a whole, then no doubt he would have clothed it with power for the accomplishment of the task. But he did not. The church has an abundance of power for the work God gives it to do to save individuals. Paul understood both the power and the scope of the gospel, and he said, “I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some.” 1 Cor. 9:22. Another apostle “declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles to gather out of them a people for his name.” Acts 15:14.

As long as the church keeps at her God-commissioned work of saving individuals, she will find herself clothed with power for her task; but if she tries to save the world as a whole, she will be shorn of her power and will be drawn down to the level of the world. The world as a whole is going down, sinking amid the sinful pleasures that “drown men in destruction and perdition,” and just as sure as the church takes a firm hold of the world so that the two cannot be separated, the church will sink with the world,—the would-be rescuer will also be drawn into the depths.

MR. N. O'MOORE, of Highland Park, Ill., writes: “Inclosed find $10, for which send the SENTINEL one year to each of the accompanying names, and credit my subscription five years in advance.”

MR. ETHAN LANPHEAR, of Plainfield, N. J., in renewing his subscription to the SENTINEL, says: “Among all the papers that come to my table, there is none that speaks as much truth in so few words as does the AMERICAN SENTINEL. May it continue to live until the end comes and righteousness triumphs.”

Studies in French History.—4.

"Now, children," said Professor Carman, as soon as they were all settled in their places, the next Tuesday afternoon, "I will ask all those who took notes at the last study, and who were impressed with some particular point, to raise their hands."

As so many responded to this invitation, the teacher said that he would only call on some of them to give a few points in the last lesson.

"Julia March, you may mention something which impressed you."

"I remember particularly about the Germans coming over into Gaul while it was in possession of the Romans, and how they settled themselves down there, in spite of all the Romans could do to prevent it. I thought it was quite a good deal like bad habits. When they once get hold of us, they are like those old Germans—kind of hard to get rid of."

Julia March always had a way of turning almost any subject, and looking at it from a moral standpoint.

"Well, Max, what do you remember?"

"That Attila was a very ferocious fellow who came from Central Asia, fought bloody battles, and finally ran away from the Romans."

"Will Barnaby, we will hear from you next."

"I don't know as I've got so very much to say, professor," said Will, awkwardly, "but I remember that Clovis was the first French king; that he was at first a heathen, and I should almost say, a heathen from first to last. Then, I remember that the name of Paris used to be Lutetia, and that it became the capital of King Clovis about 500 years after Christ."

"Well done! you have all, in fact, done very nicely. But now we would better proceed in our study."

"Professor, Joe Palmeter has his hand up," called Henry Ray.

"I see. Well, Joseph?"

"It won't take two minutes for me to say that what impressed me most was that Clovis looked to the bishops to help him get new territory, as much or more, than to his soldiers; and that he fought with the Visigoths 'cause they didn't happen to believe as he did."

"Well done; I see you have no sympathy with the idea of using force in matters of conscience. But I believe I have not told you yet why the Romans gave its name to the city of Paris. It was from a tribe they found living there named Parisii. King Clovis, I am sorry to say, during the last part of his reign, became more and more greedy, and his conscience proved itself no match for his ambition. Still he did much to improve and beautify the city of Paris. But along at last, he has put himself on record as a 'brutal and cold-blooded murderer.' He killed Prince Cloderic, whose father ruled one of the tribes of Franks over which he wanted to rule, after influencing him to murder his (Cloderic's) old father. He also killed or caused to be killed other prominent persons who stood in the way of his ambition, until at last he was king of all the Franks and Roman Gauls. But he lived only one short year after this. He died when but forty-five, and was buried in his capital, Paris. You may write in your note books:—

"Clovis, first king of the Franks, died 511 A. D."

"The oldest historians claim that Meroveus or Meerwig, the son of Clodion, was the grandfather of Clovis. So his descendants, or we may say, the kings who succeeded Clovis, were called the Merovingians, or Meerwings.

"This race of kings was bad in every way, and are a disgrace to the pages of history. Clovis was of course a very bad man, but in comparison with some of his vile descendants he seems quite humane.

"When Clovis died, he left his kingdom in the hands of his four sons, none of whom was the equal of his father. Finally, after a deal of bloodshed, the youngest son, Clotaire, took the kingdom. At his death, it was again divided between his four sons, who quarreled over it, like their uncles had done.

"The eastern part of the country was called Austrasia, and the western Neustria, and for a while these two divisions had a separate history. But after much war and trouble, poor Brunehaüt, who was queen of Austrasia, was tied to the tail of a wild horse and trampled to death, at the age of eighty years; and the man who did this dreadful deed, Clotaire, the son of a vile woman and King Chilperic of Neustria, was now king of both the eastern and the western divisions.

"Dagobert, his son, is about the only one bearing the name of king, after Clovis, that we will care to remember. But his life was anything but a good one. He once caused 9,000 people to be killed, who had come to him for protection, simply because he did not know what to do with them. They were troublesome to him, so he had them all killed."

"Horrible!" said Charlie White. "It seems as if this was a pretty good example of might against right. I don't think Rob and I would care to visit France next summer if King Dagobert were ruler," he exclaimed, with a shudder.

"No, I presume not; and yet Dagobert did a little toward bringing order out of confusion. When he died, there arose a class of miserable apologies for kings, called 'Do-Nothings.' So the authority was vested in a set of men called 'Mayors,' who did all they could to keep the kings in ignorance and vice, so that they could have the power themselves. One of these mayors, Pepin, ruled during the lives of four of these shadow-kings.

"Pepin again united the eastern and western divisions, and held the reins of government while the 'long-haired idler' of a king was playing with his dogs at his home in the country."

"I don't see what good it did them to be kings at that rate," said Jack Smith, who had always thought he would like to be a king.

"It was poor satisfaction indeed," answered Professor Carman. "Though once a year, Pepin would have the real king paraded through Paris in great style, and seat him on a golden throne for a day, and then back he must go to his country home."

"When Pepin died, his son, Charles Martel, took the reins, at the age of twenty-five years. He fought against the Mahometans, who had conquered Spain and set up a kingdom there. The people of Gaul were very much afraid of these Saracens, as they were called, but Charles was strong enough for them. In a dreadful battle near the city of Tours, he conquered them, and gained for himself the title of 'Hammer,'—for he literally hammered the Saracens."

"I thought Attila was called the 'Hammer,'" said Max Smith.

"The Hammer of the Universe," corrected Edna Phillips.

"When Charles Martel died," continued the teacher, "his son, Pepin the Short, assumed control, hunted up a puppet king, a miserable Merovingian, took him from the convent, let his hair grow again, and called him King Childeric III. Pepin then sent to the pope to ask him which should have the kingdom; the one who had nothing but a name, or he who knew best how to govern. The pope answered him that the man who should be king was he who knew how to govern. You see Pepin was sharp enough to understand that if he wanted to hold the kingdom, he must have the pope on his side."

"Yes," said Joe Palmeter, "I see,—church and state again!"

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

MR. W. R. MATTOX, of Terre Haute, Ind., to whom the SENTINEL was sent by some friend during our late special offer, in renewing the same, says: "The SENTINEL has been a welcome visitor to my office for three months, and I find the time profitably spent in reading it. The work of the SENTINEL in the cause of religious liberty is so ably and earnestly pursued that those who read it cannot fail to be convinced by it. Both reason and experience, history, and Bible teaching, support the SENTINEL in its position on this question. . . . I like the SENTINEL, and must have it a year."

The following, addressed to the AMERICAN SENTINEL, with $1 inclosed for renewal of subscription from Mr.

Sanford Rogers, Coopersville, Mich., is appreciated: "We have found you always true and can trust you still. The first numbers ever folded were for me to distribute on the train from California to Ohio."

THE article on page 19, by Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, is the first of many of which we have the promise for our readers during the coming year. The writer's wide experience as National Evangelist of the W. C. T. U., enables her to speak from the standpoint of what she has seen and felt of the needs of the masses along the line of instruction in religious liberty topics, and we feel sure her contributions will prove a valuable addition to the feast of good things which our readers will enjoy during 1898.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOL. 13, No. 3.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 20, 1898.

The American Sentinel is published in the interests of religious liberty—Christian and Constitutional.

NOTE Any one receiving the American Sentinel without having ordered it may know that it is sent to him by some friend. Therefore those who have not ordered the Sentinel need have no fears that they will be asked to pay for it

No individual can be compelled to walk in the path-way of righteousness.

God cannot accept any service that is sought to be rendered to him through Cæsar.

THE preservation of individual rights is necessary to the formation of right character.

HUMAN law fights crime by shutting up the criminal; the divine law fights sin by liberating the sinner.

THERE is good conduct by law in the penitentiary; but this does not make a model community out of the inmates.

A SUNDAY law never developed anybody's moral courage, manliness, independence, honesty, or love of principle.

"THE kingdom of Satan failed because it was founded upon the love of power. The kingdom of Christ succeeded because it was founded upon the power of love."

THE effort to enforce Sunday upon the people by law is an effort to make one man's liberty judged by another man's conscience, which is directly contrary to Christianity. 1 Cor. 10:29.

Is it true that the church's power and her opportunities to do her appointed work are provided her by the Lord? or are they contingent upon the popular ballot and the action of legislatures?

THE difference between a Christian and a "Christian nation" is that a Christian is phenomenally slow to take offense at an injury or insult, while a "Christian nation" is phenomenally quick to do just the opposite.

THE theory that men can be compelled to be good, by law, is the old pagan and carnal theory that a person must do good in order to be good. The truth, as embodied in the gospel, is that a person must be good in order to do good.

For Conscience' Sake.

THE Christian is, in all things governed by the dictates of conscience. For conscience' sake he is careful to render to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's, as well as to give unto God that which is God's.

This is in accordance with the plain instructions of that Word which is the Christian's rule of life. "Whatever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord and not unto men," is the exhortation given in the epistle to the Colossians (chap. 3:23), and the apostle Paul makes a still more definite application of the principle in the thirteenth chapter of Romans. There the Christian is enjoined to be "subject unto the higher powers," and it is said (v. 5), "Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake."

Only conscientiously, therefore, can the Christian be subject to the "powers that be," in a scriptural way.

When a law is made, therefore, which conflicts with conscience, it strikes at the very mainspring of the Christian's action as regards his duty toward the state.

If he yields his conscience in deference to the demands of the law, he cannot, "for conscience' sake," be subject unto the civil authority.

When the state wants a Sunday law, the Christian, believing it to be his duty to sanctify the seventh day and not the first, according to the fourth commandment, cannot, "for conscience' sake," render obedience to the state in it.

For the very sake of the duty he owes to the state, which is to be conscientiously rendered, he must refuse to yield his conscience to the state.

The Christian who parts with conscience can serve neither God nor the state. And no law can ever be in the interests of the state which brings any pressure to bear upon Christians in this direction.

Which Is the Better?

THE gospel of God aims to lead an individual to the highest plane of heroism,—so to develop personal independence, courage, and love of truth and justice that he would dare do right though all the world should do wrong, and though he should suffer death for doing it. It aims to make of him a Moses, an Elijah, a Daniel, a Paul, a Luther.

The Sunday law (and all religious legislation) tends to make an individual move with the masses, to lean upon the crowd, to think that he cannot do right independently of others around him, or without a law to make it convenient and easy for him. It tends to make him go as all moral cowards go, to do as they do, and think as they think. It tends to make him more a moral coward than he is already.

No individual ever rose to distinction in this world who followed such a plan of action.

The one tends to elevate the individual to the highest plane of moral development, the other tends to sink him to the lowest level of moral cowardice.

Which is the better of these two systems? Which of these two classes of individuals does the nation want?

"Sunday Slavery."

THE Constitution of the United States declares that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

This being so, the millions who are in the bondage of "Sunday slavery," about which so much is now said by the advocates of Sunday laws, have a plain remedy for their situation in an appeal to the fundamental law of the land.

Why, then, is not the Constitution invoked by somebody for this purpose? For that it never has been appealed to as a remedy for "Sunday slavery" is an evident fact, although the agitators for Sunday laws are not in ignorance of its provisions.

The plain reason is that these agitators know very well that the Sunday work about which they are talking is not slavery at all. They know that there is not a court in the land that would for a moment sustain the idea that the anti slavery provision of the Constitution had any application to such labor.

This "slavery" is a myth. There is a great deal of moral slavery in the land, but only the gospel of God can deliver any person from that.

Hypocritical Laws and their Enforcement.

THE New York World, of the 12th inst., alludes to the operation of the excise and Sunday laws under the new Tammany administration, and says that "President York, of the Police Board, expressed the true idea in saying that the excise and Sunday laws should be 'broadly construed and liberally enforced.'"

We want no laws that have to be construed and enforced in this way. We want laws that are plain in their meaning, that mean what they say, and that will be enforced in exact accordance with their wording. Anything less than this can be only hypocrisy and fraud.

D. L. Moody on "Reform."

REFORM! What we want is the regeneration of the city by the power of the Holy Ghost. You can't make good governments out of bad men.

Proposed "Sabbath" Legislation at Albany.

THE daily press has announced that the question of Sunday legislation will shortly be raised at Albany, by a bill to be introduced by Assemblyman Harburger.

This proposed bill will so amend the sections of the code which relate to the observance of Sunday as to permit baseball on the National League grounds, and almost every kind of show and sporting contest "between the hours of 8 and 11 o'clock in the evening."

This of course is simply to say that those whom the bill represents do not care a fig for any principle that may be involved in Sunday legislation, but only for the dollars which such legislation may shut out from their pockets. They are willing that honest business should be prohibited, and also innocent sports and pastimes except in such a way as will affect their own pecuniary interests.

It is not at all certain that the bill will pass; but it may be taken as a straw that shows which way the wind is blowing. It is clear that the cause of religious liberty has nothing to expect from this so-called "liberal" element on the ground of principle.

That cause has nothing to gain from a law which would wink at injustice, ignore consistency, and rest upon no foundation but that of selfish policy.

Then and Now.

BY G. S. HONEYWELL.

WHEN Peter took the sword to defend his Master, the first and only thing he did was to cut off the high priest's servant's right ear. When Christians take up the sword to-day in defense of their Master's cause, the first and only thing they can or will do is to cut off the High Priest's (Christ, Heb. 6:14) servant's right ear, which is the ear of faith; leaving the church deaf to the things of God: as it is written, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." But it was the work of Christ to restore that important member. "Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ;" and as such, we should be found "laborers together with God."

It Is a Union of Church and State.

THE Christian Citizen complains of "unfriendly critics" who "misrepresent" the Christian Citizenship League, "by assuming that Christian citizenship means a union of church and state." Then the Citizen sets up the following defense against that charge:—

"Now it ought to be so clear as not to require repetition that a separation of church and state does not separate the individual Christian from the state. Under the old absolute monarchies there was a difference between duties to the state and to God. Then the Christian only had to see that he 'render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.' But in a republic like ours the individual is himself a part of the state, and becoming a Christian and a member of the church, which is separate from the state, does not make him any less a part of the state."

Now, whether we shall be counted an unfriendly critic or not (we think we are friendly), this defense needs to be analyzed. From what we know is in it, it is possible that there may be something there that the Christian Citizen has not seen.

First. "A separation of church and state does not separate the individual Christian from the state." And "the individual is himself a part of the state, and becoming a Christian and a member of the church, which is separate from the state, does not make him any less a part of the state."

The individual is originally a part of the state. He is originally not a Christian, and therefore has no connection, nor any part, with the church, because the church is separate from the state. Originally, then, the individual is wholly of the state alone.

But now he chooses to be a Christian. He wants to unite with the church. In other words, he desires to form a union of himself and the church. He "is a part of the state;" and the church "is separate from the state."

Now the problem is, How can he remain "a part of the state" and form a union of himself and the church without at the same time and in that very act, so far as it is possible for him to do, forming a union of the church and the state?

The Christian Citizen says he can do it, but does not tell how. We say that he cannot do it, and tell how.

The church is composed of individuals, and the state is composed of individuals. The church is composed of individual Christians: the state is composed of individual citizens. The individual citizen is first; he is born to that; he is a "part of the state"—there is a union of himself and the state. He chooses to form a union of himself and the church. He does so. The Christian Citizen says that when he does so, he is "not any less a part of the state;" and at the same time insists that the church is separate from the state. But in that individual citizen it is not separate from the state. In him the individual citizen and the individual Christian are the same identical person. And as he is still a part of the state, and has now become also a part of the church—it follows as certainly as that two and two make four, that in that individual there is a union of church and state.

"The church is separate from the state." The individual citizen is "a part of the state." He forms a union of himself and the church, still remaining "a part of the state." Then it is absolutely settled that in himself there is formed a union of church and state. It is therefore as impossible for an individual citizen to form a union of himself and the church and still remain a part of the state, without at the same time and in that very thing forming within himself a union of church and state, as it is for two bodies to occupy the same identical space at the same identical time, or for the same individual to be two distinct persons.

The great difficulty with this whole National Reform Christian Citizenship people is that they set up outside of and away from individual men a figment that they call the church and another figment that they call the state. Then, as they conceive that these two figments can never be united in what they are doing, so they insist that they as individual men can go on and do all that they choose without forming any union of church and state. But it is in the individual man where the union of church and state is always first formed. No union of church and state was ever formed, or ever occurred, outside of individual men, until a union of church and state was first formed inside of individual men. And the union of church and state was never formed inside of individual men, in any other way than that which is set forth in this defense of the Christian Citizen. This defense itself is essentially the advocacy of a union of church and state.

Second. "Under the old absolute [obsolete?] monarchies there was a difference between duties to the state and to God. Then the Christian only had to see that he 'render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.'"

Now it was the Lord Jesus who first put this "difference between duties to the state and to God," as announced in the words "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." And this difference was made by the Lord Jesus Christ for Christians, for church members, for those who believe in him, as certainly as for anybody else in the world, if not more so. This commandment—"Render unto Cæsar," etc.—was given for Christians, as well as for others, and for all time. It is a vital principle of the Word of God and of the religion of the Lord Jesus, and cannot be relegated to the old absolute (or obsolete) monarchies to pass away with them.

To say that this scripture relates only to the old absolute (or obsolete) monarchies, is only to say that the authority of God and the Lord Jesus Christ is that of an old absolute (or obsolete) monarchy.

The Christian Citizen allows that where this scripture applied, "under the old absolute [or obsolete] monarchies, there was a difference between duties to the state and to God." And the only way in which the Citizen can save itself from that difference now is to fasten this scripture to "old absolute monarchies" and repudiate them both together. But any scheme that is compelled to repudiate the words of the Lord Jesus to save itself, is dangerous on the face of it. And any "Christians" or Christian citizens who are ready to repudiate the words of Jesus Christ to save their scheme, are not to be trusted in any pretensions that they may make in their efforts to make that scheme successful.

In the Name of Liberty.—No. I.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

THESE are days for laying bare the foundations, as well as making careful note of building material, that the actual relation between man and God, and man and his fellow man, may be determined and adjusted before the day of final examination dawns.

There are a few principles which were spread by the hand that framed all things, in unbroken layers of bed rock under the entire surface of humanity. Some of these have been "discovered" by social speculators; mined, quarried, and sold in the market to the loss of many, and the selfish gain of the few; and so perverted in their use that they have often become a source of despair instead of a basis of hope.

The more necessary anything is to the individual, the more that it is personal in its application, the more capable it is of arousing all the selfishness that is in human nature. If it is incapable of being safely divided into unequal portions, it is incapable of any safe division or apportionment, except such as naturally follows each man's appropriation for himself of what he needs.

This is true of air, water, heat, cold, food, love, happiness, liberty, salvation.

Among the greatest of these, because it is that upon which depends the power of appropriation and use, is that of liberty.

No other principle has been more diverted and perverted—in fact, it has ceased to be recognized as a principle. It has been made over into a luxury which only a favored class can afford, and in the enjoyment of which they do not hesitate to afflict the helpless.

This is not peculiar to our times. Paul saw the same evil, and gave warning when he said, "Take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak;" and Christ saw it, and made it the especial mission of his gospel to adjust these disputed claims which have been staked out over the world-wide field of personal liberty, and sold to the highest bidder, regardless. It is the work of the gospel to reveal that magnificent truth, that the personal character of liberty makes it as universal as life itself, and as sacred as the right to be.

A man may be so incapable of using, or may so abuse, his liberty as to forfeit it; but when this forfeiture takes place it must be to that individual or power that has suffered from such misuse.

Every human being is between two stones of responsibility,—his responsibility to God, and to man,—and if he has his rights, must be left alone to adjust his relations to each in his own way, and must take the consequences upon himself.

Whenever man, by law or undue influence of any sort, undertakes to interfere with man's relation to God, he assumes a prerogative which God has most sedulously avoided, for he does not attempt to meddle between man and man, except as he furnishes light to live and work by, and in his tender, Fatherly way gives instruction in principles, and gives help when it is desired in executing every benevolent purpose.

Imagine a family of children taking the law of the home into their own hands, and punishing each other for disregard of the father's requirements. Such conduct would be a reflection on the father's intelligence, to say the least. The only conditions that could warrant interference upon the part of one child between another one and the father, would be incapability in him to perform the duties of his office.

A great deal of human legislation is in the nature of this kind of selfish interference upon the part of one portion of the family between a strong, competent, and magnificent father, and other of his children. He has delegated all the power that men have any right to exercise over each other, and given plain instructions for its use between man and man; but as concerns all relations between himself and each individual, he has held everything in his own hands.

As between man and man, man must have certain limited rights of legislation, and all human relations can be safely adjusted and controlled by the power which God has delegated for that purpose if properly used, but our Father is still the Father in his own house. He has not delegated to any man or government the right to legislate between him and his. He is perfectly able to attend to each individual case; and for man to undertake to make laws which touch upon matters of conscientious belief, is the height of presumption.

A conviction of these truths was at the foundation of the recent effort which I made to call attention to the inconsistency of "Sabbath legislation" by any organization of Christians.

The Best Men for War.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD, one of the most prominent men connected with English naval affairs, is quoted in the London papers as saying on the subject of fighting and fighters:—

"The best fighting men were the 'scallywags' of society, amongst whom he placed himself. He did not wish to be misunderstood, and he therefore mentioned that in his youth he was a boy who robbed orchards, who hated the idea of life at the desk, and to whom the prospect of a career in the army or navy was always most attractive. It was such men, he believed, who made soldiers and sailors."

This eminent authority on the subject no doubt tells the truth.

The Nature of God's Kingdom.

THE word "kingdom" signifies a government, or system by which intelligent creatures are ruled over by one who is considered a superior. At least five elements, or component parts, must enter such an organization to render it complete and effective. These are: 1. Certain territory by which to mark the extent of the kingdom. 2. Subjects to occupy the territory and sustain the government. 3. The king or ruler to whom the subjects are amenable. 4. A throne from which the decrees of the government emanate. 5. Laws by which the subjects may be governed, and the unity of the kingdom preserved.

The heavens and the earth, with all things in them, being the product of God's creative power, it could be truthfully said that, though his throne was prepared in the heavens, "his kingdom ruleth over all." Ps. 103:19. His may be known as the "kingdom of heaven," because his throne is located in the heavens, but his kingdom extends to the farthest limits of the universe, because every part of that wide domain is dependent on him for its existence.

One part of his vast domain was entrusted to man, whom he made in his own image, after his own likeness. Given all the noble qualities of the King of heaven, man was commissioned to rule the earth under the direction of the king himself. Gen. 1:26. Through man, as God's sub-ruler, the whole earth was to render homage to the Creator-King, and so manifest its loyalty to the rule of heaven. But man was only fairly installed in this office before a bold usurper appeared to wrest that power from him, and take to himself the rule of the territory intrusted to man's dominion.

The story of how this was accomplished is familiar to many. Man was induced to disobey one of the precepts of the kingdom of God, and by this declare himself an enemy of heaven's rule, and a friend of him who would dismember the kingdom. This act severed the earth from the rule of God, and placed it under the sway of Satan, God's greatest enemy. The situation at this juncture may be well illustrated by the following diagram:—

Let all the space within the circle represent the entire universe, once in harmony, under the sway of God's rule, thus constituting it the kingdom of heaven. Let that part marked B stand for the earth which Satan wrested from the power of man, into whose possession it had been intrusted, as the representative of the kingdom of heaven. The kingdom being thus dismembered by Satan, it follows that the rule or government of the separated part will thenceforward be distinct from all the rest of the universe, which is still loyal to the rule of heaven, as shown by that part of the diagram marked A.

No kingdom, however small and insignificant, whether it be a dependency or an imperial rule, can fail to disclose in its subjects the character of its ruler and the effect of his government. It is the same with the government of the two great general divisions of the universe. In God's kingdom, no force is used to compel obedience, but every subject of that government is such voluntarily. God's representative on the earth—the Lord Jesus—said, "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not." John 12:47. It was God's love for man which caused him to send Christ to die in place of the sinner. John 3:16. He asks no one to obey him except in love. He says, "If a man love me, he will keep my words." Again, "He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings." John 14:23,24. It is thus plainly revealed that love alone is the motive power of God's rule over his creatures, and that none can obey his rule except through love. This, then, shows that God, the Ruler of the heavenly kingdom, is love. 1 John 4:16.

Not so, however, with the ruler of the disjointed portion of the universe. As he employed force in its usurpation, so force must be the constant rule of his government as long as he maintains it. Since its seizure by Satan, every portion of the earth has, therefore, been ruled by force, more or less absolute, under the name of civil government. Whoever does not outwardly conform to the rule of this system, is immediately made an example of summary vengeance, as a warning to all others who may have thoughts of insubordination. Thus, the fear of punishment, instead of love for the ruler, is made the motive of obedience in the kingdoms of earth.

Men have been so long associated with this sort of government, that their ideas of heavenly citizenship have become molded after the earthly pattern, which is coercion through punishment. Laws are therefore enacted by which men may be constrained outwardly to conform to certain religious observances to indicate that they are favorable to the reign of God's kingdom. Of course, those who themselves care nothing for the prosperity of God's government do not desire to coerce others to follow its requirements, and this accounts for the reason why straightout worldlings have never been found as persecutors of others on account of their religion.

But since Satan has himself revolted from God's authority, it cannot be that he desires to coerce man into subjection to that kingdom. On the other hand, those who manifest a determination to be loyal to heaven's requirements, are sure to meet opposition from the arch enemy of righteousness. Then, why does his system of government admit such procedure? It can arise from nothing else than the desire to oblige every one to be, at least outwardly, loyal to the government under which he finds himself. And inasmuch as it seems less harsh to appear to force people to be good rather than bad, certain laws having a religious tinge, but being opposed to God's requirements, are promulgated, and those who are somewhat religious are drawn to believe the best thing to be done is rigidly to enforce such laws, thus aiding in the work of opposing the kingdom of God, while professing to be loyal to it. This has ever been the system of tactics employed by Satan in his attempts to destroy the reign of God over men.

On the other hand, the King of heaven sent his Son into the disaffected territory to point out to the enslaved ones a kingdom having a better system of government. So, as soon as he had received the public recognition of the Father by the anointing of the Holy Ghost, he began to preach "the gospel of the kingdom of God." Mark 1:14. Standing upon the enemy's territory, as indicated by B in the diagram, he pointed to that part of the universe, marked A in the diagram, which was still loyal to heaven, and said, "The kingdom of heaven is like a grain of mustard seed;" "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven;" "Like treasure hid in a field;" "Like a merchantman seeking goodly pearls," etc. Matt. 13: 24, 31, 33, 44, 45, and many other places.

Choosing twelve apostles, he sent them forth also to tell men of this same better kingdom, of which he was the representative, giving them power to heal the sick, to cleanse the lepers, to cast out devils, and even to raise the dead, in order to demonstrate the nature of the kingdom to which they invited men to be loyal, and to show its life-giving power in restoring to soundness those who had become diseased through sin. Matt. 10:7, 8.

It should not seem strange that such teaching, accompanied by such demonstrations, met with such decided and unqualified disapproval from Satan, since the success of Christ's mission meant the overthrow of his system of government. He would not then, nor will he now, permit the true nature of God's kingdom to be presented among men, without seeking the destruction of those attempting to do so. The reason for this will be considered in a following paper. J. O. C.

Religious Liberty in the Friendly Islands.

BY E. HILLIARD.

THE people of the Friendly Island Kingdom claim that their constitution grants religious liberty. Doubtless those who framed and adopted it aimed to have the principles on which governmental action is based, such as would be restrictive to the rightful liberties of none. It is evident that the design was to exclude all class legislation, and permit the enacting of only such laws as could be enforced alike upon all. It reads:—

"There shall be but one law in Tonga for chiefs and commoners, for Europeans and Tongans. No law shall be enacted for one class and not for another class, but the law shall be the same for all the people of this land."—Declaration of Rights, Art. 4.

This constitution then declares religious liberty for all in the following terms:—

"All men are free to practice their religion and to worship God as they may deem fit in accordance with the dictates of their own conscience, and to assemble for religious service as they may appoint."—Art. 5.

The remainder of this article prescribes the limits of this freedom. It says:—

"But it shall not be lawful to use this freedom to commit evil and licentious acts, or under the name of worship to do what is contrary to the law and peace of the land."

Any government has a right to restrict all acts that are an infringement on the rights of others. While the framers of this constitution, doubtless, intended that it should grant to all full religious freedom, yet it is apparent upon close examination that it falls somewhat short of this. Let us see. The article immediately following the one quoted above, is restrictive of religious freedom. It reads:—

"The Sabbath day shall be sacred in Tonga forever, and it shall not be lawful to do work or play games or trade on the Sabbath. And any agreement made or document witnessed on this day shall be counted void and shall not be recognized by the government."—*Art. 6.

Why cannot legislators see that the Sabbath is a religious institution, and that a man has a right to keep it as such or to disregard it entirely? True religious liberty involves the right to be a Sabbath-keeper or a Sabbath-breaker. Is it not the privilege of every individual to keep any day he chooses? It certainly is. If, then, he chooses to keep some other day than the one declared to be forever sacred by the constitution of Tonga, must he in addition to it observe the day enjoined by that constitution? If so, he by no means enjoys religious freedom. Should he labor on the day that the constitution declares sacred, and on which it says that no work shall be done, then he would be charged with doing that which is unlawful and contrary to the peace of the land. So we see at once that the exercise of religious freedom is curtailed by the highest law of the land. It is very evident that no such law should compose a part of any governmental constitution. It is civil power entering the domain of God-given individual freedom.

If the individual conscientiously observes another day than the one enjoined by the government, and then is compelled by the civil power to observe in addition the one commanded by its constitution, he is taxed fifty-two days per year for his religious convictions, without the least benefit to the government. Counting his time at the moderate sum of one dollar and a half per day, he virtually loses seventy-eight dollars each year, and all because he chooses to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience.

No, no; any government that enjoins Sabbath observance upon its constituents does not grant religious liberty. The Lord gives a man the liberty of choosing between good and evil; but civil government does not propose to do this in the matter of Sabbath-keeping. The Lord says: "See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil." "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." Deut. 30:15; Josh. 24:15.

The lack of knowledge as to what constitutes true liberty has made the martyrs' graves. A man may know considerable about religious liberty; that is, about the privileges granted by the civil power respecting the practice of any religion; and he may live under a government that grants him this liberty to the fullest degree; and yet he may be an absolute stranger to true liberty. True or Christian liberty does not come from civil government. It emanates from a higher source. The choosing or rejecting of it involves life or death. Christ, the author of life, is the only one who has power to give life. The Word, in speaking of Christ, says, "Whoso findeth me findeth life." Prov. 8:35. This liberty, which is the freedom of soul from the slavery of sin, is within the reach of all. All are born into this world the servants of sin. Said the patriarch David: "Behold I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." Ps. 51:5. Said the Saviour, "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin." John 8:34. Reader, are you in the slavery of sin? Do you desire to be set free? Here is the remedy. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." John 8:32. It is the truth brought into the inner sanctuary of the soul that sets the captive free.

Now, when the divine law enjoins the observance of the seventh day of the week, and civil government demands obedience to the first, which will the Christian obey? He has tasted the pardoning love of the Infinite One, his soul is free, and he feels that he must stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made him free. Gal. 5:1. It matters not whether he dwells in a dungeon or a palace, he will maintain his allegiance to the divine government, and through obedience to the immutable law of God keep his name recorded in the book of life.

How unjust and cruel for earthly governments to enforce a law upon their constituents which is diametrically opposed to freedom of soul, and squarely in opposition to the divine law of God! O that those who are laboring in the interest of such a law could see from the light of God's Word what an evil thing they are doing. We trust some, at least, who are engaged in this wicked work, will find it hard to "kick against the pricks," and, like Saul of old, will be brought into harmony with the mandates of heaven, and find true liberty through the blood of Christ.

Bogus "Public Sentiment."

ON this subject the Detroit Free Press, in a recent issue, speaks as follows:—

"One of the most pronounced nuisances in either branch of Congress is the 'petition fiend' who devotes himself to 'creating public sentiment' by sending out great quantities of blank petitions for various purposes to religious and other organizations for signature. Upon being filled out, these forms are returned to the sender who dumps them in on the senators and representatives from the districts in which the signers reside. Just at present Senators McMillan and Burrows are suffering from an inundation of petitions ostensibly from Michigan religious organizations urging reforms in the morals of the people of the District of Columbia, including the abolition of the sale of intoxicating liquors in public buildings, the raising of the age of consent, and the observance of a puritanical Sabbath. A large number of these petitions are regularly put in circulation, collected and delivered to the senators by Wilbur F. Crafts, a gentleman who seems to find the employment most congenial. As neither branch of Congress regards the question covered as pertinent, and citizens of the District of Columbia regard them as exceedingly impertinent, the senators hope the flow of petitions can be diminished somewhat by an exposition of the methods employed in obtaining them."

Our correspondent who sends us the above adds the following by way of illustration:—

"I was present at a Sunday evening service in a town in Michigan several months since, when one of these petitions referred to was presented. The minister read it. The motion was made and seconded. The house was full. About six, or such a matter, voted in favor, none against. Result, as declared by the pastor in charge, 'Carried by the unanimous vote of the members of the First M. E. Church, at Memphis, Mich.'"

MR. GEO. F. B. UNGER says concerning the SENTINEL, "To part with it seems like burying an intimate friend."

AMONG the various schemes and ideas which have of late been sprung upon the public in the name of reform by law, is that of the establishment by Congress of a "bureau of matrimony," to rest upon a law to be passed making marriage compulsory upon all persons of marriageable age. As yet, this innovation has not a very strong backing, the visible power behind it consisting of one determined woman, by name Mrs. Charlotte Smith. Just what reasons the latter is able to set out in support of her proposition, we have not yet learned; but doubtless they are as numerous and quite as weighty as those urged in behalf of other proposed reforms with which the public have long been familiar.

It might be said in its support, for instance, that man was not created to live by himself, and that the married state is the one ordained for him by the Creator: and this is certainly true. Therefore it might be argued that, as a general rule, it is the duty of all persons of marriageable age to get married; and this being so, that there ought to be a law to make them do it. Statistics might be invoked to show—as they unquestionably do show—that criminals are proportionately more numerous among the unmarried part of the population than among the married; and hence it would be clear that by increasing the proportion of married people there would be secured a diminution in the amount of crime. And it will not be questioned that the prevention of crime is one of the chief ends of civil government.

That is the way people argue in support of some other and quite popular reforms, and the argument holds just as good in the one case as in the other. It is upon just this line of argument that the great movement for "Sabbath reform" rests. It was ordained that man should keep the Sabbath; and if all men would do this, the benefit to society would be incalculable. Crime and the evils which spring from human depravity would disappear as if by magic. Therefore, say the promoters of the movement, let us have laws which will oblige all people to keep the Sabbath. Their "logic" involves the same mistake that is involved in the idea of a compulsory marriage law,—a mistake which is fatal to the success of the scheme as a means of promoting the welfare of mankind.

THE mistake turns upon the point of compulsion. Marriage was not ordained as a state to be entered into by compulsion; and neither was the Sabbath so ordained. A person who marries under compulsion makes the poorest kind of a marriage partner, and the poorest exhibition of Sabbath keeping is furnished by the one who observes the day against his own free will. Unless his heart and soul are in it, the individual himself is not in it; and then the thing itself, whether marriage or Sabbath keeping, becomes only hypocrisy and sham.

THE trouble with Mrs. Smith's scheme of reform by enforced matrimony is not in the scheme itself, but in the principle on which it is based. It would be all right to compel people to get married, if the principle of reform by the force of law were a sound one. But it is not; and whenever this principle is embodied in a scheme of reform, things are made worse than they were before. This is the only result that can ever follow in such a case.

* * *

BUT although this is as plain as a b c, the efforts made to reform the city, state, and nation by law still keep up, and are becoming more widespread than ever. Morally, the world is moving backward, not forward.

* * *

THE state of Ohio has just passed through an acute attack of politics, which, while it has not furnished the rest of the country with a very edifying spectacle, has given the observer a fair idea of what politics can become under the developing influence of nineteenth century civilization.

* * *

THE most conspicuous thing in this contest was the open and specific charge of bribery made by the leaders of one political faction against the successful candidate for the office of United States senator. The latter having escaped defeat by a single vote, the President says that in his victory "all right-minded people will rejoice;" whereupon a prominent politician of the state makes reply to the President that his words are an "insult to every honest man in the United States." This is bad enough, certainly; but what would it have been if all the preachers in the state had been involved in the contest, imparting to it a distinctly religious character? Certainly it would have been worse, in such a case, than it was.

THERE is news just now of a rather strange and startling character from Italy. The pope, it is said, has made a pronouncement in favor of republics. This is contrary to the traditional policy of the papacy, which has always favored monarchical government. This pronouncement is made in the Civiltà Cattolica, the official organ of the papacy in Italy, in an article which is referred to as "evidently inspired."

THE article says that the co-existence in Rome of the Vatican and the Italian monarchy is not possible, and that one or the other of them must go. Which means, of course, that the monarchy must go, since the pope has no intention of going himself. The article says that there are many examples to prove that national unity may exist in other forms, and cites the republics of Switzerland and the United States as illustrations. There is in this no flattering significance as regards this "land of the free."

At this date, looking back at events which have transpired within recent years, it is not very difficult to see why the papacy has come to look with favor upon a republic. Traditionally, as stated, the policy of the papacy has been in favor of monarchy. The republics which are upon the earth to-day are of comparatively recent origin. They represented, at the time of their rise, a movement of the people away from long standing despotisms which had come down from the Middle Ages, in the direction of popular liberty. A republic—a "government of the people, by the people and for the people"—contained the promise of liberty for the people, both civil and religious. For this reason the papacy feared such a form of government, and stood against it.

BUT the papacy has discovered that things were not really so bad as it feared. It has discovered that even a republic may be "run" upon papal principles; that indeed the greatest republic of modern times is conducted upon lines which afford no real guaranty of that religious freedom to which she stands opposed. She has discovered that the United States Constitution, as now interpreted, is not the formidable document she thought it was; so that she has instructed her adherents to go forth to the spread of papal principles, bearing a copy of this Constitution in their hands. The pope was not long since assured by Mr. Burke Cochrane, a Catholic and one of the most prominent of American politicians, that church and state are not really divorced in this country, but are in fact firm supporters of each other. He sees too that an untiring effort is being made in this republic to secure as close a union of church and state as was ever known in the papacy's palmiest days. What wonder then that Rome has lost her fear of republican government. But how will the suggestion of an Italian republic be received by the crowned heads of Europe? This remains to be seen; though we may be sure that the papacy always feels her ground before she treads on it.

Items from Washington.

UNDER date of January 15, our Washington correspondent sends us the following:—

"The prospect is good for the defeat of the Sunday bill in the Congressional Committee.

"The three daily papers in this city have declared themselves in favor of opening the National Library on Sunday.

"No bill for the 'God-in-the-Constitution' amendment has yet been offered. Such a bill would have no chance of passing."

"Sabbath Reform" in the Transvaal.

THE Cradock Register (South Africa), in a recent issue printed the following item of "reform" news:—

"THE SABBATH.—The Rev. Mr. Murray, Moderator of the Dutch Reformed Church, in Natal, has addressed a letter to Afrikaners, expressing his sympathy with those who have suffered great losses through rinderpest. He considers the plague as a punishment for sins; the main transgression of the country being the violation of the Sabbath. 'Not only is the Sabbath considered as a "visiting" day by many, but even inoculation of cattle is being performed on that day.' The Transvaal Volksraad has decreed that officials shall in future be compelled to attend divine service on Sundays."

The Transvaal legislature is noted for its "whole-souled" way of doing things, and the present instance is no exception. Having set out to reform the community by law on the point of Sunday observance, the members of this body do not stop with any half-way measures, but decree that "officials shall in future be compelled to attend divine service on Sundays." They see that attendance at the churches is the ultimate step in this reform, and this is just what is seen by the promoters of the Sunday-observance movement here; but the latter are governed less by logic and more by policy.

But the logic of the Sunday law movement is the same here that it is in South Africa. The logic does not stop short of a decree compelling the people "to attend divine service on Sundays."

Your Conscience.

I WONDER how many of the youthful readers of the SENTINEL can really tell for what reason the Creator gave them a conscience.

And how many can tell what a person ought to do with his conscience?

Ought you to be master of your conscience? or should your conscience be master of you?

Some people try to quiet their conscience when it reproves them for a thing they have done, instead of correcting the wrong as conscience tells them. They seem to think they will be better off with a sleeping or a dead conscience than with one that is alive and wide-awake. But what is the right condition for every conscience to be in?

Of how much value do you think conscience is to you? Did you ever see a person who had no conscience at all, or almost none? And if so, did you envy him? Try to imagine what this world would be like if the people in it possessed no consciences.

Like every other thing that is of great value, conscience ought to be carefully cherished. And being a faculty of the mind, it must grow and become educated as the mind develops. But how ought it to be educated? Should it be by what men say; by the maxims of the world and the traditions that have come down to us from the past? Or is there some other and better way for it than this? and what is it?

When you go contrary to your conscience, because some person tells you to do so, what are you really giving up? If a law should be passed telling you to do a certain way, and your conscience should tell you differently, how much would you really surrender if you should yield your conscience?

How much do you think any person could serve the Lord without the aid of his conscience? Could any one who should surrender his conscience exercise faith?

The Bible tells us that whatsoever we do, we should do it not merely unto men, but unto the Lord. Now if you should surrender the conscience which God gave you, could you do anything unto the Lord? What do you say to this?

But is your conscience, or anybody's conscience, the standard of right and wrong? Could you say that your conscience told you to do a thing that interfered with some one's rights? Some people have said this, but it did not justify them. It was really not their conscience, but something else, that led them to do such things. God is the author of both conscience and rights, and he never made two things that conflict with each other. When conscience and law come in conflict, an appeal must be made to an authority which is higher than either, and that is the Word of the Creator.

The principle of the Golden Rule will always settle any seeming conflict between conscience and individual rights.

Studies in French History.—5.

"WHAT became of King Childeric III?" asked Florence Ray at the next study. "The time to go home came so soon last week that we did not find out, and I have been worrying about him ever since."

"Poor fellow," answered Professor Carman, "they shaved his head again, and sent him back to his cloister."

"Then I suppose Short Pepin had his way," snapped Joe Palmeter, spitefully.

"Pepin the Short," corrected Edna Phillips, whose memory of names and events never deserted her.

"Yes; Pepin the Short had his way, and now became the first of the Carolingian kings, so-called from the word 'Carolus,' the Latin name for Charles.

"Now to renew: Our last study took us over a period of 241 years, bringing us to the year 572 A. D. Who was the first French king?"

"Clovis," answered a dozen voices.

"When did he rule France?"

"From 471 to 511 A. D."

"After him came the later kings, hardly worthy the mention. But Pepin the Short was the first real king worth speaking about after Clovis. You will remember that his father was the great Charles, called the Hammer; but he was not really a king—only a mayor. This Pepin the Short was also the father of Charles the Great, or Charlemagne; he, Pepin, fought and conquered the Saracens and Bretons, went down into Italy and reduced the Lombards to submission, then gave their territory to the pope. This 'Pepin's Donation,' as it was called, was the beginning of the wonderful friendship which existed many years between the popes and the French kings.

"Pepin was a very strong and courageous man. Once when he with many of his people were witnessing an exciting fight between a lion and a bull, as was the cruel custom, he asked, 'Who dares separate them?' No one caring to distinguish himself by running so fearful a risk, the king himself leaped between them, and finally cut off both their heads, saying as he did so, 'Now am I not worthy to be called your king?'

"When he died, he left the kingdom to his two sons, Charles and Carloman. But Carloman soon died, leaving to his brother, Charles the Great, or Charlemagne, as he is more commonly called, the entire kingdom. This was about the year 768 A. D. You should make a note of this date in your books, for now there was at last what the world calls a great man seated upon the throne of France. He was a man of great energy, military genius, and wonderful achievements. He was also a great friend of learning. But in those days, people did not have such books to read as we do now, for you must not forget that the art of printing had not yet been invented."

"I don't see," said Jennie Jacobs, "how in the world they could learn anything without books, I have a hard time nowadays to learn even with them."

"Well, you see," replied Professor Carman, with a smile, "they had a few books, but they were very expensive, and were all copied with pen and ink; so you may imagine the labor they involved."

"It is said that Charlemagne made fifty-three warlike expeditions, and was always a victor, except in those against the Moors, who lived in Spain. Once when he was coming back home from one of these, he had to pass through the country of the Basques, and when he was crossing the Pyrenees with his army, these Basques, who were friendly with the Saracens, threw down great rocks, stones, and tree trunks upon them. This killed many and so frightened the others, that they became an easy prey to the fierce Basques, who killed them without mercy."

"O I don't see how any one could have been so cruel," said Florence Ray, "it seems as if people were not half so bad as they were then."

"But, Florence, human nature, without the renewing influence of the grace of God is pretty much the same in all ages."

"It is from this battle that the romantic legend of Roland and Oliver sprang."

"I've heard of them," said Harry Ray, who was a great reader.

"O, please tell us about them," pleaded Milly Brown, who was very romantically inclined.

"But, you see, I'm teaching truth now, and not fiction," said Professor Carman, with a smile, "so you'll have to get some one else to tell you the improbable stories."

Milly looked quite disappointed, but the professor proceeded: "Charlemagne had a war with the Saxons, which lasted over thirty years; but they were finally forced to submit to the mightiest warrior of the age. But this war was another of those carried on in the name of religion. The zealous king wanted the Saxons to believe as he did. But I think he would have better succeeded if he had shown a more Christlike disposition toward his enemies. Only think of his ordering the wholesale slaughter of four thousand helpless prisoners at once, and then declaring that the war was carried on for the purpose of converting his enemies!"

Julia March raised her hand quickly. "I think he did not follow the teachings of Christ very closely, for he said, 'Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you;' he didn't say to kill them."

"No, indeed. Well, when Charlemagne had reigned thirty-two years as king of the Franks and Lombards, Pope Leo III crowned him also emperor of the Romans in the year 800 A. D."

Professor Carman paused a moment, as nearly all seemed to be very busy with their note books. When the eager eyes were again raised to his, he continued:—

"Foreign princes and kings were all anxious to form a friendship with this wonderful man. The Caliph Haroun Al Raschid, the famous hero of the 'Arabian Nights,' sent him a clock that struck, an elephant, and a monkey,—wonderful curiosities then.

"He created what was called the 'School of the Palace.' There Charlemagne would sit in great dignity, surrounded by his children, and some of the favored nobles, while Alcuin, a wise monk, brought on purpose from England, lectured to them about grammar, astronomy, and theology.

"The emperor tried to learn to write. But his hands were so stiff and accustomed to the sword, that he made sad work of it. But so anxious was he to improve every moment that he used to have some one to read to him even while he ate. He built a beautiful cathedral at La Chapelle, in Germany, which you can still see; therein is the very chair in which he was buried for near two hundred years, till Otho III removed the remains. Please write: Charlemagne died in the year 814, when he was seventy years old, having reigned nearly fifty years.

"Now you may all be dismissed, and see how much you can tell your parents to-night about Charles the Great or Charlemagne."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

He "Shall Wear Out the Saints of the Most High."

"WELL, Charlie, what is the next specification in the prophecy concerning the papal power?"

"He . . . shall wear out the saints of the Most High," read Charlie.

"What does it mean to wear out anything, Charlie?"

"Why, mama, I should think you would know when you have a boy like me. See here, my knees are almost coming through my pants, and they will soon need another patch."

"Well, how did you wear them out?"

"Why, just by wearing them out, by giving them a knock here, and a scuff there, by tumbling, climbing, and scuffling at school, by straining and tearing, you know, mama."

"Then you did not do it all in a minute?"

"No. I did it by slow processes, as it were."

"All right. How did the papacy wear out the saints of the Most High?"

"By keeping at them. By all sorts of persecutions. I'll show you," said Charlie, taking "Foxe's Book of Martyrs" from the shelf. "Look at these pictures, and you'll see. Here is a man on the rack. They would rack him for awhile, and then if he would not recant, and be a hypocrite, they would put him in a cell for a few days and rack him again. They hung heretics up by the thumbs, burned them at the stake, baked them in slow ovens, sealed them up in the walls of buildings, flayed them and rubbed them with salt, pulled out their tongues, and seared out their eyes. O mama, it is dreadful to think of the way in which men used to be tortured. The martyrs must have had a living connection with God, and have known real help, or they never could have stood true to truth. How glad I am it's all over."

Mrs. Ross sighed and looked troubled. "All you have described is wonderfully real and vivid to me; for I have visited places in London, and in other parts of the world, where men were burned at the stake, and where these very tortures were enacted. I stood on the very spot at Smithfield, London, where some of the most godly men were burned at the stake for their faith, and entered the old Norman cathedral opposite the spot, at the door of which the priest stood holding up the crucifix, and urging the martyr to recant ere the flame touched him."

"I should think the sight of Christ dying on the cross would have helped the martyr to die for him. How very inconsistent it was to hold up the crucifix for such a purpose!"

"After visiting Smithfield I went to Madame Tussaud's wax-work exhibition, and there in 'the chamber of horrors' saw a very realistic representation of the Inquisition."

"For weeks after seeing that horrible sight, I felt nervous and frightened when alone; but now I am glad that I visited the chamber of horrors. There are many places in the world where you may still see frightful instruments of torture. At Nuremburg is a building given up to a diabolical display of torture instruments. Even in this generation buildings have been torn down in Spain, whose double walls were found packed with the skeletons of martyrs. The whole earth is sprinkled with the graves of those who died because they chose Christ for their heart's king, and would not permit self in any form to wield the scepter."

"Mama, how many martyrs do you suppose there were?"

"The very lowest estimate given by history is fifty millions. But I think with others that it is more than likely that they never will be numbered till the earth discloses her dead. Now I want you to read a few scriptures just to see by what figures the prophet describes the blotting out of the saints of God. What is to cover the earth? Read Isa. 62:2."

Charlie read: "For, behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people."

"When darkness covers the earth, what do we call the time?"

"Night time," said Charlie.

"The darkness spoken of here is spiritual darkness, or spiritual night."

"What appears in the sky at night?"

"The moon and stars," said Charlie.

"Why do the moon and stars give light?"

"The moon and the planets reflect the sun's light; the stars are suns in themselves."

"For carrying out the figure, we will call the moon and the stars or planets that reflect light, the people of God. Our Saviour is the Sun of Righteousness, and the moon and stars of God are those who shed his light into earth's spiritual night."

"What does the prophet declare shall be seen upon God's people?"

"The glory of God."

"What is God's glory?"

"You told me once," said Charlie, "that it was his love. Moses prayed, Show me thy glory, and God said he would let his goodness pass before him."

"Then what is to appear on the people of God?"

"The goodness or character of God."

"What did Jesus say his people were to be in the world's darkness?"

"The light of the world."

"But if the spiritual condition is one that may be compared to darkness or night, what may God's people be compared to?"

"To the moon and stars."

"Now, Charlie, you may read in the eighth chapter of Daniel another prophecy that brings out the manner in which the horn was to war against God's light-bearers."

Charlie read the 10th verse: "And it waxed great even to the hosts of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host."

"You can see how the horn warred against the stars of God, and gather from the violence of the figure that there was a deep-set malignity back of its action. What does the name 'Lucifer' mean?"

"Light bearer," said Charlie.

"Yes. You remember in one of our first talks how Lucifer shed the light of God's glory throughout heaven, and that through self exaltation he lost his light and his position, and was cast out. You can see by the scriptures we have read that God has chosen us, who have been the captives of Satan, to become his light bearers, and take the place of the great angel who lost his first estate. O how Lucifer hates us when we shed abroad the glory of love, of which he is now incapable,—when we believe God's Word and follow the footsteps of Him who is meek and lowly in heart. It is this malignant spirit of jealousy that is behind all persecution, that bids the horn tear down the stars of God, and stamp them out."

"But persecution did not blot out the people of God," said Charlie. "I read somewhere that the fagot was like a taper that lit up other stars, and that when a martyr died, his ashes were like seed that sprang up in a great harvest of souls."

"That is true, Charlie, praise God. No one can do anything against the truth. But the object of the persecution was the blotting out of God's people. The privilege of becoming God's light bearers is too sacred, too dear, too full of heavenly joy, to be lightly given up. Once let a soul catch a glimpse of the glory of God, and realize that that glory may be seen upon him, and death itself loses its terrors. Besides the promise is sure that we shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck us out of the hand of omnipotent Love."

"But, mama, how was it that the papacy had power to persecute the people of God? It doesn't have that power to-day. Why, there's liberty everywhere. You know our Constitution says that Congress shall make no law respecting religion, or to hinder the free exercise thereof. What could any church do in the way of open persecution in the world to-day?"

"It certainly does not look as if it could do anything; but in the Dark Ages the Catholic Church could command the power of the state. God's plan is to keep the state and church separate; but Satan's plan is to put into the hands of the church the power of the state, so that he, through a perverted church, can control the faith of men, or at least make them conform to certain outward standards. Satan would like to run the world through one mold,—the self-mold. Whenever the world consents to his scheme of government, and he is always alert to push it on the world, then persecution can be carried on under the sacred name of law, and then God's saints are treated as was their Master, who was known as one of the malefactors."

"But, mama, why is it that the people of the past had to endure all this, while to-day we have things so pleasant? It doesn't seem quite fair."

"Every generation has its own test. But we will answer this question more fully at another time. I will give you one text, however, to think about. The apostle says, 'Yea, and all who will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution.' The image of Christ is too faintly traced in those who profess his name to provoke enmity from him who was the murderer of the Son of God. When the image is clear, your question will receive the answer of ages. But we have talked a long time; let us close with prayer."

Mrs. Ross prayed fervently that they might reflect the glory of God, and be strengthened to bear all the consequences. Then they sang together—

"Be Thou my pattern, let me bear,
More of Thy gracious image here;
Then God the Judge shall own my name,
Among the followers of the Lamb."

"There is just one thought more, Charlie. The great day of vindication is at hand. Very soon the martyred hosts will hear the voice of the Life-giver. John saw these hosts of God, and said, 'These are they who have come up through great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.'

"Let us wash our robes, my boy, and be made white; then we shall be tried, and after the cross will come the crown."

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But not all of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOL. 13, No. 4.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 27, 1898.

Single copy 3 cents.

The American Sentinel is published in the interests of religious liberty—Christian and Constitutional.

act upon belief; and to deny the right to believe is to deny the right to think at all.

In Christianity, faith is the only avenue of power.

THE nature and effect of a piece of religious legislation are not in any wise changed by its being labeled "civil enactment" or "police regulation."

FOR any human power to take from an individual that which divine power and authority has given him, is an act of amazing temerity, to say the least.

Good intentions cannot change the character of a bad deed.

THERE is nothing that can get above right, or occupy a higher seat than that of justice.

"As by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of One shall many be made righteous." Rom. 5:19. Neither sin nor salvation has any significance apart from the individual.

To separate the interests of the state from those of the individual, is fatal to both alike.

The State and the Individual.

BEWARE how you take hold of another man's conscience; for that conscience has God at the other end of it.

THE doctrine that the state is everything and the individual nothing is exactly the opposite of that upon which all good and just government is established.

It is a mistake for any legislative body to think it has the authority to define sin, or the power to punish it.

It is synonymous with the doctrine that government is instituted not to maintain the absolute inviolability of certain individual privileges known as "rights," but only to secure "the greatest good to the greatest number."

If you are following the Lord yourself, your eyes are upon his perfection, and not upon your neighbor's imperfection.

When the supposed interests of society or of the state come in conflict with individual rights, the latter are by this theory swept aside. "It is expedient that one man should die and not that the whole nation should perish."

THE more a government reduces its individual subjects to the condition of automaton, the more despotism will there be under it.

So reasoned the Jews when they committed the most awful mistake that it was possible for any people to commit.

It is said that the preservation of the state demands the enforcement of Sunday laws, and that when the individual conscience conflicts with the "state conscience" in such a matter, the individual conscience must give way.

THE right to believe is nothing without the right to

We are asked to believe that it is sometimes necessary to sacrifice the individual for the good of the state or of society.

There is an illustration of this just now in France, where there is great excitement over the question of the innocence or guilt of an alleged traitor. The government seems to think that the good of France demands that the condemned individual should suffer his prescribed punishment, even though he may have been unjustly convicted.

In Russia, as noticed elsewhere in this issue, little children and infants are ruthless torn from their parents' arms in the night, by the government police, and taken away to be brought up as orthodox members of the state church. And this is done for the preservation of the state.

But the government of God holds to no such principle. That government, the maintenance of which is essential to the welfare of every being in the universe; that government, as compared with which in importance all earthly governments are as nothing,—would dissolve and go out of existence sooner than it would perpetrate a wrong upon one individual, however small, obscure, or humble. Sooner than do this, God himself would abdicate the throne of the universe. Yet an earthly government, a mere human and temporal affair, tries to justify itself in doing what would never at any hazard be dared by the government of Heaven. That which would dissolve the government of the universe, these earthly governments do for their "preservation"!

But there is nothing in it but dissolution for any government that does it, under any circumstances. The interests of the individual and of the state cannot be separated. When the state cuts loose from the individual and holds only to "the masses," it cuts loose from safe principle, and starts upon the sure road to decline and ruin.

THAT wicked spirit of enforced militarism—mis-called patriotism—is becoming more widespread, and becomes more bold, unreasoning, and vicious, as it spreads. At Appleton, Wis., there is an institution called Lawrence University that is making for itself a reputation in this species of despotism.

There is at this "university" a student who is studying for the ministry, and who, quite oddly for these days of military Christianity, has enough of the spirit of Christ to enable him to see that training for the ministry of Christ and training to kill people are not consistent; that the Spirit of Christ and the spirit of war are not in any sense compatible. He has therefore refused to engage in the military drills, or to belong to the militia, of the "university." For this he "is to be court-martialed" by the "university authorities."

The Milwaukee correspondent of the Chicago Times-Herald reports on the matter thus:—

"The parents of Otto Haefner, the student at Lawrence University, Appleton, who is to be court-martialed or refusing to drill, live at 591 Reed Street in this city, and fully sustain their son in his action. When seen to day Mrs. Haefner said she could not understand why the university authorities should take such a step. 'My son, she said, 'is studying for the ministry and has no taste for the militia. It does not seem fair that he should be obliged to drill when his inclinations are in an entirely different direction. He has been a good student, and the letters we have received from him have told how well he is getting along. He has worked hard in his studies, and certainly ought not to be punished for not being in sympathy with a military training. If he needs help, we will go to him.'"

Yes, and so should the people of the whole State of Wisconsin and of the whole United States, come to the boy's help. For it is perfectly evident that this evil spirit of enforced militarism, of despotic "patriotism," proposes to stop at nothing; but will override all individual right, all right of conscience, and even of God himself.

Wherever there yet remains any person who has any real respect for individual right, for the right of conscience, or of God, it is high time that his voice were being heard as far as it can be made to sound. A. T. J.

Who Provides the Sabbath?

IN the city of Boston, last month, representatives of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Unitarian, and Congregationalist churches met to discuss the question of Sunday observance, and passed a resolution saying, "We favor every wise effort to secure such speedy legislation as shall compel every transportation company to provide one day's rest out of every seven."

We believe as much as anybody does that people ought to have one day of rest in seven—the seventh day—but we have been under the impression that God himself has provided this rest for everybody; and if this is so, we do not see the force of asking the legislatures to provide it.

If the seventh day of rest is not yet provided for people, then it is no sin for the people to work on the Sabbath; for how can they have a rest which is not provided for them? and on the other hand, if the rest is provided, then it only remains for the people to take it, and there is no necessity for calling for legislative action in the matter.

Why should a legislature be asked to provide the people with something they already have?

Now there is a plain command of the Lord given in the Bible that all persons should "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," not doing any work upon it. But if God commands the people to take a rest which is not provided them, he is unreasonable and asks them to do an impossibility. This is altogether contrary to our conception of God.

"Freethinkers" and other non-Christians say that God is unreasonable and that his requirements are unjust; and when Christian bodies get together and gravely pass a resolution calling upon the legislatures to provide the people a chance to do what God has enjoined upon them all to do, the contention of the "freethinkers" is sustained. But we would urge upon all Christians the propriety of giving no support by word or deed to the doctrines of infidelity.

The weekly day of rest is already provided; and all that any person who wants it has to do, is to take it. If you doubt this, try it, and be convinced. Accept God as the provider of all good things, and don't make a god out of the legislature.

To Which Kingdom?

WE sincerely desire to help the Christian Citizen and all those who with it are booming the Christian citizenship movement that is represented in the Christian Citizen.

We have no desire for controversy; and what we write on this subject is not written in the spirit of controversy. We simply desire, if possible, to fix the attention of these people upon certain Christian principles to which, from their attitude, it seems certain that they have not given due weight.

This is not a question of policy, but solely of principle. It is not a question of what men may think; but of what Jesus Christ says. It is not a question of what a professed Christianity may consider proper; but what does the Christianity of Jesus Christ teach and require.

It is altogether a question of Christianity. These people attach to their enterprise the term "Christian." In the name of Christianity they urge their movement. It is therefore not simply proper but essential that this thing which is urged upon the people as Christian, shall be brought to the test of the Christianity of Jesus Christ.

The principles of the Christianity of the Lord Jesus are given to the world in his Word. If this professed Christian citizenship movement will bear the test of the words of the Lord Jesus, all honor to it; but if it fails to bear this test, it is not Christianity and is not to be trusted at all. We have seen already that, in one instance at least, the Christian Citizen is obliged to set aside the words of Christ to save itself from destructive conclusions. This is not a promising prospect of bearing, throughout, the test of the Christianity of the word of Christ; yet it is only fair to examine the question further and as broadly as possible.

With this object and in this spirit solely, we ask the candid consideration of the Christian Citizen and its people to certain scriptures which from time to time we shall examine in the SENTINEL.

Here is one for this time: "Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews."

His kingdom is not of this world. Then can any man belong to this world, and to Christ's kingdom at the same time?—Christ himself has answered this question. He said to his disciples of all time, "Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." "I have chosen you out of the world." Again, "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." If his kingdom were of this world, then for what kind of a kingdom would his servants fight?—For a kingdom of this world. Then, what kind of kingdom is it for which men do fight, and for which alone they can fight?—For kingdoms of this world. But his kingdom is not of this world; therefore, in the sense in which Jesus here used the word "fight," no man can ever fight for the kingdom of Christ. And any kingdom for which any man can fight, in the sense in which Jesus here used the word, is not, and cannot be, a kingdom of Christ or of God.

Again, "If my kingdom were of this world then would my servants fight." This word testifies positively that the only possible consideration upon which the servants of Christ could fight, is that his kingdom were of this world. But it is positively stated by him, that his kingdom is not of this world. Therefore it is certain that the positive teaching of Jesus Christ is that when any who profess to be his servants do fight, they fight only for a kingdom of this world, whatever their pretensions may be. Any who fight for a kingdom that is of this world, who contend for place or power in any kingdom that is of this world, by that very thing plainly show that they are not of the kingdom of Jesus Christ. And any who profess to be of Christ's kingdom who will fight for any kingdom, even His own, testify by that that they are not of his kingdom; for his kingdom is "not of this world," and only upon the consideration that his kingdom were of this world, could his servants fight at all.

Yet all this is precisely what those who are leading in this Christian citizenship movement propose to do. They do seek to get possession of the kingdoms of this world as such. They do aspire and work to put themselves into positions of power to rule the United States and the other governments of this world; and to fight, actually to fight, for governments of this world. And by all of this, they proclaim with the loudest possible voice that they are altogether of this world, and not of the kingdom of Christ at all; for he has proclaimed forever, "My kingdom is not of this world."

The kingdom of Christ and the kingdoms of this world will not mix. The subjects of Christ's kingdom will never be mercenaries to fight for a kingdom to which they do not belong; and they cannot fight for the one to which they do belong.

It has been forcibly said, as regards the supposed physical need of mankind for Sunday rest, that to eat heartier meals on Sunday than on other days, as is the prevalent fashion, while taking little or no physical exercise, puts a person in poorer physical condition than he was in before. This is the way most Sunday observers do, and yet they imagine they are getting great physical benefit from their Sunday observance, and that everybody else ought to be made by law to do likewise.

In the Name of Liberty.—No. 2.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

THE principle of liberty lies at the root of, and is the inspiration of, all achievement. It is the mainspring of the gospel. Without it there could have been no gospel, for there could have been no sinner to save, nor any power to appropriate salvation after it had been provided.

It is evident from God's own standpoint that it was nobler for man to have the power to sin, if he chose, than to be always spotless because he could not defile himself,—better to have acted unwisely than to have been to all eternity acted upon ever so wisely and grandly.

No importance among men attaches to any act which has been performed under compulsion; in fact, compulsion invalidates the most benevolent act, and transforms what seemed like virtue, into crime. For a man to be a tool of a stronger will is to be degraded to a thing, below the level of even contempt.

So instinctive is this principle of liberty in every living creature, that the fear of losing it will arouse all that is most heroic in man or beast. Man, with all his ability to forecast probabilities, will after deliberate consideration, run the risk of hopeless captivity or of death rather than allow his freedom to be wrested from him, or to regain it if it has been lost.

To be deprived of liberty by the law is to be visited with the most bitter penalty; while to surrender it, even on demand, is still to be in possession of the kernel of the nut, while the burr is left to prick the feet of those who have trampled upon it.

Liberty of thought and conscience is more than that of tongue or foot; and the power to be what he will gives a glimmer of glory, however faint, to even the man who will be ungodly. The degree of unholiness to which he will go down in spite of all the hosts of heaven, is as a gauge of the power of liberty with which he was endowed, and of the heights of purity to which he would have attained if he had chosen to strive for it.

"No, thanks; I will take my medicine. I have brought myself to it, and I will not sneak out of the consequences by taking any favors," were the words by which a "hardened criminal" answered to a gospel message. And while, from the standpoint of one who knows God and his relation to man, the poor fellow was only adding needlessly to a lifelong wrong to himself as well as God, yet one could but admire his sense of justice and his consistency in the exercise of liberty.

The liberty to be what he will, to think as he chooses, and to transmute evidence into belief in the laboratory of his own consciousness, is a right which is beyond the touch of any power. God made it to be so; and, he himself, respects this law so sacredly that he made it possible for any one of his human children to defy him to his face, and in spite of all love, all power, be whatever he chooses in his secret nature where God only can see him, but where God will know him most intimately.

Just think of the awful power of this liberty! By it a man can shut God himself in with unholiness, with corruption, and compel him to hear unutterable blasphemies; making of the Holy and Just One a prisoner in his own temple, which has been defiled in spite of all his efforts to keep it clean,—has been torn down; so that it stands a ruin, swept by storms of passion, inhabited by every unclean reptile, in spite of all that could be done to keep it in repair.

Just think again of this Lover of thy soul, choosing to stay on and stay on; sitting in the cold, damp, filthy courts of a ruined soul, waiting for this same power of liberty to say at last to Him who fashioned the universe, "Let thine hand help me; for I have chosen thy precepts. . . . I have gone astray like a lost sheep; seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments." Ps. 119:173, 176.

And this is the power concerning which men in their thoughtless, enthusiastic zeal of works, would legislate! Truly fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

Superfluous "Explanation."

BY E. J. WAGGONER.

A THING that is plain cannot be explained, that is, it cannot be "made plain," since it is so already. Thus: "John goes to school" is a simple statement of fact, and it cannot be made any plainer. All attempts to "explain" the statement would simply be aggregations of words which would either have no meaning at all, or else would serve to bewilder the listener. The only possible result of any attempted explanation of such a simple proposition is to call the attention away from the fact stated.

The fourth commandment is composed of a series of just such simple statements of fact. After the commandment proper, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," we have these statements: (1) The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. (2) In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, etc. (3) He rested the seventh day. (4) Therefore he blessed the Sabbath day, and sanctified it.

These are as plain statements of fact as is the statement that "John goes to school," or that "the sun shines." They cannot be made any plainer. All that can properly be done with them is to believe them, since "the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Every so called "explanation" of the commandment is either a direct contradiction of it or else such a mass of verbiage as serves to confuse the unfortunate person who is persuaded to put confidence in it. If any one knows where the fourth commandment is stated in plainer terms than in Ex. 20:8-11, we should be glad to have it shown to us.

Proposed Stringent Sunday Law for Ontario.

BY M. C. GUILD.

THERE is no small stir in this city and Province at present over a proposed amendment to the "Lord's Day Act," which has been introduced into the Ontario Parliament, and has now passed its second reading.

It is well understood that the amendment was introduced at the request of the "Lord's Day Alliance," together with several ministers from various churches. The Alliance, an organization similar to the "American Sabbath Union," is making great efforts to secure this amendment, which will make the act much more binding than at present. They secured the services of Dr. W. F. Crafts, who has delivered lectures in various cities in the Province during the past week with the avowed object of securing the proposed legislation.

It is getting to be recognized that Sunday is on the decline in Canada, and great efforts are being made to bolster it up, not the least of which is an appeal to civil law.

Heretofore, it has been supposed that the present "Lord's Day Act" was stringent enough to suit the most fastidious Sunday-law inquisitor.

It will be remembered that not long ago two Seventh-day Adventist ministers served time in jail,—one for mixing mortar, and the other for carrying a pail of water, on Sunday,—after having conscientiously observed the seventh day as the Sabbath.

However, in recent test cases against certain corporations for Sunday labor, carried through by the "Lord's Day Alliance," it was held by the courts that the present law does not apply to corporations. Having been beaten in the courts, they now apply to the government for a law that will enable them to proceed against those who differ from them in practice and opinion.

Part of the proposed amendment is as follows:—

"Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario, enacts as follows:—

"1. Section 1 of the Act to prevent the profanation of the Lord's day is amended by striking out the words 'merchant, tradesman, farmer, artificer, mechanic, workman, laborer or other,' in the first and second lines thereof, and by adding thereto the following subsections:—

"(The section as amended will read as follows: 'It is not lawful for any person whatsoever on the Lord's day to sell or publicly show forth or expose or offer for sale or to purchase, any goods, chattels, or other personal property, or any real estate whatsoever, or to do or exercise any worldly labor, business or work of his ordinary calling' [conveying travelers or Her Majesty's mail, by land or by water, selling drugs and medicines, and other works of necessity and works of charity only excepted].)

"The word 'persons' in this act shall be construed as including corporations, except where the context indicates a contrary intention, and any corporation which requires or permits its employes to carry on the business of such corporation, or to labor or work therefor contrary to the provisions of this act, shall, for each offense, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding $400.

"Nothing herein contained shall relieve employes or servants of corporations who violate the provisions of this act from the penalties hereby imposed in case of violation."

It will readily be seen that this would stop all Sunday cars, freight trains, steamboats, cooks, and, in fact, nearly every occupation would be affected by it if construed literally. Not the least objectionable feature of this act is that the informer will get half the fine, thus putting a premium on interference with other men's liberties.

The stringent nature of this amendment has called forth indignant protests from Sunday-keepers themselves.

The Hamilton Herald says:—

"This is the nearest approach to the old Blue Laws of New England that has been introduced in the Ontario Legislature."

The Toronto Telegram says:—

"The act is the outcome of either ignorance or of the bigoted cunning which begets tyranny. Considered as a piece of proposed legislation, the promoters have evidently thought the members of the House are sadly lacking in common sense or are extremely callous to the rights of the public. . . . There is apparently an entire want of consideration on the part of the Alliance for the rights of the great majority. The government will do well to reconsider this proposed bill. It has the name of the attorney-general endorsed on the back as the promoter. It is to be hoped that this is merely formal, and that Mr. Hardy is not committed, on the eve of an election, or, indeed, at any other time, to the illiberal views and despotic interference of a so-called religious alliance, parading the fads of a few people under the guise of morality."

The Toronto World says:—

"It is to be feared that the attempts to coerce people by legislative enactments into obeying the fourth commandment must result in indefinite confusion, discontent, disgust, and resentment. There should be one rest day in the week, and that rest day should be guaranteed to every worker who wants it, so far as it is in the power of the law to guarantee it. But for the law to go further than that, and compel a man to remain idle on Sunday when he would rather work, is an unwarrantable interference with personal liberty. Instead of making the Sunday observance laws more stringent, they should be relaxed."

January 11, a large and influential delegation waited on the government in opposition to the proposed amendment. A number of speakers were present, and many of them spoke strongly in favor of personal and religious liberty. A wholesome fear was expressed of the workings of the "Lord's Day Alliance."

The government was urged to lay the bill over until the next session, that there might be opportunity to circulate petitions against it.

What the outcome will be remains to be seen.

Who knows how long even the present toleration will last? Is it not time for every lover of liberty to "arise and shine"?

January 12, 1898.

THE city of Milwaukee, Wis., is said to have the largest church attendance in proportion to population of any city in the country, while having scarcely any restriction as regards the observance of Sunday.

"All Ye Are Brethren."

THE principles of justice are ever the same, and there never was a time when it was right for one man to coerce another's conscience, but it is only in "the law of liberty," the law of love, as magnified by Jesus Christ, that this truth is clearly seen.

"The fatherhood of God" had always been recognized as a theory, but it was not until Jesus of Nazareth deduced from this sublime truth "the brotherhood of man," that the world was prepared to discern in "the law and the prophets" the Golden Rule: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

This rule not only requires that each man shall deal honestly, yea, even generously, with his fellows, but it absolutely forbids that one shall come between even the humblest of his brethren and their common Father; for, since all are the creatures of the same divine hand, it is evident that "every one shall give account of himself to God." "None can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him." Not even the father can answer for the son, nor the son for the father; hence, the admonition, "Children, obey your parents in the Lord." There are no exceptions to the rule, "We ought to obey God rather than men;" for "the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son." No human being can by any possibility escape personal, moral responsibility, and moral accountability necessarily implies free moral agency.

"A wise son maketh a glad father;" but since "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," and "a good understanding have all they that do His commandments;" he and he alone truly honors his father and his mother who truly obeys God in all things else. Not even filial affection can release any soul from the supreme obligation to give to God the first place, not only in the heart, but in the life; for "obedience is the highest form of worship." "In vain do they worship me," says our Saviour "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

It is only a failure to realize the sovereignty of God that causes any man to assume to dictate to his fellow man in any matter touching the conscience. He who does this in effect makes himself God. Nebuchadnezzar's decree that all men should worship the golden image which he had set up was an assumption of superiority to the God of heaven, whose law says, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image. . . . Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them." But the three Hebrews recognized no such authority in any man. In all things civil they were the obedient servants of their royal master, but in the realm of conscience they owned no sovereign but the God of heaven. Their reply to the king was, "We are not careful to answer thee in this matter. . . . We will not serve thy gods nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." The account of their deliverance from the fiery furnace was "written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come."

Another impressive lesson to the same intent is the record of Daniel's disregard of pretended authority in the realm of conscience. Darius, like Nebuchadnezzar, thought that because he was king, his was an unlimited sovereignty; but so far was Daniel from recognizing this claim that he paid not the least attention to the royal decree forbidding him, in common with all other men, to "ask any petition of any God or man for thirty days, save of the king only." His deliverance from the lions was the Lord's rebuke to Darius's usurpation, and his admonition to all future rulers and subjects—to rulers, not to invade his domain; to subjects, not to render to civil magistrates that which belongs alone to God.

That the principle thus clearly taught was not changed by Christ is evident from his own words already quoted, indicating the clear line of demarkation between civil and moral duties, between the things due to Cæsar and the things due to God. Nor is this all; our Lord himself sent his disciples forth to violate a "law" of the Roman Empire when he bade them go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. With the single exception of John, every one of the original apostles was condemned and executed for violation of that "civil law" which sought to save the Roman state by protecting the Roman gods and the Roman religion.

That this view puts no forced construction upon Christ's words is evident from the fact that the apostles held themselves amenable to no human law in matters touching their service of God. To the demand of the magistrates that they cease to speak in the name of Jesus, Peter and John responded, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye [for yourselves, but as for us]; we cannot but speak the things we have seen and heard." And again, when threatened by the authorities and commanded to cease preaching, "Peter and the other apostles answered and said, We ought to obey God rather than men." And this declaration of spiritual independence, millions of the followers of Christ have since signed with their life blood. And yet how far is the world from the full and practical recognition of the underlying principle that moral responsibility and accountability necessarily mean moral freedom from all authority save Him to whom final account must be given.

Where They Would Lead Us.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE fear of the founders of this government, if they followed the example of other nations in uniting church and state, was that in doing so it would be recognized that magistrates could adjudge the right of preference among the various sects that profess the Christian faith.

They saw that this could not be done without laying claim to infallibility which would inevitably "lead us back to the Church of Rome."

Consequently, the law-making power—Congress—was and still is enjoined by the Constitution from legislating in behalf of any religion.

This was not because they were opposed to the Christian religion, or any other religion for that matter, but because they knew that religion was really an affair of the heart, a matter of faith. It was really because they respected Christianity, and because it was a Christian principle, that Congress was interdicted from meddling with religion.

If the principle was Christian then, it is Christian now. Therefore any attempt to reverse this order of things must be unchristian.

Notwithstanding this we are confronted with the spectacle of people of various denominations and religious societies working with all their might to have the Constitution changed.

At the same time they, from time to time, inundate Congress with petitions begging it to enact laws that are purely religious in character. And this they are doing professedly in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Do these good people see to the end of that which they would abolish? If not, would they not do well to pause and investigate? They would not be lacking for good teachers—the Bible and history—than which there can be none better.

Christ is our example, and to follow him is Christianity.

In studying the life of Christ we shall search in vain for a single instance where he in any way sought to coerce the conscience and will of man. On the contrary we can find where he positively refused to do this. At one time he said: "If any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world." John 12:47.

Not only did he say this, but he carried it out in his life. This will be seen in the case of the woman charged with the sin of adultery. The woman's accusers fondly hoped he would pass judgment upon her. Instead of this he silenced them, and they went off one by one, leaving the woman alone in the presence of Christ. "When Jesus had lifted up himself and saw none but the woman, he said unto her, Woman, where are thine accusers? hath no man condemned thee? She said, No man, Lord. And Jesus said unto her, Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." John 8:10, 11.

Christ came to save the world, and not to judge it. Could he have done both at one and the same time? The answer must be, No. For as soon as judgment is passed, probation is closed. There could then be no possibility of any upon whom judgment is passed being saved; hence it is that the Bible always locates the time of the judgment to be at the end of the world. So the Saviour says, "He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him; the word that I have spoken the same shall judge him in the last day." John 12:48.

Not until that time is reached does probation close, except of course for those who have previously died. Up to that time Christ's work is to save mankind, and so of his ambassadors.

As therefore it was impossible for Christ to save and judge at the same time, so is it impossible for his professed followers to do this.

When therefore the Christian Endeavor Society, and all others with whom they are coöperating, shall succeed in their self-imposed task of getting the Constitution changed, and the Christian religion be made a part of the fundamental law of the land; or when they shall succeed in getting Congress to legislate in behalf of religion, they will have gained the power, not only of judging their fellow men, but of punishing them for their sins(?).

Doubtless the punishments at first would be slight, but it is certain they would become more and more severe. For, as Gibbon (in his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire") truly says: "It is incumbent on the authors of persecution previously to reflect whether they are determined to support it in the last extreme. They excite the flame which they strive to extinguish, and it soon becomes necessary to chastise the contumacy, as well as the crime, of the offender. The fine which he is unable or unwilling to discharge, exposes his person to the severities of the law; and his contempt of lighter penalties suggests the use and propriety of capital punishment."

As certainly therefore as it is impossible for the servants of Christ to be engaged in the work of judging and saving souls at the same time, so certain will it be that when the Christian Endeavorers and others attain their object they will cease to be the saviours of men. They will have broken down the constitutional barriers, and in spite of themselves, will have led this nation back to Rome.

It is announced that, beginning with 1899, the Christian Endeavor Society, the Epworth League, and the Baptist Young People's Union are to have uniform themes for their devotional meetings. The topics have been selected.

NEARLY all the baseball clubs of the National League have announced an intention of playing on Sunday during the coming season. This alone will do much to stir the promoters of Sunday legislation everywhere into greater activity.

AN important discovery is announced to have been made by delvers amidst the ruins of the ancient city of Sippara, in Babylonia, in the form of tablets giving in cuneiform writing a Babylonian account of the Deluge. These tablets are supposed to be the originals from which was written an Assyrian account of the Deluge, which formed a part of the library of Assurbanipal, who reigned in Nineveh about 600 years before Christ. The Assyrian tablets gave no clue to the date at which the story of the Deluge first became a part of Babylonian literature; but the newly-discovered tablets, it is said, throw enough light on this point to prove that the account is much older than the time of Moses; and this is what gives to the discovery its "importance."

THE tablets are so mutilated that only a small part of the account remains to be put into the living language of to-day; but this fragment is supposed to be the most important portion of the narrative. It sets forth that there were two gods concerned in the Deluge, one of whom was angry with the world and brought the flood to destroy it, while the other befriended mankind and caused the building of a boat in which men might take refuge from the impending destruction. This account it is said, differs materially from the Assyrian story, and both are essentially different from the Biblical narrative given in the book of Genesis. This Babylonian writing dates back to the year 2140 B. C., as the historians figure it; and as it purports to be a copy of an older record that had been destroyed, there is opportunity to suppose that the origin of the account reaches considerably farther into antiquity.

BUT for the unaccountable perverseness of human nature, which is well known to most people, we might wonder why it is that people will attach great importance to the discovery of these cuneiform fragments, when they have a plain, straight narrative of the Deluge, much more full and circumstantial than any other, in the book of Genesis. It can hardly be considered a rash statement to say that the Biblical narrative of the Deluge is generally regarded, among "scientific" men at least, as a myth. And whether the common people so regard it or not, it is certain that they make little or nothing of it as regards religious belief and conduct. It is rarely mentioned in the pulpit. Now, if this plain and full Biblical account of the Deluge is a myth, and of but little importance at the best, why is it that such great importance is attached to the discovery of some obscurely-written fragments of a narrative relating to the same event? Probably if the Biblical narrative had not been preserved and handed down to our times in the straightforward and well authenticated way in which it has reached us, with the indorsement of Jesus Christ and his apostles, but had been unearthed in the form of a mysterious writing upon clay tablets, it would have been hailed by "Christians" and all as the most wonderful writing in existence, and every word of it received with implicit confidence. A thing has to be "dug up" nowadays to be considered of real value as a means of information concerning the events of antiquity.

A FEW days ago a mob of white residents of Oklahoma took two Seminole Indians who were supposed to have committed murder, and burned them at the stake. It has since appeared that at least one of the victims was probably innocent; but this is less to the point than the fact that intelligent and civilized white people should conduct themselves in this way, whether the victims were guilty or not. It is a well-known fact that burning at the stake was a common method of torture in vogue among the savage inhabitants of this country while they were contending with the white man for supremacy; and it has been supposed that the torture of prisoners is a procedure which belongs to barbarianism and not to civilization. So we are not prepared to find civilization taking lessons from barbarism and adopting its methods as superior to her own, as is seen down in Oklahoma.

WE are reminded of an old saying which we believe is attributed to Napoleon—"Scratch a Russian and you find a Tartar." When civilized white people torture Indians and negroes after the fashion which is becoming so common, it suggests a wider application of Napoleon's saying, like this: Scratch a civilized person and you find a savage. It gives force to the assertion that civilization is, after all, only a thin veneer, giving a polished and refined exterior to that which at heart is only barbarism.

IS it not a truth that, after all, civilization is not the opposite of savagery, but that the opposite is Christianity? From a Bible standpoint, we must admit that this is so; for the inspired Word puts no difference between men except on the basis of "carnal" and "spiritual." The "carnally minded" are by that Book regarded as all one class, whether Bushmen in Central Africa or members of the Board of Trade in New York City. And Christianity, when it gets hold of people of whatever locality or race, makes no difference between them as regards character, giving to all the same nature, which is the nature of Christ.

IN France, a very highly civilized country, there is great excitement over the question of whether an alleged traitor, who has for some years been suffering a punishment worse than was ever inflicted on Siberian convicts, and is sentenced to continue the same for life, is really guilty of the crime charged against him. What the evidence is upon which he was convicted, no one knows except a few government officials who made his trial the secret matter that it was. Not even the unhappy victim nor his counsel were allowed to see upon what evidence he was convicted and sentenced to a punishment that is almost without a parallel in modern times. And the affair having been conducted in this unjust way, it seems now to be thought by those responsible for it that the important thing is not that a possible wrong should be righted, but that the "glory" and "honor" of France should be maintained, if need be by the covering up of a terrible injustice to one unhappy individual and those whom his misfortune has involved. And upon the theory that the state is everything and the individual is nothing, this might be the most expedient course to pursue. But that theory is wrong, and nothing but evil, both for the individual and the state, can ever come out of it.

Fifty Dollars Fine for Painting His House on Sunday.

New York "World," January 20.

BOSTON, MASS., Jan. 19.—H. L. Atkins, of Chelsea, has been fined $50 for painting his house on Sunday. Atkins says he didn't paint; his wife says so, too, but the court have decided otherwise, and the Blue Laws are triumphant.

The house of the Atkinses—very respectable people of Chelsea—is new. Last fall they say they were unable to lower a window of Mrs. Atkins's chamber one Saturday night, and on Sunday Mr. Atkins got an oil can and a brush and proceeded to oil the window. This is the story the Atkinses tell. A neighbor who saw Mr. Atkins at work was horrified at the desecration of the Sabbath. Mr. Atkins said the work was one of necessity, but a complaint was lodged with the police. The police were horrified and they dragged poor Atkins to court. The court was horrified and Atkins was fined. An appeal was taken in vain. The fine was enforced.

JUDGE PENNYPACKER, of the Common Pleas Court, of Philadelphia, has refused to grant a charter to the "First Church of Christian Scientists," of that city, on the ground that the incorporation of a church that has "faith cure" as one of its tenets is contrary to the statutes of Pennsylvania.

THE good people who believe so strongly in the value of a weekly rest, should be willing to give some rest to the congressmen and other legislators whom they are besieging with their bills and petitions.

Religious Persecution in Russia.

A HORRIBLE feature of state religion, even as practiced in a professedly civilized country, in the year 1898, comes to light in some statements made recently by the St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Daily Mail, concerning methods pursued by the Russian government for securing conversions to the state church. He says:—

"The authorities in the government of Samara, Russia, have recently been actively engaged in the criminal pursuit of kidnapping children. In the Busulykski district all parents known to belong to heterodox sects have had their children taken from them. The police usually make their visits in the middle of the night, take the children out of bed, and carry them off in the cold night air, in spite of the frantic entreaties of the parents. Many peasants have lost their whole family in this way.

"This practice of kidnapping children is increasing in all parts of Russia. It is, of course, a gross abuse of official power, and an illegal attack on the religious freedom established by statute in Russia."

And this is supplemented by the following statement made by a Russian exile to the London Daily Chronicle:—

"The sect on which this new form of persecution has fallen most terribly is the Molokan, or Sabbatarians, so called because they keep the Sabbath on Saturday instead of Sunday. Like all the Puritan sects, they are a very peaceful and industrious people, going their own way in the fear of God. But they do not observe the fasts, nor attach any particular sanctity to priests, and they allow any one who knows the Bible well to preach to them. That is all; and now their children are torn from their homes."

We say this is a feature of state religion; for while it may be said that this is the way they do things over in Russia, and that no such thing would be tolerated in other civilized lands, it is in fact the logical outgrowth of the theory that the majority ought to rule in religion. That is the theory upon which state religion rests; and it is adhered to by vast numbers of the religious people in these United States. If it be a sound one, the Russian government is justified in its course, as being the only one which in its view will secure to the children that religious training which the majority regard as essential to their own welfare and the preservation of the government. It is all logical enough, when once the theory is admitted that the state ought to govern in religious, as in civil, affairs.

"But such a thing could never be done in this country." So you say; but "logic" has a way of leading people to terrible lengths when it once gets them off the track of right principle. The only safety is in knowing what right principles of government are, and sticking to them.

THE Kentucky Court of Appeals has recently given a decision which affirms that property held by churches for income, such as rented houses, bonds, etc., is exempt from taxation. We imagine this will be very convenient for some individuals who are looking for a way to avoid paying taxes on their property.

James T. Ringgold.

WE were startled a few days since by the intelligence that this name, so familiar to the readers of the AMERICAN SENTINEL, had been suddenly added to the long roll of those whose voices are but a memory and from whose hands the pen has dropped for ever.

For a number of years Mr. Ringgold has been a prominent figure in the arena where is being fought the battle of civil and religious liberty against the forces which are seeking to erect upon the ruins of popular government, a despotic, man-made theocracy. While identified in religious belief with a prominent and popular church—the Episcopal—he stood ever aloof from and in opposition to the movement with which the popular churches are so largely identified, for an enforced observance of the “Sabbath.” He was able to rise above an environment in every way favorable to this movement, and to see clearly the principles of liberty and justice above the mists of church theology and tradition. Nor did he, as so many do, stop with merely acknowledging these principles; he was their active advocate whenever opportunity offered for his services. With the courage of his convictions, he never hesitated in this because of the seeming weakness or unpopularity of the side which stood under the ban of “the law.”

It hardly need be said that Mr. Ringgold during this time rendered invaluable service to the cause of popular enlightenment upon the vital subject of the correct principles of free government. His works “The Legal Sunday: Its History and Character,” and the “Law of Sunday,” will remain unimpeachable witnesses upon this point.

Mr. Ringgold was well known in his place of residence (Baltimore) as a member of the bar and instructor in a school of law connected with Baltimore University. His death, which was sudden, is attributed to disease of the heart.

It is wonderful how the imagination of many good people is affected by the simple fact of the occurrence of some particular thing “on Sunday.”

A writer in the Iowa Homestead—a Methodist minister and superintendent of a Sunday-school—says, “I have often thought that a gun sounded twice as loud on Sunday as on any other day.”

And that is just what a great many others have thought. That is how it has seemed to them, not only as regards gunning, but other kinds of sport. A game of baseball, for example, seems twice as wicked to them on Sunday as on Monday or Tuesday. Even honest work seems to them to be criminal when done “on Sunday.”

Now everybody knows that a gun really sounds not a bit louder on Sunday than on any other day; it is pure imagination which distinguishes any difference. And when we come to consider any innocent sport or recreation, and all honest work, as regards Sunday, we find nothing in either reason or revelation which marks them as being criminal or wrong on that day. We can only find that to many good people they sound twice as loud, or look twice as bad, or appear twice as wicked, etc.

Yet it is upon just this basis that our Sunday laws, which put a special stamp upon things done “on Sunday,” have been established. But why should we not have laws that are founded upon fact rather than fancy?

That Flag Salute.

EDITOR THE SENTINEL: Our public schools in their present form were established and are supported by the state—all the people. They are to instruct the children in the sciences, and educate them in everything necessary to make them good citizens; but it does not follow that this instruction should be of a sectarian character.

The state has no right to introduce into secular education in our public schools anything of a religious character or that will in any way conflict with the religious scruples of those who support the schools.

Now to introduce the flag salute as given in the Boulder school, and which is being introduced in other schools all over the country, blends the secular with the religious. Those who give that salute in fact do not in nine cases out of ten if ever give their hearts to God. They thus solemnly assert they do something they do not do.

But an atheist parent would object to his child saying that he gives his heart to a being that he did not believe existed, and he has a right to object too.

This also brings in the question of reading the Bible in the public schools, and many other religious forms, such as special costumes, etc.

General Grant, in his memorable speech, laid down a correct principle, namely, that the matter of religion should be left to the family altar and the church. Let nothing of a sectarian nature be taught in the public schools.

W. E. ARNETT.

THE Chinese statesman, Li Hung Chang, has offered to provide the furnishing for an Episcopal school, or build an addition to its edifice, or provide any financial help that is required, with the proviso “that the usual attendance at divine worship is not made compulsory.”

A Kingdom of Perfect Liberty.

Two boys, Walter Mills and Henry Courtney, sat on the bank of the river's dry bed one bright afternoon in October. They were the sons of thrifty farmers, and had worked hard and diligently during the busy months of sowing and reaping. Now they have enjoyed a day's vacation in the woods, gathering the fast falling nuts. Their sacks were well filled, and they were now content to stop and rest awhile. The autumn leaves in gorgeous hues came floating down on the balmy air. The atmosphere and surroundings were such as to give birth to serious thought. There was a calm, and the boys silently meditated.

"Say, Henry," said Walter, "do you think these leaves would ever have fallen here to die, or this river ever have gone dry, or the meadows ever have been so brown, if man had never sinned?"

This was a long question for a boy to ask, or for a boy to answer.

"No," he replied, in a manner that showed he was thinking along the same line; "nor I don't think we should see so many ugly things in nature; for the Bible says that God made everything 'good' and 'perfect.'"

"Yes, everything must have been just glorious when God first created the earth and made Eden as the home of Adam and Eve," said Walter, his face brightening with thoughts of the beauty of the "garden of God." "I tell you, Henry, I wish God had never allowed Adam and Eve to sin, and then had to curse the ground with thorns and thistles and briers to cause man to work for his bread so that he would not have so much time to indulge in evil. Why didn't God keep them from eating that forbidden fruit, or else never have put such a tree in the garden to tempt them? or why did he let Satan go down to that beautiful garden after being cast out of heaven? Doesn't the Bible say that God knows all things, and understands our 'thought afar off,' or something like that? Then, why did he not keep this flood of evil from the world, when he had the power to do it?"

Both boys were thinking fast, and they were getting into deep and untried waters. But they were the sons of Christian parents who had taught them the principles of the gospel in the home, and had always kept them in the Sabbath-school where many a fact had been stored in their minds for future use. These facts were now coming together in such a way as to help them out of the difficulty. A short silence followed which was broken by Walter.

"But God doesn't compel any of us to keep his law, does he? He doesn't force any of his creatures to do his will. Don't you think that we, and all the heavenly beings, too, love him more because he is not arbitrary with any of his subjects?"

"Yes; 'God is love,'" replied Henry, studiously. "He is not a tyrant as Satan has caused some people to believe. Think what it has cost God, the Father, and all heaven, to allow to all the liberty to choose good or evil. God had to give up his only begotten Son, and the angels their beloved Commander. Then they must see him in the form of sinful man, endure the cruel mocking and scourging, and be rejected by his own people whom he had created and chosen. And all this was done, too, with the power that came from God. John 19:11. And God knew all the while that this must take place in order save man, didn't he?"

"Now, do you remember that memory verse we had in Sabbath-school a short time ago?—the one which says, 'Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you'? What a great God of liberty our heavenly Father is, and what a wonderful lesson of liberty he is giving to the universe, and to this world!"

"Yes; it is truly wonderful," said Henry, "and, after all, I'm glad that God did let Adam choose right or wrong, as he desired; for now I can see more than ever that 'God is love.' And this world would be happier and better if every one in it would follow the example of our Creator. Only the other day I heard father reading of a man who was arrested and put in prison for working quietly on Sunday after he had conscientiously observed the Sabbath. And while the man was in prison, his wife and children suffered for the necessities of life. I'm sure now that this trying to compel people to be good or make them good by law, is all wrong. I hope we shall never be led in any way to trample upon the rights of others, or interfere with man's duty to God."

"Yes, and, Henry, perhaps we can put these principles in practice even now. We often see the rights of others trampled under foot. Let us watch for the opportunity with our associates."

The setting sun witnessed these happy sons of America return to their homes to take up the stern duties of life with broader ideas of its sacred responsibilities. They now saw that they were honored by the Creator with liberty to make their own choice; and they sought to choose the ways of him who gave up his life rather than take away the right of choice from one of his subjects. The God of liberty would have all in the universe enjoy the same liberty that he enjoys, even though it took the life of his Son. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

Studies in French History.—6.

"O PLEASE, Professor Carman," said Maggie Palmer, when the children had taken their seats, the next Wednesday afternoon, "I would like to ask a question about Charlemagne. I was telling papa and mama all I had learned, at the supper table, and Joe said that I forgot to mention that the great emperor was buried sitting up. I did not quite understand you so. Is that true?"

"Yes, Maggie; Joseph was right. The poet has said of Charlemagne—

'No useless coffin enclosed his breast.'

But they dressed him in magnificent style, placed a crown upon his still, cold brow, a copy of the gospels in his hand, which would no longer grasp the sword he knew so well how to wield, and placed him upon his chair-like throne, in the silent tomb. Fitting end, indeed, to such a life, and fit illustration of the brief greatness of human glory."

"I'm so sorry," said Julia March, "that his cruelty to those Saxons should spoil his record."

"Let's see," chimed in Joe Palmeter, "it was religious zeal, I believe."

"Yes," said Professor Carman,—"a zeal not according to knowledge."

"Does history tell us anything about the way Charlemagne looked?" questioned Milly Brown. "I just wonder and wonder."

"Well, you may think of a tall man, large and well proportioned, with long, flowing beard, which was the manner of his time, a thick neck, large eyes, and a long nose. His dress during all his life was a model of simplicity, and part of it was woven and fashioned by his own daughters. So it must be that their father believed in training them to do useful work.

"It must not be forgotten that the common people were at this time (800 A.D.) and for many years afterward, sunk very low in poverty and ignorance."

"Why didn't they complain about it," asked Jennie Jacobs, "and get their friends to help them?"

"Alas! there was no one to come to their relief, and so they suffered in silence.

"At Charlemagne's death, the kingdom was left to his son Louis, called the 'Good-natured.' He had two brothers, but they died before their father. Louis reigned twenty-six years. When he was only a little fellow three years old, his father had him dressed in a tiny suit of armor, and after being carried in his cradle to Aquitaine, over which country (Southern France) his father made him king, he was paraded through the streets on horseback, so the people might show him their respect."

"Well," said Florence Ray, "I guess that spoiled him for anything like a sensible king when he grew bigger."

"One would have thought so, truly; but really, he became a king whose love of justice and right was quite exceptional for that age. He had no desire to be great at any one's expense.

"His first wife dying, he married Judith, a bad woman,—but he was duped into this piece of foolishness,—and he never had much comfort afterward. The empire was equally divided before his death among his three sons by his first wife, which was the custom of those days, and which every one agreed was right but Judith. She made much trouble trying to persuade Louis to give a kingdom to her son, Charles the Bald. So, after a while, because Louis could no longer endure her complaints, he consented, but was obliged, in order to do so, to take a slice from each of the other brothers. This the brothers did not like at all, and war and sorrow to the poor king followed. They carried this so far as even to imprison their father, and take his kingdom from him,—he gave them each a kingdom, in return, they took his from him."

"O Professor Carman!" exclaimed tender-hearted Julia March, with tears in her eyes, "how could they treat their old father so mean, when he had been so good to them? I wonder if they ever learned the fifth commandment."

"I think not; or, if they did, they did not practice it. But, after a while, outside help placed him again on his throne; but he had learned who his friends were, and who he could trust.

"Once, when his army camped over night, ready for the fight next day, poor King Louis woke up in the morning to find his soldiers all deserted to the enemy in the night."

"I guess if his father, Charlemagne, had been there, it would have gone hard with them," said Max Smith.

"I think they would not have dared to desert that lion-hearted warrior," answered the professor. "But poor Louis could not endure this strife, and died, history says of a broken heart, soon after a bloody battle which his sons fought among themselves."

"Well, I'd like to know which got the kingdom, after all the squabble," piped Harry Ray. "It seems as if I had read somewhere that Charles the Bald got it."

"You are right. The son of Judith at last got the entire kingdom which belonged to the great Charlemagne. After the death of Charles the Bald, it was again divided into France, Italy, and Germany."

"What year was this, please?" asked Edna Phillips, pencil in hand.

"Good, Edna. Remember where we are in the stream of time, and make a note of it: Charles the Bald died A. D. 877, after a reign of thirty-seven years.

"It was during his reign that the country was overrun by pirates, who came from the North, calling themselves 'Sea kings.' They boldly plundered Paris, robbing it of vast stores of wealth. France begun to dread them terribly, but still they came.

"These heartless wretches would take helpless babes and toss them into the air, and catch them on the sharp points of their pikes. Finally, one of their number put a stop to these brutalities, and so he received the beautiful name of 'The Saviour of the Children.'

"The next ruler was the son of Charles the Bald. His name was Louis II., and he was called the Stammerer. He reigned only two years, and was followed by his three sons, who succeeded each other. These were: Louis III., Carloman, and Charles the Simple."

"Humph! I'd hate to go down to posterity with such a name as that hanging to me!" exclaimed Bob Billings. "Seems as if a fellow couldn't have been very smart to get such a title as that."

"Don't you think there are a few Charles the Simples, nowadays?" asked the professor.

"Why, what did he do?" asked Rob.

"He was very weak minded, and among other things he did, he gave his daughter to Rollo, the heathen Northman leader. The foolish king also gave him a part of France, which they then named Normandy, if he would consent to become a Christian."

"Was he really converted?" asked Julia March, hopefully.

"I am not at all sure of that, though historians call him a wise and just ruler. But Charles the Simple thought if he only went by the name of Christian, it was all that would be needed."

"Isn't that the way nowadays with those folks who think if they have their name on the church book, it is enough?" asked Harry Ray.

"Yes, and so we see that there are a great many Charles the Simples yet. Now, as our few minutes are up, you may go home; but take with you this one more fact: that this heathen Rollo was great great grandfather of William the Norman, who conquered England."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Next Week's "Sentinel."

We are informed that the controversy which was raised in Colorado by the "Flag Salute" in the public schools is still "on," the Boulder school authorities having decided that any pupil who refuses to give the salute shall be suspended. A decision in the matter is looked for from the State superintendent of public instruction.

Our next issue will treat upon a subject which is kindred to the flag salute, relating to a situation which developed some time since in a village school in Pennsylvania. It will be a "special" for that State, but will be suitable for use in every state, for as we are learning more and more from our correspondents, the situation is essentially the same all through the country. Look out for it.

To the Friends of Ship Missionary Work.

By a fire which occurred at one of the Brooklyn docks on the night of the 20th, the New York harbor mission boat "Sentinel" was damaged to an extent which will necessitate the expenditure of a considerable sum of money in repairs, before the vessel can be of further use. The boat was not insured.

The "Sentinel" is devoted entirely to the work of distributing gospel literature among the sailors and others on the ships entering the harbors of Greater New York, and is the only vessel so engaged at the present time.

Any who would consider it a privilege to aid in work of this nature, are invited to forward donations to Mission Boat "Sentinel," 39 Bond St., New York City.

A Card.

To all interested in carrying the gospel of Jesus Christ to the inhabitants of other lands and who desire to assist in supporting missionaries already placed and others who may engage in the work, the opportunity is given to make an offering to the Foreign Mission Board of the Seventh-day Adventist denomination.

Such donations should be sent to W. H. Edwards, the Treasurer of the Board, 1730 North Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

The burning words of these great orators are of absorbing interest both to those who have lived through the exciting scenes pictured out, and those who know them merely as history. There can be nothing better placed in the hands of the rising generation than a book presenting, in an attractive way, the principles on which this government is founded. Efforts are now being made to overthrow those principles, hence it is important that we become intelligent regarding them. The work is a great assistance to that end.

It is better to stand alone on the truth, than with a crowd upon mere opinions.

THE patriot is he who strives not to plunge his country into war, but to preserve its peace.

HE who invades the rights of but one individual does that which God himself would not dare to do.

THERE is no surer and quicker way to dishonor Christianity than to try to compel people to observe Sunday, or any other professedly Christian institution.

It requires superhuman wisdom to discern what are the real, vital, all-important issues before the people, at the time when there is time to prepare for them.

TRUTH is about as unpopular in the world to-day as it ever was. It is hard work to get people to recognize truth now when it is liable to cost them something to do it.

Is there any more effectual way to oppose wickedness than that in which Jesus Christ opposed it? Should not church people, at least, answer this question in the negative?

"ATTENTION to details" is essential in any business, but nowhere more so than in the business of government. And in government, the details are the individual citizens.

THERE is a great deal going on in the world to-day—so much that movements the most dangerous to liberty are able to make their way "in the crowd" almost unobserved. Eternal vigilance was never the price of liberty more truly than just now.

It is easy enough to see now that Jesus Christ had a great mission to this earth—the greatest that could be imagined. But how many saw this at the very time when Christ was upon the earth?—Only a few, even of his own disciples. So if you do not see that the SENTINEL has any mission, or if the people generally do not see it, it may still be true that it has one, and a very important one too.

War and Civilization.

It is a very significant fact that in all civilized lands to-day there is the greatest activity in pushing forward preparations for war.

Whatever other branches of industry are idle, the effects of "hard times" and "over production" are never felt in the great workshops where are forged the nation's implements of destruction. They are usually running "over time."

One might imagine that civilization and war went hand in hand, or that war was an instrument of civilization, instead of being, as in truth it is, its destroyer.

Is civilization now preparing to commit suicide?

All Europe is an armed camp; and now the war agitation has involved the heathen countries of the far East, and extends its dark shadow across the water, so that it covers the nations of both hemispheres; and we are compelled to face the prospect of a general war, which will inflict a blow upon civilization that will sweep away at once the fruits of centuries.

This is the actual situation; and in view of it, how unwise to foster a sort of "patriotism" which glorifies war, and covets the opportunity to demonstrate national prowess amidst death and carnage.

Let us have a different patriotism taught to our youth and children.

It makes a great deal of difference whether you get satisfaction out of those things which tend to ennoble and prolong life, or out of things that tend to debase and destroy it.

Christians Are a Sect.

WHEN the Apostle Paul came to Rome, certain of the Jews came to him and said: "We desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for as concerning this sect, we know that everywhere it is spoken against." Acts 28:22.

No one will question the application of the words "this sect" to the Christians. Now, if Christians were a sect in Paul's day, at what time did they cease to be a sect? Obviously, they are as much a sect now as they ever were.

This being so, the term "non-sectarian" cannot apply to anything that is Christian; and the very common use that is made of it to designate some religious movement or undertaking that is backed by several or all the churches together, is without any warrant of fact.

It is nothing against Christianity that its adherents constitute a sect. But it is something against Christians when they try to get state aid for a religious enterprise, on the ground of its being "non-sectarian."

To such as see no call for a paper like the AMERICAN SENTINEL we would suggest an investigation of facts and figures pertaining to the formation of religious organizations in the land to-day for political purposes.

New York "World," January 24.

THE Rev. Dr. Parkhurst's sermon yesterday was on the personal need every one has of accepting the atoning blood of Christ for his salvation.

After the doctor had closed his manuscript, he said:—

"My ideas on this subject in all its phases are very different now from what they were a few years ago. They are very different from what they were when I first preached to you from this pulpit. I have come to the conclusion that it is unsafe, for me at least, to trust any man who is not openly and confessedly a Christian, not only theoretically but in his life.

"A new heart is needed by individuals. Unless individuals are changed and reformed we cannot have reformed cities and governments. For that reason, more than ever before in my life, I feel the necessity of personal pleading with you for your soul's good. To that work and that work only I shall devote all my sermons and all my efforts this winter."

Not What It Used To Be.

BY WILLIAM WARD SIMPSON.

WANTED—A Law that will make men seem good,
That will make a Sinner do as he should;
That will make him walk in the good old path,
Make him go to church and keep the Sabbath;
If he don't want to pray, make him pray, by force;
Each day from his Bible at least read a verse.
Such a law is needed just now, for you see Religion is not what it used to be!

Brantford, Ontario.

The Bible Condemns It.

"WHATSOEVER is not of faith, is sin." Rom. 14:23.
To observe Sunday by compulsion of law, is not of faith.

Therefore such Sunday observance is sin.

And a large part of the professedly Christian people of this country are calling on the legislatures for laws that would compel people to sin.

Military "Christianity."

IN a discourse given at the Rev. Thomas Dixon's church in Brooklyn, January 24, Mrs. Mary E. Lease, the well-known lecturer, made this allusion to the spreading spirit of militarism which is mistaken in these days for patriotism and even for Christianity:—

"The modern parson is too often identified with the military. Visiting the other day a fashionable church not one hundred miles distant from this spot, crowded with well dressed people, I was shocked to see one of the side rooms stocked with firearms. They sang of the Prince of Peace, but with those loaded arms near by I thought a more appropriate song would be 'Johnny, get your gun.'"

IN Atlanta, Ga., the question of fusing the Bible in the public schools has been before the school authorities for some time past. A Bible text-book was first submitted, but was objected to by the Catholics and Jews. The Catholics demanded that the text-book give the Catholic version of the Ten Commandments, and also teach the Catholic doctrine on the subject of marriage and divorce. These changes were made, and others to satisfy the religious opinions of the Jews; and whether the text-book will now be acceptable remains to be seen. It should be evident, however, that attempts to teach the Bible in the public schools must be a fruitful source of religious controversy; while it cannot be denied that a book of religious teaching which is satisfactory to Protestants, Catholics, and Jews alike, must come far short of teaching religious truth as the Bible teaches it. It would of necessity be like the play of "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out.

Religious Liberty in Pennsylvania.

THERE happened not long ago in the State of Pennsylvania, an incident which, while trivial in itself, stands so related to other facts as to be by no means insignificant.

In one of the public schools of Tidioute, Warren County, the youthful pupils had been taught by their teacher a little song or verse for recitation, the purpose of which was to teach them temperance and inculcate patriotism. This of course is entirely proper and laudable, provided only that it is done in the right way, so that temperance and patriotism are taught, and not something else.

But in this case it was something else than patriotism that was being taught; in fact, it was something quite the opposite. And it is to the consideration of the question of whether this is so or not, and of what true patriotism is, that we especially invite the attention of the reader in this issue of the AMERICAN SENTINEL.

But here is the song, or verse, which the youthful pupils were taught to recite in concert:—

"We are temperance children,
Growing for the cause;
We will vote down alcohol,
And enforce the Sunday laws."

Now what kind of patriotism is it that represented in the enforcement of Sunday laws? What kind of patriotism do the Sunday laws embody? History can give us an answer to this question. For it is a well known fact that we must go back into history to find where and how the Sunday laws that are upon our statute books, and which the children of to-day are to "enforce," had their origin. These Sunday laws have been handed down from one generation to another, and date far back of the time when the thirteen colonies became the United States of America; back of the time when the world heard proclaimed the Declaration of Independence; back of the time when civilized mankind made the last great world-wide movement for the realization of civil and religious freedom.

They date back to the Dark Ages; and the "patriotism" they embody is the "patriotism" of those times. And what is that "patriotism"?

Anybody who has read history knows what it is. It is a "patriotism" which was in harmony with the civil and religious despotism in which the masses of mankind were then sunk, and from which, since that time, they have made long and heroic struggles to be free.

It may be said that Sunday laws have been enacted all along from the time when church and state were united down to the present; and this is true. But it is not to the point. It would be more correct to say that they have been re-enacted. In substance, they have simply been handed down from century to century, till they have come down to us.

The spirit which enters into them,—the "patriotism" which they embody—is that of the times in which they had their origin.

And now, the children in the public schools are being taught to pledge themselves to "enforce the Sunday laws," as soon as they shall be big enough to do so. But this is not all of the story, and the remaining part of it illustrates what has been said regarding the spirit and purpose of such laws.

In this school was a young lad, Victor Robbins by name, whose parents were observers of the seventh day. He told his seat mate that he was not going to sing the song, because it was not right. His seat mate informed the teacher. The teacher noticed that he did not sing, and, calling him to account, a dialogue ensued which was substantially as follows:—

The teacher kept the boy after school and compelled him to sing the verse printed underneath the picture, on the left, which he had been instructed not to sing by his parents, who do not believe in Sunday laws.

"Victor, why don't you sing?"

"I don't want to sing that song."

"Why not?"

"Because I am not allowed to."

"Who does not allow you?"

"My parents are Seventh-day Adventists, and they don't want me to sing that song. It means persecution to them."

The outcome was that the boy was detained after school and compelled to sing the song.

He was compelled to endorse, in principle, the persecution of his own parents, and to say that he would do that which he knew in his own heart he would not do at all.

And all this was done in the name of Christian Endeavor. It was a Christian Endeavor song, and the teacher was an active member of the Christian Endeavor society.

Now the incident is before the reader in its full significance. Only let this line of work be taken up and pushed by the Christian Endeavor body, so that the children in the public schools everywhere shall grow up committed to the idea of enforcing Sunday by law, and what would we have in this country a few years hence? How much liberty would there be left for all those whose convictions of duty did not harmonize with the idea of Sunday observance?

We have no desire to make more out of this incident than is really in it; and we do particularly desire to give all parties concerned in it credit for the best intentions. It is quite possible that this little song was meant only as a temperance song, and that its authors had in mind only the Sunday closing of saloons; though it is to be noted that when alcohol is really voted down, there will be no occasion for Sunday laws so far as temperance is concerned, since there will then be general prohibition. Certainly the voting down of alcohol could not be done by merely closing the saloons on Sunday; for a Sunday closing law, as applied to the saloons, means the sanction of law for a business which is by nature an outlaw. For it is impossible to close the saloons on Sunday only, by law, without sanctioning them by the same law on all other days of the week.

It is sufficient to observe that however this little song may have been intended, the actual enforcement of Sunday laws means persecution to those who stand opposed to Sunday on religious grounds. History teaches it, logic demands it, and recent experience in this very land abundantly confirms it.

We oppose these innovations only because they should never first have been proposed.

Patriotism.

WE believe in patriotism; and we believe in the teaching of patriotism in the public schools.

But we do not believe in the "patriotism" that—in many places—is being taught.

We do not believe in a kind of "patriotism" that glorifies war. War is against civilization, against national prosperity, against every interest of the individual and of the state.

We believe in a patriotism that seeks to save life, not to destroy it.

We believe in a patriotism that maintains—not denies—liberty of conscience.

We believe in a patriotism that proclaims that "all men are created equal," and that every individual has "certain unalienable rights."

This is the patriotism of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. This is the patriotism of the noble men who laid the foundations of this nation.

Why cannot the children in the public schools be taught something about individual rights? What could be more profitable than to teach them to prize their own rights, and to respect the rights of others?

What kind of patriotism is more truly American than that which prompted the writing of the Declaration of Independence?

To teach the children patriotism it is not necessary that they be taught how to kill people, and to believe that we are the "biggest" nation on earth, and can "lick" any or all of the others.

It is not necessary to teach them that the only proper place to show patriotism is amidst the smoke of gun-powder and the death and ruin of the battle field.

If the American flag is to be held up before the children in the public schools, let them be taught that it stands for something else besides war.

Let them be taught the principles of individual liberty and independence upon which the government, represented by the flag, was established.

Teach the children to love peace, not war. Teach them that respect for right, that love of truth, that moral courage and self-reliance which are essential to true manhood. There will then be no danger but that they will grow up to be patriots.

An end must be put to a social condition that mocks the dictates of justice and makes a travesty of the gospel of Christ.

Thrones are trembling and the preparations for the greatest of wars are being rapidly pushed.

There are but two methods to deal with this storm of human unrest—the policy of Cæsar or the method of Christ. One is the personification of individual selfishness, the other the doctrine of brotherly love.—Mrs. Mary E. Lease.

Patriotism and the Flag.

"New York Journal," January 24.

THE Department of Public Instruction of this State is sending out "Suggestive Programs" for the observance of Lincoln's and Washington's birthdays—anniversaries which by all means should be observed in schools and all that they stand for impressed upon the children.

The opening feature of the program is the "Salute to the Flag." We quote the grave recommendations of the department verbatim:—

"At a signal from the principal the pupils in ordered ranks, hands to the side, face the flag. At another signal every pupil gives the flag the military salute as follows: 'The right hand lifted, palm downward, the forefinger touching the forehead above the eye.' Standing thus all repeat together slowly: 'I pledge allegiance to my flag and the Republic for which it stands, one Nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.' At the words 'to my flag,' the right hand is extended gracefully, palm upward toward the flag, and remains in this gesture till the end of the affirmation, whereupon all hands immediately drop to the side."

This seems to be another example—they are already innumerable—of the unfortunate tendency of well meaning persons, to mistake flag idolatry for patriotism. It were better to teach frankly to the boy that the flag is now what his fathers made it, and will be what he and his fellows make it; that it waved over slavery until his fathers purged it of that stain; that it waves now over political corruption, judicial injustice, and industrial distress, and will continue to spread its folds over these evils unless he and his fellows with stout hearts, pure minds and honest purpose toil in their youth and in their age to sweep away the abominations which have grown up under our flag as under others.

There is a wide difference between flag patriotism and true patriotism. The latter includes reverence for the flag, the former is apt to include nothing else.

ONE man has at last appeared who favors the union of church and state in the United States, and who at the same time has the honesty to say so. He at the same time has the ability to discern, and the honesty to say, that the union of religion and the state is the union of church and state.

This open-minded man is Rev. Dr. Charles M. Lamson, the president of the American Board of Foreign Missions. In the reception and dinner of the Chicago Congregational Club, in Chicago, Monday night, January 17, 1898, Dr. Lamson spoke on "New-Englandism," in the report of which we find the following:—

"Another tendency is toward the union of church and state, or, better, of religion and state. Congregationalism is democracy. It is an inherent part of all true republicanism. The church has a great opportunity to assert its love for the land and to become patriotic. The time is coming when we shall place the obligations of citizenship in the forefront of our principles and inculcate them on all sides in the church work."

Another point in this to his credit, and to which we call the attention of the Christian Citizen is, that Dr. Lamson recognizes, and openly says, that the union of religion and citizenship is the union of religion and the state, which is the union of church and state.

That one such man is found, is a distinct gain. If there were about one or two thousand more such, the situation would be greatly relieved. We sincerely wish that every one of those who are so diligently working for the union of church and state in the United States would by some means get the courage to say so. Nothing is ever gained by trying to get one thing under pretense of something else.

A. T. J.

Another Scripture Study with the "Christian Citizen."

"THERE was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest." Luke 22:24. The disciples were expecting Christ to set up a kingdom in this world and of this world. They expected that in this kingdom they themselves, as a matter of course, would have the chief places, because they were his first chosen disciples. But it was not enough for them that they should have the chief places: the strife among them was as to which one of them should have the chief place. It was not enough that they should all be great and occupy prominent positions; they got up a strife as to which of them should be the greatest and have the most prominent position. Nor yet was the strife exactly as to who should be greatest; but who should be accounted the greatest.

Everybody can see that this was simply political ambition, and political strife for political position. Their conception regarding Christ's kingdom was altogether a mistaken one; yet that does not affect the fact that theirs was only political ambition and political strife for political position: and this all because their conception of Christ's kingdom was political. Everybody can see also that the conception which these men then held of Christ's kingdom is precisely the conception which the Christian citizenship movement entertains to-day. And the strife in which the disciples were then engaged with respect to their place in the prospective government is precisely that of the Christian citizenship folks to-day respecting their prospective government. These to-day contemplate nothing else than a grand national "strife" by an election campaign to decide "which of them shall be accounted the greatest." We know that these to-day sustain themselves with the idea that their work is all for the glory of God. But was it not so with those other disciples? Yet it was all wrong; it was sheer political, selfish ambition.

"And Jesus said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be SO." Luke 22:25, 26.

"So" means "like," "after the same manner," "in the same way." What is the basis of this "so" here?—The kings, the rulers, of the Gentiles, of the nations, of those who are not of the people of God—these exercise lordship over them and exercise authority upon them: "but ye shall not be so." Ye, my disciples, ye, Christians, "shall not" "exercise lordship over them." Ye shall not exercise lordship over the nations, over those who are not of the people of God: ye "shall not" "exercise authority upon them." The kings of the Gentiles are so: but ye shall not be so. The kings of the Gentiles do so: but ye shall not do so. Yet everybody knows that this is precisely the thing that the Christian citizenship folks are planning both to be and to do. They do design to be just so, and to do just so. While the word of Christ stands ever before them—"Ye shall not be SO."

Do you obey Christ, or do you not? Are you Christians, or are you not? "Why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"

It will not do to try to dodge this by pleading that Christ meant that his disciples were not to exercise lordship over, or authority upon, Christians, their own brethren, as the kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over and authority upon the Gentiles, their own people. This is included in what he said, of course; but this is not all that he said in what he said. It cannot be claimed that under this word Christ's disciples could not exercise lordship over, or authority upon, their own brethren, yet could do so over and upon those who were not of their brethren, those who were altogether strangers to them. For if they could not do so with those who were of their own, and recognized fellowship with them, and held the same principles, how much less could they do so with those who were altogether separated and in no way of them nor of their principles or ways.

No: this prohibition of Christ's is universal. Kings of the nations exercise lordship and authority; "but ye shall not be so." The kings of the nations exercise lordship over them; "but ye shall not be so." The kings of the nations exercise authority upon them; "but ye shall not be so."

We know that the Christian citizenship folks insist that they must take possession of the government—municipal, state, and national for "the good of both government and people." They insist that those who now run the government are running it to the bad; but "we will run it only for the good; they are agents of evil, we will be agents of good."

Oh, yes! that is what those who exercise lordship and authority over others always said. "The people are only the better for being ruled, and we are the ones best fitted to rule; we do it for their good; we are only agents of good to the poor bad people."

All this is precisely what Jesus says that these kings all say of themselves: "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors." "Bene"—good. "Factor"—agent. "Benefactors"—agents of good. This is precisely what the Christian citizenship people propose to be in their political aspirations: they propose to be benefactors, agents of good, to the country and the people. They propose by their political ambitions to work the "redemption of cities, states, and the nation." Thus they too in this day would be called the same kind of political "benefactors."

But what says Jesus to them and to all who bear the name of his disciples?—He says, "Ye shall not be so." Those who exercise authority upon the nations are called benefactors; "but ye shall not be SO."

Has not the fallacy of such ambition on the part of professed Christians been sufficiently demonstrated in history? Has not the thing been attempted over and over? And has not every attempt proved a most dismal failure so far as any kind of good is concerned? The thing was always productive of more and greater evils than were those which they proposed to remedy.

"Ye shall not be so," says the Lord Jesus Christ. Will our Christian citizens respect his authority, and obey his Word?

A. T. J.

Jesus and Social Reform.

George M. Steele, D. D., in Northwestern Christian Advocate.

THAT the teachings of Jesus tended to the rectification of social wrongs there is no doubt. There is just as little doubt that this was not the primary object he had in view. A considerable class of teachers in our day hold the directly opposite opinion. Not all of them agree with what one frankly said: "We are to make men comfortable in this life without their concerning themselves much about the future." But to this complexion does all such teaching come at last. . . .

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added." This was the keynote of Christ's campaign for the reformation of humanity. He never adopted nor taught any social theories that were not primarily ethical or religious. We may safely challenge the production of a single utterance that must necessarily be interpreted as having an economic, political, or otherwise social character. These topics were utterly foreign to his intentions. When one came asking him to interfere in a case of alleged injustice as to a division of an inheritance, he exclaimed, in a tone of resentment, "Who made me a judge or a divider over you?" and proceeded to deliver a discourse on covetousness.

HE IGNORED "SOCIOLOGY" AS SUCH.

Jesus has been claimed by all sorts of reformers as an advocate and exponent each of his own particular cause. The socialists cite him as an authority; so do the labor reformers of all types; the land reformers; and even the anarchists. The communists of this day represent him as their first great advocate; though the communists of a century ago designated him as Le scelerat, "The infamous." But he had no word which can be tortured into an approval of any of the doctrines held by the parties in question, nor had he one word in condemnation of them. There is absolutely no teaching by him on any branch of sociology as such. The few elementary principles that were accepted in all civilized communities of that age and are nearly self-evident, he took for granted. So he did certain principles of physics, and meteorology, and chemistry, and astronomy. Many of the prevailing notions concerning these subjects were glaringly wrong, but he did not undertake to correct them. . . .

We may search in vain through all the teachings of Jesus for any advice respecting the relations of employers and laborers, on the treatment of the criminal classes, on pauperism, distribution or exchange, on taxation or finance, on a system of education or the management of a family. He did not even organize a church, though unquestionably he expected his followers to do so, and he laid down no form of church government. He simply and sternly demanded of all men in all social relationships and in all callings and industries, righteousness and love. It was God's righteousness, founded on God's law and coming in God's way; not that which comes from human culture or tends to merely temporal welfare. The love was that which is "shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost," and which impels the subject of it to do to others as he would have them do to him. Once get man permanently fixed in this experience and there would be a solution of all the moral and social problems of life.

LABOR AND TAXATION.

It may be said that there were at that time no such gigantic evils as now afflict human society. But this is as far as possible from the truth. Bad as the condition of certain classes is now, it was at that time incalculably worse. It is hardly credible—the statement of the oppression and degradation of the masses of the people. Take one particular, that of the taxes. We are told by competent authority that from two thirds to three fourths of the whole product was collected by the tax-gatherer. Those to whom the taxes were farmed out amassed enormous fortunes by extortion and robbery of the people. Laboring men, when not slaves, were crushed down into the most appalling poverty. There were frequent revolts and desperate insurrections, which were put down with such violence and cruelty as are never heard of in our time. Out of these came the formation of robber bands, roaming about the country and committing all manner of depredations; and those engaged in these outlawries justified themselves on the ground of the exaction and tyranny of their superiors. It was this that made the publicans so hated and execrated. It was because Jesus treated these and some other disreputable characters as proper subjects of his saving influence and capable of becoming members of the kingdom of God that he was at times distrusted and bitterly maligned.

But was he indifferent to this great mass of human misery? Was there in him no sympathy and no desire to mitigate this wretchedness? Assuredly this was a part of the incalculable burden which he bore. He looked upon those sufferers with infinite tender pity. He bore the griefs and carried the sorrows of the oppressed and afflicted. He was described as "a man of sorrows." "He had compassion on the multitude."

Why, then, did he not organize a crusade against these abuses and more explicitly and directly denounce them? It was certainly not because he regarded them of minor importance. Their removal was an essential part of his program for the emancipation of humanity. But he regarded them and all other social evils as the effects of certain causes, and to attack the former to the neglect of the latter would have been unreasonable and nugatory. He recognized sin and selfishness deeply entrenched in human nature as the source of all these moral and social disorders, and he preached a gospel which, if accepted and lived, would destroy those foul springs of evil and cure the wrongs which spring from them. He laid the ax at the root of the tree instead of pruning among the branches. "First make the tree good." It was spiritual regeneration of the individual at which he directly aimed. This and nothing else would save society.

THE INDIVIDUAL, NOT "SOCIETY."

Many who are engaged in social reformatory work are urging the rectification of society as such. They claim that there has been too much attention paid to the conversion and salvation of individuals. There is no sanction for any such method in Christ's ministry. Indeed, it is preposterous in itself if the method is to be taken literally. Society is composed of individuals, and though individuals associated are something vastly more and greater than a mere aggregated mass, yet society can never be reached except through its members. It is not to be understood that Jesus placed no value, or small value, on the increase of power that comes through association. Society is one of the chief facts of humanity, and no one can, without great disadvantage, ignore or underrate it. But it must always be understood that individuals in society are of more importance than society itself. Society is a means not an end; and the means can in no case be regarded as greater than the end. Says F. W. Robertson: "It is easy to be a warm lover of England and yet not love one Englishman. Easy to set a great value on a flock of sheep and yet have no particular care for one sheep or lamb. If it were killed, another of the same species might replace it. Easy to have fine, large, liberal views about the working classes or the emancipation of the negroes and yet never have done a kind act to one."

THE MISSION OF JESUS THEN AND ALWAYS.

The mission of Jesus, then, was ethical and religious and nothing else. Whatever wrongs of any sort existed then or exist now, their removal could be effected only by moral and spiritual agencies. Subsidiary to these agencies are all studies and investigations of a social and scientific character; these latter are of great importance and not to be ignored or neglected by religious men; but they are subordinate and not paramount or preëminent. This appears to have been the method of Jesus. He evidently expected his successors to do many things—he asserts even “greater things”—that he did not do. They were to be under the direction of the Holy Spirit, who was to “bring all things to their remembrance”—guide them as he himself had done, only on a broader scale.

What the church and Christianity want, then, to-day, is not a new economical or political or hygienic gospel, but the original gospel of Jesus, which calls for repentance and faith as conditions of regeneration and which insists on the characteristics laid down in the Sermon on the Mount and the other teachings of Jesus. This will include doing good to all men and in all ways, rectifying all wrongs whether industrial, commercial, domestic, or political. That this is not more fully done—and heaven knows how great is the lack!—is not because we need a new religion, but because we do not apply that which we have.

Sunday and Personal Right.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE Constitution of the United States was founded upon the self-evident truth that all men are created equal.

This government was not organized to grant rights to which its citizens previously were not entitled, but to protect each one in his individual rights. It sought to be a government such as all governments ought to be—one in which the individual shall enjoy to the fullest extent his natural rights.

To more effectually secure these rights church and state were separated, and Congress was forbidden to legislate in favor of, or against, religion, confining it to matters which are purely civil.

It is sometimes urged by those who are seeking to secure laws for the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath day that such a step would not be a union of church and state.

But murder will out, and it is being made more and more manifest that such statements, however honestly intended, are absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

If Sunday laws are all right, and no union of church and state would thereby be effected, why do they desire to have the Constitution changed?

As the Constitution was founded upon the self-evident truth that all men are created equal—that they have certain unalienable rights; and since to more effectually secure these rights to one and all church and state were kept separate, it is perfectly plain that to change the Constitution in this regard is to deny the doctrine that all men are created equal—that they have any inalienable rights at all.

It is therefore perfectly natural that those who plead for Sunday laws should come right out and thus deny this principle—this self-evident truth. Indeed, it could not be otherwise. Hence Dr. Burrell, at the Christian Endeavor convention held a few months ago, at Paterson, N. J., in pleading for Sunday laws, was perfectly logical when he declared that the doctrine of personal rights was a political heresy.

To fasten this teaching of Dr. Burrell upon the people of this country is to bring them into the worst kind of bondage. It is not only to make a slave of man's actions, but also of his conscience. From being a king amongst kings, he is reduced to the awful condition of a serf—a mere automaton, a machine of the government, capable of action only as the government directs.

Doubtless Dr. Burrell and his associates would like to cover up this truth, if it were possible. But the matter of Sunday laws, striking as it does at the very root of personal liberty, brings its advocates face to face with this phase of the question, and the inexorable law of logic compels them to make this argument; they cannot dodge it if they would.

Sunday law advocates would have us believe that this Sunday-Sabbath is a true friend of all—especially of the laboring classes. But an institution that cannot be sustained except by denying truth that is self-evident, is an enemy, an implacable foe; and will destroy instead of save,—whether it be a nation or an individual. Consequently Sunday cannot be a part of the truth the knowledge of which shall make us free. John 8:32. Its source is not in the Author of freedom who said, “And if the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed;” nor is it a part of that law concerning which the Psalmist said, “I will walk at liberty, for I seek thy precepts.” Ps. 119:45.

In the address of Dr. Burrell before referred to, he urged that Sunday is a seal. Yes, this is true; but not the seal of God as the speaker desired his hearers to believe.

The very fact that this Sunday institution cannot, as before stated, be sustained only as the self-evident truth that all men are created equal, is squarely denied, and a change of the Constitution called for, ought to convince every one, especially Christians, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that Sunday is not the Sabbath of the Bible, nor the seal of the living God. God's Sabbath is not a sign of bondage, but of liberty—liberty that can be found only in the Lord Jesus Christ.

This country does not need a kind of “patriotism” that is only good on the fourth of July, and derives its chief inspiration from fireworks and lemonade.

If you don't agree with the sentiments expressed in this paper, don't get excited over it; but if you do, remember that on the side of truth there is always calmness.

THERE was a great banquet given the other day in this city,—the largest, it is said, that was ever given at an American hotel, as well as “the richest and most resplendent.” It was a banquet given by the “National Association of Manufacturers.”

* * *

ABOUT a thousand diners were present—more than could be accommodated in the great dining-room of the ten-million-dollar hotel in which the banquet was spread. Nearly all of them were millionaires, the aggregate wealth represented reaching away into the billions, beyond the stretch of the human imagination to picture. It was not a banquet held for the purpose of eating and drinking, but for considering the situation of the country; for it was as representing the country that this great gathering of manufacturers had assembled. And it was evident that “the country” is prosperous; no one looking into the great dining room and taking even a momentary glance at the banquet as it was in progress, could have doubted for a moment that “the country” is very prosperous indeed.

THE President of the United States was there, and made a speech. He came expressly from Washington to be present, and he came in his official capacity. It was the only capacity in which he could have come. The conclave would not have cared a cent for his presence in his own individual capacity; for the President is not a great manufacturer, neither is he a millionaire. But why should the President, as such, come from Washington to do honor to this banquet of wealth? This is a query which we deem pertinent to a consideration of the event.

THE President of the United States is the representative of 70,000,000 people,—the inhabitants of all the States and Territories. As such he stands for the people. Persons who go to see the President on any mission go to the people. As chief executive of the nation, the President is the embodiment of the people. The people are the reality behind every act that is done in official capacity. They are the real movers, the real actors, in everything.

THE manufactures might have gone to Washington, —to the President; but instead, the President came to them. The people moved at the will of the millionaire manufacturers. Remembering that it is not the tail that wags the body, but the body the tail, it is evident that the millionaire manufacturers, and not the 70,000,000 or more citizens, are “the country.” It is in dollars that the millions count, not in mere human individuals. But things have changed in this respect since the days of Jackson and Lincoln.

* * *

THE “National League for the Protection of American Institutions” is getting ready to fight Sunday baseball, which the leading ball clubs have announced their intention of playing during the coming season. The object, of course, is to prevent the “desecration of the Sabbath.”

* * *

THE League should change its name. Baseball is distinctly an “American institution,” while the Sabbath is not; yet the League is going to oppose baseball in the interests of the “Sabbath.” It is going to oppose an American institution, in order to maintain something entirely foreign to such institutions.

* * *

ANY person who reads the Bible and history cannot help knowing that the Sabbath is not an American institution; it is a divine institution. And any one who believes the Bible ought to know that a divine institution does not need the protection of an earthly power.

* * *

NOT long ago Emperor William, of Germany, in swearing in some recruits for his army, took occasion to proclaim that a good soldier must necessarily be a good Christian. Appreciating the absurdity of this utterance, the editor of a Berlin journal published a cartoon in which the infidel armies of Frederick the Great and Napoleon, and the heathen armies of Alexander the Great and Leonidas, were represented as reading these words of the emperor’s speech; and for this the editor is to be punished for “lese-majesty.” It is said, by the way, that about a thousand prosecutions for “lese-majesty” take place in the German empire in the course of a year.

BUT the noteworthy point which appears in the present instance is that while “lese-majesty” sends the offender to prison for at least a term of several months, a man who almost at the same time was prosecuted for speaking against God, got a sentence of imprisonment for only eight days; which leads an exchange to remark that Emperor William “is probably the first to carry the impression that he believes in a God of less importance than himself.” But just such inconsistencies are always to be found under a system where church and state are united.

It is a fact that the union of church and state under any form of government tends not to beget reverence for God, but rather the opposite. Of course, under such a system, the state is bound to punish all such acts as constitute "offenses against God and religion." But to punish an "offense against God" with anything less than death, is only to cast ridicule upon God. God, indeed, forgives the offense freely, and magnifies his name through his mercy and love. He forgives the offender, and the latter escapes the penalty of his transgression; but always the divine forgiveness discloses the awful scene of the Son of God hanging on the cross in the agonies of death, for the very offense which was forgiven. So that both justice and mercy, the attributes of God's character, are magnified in his forgiveness of sin. But as human governments are not conducted upon the principle of forgiving the offenses of transgressors, it only remains for them to inflict punishment; and when the state assumes to deal with offenses against God, the only thing it can do is inflict what it deems a fitting punishment for them.

AN offense against God is a sin; and the only fitting punishment for sin is that which God himself, after the Judgment, will inflict upon all who have not obtained pardon and regeneration through Christ. When a government therefore undertakes to punish for an offense against God, by inflicting a penalty of fine or imprisonment, as is usually done, it only casts contempt upon God, and lowers him to the level of the earthly and human. An offense against him comes to be considered as on a par with an offense against an earthly ruler, or as even a thing of less consequence. It is simply impossible that the result should be otherwise.

The Ontario Sunday Bill Withdrawn.

EDITOR SENTINEL: The bill introduced in the Ontario Parliament, at the request of the "Lord's Day Alliance," to amend the "Lord's Day Act," and make it more stringent than at present, has been withdrawn. This was largely brought about by Sunday keepers themselves, who viewed with alarm the prospective workings of the bill, and vigorously protested against it.

The law as it now stands leaves the way open for religious persecution, and it was shown that should the amendment pass, very many of the industries of the country would be seriously menaced, if not entirely destroyed.

It is proposed, however, in the future to take up the matter again in a form that it is hoped will meet with popular approval.

Those who favored the bill severely censure the government for its action in withdrawing it.

As the country is on the eve of an election, the present government is accused of yielding because of political expediency.

Thus it may be seen that Sunday laws abound in innumerable difficulties, both to those who make them and those on whom they are enforced.

How much trouble would be avoided in this world if the matter of the Sabbath and religion in general were left between God and man.

To Close Drug Stores on Sunday.

New York "World," January 24.

THERE will be a meeting of the Executive Committee of St. Michael's Chapter of the Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor to-morrow night at the Parish House of St. Michael's Church, 225 West Ninety-ninth Street [New York City]. The object is to start a movement to close drug stores on Sundays. So far sixty-five trade, labor, reform, business, and church organizations and fifteen leading clergymen have indorsed the movement.

Decline in the Price of Titles.

It will be good news to some Americans, that there is a prospective decline in the price of titles of royalty. The Italian government, says the New York Sun, intends to submit to parliament a bill which provides "that any one desiring the title of prince shall pay $8,000 therefor. Five thousand dollars will be the sum necessary to obtain the title of marquis, while $4,000 will buy the title of count. Any one may become a baron who is willing to pay $1,000 for the honor."

This is far below the price that American heiresses, or their papas—have been in the habit of paying; and we know no reason too why these titles are not just as good as any.

A DISPATCH from Rome says that Cardinal Vannutelli is "in deep disgrace" at the Vatican, on account of having been present at a grand dinner given in honor of the American ambassador to the Quirinal, Mr. Draper. To thus openly seek the good will of the Italian government, is to violate a stringent rule of papal policy; but it seems that the cardinal, who is a prominent candidate for the tiara, thinks the good will of the Italian government worth more to him than the friendship of the Italian cardinals.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Studies in French History.—7.

"Whom were we talking about when our last week's study closed?" questioned Professor Carman.

"That's good; I see you are interested in these lessons," he added, as he noted the dozen eager hands that were raised.

"It was about Rollo, the Norman," answered Charlie White, in response to a nod from his teacher.

"Right. Well, Milly, what is on your mind? you may speak freely. In fact, I think we may as well devote the first of the half hour to questions, answers, and a familiar talk on the previous lesson."

"Well," said Milly, "aunt Mildred is at our house visiting, she is real good in history, and she told us a little story about Charles the Simple and Rollo. She said that when the king let Rollo have certain lands, it was necessary that he comply with the usual custom, and show his allegiance to his king by kissing Charles' foot. But Rollo didn't propose to do that kind of business, and so he sent a soldier to do it for him. But it was not at all agreeable even to him, and he was so indignant at being asked to do this, that he seized the king's foot and raised it to his lips, instead of bowing down to perform the ceremony. As the king was sitting on a throne which was not stationery, it tipped him over, throne and all," laughed Milly, "and then the Normans laughed at him; but the Frenchmen were quite angry, though the king wisely turned it off as a joke."

"A very good story, Milly, and well told," said Professor Carman, encouragingly.

"After Charles the Simple had been murdered," continued the teacher, "which people supposed was done by one of his nobles, Hugh the Great, who was the son of the Count of Paris,—he who had been the real ruler instead of Charles the Simple, might easily have been king. But he did not choose so to aspire; so Louis IV. ascended the throne. He reigned eighteen years, and in 954 A. D. he left the kingdom to Lothaire, his son. He was succeeded by Louis V., called the Do-Nothing, because really his reign was so short that he could not have accomplished much, were he even so wise,—it was only a year. He was the last of the Carolingian kings, the direct posterity of Pepin, and of Charles the Great."

"Charles the Great and Charlemagne were the same, weren't they, I believe?" asked Max Smith.

"Yes, the very same. Now, Hugh Capet, son of Hugh the Great, was made king by the nobles; and so you see that in less than two hundred years from the time when the great Charlemagne was placed in his tomb, the kingdom for which he fought so many battles and over which he reigned in such glory, had gone into stronger hands."

Rollo of Normandy showing allegiance by proxy to King Charles.

"Don't you think it would have been better for France if the descendants of Charlemagne had continued to reign?" asked Rob Billings.

"If they had been capable as their illustrious ancestor, yes; but they were not, so it was no doubt better to have a change. You see the nobles had almost unlimited power over those under them, and history says that the name of 'king' was almost a mockery."

"How came the nobles to have so much power?" asked Joe Palmeter.

"I will try and explain how, Joseph, or rather, I will tell you about the Feudal System, then you can understand it."

"When a chief went to war, in very early times and was victorious, he used to give his principal men a certain share of the conquered territory, if they would promise to fight for him and work for his interests. This was called 'owning allegiance,' while the chief was called their liege lord and they his vassals. Then after a while these vassals themselves would do the same thing, and subdivide the land, among others, called 'freeholders,' and these freeholders had also others under them, called serfs, who were the very lowest class. So there were:—

"First, the king; second, the nobles; next, the freeholders: and lastly, the serfs."

"I should think such a way of doing things would make no end of bother and worry for the king," said practical Jack Smith.

"It did, indeed, for after a while the poor king didn't own as much land as the nobles and vassals, and so they did not like to acknowledge their allegiance to him."

"Wasn't that the way with Rollo?" asked Florence Ray.

"Yes, and poor Simple Charles did not dare to resent the insult of being tumbled off his throne."

"I should have thought they would have changed the foot-kissing ceremony after they had such an experience as this," said Maggie Palmeter, laughing.

"So they did; after a while they signified their allegiance to the one above them by placing the hand inside that of their superior, which was certainly a more pleasing custom."

"Let me see, professor, I would like to make a note of the time when Hugh Capet took the throne."

"Very well; write; Hugh Capet, first of the Capetian kings, reigned from 987 to 996 A. D.

"I have been very glad to see that you all made good use of your note books during this lesson. We will close this study by giving the names of each of the kings of France as far as we have studied. This you will also do well to write in your note books. Then we will repeat them in concert:—

"Clovis, later, and unimportant kings, Pepin the Short, Charlemagne, Louis the Good-natured, Charles I. the Bald, Louis II. the Stammerer, Louis III. and Carloman, Charles II. the Fat, Charles III. the Simple, Louis IV. Lothaire, Louis V. the Do-Nothing, and Hugh Capet.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Following the Majority.—No. 2.

"Good evening, Tom!"

"Why, good evening, Will! Come in! Take a seat by the fire. You are just the boy I've been wanting to see. Where have you been keeping yourself of late?"

"At home, Tom. You know I told you I believed I would take my circus money and buy me one of those pocket Bibles like yours?"

"Yes, Will, I remember."

"Well, I did it, and I have been putting in my spare time of late in studying it."

"Good for you, Will! How are you getting on?"

"Well, that is just what I want to tell you. I need a little help."

"What is the matter, Will? Is it hard for you to find the texts you want?"

"No, Tom. I tried your way. Learned the names of the different books, and the order in which they come, and when I know the reference now, I can find it easy enough."

"Well, that is good! Now what is the matter?"

"Why, it's these verses here in the fifth chapter of Matthew—the 17th and 18th: 'Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.'

"So you are studying of the law, are you, Will?"

"Yes, Tom. I wanted to see if there is any reason for people's thinking it has been changed. Jim Drake says he heard his father say that there was no need of people getting their mind all confused in the study of the old law, because it had all been changed when the Saviour came, and all we had to do now was to believe in Christ.

"But, Jim," said I, "how are we to believe in Christ unless we are acquainted with him; and how are we to become acquainted with him except through his laws? Did you ask your father to explain the matter, Jim?"

"No, indeed," said he. "He wouldn't have done it if I had. He don't think such things belong to children."

"But they do, Jim," said I, "for I remember reading a verse in my Bible the other day that said, 'Those things that are revealed belong unto us and to our children,' so if there was any change made, we boys have as good a right to know it as the older people.

"Why, Jim," said I, "your father is quite an active man in church work, isn't he?"

"Well, yes," said he, "if talking politics and keeping people straight on Sunday can be called church work."

"But, Will," said he, "are you certain that the Saviour's coming didn't change the law?"

"Yes, sir, Jim, I am," said I.

"Well, now, look here, Will," said he, "it isn't very likely that the majority of the people are in the wrong, and only now and then one right."

"But, Jim," said I, "don't you know that the way that the majority travel is called the broad way, and doesn't lead to heaven at all, and but just a few find the road to eternal life? It doesn't make any difference, Jim, if all the world says a thing is so, if God says it isn't so, why, it isn't!"

"Well, Will," said he, "just show me where He says it isn't so."

"Well, Tom, do you know that I couldn't do it? I had heard it talked of lots in the Sabbath-school, and thought I understood it real well, but I hadn't realized how necessary it was that we know just where to find the proof of what we say, and I began to see why our teacher considered it so very essential that we boys learn the references for ourselves. I said, 'Jim, I don't know just where to find it, but I know it says so, and I'll look the matter up.'

"Well, yes," said he in his sarcastic way, "it strikes me, Will, that that will be about the thing for you to do, and may be when you find it it won't read just as you thought it did."

"But I knew it did, so I said, 'I mean to do it, Jim,' and walked away, fearing he might aggravate me to say something to be sorry for. I went home and began at once. My father smiled and said, 'If you keep on, my son, I don't know but you'll be a preacher yet; but if you are,' he added, 'I hope you'll stick to your profession and not try to be preacher and politician too, as some in these days seem endeavoring to do.'"

"Your father don't belong to the church, does he, Will?"

"No, Tom; but do you know I believe he has got more good religion in him than some who do, and that isn't saying that people should n't belong to the church either. But now, Tom, I'm ready to begin. What does this jot and tittle mean in this text, that the Saviour says shall in no wise pass from the law?"

"Why, Will, 'jot' is the smallest letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The Saviour is speaking to the Jews here and says that there shall not even so much as the smallest letter of their alphabet ever pass from the law till all be fulfilled."

"And the 'tittle,' Tom, what is that?"

"Why, that is just a little corner of a letter that makes it different from another that is very nearly like it. For instance, Will, you know how nearly alike our capital O and Q are? Just that little quirl taken from the Q would leave it an O; but the Saviour tells them that not even the smallest letter nor the tiniest part of a letter shall ever pass from the law while heaven and earth remain. Turn to the 111th Psalm and read the last clause of the seventh verse and the first clause of the eighth."

"All his commandments are sure. They stand fast for ever and ever."

"For how long, Will?"

"For ever and ever."

"How many of them?"

"All of them."

"Now turn to Ecclesiastes, third chapter. Read the first two clauses of the fourteenth verse."

"I know that, whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever; nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it."

"How does this text agree with the idea of the law's having been changed, Will?"

"Not a bit of agreement about it, Tom."

"So I say. You see the Saviour knew there would come a time when it would be taught that he changed the law, and he says, Think not that I have done such a thing. If you want to find what he did do, turn to Isaiah the forty-second chapter and twenty-first verse."

"The Lord is well pleased for his righteousness' sake; he will magnify the law, and make it honorable."

"He will do what to it?"

"Magnify it."

"Now let me bring the magnifying glass, Will, and we will hold it over the page and see what it does."

"It enlarges and brings out the parts more clearly! It makes it lots plainer, Tom!"

"Now Will, isn't that just precisely what the Saviour did when he said that not even the corner of a letter should ever pass from the law?"

"Well, truly it is, Tom. I don't know of any way by which he could better have done it."

"Nor I. From what we have already gone over you would n't judge the study of the law so very confusing to the mind, would you, Will?"

"No, indeed!"

"Well, it's too late to study further to-night; but come over again, Will. I just enjoy an evening like this."

"I too, Tom, and I am sure I thank you ever so much for helping me this time, and shall be only too glad to come again."

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 3, 1898.

It is expected that a hearing will soon be given upon the Sunday bill now before the Albany legislature.

THE California Association of cycling clubs has been "outlawed" by the League of American Wheelmen because the former sanctioned Sunday racing; but the League has, it seems, signally failed in an effort to get its course in this matter sustained by the International Cyclists' Union.

LOUD protests from printing concerns are being made out in Michigan against the awarding of a State printing contract to the Seventh-day Adventist establishment at Battle Creek, the latter having made a bid which was below all others received. Many of the objections are based upon religious grounds.

WE are not the only persons who dissent from the "flag salute." Read what the New York Journal says (p. 69) of the flag salute in the form proposed for the schools in this State, which is not nearly as objectionable as that form which calls for a profession of allegiance to God.

IN reply to a Christian Endeavor petition from Hackensack, N. J., to Washington, asking the government to discontinue Sunday delivery of mail at that place, the postmaster-general has replied that "the running of mails is for the benefit of the majority of the people," and that the Sunday delivery "will stand."

A COMMITTEE of clergymen of Omaha and vicinity, appointed for the purpose of persuading the directors of the "Trans-Mississippi Exposition" to close the exposition on Sunday, were recently refused a hearing on the subject by the Board of Directors. Of course the clergymen will not let the matter drop thus easily, and a determined fight may be expected over it between this and the time for inaugurating the exposition.

CONCERNING the difficulty raised by the "flag salute" in Colorado, the latest information is that State Superintendent Patton "has sent orders to the school board in Boulder to settle, if possible, the difficulty over the salute to the flag which exists between it and the Seventh-day Adventists. She considers the salute of not enough importance to antagonize a whole sect, and therefore suggests that the school board do away with the salute if peace cannot be restored by any other means. At Victor, where the same state of affairs exists, the board will probably be given the same directions."

The Ministers Were Honest.

UNDER date of January 23, Mr. W. H. Falconer, an observer of the seventh-day, writes us the following:—

"The ministers held a Sunday-law meeting in Winnepeg recently, and some of our brethren attended. In the discussion, which came up Brother Ritchie exposed the animus of Sunday legislation, with the result that some of the ministers admitted it would be persecution to us, and that they would also oppose it if they were in our place. The result was that the chairman was very much perturbed, and resigned his place and left the meeting, which then turned into a union prayer meeting. So that meeting was a fizzle. But they have had a secret meeting since."

Of course it means persecution. Why not be honest about it, as these ministers were?

JUDGE GAYNOR, of Brooklyn, in dismissing, recently, the cases of a number of boys brought before him for playing ball on Sunday, observed that a game of ball was better for the boys than the temptations and allurements which they would be likely to meet in Sunday idleness. It is certainly reasonable to suppose that a judge on the bench is as well qualified to speak on this point as is any one of the class who are calling for Sunday laws.

Do you know what to do with that child to make of him what he ought to be? "What child?"—Why, your own child, that you now have the responsibility of bringing up; that one that you are building such hopes upon, or whose wayward tendencies you are viewing with anxious forebodings. Perhaps you think that you know, but in any case, it is well to get all the information that will be of value on so important a subject. So we want to say to you that a most valuable book on the subject on child training has been recently published by Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, who is widely known in connection with the work of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Henry writes from experience, both as a mother and as National Evangelist of the W. C. T. U., in which capacity she has had wide opportunity for observation and information on the subject of which she treats. The title of the book is "Studies in Home and Child Life;" 250 pages; twenty-four chapters. Published by Good Health Publishing Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Price, $1.

THERE are a great many papers published in this country especially for the young people, but we know of only one such that aims both to entertain the young and also to inculcate the principles of Christianity, combining moral instruction with that pertaining to things secular, as is necessary to the ideal education. And that paper is the Youth's Instructor, published by the Review and Herald Co., Battle Creek, Mich. It is an illustrated weekly magazine of twenty or more pages, which appears for the year 1898 in new dress, and with other changes and improvements which add greatly to its value, but not at all to its cost, which is $1 per year. Send for a sample copy and judge for yourself.

THE two illustrations which appear in this issue were drawn expressly for the AMERICAN SENTINEL. They are the first of many original illustrations which we design to present in the SENTINEL during 1898.

A SUNDAY law is a poor substitute for moral backbone.

"HONESTY is the best policy;" and this means to be honest with your conscience.

THE individual who rates policy above principle evidently imagines that time outweighs eternity.

THE modest demand of the National Reformers is that the people will please allow them to be conscience for the government.

IF people did not choose to be so independent of God, they would not be so miserably dependent upon their fellow mortals.

IF the Constitution is a godless document because it does not contain the name of God, is the Book of Esther a godless book?

DOES the "civil Sunday" prove the theory of evolution? No one can question that it evolved from something purely religious.

THERE is no danger that the world will ever cease to be religious, for it is human nature to be religious. But when people lose Christianity, their religion naturally allies itself with worldly power and fights its battles with carnal weapons. Worldly religion is worse than none at all.

THE purpose of legislation is not to grant rights, but to preserve them. To assume the authority to grant rights is to deny that rights inhere in the individual.

CAN anyone tell why it is that the ministers and religious societies can see better than any other classes of the people the necessity for a purely "civil" Sunday?

IF it were not for the love of money, a great many people would close their shops on Sunday who are now "forced" to keep them open, notwithstanding they feel very bad about doing business on that day.

Christians Speak for All Men.

JESUS CHRIST came into this world, as he said to Pilate, to "bear witness unto the truth."

The purpose which brought him here is the same which brings every individual into the world who is "born again." Christians, like their Master, are here to bear witness unto the truth.

It is because of this, which condemns the world, that the world has hated them and persecuted them.

Christians are not in this world to ask favors for themselves of the world. If the world leaves them free to enjoy the exercise of their rights, well and good. But in any case their enunciation of the doctrine of individual rights, as with any other Christian doctrine, is for the purpose of bearing witness to the truth, which concerns all men alike.

Before the bar of truth all men stand; by it all must be judged. Whether the Christian be in the private assembly, or before the legislature, or in court to answer for obedience to the dictates of his conscience, these conditions remain unchanged. The real bar is the bar of truth. Christians are the witnesses; and by their testimony those who hear it are to know whether they themselves stand justified or condemned.

This was forcibly illustrated in the experience of the apostle Paul. Brought before Felix in bonds, to answer for the crime with which he was charged by the Jews, Paul bore witness unto the truth, which, while vindicating him against the Jews, was of such magnitude and universal application that Paul the prisoner was lost to view before the overwhelming significance of the eternal principles of right conduct. The record is that "as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee." Acts 24:25.

In bearing witness unto the truth, as it is in Jesus Christ, self is lost to view, and in its place all mankind appear as heirs of the inalienable rights which God has given them—rights by the exercise of which they are to determine their eternal destiny for weal or woe.

It is thus that Christians stand before the legislatures of the land, asking that no laws be enacted which will interfere with the individual prerogative of rendering to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's.

Another Scripture Study for the "Christian Citizen."

OF his disciples, Jesus says, "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." "Ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world." "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

The state is altogether of this world. No state will ever see any other world than this.

Yet Christ says that Christians are not of this world; nor of the things that are in the world.

Now the problem is, How can a man be not of this world; and yet be a part of that which is altogether of this world? How can he be not of, and love not, the things that are in the world, and yet be a material, an active part of a thing that is solely of this world and can never possibly be of any other? The only fair, logical, or reasonable answer to these questions settles the question of the relationship of Christians to the states and governments of this world.

So completely is the state a thing of this world that when a man is born, he is born into the world and into the state at the same time. So long as he remains a part of the world, he is a part of the state. And so long as he remains a part of the state he remains a part of the world. And all this by the very fact of his having been born at all.

But Christianity calls men to "be born again:" to be "born from above:" to be born of the Spirit. And when this is done he is born into another kingdom, into another government, into another world. And it is just as true that when a man is born again, he is born into another kingdom at the same time, as it is that when he is born the first time, he is born into the state at the same time.

When a man is born again, that birth is just as real as was the first one. When he is born again, that birth is as distinct from the first one as day is from night. And the realm, the government, the world, into which he is born when he is born again, is just as distinct from the realm, the government, and the world into which he was first born, as the new birth is distinct from the first birth. The two things are so essentially different in all their characteristics that they cannot possibly be blended.

The state is of nature wholly: Christianity is of grace wholly. The state is altogether natural: Christianity is altogether spiritual. The state is of the earth: Christianity is of heaven. Thus in nature and characteristics the two things are absolutely separate and distinct. They cannot be united nor blended in the same person, nor in the same things. No: "they are not of the world." "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever therefore will be the friend of the world is the enemy of God."

But the Lord has given us an unmistakable standard of comparison: "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." What was the attitude of Christ toward the states and the kingdoms of this world? It was one of total separation from all of them in every way. And this is not simply that he did not have anything to do with them, but that he would not have it. It is not that he passively ignored it, but that he actually refused to have anything to do with the state. He was offered the kingdom of Judea, and he refused it. He was offered all the kingdoms of the world, but he refused them all. His kingdom was not, and is not, of this world.

And he is the standard of all Christianity. He is the sole example of all Christians. And they are not of the world, even as he is not of the world. They are not of the things that are in the world, even as he is not of the things that are in the world.

"Christian Politics."

CHRISTIANITY is not of this world.

To his followers Jesus Christ said (and still says): "Ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world;" and in his memorable prayer (John 17) he said of them, "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Vs. 14, 16.

That which is of the world, the world loves, and that which the world engages in with all ardor may safely be set down as being congenial to worldly taste.

And in what does all the world engage more zealously than in politics?

The very acme of worldliness is represented in political organizations and methods.

The ballot is an instrument of worldly power. The agent of evil makes use of it as gladly and as freely as does anyone. Not so of the instruments of righteousness, —the weapons which are not carnal.

In the very nature of things, therefore, there can be no such thing as Christian politics.

"Christian politics"—that which we see developing in this country by that name—is politics in its worst and most dangerous form.

THE Supreme Court of Kansas has legally recognized and sustained the Catholic doctrine of purgatory. A will by which money was left for the purpose of paying for masses for the dead was contested.

The will was sustained. There can be no fair objection to this in itself. For surely people have the right to do with their own money any harmless thing that they may choose. And if money was willed to pay some one for whistling a certain number of times over the grave of the one making the will, the will should be sustained. So with money willed to pay for saying masses. One is as harmless as the other.

But the court did not stop here. Indeed it did not begin here. It began with the Catholic doctrine of purgatory, as quoted from a Catholic book of doctrine and from the Catholic Bible. And it sustained the will first of all because of the "wholesomeness" of this doctrine: and secondly because the Bill of Rights and the Constitution of Kansas "interferes with no mere religious practices except such as tend to subvert the foundation of public morals and order."

How courts do love to wander off into the realms of religion, and then sustain their action in so doing by quoting the clauses of the Bill of Rights and the Constitution which forbid their doing so!

Proof That This Is a Christian Nation.

"It is sometimes flippantly asserted that 'This is not a Christian nation;' you have no right to a Christian Sabbath protected by law, for the Constitution of the United States prohibits the establishment of religion." Thus begins an argument to prove that this is a Christian nation, which appears in Vol. 5, No. 1 of "Sunday Reform Leaflets," issued by the Sunday League of America, with headquarters at Columbus, Ohio.

The assumption that this is a Christian nation is the basis for many appeals for legislation, state and national, to enforce the observance of Sunday.

There are many facts which bear upon this question, and they are not so far beneath the surface of things that they cannot be readily pointed out for consideration. Let us examine a few of them for the evidence which they furnish upon this point.

Is this a Christian nation because the people spend some hundreds of millions of dollars every year for whiskey and similar liquors, and about five millions to carry the gospel to the heathen?

Are we a Christian nation because we prefer to give ten times as much for tobacco to smoke and chew as we are willing to give for foreign missions?

Is this a Christian nation because it maintains a great and growing navy for the purpose of inflicting death and destruction upon its enemies?

Is this a Christian nation because it always demands satisfaction for any real or fancied insult to its dignity?

Is this a Christian nation because it shuts up the transgressor in prison, instead of forgiving him the offense?

Are we a Christian nation because we are ruthlessly exterminating the beautiful birds—taking from them the life the Creator gave them—in order that our ladies may have feather-trimmed bonnets to wear to church?

Are we a Christian nation because our church-going people are split up into a hundred irreconcilable divisions and sects?

Are we a Christian nation because nine-tenths of the people are twice as eagerly engaged in the pursuit of money and pleasure as in the pursuit of piety?

Which one of these perfectly evident facts demonstrates that we are a Christian nation? Or do they all unite to prove the point?

Will the Sunday League of America—or anyone for that matter—please inform us how this is.

The Individual vs. the Masses.

MR. BROWN.—Good morning, neighbor Smith; what's this you are working on? What are you trying to do by heaping up this mountain of brick?

MR. SMITH.—Why, friend Brown, I'm going to have a very fine building; one of the finest that was ever made, when it's finished.

Mr. Brown.—Y-e-s; but it don't look like much of anything now; I should say it was in pretty bad shape for a building.

Mr. Smith.—Oh, yes, it does look so just now; but it's going to look a great deal better pretty soon.

Mr. Brown.—But you're not doing any brick laying, my friend; you're having the brick just dumped down onto the top of the mass in heaps.

Mr. Smith.—Oh, I'm not paying any attention to the individual brick; that method is out of date. The individual is nothing; it's the mass that counts.

Mr. Brown.—U-u-m, I see. Well, I don't think your building will be a success.

Mr. Smith.—You're a pessimist, Brown; I've no patience with a person who still clings to that old doctrine of individualism. Come around two or three weeks later, and you'll see that I know what I am doing. Good morning.

Mr. Brown.—Good morning.

MORAL.—The best government, like the best building, is that in which most careful attention is bestowed upon the individual constituents that enter into it.

A Kingdom Usurped.

As learned from a previous paper, the kingdom of God is composed of five constituents, or necessary parts, namely; territory, subjects, the King, his throne, and his laws. That kingdom complete must retain all these features. To take away from the compact any one of these is to destroy the unity of the kingdom. In every part of God's kingdom these must not only be retained in harmony with each other, but all these parts must render homage to the one sovereign King. Any portion of these elements, not so related to the general whole, is in rebellion against their rightful Ruler.

When man in Eden was induced to transfer his allegiance from the king of heaven to Satan's rule of sin, he not only withdrew himself, as a subject, from that compact, but the territory which had been entrusted to his dominion, as God's representative, was also transferred to the rule of sin, and man became Satan's representative in that portion of the universe, to govern it after the model of force. Thus it is seen that, as shown by the line drawn across the diagram, a portion of the original kingdom was affected by sin. The earth and its inhabitants, represented by that part of the diagram marked B, were by this cut off from the government of heaven, as shown by A, and became the territory and subjects of another government.

In this transfer it was impossible to make over to the usurper more than these two parts,—the territory with its subjects. The king, with his throne and laws, being higher than man, and therefore beyond his reach, were not in his power to carry over to the side of Satan. These being eternal in their nature, remain forever as they were before sin entered. This being true, the three eternal, unchangeable elements of the kingdom of God can never combine with the rule of earthly governments, because of the difference of their administrations. Love and force, as governmental policies, cannot possibly unite. God cannot join the divine elements of his government with those of earthly rule, because his righteousness and love are entirely incompatible with the laws of sin and force.

The Saviour therefore said truly, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Matt. 6:24. The reason is plain. Such a course would necessitate serving two masters who are directly opposite in every particular, which would be utterly impossible. So, then, while the influence of human selfishness, combined with Satan's system of government, controls the world, it cannot be true that God unites the will of heaven with these revolting portions of his kingdom to enforce obedience to his law. When one is forced to do a thing, his mind does not give consent, and without the consent of the mind, one cannot serve the law of God. Rom. 7:25. So long, therefore, as the mind remains unchanged from its carnal state, it is always, and at all times, enmity to God and his rule. Rom. 8:7. God cannot add his sanction to any attempt to force obedience to him; and still retain his gentleness, which alone makes men great in righteousness. Ps. 18:25.

Since the reign of sin, which makes force the predominant element in earth's governments, separated the earth and its dwellers from God's kingdom, it must be necessary for that rule to pass away before the earth can again become a part of the kingdom of righteousness. To this end the Saviour has instructed all to daily pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." Matt. 6:10. God's will is not done in heaven because its inhabitants are forced to it, nor are different degrees of consecration known in the service there rendered. All the service of that intact reign is therefore complete in single-mindedness, and no one there dissents in any degree from the mind of Jehovah.

The restoration of that perfect rule in the earth must therefore be the entire elimination of sin from every heart and from every nook of the territory usurped by Satan. In other words, the kingdoms of this world must become "the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ," that he may rule therein forever, just as he now reigns over that portion of the territory and subjects which were never subjected to the rule of sin. But this work must begin in the hearts of the subjects, and under the influence of God's Spirit, rather than by the force of law. It must be accomplished by those loyal to God's government entering the usurped territory and proclaiming "liberty to the captives" in the name of the king of heaven (Isa. 61:1, 2), and pointing them to a better reign, as exercised by the Lord himself, rather than by using the laws of the usurped territory to enforce an obedience prescribed by them as the will of heaven.

It almost seems as though men are blind who cannot see that Satan, having brought sin into the world, and so secured control of it, will never try to make its inhabitants become loyal to heaven, the very government of which he is an avowed enemy. It is indeed strange that so few suspect that the laws enacted in Satan's territory, apparently looking to setting up the reign of God there, are but a feint,—a politic move—to cover up Satan's opposition to God, by his appearing to be an "angel of light" (2 Cor. 11:14), and that he deludes men by this device actually to assist him in his work, under the pretense that they are thus advancing the interests of the kingdom of God.

The Pharisees of Christ's time were similarly deceived. They believed that their nation and country constituted the kingdom of God, even though fallen under the exacting rule of the Roman power. Knowing no form of government but that which was external and visible, they supposed that when their kingdom was again liberated from a foreign yoke, it would be done by being recon-quered by the Messiah, who would then rule over them and their territory in person. So, as a test by which to decide whether Christ was really the Messiah or not, they demanded of him to tell them when he would reinstate the kingdom of God among them. His answer was clear and decisive: "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation [margin, outward show]; neither shall they say, Lo, here! or, lo, there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you." Luke 17:20,21. In other words, the outward form of God's government on earth is lost. It will not return in that shape, but must, for the time, be established within you, and your bodily members become wholly subject to God's will from the heart, even though your territory be ruled over by a foreign power.

The earthly part of God's kingdom having been separated from the government of heaven, the way was then opened by which men might signify their loyalty to God, even though living in the territory of a hostile government. To show the nature of this arrangement, let us study the following diagram:—

The upper horizontal line will represent the kingdom over which man was given dominion at the beginning (Gen. 1:26), and which, upon the entrance of sin, became subject to the rule of Satan. Man being born upon this usurped territory, is by nature a slave of sin, but is invited by the gospel of Christ to renounce the service of Satan, and yield allegiance to the king of heaven. But inasmuch as the territory under which men are born is detached from the kingdom of heaven, and must remain a part of the realm of wickedness until sin is destroyed out of it, an arrangement has been made by which man may connect with that part of the kingdom of heaven that remains steadfast, including the King, his throne, and his law, these to be enshrined in the heart. This, of course, constitutes him a subject of that kingdom which reigns within. The lost territory, however, cannot be received thus, but must be waited for until it also is cleansed from sin, when it will be restored to its original domain, and so the kingdom of God be again united in its original perfect state.

This reign of God in the heart is known as the kingdom of grace (Heb. 4:16), and has run parallel with earthly kingdoms ever since the fall of man. It is indicated in the diagram by the lower horizontal line. Growing out of man's necessity for a purer and more satisfying government than that in which fate has placed him by birth, it stands in the place of the lost territory until that territory can be restored to the reign of heaven. Whoever, therefore, becomes an "adopted" citizen of this kingdom of grace is "called out," in heart, from the rule of earth, hence must count himself a "pilgrim and stranger" in a foreign land, an alien from the commonwealths of earth, to be looking for "a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Heb. 11:9,10.

As this temporary kingdom grew out of, and runs parallel with, the kingdom first given to man, but now usurped by Satan, so when that territory is again restored to its first condition, the two will be merged into one perfect state, and those who have been subjects of the kingdom of grace will then be subjects of that perfect and eternal reign of righteousness. This is clearly shown in the following words of the Saviour: "Then shall the king say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Matt. 25:34.

Then the kingdom which was prepared for man at the foundation of the world; which was given to him, and passed over to the control of Satan, will have been redeemed by Christ and restored to man, who will again "reign upon the earth," as at the beginning. But more upon this in another paper.

The Bible and the "Tradition of the Elders."

BY ISAAC MORRISON.

MR. BROWN (to the book merchant, Mr. James):—My new neighbor has been telling me that Sunday, the first day of the week, is not the Sabbath; and he read to me from the Bible, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, in it thou shalt not do any work;" and in the New Testament of Christ's most intimate followers after his crucifixion, where it says, "They rested the Sabbath day, according to the commandment." This was not the first day of the week, but the day just preceding it, which was the seventh day; for "when the Sabbath was past, . . . very early in the morning, the first day of the week, they came to the sepulchre at the rising of the sun." (Luke 23:56; 24:1; Mark 16:1,2). What do you think about it, Mr. James; is not that about the truth in the matter?

Mr. James.—Tut, tut, Mr. Brown, I hope you are not going off to join the Adventists! (Turning to his clerk, John, what do we believe on the Sabbath question?)

Clerk (reaching for a book on the shelf above the Bibles).—I will read it from one of our standard Methodist books, "Binney's Theological Compend Improved," by Rev. Amos Binney and Rev. Daniel Steele, D.D. From pages 169, 170, and 171, I read these paragraphs:—

"The Sabbath. By this is meant: 1. The day appointed of God at the close of creation, to be observed by man as a day of rest from all secular employment, because that in it God himself had rested from all his work. Gen. 2:1-3.

"3. The original law of the Sabbath was renewed and made a prominent part of the moral law, or ten commandments, given through Moses at Sinai. Ex. 20:8-11.

"4. This seventh-day Sabbath was strictly observed by Christ and his apostles previous to his crucifixion. Mark 6:2; Luke 4:16, 31; 13:10; Acts 1:12-14; 13:14, 42-44; 17:2; 18:4.

"5. Jesus, after his resurrection, changed the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week."

Mr. James.—See how clear and plain that makes the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, Mr. Brown!

Mr. Brown.—O, but we are Protestants, and the Protestant rule of faith is, "The Bible, and the Bible alone;" "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them" [Isa. 8:20; 2 Tim. 3:15-17]. Why didn't you take down the Bible to see what you believe, rather than your standard church books to see what your church elders and bishops would allow you to believe that the Bible taught on that subject?—What does the Bible say about the change of the Sabbath?

Clerk.—Here are two paragraphs (pp. 171, 181) right on that point, that will make the matter clear:—

"It is true there is no positive command for infant baptism, . . . nor is there any for keeping holy the first day of the week.

"Jesus, after his resurrection, changed the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week . . . When Jesus gave instructions for this change we are not told, but very likely during the time when he spake to his apostles of the things pertaining to his kingdom." Acts 1-3. This is probably one of the many unrecorded things which Jesus did. John 20:30; 21:25."

"In this we are only following what is freely admitted by the greatest bodies of Christian workers, and by all the greatest Protestant denominations: as you can see by the following paragraphs from the superintendent of the Sabbath-Observance Department of the National and World's W. C. T. U. and the president of the American Sabbath Union, which was organized and is coöperated in by fourteen of the leading denominations in the United States:—

"Ques.—If Jesus wished the day changed, why did he not command it?

"Ans.—A command to celebrate the resurrection could not wisely be made before the resurrection occurred. He probably gave his own disciples such direction afterwards, "when speaking of things pertaining to the kingdom."'"—Leaflet No. 3 of the Sabbath-Observance Department of the National W. C. T. U., by Mrs. J. C. Bateham, Superintendent of the Sabbath-Observance Department of the National and World's W. C. T. U.

"Our opponents declare, 'We are not satisfied with inferences and suppositions; show us where the first day is spoken of as holy, or as being observed instead of the seventh; we must have a direct positive command of God.' We admit there is no such command. But if we are to be limited by such a demand, all of us shall soon find ourselves in a very entangling predicament."—"Pearl of Days" Leaflet, No. 3, by Rev. Geo. S. Mott, D. D., President of the American Sabbath Union.

Mr. James.—See how clearly that settles the question! That "Theological Compend" is a handy book to have to help you out on such questions. Let me sell you a copy, Mr. Brown.

Mr. Brown.—But what your clerk read from those standard authorities reminds me of what my neighbor further said about the unfinished Protestant Reformation from the traditional errors of the Roman Catholic Church; which church, like the Jewish Church in the days of the Saviour (Matt. 15:1-9, 13), rests upon the "tradition of the elders" and the authority of the church instead of the Bible. Especially is this so on this Sabbath question. Let me read you a few sentences from standard Catholic works that my neighbor loaned me:—

"You are a Protestant, and you profess to go by the Bible, and the Bible only; and yet in so important a matter as the observance of one day in seven as a holy day, you go against the plain letter of the Bible, and put another day in the place of that day which the Bible has commanded. . . . We come to the time of the (so-called) Reformation, when it so happened that those who conducted the change of religion in this country left this particular portion of Catholic faith and practice untouched." "It was the Catholic Church which, by the authority of Jesus Christ, has transferred this rest to the Sunday in remembrance of the resurrection of our Lord. Thus the observance of Sunday by the Protestants is an homage they pay, in spite of themselves, to the authority of the church." "Reason and common sense demand the acceptance of one or the other of these alternatives: either Protestantism and the keeping holy of Saturday, or Catholicity and the keeping of Sunday. Compromise is impossible."

Then I guess we are in for finishing that great Reformation from the errors of what the Apostle John and all early Protestants have styled, "The mother of harlots and abominations of the earth." And do you know, Mr. James, that the Catholic Church makes this Sunday-keeping above everything else the sign of our submission to them instead of to what God says in the Bible? Listen to this:—

"Which church does the whole civilized world obey? Protestants . . . profess great reverence for the Bible, and yet by their solemn act of keeping Sunday they acknowledge our power and obey our church instead of the Bible. The Bible says, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,' but the Catholic Church says 'No, keep the first day of the week,' and all the world bows down in silent obedience to the mandates of the Catholic Church." Compare this with Rom. 6:16.

And they make this Sunday institution the seal or mark of their power and authority that renders valid their laws and enactments among Protestants. Says Cardinal Gibbons, who is at the head of the Catholic Church in the United States:—

"Of course the Catholic Church claims that the change was her act. . . . And the act is a mark of her ecclesiastical power and authority in religious matters."

You certainly would not wish me, when enlightened on the subject, to knowingly adopt the rule of faith of the Roman Catholic Church in the place of the Protestant rule—"The Bible, and the Bible alone;" nor to adopt the very seal or mark by which it proves and attests its power and authority; and all this just in order to still continue to keep Sunday. And of course you would not care to be found in that situation either. Let me lend you these Catholic books, Mr. James, to read in connection with Dan. 7:25 and Rev. 14:9-10.

Mr. James.—Here are some customers coming in. Excuse me, Mr. Brown.

Hammond, La.

Not Fancy but Fact.

It is not fancy but fact that Jesus Christ came into this world to set men free. Nearly seven hundred years before his coming, it was prophesied of him that he was "to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prisons to them that are bound" (Isa. 61:1); and early in his ministry he read these very words and said: "This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears." Luke 4:21.

The mission of Jesus was, first of all, to set men free from the dominion of sin; but there is a close and necessary connection between spiritual freedom and physical freedom. In fact, since we are to glorify God not only in spirit but in body, since both are his and all our powers belong to him, soul liberty demands that degree of physical liberty that leaves the body free to obey the behests of conscience. For instance, the three Hebrews in order to preserve consciences void of offense, when commanded to bow before the golden image in the plain of Dura, were compelled by the circumstances to assert the physical right to stand erect while others bowed themselves to the ground in idolatrous worship.

Since the worship of God requires not only the service of the mind but also of the body, it follows that the preaching of the gospel necessarily instills into the hearts of men genuine love of genuine liberty of both mind and body. The man who believes with all his heart the words of Christ: "One is your master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren," will not be found exercising lordship over his brethren; neither will he yield his conscience to the keeping of any man or of any combination of men; he will claim liberty of mind and body, of thought and action, as an inalienable right, a sacred gift from God, to be used to his glory.

But when Christ came to this sin-cursed earth, liberty of conscience was unknown. Rome ruled the world, not only physically, but mentally. The highest duty of every man was to be "the obedient servant of the state." It was a capital crime to worship any god not recognized by law. It was the midnight of the world. The light which God had given to patriarchs and prophets had been dimmed by bigotry and superstition, and by the traditions of men. The chosen people of God were physically the vassals of Rome, and spiritually the slaves of sin, and yet realized not their true condition. To Jesus Christ they boastingly said, "We be Abraham's seed and were never in bondage to any man." But he replied,

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin." And so hopelessly degrading was this spiritual bondage that it made them in a measure insensible to national vassalage and caused them to even glory in their shame, crying out, "We have no king but Cæsar."

Such was the condition of the world when Jesus Christ came "to proclaim liberty to the captives;" and it was into such a world that he sent forth his disciples to teach the equality of all men—not to assail with fire or sword the established order of society, not to enter the lists as military revolutionists or even as political reformers—but to overthrow despotism in its original seat, the human heart; to teach to all men the all-comprehensive truth of the fatherhood of God, that they might thereby know also the brotherhood of man; that loving God supremely, each man might love his brother also.

When Christ came into the world paganism was enshrined in the hearts of the people, was deeply rooted in their social customs, and was entrenched in the laws of the empire, and yet within the lifetime of the apostles the new religion, the religion that challenged the supremacy of the Cæsars, that taught that king and peasant were equally answerable to God for both thought and action, had reached the confines of the then known world; had crossed seas, scaled mountains, traversed deserts, and even invaded the palace of the emperor, making its conquests in his household. All this and much more had been accomplished without one civil statute favorable to the gospel; without even once drawing the sword, without the use of either bullet or ballot, without political influence—in short, without any carnal weapon or human device, but solely by the power of God in and through his word. Well might the apostle, through whose ministry much of this had been wrought, say: "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds; casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ."

In less than three centuries, Christianity, single-handed, won the bloodless battle for liberty of conscience, bloodless only so far as the new religion was concerned; for its disciples were destined to "fall by the sword, and by flame, and by captivity, and by spoil, many days."

But "the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church," and the more the religion of Jesus was persecuted the more its adherents multiplied, until religious liberty became the law of Rome. But the victory was short-lived. What fire and sword could not do in three centuries was done in much less time by human ambition. The church, no longer persecuted, presently became a persecutor; and once more life-blood was the price of soul liberty. But genuine Christianity was not dead; God had not left himself without witnesses for the truth; Wycliffe, Huss, Jerome and Luther called the church back to the true principles of liberty of conscience. Taught by Luther, or rather by the word of God ministered by him, the German princes signed the famous protest which said to the Emperor Charles V:—

"If you do not yield to our request, we protest by these presents, before God, our only Creator, preserver, Redeemer, and Saviour, and who will one day be our Judge, as well as before all men and all creatures, that we, for us and for our people, neither consent nor adhere in any manner whatsoever to the proposed decree, in any thing that is contrary to God, to his Holy Word, to our right conscience, to the salvation of our souls, and to the last decree of Spires."

In the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, these principles have found their most perfect practical expression; and in this country the church has enjoyed the most perfect liberty and the greatest prosperity of all modern times. And here, as in Rome, prosperity has sapped spirituality. Humility has given place to pride, arrogance has taken the place of meekness, and the pro-tes-tant of yesterday has become the persecutor of to-day. Denominations which only a century ago demanded religious liberty for themselves are to-day besieging Congress for legislation utterly subversive of soul liberty. The popular churches boast that they hold Congress in their hands, and they seem disposed to use their power for their own aggrandizement. Would to God that they might even yet learn anew the lesson that Christ's work is to give liberty to the captives; not to imprison men in dungeons of granite and iron, but to set them free from the fetters of sin and selfishness.

The Law of God and the Law of the Nation.

BY GEO. M. BROWN.

ALL Christians agree that the law of God is the rule by which the lives of men should be governed, and that one of the precepts of the Christian religion is obedience to the civil power in the realm of civil affairs as it speaks through national law; but it will doubtless be a surprise to some to learn that national law is God's law, and "that society with its rights and its institutions is of divine mold."

These astonishing ideas are however held by many and were advanced by one of the foremost men in the Roman Catholic Church in America.

At the annual banquet of the Cleveland, O. Chamber of Commerce, May 14, 1897, Archbishop Ireland, in his response to the toast, "The Sure Foundation of a True Citizenship," is reported to have said, "Whence will come to Democracy the potency of immortality? With reverence I pronounce the sacred word—conscience. Conscience ruling, Americans will be a law-abiding people; for righteousness commands obedience to law and proclaims that the law of the nation is the law of the supreme governor of men and of nations—Almighty God. Americans will respect the rights of their fellow citizens; conscience bids them know that no one lives for himself alone, and that society with its rights and its institutions is of divine mold."

It will be noticed that according to the archbishop's idea the law of the nation is the law of God; and righteousness—right-doing—commands obedience to this law. Thus the person who refuses to yield obedience to the law becomes not only a criminal, but a sinner who does not follow the dictates of conscience; and thereby becomes a menace to the immortality of our democracy.

All can see that the idea advanced is one long held by Rome,—that the church and state should be united, and that the former should dominate the latter. The surprising thing is that our nation, a professedly Protestant power, should have reached a place where one high in the councils of the Roman Church dares publicly to declare that its laws are the laws of God and that all are in conscience bound to obey them.

When such bold declarations are publicly made, surely it must be that Rome is confident of her position and believes that she can dictate in the enactment and enforcement of our national laws.

In the face of these things liberty-loving men of every creed and political faith should rally to the defense of the liberties purchased by the untiring efforts of the founders of this government.

If society with its institutions, which are manifestly of the world, is of divine mold, then the Apostle John was sadly in the dark when he said that the things of the world "are not of the Father." 1 John 1:15-17.

Many years ago the National Reform party expressed their willingness to unite with the Roman Church on any basis that the latter would propose. It is evident that there is nothing to prevent this union now.

Reader, pause and consider. Which side will you take in this matter? Do you agree that national law is God's law and that society with its institutions is of divine mold? or do you stand for the infinite superiority of God's law over all other law and pledge obedience to it without regard to the laws of civil governments which are many times framed to favor the rich and oppress the poor?

Fond du Lac, Wis.

EPISCOPAL BISHOP NICHOLSON, of Milwaukee, Wis., has come out with a protest in the name of the church against the practice of referring to the naming of warships as "christenings." Christening, he holds, means coming to Christ; its use in connection with ships is blasphemy, and he would not be surprised to hear that the battleship "Kentucky" had gone down by reason of the profanation. The bishop says nothing about the country at large, though the majority of ecclesiastics are accustomed to take the name of Christ in vain by calling the United States a Christian nation. Why should not a man-of-war be christened as well as the ship of state?—Truth Seeker.

A CABLE dispatch from London to the New York Sun under date of February 5, gives the following: "The French authorities have decided to abandon the inscription on coins, which, since the days of the Consulate, has been Dieu protège La France [France, the favored of God]. Sacrilegious English journals suggest that the Czar will do as well." Of course, France is not the only nation that is the protège of God; that could not seriously be claimed. Each of the "Christian nations" is—in its own view and upon its own authority—the favored one of Heaven. And in fairness, the claim must be allowed to all alike.

BUT it sometimes happens that two of these governments come to a point in their relations with each other where they decide to settle their differences by an appeal to arms; in which event the idea that it is the favored one of Heaven is quite certain, in the case of one of them at least, to receive a severe shock. And as this very thing has happened in the recent history of France, it is not surprising that the French government should have discerned the propriety of removing the inscription from the national currency.

SOME one has asked, with considerable point, why it is that the U. S. Government has inscribed on a part of its currency the sentence, "In God We Trust." The circumstances of the origin of the inscription we do not know, but the words must be taken as showing some connection between the Government and religion; and as such, they are worthy of note.

THEY are worthy of note as illustrating the worthless character of a profession of religion by the Government. For they do amount to a profession of religion. To trust in God is to be religious in the fullest sense of the word; and the inscription is a governmental declaration of trust in God. It might be asked, In what god? and this not being specified, room is left for the suggestion which some persons have made that, if we may judge from the practice of the great majority of the people, the real meaning is—or should be—"In [this] god we trust." The people do trust in something; and if the majority do not trust in money more than in anything else, the observations of many good minds are certainly at fault. However we may look at it, we can find nothing to demonstrate the propriety of this bit of governmental procedure.

IT is to be observed, also, that the government has now repudiated the very money upon which this inscription is placed. It is a fitting coincidence that this repudiated metal should have been chosen to bear a religious inscription which is equally worthless, as regards any purpose which civil government is designed to serve.

NOTWITHSTANDING a very unfavorable report sent back by an agent of the Government commissioned to investigate the situation in the Klondike country as regards the prospects for success in fortune seeking, it is apparent that thousands from all parts of the country will soon be joined in a great rush to the reputed land of gold. There is something in this which illustrates a strange quality of human nature. Why is it that people are willing to work so hard and face such difficulties and dangers to get gold in this particular way? It has been said by those who spoke from experience, that the hardest way in the world to get gold is to dig it; and it is no doubt true that if the average person would expend the same amount of hard thought and active effort and perseverance in seeking wealth through some of the ordinary channels of business enterprise, that is expended in fortune seeking in the soil of a desolate and inhospitable country, his success would be much more certain.

WITHOUT life, gold is of no possible value; yet men will risk life in the most reckless fashion to get possession of this metal. There is something about the love of money which tends to warp the judgment as well as the conscience, and that to a most dangerous degree. Carried to the extreme, it presents to us the sad and incomprehensible picture of the miser who, for fear of experiencing want and hunger through deprivation of money, voluntarily put himself in that very condition and keeps himself there till death results. Certainly it is not hard to see, in the light of many circumstances, the wisdom of the Scripture which mentions the love of money as a thing of which we are to beware.

WE have been asked if we would object to the "flag salute" provided the word "God" were left out of it. This is a question that is too indefinite to be answered definitely. As has been said, however, we do not object to a flag salute, in itself; but we do object to the salute in its present form, and it might be objectionable without containing the word "God." A salute which embodies nothing more than a recognition of the principles of liberty and justice upon which this Government was established, and for which the flag is supposed to stand, might be proper enough; and certainly the flag can claim no higher honor than to be recognized as the emblem of that which is noblest in human government.

It is for this reason, and this alone, that the flag can be worthy of honor. This is a great nation, it is true; but mere greatness is not a thing to be honored. Rome was a great nation—so great that she ruled the world—but we would hardly think of paying homage to the Roman eagles. It is goodness, not greatness, that makes anything worthy of recognition; and the flag would be just as worthy of honor were this the weakest and most insignificant nation on earth, but founded on the principles of the Constitution and Declaration of Independence, instead of being, as it is to day, one of the greatest and most influential. But in saluting the flag what thought is uppermost in the minds of the children,—that of the principles of civil liberty for which our forefathers contended? or of how big and powerful we have grown to be among the nations of the earth?

* * *

THERE is nothing more essential to the welfare of the country than that these principles of civil liberty should be recognized and put in practice by all the people, both young and old. But that the flag salute contributes anything to this end we have no evidence for believing. On the contrary there is evidence that it tends to revive that sectional animosity which can have no place in free government. Moreover, as an indication of real patriotism, the salute is of no value; it stands only on a par with formalism in religion. Principles—the principles of right and manly conduct—are the things of value. Beside these, all sentimental forms and ceremonies sink into insignificance.

Sunday in Hawaii.

IN Washington, D. C., there is considerable agitation over the matter of opening the Congressional Library on Sundays. One who is well informed upon the situation as regards Sunday opening of libraries, museums, and places of amusement on Sundays in other lands, says that "We would learn something from that little republic out in mid-ocean—for the public library in Honolulu is open not simply every week-day, but all day Sunday, having the same hours, from nine o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock in the evening. And yet, Honolulu might well be called a City of Churches and church going people. From personal knowledge during my recent three-months' visit to Hawaii, I can say, no New England village in our own land shows a more strict observance of Sunday than Honolulu."

Why, asks this writer, should we have the saloons accessible on Sundays and the libraries closed, as is the general rule in this country? The writer goes on to state that "This is the more remarkable because of the mixed population—Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese—who may not care for the Christian Sabbath, but respect the law, in the strict observance of the Sunday as a day of absolute rest from all work or business.

It seems from this that the best Sunday observance by law is secured where the population are mostly straight-out heathen, making no pretense of regard for Sunday as a sacred day. But is this what is desired by the clergymen and others who are calling for Sunday laws?

Sunday-Closing Movement in Lexington, Ky.

THE Lexington (Ky.) Morning Herald, of January 24, reports a meeting held in that city the previous day to inaugurate a movement for Sunday closing of all kinds of business. It was held under the auspices of the Christian Endeavor and Epworth League societies of the city, joined by the W. C. T. U. and Y. M. C. A.

The meeting was held in the Central Christian Church, and was "largely attended."

The object of the meeting was stated as being "to devise some means of preventing the opening of business houses and saloons on Sunday," which was alleged to be in violation of existing city and State enactments.

It was decided that Sunday newspapers should be prohibited, as well as other business enterprises; also that an investigation be made with reference to Sunday mail delivery in the city, with the view of securing its abolition.

After this the meeting adjourned until February 6.

Whether or not it was claimed that this movement for Sunday closing was of a merely civil character, is not stated. If the claim was made, as is usual on such occasions, it was sufficiently refuted by the circumstances of its inauguration.

A number of purely religious organizations came together in a church building and inaugurated a movement for the compulsory closing of all business on a religious day. Is there anything in this savoring of a union of church and state?

For whose benefit is the government of the State of Kentucky run? For the religious societies, or for the whole people?

And who is to be benefitted by a forced observance of a religious day?

These are live questions, which it belongs to legislators and the whole people to consider.

A MOVEMENT is now in progress in New York City "to lessen the amount of Sunday labor, due to the increasing tendency to open shops on that day." "Many proprietors say that they would be glad to close, but are forced to keep open by their customers, many of them church people."

That is, the fear of losing a little trade forces them to work on the day they profess to believe in as the Christian Sabbath. Something to put a little backbone into such people, is the thing that is needed.

Intolerance a Venial Sin.

THE question of Roman Catholic interference in behalf of civil liberty for Protestants in Peru, who are denied the rights accorded to Catholics, is one that Protestants in this country have long been pressing upon the attention of representative Catholics here, and which seems to be causing the latter some trouble. The Catholic Citizen has finally admitted that intolerance on the part of Catholics in Peru, while not a mortal sin, is one which will send them at least as far down as Purgatory. The matter is set forth in the following from The Independent (N. Y.) of February 3:—

"We asked the help and the influence of our Catholic press to relieve the wrongs of native Protestants and American citizens in Peru, who are not allowed religious freedom in the matter of civil marriages. Our excellent contemporary, The Catholic Citizen, is the first to give answer, as follows:—

"That Peruvian Protestants and American citizens residing in Peru be permitted to marry there as here (divorcees excepted), and that their marriages be considered legal marriages. If the laws of Peru do not permit this, then those laws are unjust. Catholics concerned through any mistaken notion of zeal in obstructing remedial legislation will burn for it in Purgatory."

"No answer could be more satisfactory, although we hesitate to indorse the penalty."

Threatening the Government.

"Present Truth," London, Eng.

In a plea for a united and vigorous effort for Sunday closing, in view of the fact that Parliament soon meets, a writer says in one of the religious journals: "Against the united voices of the Christian churches of our land, no government dare turn a deaf ear." We have been searching the Bible with the special object of finding where Christ or Christians ever made even a covert threat against the government if it did not meet their mind, and we find no such thing. We do find these words of Christ: "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not." John 12:47. We are therefore forced to conclude that the Christianity which that writer has in mind is a sort that has come up since the days of Christ and the apostles. Beware of it.

THE writer who conducts the department of "good citizenship" in the Voice (N. Y.) says that "Perhaps the clearest thing in the minds of our forefathers in America was the importance of keeping forever separate the church and the state. And perhaps the muddiest reasoning ever done by the human brain was that by which we arrived at the imbecile and impossible corollary that pious standards were to be excluded from political duties."

If this does not mean that politics are to be conducted so as to suit the church, it is one of the "muddiest" paragraphs that have come under our observation. "Pious standards" in politics means church politics or it means nothing.

Peacemaker or Revolutionist?

UNDER the heading, "The Arch Revolutionist," an English journal makes this comment on the latest attitude of the pope towards the Italian government:—

"The pope's Christmas allocution, as it is called, was all about his desire for 'peace,' and there was promise that his views would be further explained. And now the chief Vatican organ comes out boldly inviting a political revolution in Italy. The pope desires a 'real sovereignty' among the princes of this world, and cannot tolerate that a king should sit in Rome as head of the State. He suggests overthrowing the monarchy and setting up a republic, and in the confusion he would doubtless expect to make sure of dominating the republican federation. It shows the pope as the arch-revolutionist, stirring up strife, resisting the 'powers that be,' and generally making plain the anti-Christian character of the papacy."

"The sixteenth year of the Christian Endeavor Society which closes this week has been the best year of all. Abroad, it has seen the inauguration of a United Society for India, Burma and Ceylon, the establishment of an Endeavor paper for India and of a number of Unions in South and North India. In South Africa the movement has received a great impetus. Great Britain has passed the 5,000 line; and from all the English colonies come reports of progress. The year shows an increase of 5,000 in the number of societies and of 250,000 in the membership."

"We sympathize with the converted Jew who has been told that he must eat pork as a testimony that he is a real Christian, and who publishes his protest in the leading poem of a Jewish-Christian magazine. It begins:

'Oh, must we eat the flesh of swine,
Because, Lord Jesus, we are thine?'

It is not at all necessary."

There would be a good many more Jews converted to Christianity if they were not given to understand they must as Christians do some things that Christ not only never commanded, but that are positively against his precepts.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Studies in French History.—8.

"How many can repeat the names of the kings of France given as far as the last study?" questioned Professor Carman.

Every hand came up except Milly Brown's and Jennie Jacobs', who excused themselves by saying that they were sorry they had neglected to write them in their notebooks, but would surely do so and have them all learned before another lesson. After repeating them once more in concert, Charlie White said, eagerly:—

A FEUDAL CASTLE.

"Professor, we were learning about Hugh Capet. Will we hear a little more about him to-day?"

"Yes, Charlie; though I have more to tell you about his son Robert than about him. Hugh began to reign 987, and had a reign of nine years, that is, he was king in name, but he really was absolute ruler over only a little part of France directly around Paris. The nobles had all the rest,—a good example of the workings of the Feudal system.

"Once when one of his nobles displeased King Hugh, the king asked him, 'Who made you a count?' but the other had only to ask his liege lord, who made him 'a king' to effectually silence him. Hugh gained the respect of the nobles and of the clergy by his kindness and wisdom. Some of his relations are still living. May be they have hopes yet of ascending the throne of their illustrious ancestor."

"Myl wouldn't they feel grand?" said romantic Milly Brown.

"Perhaps some of them may. All the world is making history very rapidly of late years."

"Robert the Pious, as he was called—the son of Hugh—well earned his title; for he was a kind and conscientious man, and altho' his reign of thirty-five years was marred by a period of religious persecution, still we are sure that poor Robert would not have allowed this if he had been better enlightened."

"I should have thought if Robert's wife had been a tender-hearted as he that they would both together have found out that religious persecution was a cruel thing."

"His first wife perhaps might have been a help to him; for they were tenderly attached to each other. But they were forced to a separation by the pope, and were both of them very miserable on account of it."

"What business had the pope to interfere with the king's private life, I'd like to know?" said Joe Palmeter.

"He made it his business, Joseph, and a miserable business it was. Poor Robert at last married a frivolous vain woman named Constance. She wearied him with her continual scoldings, for she disliked to have him so charitable and liberal toward the needy. But poor Robert would indulge his desire to give to the poor, and even if he had no money about him, he would give away the very clothing he wore."

"Was it King Robert who once gave the silver ornaments which he wore on his lance to a poor beggar, and then told him to be sly and not let the queen know it?" asked Edna Phillips.

"Yes, it was King Robert, and when the stingy queen missed the ornaments, the king actually lacked the moral courage to tell her the truth, and denied knowing any thing about it. At another time when he was eating there was a hungry fellow under the table, and while the generous king was feeding him, as was his custom to do to the very poor, the ungrateful fellow cut a valuable gold ornament from off the king's clothes, and ran away the king only remarking that it would do the poor fellow more good than it would him. Once, while the kind-hearted king was at his prayers in church, a thief cut off about half of the gold fringe which bordered the king's mantle before he said a word to him,—though he knew what the scamp was about perfectly well,—and then he only asked him to leave the other half for some one else."

"I wonder if the people appreciated so good a king," said Julia March.

"I fear not, for his was a stormy reign. Robert had also quite a talent for music and writing poetry, and when Queen Constance asked him to write her a song, he sang a Latin hymn, the first line of which, translated means, "O constancy of the martyrs," and the ignorant queen was satisfied, hearing, as she supposed, her own name; but really the king was only laughing at her.

"This was about 1000 years after Christ. Now there were some of the people who, because of a passage of scripture in the book of Revelation, jumped to the con-lusion that Christ was coming in the year 1000. The historian says that it is not strange that the people should have been frightened at the thought of the coming again of the Christ, for there was then existing such a state of frightful wickedness as had never been known on earth. The Catholic Church, which pretended to teach men good, set such an example of evil that instead of light, she was a body of the grossest darkness. Of course the Christ did not come, and then—"

"What did they do then?" asked Joe Palmeter, excitedly.

"Do?—The brief morality which they had practiced from a sense of fear was succeeded by a relapse from virtue, though really they were less wicked for quite a time, and the religious leaders did become somewhat purer in life and practice."

"Well, then, the excitement did do a little good," said Milly Brown.

"Yes, but it was the beginning of a dreadful season of religious persecution, in which, I am sorry to say, King Robert joined. The miserable Jews were driven from place to place, tortured, and put to death most cruelly."

"Did they do this out of a religious zeal?" queried Joe Palmeter. Joe could not reconcile the idea of loving God so well that people would be led to commit murder because of it, with his idea of right.

"Yes," said the professor, sadly, "yes; they forgot that Christ said, 'If ye love me, keep my commandments,' and that the sixth forbids murder."

"Well, mother says that the history of France will be repeated in our own country," said Charlie White, "but I hope that part of it—the religious persecution part of it—won't be."

"But I tell you I am afraid it will," said Joe Palmeter.

"There are already indications—strong ones—that Joseph is right," said Professor Carman, sadly. "But you are now dismissed until another week; and I hope you will try and remember what you have learned to-day, for there have been some things in this lesson of considerable importance."

Invaluable to Bible and History Students

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 10, 1898.

BOUND VOLUMES of the AMERICAN SENTINEL for 1897 are now ready, and will be sent to any address on application. Price, manilla covers, $1.50; half roan, $2.50.

THE clergymen of Toledo, Ohio, have won a fight for closed theaters in that city on Sunday. Theatrical managers say however that they will continue the battle.

WE are informed that the attitude of the Boulder (Col.) School Board in reference to the flag salute is uncompromising, and that seven children have thus far been suspended or expelled as the result.

THE actors of this city are "up in arms" against the bill now pending at Albany which will allow of their being compelled to "work" on Sunday. It would almost seem as though these people should be allowed one day in the week in which to conduct themselves naturally.

ON a recent Sunday a newly-appointed policeman made thirty-one arrests in this city, most of which were for violations of the Sunday law. And he did all this "single-handed." The astonished magistrate before whom the prisoners were brought the next morning let all but seven of them go.

IT is reported upon good authority that the pope instructed the Catholics in the Reichstag to support Emperor William's bill for an increase in the navy, which was recently passed. This is pointed to as a somewhat singular proceeding for a "vicar" of the Prince of Peace.

OUR contributors will pardon us for reminding them that there is danger in writing for a journal like the SENTINEL, of illustrating the phrase "too much of a good thing." Short measure is appreciated by the average editor these days—and by the average reader as well.

THE new Russian minister to Corea is said to be as zealous in promoting the spread of the Greek Catholic religion in the province as in furthering Russian political supremacy. This is only to be expected from an official of an empire where church and state are united.

IT was recently proposed in Congress to amend the Constitution so as to provide that the national legislature "shall have power to establish uniform hours of labor throughout the United States." The proposition was without substantial result, but is quite suggestive of one way in which a national Sunday-rest law may become an established fact in this country.

AS a basis for their claim that the Federal Constitution ought to recognize God, National Reformers point to the fact that forty out of the forty-five state constitutions contain such an acknowledgement, and that the same has been put into the constitutions of all the newest states. Logically, therefore, the people of the nation stand committed to this most dangerous governmental error.

THE process of Christianizing China, according to the method always employed by "Christian nations," is fairly begun, and may be expected to go forward now without any material interruption, if the supply of powder and balls holds out, as it no doubt will. The Catholic Times (London) remarks that China will readily be Christianized, since the Chinese "usually bend with considerable docility to the wishes of the government." This will make them good Christians according to the Roman Catholic—or church and state—standard of Christianity.

THE W. C. T. U. of Newport News, Va., has prepared a petition to be forwarded to Secretary of the Navy Long, asking that water be used instead of wine in "christening" the new battleships "Kentucky" and "Kearsarge," which are to be launched in March next. Have these ladies reflected that these ships are to be used for fighting, and have they considered how much more appropriate, as suggestive of fighting, intoxicating liquor is than mere water? We do not see how even the W. C. T. U. can consistently claim that intoxicants and fighting do not properly belong together.

THE beauties of church and state union as seen in the highly-civilized country of Germany, are illustrated in the following, which is reported from Berlin, under date of February 5:—

"The Burgomaster of Schkenditz recently issued an edict requiring the townspeople to wear their best clothes on Sunday. On the following Sunday, walking abroad to observe the result of his order, he found a stableman in wooden clouts, torn stockings, soiled trousers, and a flaring red neckerchief. A policeman was immediately summoned to arrest him, and he was tried for lèse majesté or its municipal equivalent. Although he proved that he had been grooming and feeding his master's horse and was on his way home, he was fined a mark and a half and costs."

IN these days the church is becoming a dangerous competitor to the world in some branches of worldliness. For instance, the rector of St. John's Episcopal Church, in Jersey City, has started a class in dancing, the church gymnasium being convenient for the purpose, at prices which completely outbid those of the regular teachers of the art; and as a result the latter's patronage has fallen off, while the church dancing class is booming. Of course, one naturally likes to feel that he or she is doing all right in such things, as must be the case when it is conducted by the church; and this gives the church a decided advantage over the world in the matter of questionable amusements. There is nothing which human nature appreciates more than the opportunity to do a wrong thing in an eminently respectable manner.

CHRISTIANITY is intolerant only of sin. It makes no account of crime, as such.

HE who renders to God the things that are God's, will not fail to give to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's.

WHEN Cæsar dictates what shall be rendered to God, the latter gets only that which Cæsar does not want for himself.

THE kind of legislation which debars the "Louisiana lottery" and sanctions church lotteries, will not benefit the country in the long run.

THERE is no reform worth having that cannot be realized through that individual change of heart which is Scripturally described as being "born again."

THE papacy did not make the union of church and state; the union of church and state made the papacy. Such a union will make a papacy anywhere.

ONE of the greatest delusions of this day is that of moral reform through politics. Such reforms always manage to keep a little way ahead of the present realities.

IF only that missing Scripture text could be found which says that Sunday is the Sabbath, how much less state and national legislation would be needed to afford a basis for Sunday observance!

"It is not the office of Christianity to remove men from temptation, nor temptation from men." And no legislation to secure either of these ends can be asked for in the name of Christianity.

NOTHING more utterly useless could be imagined than the forming of political organizations in the church with the object of trying to get the Lord to change his mind and accept the kingdoms of this world in its present state.

THE goal of military service is to destroy life; that of Christian service is to save life. And yet many people cannot see that militarism has no proper place in the Christian church, or in the Christian's heart.

A Chimerical Project.

JESUS CHRIST refused to accept the kingdoms of this world.

Once the people came to take him and make him a king by force; but he departed and hid himself from them. John 6:15.

Upon another occasion the devil offered him all the kingdoms of the world if he would fall down and worship him.

Jesus did not deny that the devil had the control of these kingdoms as he claimed. In fact, at another time he acknowledged the truthfulness of the claim, by referring to Satan as "the prince of this world." John 14:30. But he refused the devil's offer.

It is evident that if Christ had accepted this offer, he would have taken the kingdoms of the world under Satan. The devil would not have been destroyed, nor his works. But it was to destroy the devil and his works that Jesus Christ came to earth as the Saviour of men. 1 John 3:8.

The works of the devil must be destroyed before Christ can accept the kingdoms of this earth. But so long as the devil lives, and wicked men exist upon the earth, the devil's works will continue. For he is the spirit that "worketh in the children of disobedience."

And there are only two possible ways in which the world can be freed of sinners. They can be destroyed, and they can be converted. If they refuse to be converted, then there remains but the one way of destruction.

And there is but one possible way in which sinners can be converted, and that is through faith, as revealed in the gospel.

It is therefore perfectly plain that no more chimerical project can be conceived than that of legislating the kingdoms of this earth, or any one of them, into the hands of Christ. He cannot accept them while the earth remains in its present state.

And it rests entirely with the Lord to remove sinners out of the earth, so that the works of the devil will be destroyed. His power alone can convert sinners, and to destroy sinners is his prerogative alone.

Now, in his love and forbearance, he is appealing to men by his Spirit to become converted and thus fitted for his eternal kingdom. But his Spirit will not always strive with man; and when its work is done,—when man's probation shall have ended and the time of the appointed Judgment shall have come, then God will arise clad in the "garments of vengeance," to do "his strange act," of purging the earth of wickedness by the bolts of his wrath.

Then will be fulfilled the Apocalyptic prophecy (Rev. 11:15-18): "And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever. . . . And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou . . . shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth." Also that prophecy of the Psalms, in which God says to his Son, "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Ps. 2:8, 9.

Yet notwithstanding the utterly chimerical nature of the project to legislate the kingdoms of earth into Christ's hands, as made plain by the facts here considered, there are millions of people enrolled in religious societies in this land who are to-day calling upon Congress and the state legislatures for laws which will "regenerate society," make this a "Christian nation," and "enthroned Christ on Capitol Hill."

Never by the remotest possibility can the movement succeed. It can never do any good; but it can—and will—do incalculable harm.

To Legislators.

WE would call the attention of legislators everywhere to the fact that there are many people in this country who would like to be good, if the legislators would only give them a chance.

They would like to be good, but the laws of the country are not so framed as to make it an easy thing to be good. Hence they go on in sin.

They are waiting for legislation to be enacted which will make it easy to be good, and difficult to be bad.

For example, there are many people who would like to close their shops on Sunday; but if they should do so, without a Sunday law, some other persons would keep their shops open; and how can one person keep his shop closed on Sunday when another person—a rival in business, perhaps—is keeping his shop open and taking in money?

How can it be expected that an individual can afford to sacrifice money—actual cash—for mere religious principle?

Some legislation must be had so that a person can be true to the dictates of conscience without making any sacrifice of a cash value.

As things are now there is a broad way which leads down to ruin, and multitudes are traveling in it; while only a narrow way leads to life, and this is traveled by the few. There must be legislation which will hedge up this broad way, so that it will be narrow and difficult, and at the same time enlarge and smooth down the narrow road to life, so that it will be the easy road, instead of the other.

What do you think, legislators, of the task marked out for you?

Do you think that it is really difficult to be good in this world without the help of state legislation, or that such legislation can make people any better than they are?

The Bible says that it is impossible for any person to be good, under any circumstances, without a change of mind from the carnal to the spiritual.

It says too that it is just as easy for a person to be good after his heart has been renewed by divine grace, under any circumstances, as it was for him to be bad before that work of grace had been done. The testimony is that "where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." Rom. 5:20. Where sin abounded in the heart, before conversion, making the individual do that which is contrary to righteousness, now, after conversion, grace does "much more abound." Certainly then it can be no less easy under the latter state to do right, than before it was to do wrong.

This is the testimony of Scripture; the Scriptural plan of doing right makes no account whatever of any aid from the arm of flesh.

It is always easy for God to do right; he cannot indeed do otherwise. And "Christ in you"—Christ, who is God, in every one who believes—is the purpose of the gospel, and is the Scriptural and only way of changing from a life of sin to that of righteousness.

Bible Study with the "Christian Citizen."

God brought his people out of Egypt. Forty years they wandered in the wilderness before they could enter the promised land. During this time, that people were "the church in the wilderness." Acts 7:38. They were out of Egypt, but not yet in their own land; therefore they had no country where they were. They were only strangers and pilgrims there. Their only country was the one to which they were going.

Now of Christ, and in him of all Christians, it is written, "Out of Egypt have I called my son." Matt. 2:15. Christ was out of Egypt, but he was not in his own land; therefore he had no country, no kingdom where he was: "My kingdom is not of this world." He was a stranger and a pilgrim, between Egypt and the promised land.

Christians are the sons of God. John 1:12; 1 John 3:2. They are called out of Egypt; for "Out of Egypt have I called my son." Christians are out of Egypt, but not yet in the promised land, not yet in their own land; therefore Christians have no country, no kingdom, where they are. Christians are "strangers and pilgrims on the earth."

You may say, "Israel should not have remained in the wilderness all that time." That is true. But they must necessarily be in the wilderness some portion of time; because the wilderness lay between them and the promised land, and they must needs pass through it to get to their own land. And being out of Egypt, and not yet in their own land, it is essentially true that in this interval they had no country and no kingdom where they were; but were strangers in that land, and pilgrims passing through to their own land.

It is true, however, that Israel of old, the ancient "church in the wilderness," should not have remained in the wilderness forty years. They should not have wandered in the wilderness at all: they should have gone straight onward from Egypt, from the Red Sea, to the promised land. All this delay and wandering was solely because they "in their hearts turned back again into Egypt." Acts 7:39. Bodily, outwardly, professedly, formally, they were out of Egypt. But in heart they were yet in Egypt. And being in heart yet in Egypt, they were ever longing to be there in the body also; the flesh-pots of Egypt were the great object of their desire; and they were ever ready to cry, "Let us make us a captain and go back to Egypt." It was their longing and their failure to be separated in heart as well as bodily from that country, that kept them forty years wandering in the wilderness.

Likewise it has been this same thing that has kept the professed Christian church wandering up and down and round and round in the wilderness of this world so long since the time when first "out of Egypt" God called these his sons. From the days of the apostles till this hour the great difficulty and lack in the lives of Christians has been that, though professing to be Christians, and in this professing to have come out of Egypt, they have yet in heart been ever inclined toward Egypt. The flesh-pots of Egypt, the things of the country from which they profess to have "come out," have ever had for them a stronger attraction than has the country to which they profess to be going.

These Christians in the United States profess to be "strangers and pilgrims on the earth," merely passing through this country to that "better country." Yet in practice they take just as much interest in trying to "run things" in this country as though this country was their own, and the only one they ever expect to see. Their profession and their practice do not in any sense agree. If a few of these same "Christian citizens" of the United States were to make a tour of Europe, where they would be strangers and pilgrims, they would not count themselves citizens of the countries through which they passed. And however important and agitating were the affairs of those countries to those who were citizens there, yet these tourists—these strangers and pilgrims—would not consider these affairs to be of sufficient concern to them to require more than a mere passing notice. And if these folks were really inconvenienced by some occurrences in the countries through which they were passing, they would bear it gracefully under the comfort that as they did not belong there, it could not last long for they would soon be out of it.

That is the way these "Christian citizens" would act and consider matters if they were to become for a little time "pilgrims and strangers in Europe." Now they profess and proclaim, and sing, that they are "strangers and pilgrims on the earth." Why then do they not act thus in this country on the earth, when they know full well that they would act precisely that way in any country in Europe? Is it not perfectly plain that a pilgrimage in Europe would be to them a much more real thing, than is pilgrimage on the earth which they profess and proclaim, and of which they sing?

But any "Christian" to whom earthly things are more real than are heavenly things—even his Christianity is not real. Any "Christian" to whom a pilgrimage in Europe would be more substantial and practical, than is his pilgrimage on the earth, is not in fact a pilgrim on the earth at all. His professing it, his proclaiming it, and his singing it, are all a fraud.

"Out of Egypt have I called my Son." Christians are the sons of God. They are therefore out of Egypt. But, though out of Egypt, they are not yet in "their own land." Therefore they are strangers and pilgrims on the earth, they are without a country in this world, and are active citizens nowhere but in heaven. "Our citizenship is in heaven."

Some Early History of God's Kingdom.

THE earthly portion of God's kingdom was given to man. Ps. 115:16. He was to rule in the earth as God's representative. Gen. 1:26. It matters not, at this stage of our study, just how that rule was to be conducted. It is enough to know here, that God is love, and that all his acts are therefore performed in love. Man, having been created in God's image, could have conducted the government entrusted to him on no other principle than that of love. But this state of things was not destined to continue long. In an unguarded moment, earth's deputy governor was betrayed into the transference of his fealty from God to another, whose character was exactly opposite to that of Him in whose kingdom man was installed as a prominent factor.

This was a transference also of ruling power to the captor. Instead of being what God had made him, a free being, man was brought under the bondage of sin, and hence became an agent of Satan. 2 Peter 2:19. Hitherto he had been in condition to rule after God's pattern, but after having adopted Satan's methods, his system of government came to be in accord with his new master's will, and his own assimilated likeness of Satan's character.

But as shown by the diagram here reproduced, although God's original kingdom was thus dismembered by man's disloyalty, the traitor was not cast off by his former Master and Benefactor. True, God cannot receive a rebel into his favor, but he could and did provide a method by which every one who wills to do so, may again become members of his kingdom, though living in a territory and government hostile to the interests of the kingdom of God.

Let the upper horizontal line of the diagram represent the earth as first placed under man's dominion, but which fell under the rule of Satan, through his power over man. So long as Satan rules in the hearts of men, so long will that usurped territory be ruled under the suggestions of Satan. It will be useless for a few puny men to undertake to transfer back to God that of which Satan has gained possession. Human wisdom and might cannot possibly be equal to such a task. Only one—the Lord Jesus Christ—can do this, and the accomplishment of it will not be till he destroys him who has the power of death, that is, the devil. Heb. 2:14. Then, and not till then, will the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ. Rev. 11:15-18.

For this very reason, the Lord made provision to extend parallel with the history of earthly kingdoms, one by which man might show himself loyal to God and opposed to Satan. This arrangement is illustrated by the lower horizontal line of the diagram, springing from the original kingdom, at the fall of man, and being made to reach forward to the end, where it again merges into the earthly kingdom at its final cleansing from sin and the power of Satan.

This is the kingdom of God's grace. As the gospel of the kingdom is preached in Satan's territory, men may, by refusing to acknowledge Satan's reign, be counted as citizens of the kingdom of grace. God does not ask that any of those in the earthly kingdoms shall be forced into his rule of grace, but "whosoever will" may come, and freely partake of its favors. Whoever does so must, however, be also willing to have his citizenship a wholly heavenly one, in order to be true to his King who is in heaven (Phil. 3:20), and be satisfied to count himself a stranger in the earth; for God and mammon cannot possibly be served at one and the same time. Matt. 6:24. It is therefore folly to think of forcing by civil laws one of earth's subjects to accept a grace that he cares nothing for, since that grace can never be bestowed by the laws of man, but by the will of God alone. James 1:18.

When a few hundred years had passed of man's misrule under the direction of Satan, a flood came and swept away all earthly governments, leaving but eight persons who were righteous before God. Gen. 6:5-8; 7:1. Had Noah and his posterity preserved their integrity upon coming out of the ark, Satan's rule over mankind would have been broken forever, and the kingdom of God would have been the rule in the earth, as it was designed to be from the beginning.

But the power of evil again took possession of men's minds, until few regarded the kingdom of God's grace. There was one, however, whom God chose to have represent him and his kingdom in the earth. But in calling Abraham as his servant, God did not again destroy the kingdoms of men, as he had before done in selecting Noah to be his representative in the earth. He did, however, select a portion of territory in which to plant his kingdom, and called Abraham out from the Chaldean country, telling him to get away from all his relatives, and go into the chosen land which would be shown him. Gen. 12:1.

It will be noticed how careful God was to have Abraham removed from the molding influence of human minds as he took up the work assigned him. About to become the head of God's kingdom on earth, and the father of all the faithful, God would not permit even Terah, the father of the patriarch, to accompany him to the country of which he was to be the heavenly representative. The father of Abraham being of doubtful character (Josh. 24:2), he could not be permitted to have an influence in the government of that nation which was to be developed from the seed of Abraham, "the friend of God."

Notwithstanding these requirements of God, Abraham took his father with him, when he left Ur of the Chaldees. But his steps were turned aside from entering the promised land at once, and the whole company went to Haran where they remained until Terah's death. Gen. 11:31,32. This bar to the proper beginning of the kingdom being removed, Abraham received command to proceed to the country for which he had started some years previous. Gen. 12:4. Lot went along, however, and caused much anxiety to his uncle, until, through a quarrel between the herdsmen of the two men, the younger decided to separate from his uncle, and settle in the plains of Jordan, among a people more to his own liking. Gen. 13:5-11.

When this came about, and the last relative of Abraham was separated from him, then the Lord spoke to him, saying, "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee." Verses 14-17.

There is more in this promise than one sees at the first glance. God had actually promised to the representative of his kingdom in the earth, territory claimed by another. Satan had conquered its first deputy-governor, and held it by right of conquest. He now saw that God intended to take it from him again and give it as a prize to those who would renounce the power of evil, and so restore all the component parts of the original kingdom. Here was another opportunity to charge God with arbitrariness. Was not the earthly territory his, fairly won from man, whose dominion it had once been? What right had God to bestow by promise upon Abraham and his seed that which he himself claimed the privilege of giving to whomsoever he would? Luke 4:6.

From this time forward we may look for a fierce contest to be waged by Satan against the seed of Abraham, lest the promise of God shall be fulfilled to them, and the territory pass from under his control. Having command of the powers of earth, we may expect him to marshal their governments, at every step of the way, to oppose the growth of Abraham's seed, and so prevent them from possessing the domain which he considers his lawful prey. Just when he began that work, and how he has since carried it on, are points to be reserved for another paper.

Separation.

BY E. P. MARVIN.

"Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?"

"And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?"

"And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people."

"Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you."

"And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."—2 Cor. 6:14-18.

Salvation is through separation unto Christ. The world with all its wisdom, philosophy, science, civilization and progress is a moral ruin, and if any are saved it must be by coming out of it.

Sin separates from God, and we can only get back to God by separating from sin. This began to be very distinctly taught in the calling of Abraham (Gen. 12), and was constantly taught in the ceremonials of the Mosaic dispensation. In general, this is the separation which Christ exemplified in his earthly life. We are to imitate him. We are in the world but not of the world, in its affections and desires, objects and aims, hopes and anticipations. By the world in this connection is meant the system of men and things most common around us, which is evil, under control of Satan the usurper, and opposed to God and his gospel. Gal. 1:4. This system has many departments—social, political, commercial, and religious, through which Satan works. This world is unchangeably evil, opposed to God, and bound over with its head to "the judgment of the Great Day." From this we must be separated or we cannot be saved. 2 Cor. 6:17, 18. All who are loyal to the Word and willing to study it may take the following lesson respecting—

1. We must be separated from the world's SOCIAL YOKE for fellowship with Christ. "Society" is hydriotic cal, hollow-hearted, proud, carnal, godless, and increasingly immoral. All Christians should renounce its claims. The early Christians regarded its objects and aims, its conversation and amusements, its spirits and attire as utterly unchristian and they utterly renounced it. Indeed, the early Christians would not be admitted into modern "society," nor would they seek admission. No person can be truly loyal to Christ and at the same time to Mrs. Grundy. Her dominion is earthly, sensual, devilish. Her polished manners and esthetical sense are only the veneering and foil of the flesh. 1 John 2:15-17; James 4:4; 1 Tim. 2:9-10; 1 Peter 4:3-5. Of course this principle will keep Christians out of all brotherhoods, or call them out as soon as their eyes are opened, if they walk closely with God. Man-made societies naturally adopt a man-made and Christless religion.

2. We must be separated from the MARRIAGE YOKE with unbelievers in order to live in holy wedlock with our Heavenly Bridegroom. God's people from the outcalling of Abraham, have been forbidden to marry unbelievers. Such intermarriages brought in the antediluvian apostasy. Gen. 6:2-5. Paul declares that Christians should marry only in the Lord. 1 Cor. 7:39. Yoke a sheep and a goat together, and the goat will usually lead the sheep. This is not God's way of saving souls. Lot's daughters, Ishmael, Samson, Ahab, Jereboam, and many others in Bible history were injured or ruined by these unholy alliances. The first blasphemer stoned was the son of an Egyptian, married to an Israelitish woman. Lev. 24. The rebellious Absalom was the son of a Pagan woman. Even Solomon was led astray and perhaps lost through alliance with outlandish women. Samson's parents expostulated with him against his marriage outside of Israel, Judges 14:3. Some one says, "Well, well, if you marry a child of the devil, you may expect to have trouble with your father-in-law." Deut. 7:3-4; Josh. 23:12-13; Ezra 9:2; Rom. 8:5; Luke 16:18.

3. We should renounce the BUSINESS YOKE with unbelievers in order to be free to do our Master's business. In a business firm it is unsafe to commit yourself to the action of others who are unconverted. The ethics of the world and Christ are widely different. Deut. 22:10. We are to do all for the glory of God; they nothing. 1 Cor. 10:31. We do all in his name; they nothing. Col. 3:17. We are not to love money; they do. 1 Tim. 6:10. We are crucified unto the world and alive to Christ; they are alive to the world and dead to Christ. Gal. 2:20. Mark the results of such business alliances in 2nd Chronicles, 18th and 20th chapters; also in many examples of modern times.

4. We should renounce the POLITICAL YOKE imposed by bosses, and discharge first of all the duties of our heavenly citizenship. Satan, the usurper, offered the kingdoms of this world to Christ, for a bow. Matt. 4:9. Since the crown rights of our true covenant king have been and still are rejected by all nations during these times of the Gentiles, it is vain for us to expect to reign, rule and run the world. Our mission is to run people out of it for refuge in Christ. Heb. 6:18-20. In all countries we are pilgrims and strangers who refuse to be naturalized. Phil. 3:20.

"We've no abiding city here;
Then let us live as pilgrims do."

(Col. 3:1-3; Heb. 11:13.)

We advocate the crown rights of an absent Prince and wait for a rejected dynasty to be restored. Titus 2:11-15. There is no "Christian State" on earth, and there never will be one until the Christ of God shall come to erect it and reign over it. The old prophets were indeed statesmen, under a theocracy, but the apostles were not, under Gentile rule. Good citizenship under the theocracy was very different from good citizenship under man's government. Ours is a pilgrim life like that of the father of the faithful and the friend of God. We have a higher citizenship and a loftier patriotism. No instructions are given us in the New Testament for Christians to work in politics or hold office during our Lord's rejection and these times of the Gentiles. We are ambassadors. Four duties only are enjoined:—

1. Pay taxes. Matt. 17:24-27; Rom. 13:6.
2. Obey rulers. Rom. 13:1-7; Titus 3:1.
3. Honor rulers. 1 Peter 2:17; Jude 8.

4. Pray for rulers. 1 Tim. 2:1-3. Christ and the apostles instruct us in the duties of husband and wife, parents and children, elders and deacons, but not in those of the magistrate. If we have other duties to the state, it must be by inference only; there is no express command.

5. We must renounce the vain and formal RELIGIOUS YOKE of the world for the blessed and spiritual yoke of Christ. Matt. 11:28-30. The religiousness of worldly societies among us is no better before God than paganism. Nothing is farther from the religion of Christ. Two prominent characteristics of the present time are unprecedented and phenomenal:—the multiplication of societies and the production of ecclesiastical amusements for mixed saints and sinners. It is a fact to startle thought, that although these two devices are often carried on to help the church to reach the "masses," and attract them to the church, the masses are further away than before they were invented.

What then must we conclude concerning the wisdom and scriptural character of these methods?

Let us declare and testify with divine assurance, that if the great power of God should come upon us, it would annihilate both these devices.

"Ecclesiastical Amusements" would vanish like a delusive dream before the earnest work of rescuing lost souls, and these "societies" with their "amusement industry" would merge their spiritual individuality and energy in the promise and potency of the consolidated Church of God, the sacred Bride of Christ.

The Church of God, in its original constitution, was not a confederation of man-made and half-breed societies, with the clatter of machinery and the clamor of methods, but a compact and consolidated body. Eph. 4:15, 16.

Christ ordained no "auxiliaries" nor "annexes" for his church, and if she is faithful she needs none.

But the unfaithfulness of the church occasions their existence, and as some of these societies are doing good, though not in the best way, we cannot absolutely condemn them.

Indeed we work with some of them, and pray God's blessing upon them.

But what a pity that the church should need so much and such help, leading so largely to the "Amusement Heresy and Cooking-stove Apostasy."

We have contact but not fellowship with the world. We should have fellowship only with assemblies of persons who give evidence of being saved persons. 2 Tim. 3:1-5. The alliance in law of "Church and Society," with "Secular Trustees," is marriage with the world—"Pergamos." Godly deacons managed the property of the early church. In Rev. 17:3, the harlot rides on the beast, but in Cant. 8:5, the true Bride leans on the arm of her Beloved. All yokes with "associate members," or lobby members, are utterly unchristian. There was no fellowship between those inside and outside of the ark. They were absolutely and eternally separated, as the saved and the lost. No auxiliary pleasure yachts were provided to hover around the ark with "associate members." Keep out of mixed flocks of sheep and goats. The line of demarkation should be distinct. These alliances are efforts of the church to "plow with ox and ass," and the crop will be thorns and thistles for the burning.

In short, we are to be like Christ, Isa. 53:3, despised; Matt. 10:24, rejected; John 5:41, no position; John 18:36, strangers; Heb. 3:1-14, pilgrims; 2 Tim. 2:12, suffering; Titus 2:11-15, self-denying, sober, righteous, godly, watching, pure, peculiar, and unpopular. This is Christianity according to Christ, and the only gospel that saves.

In all ages the policy of conformity to the world has shorn the church of her strength, destroyed her usefulness in the world, and dishonored Christ. She has always been most powerful, honored and triumphant, when most separated and holy.

Then in the face of soft theology, pulpit blandishments, and all worldly policy, let us ring out the clarion call for complete separation from the world and complete consecration to Christ.

If all Christians would live like Christ they would soon turn the world upside down.

WE have no objection to the Christian Endeavors, or to the members of any other religious society.

We have no objection to any religious organization, as such. In their legitimate field of work, the Christian Endeavor Society, the Epworth League and kindred organizations are capable of achieving magnificent results in the way of uplifting fallen humanity.

In this line of work they have done much, and their work is worthy of all commendation. We cease to approve, and object, only when they enter upon work which is outside their legitimate sphere of action.

We object, in other words, when a religious organization steps over the line between that which is religious and that which is civil, making use of civil power to enforce religious beliefs or observances.

The Christian Endeavor Society is a truly magnificent body of earnest, devoted, and well-meaning young men and women; and the same is true of the Epworth League. They have power, influence, enthusiasm, consecration.

But for this very reason it is all the more essential that they should not make the false moves which they are now being led to make. That which is capable of accomplishing vast good is also capable of doing incalculable damage. It is only a question of whether it is used for its legitimate purpose, or is perverted to something else.

We believe the Christian Endeavor Society, joined with the Epworth League and kindred organizations, while capable of immense good in religious work because of their numbers, zeal, and devotion, are also, for that very reason, capable of plunging this whole country into ruin, under mistaken ideas of right and duty.

There is nothing else but ruin for this country in a union of church and state.

Lucifer, before his fall, was one of the highest angels in heaven; and for this very reason, when the goodness that was in him became perverted, he became the prince of evil.

Too great caution cannot be exercised in guiding organizations within which lie such vast possibilities for good or evil.

Why Is It?

THE greatest power in the universe is the power of God.

The greatest power is capable of accomplishing greater results than any lesser power.

In the direction of reform, therefore, the greatest results will be accomplished by the power of God.

"The power of God for the reformation of man is manifested in the gospel, and in that alone. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Rom. 1:16.

There is now a great call made for moral reform and the regeneration of society.

Yet those who are sounding this call and organizing movements for its accomplishment, do not propose to make use of this power of God which is by faith, but of another power—the ballot.

Why do they propose to use the ballot in the place of the power of God? Why do they pass by the greatest power in the universe and select a power which is infinitely inferior to it?

AMERICA has at last a real queen, with jeweled crown and scepter, and all the other appurtenances of royalty. A new royal dynasty has been launched into being, the head of which is to be known as "Queen of the Holland Dames of the New Netherlands." With much pomp and glitter, the coronation ceremonies were conducted on the evening of the 9th inst., in the grand ball room of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. Miss Lavinia Van Westervelt Dempsey is the name which has hitherto designated the new monarch.

THE proceedings attending the coronation were very interesting, and were meant to be impressive. "Her Majesty" was seated upon a gilded throne, over which was a canopy of ermine. Upon the upholstery of the throne was embroidered the coat of arms of Holland. Surrounding the queen were Sir Knights and noble dames and ladies of honor, and numerous pages waited in attendance to bear the trains of the royal dresses. Some of the Sir Knights wore costumes said to be fac-similes of those worn in the time of William the Conqueror; and others were dressed to represent the court of Louis XVI. of France. One of the ladies of honor was dressed like Mary Queen of Scots, and displayed a veil and prayer book which she affirmed once belonged to the wife of Oliver Cromwell. As regards uniformity of style, the court costumes were a failure; but much allowance must be made for slight discrepancies in conducting such an undertaking as that of founding a royal dynasty upon American soil; besides, they all represented royalty, and that was the important point.

* * *

So now we have a real American royalty; and American heiresses need no longer be sent abroad to acquire a royal title; for in the natural order of things there must be in this new dynasty real American princes and princesses, dukes, marquises, counts and what not, and it will only remain for title-loving Americans with money to purchase their titles from the home market which will be available from this time forward. Of course, the highest order of "high society" in America will be the new royalty; and the "four hundred" must now step down into second place.

THERE is a serious significance in all this, however much one may be impressed with its absurdity. As a straw showing the direction of the wind, it joins with other things to show the existence and growth of a sentiment among wealthy and prominent Americans which is directly the opposite of that under the inspiration of which this republic was established. It is one of many indications that with the rise of the money power, there has arisen in this country a sentiment which is contrary to the Declaration of Independence and to the principles of free government, and which must be reckoned with as a dangerous foe of American liberty.

THERE is quite a sentiment prevailing in this country, if we may judge from newspaper statements, in support of the idea that temperance does not mean total abstinence from what is bad, but that it consists in a moderate use of such things; the use of them in so moderate a way as not to exhibit their harmful properties. For example, true temperance as regards the use of intoxicants consists, according to this idea, in drinking them to an extent that will be just short of getting drunk. An individual who writes upon the subject, and in so doing no doubt voices the sentiments of others, says this: "When we are admonished to be temperate in all things, even in language, I presume it was never intended that we should abstain from talking; and so in our 'meats and drinks.' Pray relieve the mind of one accustomed to drink wine at table who has heretofore believed that there was virtue in temperance, and still thinks there is but little in prohibition."

* * *

It is true there is such a thing as intemperate speech; but speech is not inherently harmful, and intemperate speech does not mean much speech, but improper speech. Intoxicants are harmful in and of themselves. The harmful property is in the smallest amount of them, no less truly than in the larger quantities; if this were not so, no harm could result from using them freely. It is a fact that moderate drinking does directly lead to "over-indulgence" and drunkenness; no one ever begins the use of intoxicants otherwise than "moderately." Must we then conclude that temperance leads to intemperance? The proposition is absurd. No; if "moderate" drinking were true temperance, it would never lead to drunkenness. The moderate use of the things which are proper in eating and drinking, never leads an individual to a dishonored grave. This so called "moderation" is a delusion and a snare. If people would be really temperate in life, they would never care for the "moderate" use of intoxicants. A taste for such things is a sure evidence that the seeds of intemperance are in the system, only waiting the opportunity to develop and do their deadly work.

It is the same with indulgence in any other form of evil. The carnal heart continually longs to indulge in those things which are hurtful to body and soul; but it aims to do this only "moderately." And in this it now has, all too frequently, the countenance and aid of the church. As noticed in our last issue, the pastor of an Episcopal church in Jersey City has started a class in dancing, in the church gymnasium; and the success of the innovation shows how ready the young people are to avail themselves of the opportunity to indulge in a form of worldliness under the auspices of the church. Under the auspices of the church, the indulgence will of course be very "moderate," and therefore an exhibition of true temperance. Will it? What do you think?

HERE is what one individual thinks—Mr. Eben Bumstead, of Boston, Mass.—who has sent us a leaflet called out by this Jersey City incident. He says:—

"Dear Sir:—The prominence which has lately been given to the announcement that a Jersey City pastor intends to form a 'Bible-class dancing school,' would seem to make this an opportune time for speaking in no uncertain tones—cost what it may—in order to warn your people everywhere of the dangers which they do not now see, of the modern waltz, which the dancing masters at their recent convention in this city condemned as 'obnoxious,' and which the Christian Herald, of Sept. 22, 1897, says 'has proved the road to ruin to countless thousands.'"

* * *

In this circular is given the testimony of Mr. T. A. Faulkner, ex-dancing master, ex-champion dancer, and ex-president of Dancing Masters' Association of the Pacific Coast. In this he says on the point of "moderation" in this indulgence: "I only wish that certain parents who think they are restricting their children to 'parlor dancing at home only,' could have been with me the night of May 30th, 1892, and have seen as I did, their girls, some of them but twelve or fourteen years of age, dancing in a public saloon, where so much beer had been spilt on the floor that the women had to hold their dresses to keep them from getting soiled and wet as they danced. This is usually the result of teaching the child to dance and then to restrict it to home dancing. If they once become fascinated with it they must and will, by some means, fair or foul, have more of it than their homes afford. The safe side is the best side. Keep them from taking the first step to ruin, and they can never take the last."

* * *

TRUE temperance consists in abstaining from taking the first step to ruin.

* * *

AND it is very significant that such charges of worldliness can be laid at the door of the church at the very time when the church is trying to get control of the state, to run the affairs of civil government according to the laws of Christian morality. The church should remember the proverb, "Physician, heal thyself."

A Striking Incident from South America.

THERE is no quarter of the globe that furnishes richer mines for securing practical examples of the workings of a united church and state than South America. We have published within the last year quite a number of personal experiences, written by the actors themselves. In a contemporary, we find the account of a seller of religious books in Chile, where there is supposed to be religious liberty. It seems that it was his first experience, as he was evidently not aware that Catholic holidays in that country are quite rigidly observed. He came to one town where he had some books to deliver, and all the places of business being closed, he could do little or nothing, so he went to another town, and with practically the same results. While waiting in the public square for a train, a priest came out of the main church of the town with his procession of saints, when all the men took off their hats. There were fully a thousand present, and he alone kept on his hat. On the opposite side of the street the priest in his four-cornered cap came along and motioned for him to take off his hat. No attention was paid to this, and he was then commanded to either remove his hat or leave the square. What happened after this we will let him tell in his own language. He says:—

"I asked him what authority he had in Chile to give such a command, as there is religious liberty in this country. He threatened to call the police. I said, 'Very well, if you have authority to do so.' He left his monos (saints) in the street, and went to look for a policeman; and the crowd left his procession to see me.

"While I was waiting, I asked the people what authority the priest had, as I did not believe in his santos or his church. Finally the priest came back with the policeman, and commanded him to take me to jail. I again asked if one had to take off his hat in the public square. The policeman said I must come with him, and talk to the chief of police, which I did. While on the way, I gave a tract to the policeman, and convinced him that the priest was wrong. Half a square before we reached the prison, several persons came rushing up behind, and asked the policeman to let me go. One of these brushed my back with his hand, as on leaning against a tree while waiting in the square for the priest, my coat had become soiled. I asked them to come along and see what the chief would say.

"On reaching the prison the policeman said, 'I come with this man by order of Señor Cura, because of his making a scandal in not taking off his hat.' The chief said, 'Go.' I did not care to go at once, so he asked me in, and I showed my book to him and others, and gave him some tracts, then turned to the public square again, where the priest was. A little before reaching it a well-dressed man came almost on a run, and we met on the corner. He was astonished, and asked if I was not the man who had been sent to jail.

"'Yes,' was my reply.

"He said, 'If I only had power, you would go to jail.'

"I then asked him if he was a Christian, and if Christ ever sent any one to jail. He went away somewhat ashamed. On reaching the 'plaza,' or square, the people spied me, and pointed me out to others. Because of my 'offense' many had become my friends, and perhaps more had become my enemies. After talking awhile to some, as the priest was entering the church with his crowd. I gave away some tracts, and left for the station to take the train for San Felipe.

"When I had entered the train one young man began brushing the dust off my back to show his affection. I felt thankful to the Lord for this victory. Being my first visit to the town, I arrived without friends or enemies; but on leaving, all were either friends or enemies."

Is the Bible Equal to It?

BY LEWIS C. SHEAFE.

JUST now the preachers of this city are having a spasm of "higher criticism." They are jubilant over the so-called discoveries, and lament that they have been so simple-minded as to believe in the past, that the Bible is the very word of God, and that the Lord meant just what he said. Now, they say, we can treat the Bible as literature, and in their wisdom it is not safe for one not well versed in the languages to attempt to do much with the Bible.

Such language reminds one of what was said by the papists after Luther's triumph at Leipsic; they said in substance, We too accept the Scriptures, we even put them above Augustine and the Councils. But who can interpret them? Can peasants and women, or even merchants and nobles? The Bible, though inspired, is full of difficulties; there are contradictory texts. It is a sealed book except to the learned; only the church can reconcile its difficulties. We can accept nothing which is not endorsed by popes and councils. No matter how plain the Scriptures seem to be, on certain disputed points only the authority of the church can enlighten and instruct us. Moreover, since the Scriptures are to be interpreted only by priests, it is not a safe book for the people. We, the priests, will keep it out of their hands. They will get notions from it fatal to our authority; they will become fanatics; they will in their conceit defy us.

Then Luther rose, more powerful, more eloquent, more majestic than before; he rose superior to himself. What! said he; keep the light of life from the people? take away their guide to heaven; keep them in ignorance of what is most precious and most exalting? deprive them of the blessed consolations which sustain the soul in trial and in death? deny the most palpable truths because your dignitaries put on them a construction to bolster up their power? What an abomination! What peril to the souls of men!

Then Luther grasped that great idea of the Reformation, which was "The right of private judgment," or "Religious liberty." He said, Let the Scriptures be put into the hands of everybody; let every one interpret them for himself, according to the light he has from the guiding Spirit. Let spiritual liberty be revived, as in apostolie days. Then only will the people be emancipated from the middle ages, and arise in their power and majesty, obey the voice of enlightened conscience, and be true to their convictions. Then will they obey God rather than man, and defy all sorts of persecutions and martyrdom, having a serene faith in those blessed promises which the Gospel unfolds.

That same enemy of religious liberty is abroad again. Let us beware. Don't put the scholarship of men above the wisdom of God, for God has hid these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them unto babes. The doubts and denials of scriptural facts, by the so-called higher critics, have gotten men into the fog, and to-day men and women are skeptical as to the existence of God, the moral government of the world, the truth of Christianity, and the reality of the supernatural. Now the way out of this fog is by a living faith in the living Word of God. Give it a prayerful study. It has light yet to reveal for these times. It is equal to these times, for it is Spirit and life.

Superabundant Legislation.

N. Y. "Christian Advocate."

PRESIDENT WHITAKER, of the New York State Bar Association, said recently that from 1777 to 1897 the Legislature of New York had passed and ordered printed 101,000 pages of statutes, and that in the years 1887 to 1892 a volume of 600 pages was published each year; from 1892 to 1897 two volumes of 1,000 pages each were issued each year, with the exception of two years, when the output was three volumes each year. This is a vast amount of legislation even for so important a state as New York, and there can be no doubt that much of it is never enforced, and probably some of it is absolutely unnecessary. Perhaps if the Legislature met biennially, and the term of the session was limited, this evil of unessential legislation might be mitigated. As it is now, the Legislature sits for about four months each year, and produces about 1,000 pages of statutes. President Whitaker says: "A very large portion of the time of the Legislature is spent in passing special and personal laws, in which the people as a whole have very little, if any, direct interest. And it is not infrequent that laws are passed in direct opposition to the real interests of the general public. In fact, people are beginning to look upon legislative sessions as a menace, rather than a solace."

WHAT the world needs is not more legislation, but more love.

ON the side of truth men care only to discuss principles; on that of error they prefer to descend to personalities.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Studies in French History. -9.

"WHEN the poor Jews could no longer be found to torment and persecute," begun Professor Carman, the next Wednesday afternoon, 'the tide turned toward some heretics at Orleans. Among these was an old man, who had once been confessor of Queen Constance. But he had become in some way convinced of the errors of the Romish church, and had severed his connection from it. This made the queen so angry that as he was passing by, she struck him so violent a blow with her staff that his eye was dashed out."

"She must have been an extremely pleasant tempered there was an abundance of food. And now, while everybody's heart was soft and tender with gratitude, the Catholic Church made a law, called the 'Peace of God,' forbidding the taking of human life, in war or in any other way."

"Well, seems to me that was a pretty good thing," said Charlie White.

"Yes, but while the people depended upon their own unaided efforts they could not keep the sixth commandment or any other. The natural heart is full of hatred and murder, and these people soon became as lawless and wicked as ever. Then another law was tried, called the "Truce of God." From Wednesday eve till the next Monday morning, the law forbade murdering anyone upon any pretext whatever; so that during this period each week, human life was comparatively secure."

"Then I suppose if any one had any killing to do, he must do it between Wednesday and Monday," chimed in Harry Ray.

"I should have thought they would have called the other days 'butchering days,'" remarked Will Barnaby, shuddering.

"Yes; but even this restriction was better than nothing. This was the condition of things in the eleventh century,—about 1034.

"How long did King Robert the Pious reign?" asked Rob Billings, pencil in hand.

"Thirty-five years, and was succeeded by Henry the First, his son, and Philip the First, his grandson. Henry reigned twenty-nine years, but his reign seemed to be quite uneventful. Philip had a long reign of forty-eight years. The historian does not give Philip I. a very good name, I am sorry to say; but kind and just rulers are always the exception, not the rule.

CRUSADERS ON THEIR WAY TO PALESTINE.

woman," exclaimed Jack Smith, indignantly, "and deserved to have songs written about her."

"About the year 1031 there was a dreadful famine which lasted for three years. I think I have never read of anything so horrible ever being done as during this frightful time. History tells us that human flesh was very often eaten, and even that the frenzied people would rob the graveyards, and devour the buried corpses. It was not safe for children to be left alone, lest some fiend, made frantic by the pangs of hunger, should kill them to sustain his own life. The wolves and other wild animals were as hungry as the people, and grew so bold as often to attack them; and the famished people were so weak from hunger that they could hardly defend themselves."

"O, wasn't it so dreadful!" exclaimed Florence Ray. "How long before there was a change?"

"In the fourth year the crops again grew, so that

"While Philip was on the throne of France there was a wonderful warlike movement undertaken to rescue or recover Jerusalem from the hand of the Turks, called the Crusades."

"I remember of reading that Philip the First was awfully lazy, and lazy folks are generally cowards; so I should have thought he would have objected to exposing himself enough to lead his army," said Edna Phillips.

"Your idea is quite correct, Edna," said the professor, "quite correct; for Philip did not offer to head his army, and so when the Christian troops returned victoriously, he did not claim, nor did he get a bit of the glory.

"Along toward the last of his reign he pretended to feel so sorry for his sins that he ordered his people not to bury him with the preceding kings of France in St. Denis Cathedral.

"The lives of the nobles were wicked and profligate in the extreme. If any man wished to live without honest toil, he would take a horde of his retainers, or people under him, and placing himself at their head, would plunder and rob any one who chanced not to be able to offer resistance."

"It doesn't seem as if France or any other kingdom could endure such a lawless way of living very long," said Florence Ray.

"Well, there was a better time at hand for the miserable people, and well it was that this was so. When Philip I. died, his son Louis VI., called the Wide-awake, when he was young, but known better as 'The Fat,' reigned after him. Louis immediately began by attempting to control the lawless nobles. He was cunning enough to call the common people and the church to his aid, because they were all of one mind in wanting to rid the country of these lawless villains. At last they succeeded, though they did some hard fighting. But although the king became so fleshy that he could hardly seat himself upon his horse, he did not give up hard work.

"Benjamin Franklin said, 'If you want a thing done, do it yourself,' and Louis did it; though he had of course never heard of either Franklin or his saying; nor did he believe in putting off till to-morrow what ought to be done to-day. His minister's name was Suger, and he was a wise and sensible man. He was of great value both to Louis VI. and to his son Louis VII., who succeeded him, and whose reign of forty-three years begun in 1108.

"Now perhaps this study has been as long as you can profitably take in for this time; but I would like to ask if there are any in our class who would like to give up these studies."

For an answer the professor received a perfect chorus of "No, no; we want to continue them; we wouldn't give them up for anything."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

To the Juvenile Readers of the "American Sentinel."

Dear Friends:—Doubtless all of you are more than gratified with the Young People's Department of this periodical, which has been created especially for the youthful readers of the paper. Personally, I am of the conviction that this addition is very timely, and will be of great value to all who interest themselves in it. Perhaps some may think the subject of religious liberty is not essential for young people, nor of vital importance enough for them to become interested in. But of all the people who should be especially awake to these living principles, with a keen sense of their value, the young ought to be the first and most active. There are many reasons which demonstrate this to be a fact; a greater number than can be written in this short epistle.

It is a fact with which nearly all of you are familiar that, during the past three years, a continuous patriotic wave, so-called, has been sweeping over this country, and it seems constantly to rise with each setting sun. One very remarkable thing about this movement is that its strength lies in the concentrated forces of several millions of the best young people of this country. Never perhaps in the history of the country, the times of '76 and '61 excepted, has the air been so full of patriotism as at the present, and its density becomes more and more apparent. One writer, recently speaking of this movement, said, "There can be no question about the penalty that may be incurred by neglecting the present golden opportunity to make patriotism universal and fervid, North, South, East, and West. Miss this God-given opening of to-day, and the fortunate conjunction may never return."

God is certainly granting golden opportunities at the present time to rightly understand the true meaning of civil and religious liberty, that all may know the correct relations which exist between God and Cæsar; between the church and state; between God and the individual; between individuals and society; and much, yes, everything, depends upon a correct understanding of these relations. Never has a truth come to the world without the devil was bound to defeat it if possible; either by directly opposing it, or else by counterfeiting. So these eternal principles of civil and religious liberty which to day are commanding the attention of almost the whole world, and promise, in the near future, to become the living issue, are either misrepresented, falsely colored, or misconstrued by the force of evil, in order that their true meaning shall not be apparent to all.

As one of the outgrowths of this popular patriotic wave there has been thrown ashore this so called "Christian Citizenship" organization. It has gathered under its influence nearly five millions of people, the very cream of the land, and imbued them with an enthusiasm worthy of the most noble cause the world has ever known. As we are all well aware, the whole foundation of this great movement is built upon a false hypothesis; hence will not stand when the great contest between righteousness and error will be waged. It being built upon a sandy foundation, the rivers of truth will inundate the whole structure. Then how important it is that every young person educate himself that he may correctly understand these eternal principles,—that he build upon a solid foundation, even upon the Rock of Eternal Truth, in order that he be not carried away with "the refuge of lies," which are to come to nought.

Yet more: it is not only necessary that each one understands these principles for himself, but he also has a duty to perform in telling his neighbor the true intent of the principles of civil and religious liberty. Millions to-day are anxiously waiting to learn the truth of these things; and as ye have freely received, freely give.

But some may ask, "Who is my neighbor?" He who needs the assistance most, independent of caste, color, condition, or position. When we consider the millions of persons in these various organizations, working with such a zeal and earnestness for what they believe to be the upbuilding of Christ's kingdom upon earth, yet misguided because of erroneous principles, how necessary it is for every person who loves God, and to whom has been given the privilege of knowing these eternal truths, especially among the young people, to become thoroughly acquainted with these facts themselves, and then coöperate with the divine One, that many of these earnest but misguided persons may know the truth as it is in Jesus, and turn their feet in the path of truth and rectitude.

It is the mission of this department of the SENTINEL to educate the youth upon this line. The call of God today is, "Educate, Educate, Educate." By so doing each one will not only save his own soul, but will have many sheaves to be gathered in the garner at the great day of the Lord.

Yours for religious liberty,

F. C. GILBERT.

"He Shall Think To Change . . . Laws."

"OUR last talk brought out the fact that the papal power has warred against—well, let me see if you can tell me, Charlie?"

"Against the Most High God and against the saints of the Most High."

"What was he next to war against?"

Charlie turned to the prophecy and read from Dan. 7:25, "He shall think to change times and laws."

"Whose times and laws, Charlie?"

"The times and laws of the Most High."

"Yes. We all know that it is customary for nations to change their laws; for men to change each other's laws; but what kind of wisdom would men need to change the laws of the Most High?"

"The wisdom of the Most High," said Charlie.

"Has any finite being ever had the wisdom of the Most High?"

"N—no," said Charlie, slowly. "Jesus was the Son of God,—God in the flesh."

"We will speak of his attitude to the law of God a little later. What does Paul call the pope?"

"The man of sin," said Charlie.

"And in our past talks we have learned that the pope is only an exponent of self; that each one of us, unchanged by divine grace, will war against God and his saints.

"Let us see what the pope has said in regard to changing God's law. Hand me the books on the sofa."

Mrs. Ross read: "The pope's will stands for reason. He can dispense above the law, and of wrong make right by correcting and changing laws."—Pope Nicholas, Dist. 96.

"This paragraph is from the decretals of the popes."

"But, mama, suppose the pope did think to do away with God's law and the precepts of Christ, what difference would it make? He couldn't really do such a thing. Right, you know, is right, because it is right, and because God is. To undo God's law, that is the very expression of right, would be to put God out of existence."

"Yes, Charlie. But who is behind the papal horn?" "Satan."

"And Satan is manifested in self, and self would kill and obliterate any thing or body that would hinder its exaltation. While no one can undo right, or dethrone God, yet self thinks to do it. The Catholic version reads, 'He shall think himself able to change times and the law.'"

"Do you suppose that the pope actually thinks he is able to do that?"

"Certainly. But he is not the only one who thinks so. Whole nations have thought to do so, and as nations are only individuals in mass, individuals have thought to do so. You may turn to Rom. 8:7, and read."

Charlie read, "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."

"Dear me," said Charlie; "Is it impossible for any of us to keep God's law?"

"Impossible, unless we experience a change of heart, or mind. Paul also says, 'We have the mind of Christ.' Jesus told Nicodemus that in order to understand the things of God he 'must be born from above,' All have carnal minds who have not the mind of Christ, and the works of the flesh appear. Self controls the life, and the fruits of the Spirit are not seen."

It is estimated upon good authority that there is $1,000,000,000 represented in untaxed church property in this country.

It is a strange definition of the word "justice" which the French government is trying to set up, through the proceedings of the trial of M. Zola. That government has something yet to learn from the French Revolution.

IN the Equity Court, Washington, D. C., February 3, a decision was rendered by Judge Hagner, which declares it to be unconstitutional for Congress to appropriate money for sectarian institutions. We have sent for a copy of the decision, and expect to speak further of it later.

THE sentiments expressed in the letter of ex-minister De Lome, in which he characterized the President as a "low politician," and the American people as "rabble," are only naturally to be expected from an official of that most Catholic nation, Spain, in reference to a Protestant President and a Protestant nation. Let no one be surprised that Rome does not speak flatteringly of Protestants.

THE terrible nature of the struggle that has been going on in Cuba can be appreciated only in the light of the fact that more people have perished in the three years of the war for Cuban independence than perished in the five years of the great war that devastated the Union. No less than 400,000 people, it is said, have perished from starvation alone. And yet the claim has been persistently made by Spain, and recognized officially here, that there has been no war in Cuba at all!

A VERY interesting and important trial is that now being conducted at Lattimer, Pa., in which the sheriff and his deputies who shot and killed a number of unarmed miners who were on strike, at that place, some months ago, appear as defendants. And the most interesting and significant thing that has thus far occurred in connection with it, is the fact that the presiding judge actually allowed the deputies, who are charged with murder, to be three days at liberty without bail. Such an occurrence must go far to strengthen the charge that wealth and poverty do not stand on an equality in this country before the law.

A MEETING of the "Evangelical Alliance" of St. Johns, New Brunswick, was held recently to consider measures for securing a more general observance of Sunday. The Methodist, Baptist, and Presbyterian denominations were conspicuously represented. A committee was appointed to secure additional Sunday legislation. The Alliance will hold meetings once a month.

IN an impassioned speech before Congress in behalf of Cuba, recently, Senator Mason, of Illinois, made this indictment of the nation in general and of his party in particular, the truthfulness of which must be admitted. It discredits this country as the alleged home of liberty:—

"We lived in the shadow of the law of compensation for a hundred years. We set our flag in the sky and said: 'This is the land of the free and the home of the brave.' And at the same time we were selling women and children to the highest and best bidder for cash. The law of compensation went into operation, and we did not have materials enough, at the end of the war, to make headboards for our soldiers' graves. The bankers and keepers of bucket-shops are wiring me to-day to consider the price of wheat and pork in my own state. I say to you that, with the picture of starving women and children in Cuba, I have no heart to look at the price of pork in Illinois. [Applause.] They tell us that war is hell. In Cuba it is worse than hell. Dante with all his word painting has never described anything so horrible. And this is the war the Republican party promised to stop."

Church Lotteries Sustained.

A DECISION recently given by Justice Neu, of the First Civil District Court, in this city, affirms that an article put up and disposed of at a church lottery, is the property of the winner, and cannot be confiscated by the State for violation of the law against lotteries.

Holy Trinity Church, of East New York, was in need of funds; so it was decided to hold a fair and bazaar after the usual fashion and raise the money. Between the pastor, the ladies, and the Y. M. C. A., the necessary arrangements were completed, and the fair was inaugurated. This was in last December.

The enterprise was a "grand success"; but one thing turned out unfortunately. A fine tapestry rug, with a picture painted on it representing a love scene, was raffied off, and was won by a saloon keeper. He might make use of the tapestry to ornament his saloon, so the church people realized, and of course this would never do.

So the saloon keeper was approached by one Mr. Miller, and a bargain made whereby the former parted with his tapestry for the sum of $5. But not long afterward the saloon keeper learned that his tapestry, by virtue of the painting upon it, was valued at $75; and then, as it is reported, he used "some powerful language," and going to Mr. Miller he offered the $5 and demanded the return of the tapestry. Mr. Miller declined; and now the decision of Justice Neu, into whose hands the matter came, awards the tapestry to the saloon keeper, who will display his trophy where he sees fit.

This is much to the disappointment of the church people; but they may console themselves with the reflection that the point of the rightful claim of the State to the possession of the article for violation of the anti-gambling law, which was raised by one of the attorneys, and would have been a heavy blow to church lotteries, was not sustained by the court.

REFORM individuals, and there will be no need of "national reform."

RELIGIOUS legislation not only invades the rights of man, but those of God himself.

EVERY appeal made by the "Christian" church to the state is a denial of the power of godliness.

THE ballot stands for physical force, but physical force does not and cannot stand for morality.

ERROR is always asking the aid of the state to avert the danger of a collision with truth. But truth never fears such a collision.

A SUNDAY law is all right, upon the theory that it is proper for one person to sacrifice principle in order to save some other person's feelings.

THE only thing that force can accomplish with bad citizens is to put them in the penitentiary. There is not force enough in the world to reform one individual, even were it all concentrated upon him.

THE tendency of modern civilization is to destroy individuality; and the only sure refuge for individuality is in the gospel. Without individuality there could be no faith; and without faith, there could be no gospel.

ONE of the strangest things in this age of marvels is that Sunday can be commercially the first day of the week, and at the same time be religiously—as we are told—the seventh day! How this can be we do not understand.

It is not according to the gospel that a person should be compelled to do what is right. Whether a thing is morally right or wrong, therefore, is a question with which civil government cannot concern itself; for civil government was not instituted to proceed contrary to the gospel. Its proper inquiry is, with respect to anything, Is it contrary to the preservation of individual rights?

Bible Study with the "Christian Citizen."

THE people of Israel in the wilderness was "the church in the wilderness." Acts 7:38.

While they were yet in the wilderness, shortly before they entered the land of Caanan, God said of them, "Lo! the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." Num. 23:9.

This was spoken of his church, when as yet it was a separate people: "Lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations."

This was said of his church when they were about to enter the land of their permanent habitation. It was expressing his will concerning them, that they should not be reckoned among the nations.

Thus he never intended his people to set up a state, to establish a kingdom, or to have any part in any such thing. They were not to be reckoned among the nations.

His people then being the church, when he said, "The people shall dwell alone and shall not be reckoned among the nations," he simply said that it was his will that there should be forever a fixed separation between his church and any state or kingdom of the nations on earth. In that word he simply said that the separation which then existed between that church from all nations, states, and kingdoms, should so continue forever.

That church, then, was never in his purpose to become a state or kingdom like the nations of the earth. It was not to be "reckoned among the nations." The people were not to mingle with the people of the nations, to learn their ways or follow their customs. Nor was the church—the whole body of the people—to become a state or kingdom like the nations.

The only organization of the people in the wilderness was church organization. They had nothing comparable in any way to a state or governmental organization. They had government; but it was church government. Jesus Christ was then the head of the church, as really as he has ever been. They had a Ruler; but he was a religious ruler, and religious only. Thus everything about them, all with which they had to do in the matter of government or organization, was altogether religious and churchly.

Such being the only government or organization that they knew; and in that at the time being already separated from all the nations; when the Lord said of them, "The people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations," it was the plain declaration of the Lord's purpose that thus they should forever remain—knowing no kind of organization but church organization, knowing no kind of government but that of God, which is solely religious.

Thus the Lord taught then and for all time that the members of his church, those who profess to be his people, shall never be reckoned among the nations, shall never have any active citizenship in, or connection with, the nations of the earth.

And that word which was then spoken of his church, is yet spoken of his church. There still stands that sentence in the revealed will of God to his church. That word speaks just as distinctly to the members of his church to-day as it did to his church that day. Whether his church at that ancient day heeded this word or not, does not affect the fact that such was God's plainly-declared purpose concerning them. And whether those who profess to be his church to-day regard that word or not, does not affect the fact that there stands the word declaring forever that the Lord's people, the church of God, "shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations."

Christian citizenship on the earth is a contradiction of the plain word of God. It is in fact a contradiction in terms.

Christian citizenship in heaven, even while sojourning on the earth, is the plain truth of the word of God. And it is a glorious fact in Christian experience.

A. T. J.

THE Christian Citizen says that "the teachings of history but emphasize the oft-expressed conviction of leading thinkers that the greatest crisis in our national history impends." That is true. And it is equally true that nothing is helping more to hasten this impending crisis, than is this same "Christian citizenship" in its persistent mixing up of Christianity and politics, of church and state.

The Practical Side of It.

THE practical importance of the subject of Christian citizenship, as discussed in the columns of the SENTINEL, is evidenced by communications like the following which is printed in The Outlook, of February 12, under the heading, "Shall Missionaries be Protected by Government?" :—

"To the Editors of the Outlook:

"The frequent occurrence of international trouble in Asia, growing out of attacks on missionaries or the destruction of mission property, must present to the Christian mind and conscience a painful anomaly. Missionaries in China, for instance, know that their presence is exciting violent animosity in a fanatical sect, but instead of retiring, they remain, and riot, incendiarism, and bloodshed follow. A European government steps in and demands redress. A number of heads are cut off—probably not those of the actual culprits.

"Again, some German Roman Catholic missionaries are killed, and their death is made the pretext for seizing and holding an important Chinese port. Or missionary school property is destroyed in Armenia, and threats are made to enforce redress and restitution at the cannon's mouth.

"None of these methods are such as the Master would have approved of. That, I think, every Christian denomination or missionary will admit. And these were not the methods in vogue centuries ago, when, it is allowed, the Roman Catholic missionaries in the Far East won more converts to Christianity than have since been enrolled as members by all the Christian denominations taken together. The inconsistencies between the teaching of Christian missionaries and the practice of Christian governments must be fatal to the spread of Christianity. The missionaries go out ostensibly with their lives in their hands, and profess to be as willing to be martyrs as were the apostles of old. But when they suffer for their principles, the Christian government steps in and insists on the infliction of punishment on somebody. The missionary preaches the doctrine of forgiveness; the missionary's government practices the doctrine of revenge. As long as the missionary is a citizen, his government cannot but resent and demand redress for injury to its citizen and breach of treaty rights. The missionary himself and the society he represents may be averse to such measures of violence as the civil government, regardless of the sufferer's wishes, feels compelled to take in vindication of its national rights. Yet, in the eyes of the heathen or the Mohammedan, the missionary must be regarded as the instigator of the punishment.

"The situation is painful from every point of view, especially to the Christian citizens of this country who disavow all connection between church and state.

"One can see no other remedy than voluntary relinquishment of citizenship by every missionary as soon as he enters on his mission work, and the disavowal by every missionary society of any relation to any civil government and right of protection. If such a course could be pursued, with the concurrence of all Christian governments, and without detriment to the commercial rights of their citizens or the security of secular property, Christianity would be relieved of one of the most flagrant hindrances to its spread in non-Christian lands, and Christian missionaries would be looked up to with much more admiration than they now excite in Christian lands; for, when serious international complications arise, especially if they have been occasioned by the indiscretion or overzeal of male or female missionaries, the world at large does not make charitable allowances for all the circumstances.

J. D."

This illustrates the very truths that have been pointed out in the SENTINEL respecting the Christian's relation to earthly governments. Of course, when a person professes Christianity—the heavenly citizenship—and at the same time wants to hold on to the state, as being a citizen of it, thus forming in himself a union of religion with the state, there must arise "painful anomalies" and "painful situations" such as the writer has described. And they cannot but be "especially" painful "to the Christian citizens of this country who disavow all connection between church and state."

The situation would be much less painful and perplexing if "Christians" would really believe what they profess, and then would act in harmony with their belief.

ALL the false theocratical notions that have characterized the National Reform movement from its beginning, are now inherited, propagated, and cultivated by the false Christian citizenship combination.

What May We Expect?

WHAT is there about Sunday which leads its defenders to make such inexcusable blunders as that which appears in the following?—

"When ought we to prepare for Sunday? Ex. 16:23.

"When God prepared food for the children of Israel, did he prepare any on Sunday? Ex. 16:27."

These questions are part of a "catechism on the Sabbath," which is printed in a late issue of the Christian Endeavor World, with the indorsement of John Willis Baer, the general secretary of the Endeavor organization. They amount to a definite assertion that the children of Israel kept Sunday during their wanderings in the wilderness.

Now everybody knows that the children of Israel in the wilderness did not keep Sunday, or the first day of the week at all. Everybody knows that it is not claimed even by the most ardent advocates of Sunday, that the Israelites kept it. The very phrase "Jewish Sabbath" which those advocates delight to repeat in controversy, and by which they refer to the seventh day of the week, is a standing evidence of their belief upon this point.

The Jews have kept the same weekly day ever since they first became known as a nation. This no one will seriously dispute.

And now the general secretary of the Christian Endeavor Society deliberately puts it out as truth that the Jews, back in their journey from Egypt to Canaan, kept Sunday; that it was Sunday that God designated by miracles in connection with the falling manna, as his Sabbath!

We mention this because it leads us to make the inquiry, To what lengths of error will the great Christian Endeavor body be led in their support of Sunday? If they will believe this, as they are of course expected to, being printed in their leading organ and indorsed by the official who stands next to the president, what will they not believe in the line of religious error?

And since it is true that people act in accordance with their beliefs, and since the Christian Endeavorers are expected to be young men and women of action, what mistakes may they not be expected to commit in action? This, in the case of such a body, is a very serious question.

State Religion.

BY ALLEN MOON.

PEOPLE who clothe the state with divine attributes have not all lived in the musty ages of the past, but some of them have come down to our time, and not a few of them have drifted from the monarchies of the old world—where kings ruled by divine right—into this fair land, where the government is by the people. But a feeling of lonesomeness comes over them; so they set themselves about to remodel the government of our land, after the old order, when rulers enforced divine decrees.

Rev. Dr. McAllister, before the House Judiciary Committee of Congress, used the following language in advocating the God-in-the-Constitution resolution, which fully justifies the above statement:—

"I say it comes to this: This matter of conscience is one that goes back to the moral sense of the people. It is not simply an individual conscience. It may be a Mohammedan conscience—there may be an infidel or atheist conscience—I hardly know what that would be, but whatever it may be, he has it. Concede that he has it. Here is the nation which gives its decision according to its sense of right and wrong. That is the national conscience, and when the nation thus gives its decision, individuals whose conscientious views may conflict—like a Mormon who believes in polygamy, or any man who stood up for slavery after the question was settled, or any man in a prohibition state to traffic in liquor—in such cases the individual conscience must yield to the conscience of the whole people, which is over him, and should be over him in order to enforce what is right, but which can be over him only by recognizing the Lord's supreme authority over the nation."

It is difficult to believe that men with the Bible in their hands and living in a land of comparative religious freedom, could not be satisfied to enjoy religious liberty. The absurdity of the state attempting to regulate religious matters is forcibly expressed by Rev. Minot J. Savage, in The Forum. He says:—

“One of the most needed, as it is one of the most difficult, of all reforms, is that which aims at having the state mind its own business. This includes two things, letting alone what is not its business, and really minding what is. In the light of legal history, one of the most curious things is the still-surviving popular faith in mere laws as a means of preventing evil and accomplishing good. The statute books of even our young country are chiefly old lumber rooms. But, beyond this, and more mischievous still, is the fact that the state is continually legislating concerning things that are beyond the limits not only of its rightful, but even of its possible, jurisdiction. Many of its attempts are as impracticable as would be a legal interference with the force of gravity. Should Congress enact laws concerning things in India, all the world would smile. But not our country only, nearly all countries, are still passing laws that imply a claim of jurisdiction over other worlds and other states of existence. They are passing laws that attempt to deal with inner conditions of consciousness—with metaphysical subtleties, over which philosophers and ecclesiastics are still wrangling. People want laws passed not only for the protection of life and property and securing good conduct now and then, but they want laws the causes of which are supposed to come from other worlds and for ends which issue only in other worlds. In brief, they are continually confounding the functions of the priest, the preacher, the philosopher, or the metaphysician with those of the legislator. . . .

“We are slowly reaching a point at last where the most civilized people are beginning to see, with at least partial clearness, that the functions of the state should be limited to the practical matters of conduct in this life, and to their bearing on the liberties and rights of men as citizens. The philosophers may reason of ethical origins and principles, and of supersensual sanctions. The metaphysicians may speculate as to transcendental causes and results. Theologians may theorize as to what was ‘in the mind of God,’ of which actual facts are only a partial expression. For my present purpose, I question neither the right nor the wisdom of these things. But the point I wish to make is this, that, whether false or true, these things simply do not concern the state as such. . . . And the only interest of the state, as state, is that all the rights and duties involved in a civil contract shall be maintained, to the end of public order. The moment that it attempts anything beyond this, it is a trespasser on personal rights, and works only mischief. It is hardly matter for dispute that those who have claimed to be acting for God, in political matters, have been authors of cruelty and injustice. Mr. Gladstone, pietistic though he sometimes is, claims only to be working for the good of man. Civilization tends both to modesty and kindness.”

Although this language was used with reference to another divine institution, it is just as applicable to the Sabbath institution and Sabbath laws. The apostle Paul says of the divine law of the Sabbath that it is spiritual. Then the Sabbath institution belongs in the spiritual realm, and when the state enacts laws to regulate the observance of the Sabbath, it goes outside of that for which it was instituted, and instead of exerting its power to make men civil—which is its only function—it assumes the attribute of the Deity, and attempts to make men spiritual and to enforce upon them spiritual institutions. “God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth,” that is to say, worship him in the observance of those things that are spiritual—as the Sabbath, the Lord’s supper, baptism, prayers, etc. The state has no more right to invade this realm than the United States has to enact laws for China.

It would be much more reasonable for one state to enact laws for another and seek to enforce them, than for an earthly government to legislate for the spiritual, for, in the first instance, both belong to the same sphere, but in the latter the functions are entirely diverse; and if in the case of one state legislating for another such effort would be repelled, much more when civil government attempts to rule in matters spiritual, should it meet with resistance—not of brute force—but of the “weapons that are not carnal, but mighty through God.”

THE Christian Citizen proclaims loudly that “Christian citizenship is more than reform, it is regeneration.”
Regeneration of what?

In the Name of Liberty.—No. 3.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

THE trouble with the liberty question is, as with a coat that has been pieced out over a figure for which it was never intended, either in measurement or style. Of course, there is no fit to it.

The “great majority” has childishly appropriated this coat, and is trying to struggle into it while it is perfectly plain that it can only “set well” on the individual man for whom it was originally constructed.

An elephant might wear his keeper’s jacket with the same grace with which the “people” can put on liberty. We often hear it said that “personal rights” are limited by “popular liberty.” “The greatest good for the greatest number,” has become a sort of war cry, when, per contra, there can be no “popular liberty” until personal rights have been secured; no good to any two until the good of the one has been secured. Just as long as it is possible for the liberty of one man, and he the weakest of them all, to be curtailed in any degree by law or in spite of law, then there is a point at which any, every and all other “liberties” are endangered. A man may forfeit his liberty, but never his right to it.

Liberty cannot be made plural in principle or application. It is liberty pure and simple; it cannot be added, subtracted, multiplied, nor yet divided. It cannot be shared; it is as personal as love, as sacred as salvation, and as individual as life.

“Give me liberty or give me death,” was no oratorical climax; it was the cry of a soul, and it finds an echo in every other soul that ever breathed.

We know that the conditions of human life in the days upon which we have fallen are such that the "inalienable" rights of man will be alienated more and more at every point which can be reached by iron-handed selfishness wearing the mask of love for "the people." The man will be made subservient to the mass in all the concerns with which human greed and ambition are identified, until the end of time. The individual will be so covered up by the populace that it will take the eye in which is all light, to find the ones when they have been merged into the many; and to every soul, many of them true but bewildered, the greatest surprise of a life time will be the discovery that each was its self alone, and not a part of the great over-mastering whole.

This has already happened. It is nothing strange to see a strong man break down when a personal interest has been manifested in his individual case; while he has cried out: "What! for me, just me?" He had not thought of himself as "just me" separated even in his hunger, loneliness, sinning, and need of salvation from the "rest of 'em" with whom he has struggled for "their rights," or with whom he had tramped and huddled in; with whom he had slept in a five cent lodging, or out in the field, or over on the "Lake Front."

We know that the world is massing for the final shock. "United we stand, divided we fall" is the truth to which the nations have pinned their faith. This old notion expresses a truth, which is a truth in the right place; but out of the right place it is grievous error.

"O my soul, come not thou unto their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor be not thou united; for in their anger they slew a Man." Gen. 49:6.

"The unity of the spirit" with the "bond of peace" (Eph. 4:3) is the only combination which is safe among men.

"United with Christ" we stand, divided from him "we fall;" every separate individual for himself, and not another.

We cannot hope to make the unbelieving world comprehend what liberty means to us, but there is one thing that we should be able to do; to preserve it as a doctrine of truth in all our dealings with others, and as a blessed experience in our own lives.

The more closely we come to the days when the mouth that "boasteth great things" shall proclaim "liberty" for the many, without reference to the one here and another there, with whom the many are in controversy because of truth; the more important, the more blessed will it be for each one to know for himself what liberty is, that liberty with which Christ has made us free; and to have it (with our life and all our other treasures) "hid with Christ in God." Col. 3:3.

THERE is no such thing as national Christianity. Christianity cannot be national; it cannot partake of any characteristics of earthly powers. There cannot be American Christianity and German Christianity, English, French, or Russian Christianity. Christianity changes that which it touches, but is not at all changed itself. It is the same everywhere, is altogether divine, and altogether what it was in the life of Jesus of Nazareth.

The Kingdom Promised to Abraham's Seed.

WHEN God said to Abraham, as in Gen. 13:15, "All the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever," he did not mean to limit that gift to the land of Palestine. The apostle Paul said that the promise to Abraham included the whole world. Rom. 4:13. In this grant God bestowed upon the father of the faithful all the territory of his kingdom, which he first gave to Adam, but which had been usurped by Satan. As Adam was placed in Eden and commanded to replenish the earth, beginning at that point, so Abraham's immediate seed were to be settled in Palestine, that from that section they might also spread and fill all the earth.

But Abraham's seed were not to be limited to his lineal descendants. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He [God] said not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." Gal. 3:16. Christ was the seed, then, upon whom this usurped territory was to be bestowed. It was his by right of creation, and as this was also to be included in his redemption, he, too, as the "seed" of Abraham, must be born in the land promised to Abraham, that his children might, from that point, multiply and fill the entire territory given to him. So, then, whoever gives himself to Christ becomes by that act the seed of Abraham, and an heir to the territory promised to his seed.

But, as in every other purpose of God, Satan attempted to thwart that promise, and on the ground that the territory being acquired by him from Adam, to whom it was first given, it was his to dispose of as he desired, without let or hindrance. Luke 4:6. God, who knows the end from the beginning, foresaw this attempt of Satan to make void his word, and so made known to Abraham something of what his people would meet before entering upon their promised possession. Appearing to the patriarch in vision one evening as the sun was sinking in the west, the Lord said to him: "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years."

This picture of the patriarch's seed being a nation of slaves in a strange land was not pleasing, but the assurance was also given that in the fourth generation they should return to their own land, and that they should then displace, as the emissaries of Satan, all the nations which would be found there. Gen. 15:12-21.

It proved as God had said about Abraham's people becoming enslaved by another nation. A severe famine throughout Palestine induced them to go down to Egypt for help, where they were reduced to slavery. Beginning to multiply and spread out over the country, the king became alarmed, and took counsel to repress them, lest they become so numerous and strong as to effect their liberty. Rigorous legal measures were therefore adopted by which their burdens would be increased. But this did not hinder their growth in numbers, so public orders were given to the midwives to destroy every male child born, in order to destroy the seed of that nation. The girls were permitted to live, because they might be readily assimilated with the Egyptians by marriage, and so add to the strength of that people, while the Hebrew nation would be constantly diminishing." Ex. 1:7-22.

Thus the power of a nation's decrees were brought to bear against the promise of God, that his people should return to occupy the territory assigned them. Had the strong measures prevailed which were proposed by the Egyptian government, the promise to Abraham would have been a failure, and God's word would have been broken. But this was not to be. By God's infinite power these people were redeemed from their bondage and planted again in their own land, making it appropriate for God to keep before them the saying, "I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Ex. 20:2.

This was the first time that the power of a whole nation was brought to bear against God's people, and for obvious reasons. Until it was made known that the territory usurped by Satan was to be conferred on the seed of Abraham, he stirred up no national effort against God's people, preferring to move against them singly. But when the oath of God was pledged to secure to some particular seed that to which Satan laid claim, he adopted tactics by which, if possible, to entirely blot out the descendants of Abraham, and so destroy the prospect of the "promised seed." Or, failing in this, the same purpose would be served by causing the literal seed of Abraham to be absorbed into other nations, in order to destroy the identity of the "seed" who was to inherit the promised possession.

But these devices of Satan were destined to fail; for the very introduction of the New Testament traces the lineage of Christ, the "promised seed," from Abraham to David, through fourteen generations, then from David to the Babylonian captivity, fourteen generations, and from that point to Christ, fourteen generations more, thus establishing him as the true seed of Abraham. Matt. 1:1-17.

Satan, however, could not foresee his own failure. Were not the nations of earth his servants? Could he not inspire them to work against the promise of God under one pretext or another? The work of the Egyptian nation to destroy the Hebrews was, therefore, his first organized effort in that direction. If not successful in that attempt, he might still follow after to divide and distract them, even to the opposition of their own national strength against the consummation of the oath of God, so that they would, in a frenzied way, call for the crucifixion of the "seed," in order to rid the earth of his presence.

But of the steps in national persecution upon the seed of Abraham, which led up to the rejection of the One upon whom the promise was to be fulfilled, must be reserved for future consideration.

J. O. C.

Is It a Coincidence?

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

It is a significant fact that those who are laboring so zealously to have Sunday enforced by law in this country speak of it as being "a seal," "a sign," "a mark," etc.

Thus: Mrs. J. C. Bateham, a prominent member of the W. C. T. U., in her Sabbath leaflet, No. 33, speaking of Sunday, says, "The Sabbath is the corner stone of Christ's kingdom. Let us recognize each recurring Sabbath as the sign of God's covenant. By this sign the world largely judges the depth of our Christian character, and by this sign God judges us."

Also at a large National Reform Assembly at Saratoga Springs, Rev. Joseph Smith, Moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly (1894), presented the following resolution:—

"Resolved, That the fundamental principles of the National Reform Association . . . are true and scriptural principles, and that these principles must control our national life, or we shall perish.

"Resolved, That the Sabbath [Sunday] is a sign between God and man, and its reverent observance a mark of the nation whose God is Jehovah."

Again: Rev. Dr. Burrell, at the convention of the Christian Endeavor Society at Paterson, N. J., in October, 1897, said: "God made a covenant with his people, and the Sabbath [Sunday] was the seal."

The careful student of the Bible will recall that in the Book of Revelation are found similar expressions (see Rev. 13:11-18), suggesting to his mind the possibility of the power brought to view therein and spoken of as causing all to receive a "mark" in their foreheads, etc., being none other than the United States.

Without deciding at first that this is so, he will feel that, if nothing more, it is a striking coincidence. But as he continues to ponder the symbols he will inevitably be led to conclude that it is after all not a mere coincidence, but a veritable fact that the one is the fulfillment of the other; that the prophet, under the symbol of the "beast" with "two horns like a lamb," is giving in outline a history of the United States.

Every student of the Bible, especially of the prophecies, knows that beasts, in symbols, represent earthly governments. Thus, the four beasts in Daniel 7 are distinctly said to symbolize four kingdoms. See verses 15, 24. Hence the two-horned beast in Rev. 13 is a symbol of some earthly government.

Reading the statements concerning this government carefully, the chief reason why it is given a place in prophecy will be apparent; it will use its power in the enforcing of a certain "mark," thus causing the people under its control to worship another power to whom this mark belongs. Hence the mark is a prominent feature.

As the enforcing of this mark involves worship, none can fail to see that whatever the mark may be, it must be something that pertains to religion.

Now it must be evident that whatever government is symbolized by the two-horned beast, and whatever may be the mark it is to enforce in fulfilling this prophecy, it will set forth something which is purely religious in character, and in the very nature of things much will be said concerning it as being the mark, sign, etc.

Moreover, it will be something which the beast, having the deadly wound that is healed, and in the presence of which the two-horned beast works (Rev. 13:1-10), claims as its mark. Of this there can possibly be no contradiction.

Now is it possible that the United States is the government symbolized by the two-horned beast?

It is a fact, as every student of the Bible knows, that all the great nations of earth, from the days of Egypt and Babylon down to our own times, have been subjects of prophecy, and it must be acknowledged that there is, apparently, no reason why there should be an exception in the case of the United States—a nation that is, from every standpoint, equal at least to the greatest of them.

Now scanning the whole field of prophecy we shall find that while all other nations of earth, from Egypt and Babylon down, have found a place in prophecy, the United States is excluded, unless indeed it is symbolized by the two-horned beast. Yet there is no nation in existence that is making prominent a religious institution which is called a "mark," etc., and which too is claimed by the power which received the deadly wound and was healed, unless indeed it is the United States. And yet again: there is no nation that answers to the description of the two-horned beast unless indeed it is the United States.

That being so we find an astonishing anomaly: that of a government foretold in prophecy which cannot be found in history; and of a nation that has no place in prophecy, yet doing the very work which this particular prophecy makes prominent, viz., of enforcing that which is called a "mark," and which is claimed by the power that received the deadly wound and was healed, as its mark.

But if on the other hand we find the prophet describing a government, as already set forth in this article, and we find too that this is the only nation that is doing a work similar to that specified in the prophecy, the conviction grows upon us until we become absolutely certain that the United States and the two-horned beast are one and the same power.

It is said that when the Emperor of Germany visits

Palestine, the Sultan will present him with a piece of ground which is the traditional site of the Last Supper. Much as we should rejoice to know that the sacred spot was in Christian hands, when we remember how the German emperor betrayed the Christian Greeks into the hands of the Turks during the late war, such a gift seems almost a mockery.—Christian Endeavor World.

The whole thing is a mockery.

What Science Has Done for Us.

New York "Staats-Zeitung"

In days of yore, ere science had advanced to its present high state of perfection, there were drunkards among us. Fie! How awful! Worse, there were regular "boozers"! Fie! How still more awful! To-day no such persons are to be found. We have, indeed, some people among us who are suffering from dipsomania. But that sounds very different. Moreover, such "boozers" used to be possessed of all sorts of nasty qualities and outward signs of their state. Such a fellow, for instance, would, in his disgusting state, see things double. That does not occur in our days. The most that can be said is that there are people suffering from amblyopia. But that sounds much better. On the morning after his dissipation a drunkard used to have all sorts of aches and pains. "His ears tingled," or he had "a head as big as a bass drum." "His hair hurt him," he had the "shakes," and the doctors brutally termed it "seediness." Suffering humanity does not know these things to-day. It happens occasionally that a man has an attack of tinnitus aurium, that his hair is subject to paræsthesia, that his frame is slightly convulsed by chorea. Such little ailments do not exclude us from society. The disgusting fraternity of "boozers" would also "be as blue as blue can be" when they sobered up and had not the wherewithal to have another bout. Science has left us to-day only people who suffer from "nervous attacks."

There were once upon a time a certain class of people called "smutty" (Schweinigel). They are dead and gone. There are, indeed, some people left who delight in telling nasty stories in decent society; but we call them erotomaniaes.

But the greatest gratitude we owe science is for its almost complete extirpation of crime. How thankful we feel when we remember that the thieves which formerly invested our cities are gone, and that only a few sufferers from chronic kleptomania are left! Those who do not appreciate sufficiently how little harm, comparatively, is done by pyromaniacs should talk to the few old people still living who saw the day when "firebugs" were dangerous to the community. Nor should we forget that to-day murder is solely due to hypnotism or any other old thing with a learned name.

WHATEVER is religious, cannot be non-sectarian; there is no religious body that is not a sect.

A "GRAND ARMY" commander at Oil City, Pa., writes us in regard to our issue of February 3, taking exception to what he calls our "attack on the teaching of patriotism in the public schools." That the flag salute teaches war, he says, "is not true, and you know it." "But," he adds, "I will tell you one thing: that the boys who made it possible for you to live under it [the flag], will also make it possible for your sect to respect it." In just what way this is to be done it is left to our imagination to depict.

WE do not take exception to the flag salute on the ground that it teaches war, but on the ground that it requires a confession of belief in God. We thought we had made this plain in all our references to the subject. It is a fact however that the "patriotism" which in these days is being taught to the children in the schools does embody the war spirit. It is a fact that this teaching is training them for war. The ideals which it sets before the children are military ideals. They are trained to be "patriots" in "boys' brigades" with guns in their hands and the tactics of military drill in their heads. And not even the kindergarten is exempt from the inculcation of this military "patriotism."

* * *

It is perfectly natural, however, that it should be so, even in this land where militarism is not deemed a political necessity; for it is only human nature to glorify war. It is human nature to glorify a triumph of physical force. The successful military commander is a hero always. The Bible says that "Greater is he that ruleth his own spirit than he that taketh a city;" but the human ideal—the man who gets the glory—is always the one who takes the city. Human nature ascribes no particular credit to the man who can rule his own spirit; yet it is undoubtedly true that such a man is qualified above all others to serve his country.

A MAN to whom some one has been sending the SENTINEL writes in quite a hostile strain from Petaluma, Cal. "I am sorry," he says, "if any of my friends have so far mistaken my character for loyalty to my country and my purpose to encourage patriotism and good citizenship as to think that I could tolerate or encourage a paper of the character of the AMERICAN SENTINEL. I care not what a man's religion may be as long as he does his duty as a citizen and a man; and I cannot think that in these enlightened times and in a republic like our own, a man's religion ought to impair his usefulness as a citizen. A man who complains of unjust laws and at the same time refuses to remedy those laws by his influence and his vote, is to say the least very inconsistent."

THERE are doubtless many others who take this view. It is getting to be a prevailing idea that a person's usefulness in this country is largely measured by his vote. This is due in part to the great importance which is attached to the ballot as an instrument of reform. The two ideas go together. People who are planning reforms in these days ("moral" reforms of course—nobody advocates any other kind) base their calculations upon the power they can expect to exert at the polls. The man who does not vote is looked upon as nearly if not quite useless in any way having to do with reform or the service of his country.

* * *

Now as a matter of fact, how much has really been accomplished by the ballot in the direction of reform? How much has been accomplished in the direction of better government and better conditions of life? Any person who keeps the run of current events can answer this question for himself. For example, here in New York City the effort has long been made to free the city from the control of "Tammany." But after years upon years of balloting, it remains a fact that Tammany was never more securely in control of the city than just now. For years the majority of the people have been dissatisfied with the government. They have wanted more prosperity. They have been convinced that the party in power has become corrupt. So they have gone to the polls and turned one party out and put in the other. They have kept on doing this for years; and to-day what is the result? The same cry of "hard times," the same reduction of wages and consequent strikes, the same cry of the unemployed, the same charges of veniality in high places, and of political corruption, are seen and heard now as have made themselves familiar in the past.

* * *

FOR years the workingmen have struggled to maintain what they view as their rights against the encroachments of the money power. They have put their tickets in the field and their votes in the ballot box time after time; and yet the conditions remain essentially the same now as they were before. The advantage, if any, remains on the side of wealth. The one fact which is becoming more and more prominent, in other lands as in this, is that commercialism is the "time-spirit" of the age; that it is money, above all other things, that rules.

AND still the "reformers" have not lost faith in the ballot as the proper instrument for their ends, but cling to it more fatuously than ever. The people, they say, are "going to" do something pretty soon. When the party in power manifests that it has "betrayed the people's confidence"—as it is regularly charged with doing nowadays—these reformers say, Wait; there is retribution in store for them; there is another election coming. And the country is still waiting for that great election when the people will at last see and do their "duty" just as the reformers see it, and overturn all political corruption and establish justice, honesty, and virtue upon the throne of government. This bright vision is the ignis fatuus of modern would-be reformers.

It is an old saying that the proper way to fight the devil is "with fire." Supposing fire to be the devil's weapon, this is saying that the devil must be attacked with his own weapons. And this is the plan upon which well-intentioned people have very often conducted their attempts at reform. But no genuine reform was ever accomplished in this way. The devil simply laughs at all such efforts. Let the weapons be such as he can use, and he will win the battle every time. God himself could not successfully fight the devil with his own weapons.

* * *

And this applies, in a way, to the ballot; for it is a fact that any evil-minded man or combination of men can make as much use of the ballot as could the most righteous person that ever lived. The very means which good people would use to accomplish the purposed reform, is used by evil-minded persons to defeat it. And by fraud, and the various resources known to the "ward politician" and the political "boss," they can and do make more effective use of this weapon than can be made by those who are honest.

* * *

THE weapons God has provided for use in the contest with evil are such as the enemy cannot use. God fights sin with grace; he fights error with truth, and darkness with light. And to us he has said, "Overcome evil with good." In our hands he has placed "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God," and which "is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword." Armed with these spiritual weapons, can the Christian exert any influence in the shaping of events? Can he make an impression for good upon those around him, and serve the interests of the country in which he lives? Let the mighty reformations which have from time to time swept through the land, overthrowing the strongholds of error and turning men from lives of sin and strife to the ways of righteousness and peace, answer the question. All great and lasting reforms from evil, have come by the Word of God.

REFORMS, great and genuine, have come through the proclamation of the truth; but no such reform ever came through the ballot, nor can it come in that way. "The power of a moral idea" set going in the field of publicity, —the power of truth, the truth of God, proclaimed in the ears of the people, the power of public sentiment, which the ballot may reflect but can never create—this is the power upon which the Christian depends to serve his fellow men, the land of his birth, and all the world. Upon this power the SENTINEL relies to accomplish its work. "Ye are the salt of the earth"—such is the divine word spoken to all genuine Christians. And this statement is the unimpeachable truth.

Judge Hagner's Decision Against Sectarian Appropriations of Public Money.

THIS recent decision, of which we made mention last week, is one of no small importance in its bearing upon the subject of state aid to sectarianism, of which there have been and are still, numerous examples in this country. The following extracts cover the leading points of the decision:—

"Whatever authority the Commissioners of the District of Columbia possessed with reference to the subject, they could only have acquired from Congress, which of course could communicate to them no powers it did not constitutionally possess. Whatever acts were forbidden by the Constitution to Congress with respect to the assistance of religious establishments, were of course forbidden to its agents the Commissioners.

"The statute undoubtedly authorized the isolating buildings to be constructed in the discretion of the Commissioners either on the grounds of two hospitals; or perhaps on other lands not belonging to any hospital. By the contract the Commissioners agreed they would erect the building on the grounds of Providence Hospital, to be paid for out of the designated appropriations, and would turn it over when completed to the officers of the hospital, on condition that two thirds of its entire capacity should be reserved for the poor patients the Commissioners might send there.

"It is conceded by the demurrer that Providence Hospital is a corporation composed of members of a monastic order or sisterhood of the Roman Catholic Church, and that the title to its property is vested in the Sisters of Charity of Emmettsburg, a non-resident corporation.

"One who erects buildings on the land of another has no right to remove them against the will of the land owner. Whatever title the United States might claim in a building constructed by it upon the grounds of Providence Hospital, would be a species of continuing joint ownership or co-partnership between the Government on the one part, and a sectarian corporation having its habitat in the State of Maryland, on the other. In furtherance of such a joint enterprise the Government, as one of the associators, might reasonably be expected to make further contribution, if the sum already given should prove inadequate, or the building be injured or destroyed; with perhaps a moral responsibility to any patient receiving injury because of faulty construction. . . .

"Mr. Madison, in the message vetoing the Alexandria church bill, after noticing that it enacts into law a number of rules relative to the organization and polity of the church, adds: 'This particular church, therefore, would so far be a religious establishment by law; a legal force and sanction being given to certain articles in its constitution and administration.'

"In like manner I conceive the agreement before me undertakes in behalf of the public authorities to give 'legal force and sanction' to articles in the administration of the hospital which 'so far, would be a religious establishment by law,' and for that reason illegal. It is also worthy of remark that the Commissioners agree to pay at a designated rate for the patients they may send there, 'subject to annual appropriations by Congress;' while Section 81 of the Revised Statutes of the District (which, by the Act of 1879, is applicable to the Commissioners) declares the Commissioners 'shall have no power to make contracts to bind the District except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and not until such appropriation shall have been made.'

"Besides, in the words of the provision before quoted, 'it is hereby enacted, that from and after the 30th day of June, 1898, no money appropriated for charitable purposes in the District of Columbia shall be paid to any church or religious denomination or to any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control'—which would render this obligation assumed by the Commissioners in the agreement incapable of performance after the date named.

"However incongruous such a joint ownership may be where the other party is non-sectarian in its character, I conceive it would also be an unlawful one, as against the spirit and purpose of the First Amendment, when such contracting party is a sectarian sisterhood or order under the auspices of a church or religious society."

"For the reasons given, I shall pass an order for an injunction against the treasurer as prayed in the bill with reference to the agreement of the 16th of August, 1897."

Against Churches on Reservations.

New York "Sun."

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15.—The House Committee on Military Affairs to-day voted, 10 to 3, against Representative Odell's bill giving power to the Secretary of War to authorize the erection of a building for religious worship by any denomination, sect, or religion on any military reservation in the United States. The bill, it was freely understood, was intended to settle the controversy which has raged for some months over the application of the Catholic Church authorities for permission to erect a chapel at West Point, where services were to be conducted under the auspices of that church. The desired permission was granted by Secretary Alger, a Protestant, and revoked upon the decision by Attorney-General McKenna, a Catholic, that it was illegal.

The bill was advocated by Mr. Mahany, and the opposition, led by Mr. Lentz, of Ohio, was based on the broad ground that the United States desired no places of worship on any of its reservations not under the control of its officers. It developed in the course of the discussion that several applications for similar privilege on other reservations are pending before the Secretary of War, made by Protestant bodies, and the buildings are already in existence on several military reservations. The bill received but three votes. After the committee adjourned Mahany introduced a bill directing the Secretary of War to order the removal at once of all religious edifices of any description whatsoever from the military reservations of the United States.

Statistics of Papal Activity.

"Sabbath Recorder."

CARDINAL GIBBONS, in the Catholic Mirror, Jan. 8, 1898, reports 1,500,000 as being educated in the Catholic schools of the United States at the present time; that "Missionary Bands" are carrying on work among non-Catholics in seventeen different dioceses, and that "30,000 persons are annually received into the Catholic Church in the United States" through conversion; 1,105 conversions have taken place in the archdiocese of Baltimore within the year. Surely that is a good showing for the future of Catholicism in the United States. And yet there are people who say, "There is no Catholic question in this country; Catholicism is dying out." A system which has fifteen hundred years of successful history back of it, and a million and a half of children under tutelage, in this country alone, is not yet ready to order its funeral appliances.

As almost everybody hereabouts knows, a state of serious dissension has arisen in one of the most prominent churches in this city, which has for a long period been under the pastorate of Dr. John Hall. We are informed that at a recent meeting of the church, the pastor "remarked that frequently people had said to him that they would like to attend his service regularly, but were unable to do so because they could not afford it;" and that "he took occasion to correct the impression that seats in the church cost hundreds of dollars, and pointed out that in the gallery they can be obtained for five dollars a year."

And what is the difference in that church between a five-dollar gallery member and a fifty-dollar front-pew member? What is the difference in the feelings of two such individuals as regards Christianity and the church? What is the difference in the view of the church? And what is the difference in the view of the world? And lastly but not least, what is the difference in the sight of God?

Can it be seriously expected that a church so conducted will be held together in the bonds of Christian unity?

The Sunday-Closing Movement in England.

"Present Truth," London, Eng.

MEETINGS and "demonstrations" in favor of the Sunday closing of public-houses are now the order of the day, the bishops and clergy no less than the Nonconformist ministers taking an active part in them. A regular campaign has been started. A correspondent sends us a report of one which he attended a few days ago, where the object of the movement was very plainly set forth. The chief speaker, a Wesleyan minister, after saying that "the public-house is the worst enemy the church has," declared, "If once we get the public-houses closed on Sunday, we shall go a step further and"—what? shut them up every day in the week? That is what one would naturally suppose, but no; it is not the purpose at all. Here it is "When once we get the public houses closed on Sunday, we shall go a step further, and stop all Sunday trade." That is the object, and the only object, of the Sunday-closing movement. Everybody has a right to engage in it who wishes to, but all should know that it is in no sense a temperance movement. It should be understood that it is but a step towards enforced Sunday observance.

But is it not going a little too far to say that enforced Sunday observance is the only object of this movement for the Sunday closing of public-houses? May not the diminution of the liquor traffic be also anticipated?—No; and the proof of this is found in the fact that it is constantly urged that the publicans themselves are in favor of Sunday closing. But no publican who proposed to continue in the business, was ever in favor of diminution in the sale of liquor.

Further proof that this Sunday-closing crusade is a compromise with the liquor traffic, by which the liquor dealers are to help "protect" Sunday in return for having their business protected, is furnished by so eminent a temperance worker as the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Daily Mail gives the following from a speech by him at a "temperance meeting" in St. Andrew's Hall, Bethnal-green, a few days ago; in which "he urged temperance people to concentrate their efforts on Sunday closing":—

"Even drinkers, he said, admitted that the closing of the 'houses' on Sunday would be an advantage, and he entirely disregarded the statements which had been made that beer served on the Saturday—that was, assuming Sunday closing was in operation—could not be drunk on the Sunday.

"That had nothing to do with the question, and was a side argument to throw them off the track. On the contrary, he predicted that if Sunday closing were in operation there would spring up a bottled beer trade which would insure fresh beer for those who desired it."

What could be plainer? To all drinkers he said in substance: "Don't be afraid that you will not be able to get your beer on Sunday. Join in with us to get the public-houses closed on Sunday, and if the beer that you buy on Saturday night does not last well over Sunday, be assured that a bottled beer trade will immediately spring up which will insure you all the fresh beer you wish."

It would please us much to see the liquor traffic stopped entirely. If only one-half the present amount were consumed, it would be a great gain. But when a given amount of beer is to be sold and drank in a week, it makes no difference when it is done. We marvel much at the blindness that has seized all these good temperance people. So strongly has the Sunday mania seized them, that they really think they are working for the cause of temperance, while deliberately planning for the undiminished consumption of liquor. Could there be a more striking illustration of the intoxicating nature of the wine of Romanism?

TENNESSEE has enacted a law against "flirting," and the first indictment, we are told, has just been found under it: We would suggest that the law be extended to cover flirtations of the church with the state, which has been causing serious trouble in that part of the country in recent years.

German Sunday Laws.

MERCHANTS MADE TO COVER THEIR WARES DURING CHURCH HOURS.

"London News."

THE German police regulations for the outward sanctification of Sunday require that all articles offered for sale, if not removed from their customary places, shall be covered during the "church hour." Photographers who exhibit specimens of their art in frames outside their rooms provide the frame with a blind, which is drawn down during the time in which exposure to the public gaze is unlawful.

The Berlin police authorities have lately given notice that the prohibition extends to the newspapers in the various trinkhallen. As a trinkhalle rarely contains any article which can be used as a veil or curtain, the women who sell the newspapers make use of old newspapers to conceal the copies of the latest editions. Hence the newspapers which are for sale lie hidden for a while underneath the unsaleable newspapers. The police regulations for the sanctification of the Sunday are thus sufficiently complied with, as the police authorities have graciously conceded that yesterday's or last week's journal is not considered by them to be an "article for sale."

VICE-PRESIDENT HOBART recently laid before the Senate a petition from the German American Union of Washington, D. C., asking for the opening on Sundays of the Congressional Library, the National Museum, and the Botanic Gardens, between the hours of 1 and 5 P. M. The proposed measure is favored by the leading papers of the city.

Studies in French History.—10.

"LET's see," said Charlie White to his friend Rob Billings, "who was the last king professor told us about last week?"

"Louis the VII., I believe," answered Rob, as he seated himself by Charles' side, to wait for the other scholars to arrive.

"O yes, I remember; and father said this morning that he was called Louis the Young."

"I wonder why," said Charlie. "He couldn't always have been young if he reigned forty-three years, as professor says he did."

"I expect they got into the habit of it. By the way, Charlie, the more I learn about France, the more anxious I am to go and see the place where these very things we are learning about happened."

"I think we will go, Rob, if we study hard."

By this time the teacher was in his place, and, looking around upon the happy faces before him, began:—

"Louis VII., while going to Paris one day, received word of his father's death, and so suddenly the weight of the kingdom fell upon his young shoulders. He however depended much upon that able counsellor of his father, Suger.

"The first trouble which he had was with the pope. Pope Innocent II. took it upon himself to appoint one of his nephews to fill the position of a bishop who had died. Louis was old enough, though young, to know that he was trespassing upon his rights as king, and he at once appointed another man, and declared that no pope should take such a liberty with him, while he lived. So the pope was angry and excommunicated him. At last in the midst of his troubles, Louis took the town of Vitry. His troops set it on fire, and in this fire 1300 people perished who had fled to the church to save themselves. The poor king was nearly crazed with grief, and so broken in spirit that he yielded to the pope without further trouble."

"This is not very much like some of the earlier French kings, it seems to me Dagabert, for instance, that fellow who ordered 9,000 people to be killed 'cause he didn't know what else to do with them," said Edna Philips, whose memory seemed never to desert her.

"Sure enough," said Professor Carman. "Now can you tell us, Edna, how long before Louis VII., Dagabert lived?"

"It must have been over 500 years, I think, sir."

"Well done. At last the king asked forgiveness of the pope, and decided to join St. Bernard in agitating the minds of the people, and getting them to start on another Crusade. You see King Louis felt in some way responsible for the death of those people who were burned, and the foolish man imagined that if he would allow St. Bernard to fasten a red cross on him, and then if he would fight the Turks, that would atone for all his sins.

"Louis' wife was so fond of popularity that she was among the first to wear the red cross. Suger remonstrated with Louis, but it was in vain, and the king raised an army of 100,000 men. This vast number was also supplemented by another army of people from all classes,—men, women, and even children."

"What! children go to war!" exclaimed Julia March. "What good did King Louis think it would do him or his cause to have women and children in his army? Really, professor, what did they go for?"

"This is simply an example on a large scale of religious fanaticism. History says that as soon as the word 'Jerusalem' was mentioned, 'the world in general became insane.' So you see as these idle crowds professed to be actuated only by a love of God, and a desire to help his cause, no one, not even the king, had the courage or the common sense either, to put a stop to their going."

"I believe the second crusade was a failure, if I remember correctly. Is that true?" asked Charlie White.

"Yes; it was a most miserable affair all around, and Louis was heartily sorry he had not listened to the advice of Suger."

"How long did Louis stay in Palestine?" asked Joe Palmeter, pencil and note book in hand.

"Only two years, Joseph, but they were years of mortification and unhappiness to the poor king. The Greeks had promised to help him, but failed, and the most of his brilliant army was either massacred or sold into slavery. Then his queen Eleanor demanded a divorce, because he had failed so miserably, and called him a coward. So after a while he yielded to her clamors, and both she and over half of the lands of the king passed over into the possession of Henry II. of England.

"While Louis was king of France, he adopted a national flag, called the Oriflamme. It was made of red silk, and it had tongues of gold on it. This was the flag of France for hundreds of years.

"Philip II. began his reign at the age of fifteen. He took a descendant of Charlemagne for a wife, which pleased the French people very much. The great aim of Philip seemed to be to spite and annoy the king of England. He used to listen to his father and Henry as they would meet under a large oak tree, and he was keen enough to notice, young as he was, that his father was always outwitted by England's king. So Philip determined that as soon as he got matters into his own hands he would make things lively for Henry."

"I wonder if Charlie and I can't see that same old oak if we should visit France,—oak trees stand and thrive for hundreds of years sometimes," said Robert Billings.

"I have no doubt you could, Robert, and it would be a fine sight, for three hundred men could stand under its massive limbs, but foolish Philip got angry one day and had it cut down."

"Didn't Philip II. have another name?" asked Joe Palmeter.

"Yes, he was called Augustus, and his father called him the 'God-given,' because he was so glad to have a son born to him," answered Professor Carman, as he touched the bell, signifying that they were dismissed.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Magnifying the Law.

"Now, Charlie," said Mrs. Ross, "we have seen the bold statements of the pope in regard to the law of God. He holds it only lightly, pours contempt upon it, and assumes power to do away with it."

"But, mama, has he ever done it?"

"Yes; that is, he has thought himself able to do it. In 'Butler's Catechism' you may find the ten commandments in the mutilated shape in which they are taught to the people. The second commandment is entirely omitted, as it would condemn the practice of making images for the purpose of worship, or as they say of worshipping God and the virgin, etc. The fourth commandment is almost entirely left out, and in order to make up for the loss of the second, the tenth commandment is divided into two, the ninth reading 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife,' and the tenth, 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods.'"

"What can God think of this, mama? It does seem as if Satan were trying to set up a rival government on earth, and has succeeded in gaining the world to an unknowing allegiance to himself. Now, mama, here I am nearly fourteen, and I never knew before that all this was foretold in the Bible and fulfilled by the papacy. Tell me what Jesus thinks about this?"

"I will let you come to your own conclusions by reading the Word of God. Turn to Isaiah 42:21. What does the prophet foretell about Christ's attitude to the law?"

Charlie read: "The Lord is well pleased for his righteousness' sake; he will magnify the law, and make it honorable."

"Tell me what it means to magnify anything."

Charlie opened the dictionary and read: "To make great or greater; to increase the apparent dimensions of; to enlarge; to increase the power and glory of; to exalt, to extol, to sound the praises of."

"I have a small magnifying glass in my hand. We will place it over the text 'God is love.' Now how does it appear?"

"Much plainer and blacker."

"Here is a daisy. Look at that."

"O, mama, how beautiful! I never knew a daisy petal was so lovely. It sparkles as if diamond dust were sprinkled through it."

"Has the glass brought out anything that was n't true?"

"No, mama. It has only shown up its hidden beauty—only shown us a little more clearly that 'God is love.'"

"Now what was Christ to do with the law?"

"Magnify and make it honorable."

"His attitude to the law was to be exactly the reverse of that of the papacy. Let us see how he fulfilled the prophecy. Turn to Matt. 5:17, 18, 19."

Charlie read: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."

"That settles it, mama. I knew the pope could not change God's law."

"No; he cannot. But each one of us may think our way better than God's. We shall be safe only as we humbly seek the grace of Christ, and walk meekly in the footsteps of him who has said, 'I have kept my father's commandments, and abide in his love.' One word on the magnifying of the law. How does the eighth commandment read?"

"Thou shalt not kill," said Charlie.

"When Jesus magnified it, how deep did he show it to be? Where did it reach?"

"Whosoever is angry with his brother . . . is a murderer."

"Yes; not only does the law prohibit the outward act of violence, but it guards the heart from even an unkind thought."

"What fulfills the law?"

"Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."

"And who is love?"

"God," said Charlie.

"Then if this love abides in us, we shall be God-like, or Godly, and then can we expect the world, the flesh and the devil to look with favor upon us? Still what shall we choose to do?—Take the side of him who thinks to change God's law, or the side of him who magnifies and makes it honorable?"

"O, mama, let us sing, 'I will follow thee, my Saviour—by thy grace I'll follow thee.'"

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 24, 1898.

A HEARING on the proposed District Sunday Bill, which has been for some time before Congress, has been set for February 25.

MISS FRANCES WILLARD, president of the World's W. C. T. U., died at a hotel in this city on the morning of February 18, from the effects of an attack of grippe.

No clearer proof that militarism s despotism could be furnished than that afforded by the facts which come to light in connection with the Zola trial in Paris. A republic, plus militarism, equals a despotism. We want no militarism here.

For the loss of two hundred and fifty-three brave lives, and the dark tragedy which has cast its shadow over the nation and pierced with a darker sorrow many family circles, every patriotic heart now beats in sadness and sympathy. The shadow of war is dark enough, even in time of peace. Let us hope that its horrors may not be extended further.

A BILL is before Congress, and has already passed the House, to pay $288,000 indemnity to the agents of the Methodist Book Concern of Nashville, Tenn., for damages occasioned by the occupancy of their buildings by the Federal troops during the war. It is not denied that the buildings had previously been used by the Confederate authorities for the manufacture of arms and for printing literature to further the cause of secession. The "Methodist Church South," it is well known, was in sympathy with the South during the war. Hence the claim that seems now likely to be honored by Congress rests solely upon the ground that the Concern was a religious institution. Congress is asked to do for such an institution what it would not do for a secular institution. It is a perfectly plain case of state aid to sectarianism; but unfortunately the minds of many legislators are so befogged by precedents which overstep the dividing line between church and state, that they are slow to see and follow right principles in such cases.

BISHOP POTTER is quoted as having expressed the following as his sentiments in reference to the incident of the DeLome letter, which has lately engaged the attention of this Government and of Spain:—

"I happen to know the gentleman. He is courteous and agreeable, but he has made a grievous mistake, and there is but one course for either country to pursue. The head of the government has been criticised, and there must be some public acknowledgment or apology by Spain. That letter was a terrible mistake, and De Lome's resignation does not release Spain from an apology nor this country from demanding one. It is not now a question of individuals, but of governments."

Is Bishop Potter aware that "this is a Christian nation"? or does he believe that it is good Christian conduct to demand satisfaction for slighted dignity?

THE inconsistency and inexpediency of trying to base the temperance issue upon the Sunday issue, is being illustrated in Passaic, N. J. The situation is told in the following press dispatch, under date of February 14:

"A mighty wave of reform has swept over Passaic, N. J.

"Yesterday the newsdealers there were not permitted to sell the New York newspapers after ten o'clock in the morning. This was in obedience to an order issued by Chief of Police Henry last week.

"The Chief of Police issued his order in the hope that the newsdealers would close their stores. Immense pressure was brought to bear on him by the saloon-keepers. The Board of Excise of Passaic lately put out a mandate ordering the saloons to close on Sunday.

"Twelve saloon-keepers, who have been fined $15 each for violating this order, brought their influence, it is said, to bear upon Chief Henry, and he promptly commanded all stores to close on Sunday, except drug shops, cigar stores, and candy stores. "They say, 'It's rum or nothing' on Sundays."

RECENTLY the Spanish minister to this Government made an uncomplimentary reference by letter to the President and people of the United States, and the country was greatly stirred by its discovery. Following this came the news of the blowing up of the warship "Maine" in Havana harbor, presumably by an enemy; and immediately there was great excitement everywhere and a loud call for decisive action by the Government against Spain. But for months the country has been almost an eye-witness of the spectacle of people dying of starvation by the hundred thousand on the shores of Cuba, and nothing that would compare with the present stir and excitement has been occasioned, although scarcely any one doubts that decisive action by this Government would put a speedy end to the Cuban horrors. This may be all consistent and proper from a political and diplomatic standpoint; but there is something curious about a situation where an uncomplimentary letter and the loss of a fine warship with two hundred and fifty-three men, terrible as this is, outweighs the slow and painful death of hundreds of thousands of human beings, including helpless women and children.

Decision Against Religion in the Public Schools.

A PRESS dispatch from Jefferson City, Mo., dated the 13th inst., states the following:—

"Attorney-General Crow has rendered an opinion to the State Superintendent of Public Schools which holds it unlawful for a teacher to require pupils to repeat the Lord's Prayer as a part of the opening exercises in the public schools of the State.

"It also holds that the reading of the Bible by the teachers as a part of the school exercises is contrary to the laws.

"The attorney general holds that these exercises are a form of religious worship and cannot be enforced upon the students under the State and Federal Constitutions."

If you fear God, you will not fear anything else.

THE man who is least patriotic generally does the most belligerent talking.

THE Omnipotent himself could not successfully fight evil with the devil's weapons.

In whatever thing there is justice, there is God. The two cannot be divorced.

THERE could be no worse exhibition of taking God's name in vain than that of parading it in the constitution of a civil government.

It does not take very much to convince the man who wants legislation to regulate the religion of the country, that he is a successor of the prophets.

BECAUSE it would be a great gain if the people would all do right, it does not follow that anything would be gained by making laws to compel them to do right.

In religion God is the governor, and there can rightfully be no other. How then can a "government of the people, by the people," rightfully concern itself with religion?

If it be true that "figures won't lie," how is it that the apostles of "Christian Citizenship" figure that the saints in this evil world are going to be able to outvote the sinners?

Do you want your own religious practice to be regulated by a state or national legislature? And if not, are you willing that such regulation should be imposed upon your neighbor?

THERE is a great struggle among the various classes in this country to-day, religious and otherwise, to monopolize the application of that phrase of the Constitution which reads, "We, the people of the United States."

To Preserve the Earth.

"YE are the salt of the earth." So said Jesus Christ to his followers, and the words remain true of his followers to-day. That is to say, the followers of Christ—Christians—are the preservers of the earth.

They are the preservers of the earth because they are Christians. And Christians are not of this earth, but have been "born from above." They are in the world, but not of the world. They have been "called out" from that which is of the world. Christ has chosen them out of the world, and the world recognizes this fact by hating them. John 15:19.

Christians therefore are the preservers of the world by being unlike the world. They are the "salt of the earth" by being unlike the world in which they are, even as salt is unlike that in which it is placed.

But to this statement that Christians are the salt of the earth, the Saviour added: "but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men." Matt. 5:13.

If the salt loses its taste, so that its presence in the food cannot be distinguished, it is good for nothing; it will neither season anything nor preserve it. And if Christians, in the world, become conformed to the world, they are good for nothing as preservers of the world.

And now for years it has stood forth as a fact before all the people, and one becoming ever more prominent, that those who profess to be followers of Christ, the members of the churches, are combining into organizations to work by political methods for the salvation of the state. Through methods which are of the world, and in the use of which they must be identified with the world, they propose to work for the preservation of the world.

While the Word of God which they profess to believe says that the world is preserved only by that which is unlike the world, they propose to preserve it only by that which is like the world.

It is perfectly plain, therefore, that as certainly as the words of Christ are true, the Christian Citizenship and kindred organizations who are working to get control of the popular ballot and to shape legislation, for the preservation of the state, in these very things are working directly for the destruction of the state. In just so far as they make use of these methods they become identified with the world and lose their identity as Christians; for as Christians, they are to pursue methods of work for the uplifting of mankind which rest not upon the power and wisdom of man, but of God; not upon the power of law, but of love.

Why cannot Christians see that in their Christianity—their separation from the world, their nonconformity to it, their very lack of identity with it in anything—lies the only guaranty of the world's preservation?

Bible Study with the "Christian Citizen."

BEFORE Israel entered the land of Canaan the Lord said of them, "Lo the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." Num. 23:9.

This said to them as plainly as it was possible to say that they, God's people, were not to be formed into a nation, a state, kingdom, or government, as were the nations round. They were to "dwell alone," a distinct and separate people, individually and collectively, in character and in government.

However, after they had entered that land and dwelt awhile there, they set their hearts on having a king, a state, a government, like all the nations. Therefore they said to Samuel, "Make us a king; like all the nations." This greatly displeased the prophet, and he prayed unto the Lord.

But the Lord said to Samuel, "They have not rejected thee; but they have rejected me that I should not reign over them." "Now therefore hearken unto their voice; howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them." "Nevertheless the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel; and they said, Nay; but we will have a king over us; that we may be like all the nations."

For Israel then to have any other king than God; for them to have any government than that of God; was to reject God. It was sheer apostasy. Of course Israel then did not believe it, and professed Israel now will not believe it. Yet the Lord said it; and it was true then and it is true now.

Israel was then the church. When they formed themselves into a state, that was a positive union of church and state. And when the church to-day form themselves into the state, or into a part of the state, that is also a positive union of church and state.

Perhaps the Christian Citizen will insist that there was not a union of church and state in Israel when the same identical individuals were members of both! This is its plea on such a condition in the United States; why will not the plea hold good on the same condition in ancient Israel?

The simple truth is that Israel had been called out of Egypt, separated from the nations, and formed into the church. And it was simply impossible for them to form, or have any connection with, any state, without in that very thing forming a union of church and state. It was impossible for any individual to do so without forming so far a union of church and state.

And still God is calling his sons "out of Egypt," separating them from the nations, and forming them into his church. And still it is impossible for these to have active connection with any state without in that very thing forming a union of church and state. It is impossible for any individual church member to have active connection with any state without so far and in himself forming a union of church and state.

The whole history of Israel, the whole history of the church in the Bible as well as out, the whole Bible itself demonstrates that this is everlastingly the truth.

For the professed people of God to interfere in the politics and affairs of the nations and attempt to decide these matters and to "run things," is to say to all people that the government of God is not enough for them; but they must make and run one of their own. They certify that the laws of God are not enough for them; but they must make a set of their own. It is only to say that the government, the kingdom, of God is not perfect, and that therefore its laws are not sufficient for them.

Of course all this is a clear repudiation of God as King, Governor, and Lawgiver; and a putting of their own selves in his place as all these.

Against the solemn protest of God ancient Israel did set them up a kingdom like all the nations. And the logical result was complete destruction.

Against the plain word and the same solemn protest of the Lord, the professed church of to-day persist in doing the same thing. And nothing can come of it yet but complete destruction.

So far as these "Christian citizen" folks are concerned, why was the Word of God written? What good are its lessons and warnings to them? "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say?"

A. T. J.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

WE have come far enough away from the beginnings of the Women's Christian Temperance Union so that we can look at it as history; and it has occurred to me that the story of it, from my own standpoint, might not be without interest to the readers of the SENTINEL, and might serve a purpose in bringing about a better acquaintance which would facilitate coöperation in many lines of work for the alleviation of the distresses of the world in these last days.

No body of Christian workers has ever been less understood by its natural allies than this one; while those who, for good reason, were its bitter enemies, had an instinctive understanding of it, which finds its counterpart in the knowledge which the rat has of the cat, or which the legion which possessed the poor demoniac of Gadara had of the gentle Presence which intruded upon him in his place among the tombs.

Those who have at heart the perpetuation of the liquor traffic and its kindred vices, have never had any doubt as to the source from which this organization sprung, nor of the danger to their interests which was folded up in the bud of the W. C. T. U. They have known that we must be watched; that we must be fenced against at every turn! They have been just as much afraid of us as though the prophet of the Lord had not said things which make it clear that as far as this world is concerned their traffic is safe; that it will increase in spite of all that we can do against it; its agents waxing worse and worse to the end of time.

In the beginning our women had, and many still have, but a superficial view of the evil known as the liquor traffic. It seemed to us at first to be a creature of human greed only; greed of money and of power which, however, could not be stronger, as we supposed, than the philanthropic instinct which we believed was in the nature of every man, if we could only find it, and to the search for which we set ourselves with diligent earnestness and faith.

It was after years of the most bitter experience that some of us discovered that the true source of the evil which we had been searching out was not in man; was, in fact, just as far beyond human power to produce, perpetuate, or to destroy, as was anything which concerned the destruction or the salvation of a soul; that indeed soul-salvation or ruin was the key to the situation; that the washing of the individual sinner from the pollution of appetite, greed, and selfishness of every sort was the solution of the problem; such washing as would cause the politician to cease to court the "saloon element" for votes; the drunkard for his treats; that the salvation of Christ was the only remedy for all who were entangled in the meshes of this multifarious evil; that the money, men, and politics, which lived upon it, and which in turn were kept alive by it, must be set at liberty, i. e., disentangled from error by the same truth by which Christ alone can give freedom.

It required years of heart-breaking effort at trying to close saloons by crusade prayers and by law; at trying to secure "local option" and so to quarantine each corporation against every other; as well as trying to pull men and women out of the fires of debased appetite, to bring us, in any degree, to comprehend the awful power that was incarnate in the liquor traffic.

One day about twenty years ago, at the annual session of the temperance convocation at Lake Bluff, Ill., a great light of truth flashed upon me and almost bewildered me by its terrible significance. Alcohol was Satan's counterfeit of the Holy Spirit of God; it was not simply a drug, an article of commerce, a thing of any sort; it was vastly more—it was the vehicle in which he had chosen to ride at the head of the hosts of destructive agencies in the world, as the antagonist of the gospel, and was absolutely invincible to human effort, unless led and directed by that "Mightier than the strong man armed," who alone could know how to circumvent his plans. No supernatural power can ever be overcome by natural means; only by some other supernatural power more mighty than itself. Alcohol was appropriate as the visible form in which the enemy of God and man should become incarnate. A quick subtle poison chemically unchangeable, and incapable of being so disguised as to modify its dire effects; a sword of sure destruction that cut through every sheath and left the keen, naked edge exposed and ready for its service of death. It was recognized in its true character as such a counterfeit as long ago as the day of Pentecost, when the people witnessed the display of divine power and were "all amazed and in doubt, saying to one another, What meaneth this? While others mocking said, These men are full of new wine." Not that the fullness of the Spirit of God would ever really simulate drunkenness, but a counterfeit "baptism of the Spirit," or, in other words, fanaticism, with which doubtless the apostles were charged, would naturally take that form.

The diabolical power with which this drug is invested has become very bold in its office as a counterfeit. Let any of my readers put it to the test. Take a sheet of paper and in parallel columns write what each proposes to do for its followers, and see that it has promised to its victims all that the Holy Spirit has ever promised, excepting one gift, and in that one exception it has gone beyond the divine Word with that recklessness that leads fools to rush in where angels fear to tread. It has not claimed to make men pure, but it has dared to promise to make them stronger; forgetful of poverty, shame, and sorrow; if not actually rich, honorable, and happy; at all events more satisfied in impurity than the Spirit of God could make them in all the purity which he could produce. It has to many made purity appear as contemptible, "womanish weakness," and uncleanness as the only true manliness.

"Be pure and you may be good, but you won't have half so much fun," is the text from which it has taught many a lesson in its effort to meet the influence of the Word which makes clean; and even men who have professed to be Christians have laughed out loudly and merrily at the aptness of the application.

The Second Organized Effort Against God's Kingdom.

ACCORDING to the Word of God (Gen. 15:13-16), the seed of Abraham was released from Egyptian bondage and persecution, to be returned to the land of promise. From the very beginning of the journey thither, the mighty hand of Jehovah was miraculously manifested in behalf of that seed, to preserve it from danger and death; first, at the Red Sea, and afterward in giving bread from heaven. He constantly gave proofs of his infinite power to save, that the people might forget the heathen sun worship of Egypt, and become loyal subjects of his kingdom.

On the way to Canaan God very properly set before these people, who were expecting to become members of his great commonwealth, the eternal law of his kingdom. Ex. 20:2-17. To this law they pledged obedience beforehand, which was evidence on their part of intended submission in full to Him who had chosen them to be subjects of his kingdom. Ex. 19:4-8.

Under this national compact, the literal seed of Abraham became temporal subjects of the kingdom of God established upon earth. Had they proved faithful to their part of the agreement, nothing could have prevented the restored territory from being eternally settled upon that nation. Like all succeeding generations, however, their resolutions were stronger than their power of action, and so they failed to carry out their well-meant promises.

In their self-will the tribes disagreed until two separate and distinct governments were maintained among them. The larger and civilly stronger government of Israel being separated from the religious center which God had established in Judah, they chose one of their own, and thus gradually drifted into the sun worship of the nations by which they were surrounded.

But for all this, God did not cast away the people which he foreknew. His long-suffering patiently endured them, until they utterly turned away from him to worship the host of heaven, and to serve Baal. 2 Kings 17:16. With the power of God thus lost to them, it was a favorable moment in which to attempt the overthrow of that people, and thus prevent the fulfillment of the oath of God, that the seed of Abraham should possess the land. As the usurper of the territory, Satan claimed the privilege of bestowing it on whomsoever he desired. Luke 4:6. But notwithstanding this, God had, without his consent, promised it to the seed of Abraham, and confirmed that promise by a solemn oath. Heb. 6:13-18. From that time forward every effort of Satan was bent in the direction of making a war of extermination upon the people thus favored of God, and so preventing the fulfillment of his promise.

That work began in Egypt by a law of the government requiring all the male children of that nation to be killed as soon as born, in order to destroy the promised seed. This proving unsuccessful, they were pursued into the promised land and there harassed toward the same end. But the people, becoming established, soon became numerous, and promised to spread over the entire earth. To destroy the promised seed under such conditions, they must be separated, and so weakened in their hold upon the territory held by them.

Accordingly, in the ninth year of Hoshea, king of Israel, the Assyrian army came and took the people of Israel out of their land, and carried them away, scattering them among the heathen nations of the far East. 2 Kings 17:6. But this was not all. The king of Assyria brought heathen from Babylon, Cuthah, Ava, Hamath, and Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria from whence the Israelites had been taken, that they might possess the land. Verse 24.

The victory in this case was supposed to be made doubly sure. Not only were ten of the tribes removed from their possession and placed among the heathen, there to lose their identity with the promised seed, by being swallowed up among other nations, but heathen were brought into the Lord's inheritance to change the customs and worship of that country, and to influence the religious relations of the remaining tribe of Judah, by forming marital connection with them. This was an organized national effort to thwart God's promise on a grand scale.

Had not the people of Judah been specially protected, this effort would have been their overthrow, as well as the ruin of Israel. A strong antipathy sprang up between the two peoples, so that it came to be well understood that the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans. John 4:9. Satan may have thought his scheme of removing by force the larger part of the literal seed from Canaan, to be a success. But God would not permit his oath to Abraham to be thus easily violated. The promise to the patriarch's seed was not dependent on the tribes removed. Judah was yet left, and from among its thousands would in due time come forth Him who was to be ruler in Israel. Micah 5:2.

God's promise was not to the seeds of Abraham, as to the whole of his descendants, but to one Seed, which is Christ. Gal. 3:16. Judah was reserved for the territory, and its tribe for the people, through which that Seed should be revealed. It would almost seem as though the adversary of God in some way learned this truth, for in due time his third national effort to wipe out the seed of Abraham was directed against that people, as will be developed in a further study of this subject.

The Papacy Asking State Aid.

IN no wise abashed by the rising sentiment against state aid to sectarianism, as seen in the attitude of Protestant churches and in decisions of the courts, the papal authorities in this country continue to ask for Government aid for their sectarian schools.

The latest instance of this of which we have notice is a plea made by Archbishop Ryan, before a committee of U. S. Senators, on February 3 last. It has been the policy of the Government to gradually reduce the customary appropriations for these schools, and the archbishop asked that no further reduction be made in the amount appropriated for 1898.

He presented a number of arguments in support of his plea; but not one of them was based upon any principle of justice or free government. Of course, no such principle will support an argument of that nature. His arguments were based on policy purely, and from the standpoint of policy they were somewhat plausible.

But in government, as in other matters, "honesty is the best policy," always. Let the Government be honest with the people's money.

The archbishop touched at some length upon the subject of sectarianism, and his remarks upon this topic are interesting, if not convincing.

"This word sectarianism, gentlemen," he said, "is the most thoroughly misunderstood, and at present perhaps the most mischievous word in the English language. Properly speaking, sectarianism is the religion of sects, that is, of bodies cut away—as the term implies—from the original church. Unsectarian religion is the religion of that original church. But this is not the meaning popularly attached to it. Webster defines as sectarian 'one of a party in religion which has separated itself from an established church or which holds tenets different from those of the prevailing denomination.' Now as we have no established church, for union of church and state in our circumstances is out of the question, and there is a dispute as to which is the 'prevailing denomination,' a 'sectarian' is not easy to find. For a man to preach unsectarianism it is supposed that he must avoid all doctrines in which he may disagree with any one of his audience. Now as every doctrine of Christians has been denied by some one, unsectarian preaching is simply impossible when the audience is representative of all shades of religious opinion. What is called unsectarian teaching is attempted in some of our public institutions by what are known as 'moral instructors,' but it is sometimes the most sectarian of all teaching, as it represents simply the peculiar religious views not of a body, but of the individual who teaches."

"One can therefore easily see that what is so-called unsectarian religion is logically impossible; and even if it existed, could not practically affect individual morality."

As regards the logical impossibility of unsectarian religious teaching, the archbishop's remarks are sound. There is simply no religious body in the world to-day which must not, from the human standpoint, be regarded as a sect. And this being so, the archbishop's definition of sectarianism is of no practical value. As the Memorial of the Baptists and Quakers to the legislature of Virginia, truthfully said, "It is . . . impossible for the civil magistrate to adjudge the right of preference among the various sects professing the Christian faith, without erecting a claim to infallibility." It remains for God to reveal to the individual, by his Word and the Holy Spirit, what is the true religion,—the religion of the "original church."

But as regards the appropriation of public money, it is not necessary to consider which is the original church and which of the religious bodies are sects; for it is not the province of civil government to give public funds to the original church any more than to a sectarian body. The principle upon which this fact rests is simply that it is not justice for the civil government to favor one party or class of the people at the expense of another class. This is a Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," and under it all classes must be treated alike. The believer must not be favored at the expense of the unbeliever. The latter must not be forced to contribute to the support of any religion, whether sectarian or otherwise.

"Gentlemen, we do not ask money from you to teach our religion, but to impart secular education, the value of which you can test by your own inspectors, as is done in Protestant England. If, in addition to this secular learning, we by the influence of religion make these Indian children purer and better now and more obedient to authority when they become men, will you reject our services simply because we teach the religion that has civilized the world?"

The chief quality of this paragraph is assumption. What religion is it that has "civilized the world"? Is it the Roman Catholic religion? or is it the Protestant religion? or the Jewish religion? Or has any religion done it? These are questions which cannot be settled by the word of an archbishop; nor is it the business of any committee of Congress to consider them. Congress has no more right to base an appropriation of public money upon the assumption that the papal religion has civilized the world, than it has to throw the people's money into the sea. Congress has no business whatever to pronounce, either directly or indirectly, upon a religious question.

Will the papal religion, also, make the Indian children "purer and better" than they would be without it? This also is pure assumption, and one which many other people, both religious and otherwise, would deny. And that, as the archbishop stated, the papacy does not ask for state money to teach religion, but to impart secular education, is a piece of very thin sophistry. These Catholic Indian schools are religious schools, and were it not for the religion which is taught in them they would not exist at all. For a prelate of the Catholic Church—or for that matter, of any church—to claim that religion is not the main thing in the eye of the church, is simply absurd. Religion is that upon which the church depends for her very existence; it is the mainspring of all her action.

Anyone familiar with Catholic literature knows that “secular education,” apart from religion, is frequently denounced in it as being worse than no education at all. But if any person, despite all other proofs, were still inclined to regard Rome as the friend of secular education, he has but to look to those countries in which Rome rules, or has ruled until recently, to find evidence which will convince him if he is open to conviction. Where, outside of the wilds of central Africa, would one go to find ignorance and superstition so dense and presenting such an impassable barrier to right and reason, as in the priest-ridden districts of Ireland, Mexico, or South America? To any one familiar with geography, it is impossible to dissociate in the mind the mention of one of these countries from the thought of a land where the masses of the people spend their lives in ignorance, superstition, and poverty.

If the archbishop had presented a true statement of the case, he would have spoken like this: Gentlemen, unless the United States Government pays for the maintenance of our Catholic Indian schools, the church will have to maintain them herself. But the church does not want to do this. It is true they are church schools, wholly under the church’s direction and control, and in which the foremost consideration is to bring the pupils into the Catholic fold; but we would like the Government to stand the expense, while we reap the benefit. Remember, gentlemen, that it is the bounden duty of the Government to educate these “wards of the nation”—in the Catholic belief. So, gentlemen, I ask that you will kindly appropriate the people’s money for this purpose; and if this is against their will, let it be remembered that the people ought not to have any will that is contrary to the Catholic Church.

And besides, it is a settled principle of our belief that the state ought to support the church; and this principle, which by the way is a very important one, seems in danger of being discarded here in the matter of these Government appropriations. Hence I particularly ask that the same be continued undiminished to the Catholic schools, since each such appropriation is a recognition of this principle as being just and right.

And remember also, gentlemen of the committee, that it will cost considerably more to build and maintain Government schools for the Indians than it costs to maintain our church schools, since these are already built and employ teachers who, having devoted their lives to the church, work for religion’s sake and not for money. Therefore to proceed upon the principle of separation of church and state, will cost you thousands of dollars; and I ask you to consider, gentlemen, whether it will pay to revert to constitutional principles of government at the cost of so much money.

This is what truth would compel one to say, and substantially all that one could say, in asking state aid for the maintenance of sectarian schools. Such aid is simply a misappropriation of money,—a use of it never authorized by those to whom it belongs. The state in giving such aid does that which, in the case of a private individual, would be counted a crime to be punished by a term in jail. The papal authorities ask that the state shall continue to do this, notwithstanding it has begun the establishment of a contrary policy. The SENTINEL asks that the Government discontinue these misappropriations and adhere to the foundation principles of free government, at whatever cost in money. The right way will be the cheapest way in the end.

We note, however, the statement made editorially in the journal which reported the archbishop’s plea—the Catholic Standard and Times, of the 19th inst.—that “We have just learned that since his plea was delivered the Senate committee has decided to recommend an addition of ten per cent. to the appropriation already voted by the House.” This certainly justifies calling the attention of the American people to the subject as one of practical interest to them at this time.

A Lamb-like Government.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

ADDITIONAL evidence that this nation is the one symbolized by the “beast” of Rev. 13:11, is furnished in the description that the prophet gives of the beast. It has two horns like a lamb.

Whenever, in the Bible, a lamb is used as a symbol, it is always to represent Christ. See Rev. 5:6, 8, 12. And more than once we hear John the Baptist speaking of Christ as “the Lamb of God.”

Therefore the conclusion is inevitable that the two-horned beast, which is lamb-like, symbolizes a government, which, in its national capacity, is like Christ. In other words, such a nation would be established upon principles which are in harmony with the utterances of Christ concerning governments.

That being so, we may rest assured, beyond the shadow of a doubt, of the correctness of the application of the symbol; for in all history, from the days of Christ, there has absolutely never been a government founded upon principles taught by Jesus Christ excepting that of the United States of America.

Jesus Christ taught there are duties devolving upon every member of the human family that are of such a nature that it is impossible for any earthly tribunal to successfully take cognizance of them; duties which in the very nature of things can be discharged only when the heart is regenerated, washed in the blood of the Lamb.

The first duty incumbent upon all mankind, and in the same degree to all, no more, no less, is: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." And another duty that grows out of this is: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

But where is the nation that can enforce this duty? The only power that any government can use in enforcing its requirements is force: force, too, that is represented by policemen's clubs. But all the clubs of the whole police force of the United States cannot instil one particle of love for God, or anybody else, into the human heart. They can reach no further than a man's skull, and at their very best only club his brains out, and put him where he cannot possibly love either God or man. But one reason why it is the first duty of man to love God with all his heart is that without this element being there it is absolutely impossible for him to comply with a single requirement of the Almighty, for "on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." "Love is the fulfilling of"—not a substitute for—"the law."

Again, the Bible teaches the absolute equality of all men. For instance: "There is no respect of persons with God." Rom. 2:11. And in Acts 17:26 we are told that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." Again: "Every one of us shall give account of himself to God." Rom. 4:12.

In order that this can be done properly—whether the account is good or bad, man has been endowed with liberty—liberty to serve or not to serve God, as man himself pleases; or if he chooses to serve God, to do it in a way that shall be pleasing, or not pleasing, to God.

This is his natural right; God has so endowed him. Without it true service could not be rendered to God. This liberty is usually spoken of as "liberty of conscience." This is shown in the language of Christ: "If any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not." John 12:17.

Now any government which should in practice recognize these principles with reference to earthly governments would indeed in this respect be Christlike or lamb-like.

But as before stated, the United States, of all nations, is positively the only one that has so recognized them. The following expresses the position of this government: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."—Declaration of Independence. And also: "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."—The Constitution.

"The intent of the lawgiver is the law," is a legal axiom. Just what was intended by the above may easily be learned, and therefore what the law really is.

Washington says, "Every man who conducts himself as a good citizen, is accountable alone to God for his religious faith, and should be protected in worshiping God according to the dictates of his own conscience."

Jefferson took a prominent part in bringing before the General Assembly of Virginia a bill which was carried, entitled "An Act for Establishing Religious Freedom." A few brief extracts will show what Jefferson's convictions were on religious liberty. "Well aware that Almighty God hath created the mind free; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burdens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet choose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his Almighty power to do . . . that our civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions, more than our opinions in physics or geometry . . . that it tends also to corrupt the principles of that very religion it is meant to encourage, by bribing, with a monopoly of worldly honor and emoluments, those who will externally profess and conform to it . . . that to suffer the civil magistrates to intrude his power into the field of opinion and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles, on the supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy, which at once destroys all religious liberty. . . . Be it, etc."

And in a letter to Rev. Mr. Miller, Jan. 3, 1808, he says: "I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, disciplines, or exercises."

These expressions, and many others, are summed up in what Bancroft, the historian, says: "Vindicating the right of individuality even in religion, and in religion above all, the new nation dared to set the example of accepting in its relations to God the principles first divinely ordained in Judea. It left the management of temporal things to the temporal power; but the American Constitution, in harmony with the people of the several states, withheld from the Federal Government the power to invade the home of reason, the citadel of conscience, the sanctuary of the soul; and not from indifference, but that the infinite spirit of eternal truth might move in its freedom and purity and power."

Thus the United States adopted the principle of government that Jesus Christ taught; thus it became lamb-like, and being the only nation that ever did it, it is proven beyond a doubt that the United States is the Government symbolized by the two-horned beast.

A SUNDAY law for the District of Columbia is an entering wedge which is designed to sever all connection of the Government with the principle enunciated in those words of the Constitution: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Let the friends of liberty look out for the entering wedges.

THE topic of all-absorbing interest for some time past has been that of war with Spain. There are a great many people in this country who think we ought to have war with Spain over the blowing up of the "Maine;" this is evident from all reports that come to us, making the most liberal allowance for journalistic "inaccuracies." And not a few of these belligerently-minded people occupy the position of ministers of the gospel of Christ.

OF course, if "this is a Christian nation," there will be no war; for even should it be proved that an act of treachery caused the disaster to the "Maine," the nation would forgive the offense, which would probably be all that Spain would require. It cannot be denied that Christianity requires the forgiving of offenses, however wanton and injurious these may be, and forbids taking revenge upon an adversary. "Dearly beloved," it says, "avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath; for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord."

* * *

BUT it is needless to say that no such considerations will govern in the case; for this is not a Christian nation, and depends not upon God to fight its battles, but upon its army and navy. No Christian nation ever found it necessary to maintain an army and navy. No Christian ever found it necessary to preserve his standing and maintain his interests among his neighbors by carrying about with him a loaded revolver.

* * *

WE have heard of "Christians" who were willing to prove their Christianity by fighting any person who might call it in question. This may be rather an extreme case; still it is quite in accord with the dictates of the natural heart, and quite as convincing an argument as would be furnished by carrying out the warlike suggestions of some of the preachers. The tendency of the times is toward making a person's willingness to fight a test of his Christianity. If he does not believe in fighting he is set down as not patriotic; and the worst denunciations he will receive will come from the pulpit and the religious press.

"WELL, then, should not an individual do any fighting in this world at all?" This is a natural question, and can be very easily answered. The purpose of God in the gospel does not contemplate that we shall do no fighting in this world; on the contrary it provides that every person who will conform his life to it shall have all the fighting he can possibly want. It simply substitutes another object of attack for that which the individual, left to himself, would naturally choose. In place of "the other fellow," it points him to self as his worst enemy, and directs him to exert all his energies to conquer that. It declares—and very truthfully—that "greater is he that ruleth his own spirit, than he that taketh a city."

* * *

THERE is nothing figurative about this; it is intensely real. The only person who could doubt its reality would be he who never tried to live the Christian life. The fight with self is a battle royal. The gospel provides a harder battle for the believer than any that he would ever engage in without it; but at the same time it gives him a perfect assurance of victory. So the individual who likes to be belligerent need not pass the gospel by for fear that he will not have ample scope under it for the exercise of his combativeness. He need not fear that it will make of him a weak, supine creature because it requires meekness and forbearance toward all men. On the contrary it will develop in him the strongest possible character. Moses was reputed as being the meekest man on the face of the earth; but he was at the same time the strongest and most fearless character of his time. The man who is master of self has attained to the pinnacle of human greatness, whether he be recognized as great by the world or not.

* * *

GOD is not fighting men; on the contrary he is working to save them, without distinction of class or nation. Must it be thought strange, then, that he does not want men to be fighting and killing each other? God is fighting the evil that has established itself in the human heart; he is fighting the selfishness which is man's mortal enemy. And if men had the will and the courage to coöperate with God in fighting self in themselves, there would be no occasion for all the fighting that they are so ready to do with one another.

SELF is always ready to fight—some one else. There are individuals who go about the country making a business of fighting. Was ever one of them known to be willing to fight self? They glory in the thought of being able to master other people; but not one of them is master of himself. They are conspicuously subject to their own passions. They are slaves to their worst enemy. No other possible foe can bring upon them so much evil; no other can bring them to such a fearful destiny. It is the settled purpose of self to plunge the soul into ruin for all eternity; for this it is working every hour and every moment. Why then cannot men see that their first business as fighters is to fight self; that they are to be masters of themselves first of all? He who is not master of himself is not fit to be master of anything else; and as long as men are not masters of themselves there will be no end to their efforts to be masters of each other.

HOWEVER, we believe it safe to say that there will be no war with Spain over the loss of the "Maine." The issues which determine peace or war in these days are different from those which settled the question centuries ago. This is the age of commercialism. Commercial interests dictate the policy of nations. The "great powers" will unhesitatingly make war upon any weak tribe which refuses their trade. England forced the opium trade upon China; and only recently China was forced to accept a loan which she did not want from England and Germany. When there are weighty financial reasons for war, war is very apt to follow; but war in this day, when it costs thousands of dollars to fire a big gun even once, and when millions of dollars are put into a single warship which may be sent to the bottom of the sea by a single blow, is a very costly undertaking; so that usually financial considerations weigh heavily in the opposite direction. Spain is reported to be bankrupt; and however well a nation may be supplied with patriotism, it cannot go to war if it is not supplied with gold.

* * *

By the way, can any one tell why it is that government officials are so chary about giving any news relating to important matters out to the public? These officials are always pledged to the strictest secrecy regarding all information in possession of the Government of such a nature as would naturally exert a powerful influence upon national action, as for example the discoveries relating to the disaster to the "Maine." Why are the people left for days and perhaps weeks to feed upon newspaper lies? We had always thought that in this country the people themselves were the real government, and that those in office, from the President down, were the servants of the people; and we never knew it was the proper business of a servant to conceal from his master important information concerning the latter's business. Where do these officials get their authority for such a course? Not from the people, certainly. Do they really consider themselves the servants of the people? or do they regard themselves as their rulers? Cannot the American people be trusted? If they cannot, then the sooner the pretense of self government is abandoned, the better. But we believe in a government by and for the people.

* * *

It seems that a movement is on foot which has in view the appointment of the pope to arbitrate the difficulty between the United States and Spain. The pope, it is said, is the only arbitrator Spain would accept, and doubtless Leo himself would not decline an invitation to act in that capacity.

Church and State in Brazil.

THE constitution of Brazil guarantees perfect liberty to all religious denominations, and declares, "A free church and a free state, without which there could be no self government."

This is all that any one could ask, providing it meant what it says; but when we come to the practical workings of religious liberty we find liberty to be somewhat wanting. As long as not much is said against the established religion and customs of the country all goes very well, but when the Word of truth is proclaimed, setting forth the gospel as the power of God unto salvation and that the church is subject to Christ, and that he is the head of the church, we are sometimes called in question.

The following facts will serve to show some of the religious freedom enjoyed by Protestants in Brazil.

Not long ago a Protestant colporter was selling Bibles and religious books in the State of Espirito Santo and one evening he was seized, dragged into a store, and there tantalized until midnight by an impudent crowd of men, and all of his books and Bibles were taken from him and burned in the street.

In the State of Rio de Janeiro, a Protestant minister was holding meetings in a village, about twenty five miles from the city of Rio de Janeiro, and one evening during service the building in which the meetings were being held was surrounded by a furious mob of Roman Catholics and the windows were broken in, the minister thrashed, others beaten with sticks, some cut with knives and as soon as possible they fled to the woods for their lives.

The minister appealed to the proper authorities for redress, but he could not get a hearing. The authorities told him that he had better not go there any more and then there would be no more trouble.

A month or so later I visited the same village and while there I had an interview with a prominent Roman Catholic of the place relative to the recent trouble, and he said he did not approve of mob violence, and then he went on to explain that the mob was composed of the lower class of Catholics. I asked him why he did not protest if he did not approve of the disturbance. "Well," said he, "I haven't anything against Protestants enjoying their own religion, but I don't think they should be teaching it in Catholic communities."

I then told him that, according to his idea, the commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel," should read, "Go ye into all the world, except where there are Catholics, and preach the gospel." He smiled, and after a short conversation on the topics of the day, I thanked him for the privilege of so pleasant an interview and departed.

About six months ago, in the State of Santa Catharina, a Protestant minister, accompanied by two colporters, held a series of meetings and as a result about forty Germans embraced the new faith and many of them were baptized and a Protestant church was organized.

Many in the place who rejected the influence of the gospel and its power to save, became displeased with the new doctrine (the gospel pure and simple), and one man had his two daughters, young ladies, arrested and put in jail for being baptized and keeping the Sabbath (seventh day) as it was contrary to the religion and the customs of the country, and against his personal wishes. Several others were put in jail for the same offense(?) and they were held there a week, but their testimony was the same when they were released as when they went in, "We cannot help but believe the things which we have seen and heard." When the minister and the colporters were leaving the place, they were overtaken by a furious mob, armed with guns and clubs, and after a few minutes' babel, a man struck one of the colporters on the head with a club and then the mob dispersed.

The colporter was carried away for dead, but he finally rallied and it was three days before he regained consciousness. Before he was able to walk the officers of the place came and demanded his presence at the court. He told them that he was too ill to go, and they dragged him out of bed, but on finding that he could not walk they left him with orders to appear as soon as able. A few weeks later he appeared before the court to answer for, he did not know what. He had done nothing but what he had a perfect right to do. He was called in question for filling the place with his doctrine. He was not the minister, he was only assisting in the meetings and had been nearly killed for it, but that was no matter; he was one of the company; so with Bible in hand he answered the questions and was finally released with the charge not to speak at all nor teach any more in that place.

The question may arise as to what was done with the man who gave, what he hoped would be, the fatal blow. Nothing at all was done with him. The colporter went on his way rejoicing that he had been counted worthy to suffer for the name of Christ, and praying for his persecutors that they might learn better and do better.

These are some of the practical workings of religious liberty(?) in Brazil, but if the people knew better no doubt they would do better.

Before closing I wish to say that the foregoing has not been written with any feelings against Brazil and her people, but simply to set forth the facts as they exist. There are many good people in Brazil and all they lack is the great principles of truth which are able to perfect them in righteousness. The gospel is spreading over the land and some are yielding to its saving power.

The motto on the Brazilian flag is, "Ordem e Progresso" (Order and Progress), but it is a progress in evil without much order. Just to the extent that the people receive the gospel, just to that extent is the reformation taking place and no further.

With sword and bayonet the government has been trying for years to make the people better, and every charge makes them worse, but where the gospel is received into the hearts of the people there they have no use for the sword. How different the effects of compulsion and persuasion! One is a savour of death unto death, and the other a savour of life unto life. W. H. THURSTON.

Catholic Doctrine Relating to Public Schools.

IN a recent Encyclical to the bishops of Manitoba, the head of the Roman Catholic Church speaks as follows on the subject of the "rights" of pupils in the public schools:—

"The matter is indeed one of very great and very weighty moment. We wish to bring to mind what seven years ago the legislators of the province of Manitoba decreed in session; who indeed took away a right which the laws of the Canadian Confederacy had established, namely, that Catholic children had a right to be taught and educated in the public schools in accordance with their conscientious beliefs."

Catholic children have a "right" to be taught the papal religion at public expense, and no other religious belief has any right to be taught at all. The Encyclical says on this point:—

"Wherefore it is as foolish to wish to imbue minds with right moral principles while they are allowed to be deprived of religion as to call them to recognize virtue when the fountain of virtue has been removed. Now, to a Catholic the Catholic religion is one and the only one; wherefore he can neither accept nor recognize any moral or religious teaching unless it is sought for and derived from intrinsic Catholic sources. Therefore justice and reason demand that the school supplies to every scholar not only a knowledge of literary character, but also, as we have said, that knowledge of morality joined with precepts taken from our religion without which assuredly all education will be not only unfruitful but injurious. From which these consequences naturally follow; the teachers must be Catholics, and the books from which the scholars are taught must be such as the bishops approve. There must be unfettered power of arranging and ruling the discipline, so that the whole system of teaching and of learning shall exactly agree and coincide with the belief of the Catholic faith and the duties which thence arise."

Catholic children have a "right" to be educated in Catholic doctrine at public expense.

All education which does not embody a "knowledge of morality joined with precepts taken from our [the Catholic] religion" is "not only unfruitful but injurious."

The state evidently has no right to give anyone an "unfruitful and injurious" education.

Hence the state ought to teach every pupil in the public schools, Protestant and Catholic, the Roman Catholic religion, and has no right to teach them anything less or contrary to it.

This is Roman Catholic doctrine on the subject of the duty of the state in relation to the public schools, as enunciated by the highest Catholic authority, and published in the Catholic Mirror.

Please bear it in mind.

Studies in French History.—XI.

"Of whom were we speaking at the close of our last study," began Professor Carman.

"Philip the Second," answered a chorus of voices.

"When did he live—in what century?"

"In the last part of the twelfth and the first of the thirteenth," answered Joe Palmeter.

"Right; Philip was a very ambitious man, and was anxious to raise his country to as great a degree of prosperity and splendor as it attained under the great Charlemagne. This it was quite impossible to do. But he did succeed in cementing his kingdom so firmly together that it did not fall in pieces when he died.

"When he had been king seven years, all Europe was again agitated by a proposition to start out upon another crusade—the third. Of course, Philip's ambition led him to become the first in the movement; so as he just then happened to be friendly with the king of England, they started out for Palestine together. But after they had been there a while, they became disgusted with one another, though they did not exactly put their feelings into words. So Philip left Richard to fight it out alone, while he returned home."

"I wonder that Richard was not afraid of treachery," said Will Barnaby, who was getting to be wonderfully interested.

"He trusted in the oath which Philip took, to do him no harm while he was gone. But Philip went directly to the pope, and asked to be released, or absolved, from his solemn vow."

"I think this was about the same as granting Philip an indulgence," said Will Barnaby.

"I should say so!" indignantly exclaimed Joe Palmeter. "The idea of any one setting himself up so much higher than the Almighty, as to pretend to forgive sins before they are committed!"

"It is dreadful, indeed," assented the professor. "Then Philip began courting the close friendship of Prince John, Richard's brother, and John and Philip began to plot against Richard, and they succeeded in making him very much trouble. Finally Richard died, and the fickle Philip deserted John, who was then king of England, and the remainder of John's reign was a miserable struggle with the powerful king of France."

"Which king was victor at last?" asked Charlie White.

"Philip was victorious at the battle of Bouvines,—he won a complete victory,—after which he did no more fighting."

"I wonder if he did anything to better the condition of his country," said Joe Palmeter.

"O yes, he did very much; he enlarged and beautified the city of Paris. The streets were narrow and filthy, and he changed all this."

"Well, I don't care what good he did, he was a mean fellow,—a false friend, and a deceitful man,"—said Julia March, indignantly.

"You judge him by the way in which he treated those whom he pretended to regard as friends, I presume," answered Professor Carman, "but we must not overlook the good he did."

"Nor the times in which he lived," chimed in tender-hearted Milly Brown.

"We were talking about Philip II. this morning at the breakfast table," said Harry Ray, "and grandma said that she once read that the uncle of Philip was killed by a fall from his horse, caused by his stumbling over a pig which was roaming, with others of its kind, over the streets of Paris. She said this was the reason why he determined to put things in better order."

"Well done, Harry. I see you are making our studies in history a part of your conversation, and that is right."

"Mother asks me to repeat all I have learned as soon as I get home every Wednesday afternoon," said Edna Phillips, "and I find it a great help to my memory."

"So it will be. Well, during the reign of Philip, the poor Jews were again the victims of another cruel persecution in the name of religion; but not alone were they the victims of intolerance and hatred from the church; the kindly and simple-hearted Albigenses, from the south of France, endured a fearful persecution. They reproved the monks for their evil lives, and of course this could not be tolerated; so they were treated like the infidels and persecuted to the death."

"Why, I wonder if infidels have not as good a right to expect fair treatment from their neighbors as any other class of people," exclaimed Joe Palmeter, indignantly.

"Certainly, Joseph, and it is the duty of Christians to treat them as kindly as they would those who believe as they do. But a cruel man, named Simon de Montfort, was just the kind of man to carry out the wishes of Pope Innocent III., who believed that a heretic had no earthly right to live. De Montfort, backed by papal authority, raised a large body of troops, and rushed among the poor Albigenses, with the same dreadful zeal with which, once before, he had marched against the Turks. Once they destroyed a town in which it was hard to discriminate between the Catholics and the heretics. So one of the priests, a companion of De Montfort, was asked how they were to manage the difficulty. Just imagine, if you can, the unreasoning, blind cruelty and bigotry which could prompt the reply given: 'Kill them all; the Lord will know his own!'"

"O professor! did they do it?" asked Milly Brown, with a little tremor in her voice.

"Yes, Milly; they left not a soul alive, and afterwards set fire to the town. One writer who lived in this dreadful time said that they once gathered a great many heretics together into a large castle and burned them alive with extreme joy."

"Is it possible that this was all done in the name of the religion of the gentle Nazarene?" asked Julia March.

"Yes, though Philip did not really approve of it; but he was too busy in other matters to trouble much about the sufferings of a few miserable wretches. So the beautiful homes of the Albigenses, where nature had lavished her bounties with such a liberal hand, were made desolate and silent. So, as the historian says, 'Simon de Montfort made a solitude, and called it peace.'"

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

"He Shall Think to Change Times."

"MAMA," said Charlie, "you have never explained about 'the times.' The text we were talking about says, you know, 'He shall think to change times and laws.'"

"What are God's times?"

"Why, mama, what a queer question? All time is God's."

"Has he reserved no time as his especially?"

"Yes; the Sabbath."

"Suppose you turn to Ex. 20:8, 9, 10, and read the 4th commandment."

"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God."

"This day then belongs to God. Why did he choose the seventh day as his? Please read on."

"For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it."

"Do you remember what Jesus said about the law?"

"Yes; that not a jot or tittle of it should pass away till heaven and earth passed."

"Then could any part of this commandment be changed?"

"Of course not. Mama, who ever thought it could?"

"The prophet has told us that the papacy would think not only to change God's law, but his times. You may read some statements from the Catholic Catechism, and from some of the leaders in the church. I suppose, Charlie, you will be assurprised as I was to find out these things; for I never gave the matter any thought until quite recently. But if God said the papacy would think to change his times, then we should rejoice to find that he foresaw and foretold the events of ages. Now you may read in the 'Doctrinal Catechism,' p. 174."

With wide-open eyes Charlie read—

Question.—"Have you any other way of proving that the church has power to institute festivals of precept?"

Answer.—"Had she not such power . . . she could not have substituted the observance of Sunday, the first day of the week, for Saturday, the seventh day, a change for which there is no Scriptural authority."

"O, mama, Isn't Sunday, Sunday?"

Mrs. Ross laughed. "Yes, dear. Sunday is Sunday; but Sunday is not the Sabbath. We have been keeping the wrong day, dear; but it has been because we were ignorant, and the sin of ignorance is atoned for. Here is another statement I would like you to read, from the 'Catholic Christian Instructed,' p. 252":—

Charlie read: "'Q. What warrant have you for keeping the Sunday, preferable to the ancient Sabbath, which was Saturday?"

"A. We have for it the authority of the Catholic Church and apostolical tradition."

"Cardinal Gibbons says, 'Sunday, as a day set apart for the obligatory worship of Almighty God, . . . is purely a creation of the Catholic Church.' Father Enright offered $1,000 to any one who would prove from the Bible alone that Sunday was the Sabbath."

"And so, Saturday is Sunday. Why, how queer that seems!"

"No; Saturday, the seventh day, is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God."

"Why, mama, that's the Jews' Sabbath."

"Is that what the commandment says?"

"The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," repeated Charlie.

Charlie leaned his head on his hand for some moments. Mrs. Ross looked at him anxiously, for she knew that he was going through a struggle both intellectual and spiritual. When he looked up his face was pale.

"Mama, did Jesus keep the seventh day?"

"Yes, dear. Luke says, 'He went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day as was his custom.' When he told the disciples of the destruction of Jerusalem which took place forty years after his death, he said, 'pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day.' The women who came to embalm his body on the first day of the week had 'rested according to the commandment.'"

"And did n't the disciples change the day to celebrate his resurrection?"

"No; baptism is a memorial of his resurrection. The day was changed just as the prophet said it would be by the papacy. The first Sunday law on record is the one commanded by Constantine in 321 A. D., and that was a very lax one, that the church afterward made more stringent. Church and state have always been united through Sunday laws. From Constantine's time the state wielded the sword at the request of the church. The Sunday law seems to be the wedding ring of church and state. It was through this unholy alliance that the Dark Ages blighted over 1200 years."

"Mama, why does the church want power from the state?"

"Because she feels her weakness without it. But no church ever appeals to the state for power, which realizes that Christ is her champion; for he has all power in heaven and in earth."

"Well, then, the church must begin to feel her weakness, mama; for it was only last Sunday that our minister told the people to vote as the church wanted them to. He said the churches could control the ballot if they would, and that unless we had a strict Sunday law, the Sabbath would be lost to our country. But as Saturday is the Sabbath, the Sunday law wouldn't do much good."

"Well, Charlie, whose day is the Sabbath?"

"God's," said Charlie, reverently.

"To whom then shall we render it?"

"To God."

"Yes. Jesus said, 'Render therefore to Cæsar (or the state) the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.'"

"Shall we do it, my boy?"

"Yes, mama. The pope in me and the pope out of me say, 'No;' but I must answer as Peter did in our lesson a few weeks ago, 'We ought to obey God rather than men.'"

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, MARCH 3, 1898.

It would be very interesting to observe, should the contingency arise, with what measure of zeal our patriotic bishops and archbishops of the Roman Catholic Church would support this country in a war with Spain.

A DECISION is expected soon from the Supreme Court of Ohio which will settle the controversy over the question of whether baseball shall be played in that state on Sunday. The last ruling in the lower courts,—that of Judge Ong,—was favorable to Sunday games.

THOSE persons who find fault with the SENTINEL on the ground that it is a "chronic kicker," should remember that is not the part of a sentinel to cry "All's well," when there is something decidedly wrong. And he who does not know that there is something decidedly wrong in the trend of affairs in this country, is asleep.

IN Topeka, Kans., a movement has been started with the object of making the reading of the Bible in the public schools of the city compulsory. It is reported that "appeals have been made to the Christian parents to attend the annual school meeting in April and to vote for and insist upon the reading of the Bible daily, and that teachers shall be required to teach to the children as their first lesson in reading, the Ten Commandments."

THERE is a stir of "National Reform" in Atlanta, Ga. Preparations are being made for vigorous work in the distribution of National Reform literature throughout the State. The animus of the movement is shown by a speech recently made by a prominent Atlanta lawyer in its behalf, in which he referred to Nehemiah's course in "laying hands" upon Sabbath desecrators as the proper course to be pursued by reformers now.

A RECENT issue of the daily Sun (New York) contained this interesting item:—

"The Baptist Boys' Brigade had its sixth annual reception and review yesterday afternoon in the new Ninth Regiment armory on Fourteenth Street. Eight hundred and eighty boys went through regimental and company manoeuvres before nearly 7,000 people. The boys were all members of Baptist Sunday schools."

And when these boys shall put their military knowledge to practical use, opportunity for which may soon arise, the Sunday schools can make the proud claim of having trained them for the fray, and of saying that they fought "like Baptists."

THE hearing on the Sunday Rest Bill for the District of Columbia took place as announced Friday, February 25, before a sub-committee of the Congressional Committee for the District. The leading speakers in behalf of the bill were Dr. W. F. Crafts of the "Bureau of Reforms" at Washington, and Mr. Wm. A. Gordon, a Washington attorney. Against the bill appeared Dr. A. H. Lewis, secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Soc'y, Mr. Geo. B. Wheeler, of the International Religious Liberty Ass'n, Gen. Wm. Birney, of Washington, Prof. H. C. Kirk, Pres. Secular League of Washington, and Dr. W. A. Croffut, Sec. Secular Union of New Jersey. Fifty-five minutes were given each side for the presentation of arguments. The result seemed to be unfavorable to the bill. A fuller report of the hearing will appear in our next issue.

A BILL which is now before Congress, and has already passed the House, provides that the water tax shall be remitted to all churches within the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The water tax will be paid, of course; but it is proposed by this bill that other people than those of the churches shall pay it. This is only in line with the remission of taxes on church property, which is an established custom; but it calls attention to the injustice of that custom. For without doubt it is just as proper to remit the water tax to the churches as it is to remit the tax on church buildings; and just as proper for the public to be obliged to pay all other expenses of running the churches as to pay their water and land taxes. The whole germ of church and state union is in the bill.

ONE who is described as "an Americanized Russian," who has been associated with the Nihilists in his native land, is quoted in one of the magazines as saying:—

"A Nihilist is not an anarchist, nor even a Socialist. He is merely one who desires with all his heart, and above everything else in the world, the liberty of speech and action that is the birthright of every living soul, and which is guaranteed to every American by the Constitution of the United States. Oh, you Americans should be the very happiest people on earth, for you have everything that the rest of the world is striving to gain."

Yes; so we have in theory, and according to the Constitution; but we do not prize these things as they are prized by lovers of liberty in foreign lands, and as a result they are fast slipping from our grasp.

THE efficiency of the SENTINEL depends largely upon the aid of the friends of freedom in sending to it the news from along the skirmish line in all parts of the field. To many who have done this we have replied by letter, expressing our appreciation of their efforts and interest; and to all who have not heard from us personally, we wish hereby to say the same. We assure one and all that the SENTINEL appreciates their aid in its battle for the liberties of the people.

It would be good missionary work to send the SENTINEL for a few weeks to some of your W. C. T. U. friends, while we are printing the articles relating to W. C. T. U. history.

THE primary object of proper legislation is protection to the individual.

AN appeal to precedent is often a convenient but never a justifiable means of ignoring duty.

ANY religious institution which cannot be upheld by truth and love alone, would better go down.

IF you vote for a Sunday law or for any form of religious legislation, be assured it will hurt nobody more than yourself.

So long as conscientious conviction remains independent of legislation or physical force, so long will the supervision of morality remain outside the sphere of the state.

THE law of God makes of the Sabbath a day of rest. The law of man can only make of it a day of restraint. There is no ease in restraint, and there can be no true rest without ease.

"GIVE me liberty or give me death," said Patrick Henry. A good many to-day say, Give me liberty and give me death. There is no real liberty in using or doing that which brings death.

IF the world is growing worse, it is because men are rejecting the Spirit of God; and only that which will remove the cause can effect a remedy. Obviously this can not be done by legislation.

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." This is the watchword of all true reforms.

THE Sabbath law of Jehovah covers completely the whole subject of the duty and privilege of every individual with respect to a weekly day of rest. That law is still in force; and any human legislation on the subject must be superfluous and impertinent. The fact that God has enacted a Sabbath law affords the poorest possible reason for demanding that the state enact one also.

Two "Sabbath" Reforms.

THERE are in progress in the United States—and elsewhere—two movements which aim at a reformation in the observance of the "Sabbath."

One of these movements depends for success upon the enactment and enforcement of laws by which all persons will be compelled to observe the day. The other, representing but a small minority of the people, could not if it would call to its aid the arm of the civil power. It depends for success wholly upon the spiritual power of truth.

Both of these movements are making progress; they are both marked. But the latter is, in principle, a direct contradiction of the former.

With the vast preponderance of numbers, influence, and wealth on its side, the movement for a stricter and more general observance of Sunday, claims that legislation and prosecution are necessary to turn the people to an observance of the Sabbath. On the other hand, the movement for the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath asserts that legislation, so far from being a help to Sabbath observance, is a positive and formidable hindrance to it; and proceeds upon its way independently of legislation and of popular custom and belief.

It proceeds even in spite of legislation, and in the face of every obstacle which lies naturally in the pathway of that which is unpopular.

And by this very thing it is demonstrated beyond any possible question that Sabbath reform does not depend upon legislation in any form.

If a movement which has neither wealth, numbers, social influence, tradition or popular custom back of it, but must move against all these things, can do so without the aid of any legislation whatever, and even against the decree of the civil power, cannot a movement which has all these in its favor, proceed without the help of legislation?

If it cannot, it is certain that it is lacking in some vital point,—that it has some inherent weakness which is fatal to its life; so that at best it can only be a dead reform, instead of one which can impart moral life to the people.

The movement which calls people to observe the seventh-day Sabbath is unpopular. It calls upon men to sacrifice—to give up position, money, social standing, and everything savoring of worldly honor and advancement. Yet in spite of all this, it is moving on rapidly, both here and in almost all nations and peoples of the earth.

If the movement for Sunday observance were moving forward with a rapidity, as compared with that for the seventh day, proportionate to the greater numbers, wealth and influence which it represents, it would be moving almost inconceivably faster than it is.

And that it does not do this, is proof positive that it is lacking in that in which the seventh-day Sabbath movement is strong; that is, the spiritual power of truth. There is in it no power of divine conviction.

Such a "Sabbath reform" therefore—however good in purpose and honest in belief its promoters may be—must be set down as a sham and a delusion. And it is certainly not the proper business of any legislature to try to further the progress of such a thing among the people.

THE Christian Citizen says that "But for that government ['the Roman government'] Jesus himself could not have lived and taught till his work was finished."

Does not the Christian Citizen know that every child knows that "But for the Roman government Jesus himself" could not have been put to death when he was? and that "But for the Roman government" he could not have been put to death at all as he was—by crucifixion?

Does not everybody, unless it be the Christian Citizen, know that the Jews said and truly, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death"? and that they had to repudiate God, and claim "no king but Cæsar;" and under profession of loyalty to Cæsar, charge Pilate with disloyalty to Cæsar, and threaten him with the consequences of such disloyalty, in order to swing the Roman government so that Jesus should be killed?

And by these same tokens does not everybody, unless it be the Christian Citizen, know that "But for that government" Jesus could have lived and taught until this hour?

We do not suggest in any of this that government is useless in the world. Government is all right in its place. But when it is in the hands of religionists, or when its power can be swung by political religionists, it is the worst thing in the world; because then it is used for the destruction of the best people in the world, as was done in the case of the Lord Jesus. - And it is the same record from Nimrod until now.

SAYS John G. Wooley, in the New York Voice, "How to start a 'bull' movement in Christian politics, is the problem." We would refer him to the pope.

In Holy Russia.

"Christian World."

THIRTY families of the Russian sect nicknamed the Shelapouti were summoned by the police to the village offices of Ekaterinovka. There the police officer read an official circular ordering that the children from the ages of two to eleven should be taken from them and entrusted to orthodox villagers. The priests were present, and one of them enlarged on the "demoralization" effected by the sect, and added that it ought to be relentlessly persecuted and eradicated. The parents burst into heartrending lamentations, and were joined by the sobbing children. Children were torn from the parents' arms. A little provincial paper, by some means, was allowed to publish an account of the scene, of which a translation appears in Free Russia. We read:—

"The parents finally seemed to have lost their senses; they kissed the skirts of the priests' garments, embraced the police officer's knees! The whole scene was unspeakably painful. But one figure made a particular impression on my mind. This peasant was a widower of about thirty-five years of age, tall, solidly built, with an agreeable though somewhat gloomy face. He kept all the time his pretty, tiny daughter of about five to seven years in his arms, never letting her go. Then he tried to escape from the courtyard of the village-office, but several policemen stopped him and violently tore the child from his embrace. No sooner was this done than he fell to the ground in a heap, unconscious. Not one single groan or sound did he utter. This sent a thrill through all present; everybody shuddered. Yet the zealous officer kicked him with his boot, exclaiming, 'Acting! The beast!' But 'the beast' did not recover his senses for a considerable time, and when he did he stretched out his hands and began to feel around him as if searching for something, although it was broad daylight. Never will that instance fade from my memory."

There will be an awful reckoning some day for the government and the church that thus ride roughshod over the primal affections of humanity.

The Mormon Object Lesson.

THE Mormon object lesson is becoming more plain to the people of the United States as time goes on. Many who are in the best position to judge, now realize that in its estimate of Mormonism the country has made a mistake; and that mistake is just this: the great evil of Mormonism did not consist in its polygamy, but in its union of church and state.

The country had its eye upon polygamy; that seemed to be the great evil pertaining to Mormonism that needed to be suppressed. To this public attention was directed. Books were written to expose its evil and arouse public sentiment against it. Finally, laws were enacted—and enforced—for the suppression of the practice, and apparently, after some opposition, they were successful. The president of the church promulgated a decree against it; the church promised to abandon it; the state constitution of Utah was made to expressly forbid it. Under these assurances Utah was received into the Union as a sovereign state.

But the people did not see deep enough. They did not understand the evil of a union of church and state,—or, as it may be said, of a union of the state with religion. And now they find, to their great concern if not to their consternation, that in the suppression of polygamy they have not cut the root of the Mormon evil, but only a sprout which it bore. The root being left, the sprout may—and naturally will—grow out again.

But we will present the situation as it is stated by Mr. Eugene Young, in the Independent (N. Y.), for March 3, as part of a symposium on "The Mormon Question," which this leading American journal deems a timely topic for consideration. We quote Mr. Young's article entire. It is worth a careful perusal:—

"Politics, not polygamy, have been responsible for all our troubles." This remark was made to me during the heat of one of the church and state campaigns in Utah by a Mormon leader who had closely followed the history of his people. One who treads the same ground as he did will find much to corroborate his views. Through Mormon tradition runs the record of a temporal ambition, so dominating and aggressive that it has always aroused the enmity of those with whom the people have come in contact, either in a business or political way. It is an ambition that practically has no limit, its first idea being to bring within the pale of the church 'every nation, kindred, tongue and people' on the earth.

"Mormonism early showed its high opinion of its own importance. In the thirties, when only a small band of extremists had been gathered from the dissatisfied ones of other sects to Nauvoo, Ill., Joseph Smith, the so-called prophet, was set up by his people as a candidate for the presidency of the United States on a platform of 'free trade and sailors' rights.' This candidacy was the climax of a series of political movements among the Latter-day Saints that had gained them the enmity of both parties in the State. The church leaders claimed and exercised the right to dictate the politics of their followers and used their power to secure concessions on all sides, until at last, becoming angry at double-dealing, the people of Illinois cast out the curious sect.

"When the new home was sought in Missouri nothing had been learned in political matters through the experience in Illinois. The 'prophet' continued to direct even the most minute temporal affairs of the people, and State matters once more became his plaything. The citizens of Missouri might have tolerated polygamy, because at that time their moral force had not become so highly potent, as it probably would be to-day; but they would not accord to the Mormons the right to play fast and loose in politics. Partisan feeling ran high in the forties, and Missouri was a battle-ground between the two great national factions. When Joseph Smith united church and state matters, there he came to grief. His people were driven to the West, and, to use a Mormon phrase, 'he was martyred.'

"The same forces have been at work in Utah ever since. Gold-seekers, who were making their way to California in the fifties, found in the valleys of the Great Basin a veritable Mormon kingdom, ruled absolutely by the head of the church and levying tribute on all who needed supplies. Adventurous men who settled in the midst of the strange religious people found themselves limited by Mormon ambitions on every hand. Search for the rich mineral deposits of 'Deseret,' as the Mormon state was called, was forbidden by the church leaders, who thought that by concealing the precious metals they might keep out the Gentiles and be unmolested in their ambition to rule. Any one who would not bow to the hierarchy was given to understand that there would be no opportunity in business or politics, for him until finally those who opposed the temporal practices, and not the religious teachings of the Mormon Church, awakened the forces which made such a long and bitter fight against polygamy.

"They found at hand a most suitable weapon. Some of them were not in a position to criticise the moral phases of Mormonism, and a large percentage were men who denied the existence of God and scoffed at his commandments. But they realized the force of the great religious sentiment of the country, and awakened it to make war against polygamy. In the bitter years that followed not the least influential of the elements which opposed the dominant church was striking at its political power. Hack politicians from the East, gamblers, saloon men and atheistic miners vied with the devoted missionaries in the general fight. Their idea was to free the police, municipal governments, legislature, and courts from the overshadowing influence of the priesthood, so they might have a voice in the government and business of the Territory. They sought to divide the Mormon people in politics, in order that there might be some opportunity for the minority, at least, to make its ideas known.

"The feeling that polygamy was not the chief evil of Mormonism was shown curiously after its abandonment by the manifesto of Wilford Woodruff, in 1890. Even after it was conceded that the Mormons had accepted the new 'revelation,' the old Gentile party in Utah continued its organization and campaign, declaring it would not disband until sufficient assurance was given that the priesthood should not control politics. Several promises and statements that the church leaders should never again endeavor to control the action of their people had to be made before real division on national political lines was brought about.

"Statehood was bestowed upon Utah because it was believed that the members of the dominant church had become honestly divided. What has been the result? Briefly, the priesthood has been gradually regaining all the power it abandoned in order to lull the suspicions of the religious people of this country. Mormon ambition is intrenched behind absolute authority, and is able to bid defiance to the religious sentiment of the country, and to trade for political power. In fact, the Mormon kingdom, of which Joseph Smith and Brigham Young dreamed, seems likely to become a reality.

"The hold of the church upon the State is becoming stronger with every year. The governorship was put in the hands of Heber M. Wells, a young man who had been closely identified with church business matters, in the first election under statehood. The Supreme Court and some of the district courts, by inadvertence, were given to the Gentiles. A United States senatorship was seized for the son of George Q. Cannon, the real head of the church. The second election resulted in the defeat of the most determined Mormon opponent of the union of church and state, Moses Thatcher, whose ambition to be United States senator was balked by the leaders. Salt Lake City was wrested last year from the control of the Gentiles, and a faithful Mormon was made mayor. School boards were next attacked, and churchmen whose loyalty to their 'file leaders' was unquestioned, were placed in power. There are still several promising fields in which the church leaders may operate; and it can hardly be doubted that they will not rest until they have secured as complete control of Utah as Tammany has of New York.

"One of the outgrowths of the increased power of the priesthood is seen in the new policy in educational matters. Before Utah became a State the schools of Salt Lake City and other important places, and the University and Agricultural college were the pride of all the people. Good salaries were paid to teachers, and it was the aim of those in control to secure the best possible talent. Teachers were drawn even from New York and Massachusetts on the east and California on the west. The broadest and most modern educational ideas were put in force. This is being changed now. With the control by the priesthood of the educational officials, the idea of employing only young men and women of Utah, and eventually, of course, only young Mormons as teachers, is becoming dominant. In this is seen one of the striking examples of the use of Mormon political power, and the principle applied will fit in almost any department of the State.

"If the church and state matters were to be confined to Utah, however, perhaps the subject would be unworthy of more than passing notice. The 70,000 or more Gentiles could be left to work out their own fortunes or leave the State. But there is a broader meaning to Mormon ambition than is found in the mere contemplation of the little western State, which is of vital interest to the whole country.

"Utah has two United States senators. The church has demonstrated its ability to choose these officials, for both Senators Cannon and Rawlins owe their seats to the exercise of the priesthood's power. Wyoming has two more. The Mormons are very strong in the western counties. Idaho has two more. Senators Shoup and Heitfeldt owe their election to the Mormon vote in the legislature, in which the church has held the balance of power for four years. Here, then, are six senatorial votes and nine electoral votes over which the Mormon leaders will have at least partial control.

"Moreover, as Apostle Lyman said in an address before the Mormon conference in Brooklyn, 'Zion is spreading out. Zion wants more room to grow.' The old aggressive missionary work of the church has been started again since the Federal Government generously gave the priesthood freedom and restored to it the property that had been confiscated. Converts are again being sent out to the West. Mormon settlements in Colorado and Nevada are very considerable, and politicians in each have learned to make concessions to secure the Mormon vote. Politicians in Arizona, which must some day become a State, now acknowledge that the balance of power in its affairs is held in Salt Lake City. New Mexico also has a growing Mormon population that is bound to become potent. It will thus be seen that the church vote, properly handled, might become a most powerful factor in the politics of the intermountain States.

"Will it be so handled? The only answer one can give is that Mormon ambition in the past has never hesitated to secure power; Mormon leaders are among the most astute politicians in this country; and the Mormon people have ever been plastic when the priesthood has told them the good of 'God's people' would come from obedience to their leaders."

Whose Is the "Mark"?

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

It has been proved in previous articles that the beast having two horns like a lamb (Rev. 13:11) symbolizes the United States, and that consequently it is this government that is to enforce that which the prophecy calls a "mark."

In this article it will be proper to inquire whose mark it is that is to be enforced by this nation.

The answer to this question will furnish additional proof that the two-horned beast and the United States are one and the same.

The enforcement of the mark is set forth in the prophecy thus, "And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in the foreheads." Verse 16.

In connection with this there is to be brought about in this country that which is called "an image to the beast," and which is to be worshiped by the receiving of the mark. Verses 15, 16. The original of this image is the beast that had the deadly wound and was healed. Verses 12, 14.

From this it will be seen that it is the power symbolized by the beast that received the deadly wound, and yet was healed, to whom the mark belongs.

The record of this deadly wound being inflicted is given in verse 3 of the chapter under consideration, and verse 1 shows it to be the ten-horned leopard beast.

The power there symbolized is quite generally conceded, by Protestants, to be the papacy; and correctly, too.

In tracing this subject it is necessary to examine several scriptures.

A comparison of the symbol of the little horn of Daniel 7, and the beast of Rev. 13:1-10 will show that Daniel and John are speaking of one and the same power.

Daniel was told that the kingdom symbolized by the little horn was to arise subsequent to the division of the Roman Empire into ten kingdoms, which in turn is symbolized by the fourth beast having ten horns. Dan. 7:8, 23, 24.

In attaining to supremacy the little horn was to uproot or subdue three of these kingdoms. Chap. 7:9, 24.

Very plain is the prophecy concerning this matter; equally plain is the history showing the fulfillment.

The Roman Empire was divided into ten kingdoms between the years 356 and 476 A. D. Between 476 and 538 A. D. three of these kingdoms were plucked up, and this was done by the papacy—the Roman Catholic Church. And as a testimony to this fact the pope to this day wears on his tiara a triple crown.

Of this (papal) power it is said "He shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and shall think to change the times and the law (R. V.) and they shall be given into his hand until a time, times and the dividing of time." V. 25. This period is the same as the forty and two months of Rev. 13:5 or 1260 days of Chap. 12:6.

There is no question as to this being the papacy, for there is no other power which has ever claimed to have the power to change God's law, and it is the only one that has ever made the attempt.

It was in 538 A. D. that the papacy became supreme, and as it was to continue for 1260 years—a day standing for a year, see Eze. 4:6—the time when it was to receive its deadly wound was 1798 for 538 plus 1260 equals 1798. And it is a well-known fact that in this year—1798—The French army under General Berthier, abolished the papal See, took the pope—Pius VI.—prisoner, and carried him off to Valence, France, where he died a year later.

But its deadly wound was to be healed. Although shorn of its power in 1798, two years later another pope was elected, and while from that time it began to lose its temporal possessions until in 1870 when it had nothing left but the grounds upon which the Vatican stands and which is subject to taxation just like the property of any other private citizen of the Italian kingdom, it has gradually been regaining strength and power, until at the present time all that remains of the deadly wound is as it were, an old scab, and it appears to be but a very short time when that will be removed.

It has been stated that it was in 1798 that the papacy received its deadly wound. At the time this wound was inflicted the prophet saw the two-horned beast coming up rapidly to take its place among the great nations of the earth. Compare Rev. 13:10, 11.

But the only government that was coming up at the time was our own nation—the United States of America—Thus: In 1776 the Declaration of Independence was made; in 1789 the Constitution was ratified, and the Ship of State started on its career. At this time this Government—and positively the only one that ever did it—recognized and adopted the principles of civil and religious liberty as taught by Jesus Christ—the Lamb of God—and which in the prophecy is indicated by the two lamb-like horns.

Thus it is proven again that the United States is the nation described in Rev. 13:11 by the Seer of Patmos, and thus it is proven that the beast which received the deadly wound that was healed is the papacy. And as it is this beast to whom the mark belongs, by this same token it is proven that the mark to be enforced by this nation is the mark of the papacy—the Roman Catholic Church.

Consequently if we can find that which the papacy sets forth as the mark of its power, and if too we can find that this is the identical thing that is sought to be enforced upon the people of this nation the proof will amount to a demonstration that this mark claimed by the papacy, and sought to be enforced by the United States, and the mark in the prophecy are one and the same.

What the mark itself is will be considered at another time.

The Standard of Civil Duty.

THERE are many who, while freely admitting that every soul is directly responsible alone to God in the domain of morals, still insist that the state should enforce so much at least of the divine law as pertains to our duties toward our fellow men. But in this they greatly err, not discerning the spiritual nature of the law of God.

Civil duties are discovered and enforced not by the divine law, written in tables of stone, but by the divine law written in the hearts of all men and graven in the very nature of man. It is to this law the apostle refers when he says in Romans 2:14,15: "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves: which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another."

"This law of nature," says Blackstone, "being coeval with mankind, and dictated by God himself, is of course superior in obligation to any other. It is binding all over the globe, in all countries, and at all times. No human laws are of any validity if contrary to this; and such of them as are valid derive all their force, and all their authority, mediately or immediately, from this original."

By "the law of nature," is not meant the written law of God. "It is not used among them that be learned in the laws of England to reason what thing is commanded or prohibited by the law of nature and what not; but all the reasoning in that behalf is under this manner: When anything is grounded upon the law of nature, they say that reason wills that such a thing be done; and if prohibited by the law of nature, they say that it is against reason. or that reason will not suffer it to be done."

This law of nature appeals more or less powerfully to all men. It is read alike by Christian and heathen. It was as fully recognized in ancient Egypt in the days of the Pharaohs as it is in many so-called Christian lands to day. Indeed, only natural law can be comprehended by the natural man. Of the revealed law of God, the apostle says: "We know that the law is spiritual" (Rom. 7:14); and again, "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God." 1 Cor. 2:11,12.

There can be no discerning of the law of God, much less any performing of it without the Spirit of God. This Spirit comes to the world as a reprover of sin (John 16:8); and to the Christian as a teacher and comforter (John 14:26); but it comes to neither the one nor the other bringing the law of the state; but with the God-written law, the "sword of the Spirit," "the Word of God" which "is quick [living], and powerful, . . . and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart." The Spirit brings this law not from the state, but from God. Were it to come from the state it could have only the authority of the state; but coming from God it has in it his own divine authority and power. It is in view of this truth that the apostle says, "For this cause also thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe."

Even the written word of God enacted into civil law, sent forth by the state as state law, thereby loses its divine character. for it is received not as the word of God but as the law of the state. The truth of this is witnessed by the fact that thousands of professed Christians are to-day living in what, according to the divine law, is adultery, but without compunctions of conscience because the law of the state has quite superseded in their minds the law of God. In like manner, in thousands of minds the standard of Sabbath keeping is not the divine law, but the law of the state upon that subject.

The fact is that every effort of man to enforce the divine law is in effect, whether consciously or not, an effort to change that law. Men enact into civil law not the divine law itself, but their interpretation of the divine law. They enact statutes to enforce "the Sabbath," but instead of the day set apart by God, they substitute another day, namely, the first day of the week. They make laws for the protection of "the Sabbath," but instead of fostering true Sabbath observance, such "laws" take away from it the safeguards of the divine law; for whereas God's law says of the Sabbath, "In it thou shalt not do any work," state laws on the same subject contain numerous exceptions, permitting much that is positively forbidden by divine law. This is nothing more nor less, in effect, than changing the divine law.

The moral of all this is that the state should keep its hands off from every species of legislation for which there are no adequate civil reasons. The sole duty of civil government is to declare our rights, to protect us in their exercise, and to take none of them from us. To attempt more than this is to assume divine prerogatives. God is the only moral governor, and his law is the only moral law; and God alone can administer his own law. He alone can by that divine law convince men of sin, and he alone can by the influence of his own divine Spirit secure obedience to his own divine law.

The law of God is spiritual; it is his righteousness. What saith the Scriptures? "Hearken unto me ye that know righteousness; the people in whose heart is my law." And again, "All his commandments are righteousness." Has the state power to enforce God's righteousness? Are civil courts capable of even recognizing, or, in other words of judging, that righteousness? Nay, verily. Only the spiritual Being can administer the spiritual law; only God can work righteousness in the human heart; for only the life of Christ lived in the human soul can meet the claims of the divine law; and only Christ can live that life in the heart that is freely opened to him. He says to every one, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." He wants to come into every heart, bringing in his own divine nature, his own perfect life, as says the apostle, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me." This is the law of God in the heart, for

"In his life the law appears, Drawn out in living characters."

C. P. B.

God's Care for the Subjects of His Kingdom.

AFTER the overthrow of the ten tribes, Judah alone was left as the remnant of Abraham's seed, by which to prove the stability of God's promise. To remove that people by force from the land in which God had placed them, would, in Satan's mind, be to defeat the plan embraced in the promise to Abraham. Divine prescience foresaw the effort that would be made in this direction, and through the prophet Jeremiah forewarned that people of their impending calamity, but told them, however, that they should again return from their captivity.

From the earliest moment of that prophet's ministry, he was charged to reveal the true situation of matters to that people. He therefore told them that evil out of the north was sure to come unless they returned to God. Jer. 1:14; 4:6. But even though they were removed from their possession, he told them that, if they would but be true to Him to whom they had been married, He would in due time bring them back from that northern country of captivity to the land which had been given to their fathers for an inheritance. Jer. 3:14-18.

To Abraham God had said that his seed should return to the land of promise after four hundred years. Gen. 15:13-16. To Judah, however, the promise was that they should return from their captivity at the end of seventy years. Jer. 25:9-11. God assured them, through the prophet, that he would not forsake them, because of his "everlasting" love for them, and so would positively bring them back again from the north country to which they would be carried by the oppressor. Jer. 31:3-9.

As was predicted, in due time the king of Babylon came at the head of an army to Jerusalem, took away its treasures, and led captive the inhabitants of Judah, and that land lay desolate for seventy years, while its people languished in Babylonian captivity. Dan. 1:1, 2. To all human appearance, the purpose of God was then thwarted. But the promise to Abraham had been backed by the oath of God (Heb. 6:13-18), and could not thus be made void by Satan, even though the powers of earth were at hand to do his bidding.

At the end of the predicted seventy years, Babylon was conquered by the Medo-Persian army. The Jews were then, by decree of Cyrus (Ezra 1:1-3), permitted to return to Palestine, but that territory was held under the rule of Persia. The territory was not restored to the seed of Abraham; they were simply permitted to dwell there as strangers, like their great ancestor, upon whom the promise of possessing the land was first bestowed.

The fifth power through whom Satan attempted to deprive the seed of Abraham of their inherited rights, soon came upon the scene to act the part assigned to it by the One whose usurped territory it was permitted to occupy. Grecia gained the ascendancy in the third century before Christ, and thus the Jewish nation came under the authority of another heathen power, which continued to deprive them of the control of the territory to which they were heirs, as the seed of Abraham.

Under the sixth power—pagan Rome—the one true Seed, who was to be head and front of all the believing children of Abraham, came upon the stage, as the rightful heir of God's promise to the father of the faithful. Gal. 3:16. He was born in Judah—the proper place—and was of the seed of David, who was of the lineage of Abraham. Matt. 1:1. Through all this line of family connections, the record of pedigree had been carefully preserved so that it was fully known by Satan, as well as by the faithful in the house of Israel, that the "babe of Bethlehem" was the long-promised seed. Luke 2:25-34. Herod the Roman governor of Judea, immediately gave orders to kill all children in the region about Bethlehem, who were under two years of age, in order to destroy this royal seed of Abraham. Matt. 2:12-16.

By a warning from God, the Child escaped this onslaught of government decree, but was afterward given a mock trial before Pilate, and condemned to be crucified. This, however, was a failure; for on the third day after, the crucified One burst the tomb, and came forth to life, to ascend to his Father, from whence he had come.

This was a great triumph for the seed of Abraham. The natural seed of the patriarch had lost at every contest with Satan. But now their great representative had shown himself superior to every attack of the arch enemy. In the wilderness of temptation, he had refused to acknowledge the authority of the usurper, even though the promise of yielding up the disputed territory was freely made to Him. Luke 4:5, 6. Although He was born a King (John 18:37), yet when the people attempted to make Him king over Satan's subjects, He sturdily refused, and fled away. John 6:15. At last, when every effort had been exhausted, yet without avail, to make Christ yield to Satan's authority, the power of the government was invoked to put him out of the way, and so to rid the world of one who was likely to inherit the promise made to the seed of Abraham.

But when Christ arose from the dead and ascended on high, Satan vented his spleen against the country and the people of the Jews. The Roman army was induced to destroy the temple and the city of Jerusalem, and scatter the Jewish nation to all parts of the earth. But that did not matter then. The people of Judah, though extremely wicked, had only been held together until the pedigree of Christ had been established as the seed of Abraham, when their union as a nation was no longer necessary. They had themselves rejected the One to which all their prophecies pointed as the Messiah,—the anointed One,—who was to be the salvation of their title to the inheritance. From the time of their rejection of him, the kingdom was to belong to another people who would bring forth the fruits of the kingdom of God. Matt. 21:43.

The literal seed of Abraham was then no longer in evidence. They had been held together as the connecting link between Abraham and the One to whom the promise was made, after which all who are the children of the promise must become such "by faith in Christ Jesus." Gal. 3:19, 25. So then, all who now become Christ's are, through this relationship, Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. Verse 29.

This being so, the persecution of Satan was extended from the literal seed to the spiritual. Since the appearance of Christ as the Head of Abraham's seed, his followers are also made to suffer through national power. Under pagan Rome, the sixth persecuting power, even the Jews, the literal seed of Abraham, united with the government to persecute Christians. When the system of government changed from Imperial to priestly,—from pagan to papal,—the persecution became more deep-seated and wide-spread than ever, because the seed of Abraham became more widely extended, reaching from the seed-sowing at Jerusalem to the uttermost bounds of the earth. Luke 24:47. Of this we will speak at another time.

"In time of peace prepare for war."

THE decease of an individual of note, at the present time, is usually made an occasion for an advertisement of Spiritualism. Not long ago the Spiritualists claimed to have a message from the "departed spirit" of the late Mr. Pullman, the millionaire car manufacturer, in which he expressed penitence because he had not done better by the working men. And now they come forward with a communication from Miss Willard, the lamented leader of the W. C. T. U. Miss Willard, it was announced, found herself upon a rather "low plane" in the spirit world,—whether as the sequence of having occupied a high plane in the material world, or not, was not stated. There is a natural interest on the part of most people to learn what the "spirits" of departed friends have to say for themselves, since they are supposed to be vastly wiser after death than they ever were or could have become in life.

* * *

THE other day we received from some one—whether a Spiritualist or not we do not know—a printed card setting forth the "benefits" which Spiritualism has conferred upon the human race. Among these were that "It proves man's immortality" "destroys all fear of death," "sweeps away the idea of a personal devil," "denies the soul-corrupting doctrine of any vicarious atonement for sin," and "solemnly affirms that every guilty soul must arise and become its own saviour." In this it takes issue with the Christian church, and if its claims are accepted, it must be denied that people are made happy by Christianity. But upon the well-established principle that a tree is known by its fruits, Spiritualism stands condemned. We never heard of any one who was made miserable by Christianity, and we never heard of any one who was made happy by Spiritualism.

* * *

THE doctrine that a man must be his own saviour is not calculated to make any person happy who has any true knowledge of himself. The world has been trying that plan of salvation for thousands of years, and nothing has ever come of it but utter failure. The need of salvation for mankind was never more manifest than it is to-day. And as if in recognition of this fact, there are more plans for self-salvation proclaimed to-day than were ever known in the past.

THIS doctrine that a man must save himself is identical with the doctrine that a man must be saved by some other man, or set of men, or by the state. The Roman Catholic religion points the individual to the priest and the pope for salvation; in nothing can he go contrary to the dictum of priest and pope as regards religious belief and practice. And as both priest and pope are mortal beings like himself, having the same faculties that he himself has, and no more, and the same opportunities for obtaining spiritual knowledge that he has, and no better, it is plain that he might just as well depend on himself for salvation as upon them. And the same is true as regards an individual's relation to the state. The wisdom and power of the state are only human wisdom, such as is possessed by the individual. The doctrine of salvation by the state is now being widely heralded by many in the name of moral reform. But in principle it is identified with Romanism and Spiritualism; and in the natural course of events these three must join hands and stand together. There will yet be startling developments pointing to the consummation of such a union.

* * *

A ROMAN Catholic priest, of Kingston, N. Y., having said in some remarks made at a funeral address, that it was the duty of every loyal Catholic to take up arms against the United States in case of war with Spain, the Catholic authorities there and at other places in the State have made almost frantic haste to disclaim his utterances as voicing the sentiment of the Catholic Church. They have taken the occasion to pose as fighting patriots of the most pronounced type, ready to follow the American flag in the bitterest opposition to the interests of that most Catholic nation—Spain. And that they are, for the most part, sincere in these protestations, we do not doubt.

* * *

It seems to have been realized by the Catholic authorities that there was a logic behind the priest's remarks that would strongly appeal to the credibility of the American people. Unquestionably, consistency demands that all Catholics remain at least friendly to Spain; for, as every person knows, Spain is joined in close union with the Catholic Church; and what does a union of church and state amount to if each of these is not to support the other? Spain does support the Catholic Church; that is beyond question. Shall the Catholic Church now refuse her support in Spain's extremity? We do not pretend to say what she will do; but we say that she cannot consistently withhold her active support from Spain when that "most Christian government" and faithful ally of the church is threatened with harm from the forces of a foreign power. Especially must this be true when that foreign power is, in its principles of government, anti-papal.

EVERY Catholic, therefore, whatever may be his personal feelings and preferences, is as certainly bound to uphold Spain as he is bound to be loyal to his church. He is bound to do this or repudiate his religion altogether. It is a cardinal principle of that religion that church and state ought to be united; and in harmony with that principle the Catholic Church and Spain have for centuries been closely united. And no Catholic can now repudiate the principle of church and state union, and the union of the Catholic Church with Spain in particular, and still be a loyal member of the Catholic Church. By the very act of repudiating that principle, he would proclaim himself a Protestant.

It is religion, above all things, that determines an individual's course of action. In the very nature of things this must be so. Religious obligations are recognized as the highest and most sacred. Dealing as they do with eternity as well as with time—with affairs and interests that infinitely surpass in magnitude those of this temporal world—they take hold upon the mind and heart as nothing else can; they command the deepest emotions of the soul. In his sympathies, and the conduct through which these find expression, an individual therefore may be expected to respond first of all to the demands of his religion. The sincere Catholic is a Catholic before everything else. The religionist of any name—if he is sincere—puts the claims of his religion before all others. This is only what every religion demands.

Hearing on the Sunday Rest Bill.

THE principal speaker at the hearing in behalf of this bill was Rev. W. F. Crafts, whose chief aim for many years past has been to promote Sunday observance by legislation. Mr. Crafts said that the bill was the same as had been recommended by the District Commissioners in 1896, and that it had been asked for at a union meeting of the churches of Washington in 1895, and had been indorsed by Archbishop Keane, Father Stafford, and Cardinal Gibbons, of the Roman Catholic Church. He also claimed that the measure was favored by the American Federation of Labor, the Knights of Labor, and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Upon this point he was disputed by Dr. W. A. Croffut, who said that he had recently talked with leading officials of the labor unions, and found them opposed to Sunday observance by law, and desirous of being left free to rest or work on Sunday as they themselves might choose.

It cannot be denied, however, that resolutions favoring Sunday laws have within recent years been passed at meetings of the labor unions, and that these organizations stand on record as committed more or less definitely to Sunday enforcement.

Mr. W. A. Gordon appeared for the Churchmen's League, an organization representing the Protestant Episcopal Church. He said that the League did not ask that the liberties of any man should be curtailed, but that the Sabbath should be preserved from profanation.

The "profanation" of the "Sabbath" can of course be nothing else than an irreligious use of the day. Mr. Gordon's speech was a plain admission that the Churchmen's League asked Congress to forbid the people of the District spending Sunday in a way that was not religious.

Mr. H. C. Kirk, President of the Secular League of Washington, took decided exception to the implied charge that Washington was a city given over on Sunday to immorality. He made statements to show that Washington compared favorably with any other American city in this respect.

Elder Geo. B. Wheeler, of the Seventh-day Adventist Church, scored a point by asking if the bill aimed to distinguish between a religious and a secular noise; otherwise, the church bells and Salvation Army drums would be prohibited from use on Sundays. He referred the committee to a similar law in Tennessee under which one hundred and twenty persons had been arrested and seventy-eight fined or imprisoned. Quoting from recent statements made by Mr. Crafts, Mr. Wheeler brought out the fact that the leading advocate of the bill denounced all who do not observe Sunday as being traitors to God and but little better than traitors to their country. Mr. Crafts interrupted him with the statement that what he had said was meant for Christians; but obviously, that which constitutes treason for one person, must constitute treason for all; for one and all stand under the same obligations both as regards God and their fellow men.

Rev. A. H. Lewis, representing the Seventh-day Baptists, made an able and telling speech against the bill, treating the subject from the standpoint of history and of the true interests of Christianity itself. If an institution claiming to be Christian, he said, could not be maintained without having the support of the civil arm, it would better go down as having demonstrated itself a fraud.

It remains for the Congressional Committee on the District of Columbia to decide, from the report made to them by the sub-committee, whether or not the bill shall be favorably reported to Congress.

Saloon Observance of Sunday in Chicago.

"Harper's Weekly."

"THE man doesn't live," said the mayor [of Chicago], "who could shut up Chicago saloons on Sunday. I shall not try to do it. It isn't for political reasons—that's not important especially—but because the people would not tolerate it for an instant."

"Then you don't believe in enforcing laws not approved by public opinion?"

"No, I don't," replied the mayor, "and I don't intend to try it."

"But your oath of office requires you to enforce all laws, and Sunday opening of saloons is against law."

"There's a difference of opinion about that," answered Mr. Harrison. "Our Sunday closing we interpret to mean the outward closing, the semblance of closing. That I believe in."

"No Sunday Laws Needed."

THE following under this head relative to the hearing on the District Sunday Bill, spoken by so influential a paper as the Washington Post, may be taken as reflecting the sentiments of a large proportion of American citizens outside of those who desire Sunday legislation because of a religious regard for the day. It is for this reason that it is given space in the SENTINEL:—

"It will be observed by reference to our report of the hearing before the House sub-committee, on Friday last, that the only persons who appeared to advocate the bill were a few professional busybodies, while a somewhat larger number of public-spirited persons unselfishly gave their time to combat a measure which has for its object a tyrannical interference with the rights of individuals. To these latter the community owe a debt of thanks. The bill in question contemplate an intolerable oppression, and yet the great mass of the population have left to accident their protection against its sinister and odious purpose.

"The chief champion of the bill was the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, who seems to be unable to find legitimate employment in his pretended occupation, and who, therefore, serves as superintendent of what he calls a Reform Bureau—at a salary, of course—and manifests his activity by meddling impertinently in other people's business. We have had this Crafts with us in the character of an irritant for some years past. Upon what authority he proceeds, and how far he represents the wishes and opinions of any considerable element of society, we do not pretend to say. All we know about him is that he undertakes to regulate the morals of the District and to annoy and bore nearly everybody in it with his offensive importunities. Speaking to the sub-committee, on Friday, he tried to produce the impression, if he did not actually assert, that he plead the cause of certain labor organizations—the Federation, the Knights, and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers—but no representative of any of those orders was present to ratify his pretensions, and in our belief none would have done so had he been present. The labor organizations do not need Crafts to voice their sentiments or to advocate their rights. They have full control over their own affairs. They can see to it that their members have one day of rest out of every seven. We do not believe that these organizations ever commissioned Crafts to speak for them. It is our conviction that they would infinitely prefer to be left free to spend the Sabbath according to their individual preferences.

"Crafts and his coadjutors have been conducting their . . . propaganda for a very long and weary time. . . . In the prosecution of their pestiferous enterprise they have resorted to every form of slander and mendacity. They have pictured Washington as an immoral city, where vice runs riot, where the Sabbath is habitually desecrated, and where, for lack of Sunday laws—to be formulated by themselves, of course—our youth are systematically corrupted and debased. The facts are, as shown by the statistics of the Police Department, that, in Washington, Sunday is the most orderly and decorous day of the whole week; that ours is a moral and a well-behaved community; that the thing we need least of all is a new law still further regulating the observance of the Sabbath. They complain vociferously of the profane noises which, on the Sabbath, disturb the pious at their devotions, while the truth is that the church bells furnish the only clamor on that day which can be said to annoy or distress any reasonable human being. They come forward with lists of the 'places of business' found open on Sunday, when it is perfectly safe to say that nine-tenths of them could not be closed without paralyzing our common civilization. They are, in fact, a set of blatant and pernicious busybodies, who represent nothing worthy the attention of Congress.

"Such citizens as Gen. William Birney, Prof. W. A. Croffut, Rabbi Stern, Rev. Geo. B. Wheeler, Rev. A. H. Lewis, and the others who appeared to protest against the Crafts' bill are entitled to the heartfelt gratitude of the public. They stand for something in the communities to which they respectively belong—for legitimate occupation, for intelligence, for responsibility, and for the spirit of religious and political freedom.

"They plead the cause of human progress and enlightenment. They stand for the principles which this republic was founded to perpetuate. They do not ask that others shall be forced to accept their dogmas. They ask only that which the pioneers of liberty in America died to win for their posterity—emancipation from the cruelties and horrors of fanaticism. They are entitled to the respect and confidence of Congress. They represent the true public opinion of Washington. We want no more Sabbath legislation. We need no more. We are a moral and a cultured people. We ask that no encouragement be given to salaried meddlers with our affairs."

Hearing on the Sunday Bill in Albany.

THE hearing on this bill, the object of which is the removal of Sunday restrictions from plays, games, and general amusements recognized as being lawful on ordinary days of the week, was held before the Committee on Codes at Albany, March 1. The opposition speeches to the bill were very tame and contained nothing worthy of mention. The principal speech was that made by Mr. Harburger, of the Assembly, in favor of the bill, of which he is the author. This contained a number of interesting points, which we regard as worthy of wide publicity. To this end we make the following quotation:—

"I contend, first of all, that there are fewer violations of law and fewer breaches of order where the liberties of citizens are not curtailed on Sundays than in large cities in which there are such fanatical restrictions. In the city of Glasgow, in Scotland, where perhaps the severity of the Sunday ordinances against harmless amusements of any sort have been carried further than elsewhere, the number of arrests beginning at midnight on Saturday until midnight on Sunday is 10 per cent. larger than on any other day in the week, and in the city of London, where rigid local ordinances have curtailed the amusements of the people, the recent public statement of the London police department shows that there are more arraignments in the criminal courts for disorderly acts on Mondays than on any other two days in the week. I have been to the trouble of inquiring how in Berlin, Vienna, Paris, Milan, and other cities where there are no such radical restrictions against entertainments and amusements on Sunday operate, and I find that in each Sunday's arrests are fewer than on any other day and serious crimes on Sundays are a rarer occurrence than where such restrictions prevail. In the city of Glasgow the number of persons fined for intoxication in a year is twice as large as the number fined for the same offense against order in the city of Vienna and the population of Glasgow is 700,000, while the population of Vienna is 1,400,000."

"The opposition to a free Sunday," said Mr. Harburger, "has been waged along three successive lines: 'first, opposition to Sunday travel; second, opposition to Sunday newspapers; third, opposition to Sunday art galleries, museums, and libraries. What intelligent man,' he continued, 'on the floor of this assembly does not remember the long and vigorous battle waged between the narrow-minded bigots on the one side and the broad-minded and intelligent friends of freedom on the other concerning the opening of the Metropolitan Museum in New York on Sunday? The one day in the week upon which workingmen and their families, clerks, employes of commercial houses, and the great body of the population generally have for recreation, the ponderous doors of this establishment in the Central Park were closed upon that day. The libraries were closed, the minor art galleries were closed, and if some of the bigots had had their way the parks would have been closed. But battles for liberty, battles for freedom, battles for the restoration of popular rights are never lost.

"I contend that where the largest personal liberty is allowed by law on Sunday, there is the most liberal and unrestricted acknowledgment of the rights of every man who is so disposed to worship on that day and the largest freedom consistent with order. In the district which I have the honor to represent the sentiment for liberal Sunday laws is so nearly overwhelming as to be unanimous. An intolerant Sabbatarian would find no following there, and yet as the records of the New York health department for 1896 and again for 1897 show, the clergyman in New York who performed the largest number of marriages is a resident of the Tenth Assembly District, a clergyman of the Lutheran Church there.

"In the six square blocks bounded by Second and Fourth Streets, Second Avenue and Avenue B, there are three churches of the Catholic faith, a larger number than are to be found in a like portion of a like territory in any portion of the United States, and in another portion of the district the spiritual ministrations of practically all the inhabitants come not from those associated with any of the Christian churches, but from the synagogues which are there numerous. Yet such a thing as a collision or dispute on religious grounds in this neighborhood of thickly populated East Side is unknown. All dwell together in harmony; there is no conflict and no friction.

"Religious holidays are celebrated by this, or that, portion of the population as they occur in the round of the year, and in summer time especially some of the ceremonials are in part celebrated out of doors, but there is no such thing as a dispute of any kind. The golden rule is the rule of all. How is it in so many of the districts of the west and southwest where Whitecaps flourish and regulators abound—where the rights of one individual in a small town are held on the sufferance of his fellows? These are the places in which rigorous, austere, fanatical, and unreasonable Sunday laws abound, wherein, as has been said, the chief function of each man is thought by him to be to interfere with the rights of his fellow. I appeal to the consideration of the Assembly not for liberal Sunday laws but for the abolition of illiberal ones inconsistent with popular right, detrimental to order and morality, unreasonable, impracticable, favorable to corruption, and totally unsuited to the requirement and to the welfare of the people of a great cosmopolitan city."

We cannot of course recognize Mr. Harburger's distinction of "liberal" and "illiberal" Sunday laws; for in principle, all Sunday laws are the same, and the principle of them all is an illiberal principle.

It seems to have been taken for granted that Mr. Harburger's bill would not become a law, otherwise the opposition to the measure would doubtless have been much more strenuous.

THE Iowa Clinton County Advertiser, says the Sabbath Recorder, "reports the arrest of H. N. Schuier, of Belleview, Iowa, on the charge of 'Sabbath desecration,' for keeping his store open on Sunday. The case was fixed for trial on February 10. The Advertiser says that the arrest is the result of a 'revival' at Belleview."

THE Ram's Horn reports that "a gigantic petition movement for Sunday closing is to be inaugurated in all the Wesleyan churches of England, this year."

THE following notice was recently served on the barbers of the town of Longton, Elk County, Kansas:—

"You are hereby kindly requested to close and keep closed, your barber shops, in the city of Longton, Elk County, Kansas, after this date, on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday."

The notice is signed by the mayor, D. W. Jackson. What its effect was we have not yet learned.

A BILL has been brought before the New York Legislature which provides for "permitting non-professional games and sports on Sunday after 1 o'clock P. M. in cities of the first class, but prohibiting taking admission fees."

Studies in French History.—12.

"ANOTHER thing which King Philip did," began Professor Carman, "was to permit his son Louis VIII. to go over to England with an army—which the English barons had invited him to do—in order to take the throne from King John, whom they did not at all like. But John soon died, and popular opinion agreed that his innocent son, Henry, ought to have the throne. So Louis went back home."

"O, Professor Carman! Milly Brown has an essay about Louis IX.," piped Harry Ray.

"Is that so, Milly? When did you write it?"

"Yesterday," said Milly, blushing.

"Well, we may as well hear it, if you have no objections. Just step right up here, Milly."

"I don't know that it will be at all good, teacher; but mother and Aunt Fannie wanted me to try," and Milly began:—

"Louis the Eighth, the son of Philip II., did not reign more than three years. He married a very nice woman, who was noted for her good common sense, and her wonderful tact. Her name was Blanche.

"When Louis VIII. died, his wife Queen Blanche was the regent of the kingdom. Little Louis the Ninth was then only twelve years old."

"Will Milly please tell what 'regent' means?" interrupted Jack Smith, "I have an idea, but I'm not quite sure."

"I suppose it is one empowered to act in the place of a king or queen," replied Milly, at which Professor Carman nodded assent, and Milly proceeded:—

"While Queen Blanche was regent, the nobles, relieved by the death of the firm Philip, determined to have things their own way again. But Blanche managed to get along with them, and by her great tact, avoided trouble. She chose a wife for Louis IX., as the custom was, and Louis was so fond of her that his mother feared he would neglect his other duties for the sake of being in her company. So, to escape her watchful eyes, they used to meet on a stairway, and talk and visit to their heart's content, and the sentinels would pound on the floor as a warning, when the queen appeared; so we see that some kings can't always do just as they want to.

"Louis IX. was very nice looking and graceful in his bearing, and for a while, when quite young, was fond of nice clothes and fine equipage. But after a few years he began to dress with great simplicity, and to show an inclination toward religion, which was quite remarkable, though at his brilliant wedding no one would have imagined that he would ever be called 'Saint Louis.'

"He was a very good man, history says, a kind husband, neighbor and son. But he was foolish enough to insist upon going off to Palestine to fight the Turks. This was a very sad mistake. The great reason for his undertaking this crusade was, that he was taken very ill, and so he made a vow that if he got well, he would take an army over to Jerusalem. So I suppose he thought he had to keep his vow. He reigned from 1226 to 1270, or forty-four years."

"Very good, Milly; you have brought out a great many truths in your essay. In fact you have done well; I hope it will not be long before others follow your example."

"I know there is very much more about Louis IX., professor, but I did not have time to study his history any longer."

"Well, perhaps, it would be well to talk a little more about him," said Professor Carman.

"As Milly says, it was a foolish piece of business for him to start out for Palestine, but there were dreadful things happening in Asia. The Mongul Tartars were butchering the Christians, and Louis thought he must do something at once. These barbarians used to murder people, and then make piles or pyramids of their heads. They even stamped the dreadful word 'destruction' on their money.

"At last, after an extensive preparation, Louis started out, and when he came near to the city of Damietta, in Egypt, he was so eager for the fight that he jumped into the water and waded ashore."

"Was the city taken?" asked Florence Ray.

"Yes; but some how the king failed to make a permanent success of it. Next was fought the dreadful battle of Mansourah, in the narrow streets of which city the wretched French soldiers who had succeeded in forcing their way into the city were miserably massacred. The men who escaped fought bravely and gained some victories, but the climate was so deadly that many died, and the poor sick king was finally taken prisoner with all his army."

"It seems so strange," said Joe Palmeter, "that it took them so long to learn that the battles of the Lord ought never to be fought with the sword."

"Yes, indeed, Joseph, but that lesson has to be learned and re-learned in every age. At last the king gave the city of Damietta back again for his ransom. This generosity so pleased the sultan that he made a rebate of one fifth of the price he had at first demanded from the Christians."

"Meanwhile, I wonder what became of poor Queen Marguerite," said Harry Ray. "Did she go with him?"

"Yes; and she suffered much from anxiety while he was a prisoner. She cautioned the old knight who was nursing her to kill her if the Saracens should take the town in which she was. But she was quite shocked when the old fellow told her that he had intended to do so from the first.

"The little son that was born to the king at this dreadful time was named Tristan; meaning 'The Sad.'

"Louis stayed in Palestine four years, and then his mother died; so he returned home at once, his expedition proving to be only a great expense, with dreadful loss of life, and almost no profit to any one.

"But the French people were glad to see their king again. He had been gone away six years and they gladly welcomed him. But Louis was unable to shake off his sadness because he had not been successful in his crusade; so instead of the cheerful countenance which was natural to him, his people were grieved to see a settled melancholy upon his face."

"I think I have read somewhere that Saint Louis was a great hand to bring people together who had been enemies," said Edna Phillips.

"Yes; he delighted to be a peacemaker, and he spent the next fifteen years after he came home, in acting the part of a father to his people. People were accustomed to settling their disputes by the sword, up to this time; but Louis would not allow this wickedness, and rather than that either party should lose anything financially, the generous, peace-loving king would make it right with the injured party out of his own pocket."

"It's awful strange, I think," said Rob Billings, "that a man who was so tender-hearted and kind would fight those terrible crusades."

"It was under a mistaken sense of duty, I am sure," said Professor Carman, as he dismissed the class.

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

NEW YORK, MARCH 10, 1898.

READ, on another page, the article "In Holy Russia," and as you read, reflect that the atrocious invasion of sacred personal rights of which the Russian government is guilty as described, is defended simply and solely by the principle that the state ought to be united with religion. Reflect also that this principle has numerous and influential advocates in the United States.

SOME interesting facts and figures will be presented in next week's issue showing that a determined opposition is being made to the policy of discontinuing government appropriations of public money for sectarian institutions. In fact, it seems probable that this policy will be reversed, and the Government put back on the old track of church and state partnership. And remember that facts like these are what everybody ought to know.

THE pope, it is said, has given out as his "express wish," that Roman Catholics "should be loyal to the country in which they live, and in the event of war rally to their country's support." We give the pope credit for better sense than such a statement implies; but after all, the spectacle of Catholics of Spain fighting Catholics of the United States by order of "the church" would not be more incongruous than that of Methodists of the North fighting Methodists of the South under sanction of the church, as was witnessed in this country not long since.

THE Sunday-Rest Bill, upon which a hearing was recently given at Washington, was, it is said, a part of the annual output of the "Churchmen's League"—an organization representing the Episcopal Church. According to a spokesman of the League who writes in the Washington Post, of March 3, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and James Madison were members of the Episcopal Church. It is not claimed that they were the founders of the League; but it may appear that they were after the Catholic and other churches shall have finished revising history.

It is easy to shut one's eyes to anything and everything; and it is almost as easy to miss seeing things of importance by giving them only a casual, careless glance. Those who have given more than a casual glance to developments now taking place in this country know that the nation has reached the greatest crisis in its history. But their knowledge will not help you unless you can be induced to give your earnest attention to these things. What means the great "Christian Citizenship" movement, to the principle of which the greatest and most active church forces in the country now stand committed? Is this feature of the times worth considering? If not, what do you deem worth considering?

WE have received a small tract and a card sent by a party in Davenport, Iowa, making a "Call to the Christian Voters" of the land, for the formation of a United Christian Party to take charge of the country. He sees "a golden opportunity for the Christians to advance the kingdom of Jesus Christ on earth, to better the condition of the human race, and to overthrow the work of Satan in our Government," by having all Christians "united at the ballot box." "Present political parties," he says, "fail to give us a remedy to destroy evil and better conditions, because they have wandered away from God and rejected his Son, Jesus Christ, in politics." It is a straw which shows how the wind of "Christian politics" is blowing among the people.

THE "flag salute" has appeared in the public schools of Brooklyn; and, of course, there is trouble. A resident of that borough of Greater New York who knows the facts of the case sends us the following statement: "In one of the Eastern District schools of our city a little boy eight years old, for refusing to comply with the teacher's request to salute the flag, and participate in a military march around the school room, in which each boy when passing the flag was supposed to lay his right hand finger on the left shoulder, imitating the carrying of a gun, was punished by having to stand up all day during his studies. The following day he was punished by having his hand slapped with a ruler. His mother, when informed of these facts, called on the teacher, who tried to defend her act on the plea of patriotism, but referred her to the principle of the school, who pleaded ignorance of the matter, but promised to stop it; which, I am glad to say, was done and it has not yet been repeated." The lad's refusal, we learn, was not from stubbornness, but because he had been taught that the spirit of militarism was contrary to Christianity.

THE country has before it two object lessons warning against a union of church and state. One is Spain,—once the foremost nation in Europe, now bringing up the rear; vanquished by each of her American colonies; bankrupt in purse and prestige, and without any creditable history since the discovery of America,—Spain, the ever-faithful adherent of the Roman Catholic Church. The other object lesson—and one which the country is obliged to notice—is Utah: now endowed with the powers of a sovereign State, and rapidly furnishing evidence of being under the control of the Mormon Church. The American people revolted at the idea of the perpetuation of polygamy; but it has been demonstrated that the union of religion with the state is a greater evil than polygamy; that it, and not polygamy, is the root evil of Mormonism. Will the people of the United States now proceed to establish a religious state, for which millions of religious people here are now working? Will they establish on a national scale what Utah has furnished on the scale of a single State? If they do, with these object lessons before them, they will certainly be without excuse.

"JUDGE not, and ye shall not be judged." "Condemn not, and ye shall not be condemned."

EVERY Christian is called of God to be a reformer, but not one is called to reform any nation, community, or individual, by the power of legislatures or of courts.

THE church might lobby till doomsday to secure legislation in behalf of religious institutions, without ever convincing the world that there is such a thing as the power of godliness.

As regards religion, the majority in this world have always been on the wrong side. Hence the vote of the majority in a religious question is practically certain to be on the side of error.

MEN are not made good or bad by the government; but the government is made good or bad by the men who conduct it. Reform the men, and there will be no occasion for a reform in the government.

THE only government that is suited to a corrupt people is a despotism. When the American people become corrupt, a despotism must and will be set up over them. Despotism is the inevitable sequence of national corruption.

WHEN the "peace of God" rules in the heart, there is quiet in the soul; and that quietness is a hundred fold more essential to proper Sabbath observance than all the quiet that can be secured by Sunday laws. Without it, indeed, no real Sabbath observance is possible.

A SUNDAY law is a tax, demanding one seventh of all an individual's time. And this time is money to the individual, but cannot possibly be such to the government which demands it. It is of all taxes the most absurd, useless, unwarranted, and unjust. God alone has the right to require one seventh of a person's time, and he alone has a wise purpose in requiring it.

It is very strange that a prayer-meeting or other religious service can be held in the church on any "week-day" evening without being at all disturbed by work and traffic, but cannot be held on Sunday without "great disturbance," if there happens to be any work or traffic in the vicinity. One would think it was not possible to be religious except in the midst of absolute quiet.

A Word More on the Flag Salute.

IN reply to a correspondent from Iowa, who writes us that many people object to the SENTINEL's opposition to the flag salute on the ground that it would stifle patriotism, we take occasion to say a word more on the salute in its relation to patriotism.

The only salute we have specifically noticed is that used at Boulder, Col., which required the pupil to make a profession of allegiance to God. It was on this ground mainly that the SENTINEL opposed it.

The flag salute is used in many other States; and so far as we know, in no other does it contain any reference to God. Without this it is of course much less objectionable. But there are some principles which apply to these salutes in general, by which we think their character for good or evil must be determined. It is our aim to touch upon these in this article.

In the first place, we think there is ample evidence that, in most cases, the flag salute is designed rather to foster militarism than patriotism. That the spirit of militarism is creeping into the public schools, cannot be denied. The "Boys' Brigades" which are now so much "in evidence," marching through the streets equipped with all the accouterments of war, demonstrate this. The spirit that glorifies war is the spirit of militarism.

But militarism is not patriotism. Militarism means despotism, patriotism—in this country at least—stands for the opposite of despotism. Militarism is the curse of Europe. And if it is ever set up here, it will be the curse of America. We do not want it, and no true patriot will encourage it.

And in the second place, there is no evidence that the flag salute is an incentive to patriotism. The salute is but a form, and you cannot get the spirit out of the form. A person can go to church, and sing, and pray, and talk; but this will not give him piety. These forms are but the means by which his religious fervor finds expression. In themselves they are useless. And just so as regards patriotism. If the individual has patriotism, saluting the flag may be a suitable means of expressing it. But unless he already has it, the salute is meaningless, like any other mere form. Patriotism is a spirit, and not a form.

We do not believe any person can be truly patriotic without being upright, honest, courageous,—in short, endowed with the virtues of manliness. Any person endowed with these virtues will be patriotic naturally. And we do not believe the country wants any "patriots" of a different stamp.

The burden of proof is upon those who have introduced the flag salute, to show that it is an agency of good and properly belongs where they have put it.

The SENTINEL does not stand alone in opposition to this innovation. Whether it has the approval of the press generally or not, we do not know. But we do know that in at least one instance the secular press has condemned it. On this point we quote the words of the New York Journal, of January 24, with reference to the salute proposed for the schools of this State, which is as unobjectionable as any that we have seen. After stating the salute in detail, the Journal says:—

"This seems to be another example—they are already innumerable—of the unfortunate tendency of well meaning persons to mistake flag idolatry for patriotism. It were better to teach frankly to the boy that the flag is now what his fathers made it, and will be what he and his fellows make it; that it waved over slavery until his fathers purged it of that stain; that it waves now over political corruption, judicial injustice, and industrial distress, and will continue to spread its folds over these evils unless he and his fellows with stout hearts, pure minds, and honest purpose toil in their youth and in their age to sweep away the abominations which have grown up under our flag as under others.

"There is a wide difference between flag patriotism and true patriotism. The latter includes reverence for the flag; the former is apt to include nothing else."

Another Raid on the National Treasury.

THE old readers of the AMERICAN SENTINEL will well remember the campaign we made in 1890 and onward on the looting of the national treasury by the churches under cover of Indian schools. We gave from the public records the history of that raid from its inception. Those records show that the scheme was invented by the Catholics, who by easy persuasion and open invitation were joined by about fourteen professed Protestant denominations. These professed Protestant denominations soon found that they were being used by the Catholic organization as cats-paws—that by means of them the Catholic organization was getting money from the public treasury, which without them she never could have got at all. They found too that the Catholic Church, which first got nearly as much as all of them put together, soon was getting twice as much as all of them together, and soon again was getting a greater proportion than that. Then the "Protestant" churches began to turn Protestant; quit receiving public money, and protested vigorously against that "raid on the public treasury" which they with Rome had been engaged in for years.

This protest, however late, accomplished much. Though it took years to accomplish it, that "raid on the treasury was finally stopped: after millions of dollars had been taken from the national treasury by these churches and devoted to their own church work in their own church schools. It was a direct support of churches by the national government. By taking the money of all the people and appropriating it to these churches, the United States Government was but compelling people to make contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which they do not believe, which our fathers declared to be "sinful and tyrannical."

In view of the foregoing sketch of some recent history the following from the Northwestern Christian Advocate, of February 23, 1898, is intensely suggestive and well worthy the most thoughtful consideration:—

"Some Methodist Episcopal names which are precious in all branches of Methodism are on record as favoring the pending congressional claim of the Southern Methodist Church for damages. A prominent and eminent minister of the southern church, in a dinner-table speech to the Cincinnati Methodist Social union, which latter recently gave a reception to the Book Committee, said that he returned thanks for several things, among others 'for the fact, he would call it a civil fact, that the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church had generously given their approval to the claim of the Southern Methodist Church, without which my church probably would not have received a much-needed appropriation' from Congress. We quote these words as substantially verbatim, for they express just that which the speaker said. That speech made our episcopal indorsement a public fact, and we therefore ask no pardon for alluding to it, nor do we waste time to say that our allusion is entirely respectful.

"We regret that our bishops have indorsed the claim, for the reason that it is excessive at a time when there is no just ground for any claim whatever, and because we are securely intrenched by facts that show that no Protestant church in this republic—the Southern Methodist Church not excepted—can afford to have that claim passed by the Senate, signed by the President and paid.

"We have it from authorities that command national respect and confidence that hundreds of other claimants are behind this Southern Methodist bill for indemnity and damages. Millions of dollars' worth of greedy clamor awaits this successful award. Among them are Roman Catholic claims that will open the eyes of this nation, but when it will be too late. Some Roman claims already have been granted, and some of our own churchmen declare that 'it is right, therefore, that some of the public money should go to Protestants.' Four of our eminent ministers recently have said just that to this writer.

"The Methodist claim, as we firmly believe and have sound reason to hold, has been advanced and put through the House by the combined, massed, concentrated, and therefore irresistible influence of the friends of other claims already formulated and awaiting the 'breaking of the jam,' as pine-log herders say of their river work in the spring. We therefore do not marvel at the wonder and surprised gratitude of that same Cincinnati banquet speaker who emphasized his astonishment that a claim that had never been able to pass a Democratic Congress is now in such a gratifying position in a Republican Congress. We are inclined to congratulate the Democrats upon their worldly wisdom and traditional astuteness!

"Any man can stake his reputation upon the prophecy that this claim, if matured and paid, will presently be followed by insistent other claims for large sums which will get through because that Nashville demand has manifested so much importunity for a third of a century. If it were possible for our own Methodist Episcopal Church to make some large claim, American and all other Jesuits and American politicians would support it; and for two reasons: 1. Because they would reap enduring gratitude from the largest church in the United States; and 2. Because the question of the precedent of a successful claim paid to the largest church in the republic would open the floodgates to the Roman greed which already has made New York City and other cities a very bonanza gold mine and replete and accessible treasury for the benefit of an unfillable maw. This historic Roman greed and its appetite for all that our national treasury can feed to it, is the correct, reasonable, and sufficient explanation to our Cincinnati banquet speaker why Republicans have done that which Democrats dared not.

"Harpies, greedy seekers after federal gold and designing politicians are making cats' paws of our Southern brethren. These latter condemn us for resisting their claim, alleging that we are 'reactionist,' are 'unfraternal,' and so on. For purposes in hand only, we must be entirely indifferent to that estimate, and we now return answer that we really honor them when we declare our belief that, if they properly weighed the facts sketched in this article, and shadowed in the entire series of this, our most recent opposition to their claim, they would refuse to accept its proceeds and would indignantly decline to be made a precedent whereby our national treasury will be looted to an extent that will make Methodism a reproach for two generations. Not for one moment have we resisted the claim for motives like those attributed to us. Our grounds for opposition are far better than that. It is the old Roman Catholic Indian school question over again. Protestants have decided to accept no more government Indian school money, because it is a block, inside the treasury, to hold open the door while greed fills its lustful hands.

"This danger is real. The immense claims are formulated and await the golden hour in which mints will scarcely be able to coin money fast enough to pay constructive, excessive, and outrageous damages to people whom the government has fostered and not harmed."

A. T. J.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

THE call to W. C. T. U. work was the most wonderful part of its history. It was to the on-looker only an unaccountable popular uprising, but to those who were in it, it was upon the part of each woman a personal answer to a personal call of God. There were, of course, some women who simply joined the crusading crowd, and soon fell away; but those who stood by during the reaction-days, when crusade enthusiasm was succeeded by calm deliberation, and the routine of organization, did so because they had heard and understood the voice of God. That voice had broken in like a sudden shower of rain upon those souls everywhere that lived with their windows open toward the skies, and produced the same quickening in each.

"Bear ye one another's burdens," were the words set to the music of that rain. "I have promised that I would not leave the world comfortless," chided the voice which we knew and loved. "Wherefore, then, is it so nearly comfortless under the shadow of a great curse. Arise, ye daughters that are at ease, and help me to heal the hurt of the children of my people."

I must draw from actual experiences to give a true color to this history; experiences which were almost as universal as they were personal.

First of all was the experience of ignorance in the things of the world out of which we had all had a similar awakening.

Woman had been shut in through all the generations. Fathers, lovers, and husbands had thought that because the world was so very evil, it must needs be that the home maker should be kept ignorant of it. They had not as yet conceived of the truth that ignorance is not purity. They felt that the home must be kept pure at all hazards. The growing boy must have the memory of a childhood amid holy surroundings to take with him when he made his inevitable plunge into the life that awaited him as a man; the secrets of which no pure woman must dream of, since she could not share them and live. Such was the reasoning of the world, and as a result we were in a much more literal sense, than I am sure Christ ever intended, "in the world and yet not of it."

There was, as age came on, for almost every thoughtful woman, a rude awakening to the fact that men

"turned out so different from what boyhood had promised." Boys were as sweet as girls up to a certain age; then, as a rule, they naturally(?) became rough, and later on barely escaped brutality. The mother could not forget her love for her boy, and by that love was crucified in almost every son she bore. An incident of a generation ago will make my meaning plain. The young mother of an eighteen months old boy had in her home a venerable guest. One morning as she was in a frolic with him on the carpet, looking up into the face of the elder woman expecting to find in it a reflection of her own delight in the child, she found sadness, almost bitterness instead. She could not understand; and smiled a questioning smile out of her ignorant happiness, which brought from the trembling, aged lips a sigh which took form in words:

"O take all the comfort you can with your boy now while you can."

"Certainly," came the wondering reply. "I expect to do that; but why do you speak to me in that doleful strain? Why imply that there will ever be a time that I will not take comfort in my boy?"

"O but he is growing up to be a man."

"I certainly hope so," replied the young mother almost defiantly. "I expect he will grow up to be a man:—but why should that not make me glad; what makes you so grave about it; why do you talk to me like that?"

"O you dear innocent; you do not know:—but there are things out in the great world that spoil boys for their mothers."

How could that young mother with her beautiful boy in her arms understand this sorrowful wisdom? Comprehension had to come through revelation, by an altogether unexpected means. The shell of the world that had shut mothers in to a secluded sacred inner chamber alone with love, with God and his Word, had to be broken before they could see and understand, and be fully equipped for their legitimate home-work.

It was the shock of the civil war that broke down the walls and thrust woman out into the world; and opened it to her view just as it was; unable to even attempt to cover up its evils from the eyes that it had been supposed could not look upon them and remain pure. When we found ourselves a nation of widows, fatherless children, and invalid soldiers; and woman was obliged, all inexperienced as she was, to become the bread-winner; meeting the conditions of the business world just as man had created them for himself alone; she found how far the race had gone astray from the principles to which she had anchored her faith, and which she had taught the child, only, as she now saw, to have them repudiated by the man. She found that truth was blasphemed by every condition of society, business, and government; and that it was not held as very sacred, even in the work-a-day-world part of the church.

Then she discovered the mysteries of the sorrows of aged womanhood;—the saloon, and the house of sin, those traps for body and soul, those holes of the pit, that "Wicked sitting in the lurking places of the villages to murder the innocent, to catch the poor; that doth catch the poor when he draweth him into his net." Ps. 10.

The women who had been personally wounded by this enemy of all purity, the wives and mothers of drunkards, were by their sorrows rendered unequal to a war against the evil. Many of them had lost all hope and faith; had ceased to believe in God. Their agonies, however, appealed to heaven for them, and God by his Spirit, laid their burdens upon the hearts of those who as yet did not know vice as a personal enemy. Women whose homes were secure should certainly be able to respond bravely to such a call as that mysterious voice had sounded in the soul of womanhood. And so the uprising of the crusade became the most remarkable manifestation of Christlike love and care for others woes which the world has ever witnessed.

God Before Country.

The "Independent" (N. Y.), March 10.

A REPRESENTATIVE Catholic paper, published in Chicago, makes the following extravagant declaration of the loyalty of Catholics to the flag in case of war with Spain:—

"If once war were declared between this country and Spain, the sentiment of Catholics, as of those of other creeds, would be accurately summarized in those famous words of Stephen Decatur: 'Our country: in her intercourse with foreign nations, may she always be in the right; but, our country, right or wrong.'

So say not we. We boast not that kind of loyalty. We believe in putting God before country always; religion before patriotism, if the two—which God forbid—should ever clash. John Quincy Adams once rebuked that sentiment of Stephen Decatur's:—

"And say not thou, 'My country right or wrong,' Nor shed thy blood in an unhallowed cause. . . .
If then thy country trample on the right,
Furl up her banner, and avert thy sight."

What is the Mark?—No. 1.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

In the last article it was shown that the mark that is to be enforced by the United States, symbolized by the two-horned beast of Rev. 13:11-17, is the mark of the papacy—symbolized by the ten-horned leopard beast of verses 1-10.

It was also pointed out that the enforcing of the mark, whatever it may be, is an act of worship, as through it the people are to be made to worship that which is called an image to the beast—or papacy.

This at once proves that the mark is a religious institution, and also that it is a test of loyalty; and whenever it is sought to be enforced it will be represented as being "the mark."

Thus far in our investigation of this prophecy the evidence has been overwhelming that this nation is positively the only one that answers to the symbols found in Rev. 13:11.

In asking the question "What is the Mark?" we shall find the evidence just as convincing and as plentiful, for there can possibly be only one answer.

In all the history of the United States there is positively only one institution, and that too a religious one, that has been set forth as a mark—just one that is regarded as a test of loyalty; and that institution is SUNDAY.

Furthermore, there is positively only one institution that the papacy claims as her own to which she points as "the mark" of her authority; and that institution is SUNDAY.

It is well known that for over a third of a century strong, determined efforts have been made to have the Constitution so changed as to have all Christian laws and usages made a part of the fundamental law of the land, and chiefest among these is the Sunday.

At first the movement was not received very favorably, but it grew, so that to-day the cause is espoused by nearly every denomination and religious society and organization in the land.

Prominent among the representative utterances in behalf of Sunday are the following:—

"For nothing were the noble men who planted true Christianity and an evangelical church in the wilderness, now constituting the United States, more distinguished than for their reverence of the Sabbath [Sunday]. It was quite a prominent feature in their character—a sign between them, and the heathen world around, and to a large extent it has continued to be a mark of American religion to the present day."—Rev. J. G. Lorimer, in Christian Treasury.

"Resolved, That the fundamental principle of the National Reform Association . . . are true and scriptural principles, and that these principles must control our national life, or we shall perish.

"Resolved, That the Sabbath [Sunday] is a sign between God and man, and its reverent observance a mark of the nation whose God is Jehovah."—Resolution presented by Rev. Joseph Smith at a National Reform Assembly at Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

It will be noticed in the above quotations that Sunday is spoken of as being both a sign and mark, the words being used synonymously.

We quote further:—

"The Sabbath [Sunday] is the corner stone of Christ's kingdom. Let us recognize each recurring Sabbath [Sunday] as the sign of God's covenant. By this sign the world largely judges the depth of our Christian character, and by this sign God judges us."—Mrs. J. C. Bateham, Sabbath leaflet.

These are representative utterances, and are accepted by nearly all religious organizations; and many other similar utterances could be cited. All of which proves that Sunday and that only, is the mark; for, as stated before, this is the only religious institution (and sought to be enforced as an act of worship) that is called a mark.

The importance with which this day is regarded will be still further seen when it is recognized as being the "test of all religion." And not only is that stated, but also this: "The people who do not keep the Sabbath [Sunday] have no religion."

According to this statement it makes no difference what a person's faith may be; he may be as firm a believer in Jesus Christ as his personal Saviour as even Rev. Dr. Everts, who made this statement professed to be; but because he does not keep Sunday he has no religion. Could Sunday be set forth more plainly as a mark?

But this is not all. The same "reverend gentleman" who spoke the above, also said: "He who does not keep the Sabbath [Sunday] does not worship God; and he who does not worship God is lost."

These remarks and many others were made with the view of securing a national law for the enforcement of Sunday.

Nor is it simply because it is said to be a sin against God that it is desired to enforce the keeping of Sunday by law. It is regarded as being equally a sin against our country and high treason against the state, as witness the following by "Rev." W. Greer, at the Philadelphia National Reform Convention of 1888: "Every sin, secret or public, against God, is a sin against our country, and is high treason against the state." Also this, by Rev. J. Boring Gold: "The man who does not subscribe to the doctrine of Sabbath [Sunday] observance is a traitor to his country, and should be treated as such."

The keeping of Sunday is therefore made a test of one's loyalty to God and to the country; and that being so, beyond all question, Sunday is the mark.

The Sad Story of Spain.

New York "World," March 10.

THE graphic picture of the territorial decline of the colonial empire of Spain in the Western Hemisphere published in the World last Monday has been supplemented by the record of its losses from year to year as told in our news columns of yesterday.

Not since the downfall of the Roman Empire has there been such a story of the rise to greatness and the fall to helplessness of a great power. It is one of the striking coincidences of history that if Spain to-day finds itself menaced with the loss of its last American possessions through a conflict with the greatest of American republics, the beginning of the power of Spain may be dated from the year 1492, in which the discovery of Columbus led to the ultimate establishment of the United States.

The year which gave the Western Hemisphere to Spain witnessed the expulsion of the Moors from Grenada and made the peninsula one united country. Its first king, Ferdinand of Aragon, whose marriage with Isabella of Castile in 1469 marked the beginning of a real Spanish kingdom, was also the last Spanish king, for at his death, in 1516, the succession passed into the line of the Hapsburgs, with sad and melancholy consequences for the civilized world.

During the four hundred years of its rise and fall its invariable record has been one of cruelty, of persecution, of bigotry, of hostility to every sentiment of human freedom, common justice, and enlightenment. The slavery to which it doomed its subjects in the Western Hemisphere was not more cruel than its oppression of the people of Holland, or its tyranny over its own people at home. The bigotry, the fanaticism, the intolerance, and the gloomy superstition of its tone of mind is unrelieved by one single gleam of recognition of human rights, just as the disgraceful record of its decay and downfall is unrelieved by one single triumph of genius in statesmanship or of prowess in battle against an armed enemy.

One by one Spain's possessions have fallen away, like bricks from a mouldering wall, until to-day it stands alone and isolated, bankrupt in resources, helpless and exhausted, but still clinging to that policy of cruelty, of oppression and extermination which has been its only known method of dealing with Morisco and Aztec and Inca and Hollander—and Cuban—and which after four hundred years has finally forced it to confront the republic of freedom, of equality, of justice, of humanity, of civilization.

It is not accident or chance which has brought about the present situation. It is inexorable destiny which decrees that the last of Spain's illgotten possessions in this hemisphere should be lifted to freedom by the one republic which represents everything that Spain has antagonized during her whole history.

The Seed of Abraham Under Roman Influence.

Up to the time of Christ's first advent, the persecution of God's chosen people had ever been by the united interests of civil and religious power. Each of the six nations which had sought the destruction of the seed of Abraham, were those having a national religion, and that religion was uniformly sun worship in some of its various forms. But when Christ appeared in the midst of the Jewish nation, as the true seed of Abraham, the literal descendants of that patriarch—the Jews themselves—in unison with the Roman government under which they lived, began a systematic persecution upon him, which finally carried him to his death on Calvary's cross.

When the dispersion of the Jewish nation was effected by the Romans, that dominant power next turned its attention to the Christians whom it hated as strongly as it had the Jews, and for the one great reason: these people, being counted of God as the seed of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise (Gal. 3:29), were opposed to Rome's national system of sun-worship and refused to recognize it, choosing death rather than to dishonor their Master. The Roman law forbade anyone having a religion of his own, and the penalty for such an offense was death to the plebeian, or common subject, while any patrician, or nobleman, offending in the same, was subject to be degraded, and transported to some isolated spot, away from the enjoyment of civil privileges.

But notwithstanding this rigorous law, Christianity spread and strengthened, until it became an influential factor in national affairs. But when it sought earthly honors, its standard of purity was lowered, and its tone of piety was moderated to accommodate itself to surrounding circumstances. Mosheim says that when the second century dawned, it found the church so far yielded to the mysteries of paganism as to imitate its forms, even to turning the face toward the sun in worship.—Eccl. Hist., cent. 2, part 2, chap. 4, par. 5, 7.

Nor was this all. In the fourth century, "The rites and institutions, by which the Greeks, Romans, and other nations had formerly testified their religious veneration for fictitious deities, were now adopted, with some slight alterations, by Christian bishops, and employed in the service of the true God." This was carried so far, indeed, as the historian adds, that "the religion of the Greeks and Romans differed very little in its appearance from that of the Christians." And all this was done because "these fervent heralds of the gospel, whose zeal outran their candor and integrity, imagined that the nations would receive Christianity with more facility when they saw the rites and ceremonies to which they were accustomed adopted in the church, and the same worship paid to Christ and his martyrs which they had formerly offered to their idol deities."—Ibid., cent. 4, part 2, chap. 14, par. 1.

Alas for the deceitful power of Satan. It has ever been his policy to blind the spiritual sight of God's people, by getting them to unite their interests with civil government, in order to hasten the conversion of those outside the pale of the church. Fatal delusion, indeed. The only wonder is, that with such a course as the historian records, any vestige of the Christian faith remained. As it was, the complexion of the church became so changed that its services differed little from those of the heathen round about. It did not take long for this Pagan-Christianity to become the dominating influence in the church, which in turn demanded from all the acknowledgment of its sway, just as the unalloyed paganism had formerly done. It is therefore but natural to find the historian recording that the Emperor Constantine "assumed to himself" the "external administration of the church," thus placing himself where he could settle all matters of church discipline according to his own idea."—Ibid., cent. 4, part 2, chap. 2, par. 4.

It was not long before he took the next step in this assumed sway. Some of the Christians of that time did not readily yield to the prevailing influence, and so stood aloof from the pagan rites and ceremonies adopted by the church. Especially were they not willing to honor the day of the sun, which the greater portion of the church had appropriated in imitation of the pagans. The controversy created by this state of things became so marked that the emperor interfered, and in the year 321 issued the following edict:—

“Let all the judges and townspeople, and the occupation of all trades rest on the venerable day of the sun; but let those who are situated in the country, freely and at full liberty attend to the business of agriculture, because it often happens that no other day is so fit for sowing corn and planting vines; lest, the critical moment being let slip, men should lose the commodities granted by Heaven.”

Two things about this edict of Constantine are worthy of attention. First, it calls the day to be observed “the venerable day of the sun,” thus retaining its pagan name and character. There is not a single hint that the emperor sought to enforce it as a Christian institution. It was simply the old reverend day of the sun. From all that appears, the pagan sentiment alone was all the edict sought to instil. Second, it assumed the right of the emperor to exempt some from the observance of the day, while holding others rigidly to it, thus showing that the law had its origin in the decree of the empire alone. In other words, it was the assumed authority of a secular ruler to control the consciences of his subjects in any way that suited him.

Four years later, having in the meantime nominally connected himself with Christianity, the emperor convened the Council of Nice, which was made entirely subservient to his will. Two questions were to be settled; one relating to the Arian controversy, and the other respecting the proper day on which to celebrate Easter. The latter question was one of the principle reasons for calling the council. It seems that the eastern churches up to that time had kept that ordinance on the fourteenth day of the moon, without regard to the day of the week, just as the Jews had always done in observing the passover. Those churches, however, which had fallen under the influence of Rome, were determined to have that festival fall on Sunday.—Boyle's Hist. of the Council of Nice, p. 22.

This important question, like others, was settled by the emperor, who had before “assumed to himself the external administration of the church.” In a letter to the churches, in which he directs all to yield to the decrees of the council, he says that when the question came up, “it seemed to everyone a most unworthy thing that we should follow the custom of the Jews in the celebration of this most holy solemnity.” He then assumes the responsibility to call the Jews “polluted wretches,” and exhorts all to “have nothing in common with the most hostile rabble of the Jews.”—Ibid., p. 52. The letter closes with the following solemn assurance that the decree of the council is the will of God: “This being the case, receive with cheerfulness the heavenly and true divine command. For whatever is transacted in the holy councils of the bishops, is to be referred to the divine will. Wherefore, having announced to our beloved brethren what has been already written, it is your duty to receive and establish the arguments already stated, and the observance of the most holy day.”—Page 54.

The adoption of Christianity in theory by Constantine, while still maintaining the forms of paganism, was but to blend the two systems into one, and so produce the papacy. The Council of Nice forged the implements of persecution which were destined to prove greater than any the “seed of the woman” had hitherto endured. Matt. 24:21. By the bishops of the church voting in that council voting to make the decrees of the emperor the creed of the church, the union of the church and state, under the papacy, was permanently effected, and power was given the civil government to enforce religious dogmas of pagan origin upon its subjects. J. O. C.

IN a Roman Catholic church in Pueblo, Mexico, there was recently posted the following notice, which was seen and read by Rev. Francis S. Borton, a Protestant missionary, who sent a transcript of the same to the Christian Endeavor World:—

“Raffle for Souls. At the last Raffle for Souls the following numbers obtained the prize, and the lucky holders may be assured that their loved ones are forever released from the flames of Purgatory:—

“Ticket 841. The soul of the lawyer, James Vasquez, is released from Purgatory and ushered into heavenly joys.

“Ticket 41. The soul of Madame Calderon is made happy forever.

“Ticket 762. The soul of the aged widow, Francisca de Parras, is forever released from the flames of Purgatory.

“Another raffle for souls will be held at this same blessed Church of the Redeemer on January 1st, at which four bleeding and tortured souls will be released from Purgatory to Heaven, according to the four highest tickets in this most holy lottery. Tickets, one dollar. To be had of the Father in charge. Will you, for the poor sum of one dollar, leave your loved ones to burn in Purgatory for ages?”

This is Romanism “at home,” where her true nature is most clearly seen. What the Roman religion is in Mexico, and in South America, that it is in its real nature here in the United States. Of this there can be no question whatever. And it is evident that it is the same now as it was when the monk Tetzels went through Germany peddling his “indulgences,” which roused the indignation of Luther and started him upon the work of the Reformation.

DR. HATHAWAY, Secretary of the American Sabbath Union, recently had a conference with the officials of the Pennsylvania Railroad respecting Sunday excursions. He states that they declared they would be glad to give them up altogether if other railroad lines would cooperate.

NEVER in the history of civilization, probably, was there a time when the sound of war so reverberated throughout the world as it does to-day. No great war is actually in progress; but everywhere there are hurried preparations for a war which, when it does come, will be greater than any which has darkened the pages of human history.

THERE is war in Cuba, and war in prospect between Spain and the United States. The great powers of Europe are growling at each other over the division of Chinese spoils. Japan has addressed a warlike note to Russia, and the latter government is straining every nerve to hurry troops to her Pacific Coast. England is fighting the Mahdi in Central Africa and the rebellious tribes, in Northern India. In South America, Argentina is getting ready for a conflict with Chile. In Crete, affairs between the Moslems and the "Christians" are anything but quiet; and the spirit of apprehension and preparation for impending strife has invaded every civilized country on the globe.

THE world is rapidly approaching a condition of things in which the only people in it who will retain the blessings of peace, will be Christians. The Christian is, above all others, a man of peace; he is a follower of the Prince of Peace, and a partaker of the divine nature, which is peace-loving. The Christian—and he alone—always has peace; not a figurative, imaginary peace either, but a literal peace. He knows that he has it, because he realizes its presence in his soul. And never does he realize it more fully than when in the midst of external strife and commotion.

IN the case of the Christian—and of him alone—there is an impenetrable barrier between the spirit of that without him, and the spirit within him. The spirit without him is the spirit of the world; but he is "not of this world." If he were of this world, then the spirit of the world—the spirit of strife and unrest—would find a responsive chord in his heart, and he would feel and be actuated by the same spirit. He who is of the world must partake of the spirit of the world; and at a time like the present he cannot but be moved by the spirit of unrest, of strife, of covetousness, of revenge, which is creating universal turmoil throughout the earth.

It is a time to call to mind the words of the psalm-st: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." Ps. 91:1. In the time of confusion and conflict to which everything earthly is now tending, it will be of inestimable value to dwell in the "secret place," shut out from the world, where is the abiding presence of peace. But first there must be in the heart a repetition of that miracle upon the Galilean Lake where the voice of the Son of God said to the tempest, "Peace! be still!" And these are always the first words spoken by Him when the heart is opened for his admission.

It would be useless to think of engaging in war without partaking of the spirit of war. And the spirit of Christianity is not the spirit of war, when the war is to be fought with carnal weapons. Not that Christianity does not stand for justice and the relief of the oppressed. It does this, and to the very fullest extent. But it operates not through the agency of carnal weapons, but by the power and the sword of the Spirit. The giving of supplies of food to the starving Cubans is the expression of the spirit of Christianity; but as much could not be said for the killing of Spanish soldiers, in which work many "Christians" are now expecting to engage. "The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them."

It cannot be said that justice and mercy have been more promoted in this world by the sword than by the spirit of Christ. All history testifies to the contrary. "The pen is mightier than the sword;" the voice of truth mightier than the roar of the cannon. The "still small voice" heard by the listening prophet upon Horeb, was the expression of a mightier power than was represented in whirlwind and earthquake and fire. Christianity stands to-day, as it has ever stood, for the promotion of justice and of judgment, of prosperity and of peace, in the earth, by the use of the most powerful and effective agency that has ever promoted these blessings since the world began.

WE have not a word to say against civil government or politics, as regards their necessity for this world, or against the propriety of one who is of this world engaging in them. Civil government must be in this world, and there can be no possible way of administering its affairs better than by officials chosen by popular ballot. We only say that a Christian—one who has been called out from the world—cannot consistently engage in politics. He cannot be of the world and not of the world at the same time. For he is under a different government than any on the earth—a government of God, which is the kingdom of God within him. As Jesus said to his disciples, "The kingdom of heaven is within you." This is a literal fact; this kingdom and government are literal, just as much so as an earthly government is literal.

"The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king." Isa. 33:22. And if all people on the earth were Christians, then there would be here a government of God, just as there will be when all on the earth who are not Christians shall have been blotted from its face. The conduct of the Christian—in business as well as in religion—is controlled by the kingdom of God within him and not by any earthly government under which he lives. He is subject to the rules of earthly government for "conscience' sake" (Rom. 13:5), or because he is under God's government. He is the most useful of all men on the earth because his citizenship is in heaven.

Religious Liberty in the South.

A RELIGIOUS POST-OFFICE WAR.

ACCORDING to the Bristol (Tenn.) Courier of recent date, a petition numerously signed has been sent to Washington from New Market, Tenn., praying that the postmaster at that place be instructed to open the post-office for an hour on Sunday. The postmaster is an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and the sending of the petition has stirred up no little strife. The Courier remarks that the town "is in the midst of a religious post-office war, and the community is embroiled from center to circumference."

Several of the ministers of the place have delivered sermons on the subject, and one of them is reported to have said:—

"If I knew there was a letter from my dying mother in the post-office on Sunday, I would not go after it until Monday."

The opinion is expressed that the office will be opened regardless of the conscientious scruples of those "who do not have to get their mail unless they want to."

But it may be asked, What about the conscience of the Presbyterian postmaster? The answer is easy. If the department orders the office opened on Sunday and the postmaster cannot conscientiously obey the order, he can resign. Matthew was required to leave "the receipt of custom"—abandon his business as tax-gatherer—to follow Christ, and his disciples should one and all stand ready to-day to deny themselves in like manner for his sake. The man who sustains loss for what he believes to be fidelity to his Saviour, should rejoice that he is accounted worthy to suffer for his sake.

But how can any man thus rejoice when called to suffer for refusal to do business on Sunday? Where is the Scripture that even so much as intimates that it is a sacred day, or that Christ would have his followers observe it? It cannot be found; and since this is now very generally known to be so; those who sustain loss for keeping it have small consolation; they cannot claim the blessing pronounced upon those who suffer for righteousness' sake, hence they turn instinctively to the civil law to protect them against being "compelled" on the one hand to work on Sunday, or on the other to suffer the loss of position or custom by remaining true to their profession of faith in the Sunday institution. It is to supply the lack of divine law that civil statutes are enacted for the "protection" of Sunday.

MORMON ELDERS AND PROTESTANT PREACHERS.

Chattanooga is the headquarters of the Mormon propaganda for the South. Hundreds of Salt Lake missionaries arrive and depart for that place every year, and many tons of Mormon publications are mailed there in the course of twelve months. But large as is the regular business done by this denomination in the South, the present season has been one of increased activity. The number of Mormon missionaries now in the Southern field is said to be two thousand, and their activity is annoying the regular ministers not a little. A recent despatch from Tampa, Fla., says:—

"This section of the State is alive over the advent of a number of Mormon elders, and the people in the different towns have openly expressed their intentions of driving the Utah proselyters from their midst. Already from some small country settlements trouble has arisen over the work of the Mormons, and in two cases the preachers were driven out of the place under threats of whipping if they remained."

Now the writer has not the least sympathy with the distinctive doctrines of Mormonism; he believes that they are a deluded people and that their elders are "deceiving and being deceived;" but nobody is compelled even to listen to them, much less to believe and embrace their doctrines, unless he wants to do so. Under the laws of the several states, these men have the same right to make proselytes to their faith, to teach their doctrines publicly and privately, that other ministers have; and to deny them this legal right, to invoke against them whitecap methods, to mob them and drive them from the community by force or by threats of personal violence, is unworthy of a free people. Every man who loves liberty for himself should insist that every other man be permitted to enjoy an equal measure of it. Any community can a thousand times better afford to tolerate even the teaching of Mormonism rather than to encourage the spirit of bigotry, intolerance, and lawlessness that necessarily accompanies whitecap methods.

But what has incited the people to mob violence against those emissaries of the Mormon Church? According to the reports published in the secular papers, the preachers of the various denominations are responsible in large measure for this outburst of unchristian and un-American conduct on the part of the people. The Chattanooga News, of February 10, publishes a portion of an address of warning which certain Florida ministers have put forth, and in which occurs the following incendiary language:—

"They are making an earnest effort to establish Mormonism in Florida, and their representatives have reached Tampa and are busy among our people. . . . They have no claims upon us and deserve no recognition at the hands of a Christian public. They are enemies of our political institutions, of our homes, of all social order, as well as of our common Christianity. Their presence in a community is an impeachment of its intelligence and an insult to its morality."

Such a "warning" could result in nothing else than exhibitions of intolerance and lawlessness ten times more hurtful to genuine religion, to sound morals, and to "our political institutions" than the teaching of Mormonism. Mormonism being opposed to the fundamental principles of Christianity is dangerous only to those who have no well-grounded religious faith and who know but little of the truths of divine revelation. The safeguard against its errors is not violence, but truth; not whipping, but teaching; not black gum or hickory rods, but the sword of the Spirit. Oh, that Christians one and all might speedily learn that, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." "All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Let us, then, not appeal to physical force, but to spiritual power, that we may live and not die in that great day when only God's truth and those who have built upon it shall stand.

Decision on the Flag Salute in Colorado.

THE following from the Denver (Col.) News, of March 1, gives the latest information that has come to us regarding the situation raised by the flag salute in Boulder:—

"BOULDER, Colo., Feb. 28.—The flag salute controversy was heard before County Superintendent Harding this afternoon. Dr. Reed represented the Seventh-day Adventists and Chairman E. J. Temple the school board. After reviewing the case Superintendent Harding decided that the flag salute, as it now stands, is a religious test and ordered that all students expelled for non-compliance with the salute order be reinstated at once. As Chairman Temple left the office he announced that the school board would have a flag salute enforced in the schools next Monday morning so modified from the present form that it could not be disqualified on religious principles."

Senate Bill for Sectarian Appropriations.

THE District Appropriations Bill, which provides for the maintenance of various charitable institutions in the District of Columbia, and was reported to the Senate of the United States, March 3, contains the following specifications (pp. 53, 54):—

"For the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish, maintenance, one thousand eight hundred dollars.

"For Saint Ann's Infant Asylum, maintenance, five thousand four hundred dollars.

"For Association for Works of Mercy, maintenance, one thousand eight hundred dollars.

"For House of the Good Shepherd, maintenance, two thousand seven hundred dollars.

"For the Saint Rose Industrial School, maintenance, four thousand five hundred dollars.

"For Saint Joseph's Asylum, maintenance, one thousand eight hundred dollars.

"For Young Woman's Christian Home, one thousand dollars."

The first-named of these institutions belongs to the Episcopal Church. The rest, excepting the last, are the property of the Roman Catholic Church.

This bill proposes the repeal of the Act of March 3, 1897, which provided that no contract for appropriations to private institutions "shall extend beyond the thirtieth day of June, 1899, and that no payment shall be made under any such contract except for service actually rendered." This provision is crossed out in the bill now under the Senate's consideration.

This, therefore, is nothing else than a deliberate attempt to reinstate the principle of sectarian appropriations, which by the Act of March 3, 1897, had been practically discarded.

The influence behind this part of the Appropriations Bill is of course that of the churches whose institutions receive the benefit of the proposed grants. It is said by one who has an inside view of affairs at the Capitol that the Methodist and Catholic churches are in league to secure the passage of this sectarian measure by Congress; that the Methodists will help the Catholics in the Senate, and the Catholics the Methodists in the House.

The money appropriated by the Government to sectarian institutions is raised by taxation. The people therefore are taxed to support an institution of the church; and this is contrary to free government. For the people never proposed to establish a church; the people are adherents of various churches or of no church. They could not possibly be united in support of any one church, or any two. What they did propose, and what they accomplished, was the establishment of a civil, Republican, government; and all money raised by taxation from the people is to maintain that government and for nothing else. To appropriate it for other purposes is to misappropriate it, and incur the guilt of dishonesty.

These sectarian institutions are wholly under the control of the churches to which they belong. The people who are taxed to support them have, in many cases at least, no voice whatever in their management. To tax the people for their support is therefore a direct violation of the principle, "no taxation without representation," for which our forefathers fought the Revolutionary War.

But we have reached a day when, in the affairs of government, principle seems to be largely outweighed by policy. But this Government must stand upon principle, and not policy, if it stands at all.

THE Bishop of Liverpool is quoted as saying that "Sunday is the barometer of every so-called Christian nation." That being true, what is the use of legislating to try to prevent a fall of the barometer?

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Studies in French History. -13.

"It seems indeed a relief," began the professor, when the little audience was again seated, "to find such a character among the kings of France as Louis IX. You will remember that in the last study we learned that he remained at home after his return from the disastrous crusade for about fifteen years. But he felt as if he had not kept the vow which he had made while on his bed of sickness; so he began once more the agitation which led to another crusade.

"You know that after any one had once donned the red cross, it was considered dishonorable unless he went to fight the Turk. So one Christmas the king made each of his courtiers a present of a new robe, as was the custom. This was put on in the dark, on the outside of the church, and when they all went in, behold, every one noticed that his neighbor wore the red cross. Each one was quite inclined to smile at this as a good joke, until he noticed the same mark on his own clothes; then he began to look pretty sober, I tell you."

"I should have thought they would!" exclaimed Milly Brown. "It was ever so much nicer to stay at home with their families than to rush off to a far-away country to roast under a foreign sun and be killed by barbarous Turks."

"Yes; and this second of his crusades was still more disastrous than the first. He did not go at once to Palestine, but sailed for Tunis, Africa, where he was taken very ill from the dreadful effects of the climate and died."

"Aunt Eunice said she believed Saint Louis died in a bed of ashes, but she had forgotten the circumstances," said Julia March.

"She was correct. When he died in Tunis, he ordered his servants to strew ashes on the floor, so that he might breathe his last while lying among them."

"I wonder what he did that for," said Maggie Palmetter, with a smile. "I should have thought a bed of feathers would have been ever so much softer and nicer."

"I think Julia March can tell you why he did it. She is quite a student of the oldest, best written and most exact history in the world."

"I presume you mean the Bible," said Julia, blushing; "and I dare say that the reason Saint Louis chose ashes as his dying bed was only to symbolize his sorrow for sin. I remember that it was a very ancient custom for people to sit among the ashes in token of humility and sorrow, and sometimes they sprinkled them on their heads."

"Yes, it was this sorrow for what was really his inability to keep his vow, though he had done the best he could, which caused him to manifest such great grief; he died with the word 'Jerusalem' upon his lips.

"It was said of him that he was never heard to utter an oath. In fact, he punished the sin of blasphemy very severely."

"I wonder if he was the French king whom I used to hear father tell about," said Max Smith. "He used to put profane men on a ladder, with nothing on them but their underclothes, and with the entrails of a hog around their neck, would make two men carry them; sometimes he would have them branded on the face."

SAINT LOUIS SITTING IN JUDGMENT.

Joe Palmetter's face had begun to get very red during this recital, and his eyes sparkled like diamonds:—

"It was wrong! I'm sure it was not right. There is not the spirit of liberty of conscience in it. It is not Christ's way of doing!" he exclaimed, earnestly.

"Why, Professor Carman," said Florence Ray, "you don't think it was right to blaspheme, do you?"

"I do not, most certainly. But the question is not whether it is wrong to do the act, but whether it would be right to punish men by law for so doing. I am sure Joseph would not approve of swearing, any more than any of us," said Professor Carman, smiling.

"Indeed I would not," said Joseph, grateful that his teacher could see the point he had meant to make, "but I believe in perfect liberty of conscience. I would not wonder if the best thing to do with a profane man would be to educate his conscience."

"Very good, Joseph. The apostle says that he persuades men to repent, and that is the Master's way. But King Louis said, in excusing his severity, that he would be willing to have the same thing done to him, and he would gladly bear the reproach, if by so doing he could purge France of so heinous a sin."

"I believe that the blood of Christ alone can purge from sin," said Julia March, reverently.

"Yes, that is so. No matter how much Saint Louis suffered on account of the sin of his country, it could not pay the debt or cancel the sin."

"Then don't you believe it's right to legislate about such matters? Seems to me Saint Louis did just right," said Charlie White, with a very sober face.

"I should think Charlie could see," said Joe Palmeter, earnestly, "that this would make no end of trouble in the government; infidels and unbelievers wouldn't stand much show, and I guess we'd have to use all the churches for jails after a little."

"Well," replied Charlie, "I'm sure it's very wrong to blaspheme, and I believe I'll ask my father to-night what he thinks of Saint Louis' way of putting a stop to it."

"That's right," said Professor Carman. "This is a subject which will bear much thinking about; for it involves a moral principle."

"Philip the Bold," he continued, "succeeded his father, Saint Louis, and brought the body of the misguided king back to France, and also those of his own wife and child, his brother-in-law, and John Tristan, his own brother,—five coffins in all—and a sorrowful procession it was."

"Next week we will ask Charlie White to tell us what his father thinks of the action of King Louis, regarding the punishment of blasphemers."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

"Time, Times, and Dividing of Time."

"MAMA, this Sabbath question bothers one ever so much. Sometimes I feel provoked to think the pope has cheated one into Sunday keeping, and then again I feel almost mad at God to think he let me go on in darkness, and do tell me, mama, why it was. There are just thousands and thousands of people who are serving God who never heard that Sunday wasn't the Sabbath. What will become of them? Yes, and of all the good people who died without knowing it?"

"Well, Charlie, you've asked me question upon question, which shall I answer first? The last I think, and that by a story I heard a minister tell a few nights ago when I asked him the same questions."

"He said, 'Suppose a man has a counterfeit bill; but has no idea it is counterfeit. He goes to a store and offers it in payment for goods. The store-keeper detects its spurious character and returns it, saying, 'I know you did not know it was counterfeit, and therefore I cannot justly charge you with dishonesty.'" This is the way many offer Sunday to God. They think it genuine. He knows their honesty and accepts their sincerity. But suppose the man after fully knowing the character of his bill goes to offer it to another store-keeper. Ah, then, Charlie, he cannot stand as an upright man. And as to this Sunday worship, God alone can tell when people know it to be a spurious day of rest. The reason we have so long been ignorant of this matter, I will try to tell you. The varying feelings you experience will soon pass away like troubled waters from a fountain of peace. The Sabbath truth is one of the most profound rest, and when it gets in, you will find Jesus more fully than ever before. What does the word Sabbath mean?"

"Rest," said Charlie.

"To whom are we invited to come to find rest?"

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest, . . . and ye shall find rest unto your souls," repeated Charlie.

"Now, why is it possible for Jesus to give us rest?"

"Because he has it to give."

"Where did he get it?"

"From his father, I suppose."

"Why can the Father give rest?"

"O mama, you do ask the queerest questions. Because—why because—"

"That won't do, Charlie. 'Because' is a woman's reason, they say. I'll ask you another question, What is God?"

"God is love."

"Do you have a sense of rest when you are in the presence of those who love you?"

"Yes, mama."

"Then if God is love, and love gives rest, the reason why God can give rest is very plain. Now, when God had finished the heavens and the earth, what did he do?"

"He rested and was refreshed."

"Does God get weary?"

"Fainteth not, neither is weary," said Charlie.

"No; it was not physical weakness that called for this rest. What is expressed in God's works? Please read Rom. 1:20."

"The invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead."

"Then God's works in nature tell us of his character, his love. The psalmist says, 'The heavens declare the glory of God.' When God looked upon nature he looked on the expression of his love and rested in love. He gave us the Sabbath as a sign of our rest in his love. Resting in his love we have an anchor both sure and steadfast entering into that which is within the vail, that is fostering unto the throne of God himself. In keeping the seventh day holy, we acknowledge God as our Creator, and as it will take nothing short of creative power to redeem us, we also acknowledge him as our Redeemer, and so,

Charlie, what a glorious rest we experience in more fully comprehending the power of him who has loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood and hath made us kings and priests unto God!"

"O, mama, it is really beautiful. There is plenty of power behind the true Sabbath, and I can see it would never be necessary for the state to back it up with its puny force."

"That is so, my boy. It is the utter weakness of Sunday, for which there can be found no 'Thus saith the Lord' that sends men to the state for its enforcement.

"Now for your first question. Why have we not found the Sabbath before? Please turn to Dan. 7:25, once more. How long were the saints, the law, and the times to be given into the hands of the papacy?"

"Until a time, times, and the dividing of times," read Charlie.

"Yes; but, mama, that's all Greek to me."

"It was to me until I patiently studied the Scriptures. Please keep your place in Daniel and turn to Rev. 12:14. Here the symbol of a pure woman is taken to represent the pure church. How long was she to flee from the force of persecution?"

Charlie read, "And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle that she might fly into the wilderness into her place where she is nourished for a time, times and half a time from the face of the serpent."

"How long was she to flee?"

"For a time, times, and a half a time."

"Very well, that is exactly the time spoken of in Daniel when the papacy was to wear out the saints, and to think to change God's law and Sabbath. Now read the sixth verse, and see what this time, times, and half a time is equivalent to."

"And the woman fled into the wilderness where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there, a thousand two hundred and threescore days."

"Now do you see, Charlie, how a time, times, and dividing of time is interpreted?"

"Yes it is clear enough. But I can't see yet how it explains the fact that we are ignorant to-day. Why, 1,260 days wouldn't be very long for the papacy to keep us ignorant."

"That's so, Charlie. I forgot that you did not know that each day represents a year. You may find this for yourself after we are through with our study by comparing Eze. 4:6 and Num. 14:34."

"So really then this period of time, times and dividing of time covers 1,260 years?"

"Yes, dear. This is not a new interpretation. Adam Clark and other accepted commentators take the same position. But we need nothing but the Bible truth."

"Well now, mama, when did this time begin?"

"Do you not remember when the tiara was given to the bishop of the church of Rome?"

"Yes; in 538 A. D."

"Now, reckoning from that time 1,260 years, we are brought down to 1798, when the pope was taken prisoner by Berthier, a French general sent to overthrow the papal power. The pope was brought to France and died in exile. Since then the pope has been called the 'prisoner of the Vatican,' and these great truths have been coming to light. Persecution has not generally troubled the world since then. The law and the Sabbath are coming out of his hand, and we are receiving advance light. O Charlie, let us no longer look on the Dark Ages side of this question. The Light of the world seems walking just before us, saying, 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself (self), and take up his cross and follow me.'"

"Yes, mama. How sweet it seems to think we are getting rays of light from Jesus, and there is another verse that does me good; for if we follow him then this will come true, too, 'That where I am, there ye may be also.'"

NEW YORK, MARCH 17, 1898.

THAT there is not much reform power in Sunday keeping must be evident when the saloon can be made to keep Sunday, and still remain the disreputable place that it is. No saloon ever kept the Sabbath of the Lord.

GOD calls every person to be a Christian, and every Christian to be a missionary and reformer,—to “go about doing good,” to minister to those suffering from any need; to reform all that which has become marred and broken down by sin. For all this there is a world-wide opportunity to-day. Have you heard this call?

THE Christian Endeavor Society of Syracuse, N. Y., in recent session passed a number of resolutions for presentation to congressmen from their district, among which was one “To enact a Sabbath law for the national capital.” We are sorry to note that this seems to represent a general sentiment among the members of this great organization.

READ, on another page, “The Sad Story of Spain,” and remember as you read that Spain has been of all nations the most faithful ally of the papal church; and also that Pope Leo XIII. has stated that “what the church has done for other lands, she will do for the United States.” Then ask yourself whether you are in favor of giving her a chance to do it.

FIFTY millions for war appropriated by the United States Government, $120,000,000 for warships by Great Britain, 90,000,000 roubles by Russia for a like purpose—what a “pretty penny” it costs these “Christian nations” to live at peace with each other! What a saving of money it would be if they could really be Christian enough to let each other alone!

A FORCIBLE condemnation of Sunday laws is contained in the following words spoken at the Christian Endeavor convention at San Francisco, by Rev. Robert Johnston:—

“Idleness is not holiness; cessation from toil and pleasure-seeking is not Sabbath-keeping. Separation to a special purpose is the root idea of holiness, and the day that is separated unto God is the true Sabbath.”

WHILE science and civilization have done much to ameliorate the condition of the race, it is evident from the situation to-day that they have not kept pace with the power of human greed and selfishness to plunge the race into misery and woe. Selfishness finds some way to “get around” science and civilization every time. Never was there such need of the spirit of brotherly love.

A HEARING is soon to be given at Albany on the Assembly Bill introduced by Mr. Weekes, for “permitting non-professional games and sports on Sunday after one o’clock in the afternoon in cities of the first class.” If legislators would get down to principles, and not waste time and efforts on questions of mere selfish expediency, they might do much more than is being done to clear up the situation and benefit the country.

FIFTEEN thousand car-loads of mail matter, it is said, are sent out every Sunday under the orders of the National Post-office department, in caring for which the services of 500,000 men are required. An exchange in calling attention to this fact forcibly suggests that to ask the Government, which thus desecrates Sunday, to enact a law against Sunday work, would be much like asking burglars to enact a law against house-breaking.

It is stated upon good authority that the pope’s blessing has repeatedly been bestowed upon the Spanish soldiers and arms in Cuba; and as the Spanish army celebrates mass in the field as faithfully as though it were a part of military tactics, and the soldiers are faithful Catholics, there can be no reason why the papal blessing should be withheld, and no reason for doubting the truth of the statement. Nor is any doubt cast upon its reliability by the results which have followed the efforts of the Spanish arms in the island.

A WASHINGTON, D. C., dispatch states that “a queer question of Sunday observance has been raised at the State Department by the Hamburg-American Steamship Company. The American consul at Hamburg, who was a Pittsburg newspaper man, has refused to furnish papers to vessels clearing that port on Sunday, and there is a heavy penalty for vessels sailing without the necessary papers. Sunday is one of the regular sailing days for the Hamburg line. It has been customary, it is said, to permit passengers to land in this country on Sunday.”

THINK of the absurdity—to say nothing of the wickedness—of punishing a child in the public schools for not being “patriotic”! and punishing him severely, too. (We refer to the incident in the Brooklyn school, mentioned in our last issue.) The most unreasonable demands are generally accompanied by the severest punishments in case of refusal. Think of a school teacher assuming to know when a child is patriotic and when he is not! What constitutes the highest, truest patriotism? Who has authority to settle the question for everybody else, or for anyone else? Who has authority to set up a standard of patriotism in the public schools and compel anybody else to conform to it? Even if patriotism were a thing as well defined and understood as the multiplication table, who has a right to compel anyone else—child or adult—to be patriotic? What court would enforce such a claim, or listen to it for a moment? The children have a right to be protected against such teachers.

It is just as impossible to legislate good deeds out of bad men, as to legislate good fruit out of a bad tree.

THE measure of strength and prosperity in any government can be accurately judged by the degree of civil and religious freedom enjoyed by those living under it.

CIVIL government can accomplish its ends only as it has and employs force to compel obedience; Christianity can accomplish her ends only as she refrains from the use of force.

A SUNDAY law, or any form of religious legislation, is a blow which falls much more severely upon free government than upon the individuals who are its intended victims.

THERE is a pope within you, unless the kingdom of God is within you. It is the popery in people by nature that makes possible and calls for a pope outside of them.

OUGHT the citizen of Spain, in case of war over the "Maine" disaster, to be patriotic and support his country, and do all the damage possible to this country? If not, why not?

THE man who wants to keep Sunday can keep it without any Sunday law; and the man who doesn't want to keep Sunday can get neither rest nor religion out of such a law if he has one.

"COME up and see my zeal for the Lord," said Jehu, the king of Israel, as he was on his way to execute vengeance upon the stronghold of idolatry; but Jehu did not accomplish much as a reformer. And the reason was that his reform work was by force of arms and not by the power of the Spirit.

It is said there must be no union of church and state, because that would discriminate against some of the churches. But how can there be a union of the state with religion without discriminating against some religion? And if it be right for the civil power to discriminate against one religion in favor of another, why is not such discrimination just as regards the churches?

The Question of Disturbance.

It is provided in nearly every Sunday law upon the statute books of the States, that any work that is to be permitted on Sunday must not be to the "disturbance" of other people. This provision is a hollow sham.

It is not lawful to disturb people—in any proper sense of the word—on any day of the week. It is no more lawful to disturb people on Monday than it is on Sunday.

Unless a different and extraordinary kind of disturbance is meant by this provision of the Sunday laws, therefore, there is no possible reason for making it. But why should some extraordinary meaning be put upon the word "disturbance" for Sunday only?

Whatever disturbs the mid-week prayer-meeting, or the devotions of any person on ordinary days of the week, is a disturbance in the proper sense, and is prohibited by law, irrespective of Sunday statutes. And whatever does not disturb people on such occasions, cannot properly be considered a disturbance on the first day of the week.

But some people are very much "disturbed" by the mere knowledge that other persons are at work on their day of rest, thus indicating that they dissent from their views as regards the sanctity of the day. They want their feelings protected from disturbance no less than their devotions. But truth—and religious truth especially—has always had to make its way in this world by disturbing somebody's feelings. And no person's feelings have been more disturbed than those of the people who were in error.

All such "disturbance" is for the good of mankind. It is especially for the good of those resting in error, if they will but have the meekness to profit by it.

Let ideas jostle one against another without restraint in the wide arena of religious controversy. Truth must always be the gainer by it, and error the loser.

People who claim the right to work on the first day of the week do not claim any right to disturb people and have no wish to disturb them. Religious assemblies are amply protected by law upon all days of the week, and there is no occasion for giving them or any individuals special "protection" on Sunday.

"Christian Citizenship" in Practice.

WE have presented several Bible studies with the Christian Citizen on the separation of church and state, which can mean nothing else than the separation from the state those who belong to the church. As certainly as those who are united with the church are united with the state, there is in the very nature of things the union of church and state.

It may perhaps now be well to take a glance at the history of church and state; as we desire to do everything possible to help those Christian Citizen people.

One of the clearest and most profound productions on the history of church and state is the "Ecclesiastical Researches" of Robert Robinson. A close acquaintance with the Scriptures is all that is needed to see that this is so. He declares plainly of the early church, that "Christians of all classes had always thought religion independent of secular government;" and that "this is clear to a demonstration by their conduct."

"Paganism was the religion of the state, and pontiff was a title annexed to that of emperor. But Christians all disowned by their practice the office of high-priest, while they allowed and obeyed that of imperator.

"These Christians ought to be divided into two general classes. They had all set out with order: but some had degenerated into government; which was a very distinct discipline, and is the true and real seed of every kind of hierarchy. Originally placed by Jesus in a position of perfect equality, they felt their freedom when they met, and so formed a mutual confederacy against sin: having separately no authority at all, and collectively only that of declaring on due investigation that an individual had committed a known crime, which by violating the contract discharged them from their obligations to continue in society with him.

"If any of the number were chosen to officiate for the rest, the offices did not lift them out of the state of brethren into that of rulers. . . . The whole assembly judged whether their officers conducted their affairs properly: and there was perfect order and liberty but no government.

"Into some of these congregations came that wrong-headed sort of men, who were half-Jews and who thought that Christianity would be mightily improved by inserting the Jewish ritual into Christian practice. Of this sort were all the 'saints,' and Jerome expressly says that what Moses and Aaron and the Levites were among the Jews, that teachers and officers ought to be in the Christian church."

"By slow degrees this Jewish theology depraved the church, and subverted the primitive order by losing the old idea of confederacy against vice, and by elevating the servants of the church into inspectors and watchmen, and guides, and masters, and monarchs, who, as they rose, sunk the people in due proportion—first into carelessness through confidence, next into inability through ignorance, and lastly into the most abject slavery, when tyranny was played off for virtue; and to stamp the people into dust and ashes was the only method of acquiring distinction and wealth, honor, ease, and everlasting reputation. On these piteous ruins rose the saintship of Augustine, and Cyprion, and Becket, and the theology converted these dregs of the world into oracles of God.

This lust of power and government in the church led directly and inevitably to the lust of power and government in the state. "Bishops became a legislative power, and each bishop of a city church exercised this authority in three distinct characters: At home in his own cathedral, assisted by a session of clergy, whom he created and supported, he gave law to his church. In a provincial synod, assisted by other bishops, living within a district of secular division, he gave laws to all the province. In general councils he was one of a body that made laws for the whole empire. Over all in this period was the emperor, who presided as high priest, or as the Emperor Constantine used to call himself, bishop or superintendent of the external affairs of the church.

"In virtue of this office, old in name and new in practice, the emperor defended the church, not the state; suppressed enemies of the church, not those of the empire; called councils, enforced the canons, placed and displaced priests, and became the executive power, not for the benefit of a free commonwealth, but for the support of a dangerous monopoly. Thousands of volumes, ancient and modern, have been written to assort and conciliate this kind of government, but it never can be exonerated.

"Before this time emperors were not under any obligation to think of religion as they were ordered. Their reason and conscience were free, and an emperor might choose his god and his ritual; but now it was understood that he was to obey the church in all matters of religion. This was extremely difficult for the church was divided into two great factions, Arian and Trinitarian [or those who were in power and those who were not], that persecuted each other with a mortal hatred. And it was curious enough to require the emperor to believe a point under examination, which neither side had skill to determine.

"On the other hand, the church was to obey the emperor in secular things; but this was a very difficult undertaking, for cathedrals, and honors, and privileges, and endowments, and a thousand other secular things were so closely connected with this kind of church, and so essential to its very existence, that one absolute emperor might ruin in an instant what another had cherished for half a century.

"There is not an evil that can blast society which is not contained in this fatal coalition. Out of these two absolute powers in one kingdom rise new crimes, new claims, new disputes, a new order of men to investigate them, new canons of law, new officers, new courts, new taxes, new punishments, a new world all in arms, animated with a fury that never sleeps and never cools until one party subdues the other into silence. There was no peace in any kingdom where this system was adopted till either the prince disarmed the priest or the priest dethroned the prince."—pp. 133-139.

This sketch, though brief, is a complete history of the false Christian citizenship idea, the union of church and state, from its beginning in the Christian era until now; and it is a perfect forecast of the only thing that can possibly come in the United States, and that will certainly come, as surely as the present "Christian citizenship" movement shall succeed in its designs upon the government.

The True Reformer.

"AND Elijah the Tishbite, who was of the inhabitants of Gilead, said unto Ahab, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word."

In these words the Scriptures introduce to us one who stands almost preëminent among the world's reformers. It will be instructive to glance at some features of the situation in which he is set before us.

Ahab was the king of Israel. Against the king and the kingdom Elijah stood alone. No human arm was raised for his assistance. No votes were cast, no legislation was enacted, in his favor. All the power of the government,—of law, of the courts, of the army,—was at the command of the king. Against all these Elijah dared to proclaim boldly, to the king's face, and with perfect assurance, the message of a radical reform throughout the kingdom.

Who was this Elijah? The Scriptures answer: "Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are; and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit." James 5: 17, 18.

What then was the difference between Elijah and ourselves? By nature there was no difference. He was a man of like passions with us; but in comparing his work with that of the "reformer" of this day, a vast difference is apparent. The secret is revealed in his words to Ahab: "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand." Elijah lived and acted in the presence of the infinite God. He was a man of faith.

But do not we also stand in the presence of God? Yes; what was true of him is no less true of us. It is true enough, but it is faith that enables us to realize its truth; it is faith that brings it to our minds as a reality. There is a God, the infinite One, Lord of heaven and earth, "before whom I stand." This is no figure of speech, but a literal fact.

Elijah's faith grasped the reality of this great truth, and he acted accordingly. Our faith—if we have faith—will grasp it likewise. And if that be so, we shall act as though that Presence were sensible to the natural eye. Faith deals only with facts; faith convinces us of the reality of things not seen.

Who, in the presence of God, and loyal to him, would fear all the power of man? Who in that presence, commissioned by Him to proclaim the truth, would feel weak without the aid of man? Who would seek for help from the legislature? The very fact that such things are done by men claiming to speak for God, is conclusive evidence that they have not faith. Faith hears the "still small voice," and knows it to be more powerful than earthquake, fire, and storm. Faith knows the "sword of the Spirit" to be more powerful than all the swords of steel.

"The Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand." That is the language of faith, the language of true reform. The Christian sees in God the true majority; in his law the all-sufficient legislation; in his word the "voice of a multitude," that is greater than the voice of the ballot. He trusts in the presence of Him who has "all power" "in heaven and in earth."

"Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord." Mal. 4:1. The spirit of true reform in the last days is the spirit of Elijah,—the spirit of faith.

Have you faith?

"Suffering as a Christian."

"Present Truth" (London, Eng.), November 13.

THE newspapers bring us the following note:—

"For refusing to touch a gun a young Hungarian conscript, Francis John Kiss, has been sentenced to five years' penal servitude with hard labor. The Pester-Lloyd, of Buda-Pest, gives details. Kiss was ordered to leave his home in the country and join the famous Honved Hussars in the capital. On the drill ground no persuasion or threat could induce him to shoulder arms; Christianity, he declared, forbade the use of deadly weapons.

On being court-martialled, he was given the above sentence.

Christ said, "All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Matt. 26:52. As a positive command, he also said, "Resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." Matt. 5:39. Now we know nothing of the young Hungarian's life, except what is told in the newspaper paragraph; but we do know that in that one thing he acted according to the precept of Christ; therefore it is an undeniable fact that he is now undergoing a cruel punishment for nothing else than for being a Christian, for following Christ.

"But no government on earth could exist, if all men should act as this young man did, and refuse to bear arms," is the universal cry. Of course they could not, and the sentence passed upon the young man is strictly in accordance with the law. There must be soldiers as long as there are earthly governments; but that very fact shows that these governments are not Christian, but anti-Christian.

Let no one decry human government, or revile soldiers; everybody has a right to be a soldier, who wishes to be one. The Christian must speak evil of no man, nor of men united to form a government; but every loyal follower of Christ is in duty bound to give a clear testimony as to what Christianity is, and, so far as his influence extends, to make it impossible for anybody to suppose that in killing men, or in learning to do so, he is serving Christ. Christ's kingdom is not of this world; therefore his servants do not fight. John 18:36. Earthly governments cannot exist without fighting; therefore they are directly opposite in character to that of Christ, the Prince of Peace. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal." "If any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed." 1 Peter 4:16.

"We Ought to Obey God Rather than Men."

BY MRS. E. G. WHITE.

CHRIST declared of the Jews, "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." This is being done to-day. The commandments of men are exalted, and men are trying to force their fellow-men to render obedience to them. But in no case are we to take the word of men before the Word of God. "We ought to obey God rather than men," declared Peter. And Christ in his sermon on the mount, spoke clearly and distinctly regarding the importance of God's commandments.

INTEGRITY OF GOD'S LAW.

"Think not," he said, "that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven."

But God never compels men to obey him. Together truth and error take the field. The light shines forth amid moral darkness: and men are left to choose their own leader.

After the king of Babylon had witnessed the wonderful deliverance wrought by God for his faithful servants, and had seen the men walk unhurt from the fire, he published a decree that anyone speaking a word against the God of heaven, who had so wonderfully saved his servants, should be cut in pieces; "because," he declared, "there is no other God that can deliver after this sort." Thus, through the deceiving power of the enemy, God's truth is misinterpreted and misapplied, and his way confused by human inventions.

NO RIGHT OF COMPULSION.

The king had a right to worship the God of heaven, and to do all in his power to exalt him above other gods; but he had no right to use his authority in compelling his subjects to change from the worship of idols to the worship of the true God. He had no more right to threaten men with death for not worshipping the true God, than he had to make the decree consigning to the flames all who refused to worship the golden image.

To-day, as in the days of Babylon, the accuser of the brethren, is working through human agencies to hurt and destroy those who are dear to the Lord. Men in power do not realize that they cannot in justice control the minds of their fellow-men, and Satan works through them to corrupt right-dealing. Those who try to keep the commandments of God will meet with much opposition. Satanic attributes will take possession of the hearts of men, making them as hard as steel: and all who depart from evil will make themselves a prey to the hatred of those that refuse to obey the law of God.

But when the state forms laws directly opposed to the laws of Jehovah, and thus strives to compel men to obey them, it is following the example set by the king of Babylon. When it takes the guardianship of the religious interests of the nation, a spirit of intolerance is manifested if men seek to practice the truth, which, by earnest study, they have found in God's Word. Those who are actuated by such a spirit of oppression cannot understand what religious liberty means.

GOD SUPREME.

Every man has a right to worship God according to his own convictions; no one is called upon to obey laws that are opposed to the laws of God; and the only position the state can take, and have the approval of God, is to guard the rights of every individual, permitting no oppression to come upon any one because of religious belief.

As Nebuchadnezzar tried to force his subjects to obey his mandates, so men will try to force us to disregard the Word of God. They will endeavor to compel us to render homage to man-made statutes; but in God's strength we are to refuse to dishonor him.

The laws of earthly kingdoms are to be obeyed only when they do not conflict with the laws of God. When governments are tyrannical and overbearing, when they trample on God's law, their laws are contemptible in his sight. And when they try to control the minds and consciences of those whom Christ died to make free, God's children are to show their loyalty to him by refusing to disobey his commandments.

When the judgment shall sit, and the books of heaven shall be opened, all will be judged, not by the laws that human minds have enacted, but by the law of God, which existed before the foundations of the world were laid. And the men who have been co-workers with the first great rebel, and who have not, as guardians of the state, searched the Word of God, that as rulers they might deal righteously and mercifully, will be judged by the law they have disregarded and dishonored.

ANSWERING TO THE COURT OF HEAVEN.

In that day when every work shall be brought into judgment, when the Lord Jesus, with the marks of the crucifixion on his body, shall come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory, those who, while holding positions of trust, have caused God's people to suffer, will cast their idols of silver and gold to the moles and to the bats, "to go into the clefts of the rocks, and into the tops of the ragged rocks, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth." "For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain."

They have shown no respect for God, no fear to transgress his commandments; but have refused to give their fellow-men rights equal to their own, and have tried to make them disobey God. They have stubbornly adhered to man-made commandments, and they will be judged accordingly. Those who persist in enacting laws which men cannot obey without dishonoring God, and those that obey these laws, and trample on the law of the eternal God, must prepare for the result; for God will not change, nor alter the thing which has gone out of his mouth.

LOVE FULFILLS THE LAW.

"As the Father hath loved me," said Christ, "so have I loved you; continue ye in my love." "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." "He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked." "Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law; for sin is the transgression of the law. . . . And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him."

God honors those who honor him by obedience to his precepts. John, the beloved disciple, was banished to the isle of Patmos for his faithfulness. "I John," he writes, "who also am your brother and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the Word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." Did John here mean Sunday?—There is but one day called the Lord's day, and that is the seventh day of the week, the Sabbath instituted at creation. God created the world in six days; and on the seventh he rested and was refreshed. He blessed and sanctified this day, and set it apart to be observed as a memorial of creation. And on the seventh day John heard behind him "a great voice, as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; and, What thou seest write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches." "And I turned to see the voice that spake unto me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of man." Thus Christ honored John for his steadfast obedience to him."

Adam and Eve lost all access to Eden and to the tree of life because they took the word of another before the word of God. By this act of disobedience they opened the flood-gates of woe upon our world. But those who steadfastly adhere to God's Word will hear the benediction, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." No flaming sword guards that tree from those who, after the light has been given them, in the face of all opposition, turn from the commandments of men to obey the commandments of God.

The Influence of the Papacy upon the Church.

THE sixth civil power to organize against the seed of Abraham gave way to another, which was to prove the worst of all. These six powers had been but the union of the state with pagan forms of religion, while the next was to blend Christianity with its paganism, and so gain control of the rising church of Christ, in order to turn it away from its designed purpose, namely, to establish truth in the earth.

The Council of Nice was really the establishment of the papacy, because then and there the church yielded its sanction to a civil ruler dictating religious forms and laws to the world. In this the church committed itself to the policy of a state-governed church, and so virtually denied the power of Christ to rule that body, which was intended to represent Him in the earth. The place Christ should have had in the hearts of men as members of his body, which is the church, was given to another,—a “man of sin,”—that he might sit in the “temple of God,” and so manifest his authority as God. 2 Thess. 2:3, 4.

The dominant pagan element which was thus brought into the church, improved the opportunity afforded it to enjoin upon the church by civil law its own festival day as the day of public worship. It mattered not that the civil edict enjoining this observance of the day recognized it as simply the “venerable day of the sun.” The church was so intent on enthroning the civil power as the conservator of their religious interests, that the majority readily accepted the sun’s day as the Christian day of rest.

Two years after the promulgation of his famous sun’s day edict, Constantine professed conversion to Christianity. But like other pagans who had nominally accepted Christianity, he refused to surrender the day so long dedicated to sun worship, and so brought the heathen holiday forward as a fitting day of rest under Christian worship. Nicephorus declares that the emperor, considering himself the head of the church equally with the bishop, “directed that the day which the Jews considered the first day of the week, and which the Greeks dedicated to the sun, should be called the Lord’s day.”—Quoted in Elliott’s Horæ Apocalypticæ, fifth edition, vol. 4, p. 603.

Sylvester, then bishop of Rome, undertook the task of adapting the day to the needs of the church. The first step in this direction was to bestow officially upon it a name more in keeping for the place designed for it to fill in the Christian economy. Accordingly, by his “apostolic” authority, and with the approval of Constantine, he conferred upon it, on behalf of the church, the solemn title of “Lord’s day.”—Historia Ecclesiastica, per M. Ludovicum Lucium, cent. 4, chap. 10, pp. 739, 740.

With such eminent support, there was no difficulty in giving the day of the sun a prominent place in the church, especially since so many within its fold at that time had previously held the day sacred to the sun. They had not advanced far enough in Christian life to see why that day, formerly devoted to heathen ceremonies, should not find a place in Christian worship. In fact, as already shown in a previous article, the beginning of that century had witnessed the church adopting the rites and ceremonies of the sun-worshipping nations in order to draw them into the church. It is therefore no marvel that, when the pagan element became the dominant one, it should try to graft the day formerly devoted to idol deities onto the Christian religion.

But such a movement could not fail to provoke a protest from what had perhaps hitherto been a somewhat passive element in the church. The controversy which followed attracted the serious attention of those in authority, who sought to settle the matter. The Council of Laodicea was convened in A. D. 364, and the question was considered. William Prynne, an English author of considerable prominence, in his “Dissertations on the Lord’s day Sabbath,” pp. 33, 34, gives a portion of the twenty-ninth canon of that council, which shows the animus of the church at that time toward the Sabbath, and toward those who preferred to observe it:—

“Because Christians ought not to Judaize, and to rest on the Sabbath, but to work in that day which many did refuse at that time to do. But preferring to honor the Lord’s day, there being a great controversy among Christians which of the two days . . . should have precedence if they desired to rest, they should do this as Christians. Therefore if they shall be found to Judaize, let them be accursed from Christ.”

An anathema of this kind meant much to the people of that age. Having been brought up to believe that the frown of the church was equivalent to a sentence of eternal damnation, many fell into the train of those who controlled the sentiments of the councils. Yet some persisted still in maintaining a commendable independence of thought on this point, which finally brought the secular power to the assistance of the church. So in A. D. 469, the Emperor Leo put forth the following:—

“It is our pleasure that the holy days dedicated to the most high God should not be spent in sensual recreations, or otherwise profaned by suits of law, especially the Lord’s day, which we decree to be a venerable day, and therefore free it of all citations, executions, pleadings, and the like avocations. Let not the circus or theatre be opened, nor combating with wild beasts be seen on it. . . . If any will presume to offend in the premises, if he be a military man, let him lose his commission; or if other, let his estate or goods be confiscated.”

It is thus plain that the establishment of Sunday in the place of the Sabbath enjoined by God’s law was by no means easy. The threat of confiscation of worldly goods by the secular power was necessary to enforce the decrees of the church upon unwilling subjects. But the church carried her point. Having obtained the support of the state in the matter, her path was much smoother. She could ever after keep her skirts clear from the blood of heretics by turning them over to the civil authorities to be punished. This she did regularly, with a hypocritical recommendation to mercy. At first the principle of coercion was administered through comparatively mild correctives; but later, as the firmness of Christians seemed to demand, by the most atrocious cruelties, until nearly all Europe was inundated with blood.

When the control of the civil power by the papacy was complete, to be counted a heretic meant death. In Spain alone the Inquisition brought to the stake more than thirty-one thousand people. Under the reign of Charles V., fifty thousand were sacrificed in the Netherlands, and half as many more under his son. Lecky, in speaking of these persecutions, says:—

“When to these instances we add the innumerable less conspicuous executions that took place, from the victims of Charlemagne to the free-thinkers of the seventeenth century, when we recollect that after the mission of Dominic the area of the persecution comprised nearly the whole of Christendom, and that its triumphs were in some districts so complete as to destroy every memorial of the contest, the most callous nature must recoil with horror from the spectacle. . . . Nor did the victims perish by a rapid and painless death, but by one which was carefully selected as among the most poignant that man can suffer. They were usually burnt alive, . . . not infrequently by a slow fire. They were burnt alive after their constancy had been tried by the most excruciating agonies that minds fertile in torture could devise." —Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe, vol. 2, pp. 33, 34.

All this for constancy in holding to God's word as it is. The foregoing extracts from decrees of councils and emperors show that a part of this persecution was for adhering to the Sabbath of the fourth commandment. This constituted one of the signs of heresy in the days of Rome's triumphs over the saints of God, when she wore them out in her frantic zeal to change the "times and laws" of the Most High. With the history of that church in sight, no one need ask how Sunday came to take the place of the original Sabbath. Plainly enough, it has been forced upon the world through persecutions of the most diabolical nature. What the influence of this procedure has been upon Protestantism, will be considered in our next.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

My own awakening came through my Sunday-school work. I had a class of married women, among them one who was always raising perplexing questions. She had uncommon mental ability, was very earnest, but seemed utterly unable to comprehend, or unwilling to accept any teaching which bore on the practical character of Christianity. She disclaimed skepticism, only wanted to know, "O, to know"! was her cry. "How can I know that God cares for me?"

She attached herself to me, and our relations became like the intimacy of a hungry mouth, and the hand that was trying to feed it. She always walked home with me from Sunday-school, church and prayer-meeting, and whenever we met on the street would turn and walk with me to my destination, pouring the burning questions that tormented her into my ears. I wondered at and tried to solve her like a riddle, but she repelled any question from me. She was the one to question; I to answer. Ordinary conversation had no interest to her; nothing counted between us but that by which her soul could be kept from despair. At last, however, her secret sorrow was opened to me.

It was at the close of the Wednesday night prayer-meeting. She was absent. I was just leaving the church when one of the brethren detained me, saying, "Here is a man who wants to speak to you; it is Mr. —, whose wife you know." It took but a glance at his maudlin condition to reveal the shame, that was her sorrow, and to stir my heart as it had never been stirred by pity for another's woe. The crusade had begun; our eyes had been opened to see and our hearts to feel the degradation of rum's ruin; and my consternation could not have been greater, at seeing it as I did in all its ghastliness as this man represented it before me. How my heart ached for her. I determined that now, difficult as I knew it would be, I would break down the reserve between us. She should know that I knew, and then we would see about him.

At the first opportunity I told her as gently as possible that I had seen her husband and understood; and that I had been praying for her and him ever since.

She looked at me with a stern set face, changing from crimson to white; then turning she was about to leave me as if in anger, but I detained her by my arms, and the tears that gushed from my eyes. She was too hungry for companionship to stand long, on her pride, against my sincere sympathy; and after a little struggle she surrendered, clasped me close, and we wept together. Then we prayed, or, I did; she could not yet. She had prayed so long, while he had been going down and down; but as we knelt side by side she talked as she had never done before:—she told me of his early manhood; of the brilliant prospects which he had thrown away; how that although he had come out of the war with the rank of colonel, the curse of drink had been over all his honors, until at last all was lost, nothing but ruin remained for her and her children. She groaned out her despair at the fact that her boy was following in his father's footsteps; and said bitterly, "Now that you understand, can you wonder at my questions? I could not bear to disbelieve, but how can I believe, when I have no hope? You cannot blame me."

"No," I said, "but he must be saved."

"That is impossible; I gave that up long ago," she replied.

"But he must be," I insisted, "we will pray, you and I; and I know God hears; he always answers my prayers. Let us pray every day at three o'clock, and God will surely save him."

"O," she moaned, "how can I? I have no faith left,—not a bit."

"Yes, you have faith," I insisted, "or you could not live; we live by faith every hour. You certainly do believe in something; you certainly believe that I care."

"Indeed, I do," and her arm tightened about me. "I have a great deal of faith in you; I know you care, and I believe God hears you."

"Well, then," I said, "you just hold on to me, and I will hold on to God."

This contract was sealed there on our knees before God, with the most solemn tenderness, and kept. At 3 P. M. every day, I would lock the door of my little study, kneel and pray for that man, often with such a sense of personal need as I had seldom known. His degradation was so revolting it looked an impossible thing that I was asking; and yet I believed my prayers were heard, and would somehow be answered. But at last my faith began to grow weak. With every effort at prayer there would come the conviction that I must do something. But what could I do? How could any one but God do anything in such a case? I could have nothing to do with such a man as he. So I entered into a controversy that killed prayer. I would lock my door at three o'clock and kneel beside my chair with my face in my hands, but I could not pray. Sometimes I would weep bitter tears at my helplessness; sometimes I would groan in spirit while my heart seemed breaking, until at last I could endure it no longer. I must do something, that was very clear, or stop all thought of prayer, and forget my friend and her loathesome burden. I could not forget; I could not take back the promise which I had made, so I cried out, "Lord, show me what to do and I will do it."

What is the Mark?—No. 2.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

In the previous article under the above heading it was stated that there is positively only one institution that the papacy claims as her own to which she points as the mark of her authority, and that that institution is Sunday.

That being so, it is in itself an unanswerable argument that Sunday is the "mark of the beast;" for it being a fact that the beast referred to (Rev. 13:1-10) symbolizes the papacy, it is utterly impossible that Inspiration, in speaking of this power could have one thing in mind as being the mark, and then that same power claim something else as being its mark. To claim such a thing is to at once impeach the inspired Word. It is therefore certain that whatever the papacy claims as its mark, that is the thing of which the prophet spake as the mark of the beast. That it is the Sunday, as before stated, is susceptible of the clearest proof.

The following quotations are from standard Catholic catechisms bearing the imprimaturs of cardinal and bishops, thus receiving the fullest sanction of the Catholic Church:—

"Ques.—Have you any other way of proving that the church has power to institute festivals of precept?

"Ans.—Had she not such power, she could not have done that in which all modern religionists agree with her,—she could not have substituted the observance of Sunday, the first day of the week, for the observance of Saturday, the seventh day, a change for which there is no scriptural authority."—Doctrinal Catechism, p. 174.

Again: "Ques.—How prove you that the church hath power to command feasts and holy days?

"Ans.—By the very act of changing the Sabbath into Sunday, which Protestants allow of; and therefore they fondly contradict themselves by keeping Sunday strictly, and breaking most other feasts commanded by the same church.

"Ques.—How prove you that?

"Ans.—Because by keeping Sunday they acknowledge the church's power to ordain feasts and to command them under sin; and by not keeping the rest by her commanded, they again deny, in fact, the same power."—Douay Catechism, p. 58.

The same is also found in "An Abridgement of Christian Doctrine" (p. 58), by Rev. Henry Tuberville, D.D.

In the "Catholic Christian Instructed," in answer to the question, "Has the church power to make any alteration in the commandments of God?" Among other things, the following reply is given: "Instead of the seventh day, and other festivals appointed by the old law, the church has prescribed the Sunday and holydays to be set apart for God's worship; and these we are now obliged to keep in consequence of God's commandment, instead of the ancient Sabbath."—p. 204.

From these quotations it will be seen that the Catholic Church bases its power to ordain holydays and feast days upon the fact that it had the power to change the Sabbath from the seventh day of the week to the first. The sign that the church has power to command men under sin is this alleged power to change the Sabbath. Call in question the authority of the church to do this or that, and it will point to the change of the Sabbath as its authority.

That being so, it must be evident to every candid mind that Sunday is the mark of the papacy. And no more fitting mark could it have. When God, through Jesus Christ, made the heaven and the earth, he rested upon the seventh day, blessed, and sanctified it, and thus gave it to mankind as the memorial of his wonderful works. Ps. 111:4. It became the sign between God and his people that they might know that he was Jehovah. Ex. 31:13, 7; Eze. 20:20. It is the sign of his power to create, and thus of his divinity, and therefore of his power to sanctify. Eze. 20:12; 36:23.

Placed in the bosom of, and becoming a part of the eternal law of Jehovah—the ten commandments that "are done in uprightness and truth" (Ps. 111:7, 8) and which indeed are "the truth" (Ps. 119:142), the seventh day is as immutable and eternal as God himself. That day could not be changed without changing truth, and to change the truth of God is to change it into a lie. Rom. 1:25. For God to do this would be for him to deny himself, but this he cannot do. 2 Tim. 2:13. Consequently, God could not change the Sabbath from the seventh day to the first. A simple reading of the fourth commandment will prove this. Let anyone read it, substituting the word "first" for that of the "seventh," and it will be seen how utterly impossible it is for God to do such a thing—it would simply make him testify to a lie.

But the papacy claims to have the power to do that which God cannot do. That being so, she thereby declares she has greater power than God, and as this power is displayed in the change of the Sabbath, it must be, therefore, that Sunday is the mark of papal power.

Now, bearing in mind that Sunday is the only institution that the papacy points to as the mark of her authority; and that this same institution is the only thing that is sought to be enforced upon the people of this country, by the Protestants as the test or mark of true religion, it is again proven that Sunday is not only the mark of the papacy, but also that this country is the one symbolized by the two-horned beast of Rev. 13:11. God having thus pointed out this papal work, will it not be wise for every sincere Protestant to closely study these things? And the "wise shall understand." Dan. 12:10.

Shall We Discipline this Nation?

BY A. R. BELL.

"This is a Christian nation."—U. S. Supreme Court, 1892.

The word "Christian" being a descriptive adjective, reveals the fact(?) that the component parts of the nation (the individuals) are all Christians.

Defining the "Christian citizen," the Christian Endeavor, of May, 1897, says: "The 'Christian citizen' is one who brings Christian principles to bear upon his political life."

This is saying that the principles revealed to the world through Jesus Christ, the author of Christianity, which to day are by the power of God, through faith, revealed in the life of the believer, are "to bear upon his (the 'Christian citizen's') political life."

These principles are "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance," and according to the above quotation, the representatives of this "Christian nation," in Congress assembled, should bring these Christian principles to bear in all their deliberations.

But what are the facts?

Not only in Washington, but throughout all the land the very air we breathe seems to be heavily charged with the spirit of war, and preparations for slaughter are going on night and day without ceasing. The government arsenal at Springfield, Mass., is turning out 500 rifles a day, and in Ilion, N. Y., the working force is being increased as fast as new tools can be made ready for service in the manufacture of weapons of destruction. In Reading, Pa., the Carpenter Steel Works has an order from the government for $1,000,000 worth of projectiles, and in Bethlehem, Pa., 5,000 men are working night and day turning out big guns. A day or two ago a train of twenty-one cars, each car loaded with a twelve-inch mortar, arrived at Sandy Hook, and they are being placed ready for use; and in every military and naval station all is bustle. And this in the face of the statement from the highest judicial authority in the land that "this is a Christian nation."

Nor is this all.

When this nation was declared "Christian" it was for the sole purpose of enforcing Christian laws, institutions, and usages, and Christian morality upon all, and as the chief of all laws, institutions, or usages, and the supreme test of "Christian morality" is the observance of Sunday as the "Christian Sabbath," it does not surprise us when we read, "The American Government . . . is bound to maintain Sunday as a day of rest and worship," and that "Sunday is the test of all religion," and we would naturally conclude that this "Christian nation" should honor and revere the "Christian Sabbath." But, again, what are the facts?

We quote from the New York Journal, Monday, March 14:—

"No rest for war and navy chiefs. Busy all day [Sunday] issuing orders." Again: "Newport torpedo station busy Sunday. . . . For the first time in the history of the torpedo station, the shop was run on Sunday." Again: "There was no Sunday quiet around the Carpenter Steel Works to-day. Everybody was hustling and on the jump." And "The Bethlehem Works were run at full power to-day [Sunday]."

The above places are all working under orders from the Government, and turning out machines of destruction the most powerful the world has ever seen.

If there is one man above all others in this world that is held up to ridicule and contempt it is he who has made a profession of religion and proves false to it. This being so of the individual, what must it be of the nation? Professing religion, being declared "Christian" and yet proving false to every principle of Christianity, is it not time that the hand of fellowship be withdrawn, and the United States taken off the church books?

The Object of It.

It is made apparent by the facts stated at the hearing on the Sunday Rest bill, and by the testimony of residents of the city, that Washington is on Sundays a very quiet and decorous city, comparing favorably in this respect with any other city in the land, whether under rigid Sunday restrictions or not.

This fact makes perfectly plain therefore the real purpose of the Sunday Law bill for the District. It was not for the District of Columbia at all; for the District had no need of it, even in appearance. It was simply and solely a scheme to commit Congress to Sunday legislation. First, a District Sunday law; and then, standing on this vantage ground, a demand for a national Sunday law. This is the program of the Sunday law agitators. A national Sunday law is their objective point.

FREEDOM is reason's native air and man's inalienable right. No man can righteously sell, bequeath, or give away this original and necessary condition of the human soul; nor can any other man, or body of men, righteously come into possession of this primitive and inherent right of another. Years ago, in New England, a case to recover a fugitive slave was brought before Judge Harrington. To prove his claim, the slave-owner produced in court a bill of sale. The judge returned it, saying that it was not satisfactory. The Southerner's blood warmed and he indignantly asked what would be satisfactory to his honor. The judge replied, "A bill of sale from Almighty God."—Sel.

"AGAINST the barbarism of a resort to war," says a religious journal which speaks for the Reformed Episcopal Church, "it is the duty of every Christian to protest." This is true; and the Christian's protest should be sustained by action as well as by voice or pen. So far as his own actions are concerned, the Christian can never allow his convictions of right to be overruled.

It seems difficult for many people to grasp the truth that the battles of righteousness are never fought with carnal weapons. Whoever fights with such weapons is liable to defeat; but God is not liable to defeat. "The good fight of faith" is always victorious. If Spain and the United States should engage in war, the outcome would demonstrate nothing as to the rightfulness of the victorious side, any more than was demonstrated by the late war between the infidel Turks and the "Christian" Greeks.

* * *

THIS is not saying that a government is not bound under some circumstances to go to war. Governments are sustained by force, and war is but the last resort of force. Every government assumes the right to perpetuate its own existence; and to do this it feels bound to employ all necessary force, and make any necessary sacrifice of life and property. To attempt to overthrow the government is high treason, a crime punished by the severest penalties. The act in itself may be laudable, as in the case of the Declaration of Independence, by which the British Government was overthrown in the American colonies; but from the standpoint of the government it is the highest crime, and one to be repressed at all hazards. The Declaration of Independence was a crime of the highest magnitude; but it was no sin. A government fights its own battles; but the battles between sin and righteousness are fought by other agencies, even by those that are spiritual.

It is perfectly natural that a government should employ force, even in the form of armies and battleships, to maintain the things which are deemed essential to its existence. Force is the natural agency of civil government; indeed, the government stands for force, and for that agency only. It does not represent love; it does not stand for persuasion. The government does not love anybody; it wastes no time in argument. It simply commands and exacts obedience. Importers of foreign goods are not persuaded to pay a tariff on their importations; the government wastes no breath, time, or money in persuading people to obey any of its requirements. It simply makes known its requirements, and then proceeds to enforce them.

WHEN we speak against war, we do not speak from the standpoint of the civil government. From that standpoint the use of force to secure any desired end is a necessity. That is the worldly standpoint, and force is the natural weapon of the world. One method of employing this force is through politics; the ballot represents force, and not love or persuasion. Politics are a necessity in civil government, and war may become a necessity. We do not say that the civil government could do any better than to employ force in either of these forms when it is deemed that circumstances require them. We do not see how the government could do differently. What we do say is, that in these the government does not stand for Christianity. We protest against the idea that the civil government, in politics or war, proceeds upon Christian principles, save in so far as it maintains separation between church and state. In keeping itself separate from religion, the civil government is in harmony with Christianity; and in the maintenance of this principle, and this only, the two stand upon common ground.

* * *

THE government depends upon force. Christianity does not depend upon force. It cannot be maintained by force. The government represents force; Christianity represents love. The government can accomplish its ends only as it makes use of force; Christianity can accomplish her ends only as she refrains from the use of force. Let those who are of the world employ worldly methods and worldly weapons. We can suggest none better for them, so long as they remain of the world. But let those who are not of this world employ methods and weapons that are not of this world. Let them employ love, not force; the "sword of the Spirit," not the sword of steel. And Christians are not of this world. Let Christians therefore protest against war; not as being contrary to worldly principles or worldly interests, but as contrary to Christianity. It is not the business of Christians to advise the world what to do from a worldly standpoint; from that standpoint the world is as wise as the Christian. The Christian's business is to advise the world from the standpoint of Christianity; in other words, to advise those who are of the world to become Christians; to point out the superiority of the principles and ways of Christianity to the principles and ways of the world.

SOME very interesting news comes to us from the field of church and state controversy in Australia. A sudden revolution has taken place in the sentiment which seemed to be prevailing in the Federal Assembly against any union of church and state, and it came about on this wise. A motion was before the Assembly which was to incorporate in the fundamental law a provision that no state should enact any law interfering with the free exercise of religion. An amendment was offered to this, to the effect that no law of this kind should be passed by either a state or the Federal Government. Immediately an objection was raised, and the objection was that if such a provision were incorporated in the fundamental law, it would shut off any legislation for the observance of Sunday. But this was not all; the objector said further that the Seventh-day Adventists were there as the advocates of the principle of no state interference with religion, and that if this principle should be put into the Constitution, it would be a surrender to the Adventists. The result was that both the proposed amendment and the original proposition were swept aside altogether, and both state and federal governments are left wholly free to enact as much religious legislation as they may choose; and with a strong hint thus handed down to them that they are expected to enact some legislation of this kind, and especially some against the Seventh-day Adventists. So much for the effect of clerical lobbying in shaping the fortunes—or the misfortunes rather of the new-born Australian Federation.

The Papal Church-and-State Program in France.

In the light of facts which are given full publicity in lands where passing events are open to the view of all the civilized world, it is strange that intelligent people in this country should believe that the purpose of the papacy is not a union of church and state. Note the testimony upon this point which is furnished by the clerical program in France, as set forth by a clerical organ in that country. We quote this with accompanying comments from the Independent (N. Y.), of March 10:—

“Just how French clericalism proposes to make use of the present state of affairs in that republic is indicated by the official party election program as published in the Revue des Clergé Français. It begins as follows:—

“The church has the recognized right to govern not only individuals and families, but also nations. In other words, the state is not independent of the church; it is the state's duty to accept, confess, and protect the Catholic religion. It is the object of the state to protect the secular welfare of the people; but it is the sphere of the church to guard their eternal happiness. The sphere of the church is accordingly infinitely higher than that of the state, and the latter sphere is subordinate to the former. This subordination of ends brings with it, also, the subordination of means, and, as a result of this, it is apparent that the state is subordinate to the church. Nothing can overthrow this argument.”

“As a consequence of this position the program maintains that it is the duty of the state to render all possible service to the church. The church is both a divine and a human association, and possesses power to teach, to make laws and to inflict punishment; she has the right to punish heretics with ‘material’ punishments, i. e., fines, etc.; she further has the right to ask of the state to use the powers at her command for carrying out the spiritual interest which it is the function of the church to preserve and protect. The program concludes with these words:—

“By divine right the pope is the head of the church, the authority as the exponent of the highest morality which has the right of prescribing to the princes the directions and rules which they are in duty bound to observe in the government of their states.”

“The official election program of the ‘Catholic Republican Election Federation of 1898,’ which has its headquarters in Paris, and has been making an active canvass since November, is somewhat milder in tone and tendency. This program laments the fact that hitherto the republic has been antagonistic to the highest interests of religion, and makes the following demands: (1) honest acceptance of the republican principle of government; (2) reforms of the laws which have been enacted against the Catholic Church; (3) harmonious coöperation with all those who are striving for a reign of peace and freedom and justice. In spite of this peaceful program it is generally thought that the aim of Federation is just as much a theocracy as that of the Catholic party proper, namely, the clericalization of the republic, including the army. At any rate, this is the view of leading European church papers.”

An Episcopalian Protest.

An Episcopalian who writes to the Washington Post, under date of March 4, takes his church to task for engaging in the movement for a Sunday law, which he truthfully declares is and must remain a political question. He says:

“Editor Post: I am very sorry, as a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, to read in the Post the question that has been raised as to the Sunday law in this district, in which the Protestant Episcopal Church is interesting itself in a question which, in my humble opinion, should be left to persons outside of the church of any denomination. I have always loved the Episcopal Church for the reason that it has never meddled in politics. And the Sunday law must always be a political question.

“No greater evidence can be shown of this fact than the result of the election in New York City last fall—Van Wyck's election was aided in a great measure by the failure of the Sunday laws in New York City. . . . Leave the Sunday laws alone, particularly in this city. Let any unprejudiced person walk the streets of this city any Sunday and see if it is as quiet as any country village in any locality where any decent person is ever seen. . . . Please let it be known, once for all, that the Episcopal Church is out of political questions, and that Sunday observance must always be a political question.

Studies in French History.—14.

CHARLIE could hardly wait for an opportunity to ask his father what his opinion was about King Louis. His first chance came at the supper table.

Frankie, his little brother, had come in from his play crying, and with an angry flush on his cheek: "Nickey Grimley he called me a cry baby an' a coward, an' said I was stingy 'cause I wouldn't help him build a mud house"—and the blue eyes flashed defiantly,—“an’ I just telled him when I was a big man, I’d have him ‘rested an’ pit in a black prison, for talkin’ so wicked to me!”

“It would be better, dear, don’t you think,” said Mrs. White, “to play in your own yard, and keep away from Nickey, if you can’t agree, or else be so nice and kind to him that he won’t call you names? It would be dreadful to put him in prison for that, don’t you think so?”

“I dunno,” frowned Frankie, pacified but not convinced. “I told him to stop, but he did it two free times.”

“Well, Frankie,” said Mr. White, “people are never put in prison for such things,—I mean they never ought to be.”

“O father,” began Charlie, eagerly, “I want you to tell me if you don’t think it’s wrong to blaspheme.”

“Why, my son! you astonish me. You certainly know without asking me that I would rather see my son buried from my sight, than that he should blaspheme the name of the God who made him,” replied Mr. White, earnestly.

“Well, then, father, wouldn’t you punish me if I did it?”

“If you were persistent in doing so, I dare say I should remember the old-time adage, ‘Spare the rod and spoil the child.’”

“I thought so,” said Charlie, smiling, for he felt quite sure his father would agree with him; so he asked the next question with considerable assurance.

“Well, then, didn’t King Louis do all right to punish his subjects for the same thing? Joe Palmeter thinks he did wrong because he had blasphemers publicly, punished—and I’m pretty sure Professor Carman agreed with him,” added Charlie, with an indignant ring in his voice.

Mr. White smiled upon the flushed face, upturned to his. “I’m afraid I shall have to agree with them too, Charlie,” he said.

“Why, father, I thought you said just now that you’d punish me if I did it,—I can’t see the reason.”

“It is right, my son, and only in obedience to the divine will that parents should govern their own children, and bring them up in the fear of the Lord. But this is not the province of kings or rulers. It is not the business of the state to tamper in the least with the conscience of any individual. But it is the business of the church by the word of God to educate the conscience, and to do this in the spirit of the divine Master, who said to the impetuous disciple when he drew his sword to defend his Lord, ‘Put up thy sword into its place,’ ‘My kingdom is not of this world.’ No, my boy. We are placed here as free moral agents. The Holy Spirit never compels men. ‘Whosoever will, let him come.’”

“But what business, then, has the state to punish criminals for theft or murder?”

“For the safety and protection of other people, my son. If a man blasphemes or breaks the Sabbath, though this is wrong in the sight of heaven, and God will surely punish it at last, it does not in any way interfere with the rights of others in the pursuit of life, liberty or happiness. If the divine Master rebuked Peter for trying to protect him from personal danger and violence by drawing his sword, how much less would he approve of our trying to compel men by force of arms to give him respect and to honor his name. This sin you see is directly against him, and him alone. No; it were better for poor erring humanity to leave the punishment of such sins to the Judge of all the earth. He alone can decide justly the measure of the punishment which is their due.”

“Well, father, I believe I can see the point!” exclaimed Charlie, while a new light sparkled in his eyes. “I’ll tell Professor Carman what you’ve said.”

Tuesday afternoon came, and the class in French history, as it was called by the aspiring young pupils, was in its place.

“Well, Charlie,” began Professor Carman, “I suppose you are willing to take the floor and tell us what your father’s opinion is about the conduct of Saint Louis respecting blasphemers.”

Charlie blushed and stammered a little, but bravely took his place beside the teacher by the desk, and related as nearly as he could the dialogue at the supper table, finishing his little speech with the remark: “I couldn’t agree with you at first, professor, but now I am convinced you are right.”

Joe Palmeter smiled approvingly, and his teacher said as Charlie took his seat, “That was about as good, my boy, as an essay on religious liberty.”

“You will remember that Philip the Bold succeeded his father, King Louis IX., and it was of him that we were speaking when our last study closed. It was during his reign that the awful massacre called the ‘Sicilian Vespers’ took place. It was caused by the cruel tyranny of Charles, brother of Louis IX., and uncle of Philip the Bold. The pope gave him the crown of Sicily and Naples, having taken it away from the rightful heirs to do so, and he was so cruel to the people that they rose up in a body and killed several thousand French people and drove the cruel Charles from the island."

Demoralizing Effects of War.

"The Christian," London, Eng.

THE demoralizing effects of war on all who take part in its fierce struggles is occasionally painfully evidenced in the letters sent home by the combatants. We had shocking illustrations of this in published letters of some of those engaged in the recent Matabele and Bechuana affairs. The present war in India furnishes some fresh examples. In one case it comes from the pen of the Chronicle correspondent. After describing the burning of some Aka Khel villages which ruined the homes of hundreds of non-combatants, some of whom begged our soldiers to end their lives out of pity (one old woman tried to burn herself with her home), this representative of Army sentiment goes on to say: "Everybody, from the general downwards, was pleased with the success of the day's operations. A hot bath, the snowy whiteness of the cloth and the brightness of the silver which adorned the mess-table, and a night between the sheets, were afterwards thoroughly appreciated." Such callous disregard to suffering inflicted, in contrast to the glorification of the comforts of the British camp, while those poor people were left to perish on bleak hillsides, is painful reading. Any employment that can thus dry up the springs of natural pity for the vanquished must be of the devil.

Independence and Obstinacy.

"Sunday-School Times."

INDEPENDENCE is one thing, obstinacy is quite another thing. Independence is standing all by one's self, without being dependent on another. Obstinacy is standing out against others, resisting all attempts to be swayed or influenced by others. An independent man is ordinarily not an obstinate man. He hears readily both sides, and willingly considers them. He may even adopt the view of another, as different from his former inclinations, but he does so because he of his own mind accepts that view without being controlled by anybody else. An obstinate man is ordinarily not an independent man. He sticks to his own opinion so closely that he cannot fairly consider any other, in order to see if it is better than his. An independent man is an open-minded man. An obstinate man has not an open mind. Independence is quite consistent with positiveness of nature and manner in expressing present views, even though these views may be changed by the reasoning of the next hour. Stubborn, unreasoning, blind obstinacy is never independent, although the man who is bound by it often deludes himself by thinking that he has independence.

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG.
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most of all, not all of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

"AND ye shall be my witnesses . . . unto the uttermost part of the earth" were Jesus' last words to his apostles before his ascension, and were meant for his followers for all time; but judging from the press reports of pulpit utterances, from all over the country, one would think that to-day the order of things was changed, that the duty of the "ambassador for Christ" instead of beseeching men to be reconciled to God, was to incite them to war, and send them forth, not to save men's lives, but to destroy them.

It would seem from the following item taken from the New York Sun, March 18, that the "flag salute" has come to stay:—

"The Senate at Albany, N. Y., passed Senator Coggeshall's bill requiring the school authorities of every school in the state to purchase a United States flag and display it on the building during school hours and at such other times as they may determine. When the weather will not permit it to be otherwise displayed, it is to be placed conspicuously in the principal room of the school-house. The State Superintendent of Public Instruction is to prepare a program for a salute to the flag at the opening of each day of school, and such other patriotic exercises as he may deem expedient, with special provision for the observance of Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, and Flag Day."

ACCORDING to the Canadian Baptist March 17, there has been issued by the Ontario Lord's Day Alliance a request "that the first full week of April—3rd to 10th inclusive—be observed throughout the Province as a week of prayer for the Lord's day.

. . . Besides special prayer it is hoped that on one of these days a special sermon on the subject will be preached, and also, where thought desirable, an offering be made for the work." What this "special sermon" may be we cannot tell, nor to what purpose the "offering . . . for the work" will be put; but we sincerely hope it may not be expended in halting before magistrates and courts those who, differing from them in their religious belief and practice, "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."

Camden, N. J., March 11.—The new city council, in which the Reformers have a majority of five, opened with the recital of the Lord's prayer in concert by the thousand or more present. Before it ended a most disgraceful riot had ensued, in which City Clerk Varney was thrown out on his head and a certiorari, granted by Judge Garrison, was torn to shreds by angry citizens before the old council, controlled by Republicans, adjourned."

And yet, notwithstanding the above, which is only a sample of scenes occurring to a greater or lesser extent in both municipal, state, and national councils, we are told that it is nothing short of blasphemy to dare to open them without religious exercises. What a farce!

THE fiat has gone forth, and from human lips, that "Christ is to be this world's king," and also the manner by which this is to be accomplished, namely, "through the gateway of politics." This of course cannot be accomplished in all the earth at one time, so the initiative has been taken here in America, and it has been purposed to "enthroned Christ on Capitol Hill" as this nation's king. And this being made an accomplished fact, the movement will reach out till, "through the gateway of politics," all the earth shall be brought into subjection to Him. Yes; Christ is to be given the kingdoms of this world (Rev. 11:15), and he is to reign forever; but is it to be accomplished in the manner described above? Is Christ to become king through the ballot? On the contrary we are taught in the Word that instead of becoming king through the puny efforts of men, God himself will give him the kingdom (Ps. 2:8; Eze. 21:27), and he shall reign forever. O that men would forsake the ways and means that are not of God, that they would realize their high and holy calling, that instead of seeking through the primary and the polls to set up the kingdom of Christ, they would seek to draw men away from the things of this present evil world, and prepare them to stand in that day when the kingdoms of this world, being given to Christ, he shall dash them in pieces like a potters vessel (Ps. 2:9), and set up his kingdom which, occupying the whole earth, shall stand forever. Dan. 2:35, 44.

THERE is plenty of talk to-day concerning "Christian citizenship," and the duties of the "Christian citizen." This country is beyond question the grandest country in the world, but the Christian is a citizen of a better country than this. The citizen of this country may have privileges above that of citizens of all other countries, but the "Christian citizen" has privileges above even this, and the duties that pertain to the Christian citizen are far above and beyond, in every particular, the duties of him who boasts of his citizenship here. The Christian's citizenship is in heaven (Phil. 3:2, R. V.) and it is his privilege to have the "angels of God" (Heb. 2:6) do service for him. Heb. 2:14 (R. V.). Not only that, but he has been called to fill the position of fellow-worker with God (1 Cor. 3:9) and raised to the position of joint-heir with Jesus Christ as a child of God (Rom. 8:17) and been given the position of ambassador from the court of heaven (2 Cor. 2:20), his duty as such, grand and noble above all this earth can give, is to present the claims of God upon man to his fellow-beings, and call them from the kingdoms of this world unto the kingdom of God's dear Son. Col. 1:13.

UNION with the state turns religion into a moral poison.

THE natural effect of a Sunday rest law is to make people exceedingly restless.

CIVIL legislation makes people very uncivil when it enters the sphere of religion.

THE person who is not a friend of sinners—even Spanish sinners—is not a Christian.

GOD created nothing human except the individual. In all that is human, therefore, the individual is paramount.

SOME people have so much religion that they not only want to be religious for themselves, but for everybody else. But that is not Christianity.

JESUS CHRIST said: "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." If Sunday be not such a plant, no one need fear for it; but if otherwise, it will be rooted up in spite of all the legislation, state or national, that can ever be enacted.

THE most dangerous foes with which the United States has to deal at the present time, are not foreign ones, but those within her own borders. The disintegration which is the result of demoralizing influences at work upon the people of the nation, is more to be feared than the combined armies and navies of Europe.

WHATEVER practice is wrong from the standpoint of due regard for individual rights, ought to be suppressed by law on all days of the week; and whatever practice is right from that standpoint, ought not to be suppressed by law on any day of the week.

ANY person who cannot be religious without having a law made to regulate the conduct of other people, cannot be religious when such a law is enacted. No person can be a true Sabbath-keeper until he is able to keep the Sabbath independently of all human law and of the conduct of all other persons.

The Inherited Spirit of Protestantism.

RELIGIOUS persecution seems terrible enough viewed from the standpoint of physical suffering alone. But when we think of its blighting effect upon the morals of those who are brought in contact with it, the case seems yet worse, if possible. During the Dark Ages, the very fiends who invented the most horrible tortures for those who were accounted heretics, and even gloated over the dying agonies of their victims, wore the sacred vestments of the altar, and ministered religion in the name of Christ.

To the minds of the priest-ridden people of that age, religion became the vehicle of vengeance, instead of an angel of love, and was the means of steeling the hearts of its devotees against any appeal to mercy from the suffering. Even the nerves of delicate women were trained to endure scenes of the most diabolical acts of inhumanity. A wife, mother, or sister, was perhaps called to witness the writhing, quivering body of one dearer than life, while the slow fire of the auto-da-fe crept from limb to limb, wresting from its victim piercing screams of anguish. To comfort her, she was told that the God she served required such suffering from heretics in sight of the living, as a faint shadow of what all such must endure through the eternal hereafter.

Such a horrible doctrine, proclaimed from every pulpit, and emphasized by frequent burnings of heretics, was well-calculated to freeze out of every breast the milk of human kindness, and implant in its stead, the icy coldness of distrust and deceit. Those, therefore, who had not courage to brave the terrors of the stake, passed their lives in studied falsehoods and hypocritical observances to escape detection, until, with minds degraded by habitual deception, they sank, hopeless and terror-stricken, into the grave.

But this was not all. In order to make it appear that there was a desire to lift any taint of crime from the children of these so-called heretics, a law was enacted, providing that those who betrayed their parents should preserve their inheritance.—Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella, vol. I, pp. 262, 263. Thus children were induced to become informers against their parents, in order to hunt heretics out of the world. This law kept parents from teaching the doctrines of salvation to their children, lest they let fall some word which would be reported to the authorities as heretical, and so cost them their lives. Parents were afraid of their own offspring, and children were taught to antagonize their parents, until the very ties of nature were snapped, and life became an almost intolerable burden. Strange as it may seem, this terrible work was done in the name of Him who said, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another."

Such perversion of the principles of Christianity, continued through hundreds of years, could not fail to produce pernicious effects upon the morals of even the most sincere believers. Hence, when the Reformation was inaugurated, it is not so strange that, where it became strong enough, it carried out, to some extent, the same tactics which had ever marked the career of the Roman Church. After the withdrawal of Henry VIII. from the papal church, laws were made, especially in Elizabeth's reign, requiring Catholics of the realm to take an oath which would set them absolutely and irreconcilably against the doctrines of their church. Hallam's "Constitutional History" affirms that under similar laws, Presbyterians also were imprisoned, branded, mutilated, scourged, and exposed in the stocks. Catholics were tortured and hanged. Anabaptists and Arians were burned alive. If a secret meeting of dissenters was held, the preacher was liable to suffer death as the penalty. Some actually had their ears pulled off, while others were branded with hot irons. And yet the principal reason given for these coercive measures, as late as the reign of Elizabeth, was that it was an absolute sin to tolerate those who were in error.—Bilson's Christian Subjection, 1585. So nearly, indeed, did that church follow Catholic methods of persecution, that one old persecuted Puritan of that time denounced Anglicanism as being "planted in the blood of her mother."

When the Presbyterians gained ascendancy in Scotland, no priest was permitted to celebrate, or any worshiper to hear mass, under pain of confiscation of goods for the first offense, of exile for the second, and of death for the third offense. "One mass," exclaimed Knox, "is more fearful to me than if ten thousand armed enemies were landed in any part of the realm."—McCrie's Life of Knox, ed. 1840, p. 246. Servetus was burned by order of Calvin, because of his opinions on the trinity. Castellio, for repudiating the doctrine of predestination, was driven out of Geneva; and then pursued by Calvin with such unrelenting hatred, that his prospects in life became blighted, and he sank into a condition of absolute destitution, from which he was relieved only by death.

One can find a slight excuse for the Catholics, who ever denied the right of private judgment in matters of religion, for their intolerance of dissenters. But when we think of Protestantism being founded on the doctrine of the right of private judgment, what excuse can be offered for the course of Protestants in this direction? If the exercise of private judgment in religious matters is not only a right, but a duty, as Protestantism affirms, how absurd for it to brand even honest error as criminal, and to prescribe beforehand, through the civil law, the conclusion to which believers must arrive. Is it not plain that wherever such a course is taken, it reveals the same spirit back of it that caused the best blood of past centuries to be yielded upon the altar of religious bigotry and intolerance?

But what gave persecution its first impetus? Historical extracts in previous papers have shown it to be the effort to destroy the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, and to put forward in its place the pagan festival of the sun, or Sunday. The persecution started by that effort grew into a gigantic system, which swept millions off the earth under the most terrible tension of affairs. Probably those who inaugurated the work had not the least idea of the magnitude it would attain; but when once loose rein is given to the passion of intolerance, like all other excitements it passed beyond the control of those who thought they had it well in hand.

But what about the present clamor for a civil law to uphold the same day of the sun, by which such terrible consequences were realized? Is it not a revival of the old controversy, over which the church of the early ages divided, and which since then has ever caused bitterness to dwell in the hearts of those who held the ascendancy in matters of religion? If the struggle then to maintain the Sunday festival without scriptural support, resulted in such bitter persecution, is it not probable that the same effort now, will ultimately produce a similar spirit, with corresponding results?

EITHER take Christ in your lives, or cast him out of your lips; either be that thou seemest, or else be what thou art.—Dyer.

Short Sermons on Religious Liberty.

MAJORITIES seldom have a conviction.

WE ought to obey God rather than man.—Bible.

TRUE worship springs from voluntary loving service.

PURE civil government never persecuted because of religious belief.

IT was with a kiss that Judas betrayed his divine Master; and we should all be admonished, whatever our faith may be, that the rights of conscience can not be so successfully assailed as under the pretext of holiness.—Richard M. Johnson.

A GOVERNMENT without law is no government at all; but it does not follow that that law should be religious in its character.

THE acts of faith and obedience to which the gospel calls us is a reasonable service to which we are to be drawn by the mercies of God and not driven by the terrors of men.—Clark's History of Intolerance.

No human law has a right to interfere with a man's belief, his freedom of conscience, his right to worship his Creator when and how he will, so long as he does not trespass on the rights of others.—T. E. Richardson.

WE can not consistently deny liberty to our fellow-man and expect long to have it granted to us.

THE true doctrine of Christian liberty is not simply our right to think and act for ourselves, but the recognition on our part of the right of the other man to think and act for himself.

W. E. C.

An English Protest Against Sunday Laws.

ONE of the leading dailies of London, Eng.,—the Chronicle—recently in taking notice of a prosecution under the Sunday statutes, said:—

"When will people learn that it is impossible to enforce a religious observance of Sunday by law? Or when will Parliament spare half an hour for the repeal of our ridiculous Sabbatarian acts? Now and again some poor old woman in a slum is summoned by a spy under a statute of Elizabeth for having sold him two kippers on a Sunday; and now at Caversham, near Reading, three men have been prosecuted for playing football on Sunday afternoon, contrary to an early act of Charles I. The magistrates, under the chairmanship of Lord Saye and Sele (whose name in itself savors of Charles I.'s reign), of course, dismissed the summons, not because it was spiteful and ludicrous, but because the three men 'did not constitute a concourse of non-parishioners within the meaning of the act.' The act forbids all sports and pastimes on Sundays to any concourse of non-parishioners, whilst all of us, even if parishioners, are debarred from bear-baiting, bull-baiting, interludes, common plays, or any other unlawful exercises or pastimes such as are so popular amongst all ages and all classes to-day. It is a strange thing that the moment we touch law we seem as a nation to lose our sense of absurdity. And as to people who get up summonses of this kind, they are undoubtedly the direct descendants of those Puritans who hated bear-baiting, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators."

The Chronicle fails, however, to recognize that all observance of Sunday must be religious, since Sunday is a purely religious institution.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

JUST one thing was presented as possible for me to do for my friend's husband; that was to send him a message through the mail. I felt how unconventional it would be, and hesitated a long time; but at last as I could get no rest from the burden of it, I wrote a very brief note of gospel warning and invitation, based on what I had discovered, when he had compelled me to see him at his worst. I appealed to his fatherly nature, and entreated him for the sake of his children to stop short in the course that was taking him to eternal ruin. I did not "mince matters." I realized the necessity of saying what I had to say in as few and forcible words as possible so that their meaning should not escape a muddled brain, or be utterly lost if flung away in a flash of anger.

When the note was ready for the mail I laid it on a chair before me, and kneeling in prayer gave it to the Lord. "You made me do it," was my trembling appeal, "and now you must go with it, or it had better never have been done." That prayer was easy, for I felt a great sense of need. I was not yet, however, free from the feeling that I had done a very strange, and perhaps an unwarrantable thing; and as soon as the letter had gone to the letter box, I would have given anything to have had it back safely in my hands again. All the morning I was harassed and unable to go on with the literary work which was occupying me during those days; until again I knelt and said to God, "Lord, you made me do this; I wrote that letter to that bad man for you; now take the burden of it away and let me go about my work, for I must do it. I cannot be worried over this any longer. I must depend on you to take care of this strange thing which you compelled me to do. I give it up,—take care of it,—I will trust it all to you!" And from that instant I was free. When three o'clock came I found that I could pray with such faith and confidence as I had not had at any time before since I had assumed this strange new responsibility.

It was in this experience that I learned the relation between words and deeds in prayer; that prayer to be real must have in it the elements of activity.

Two or three days thereafter as I was on my way to the Public Library I met my friend; she grasped my hand and said:—

"I was going to see you; come into this office; I want to tell you something."

We entered into a sewing machine store and found a corner where we could talk quietly, when she said:—

"The strangest thing has happened. Mr. R. came home the other day sober, threw a letter into my lap and said: 'Read that'! It was your letter. I read it, he standing before me; I knew he was watching me close; O, but I was afraid! I thought:—she does not dream of what she is doing to me by this letter. I did not dare let him know when I had finished it; I expected blows; I did not know what dreadful thing might happen, so I kept acting as though I could not quite make it all out; but at last he said: 'Well, what do you think of that?' I tried to answer carelessly, but I had to try two or three times before I could say, 'I don't know: what do you think?'"

Then it was with tears and sobs mingled with laughter that she tried to repeat what he had said. It was all so different from anything that she could have expected, as God's work always must be.

"'Roxy,' he said, 'it is God's truth, every word of it; I am a lost man, and I want you to pray for me.' Just think of that. He asked me to pray for him when I had expected curses and perhaps blows. O, how I prayed! We knelt there together for the first time in all our lives, and I never thought of a doubt or a fear. I just told Our Father all about him, and us all, and how J. cried and prayed! I never would have believed it possible, for he never cries. He is a very proud man. It was a proof of God such as I have needed all these years. He has been converted truly, and I shall always be so glad it was at home with me, for I thought he had no more love for me. I thought he hated me. I should have supposed I must get out of the way if there had been any signs that he was thinking of trying to do different; that the sight of me would have driven every good thought away. God sent him home to me in this way, for my good I know. I wanted to fly to you, but we have had so much talking and praying to do that I couldn't get to it, until this morning. It has made a revolution in our home, and my boy feels the change already."

I must leave my readers to imagine the song of praise that filled our hearts, and the effect which this story of salvation had on me. It was a lesson to me, that I have tried never to forget; and as I recall it, it always stands as a demonstration of how truly the Holy Spirit has led us in ways that we had not known from the beginning of our work.

This man's career was woven in with the development of our rescue work for men, and he became one of our strong helpers.

WHAT volumes have been written, what laborious "sermons" preached, what ingenuity exercised, on the part of men, to overthrow that simple statement of Scripture which says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath"! What a hard work it is, truly, for puny man to overthrow one of the words of God! As well might one try to beat down Gibraltar with a club.

Law Makers for the Universe.

BY T. R. WILLIAMSON.

God chose to make beings just like himself, only finite, having limited powers, while his powers are unlimited.

His people are called "Sons of God." 1 John 3:2. The "brethren of the Son of God." Heb. 2:11, 17. They are said to be "partakers of the divine nature." They are called "gods," and it is said that in the future they are to be "equal unto the angels," and "as the angels." Now no series of appellations can be imagined which could show to as great a degree as do these terms, the dignity, the glory, of the position which God designed and designs that his people shall occupy.

"Sons of God," "partakers of the divine nature," what can be greater than this?

They are then to be able to choose between good and evil just as independently as God himself would choose. They are called "gods" in Ps. 82:6. This is no mere figure of speech or superlative expression; nothing of the kind. "God" is the family name, the title of grandeur, and they who are made God's sons and daughters, who actually partake of God's nature, as truly become Gods as children born into the Jones family become Jones.

Read Daniel 4 for a description of King Nebuchadnezzar's period of lunacy and you will see that the angels may and do demand of the central government, the government of heaven, the issuing of such decrees as are necessary to the ruling of this world, and if of this world then of all worlds. The angels then have an important part to act in governing and ordering the affairs of the whole great universe, and God's children are to be equal unto the angels.

They too will act just such a part; for Jesus says, they "shall sit with me in my throne;" and as the universe was made by and for Christ (Col. 1:16), he will, under the Father's direction, rule the universe; and his people sitting with him, sharing with him "in his throne," will help him rule the universe.

The people of God will judge angels and men. 1 Cor. 6:2, 3. "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God." Pillars uphold the building; God's temple is the seat of his government, of his authority, the Capitol building of the whole universe of worlds.

To be a pillar, an upholder, there is to have a share in the government. "And I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the New Jerusalem, the city of my God, and I will write upon him my new name."

Have you ever seen a sailor ashore from one of the huge battleships of the navy? And have you noted that across his breast, or on his cap, in bold letters, was printed the name of his vessel, "Kentucky," or "Yorktown," or "Illinois," or "Indiana"? Well, just so, as the saints of God, paired and twinned with angels, plant their shining feet upon the glittering worlds of eternity, swift winged from the grandeur of the sphere where shines the located throne of God, bearing in hand or by word of mouth some gentle yet mighty decree of Omnipotence, enacted at their request, they will show in blazing brilliance, on brow and breast and belt, the lustrous names of the Royal City, of the King's Son, and of the King himself, eternal, immortal.

Such is your transcendent privilege; such may be your magnificent destiny. O, poor deliver in this world's hardships and darkness. And if such be my future right, can you not, O earthly governments, O earthly courts, allow me to take direction, even here, from the King himself, in all things pertaining exclusively to his service? If I may be entrusted with a share in supervising the affairs of eternity, can you not, as long as I harm no man, allow me to think and to act for myself with reference to my duty to God in this world?

Decision Touching Religious Exercises in the Public Schools of Missouri.

AN important decision touching the question of the legality of religious exercises in the public schools of Missouri, is that lately rendered by Attorney-General Crow, of that State. The decision is in answer to the following questions raised by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, John R. Kirk:—

"1st. Is there legal authority for such religious exercises?"

"2nd. If there is authority for such religious exercise within school hours, can the teacher require pupils of the school to give attention to the prayer if they do not volunteer to do so; or, if the teacher has authority to conduct such religious exercise, may a portion of the children retain their seats and pursue such studies as they prefer to pursue during the exercise?"

The attorney-general said in reply:—

"Reading the Lord's Prayer is certainly manifesting that degree of reverence which constitutes worship. The continuous reading of the Bible and repeating the Lord's Prayer cannot be done by believers in Christianity without feelings of deepest gratitude and a holy sense of honor, reverence, adoration and homage to the Supreme Being, which is the essence of worship.

"This exercise, therefore, being a form of religious worship, and the same being done as one of the rules and exercises of our public schools, it necessarily and logically follows that a public school house is therefore made a place of worship. Referring now to that part of our constitution which provides 'that no person can be compelled to erect, support, or attend any place of worship,' it must be borne in mind that the tax paid by our citizens for the erection and maintenance of the public schools is an involuntary tax, one which they are by the provisions of law 'compelled to pay.' Thus he becomes 'compelled' to erect, support, and maintain a place of worship, if such religious worship is suffered in a public school. . . .

"I am, therefore, of the opinion that religious worship can not be indulged in any of our public schools, and that repeating the Lord's Prayer, being, as suggested by you, religious worship, may be excluded therefrom. . . .

"To compel any pupil against his conscience to participate and observe any such exercise is a vile perversion of the Constitution guaranteeing freedom of conscience and religious worship. . . .

"Such practice would produce religious and sectarian strife in every school district in the state. No matter how innocent or honestly done, it would constitute the first step toward a union of church and state, which logically involves the last step."

Let no one entertain the idea that antagonism to the conducting of religious exercises in the public schools necessarily means antagonism to religion. Such antagonism as that represented in the above decision is based upon justice; and there is no antagonism between justice and Christianity. On the contrary, Christianity demands that justice be done in every matter; hence it is true that Christianity itself demands that religious exercises should not be conducted in the public schools.

When religion enters into partnership with the state in any matter, it becomes debased and changed into a moral poison. Out of regard therefore both for religion and for mankind, we oppose such a partnership in the public schools.

The True Sign and the False.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE evidence thus far given that Sunday is the mark of the papacy has by no means been exhausted.

By studying the prophecy (Rev. 13:11-18) still further it will be seen that while the mark of the beast (papacy) is being enforced there are those who will not receive the mark either in their right hand or their foreheads. Instead of this they are brought to view as receiving the "Father's name in their foreheads." Rev. 14:1.

It will be apparent that the mark of the beast is a rival institution to that which is called the "Father's name." The number who receive the Father's name are spoken of as being 144,000. Whether this means exactly the number or represents a larger number, is not necessary to be discussed in this article.

If as has been proved Sunday is the mark of the papacy and it is a rival of that which is called the "Father's name," it must be that at the very time when strong efforts are being made to enforce Sunday as the mark there would be another day laying claim to recognition as the Sabbath and which really contains the Father's name.

And furthermore, if Sunday is represented as being a sign (and this has abundantly been shown to be the case in these articles), we should naturally expect to find that this particular day, of which Sunday is the rival, has not only the Father's name in it, but also is said in Scripture to be a sign.

No one who is at all acquainted with the religious movements in this country for the last half century or more, can deny that there has indeed been another day contended for as the Sabbath, that really does contain the Father's name and is positively called by God himself his sign. That day is the seventh day of the week.

For proof on this point we turn to Ex. 20:8-11, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," etc.

This is the fourth precept of the Decalogue, and it can readily be seen that it contains God's name,—“In six days the Lord [Jehovah] made heaven and earth,” etc.

Of the sanctuary that God commanded Moses to build, and in which the law—the ten commandments—was put, it is frequently said that God's name was there. For instance, Deut. 16:6: “But at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to put his name in, there thou shalt sacrifice the passover, at even, at the going down of the sun, at the season that thou camest forth out of Egypt.” Also of the temple which Solomon built and dedicated, and which replaced the movable structure that Moses built, it is said (1 Kings 8:29): “That thine eyes may be open toward this house night and day, even toward the place of which thou hast said, My name shall be there,” etc.

No less plainly and more so if there is any difference at all, is the seventh day called a sign. In Ex. 31:13 we read: “Speak also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my Sabbaths ye shall keep; for it is a sign between me and you.” The same thing is stated again in verses 16, 17. And yet again in Eze. 20:12, 20 we have the same truth uttered, “Moreover also I gave them my Sabbaths to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them.” “And hallow my Sabbaths, and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord your God.”

Let it be remembered that it is not simply man who thus speaks of the seventh day as the sign of God, but it is God himself who says it. And because God says it, the seventh day is now being set forth as the sign of the Creator, and the people of this country—yes, and of the whole world—are asked to recognize it as such.

But just here it is proper to state most emphatically that under no consideration is governmental recognition and aid asked for the seventh day as is the case with Sunday. Being the sign of God's eternal power in creation and redemption, it could not in the very nature of things ask such aid; while it is perfectly consistent that for Sunday, being the sign of the papacy which has never used any other power than that of the governments of earth, such help should be asked.

No, indeed; the seventh day as the sign of God appeals to the individual conscience, leaving to the individual himself the decision whether he will recognize the day or not; leaving him to answer before God's tribunal and not man's, for his action, whether for or against. And this is in perfect harmony with the principles recognized in the American Constitution, as explained by those who framed it.

The two days—the Sabbath and Sunday—are now and have been for years, before us; the prophecy is being fulfilled, and we are called upon to choose which we will accept. And be it ever remembered that it cannot be both at one time. That important results hang upon the issue before us will be pointed out in future articles.

Meanwhile the reader is asked, Which day will you accept—the seventh day, the true Sabbath, which contains the Father's name, and is God's sign? or the Sunday, which is never in the Scripture called the Sabbath or Lord's day; is not nor ever can be God's sign; but is and always has been from the first the sign of the papacy?

What Is the Kingdom of God?

It is the fond dream of many that the kingdom of God is to be ushered in, or at least hastened, by political action. It was Miss Willard who said some years since: “The kingdom of God must enter the realm of law through the gateway of politics.” But what is the kingdom of God?

In the epistle to the Romans, the apostle says, “The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.” Certainly in this sense the coming of the kingdom of God could be in no way hastened by political action. Politics is not a means of grace.

Wherever Christ reigns there is his kingdom. To his disciples he said, “Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power. And after six days Jesus taketh with him Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into a high mountain apart by themselves: and he was transfigured before them. And his raiment became shining exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them. And there appeared unto them Elias with Moses and they were talking with Jesus.” And again he said, “The kingdom of God is within you.”

In the transfiguration, they saw the kingdom of God in miniature; saw it as it will exist when all God's people shall be gathered home. There was Christ the King, all glorious in his royal apparel; there, too, were Moses and Elias; the first representing those who, having fallen asleep in Jesus, will be raised to immortality at his appearing; the second, representing the living saints who shall be changed to immortality and be translated without seeing death, even as was Elijah.

But the heart subdued by the love of God, cleansed by the blood of Christ, changed by the transforming influence of the Spirit of God, is also a fit type of the kingdom of God, for there is the new man, the subject to Christ the everlasting King. There is a throne in every heart and Christ is the lawful king. Too often the usurper sits enthroned where Christ should reign, but the kingdom belongs none the less to God; so that it is true of every man, whether he recognizes the fact or not, that the kingdom of God is within him. But the ushering in of the kingdom of God in this sense is beyond the power of earthly rulers.

Our Lord said, "My kingdom is not of this world." And when some would have taken him by force and made him a king he hid himself from them. Had he come bearing the symbols of a princely lineage, had he sought honor of men, had he courted political preferment, in short, had he coveted an earthly throne, doubtless the multitudes who scorned him and who joined in the cruel cry, Crucify him, crucify him! would have united in crowning him king of the Jews.

But Jesus Christ received not honor of men. They could add nothing to him. Each can for himself give to his Lord that which is already his—"A sinful, wayward heart;" and this once given, Christ will cleanse it, making it a fit temple for his own abode; but men can never give to Christ any other kingdom than their own hearts. He receives his kingdom from the Father, who says to him, "Ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt rule them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Ps. 2:8,9.

Our Saviour likened himself to a nobleman going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return. Cf. Mark 13:34 with Luke 19:11,12. He receives that kingdom as promised in the second Psalm, at the conclusion of the judgment described in Dan. 7:9,10. This judgment decides who are to be the subjects of that kingdom. The giving of the kingdom is described in verses 13 and 14. Following this comes the ruling with a rod of iron, the breaking in pieces like a potter's vessel. "According to their deeds, accordingly he will repay, fury to his adversaries, recompense to his enemies; to the islands will he repay recompense." Isa. 59:18. "Out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS." Rev. 19:15,16.

This earth was not created to be forever the abode of sin and rebellion against God. It was created to be peopled with a race loyal to their Creator. "For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God himself that formed the earth and made it; he hath established it, he created it not in vain; he formed it to be inhabited; I am the Lord and there is none else." Isa. 45:18. Of the character of those who are to inhabit the earth, the psalmist says: "The meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

"The Lord knoweth the days of the upright: and their inheritance shall be forever." Ps. 37:11,18. The apostle Peter, also, speaking of God's purpose concerning the earth, says that notwithstanding the fact that it is to be destroyed by fire, even as it was once overthrown by water, "Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." 2 Peter 3:13.

The future glorious kingdom of God for which our Saviour teaches us to pray, saying, "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth," is, then, nothing less than this earth purged by the fires of the last day, and restored to its Eden glory by the power of him who sits upon the throne, when he shall say in the presence of all his redeemed people, "Behold, I make all things new." Then from the ashes of the present world shall come forth the new earth, promised long; the hope of saints and sages, of patriarchs and prophets; and as before the astonished gaze of the saved of all ages it springs at once into verdure, as they see it "rejoice and blossom as the rose," as "the excellency of Carmel and Sharon" are given unto it, from the lips of that throng "which no man can number," will burst that glad shout of praise, "Blessing and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

The work of preparing subjects for this glorious kingdom is now going on in the earth. This gospel of the kingdom is being preached "in all the world for a witness" (Matt. 24:14); and soon the end will come. But only the gospel can prepare men to enter this kingdom; and only its preaching in the demonstration and power of the Spirit of God can hasten the coming of that day. "Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." "The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Human governments are powerless in this matter. God alone "can bring a clean thing out of an unclean."

Inconveniences of Royalty.

AN English paper says that the other day, when Queen Victoria was seated in her drawing-room, with several of her household in attendance, the lamp placed close beside her began to smoke. To the horror and astonishment of the company the Queen promptly raised her august hand and turned down the flame.

"Your majesty," said the lady in waiting in awestruck tones, "why did you trouble to do that yourself?"

"Because," said the Queen, "if I had called out, 'This lamp is smoking!' one of you ladies would have said to the equerry, 'See! the lamp is smoking!' and the equerry would have called out to the nearest servant, 'Here! the Queen's lamp is smoking!' and that servant would have called to a footman to attend to it, and all the time the lamp would have gone on smoking; so I preferred to turn it down myself."

AFTER all that has been said about the horrors of Armenia and of India, and the profound interest that has been awakened thereby throughout the civilized world, the following words of Senator Gallinger relative to the situation in Cuba, spoken in the U. S. Senate on the 23rd inst., need no apology for coming to the ears of the American people.

SENATOR GALLINGER had just returned from a trip to Cuba, and spoke from the standpoint of his personal investigations in the island. In his speech he said: "The number of people who have starved in Cuba will never be definitely known. It is estimated that 800,000 were driven from their homes into the cities and towns. I had it from Spanish authority that, according to their figures, 225,000 have already perished, but it is said that the Red Cross Society is in possession of figures showing that 425,000 Cubans have died as a result of Spanish cruelty from starvation, and that 200,000 more must inevitably die, making an aggregate of 625,000, or almost twice the population of the District of Columbia or of the State of New Hampshire. Dr. Lesser, an authority on the results of famine, who is on the ground, says that of the 175,000 not taken into account above, at least 5 per cent. of them will die, making a grand total of 634,000 deaths of men, women, and children as a result of Weyler's inhuman and barbarous decree. It may be that the Government of Spain and the cities of Havana and Mantanzas are doing something to relieve this terrible suffering, but if so I did not see any evidence of it. The hope of the poor remaining sufferers is in this great Government, and Heaven be thanked, our people are reaching out the hand of sympathy and affectionate interest in the shape of food, medicine, and clothing."

FROM carefully-prepared statistics, it appears that during the great civil war in America, 150,000 lives were lost on the Federal side, and 133,000 on the side of the Confederacy. By comparing these figures with those furnished by investigations in Cuba, some idea may be gathered of the awful magnitude of the storm of death and ruin that has been sweeping the island for the past two years, while it was asserted by Spain and recognized as a fact by this Government, that no war existed in Cuba at all! It should be remembered also that comparatively few of the casualties of our civil war were attended by horrors greater than that of swift death on the field of battle; and the victims were for the most part brave men, and not women and children.

AND why is all this appalling sacrifice of human life, with its attendant flood of suffering and ruin? Oh, it is in order that the government in Cuba may continue to be Spanish, and not some other government! A weighty reason, truly, for the killing of hundreds of thousands of people! Yet it illustrates the principle upon which all human governments proceed. Each one of them assumes the right to perpetuate its own existence, at no matter what sacrifice of human life and happiness. What then is government, that it should be so much more sacred than humanity? Is there anything, indeed, on earth, of more importance than human welfare?

WOULD not some other government than the Spanish do just as well for the people of Cuba? The answer given by the majority of Americans would be that almost any other government would do better. But no matter what a government may be—good or bad—it always holds itself to be most sacred, and counts resistance against it as the highest crime. And if the government is in danger, it asks and if necessary requires that the citizens under it should surrender their lives for its defense.

ALL Europe is to-day, as it has been for years, an armed camp. Why is this? Is it because all the people there love to fight with one another?—Oh, no; nobody supposes that. A great many of them have such a dislike for it that they are willing to journey thousands of miles to a strange country, where they will not have to spend years of the best part of their lives in military service. Is it because the people of one nation are afraid that the people of another nation are bent on doing them some injury? or because they contemplate some great misery that would overtake them in case the government were overthrown?—No; the people themselves, in any nation, are not bent upon injuring other people; indeed, the spread of socialism through Europe has developed a bond of sympathy and union between the people of the various nations in opposition to the spirit of war, so that it has been a question whether the socialist movement, should it continue to augment, would not be able soon to prevent war through the simple refusal of the common people—its adherents—to fight at the dictation of their rulers. Nor can it be said that in most of the countries of Europe, the people would not be just as well off under another government than the one which now holds their allegiance. There is no reason to doubt that should England conquer those countries and set up her own government in the place of those now existing, the people would be better off than they were before; for Anglo-Saxon civilization is the best that the world affords. But should England attempt it, the very people who would be benefitted by the establishment of her rule would no doubt resist her to the last; and they would do this to maintain the government. Such is the power that has been acquired over men's minds by the idea that the preservation of the government, whether good or bad, is paramount to everything else.

BUT it is not true that the government is the most sacred thing on earth. It is not true that any government is paramount to the people under it. Government is but the creature, and the people constitute its creator. Government, like anything else, is of value only as it fulfills the purpose for which it was instituted. In whatever degree it becomes perverted, its value is lessened. And it is a fact that in almost every country on the earth, from the time of Nimrod down to the present, human government has perverted the object of its institution on the earth. It remained for the founders of this Republic, after the lapse of centuries of such perversion, to announce to the world once more the true principles of government, and to set up a government upon those principles. The Declaration of Independence, declaring that all men are created equal, that they are endowed with the unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that the purpose of governments is to preserve these rights, set forth the principles of government; and the American Constitution came into being as the foundation of a government established upon them.

* * *

GOVERNMENTS are to be preserved not in their own interests, but in the interests of the people. When it becomes true that the preservation of a government is not in the interests of the people, the sooner it goes out of existence, the better.

* * *

As regards the manner in which Spanish government in Cuba served the interests of the people, it will be of interest to refer again to the speech of Senator Gallinger. Upon that point he said: "Let us look at the matter of taxation. In addition to all direct and indirect taxes on real estate, there is a tax on every door, every window, and every chimney in every house. There is a tax on every letter in every business sign. There is a tax on every name on every hotel register. Licenses are required to build houses and to paint houses. There is a tax on food animals as a whole and also a special tax on the horns, the hoof, and the hides. In addition to all this, the interest on the debt is a tremendous burden, the salary of Spanish officials is beyond all reason, and the amount of money wrung from the Cubans to keep the Madrid Government from complete insolvency is simply enormous. What would we think of such a government as that? No people on the face of the earth have been so oppressed, the treasury of Spain being literally supplied from the revenue extorted from Cuba and the Philippine Islands."

* * *

THIS is only one point in which the Spanish government fails to fulfill the purpose of government, in proving an injury rather than a benefit to the people. Another and even greater one consists in its union with the church. For of all things that sap the vitality of nations and bring demoralization and degeneracy upon the people, there is nothing that takes precedence of a union of church and state.

Diamond Jubilee Memorial to Queen Victoria.

"Present Truth," London, Eng.

THE following petition signed by 336,250 women of the United Kingdom, has been laid before Her Majesty by the Secretary of State. None but women were allowed to sign it, and all signatures were of those over sixteen years of age. The petition, it will be seen, asks for nothing that can in any way affect the petitioners personally, but is concerned only with the welfare of others. There is no desire to curtail religious liberty, but there is a feeling that there should not be a class privileged under the name of liberty to exercise despotism. It is no wonder, however, if the followers of him who exalts himself above the law of God, should treat with contempt all human law:—

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY—

"We, your Majesty's loyal and loving subjects, while thankfully acknowledging the goodness of Almighty God in preserving your valuable life, and extending your beneficent reign to a period beyond that enjoyed by any of your royal predecessors; and while further acknowledging the innumerable blessings which have been bestowed upon your subjects throughout your vast dominions, and the many humane laws which have been sanctioned by Your Majesty for the promotion of their well being, happiness and freedom; desire earnestly to plead on behalf of a large number of women within these realms, who do not share in such freedom, benefits and blessings, as the rest of Your Majesty's subjects are favored to enjoy.

"Your Majesty's memorialists venture to point out the following facts:—

- "(a) That since the early part of the present century 865 convents have been established in Great Britain and Ireland, about 800 having been instituted during Your Majesty's reign.
- "(b) That no public record of the number of inmates of these institutions is known to exist; but it is estimated that the women in these convents must at the present time be not less than 20,000.
- "(c) That many young persons of tender age are induced in a moment of enthusiasm, and by means of false and highly-colored representations of the character of a nun's life—together with the promise of celestial rewards at its close—to enter convents, and find, when awakened to the dread realities around them, that they are involved in hopeless imprisonment.

- “(d) That with regard to the structural arrangements of conventual buildings, many of them are surrounded by high walls, that both the entrance and the inner doors are trebly secured, and that underground cells are known to exist; showing that all possible means are used for giving effect to the canon law of the church of Rome, which inexorably insists that nuns be made veritable prisoners for life. This law enacts, ‘That nunneries be carefully closed and egress forbidden to the nuns under any pretext whatever without episcopal license,’ i. e., of those who are deeply interested in keeping them where they are. Further on it is stated that ‘if a nun of her own accord throws off her habit [desirous of returning to her natural life] no allegation should be heard, but being compelled to return to the Convent, they must be punished as apostates.’ This law is supreme in every enclosed convent in Your Majesty’s dominions.
- “(e) That the knotted cord disciplines are used more or less in all Convents, and the more austere orders use the steel-spiked wire whips, called iron disciplines, and other terrible instruments of torture.
- “(f) That nuns, being under vows, are not free agents. The will of the Superior is in all Convents absolute, and all correspondence to and from the Convent is read by her or by one whom she may delegate; and all communications not approved by the Superior are withheld, mutilated or destroyed, as she may determine. Generally an iron grating, built in the wall, separates the nun from her visitor, whilst close by stands another nun, to hear every word, and spy upon every action passing between them. Thus, free intercourse is rendered impossible, and no nun has the opportunity of making known to her friends without, any wrong from which she may be suffering.
- “(g) That nuns have been transported from the British Isles against their will; your Majesty’s memorialists therefore plead that the deportation of nuns from English Convents to affiliated institutions on the Continent should be made impossible without due registration and license from the civil authorities.
- “(h) That private burial grounds being attached to Convents, in which interments have been seen to take place at night, and having regard to the fact that there is no specific registration existing of the names and numbers of the inmates, the Convent authorities have great facilities for avoiding the holding of coroners’ inquests, and for evading the provisions of the burial laws.
- “(i) That the inspection of prisons, lunatic asylums, factories, workshops, etc., has brought comfort and liberty to many thousands of Your Majesty’s subjects; while Convents in Great Britain, unlike those even in Roman Catholic countries, are exempt from any kind of state supervision.
- “(j) That your memorialists are mindful of the benefits conferred under British rule, upon your Majesty’s Indian subjects by the abolition of a long established religious rite, called Suttee, whereby Hindoo widows, under the delusion that they would thereby attain eternal beatitude, immolated themselves upon the funeral pile of their deceased husbands, causing hundreds of lives to be sacrificed annually, which abolition resulted in giving general satisfaction to Your Majesty’s subjects. They are therefore absolutely convinced of the necessity for equally stringent laws being passed to prevent practices not less unnatural and cruel and withal of life-long duration inseparable from Convent life.

“Your Majesty’s memorialists therefore humbly pray that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased, in the circumstances above stated, to cause a searching inquiry to be made into the system and practices of all conventual establishments within your realm, and to institute such public control over them, as shall preclude the possibility of any of your subjects immured therein, being deprived of the benefit and protection of Your Majesty’s laws.

Repudiating the Act Against Sectarian Appropriations.

EDITOR AMERICAN SENTINEL:

THE case of Ellis H. Roberts, Treasurer of the United States, appellant, vs. Joseph Bradfield, was argued in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, on the 8th inst. The remarkable feature of the argument was contained in a printed pamphlet bound with the brief of the appellant, and signed by Henry E. Davis, attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, and D. W. Baker, his assistant, both of whom were designated by the attorney-general to act as counsel for treasurer Roberts. Referring to the act of Congress of March 3, 1897, in so far as it declares against sectarian appropriations, they say:—

“The bare declaration in regard to the policy of the government is not in itself an enactment, and really means nothing. It was put in the act to appease certain outgoing members of Congress, who for years had clamored against so-called sectarian institutions and sectarian appropriations; and possibly the framers of the act knew themselves that it meant nothing; while those who were pleased with the declaration were not wise enough to know its effect.”

What De Lome said about President McKinley was less reprehensible than the foregoing assertion; because this assertion is made by the duly-accredited attorneys of the Executive Department, imputing equivocation, mental reservation, and moral torpitude to the latter. I called on Treasurer Roberts this morning and asked him to repudiate the words and the sentiment they convey; but after reading the language in the brief, he declined to repudiate it.”

JOSEPH BRADFIELD.

Washington, D. C., March 10.

“HOWEVER natural veneration for ancient laws, customs, or usages may be, no man of principle can uphold them when he knows them to be wrong in themselves.”

The Difference.

A LITTLE boy, who in the course of some conversation of his elders, heard a good deal of talk about the progress of civilization, approached his grandfather, who was taking no part in the talk.

"Grandpa," said the child, "what is the difference between civilization and barbarism?"

"Barbarism, my boy," answered the old man, "is killing your enemy with a hatchet at a distance of a step, and civilization is killing him with a bombshell twelve miles away!"—Youth's Companion.

Studies in French History.—15.

"WHAT puzzles me is," interrupted Joe Palmeter, "why the pope had any more right to interfere with the government of kingdoms than anybody else. I thought he was the head of the church."

"So he was," said Professor Carman. "But this did not satisfy him. So he wished to unite church and state, and be the supreme head of both. He evidently thought that all the kingdoms of the earth were his, to keep or to give away, just as best suited him. Accordingly, he next offered the throne of Aragon to Philip III."

"Was he the same as Philip the Bold?" asked Florence Ray, writing busily in her note book.

"Yes; Philip III. was called the Bold, and reigned during the years 1270-1285. He was not as tender of conscience as his kind-hearted father, Saint Louis, and so he raised an army and went down into Spain, in conformity to his ambitious vanity, where he fell a miserable victim to the dreadful climate and died. His son, named after him, Philip the Fourth, and known as the Fair, took the reins of government at the age of only seventeen."

"I wonder why he was called the Fair," said Milly Brown. "Was he a handsome man, professor?"

"Yes, he had a handsome face, indeed, but that was all one could say in his favor. He was a cold-hearted, ambitious man, and perfectly unscrupulous in his manner of getting money. He did the dreadful thing which people call debasing the coin,—that is, he caused inferior metal to be put into the gold and silver,—and then when anybody was owing him, he obliged them to pay him pure coin. The people were in this manner cruelly oppressed. The workings of the Feudal system yet gave the poor people no end of trouble. The rich nobles had the poorer people who were under them almost entirely in their power, and it was with an iron hand that they held them, and ground them down. The poor wretches were as much real bondsmen as were ever the unfortunate and downtrodden slaves of our own country, and as much needed a noble Lincoln, with his 'Proclamation of Emancipation.' Sometimes the nobles would compel their vassals, after working hard all day, to sit up all the long night, and strike the surface of the pond near their fine castles with whips to quiet the croaking of the frogs, so that the slumbers of the fine lords and ladies should not be disturbed."

"I wonder if they laid awake all night to see if the frog stillers did their duty," laughed Milly Brown.

"I would never have done it!" exclaimed Rob Billings, with emphasis."

"Well, then, you would likely have received a severe punishment. It would hardly have paid you alone to resist. But the reckoning time was coming when the cruel aristocracy would reap what they had sown."

"Philip IV. was an extravagant man, and was very expert in extracting money from the Parliament of France—which was much the same as our Supreme Court—and was considered by Philip as only a means by which he could wring money from his wretched people. He made all sorts of cruel laws to regulate even the very diet of his subjects, and the kind of clothes they should wear. He forbade their eating more than one dish of meat at their dinner, and so, as the French people were much the same as now, quite fond of good things to eat, they tried to avoid the letter of the intolerant law by heaping several kinds of meat on one dish."

"I should think that somebody would have acted the spy, and told Philip," said Florence Ray.

"Yes, he did soon find it out, and he put a stop to it at once. Even the trimming on the ladies' dresses was regulated by the word and will of the tyrant."

"Perhaps that would be a good plan nowadays," suggested Julia March.

"No, indeed! it is not the business of any king, president, or congress to interfere with anybody's personal conduct in such matters," said Joe Palmeter, stoutly. "Do you agree with me, professor?"

"I certainly do, Joseph," said the teacher, "though I have no doubt there is many a dollar unwisely spent for such purposes."

"The common people were forbidden to own a carriage, or to wear gold or jewels. You see they were not allowed to spend their money as they liked, after they had earned it. But the king's word was law, and no one said anything—aloud."

"In the reign of Philip, there was a very peculiar fashion in shoes, which raged quite extensively. The king was not satisfied without having his say about this queer fashion also, and so the length of a man's title could be determined by the length of his shoes. A plain, ordinary man must not wear his shoes more than twelve inches long; a knight might have them eighteen inches, while a baron was allowed to indulge his love of shoe-leather to still greater extent—being allowed twenty-four inches."

"What did the poor fellows who were unfortunate enough to be princes do with their feet, I wonder?" laughed Will Barnaby.

"Bless you, Will; they used to hobble around in shoes two and a half feet long; while the king himself would probably have had his four or five feet in length, if he could possibly have moved his feet."

"Well, that does surprise me!" said Edna Philips.

"It is indeed surprising; but nowadays people are just about as willing to follow the dictates of fashion as they were then," said Professor Carman, as he rang the bell for dismissal.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

The Beast.

"In our last talk we explained the time, times, and dividing of time," began Mrs. Ross, "and I think it will be interesting to notice when and how this same period is again mentioned. You may read Rev. 13:5."

Charlie read: "'And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies: and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months.'"

"Of what prophecy does this remind you, Charlie?"

"Of the prophecy in Dan. 7:24 and 25, about the papal horn. Why, mama, it is almost the same. Only there's nothing in it about wearing out the saints."

"Read the 7th verse."

"'And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them.'"

"This must refer to the same power. What I wished to explain first is the 42 months. You remember that the time, times, and dividing of or half a time, was 1260 years. The Jews reckoned 30 days to a month. How many days would 42 months make?"

Charlie figured a moment and said, "1260 days."

"Then as each day in prophecy is a year, you have 1260 years for the continuance of this power."

"What power was it?"

"That is the answer to one problem for to-day. You may read the first verse."

"'And I stood on the sand of the sea and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy.'"

"Now, Charlie, we have a few review questions. What does water represent in prophecy?"

"Peoples, nations, and tongues." (Proof, Rev. 17: 15.)

"What does a beast represent?"

"A kingdom or government, an earthly power." (Dan. 7:23.)

"What do the horns on this beast stand for?"

"For the ten kingdoms of Rome, perhaps."

"Well, as we do not deal in 'perhapses,' you may read concerning them in the 17th chapter, 12th verse."

"'And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings which have received no kingdom as yet.'"

"When was John writing this prophecy?"

"In A. D. 96."

"In his day these kings had not yet risen. But what about the heads? Read in the Revised Version Rev. 17: 10."

Charlie read: "And these are seven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is yet to come; and when he cometh he must continue a short space. And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven."

"Well, mama, this is the greatest puzzle we have studied. What do you think these heads represented?"

"The forms or heads of governments."

"How many forms of government was Rome ruled under up to the time of John's writing?"

"Five, according to prophecy."

"Can you name them?"

"I'll try. Let me see,—kings, consuls, decemvirs, triumvirates, dictators."

"John says, 'five are fallen.' These had passed away. 'One is.' What form was Rome under in John's day?"

"Emperors."

"Then there was one to come who was to continue a short space. This one was called the ex-arch of Ravenna; but it is never really reckoned among the Roman heads. You see the prophet is more exact than the historian. Now we come to the seventh head. What was that?"

"The papacy."

"Very well; we have now disposed of the heads, and will turn to the horns. When was Rome divided into ten kingdoms?"

"Between the years 356 and 483 A. D."

"But mama, this whole beast—horns, heads and all—seems to be swallowed up entirely by the seventh head; for surely it was the papacy that warred on the saints, spoke great things, and continued in power 1260 years."

"You are right, Charlie. This beast represents papal Rome. The dragon of the 12th chapter was a beast with seven heads and ten horns, and represented the pagan phase of Rome: and as we look deeply into the spirit of both, we see behind them the old serpent which deceiveth the whole world. To whom did the dragon give his seat and great authority? Read Rev. 13:2."

"'And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority.'"

"You remember that it was through Justinian, a pagan emperor, that the bishop of the church of Rome received his seat in the city of Rome, and his authority."

"Yes; that is clear. But I have been struck with this beast as with something familiar. I notice that he has all the characteristics of the four beasts of Daniel—a mouth like a lion, feet like a bear, body like a leopard, and the 'dreadful and terrible' beast's power. Beside all these features, which point back to Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and pagan Rome, he has a mouth speaking great things, wears out the saints, and continues in power as long as the horn of Daniel was to continue. What a wonderful prophecy!"

"It is, indeed; and as these characteristics of the old kingdoms are united in this beast, we need not be surprised at the manifestation of the old persecuting spirit.

"What power did the prophet see this beast exercising? Read the last of the 3rd verse."

"All the world wondered after the beast," read Charlie.

"Now read the last of the 7th."

"And power was given him over all kindreds, and nations, and tongues."

"How many shall worship him?"

"And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

"This used to puzzle me very much, and I have often prayed to be saved from worshiping the beast. Now I know that it means more than having reverence for the papacy. To worship the beast is simply to worship and serve self. The beast is only the full outcome of the self principle. So still I pray with growing understanding to be saved from dependence upon men, to be saved from leaning to my own understanding, or from resting upon the opinions and traditions of humanity. Jeremiah says, 'Cursed is the man who trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm.'

"Now read in the 3rd verse what was to happen to the head of this beast."

"And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death: and his deadly wound was healed."

"With this you may also read the 10th verse."

"He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity."

"When was the papal head wounded, sent into captivity and into death?"

"In 1798, when the pope was taken to France, and died in exile."

"His deadly wound was healed," it says; and yet the pope, who is the head of this power, is still called the 'prisoner of the Vatican.'"

"Do you think, mama, the papacy will ever again have power to persecute the people of God?"

"We'll talk about that another time, Charlie. There is one more verse I wish to explain to-day. It is the 18th."

Charlie read: "'Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six.'

"Now we are to reckon the number of a man, whose number is the number of the beast. Two men have been pointed out in the Scriptures. One is the 'Son of man,' the other the 'son of perdition,' or the 'man of sin.'

"One day a traveler was visiting the city of Rome, and down the street came a papal procession with flaunting banners. Amid the images of saints and apostles, on a high throne sat the pope, wearing his blazing crown. In jewelled letters upon it the traveler saw the words, 'Vicarius Filii Dei,' and the words came to his mind 'the number of the beast.' Hastening home he counted the numerals of this title; thus: v, 5; i, 1; c, 100; i, 1; v, 5; i, 1; l, 50; i, 1; i, 1; d, 500; i, 1; and found that the sum of the numerals in the title is 666, the 'number of the beast.'"

"Well, mama, that seems queer no matter what it may mean; but I shall never see the picture of the pope's hat again without thinking, 666."

NEW YORK, MARCH 31, 1898.

ARMENIA—India—Cuba; not very lustrous gems are these in the crown of the nineteenth century.

THE terrible and utter destruction which in a moment overtook the great warship "Maine" in Havana harbor, affords the first conspicuous example of the results which will follow the use of modern high explosives and "improved" implements of warfare.

WHILE the people of this country are clamoring for war with Spain on account of her atrocities in Cuba, let them not forget that Spain is a "Christian nation." And who knows but that a union of religion with the state here, might do as much for this country as it has done for Spain!

A CRUSADE for Sunday enforcement was recently begun in the city of Plainfield, N. J. The first Sunday "raid" by the police resulted in eleven arrests. Three of these pleaded guilty and were fined $5 each, the alternative of paying being twenty days in jail. The others were held for trial. The result was, however, when the matter was tested in court, that the jury disagreed; and the crusade seems likely not to prove the success that was anticipated.

BY the signature of the President, recently affixed to the measure giving compensation for war damages to the Methodist Book Concern of Nashville, Tenn., that institution has received $288,000 which does not belong to it. It is strange that an institution which professes to be established in the interests of Christianity and to rest upon Christian principles, is willing to go on record as dishonest before the world. The moral influence of such action must certainly be a minus quantity. It is said, by the way, that $288,000 is more than the entire plant was worth, which was not destroyed, but only damaged, by its occupation by the Federal troops.

A RESOLUTION against Sunday golf playing was recently voted down in the town of Barnstable, Mass. This led to an agitation of the question of Sunday enforcement, conducted through the local paper, and which, as usual, did not tend to strengthen the claims of Sunday as the proper day for rest and worship.

ON Sunday, January 9, says the Indian Witness, of Calcutta, there was a collection taken in all the Roman Catholic churches and chapels of that city "for the extermination of slavery in America,"—this being one of two collections in the year prescribed by the pope. There being no slavery in America save in the Catholic portion of it, we are left to wonder at the consistency of taking up a collection in one part of the papal household for the abolition of slavery in another.

THE town of Greenport, L. I., is agitated over the question of mail delivery on Sundays. Two prominent church workers of the place, it is said, want the post office closed on the ground that some persons go there for mail on Sundays when they ought to go to church. Of course(?) these individuals will go to church as soon as they find that they cannot go to the post-office on Sundays, and especially when they learn that it was the church that closed the post-office against them.

ONE can hardly keep track of all the organizations that are springing up these days upon the idea of the enforced application of the divine law to political and social life. The latest that we have noticed is the "Christian Social Union," the objects of which are: "1. To claim for the Christian law the ultimate authority to rule social practice. 2. To study in common how to apply the moral truths and principles of Christianity to social and economic difficulties of the present time," etc. How difficult it seems to be for some people to realize that God himself knew of but one way in which the Christian law could be made applicable in a beneficial way to human affairs; and that required of him an infinite sacrifice; that God made this sacrifice in the death of his only Son on the cross; and that this one way provided by him is the gospel of Jesus Christ! There is no salvation for anything in this world but by the gospel.

THE prospect of war between this country and Spain is increased by the "Monroe doctrine," which would oblige the United States to protect Cuba against Spain, in case the independence of Cuba should be recognized by the American Government.

THAT was not a very conspicuous success which was scored by the W. C. T. U. on the occasion of the launching of the battleship "Kentucky." The W. C. T. U. of the State had interposed a strenuous objection to the custom of breaking a bottle of champagne over the bow of the vessel at the launching, and had prevailed upon the governor's daughter, who was chosen to perform the ceremony of "christening," to substitute a bottle of water for the customary bottle of liquor. But no sooner had the bottle of water been broken over the ship's bow, than bow and sides were bombarded with innumerable flasks filled with the "genuine article," from the hands of the hundreds of assembled Kentuckians, who were bent on being loyal to the traditions of their State. So that never before was a ship's bow so drenched with intoxicating liquor on the occasion of a "christening." After all, however, we do not think the W. C. T. U. ought to feel very bad about it. It is a much better way of using up whiskey than to drink it, and as everybody knows the close connection there is between whiskey and fighting, it really seems that no person ought to object to such use of it on the ground of propriety. The "Kentucky" ought now to become the best fighter in the navy.

ENFORCED idleness is not rest. It is unrest.

THE pedigree of the "civil Sabbath" is wholly religious.

LAW furnishes nobody with the power to obey its requirements.

"RELIGION is the best armor in the world, but the worst cloak."

"MEN will wrangle for religion, write for it, fight for it, die for it,—anything but live for it."

A FORCED uniformity never does anything to promote unity. The one is directly contrary in spirit to the other.

UNION of the state with religion, means a state conscience in religion, by which the individual conscience is to be superseded.

"To render good for evil, is God-like; to render good for good, is man-like; to render evil for evil, is beast-like; to render evil for good, is devil-like."

RELIGION cannot be made a department of civil government without losing all its goodness; and politics cannot be made a department of religion without destroying civil government.

EXPERIENCE with a strict Sunday law in the large cities proves conclusively that in such places at least the measure does not lessen crime or promote the safety of life or property.

THE man who believes he ought not to keep Sunday, and has the courage of his convictions in the face of all opposition, is of more value to his community and to the state than the one who believes likewise, but has not the courage to do what he thinks is right.

Civil Government and the Gospel.

"THE powers that be are ordained of God." Rom. 13:1. "The powers that be" represent civil government. In a fallen world, civil government—a government of force—is a necessity.

But civil government is not the only or the most important thing ordained of God for this world. Before civil government arose, it was ordained that fallen man should be restored to his lost estate by a plan of redemption—the gospel.

This was because "God is love," and the salvation of man—the object of that love—was in the sight of God the thing of primary importance.

There are then, in the world, two governments, both ordained of God; namely, civil government—a government of force—and a government of love, which is operative upon the earth through the gospel.

The government of love is God's government; for "God is love." This was ordained of God from the beginning, and must always continue, so long as the character of God remains what it is. Civil government, being not of love but of force, was not thus ordained, but became a necessity on account of sin.

These two governments being in the world, both ordained of God, it is evident that in the purpose of God they are to operate in harmony with each other.

The gospel—the government of love—demands that pardon be accorded the penitent transgressor. The government of force demands that the transgressor be punished, whether penitent or not. It is evident therefore that if these two governments are made to cover common ground, they will come into immediate conflict with each other.

This is why it is that civil government and religion must be kept separate. When civil government is carried into the sphere of religion, it begins at once to antagonize the work of the gospel.

God wants every person on the earth to form an upright character. And as character stands for free personal choice, it is necessary that man should not be coerced into the path of uprightness, but should be left free to choose between right principles and those of a contrary nature.

It is not the business of civil government, therefore, to coerce men into doing right; to force them into the paths of morality. In so doing it would only antagonize the gospel. Its sphere is limited to that of natural rights. To protect these is the only prerogative of force.

Patriotism "Redefined."

A CHICAGO pastor, Rev. Frank Crane, in a recent sermon suggested that there was need in this country that "patriotism" be redefined. "It has been," he said, "a willingness to go out with a brass band and kill somebody for our country's sake; let it be also a willingness to stay at home and save somebody for our country's sake."

Referring to these tasks at home through which one may manifest a true patriotism, he said:—

"While glorious statesmen were champing the bit to get into the fore of battle, a little company of men and women were opening a social settlement over in the Gad's Hill district of Chicago. What about them? They wave no flags, shoot no bullets. They are patriots, however—real, not fustian.

"Open saloons and houses of shame carry on their nefarious trade of sapping the life and wealth from the common people? Why don't some of these fire-breathing patriots run a tilt at these?

"Giant trusts are monopolizing the free treasures of nature, more and more getting the tainted fingers of wealth firmly gripped upon the helm of state. Why don't a few patriots rise up to 'zealously and unselfishly devote themselves to the service of their country' by giving their lives, talents, and fortunes to remedying this state of things?

"Here is an army of worse than Spaniards; they are not across the ocean, they are mixed among us.

"Why don't some of our warriors go out to fight them? Alas! the reason is too plain. We can overcome this army only as we overcome ourselves. They are to be subdued only by daily righteousness, liberality, purity, and self-denial by us. We cannot meet them with blare of trumpets and beating of tom-toms, but only by love and service.

"It is always easier to die for a noble purpose than to live for it. If our country calls us to go and fight a foreign foe there is no doubt that plenty will respond. But the deeper, silent cry of agony of our dear land is for men and women who will give life and money to insure clean politics and honest councils, legislatures, and senates; for men and women who will give up—not their blood—but their greed and base ambition and petty pride and dishonest practices, in order that wealth may not be able to destroy a virtuous people, and in order that the swarming criminal classes may be lifted by persistent, devoted effort into a true citizenship."

Christians and War.

Two bishops of the M. E. Church have given assurances that if war should come the Methodists will be "ready to answer the call as in days gone by."

How anybody can profess to be a Christian and profess to know the Scriptures, and yet talk war, is a mystery exceedingly difficult to explain.

The direct command of God, which all Christians who know the Bible profess profoundly to respect, is "Thou shalt not kill." Now how can any man sincerely respect that command and at the same time go to war. War means the killing of people. In war it is intended to kill people. In war every possible effort is made to kill people. Then, of all people, how much does a professed Christian who goes to war really believe in the command "Thou shalt not kill"?

Again: When John the Baptist came as the forerunner of Christ, preaching to people that they should believe on Christ when he should come, he was asked by those who were already soldiers, "What shall we do?" And the answer came direct, among other things, "Do violence to no man." Now how can any man go to war, and yet do violence to no man? War in itself is violence and only violence. War seeks only to do violence to men. Christians profess to be loyal to the principles of Christianity. One of these fundamental principles is "Do violence to no man." How then can any professed Christian be loyal to his profession and yet go to war, which does violence and only violence to men.

Again: When the perfection of Christianity was ushered into the world by the birth of Jesus, the word which accompanied it was "Peace on earth, good will to men." War is not good will to men. It does not intend good will to men. When these promised Methodists go to war, they do not go to preach peace on earth, nor good will to men. These bishops in promising Methodists for war are not preaching unalloyed peace: true they use the word "peace," yet it is always peace with a "but." And peace with a "but," is about the same as war with a "but."

Again: One of the Lord's disciples in a perfect crisis, drew a sword to make war. Jesus said to him, "Put up thy sword." How then can any man really respect the word of Christ and yet take the sword and go to war? How can any man really respect this word of Christ, and yet promise that his brethren shall take the sword and make war?

Again: When two of the disciples of Jesus thought that some people ought to be wiped off the earth, he said to them, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; for the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them." War means the destruction of men's lives. War cannot be made without destroying men's lives. War is intended to destroy men's lives. But this is not Christianity. Christianity is not to destroy men's lives; but to save them. How then can any man have respect to Christianity or loyalty to its principles, and yet make war?

We are not here discussing any question as to whether there ought to be war between the United States and Spain. That is a question to be decided altogether by those who bear the sword and in whose province all such things lie. We are simply calling attention to the words of Christ and the principles of Christianity, and the contrast between these and the words and actions of professed Christians who talk war and promise to engage in it.

Christianity is one thing; war is another and far different thing. Christians are one sort of people: warriors are another and far different sort of people. A. T. J.

Turn It About.

In the Union Signal appears a call for the week following Easter, to be observed as a week of prayer "in behalf of the observance of the Lord's day."

Topics for consideration are given, the first one being as follows:—

"That good citizens may be led to give the ordinance of the Sabbath a new hearing, that its vital place in Christian civilization may be generally recognized, that Sunday protective laws may be provided for our national capitol, in the passage by Congress of the Sunday Rest Bill, that those states and territories which have no Sunday laws may secure them, and that existing laws may be better enforced."

Then next to the last topic suggested is this:—

"That the Christian Church may fully awake to the importance of the issue and Christian people set an example of consistent Sabbath-keeping in their homes and in public life."

Now Sabbath-keeping is a religious act—a matter of conscience between each man and God. There is nothing compulsory in it. Yet from the above it will be seen that the first thought is for an enforced (which means an unwilling) observance of the day, and after this comes an appeal to the church to do its duty. Query: If as much effort were put forth to secure the results hoped for in the latter topic as have been expended to accomplish the ends desired in the first—would these laws asked for be necessary?

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

FOLLOWING this awakening in my own personal experience came a definite call to the work. I must ask to be pardoned for personal experiences, because, as I have before intimated, I can better serve the purpose of these articles by telling just what I know myself to be true. The experience of one harmonized so nearly with many another that this which I know best will serve as an illustration of the point of almost universal application which I wish to make.

I was engaged in literary work which kept me very closely confined to my study, but the interest which had been aroused by the crusade led me to read the accounts of its onward march each morning as they were published in the daily press. As weeks passed there gradually came to my mind a conviction that its progress meant something to me, to my own family of little children, and to the city in which I lived. But situated as I was, and with a constitutional shrinking from anything public, I made strenuous efforts to lay my burden off onto some one else. There were several ladies in my own church so situated in family, social, and financial conditions as to seem to me the natural leaders in such a movement. I tried by personal appeals to arouse in them this same interest with which I had been filled, but I invariably received the reply, "I am ready to help; I will do whatever the rest think best, but I am not ready to lead." I sent for my pastor and talked the matter over with him, and his reply was almost the same. "This is not a matter with which ministers have anything to do," he said "except to follow in the lead of those whom God has called to this work. This is a call to woman; I am ready to help, but I would not dare to think of leading."

At last, one day, one of these sisters of the same church to which I belonged came to see me. She was much older than I, and a woman of very strong Christian character and rich experience in the things of the Spirit of God. She said, "I have come to tell you something which has been impressed upon me. God never lays a burden upon one individual for somebody else. He never shows one person something which somebody else ought to do. He has not laid upon me any burden to lead in this work. I have no burden to get anybody to do anything. I am ready to help when there is an opportunity, but you have evidently been called to a special mission. I would advise you to stop trying to get somebody else to answer for you. Listen for yourself and ask God what this means."

I said, "Don't talk that way, I will tell you just how it is with me. I am very much in the same position as the little Hollander, who once found a tiny stream of water flowing through the dyke. He knew what it meant, as any intelligent Holland boy would have known. It meant that the ocean was coming. He felt the peril to the homes on the low lands, and instinctively thrust his finger into the little hole; it stopped the flow, but it also made a place for a larger stream, and when he understood what he had done he dared not remove his finger, for then it would not take long for the floods to break in upon all Holland; so he stood crying with weariness and fear until somebody found him. I do not dare move or speak, for the moment I do the ocean is upon me. I feel its pressure, and I am helpless before it." She replied, "Then, my dear child, take my advice; take this matter earnestly to the Lord, and submit yourself to him. The saloon is alive in this city: something must be done, and we must have a leader. If you are not the leader, God will make it plain; but if you are, do not dare refuse." She went away leaving me trembling and aghast before that which had been a growing conviction in my own soul for many weeks; that I had a call from God to something, but I knew not what.

That night, when my children were in bed, I went to my study, but not to write as I usually did until nine o'clock; only to pace my floor and to argue the question, What could I do? I was alone in the world with my little children, with no income except what I was picking up at the point of my pen; with no influence; with nothing but God. I spent that night walking, or lying upon the floor, or kneeling beside my chair, in earnest appeal to God that he should relieve me of this burden. But the more I prayed, the heavier it became, until at last it was a question of obedience or not. Will you obey or not? And when it was once uttered in this language in my soul, I had only one answer:—I must obey when God speaks so that I understand, whatever should be the consequences. I was lying upon the floor with my face upon my folded arms, and I said to Him, Show me what to do and I will do it. And for answer he gave me a task so simple that I laughed, and said to myself, How foolish I have been to make such a time over such a simple thing; done in a minute and ended. I will do this and then go back to my writing without anything to trouble me. I was only to send notices to all the church prayer meetings for the following Wednesday night, asking the women of the city to come together to consider what should be our relations to the saloon. I would write the notices and send them down to my grocer in the morning.

He was a leading member of the official board of the church to which I belonged; I would ask him for the parlors of the church in which to hold this meeting on the next Friday afternoon, that was all. I arose from the floor and wrote the notices; a brief call which I signed with my own name. I enclosed a note to him stating that if he was not willing that we should have the parlors I would like to see him, but if we could have the parlors, would he kindly send his delivery boy with the notices to the pastors of the various churches. I was immensely relieved as soon as this was done; in fact, so light-hearted that I had no sense of weariness after my night's vigil.

Galileo.

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

In midst of darkness, when men slept as dead,
An angel found one wakeful in the night,
And bade him forth. They passed with quiet tread
Up through the paths of planetary light,
And saw the worlds spin on as jewels of gold
Amid their silver moons in God-marked grooves.
The angel bade the waker earth behold,
And said, "She hath her orbit, aye, she moves."
This whisper of the angel thrilled his soul.
His eye grew keen with luster of delight.
Rolled back the clouds that shut him from the goal
Of the eternal God, whose throne grew bright.
Linked through creation to the God who made,
He thought the thoughts of Him who only loves,
And in men's ears again all undismayed,
He cried the angel's message, "Aye, she moves."
Then men roused from their sleep, then demons stirred,
Then hell drew up its hosts in war array,
Then smoke grew dense that morn might be deferred,
And night still hold o'er earth its fearful sway,
Then pope, priests, cardinals in splendor shone,
And banners flamed, and trumpets sounded out,
And stood the waker in the midst alone,
Derided by hell's hatred and men's doubt.
"Recant! Take back the word you've spoken out.
"How dare you so the learned and great defy?
"Your words the firm foundation stone shall rout,
"Unsettle thrones and cause the church to die."
"Minion of hell, inspired by hosts of night,
"This tumult all your heresy disproves.
"Shall we deny our feeling and our sight,
"To listen to your message that she moves?
"Death stares you in the face for lie like this.
"The church infallible gives her decree.
"So if a fate ignoble you would miss
"Recant, and it shall still go well with thee."
A moment light flashed o'er that eager face,
Then paled, the spirit in him seemed to pant.
Truth faltered on his lips, he lost his grace,
Faith wavered as he murmured, "I recant."
Yet scarce had the ignoble word been said,
Than strong conviction forced it from his soul.
A sudden majesty was in his tread,
As up he gazed to heaven's lighted scroll.
And suddenly tradition swept aside,
The fear of men his soul, made free, disproves,
And in the face of death, and hell, and pride,
He whispered, "Aye, and still she moves, she moves."
What good did pope and cardinals that day?
What good did priests and people who withstood?
Their work was only stubble, aye, and hay.
They built on the foundation only wood.
Build from the soul if ye would build for aye.
Build on the truth. Error itself disproves,
Or ye shall face a great vindictive day.
"The heretic was right, she moves, she moves."

If you are not good enough, it is because you do not want to be good bad enough.

Sunday Enforcement in Plainfield, N. J.

As mentioned in our last issue, a crusade has been started in the city of Plainfield, N. J., for a compulsory observance of Sunday. The movement was inaugurated by the ministerial association of that place. They have secured the active coöperation of the mayor and city council, and it is announced that the crusade will be pushed with vigor.

The first Sunday "raid" under the crusade resulted in eleven arrests. Three of the arrested parties pleaded guilty, and were fined $5 each. The remainder were put under bonds for trial.

When the legality of the proceeding was tested in court, the result was a disagreement of the jury. The case was that of an Italian fruit seller, José Carbone, who did not belong to any religious denomination, but claimed to be an observer of the seventh day of the week. Plainfield being the home of a considerable number of Seventh-day Baptists, whose religious principles are well known, there is much interest to see what result the crusade will have upon observers of the seventh day.

The jury having disagreed, a re-trial was ordered, with the result that Mr. Carbone was convicted and fined $25. His counsel announced that the case would be carried to a higher court.

The mayor and city officials seem disposed to recognize the right of the seventh-day observers to transact business on the first day of the week, under certain restrictions. Among the Seventh-day Baptists of the place are several storekeepers, and these have been informed that they may do business on Sunday provided they do so behind closed doors and drawn curtains, so that their places of business will have the appearance of being closed. The Sunday law of the State, like that of most of the states, contains an exemption for observers of the seventh day, provided their Sunday work be done in such a way as not to "disturb" observers of the day. This customary phrase in the Sunday laws about "the disturbance of others" has been one of no definite significance; but now the authorities of the city of Plainfield have given it a definite construction, so that it is now known that doing business on Sunday so as not to "disturb" others, means doing it in such a way that nobody will know that it is being done. This, at least, is what it means in the city of Plainfield, N. J.

So extremely sensitive are those who believe in the sacredness of Sunday, that the mere knowledge that other people are conducting themselves in a manner inconsistent with that belief, without observing profound secrecy about it, causes them a "disturbance" which they are not able to bear!

While these storekeepers have been ordered thus to conceal the interior of their places of business on Sundays from public view, the saloonists, on the other hand, under the same law, have strict orders to keep their places of business open to inspection from the outside. The former, however, have declined to accede to the order, and continue to do business on Sundays in the usual manner. As yet, they have only been threatened with arrest.

It is said that the ostensible purpose of the crusade, at its inception, was the Sunday closing of certain disreputable "cider joints" in the city; and that, under this impression, observers of the seventh day gave the movement their full support. If this be so, they have had an excellent opportunity to learn that no support of a Sunday closing movement, of whatever kind, can be proper. For while such movements may give their first attention to the closing of saloons, in the logical order of things they soon find victims among those of upright character and the most reputable employment. The saloonist appeals to logic, and logic—as regards Sunday closing—knows no distinction between the business of saloon-keeping and any other. If a place of traffic ought to be closed because it is bad, in character, it ought to be closed on all days, and on no one day more than on another. But if the plea is that it ought to be closed because the day is Sunday, then every other place of business ought to be closed likewise. This is logic, and there is no evading its requirements. No person can afford to be illogical.

But to what can these crusaders for Sunday enforcement point as having been gained in all the history of such attempts? They can point to nothing. It would seem that history, if not reason or revelation, ought to teach them the futility of such methods of reform.

Walk in the Light.

BY BAXTER L. HOWE.

To Christian Endeavorers of the Tenth Legion, and all others: Greeting,—Come and hear what the Lord hath said concerning the earth and man upon it.

The clear searching light of God's word (Heb. 4:12) has been shining in the darkness since redemption was made necessary by the fall of man, and it shines more and more unto the perfect day.

Christ said, "I am the light of the world." John 8:12. To us, as to every son and daughter of Adam, he hath said, "Yet a little while is the light with you" (2 Cor. 6:2); "WALK while ye have the light." John 12:35.

Walking in the light, we find the prayer of Christ effectual in our behalf, and the blessed Comforter sheds his bright rays upon our pathway. John 14:15-18. New life fills our soul as we sit under the breathings of our Master. John 20:22. All scripture is God-breathed (2 Tim. 3:16, R. V.), and every time we hear or read the sacred word, Christ is breathing upon us and saying, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." O may we be moved by the same power that operated holy men of old. 2 Peter 1:21.

If any would contend with the word of God let him remember that he is opposing the Holy Spirit. John 6:63.

In the beginning, the Spirit of God was brooding over the void, "formless mass" (Gen. 1:1, 2, R. V. margin); and as he breathed upon it, forth from apparent confusion came forms of life and beauty. Six days he spent in organizing the matter which he had spoken into existence, and each day was the result of his creative power as well as the things created in that day.

In the seventh he stopped, stayed in it all day, and rested; then blessed it and made it holy; and he did it all for man. Gen. 2:3; Mark 2:27. Thus, he created the days and told us to work six days, just as he had done, but in the seventh is the Sabbath of rest, holiness unto the Lord. Ex. 31:15.

So the Creator, our blessed Saviour, stands forever in the Sabbath, saying, Come unto me and I will give you rest. It is settled once and always just how the Lord wants us to use our time. Any other way of using time is robbing God and brings the curse upon the user.

Not only did the Lord create time but he created everything, and did it in such a way that it might be a pleasure to him forever. Rev. 4:11. Everything received form and life by the same blessed Spirit, breathed upon it (Ps. 33:6); so, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein" (Ps. 24:1); "The cattle upon a thousand hills" (Ps. 50:10-12); and the gold and silver is his. Haggai 2:8.

Abraham, the friend of God, had the correct idea of the Lord's ownership. When the wealth of Sodom was in his hand, though he did not claim so much as a thread of it as his own, he paid Melchizedek tithes of all. Gen. 14:16, 23, 20.

Christ is our high priest (Heb. 8:1, 2), after the order of Melchizedek (6:17-20), and he ever liveth to minister for us (7:23-25).

Levi received tithes when he ministered in the earthly sanctuary, but there "he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth." V. 8.

Of the tithe the Lord has said: "ALL the tithe of the land is holy." Lev. 27:30. If any one will use it for his own service, he must return it with a fifth part added thereto. V. 31. Nothing can be put in the place of it. If any man think to change it, both it and the change is holy. V. 32.

By the Creator himself was the seventh day made holy and if man should put all the other six in the place of it, it would not change the fact that the seventh day is God's holy day. So of our wealth; God has said the tithe is for the gospel.

"Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things live of the things of the temple? and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar?" "Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel." 1 Cor. 9:13, 14.

The gospel worker who has no inheritance (Num. 18:23, 24) is as Christ was in this world (Matt. 8:20), and is a true ambassador, as though God did beseech men by him (2 Cor. 5:18-20). He is to live of the Lord's portion.

O brother, let us be careful how we use the Lord's holy things.

Of old he said of the city of Jericho, "It shall be utterly destroyed (Josh. 6); but the silver and the gold, and the vessels of brass and of iron are holiness unto the Lord" (V. 19, margin). Keep yourselves from these things, was the word from Israel's King. But Achan took of the Lord's holy things and hid them among his own stuff. This man thought to save himself and family from possible want and enrich himself by robbing God; but he brought death and eternal ruin, not only upon himself, but his family and all that he had. Joshua 7:24, 25.

The Lord has said: "The seventh day is holy; it is mine;" "The tithe is holy; it is mine." How are we using God's holy things?

Are any of us robbing God? Are we under the curse? (Mal. 3:9) If we are, O let us come out immediately before the curse shall devour the earth and us too (Isa. 24:6), and show our faith in God by our works; and then, O then, we shall receive the latter rain,—a blessing poured out. V. 10.

Even though we are thieves and robbers, the Lord will pardon if we will come. Blessed be his holy name forever.

Sunday and Justification by Works.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

It has been shown that there are two Sabbaths that are seeking at this time for recognition. One comes to us with nothing but the authority of the Catholic Church; the other comes upon the authority of the Word of God. One having no "Thus saith the Lord" for it, vainly strives to be upheld by human enactments and would force itself upon the consciences of all, whether they believe in it or not; the other having only a "thus saith the Lord" for it, rests upon the eternal power of God, and is content to appeal through the Word of God to the consciences of men.

One in the prophecy of Rev. 13:11-17 is called the "mark of the beast" (papacy), the other is called the "Father's name" (Rev. 14:1) or seal of God (Rev. 7:2-4) or "sign" (Ex. 31:13, 17; Ezek. 20:12, 20). The first one, as has been abundantly shown, is Sunday, the first day of the week; the other with equal clearness has been shown to be the seventh day.

Failing to understand what it is for which these two days stand, although, perhaps, disposed to acknowledge the truth of that which has been said of them, many will rashly decide that it nevertheless makes no particular difference whether Sunday or Saturday is kept; but inasmuch as Sunday is more universally kept, they decide that it is preferable to keep that day.

To decide thus, independently of what the prophecy has told us, is bad enough surely; but when the Lord, in addition to the general teaching of his Word, has through the prophecy taken the pains to teach especially the people of this nation the source and merits of both days, it is infinitely worse.

Now whatever opinion one may hold concerning this point, it is positively certain that God sees a very great distinction between these two days. For just at this time when efforts are being made to enforce the keeping of Sunday by law, and therefore to the people of this present time, the Lord by an angel gives a solemn warning against the receiving of that institution. Thus it reads: "And the third angel followed them (see verses 6, 8) saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation, and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever, and they have no rest day nor night who worship the beast and his image and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." Rev. 14:9-11.

But no such warning does God give concerning the true Sabbath. On the contrary, a blessing is pronounced upon those who lay hold of the seventh day and keep it. Isa. 56:2. It could not be anything else than that, for that is why the Lord, after he had rested upon that day, blessed and sanctified it. Gen. 2:3.

Now anybody who has the least respect for God's word, however honest he may have been previously, after reading the solemn warning as quoted above, will conclude that there is something in this matter of Sunday keeping that he has not hitherto understood. He will begin to consider whether it is not safer to take God's opinion of the matter rather than to rely upon his own.

But let us see what is involved in this question. If it is really true that notwithstanding Sunday is the mark of papal power, and the seventh day the sign of God's power, there is no difference in the days, it must follow that God's blessing is of no worth, and that a human act is as good as God's. But further: if it is claimed, for any reason whatever, that preference should be given to Sunday, it would logically follow that man's act is really of more value than an act of God.

Now if what God does and blesses is no better than what man does, to say nothing of its being in any way inferior, it must be true that man can be his own Saviour. For if our acts are as good as God's it will follow inevitably that anything we may do to effect our salvation is as effectual as anything that God does; and that being so, what need has man of any saviour other than himself. Of what use would Christ be to him? Manifestly, of no use. But still further: if, as set forth above, God's works are inferior to man's works, then it would be safer to trust in man's works for salvation than in God's. And that is just the position of the papacy.

For it can be made perfectly plain that the way of salvation, as taught by the papacy, is entirely different from God's way. "By grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." Eph. 2:8. We read in John's gospel that certain ones came to Christ and asked, "What must we do that we may work the works of God?" They felt confident they were equal to any occasion, and had they been able to do as they thought themselves able, there would have been no need of salvation in any other way. But they were unprepared for the reply of Christ: "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent."

This reveals the fact that in no other way can the works of God be accomplished by us than by faith in Christ; and consequently that salvation is purely a matter of faith. This is the Protestant principle contended for in the Reformation—justification by faith—and this too in direct opposition to Roman Catholicism.

This would imply that the Catholic method of salvation or justification is different from that of faith; and such indeed is the case. The following quotation, taken from a standard Catholic work, "Catholic Belief," is right to the point:—

"They (the Reformers) then reduced, as it appears, to a mere matter of form the two sacraments they professed to retain; namely, Holy Baptism and the Holy Eucharist. To make up for this rejection and enable each individual to prescribe for himself, and procure by himself the pardon of sins and divine grace, independently of the priests and of the sacraments, they invented an exclusive means never known in the church of God, and still rejected by all the Eastern churches and by the Roman Catholics throughout the world; by which the followers of Luther ventured to declare that each individual can secure pardon and justification for himself independently of priests and sacraments. They have framed a new dogma, not to be found in any of the creeds, or in the canons of any general councils; I mean the new dogma of justification by faith alone or by faith only." (Italics theirs.)

As the doctrine of justification by faith was not known in the past, and is still rejected, by the Catholic Church, by what other means can justification be had except by works? And the same power by which such works are wrought is the power by which the Sabbath was changed from the seventh day to Sunday. And as Sunday is the mark of that power, it is as clear as day that Sunday is the mark or sign of justification by works. This will be considered more fully in our next.

THE question of the legality of religious exercises in the public schools is before the Supreme Court of West Virginia for decision, and it is thought will be settled at an early date. The case was brought up by petition of Mr. John Kennedy, to compel the Board of Education of Grant District, Marion County, and the trustees of Boothville free school to discontinue the reading of the Bible before the pupils, this being a regular feature of the opening exercises in the schools.

THE findings of the Government Board of Inquiry charged with investigating the destruction of the U. S. battleship "Maine," fasten the responsibility for the occurrence upon the Spanish government. While the Board did not announce this as a part of its report, it found that the battleship was destroyed by a submarine mine; and the explosion of a submarine mine in Havana harbor under such circumstances as those prevailing at the time, could not have been accomplished without complicity on the part of the Spanish officials having supervision and control of the defenses.

THE Supreme Court fiat that "this is a Christian nation," continues to be traversed by the action of the Government. On Sunday, the 27th inst., the President and his Cabinet, it is stated, instead of repairing to church, as is their custom, busied themselves in consultations with reference to the situation which has developed in the relations of the Government with Spain, just as would be done on an ordinary day of the week. Of course rest on Sunday is not an obligation of Christianity, according to the Scriptures; but having treated Sunday as an ordinary day, the Government—as represented by its chief executive and his cabinet—cannot even claim to be Christian from the standpoint of popular religious belief.

BACK in 1892 the Supreme Court of the United States gave a decision which was accepted by the advocates of National Reform as making this "a Christian nation." Recently, however, the Supreme Court decided that it is proper for the city of Boston to prohibit preaching in the city upon public grounds without a permit from the mayor; and now the Christian Statesman refers to this as an act of the nation "in direct contravention" of the gospel commission. Hence, by decision of the Supreme Court, from the Statesman's standpoint, the nation is both Christian and antichristian. But what, in the light of such facts, must one conclude as to the real value of a Supreme Court fiat upon such a question?

THE New York Sun calls attention to the curious effect of a Sunday closing proviso in the will of Mr. Lenox as regards the disposition of his library. This library is to be consolidated with the Astor library, and the two will constitute a great public library for the people of this city. This library is to be open on Sundays, so the committee having it in charge have decided; but they felt bound also by the Sunday proviso which covered a portion of it. The Sun says:—

"To the committee in charge of the consolidated library this fact has been not a little disconcerting. The Lenox collection was too valuable either to leave out altogether or to shut from view on a certain day of the week. Some one at length suggested that the difficulty could be solved by applying the rule only to those books which had belonged personally to Mr. Lenox. This it was decided to do, and a sub-committee was appointed to look into the matter. But when this sub-committee made its investigations it found that, of all the collection, those volumes possessed individually by Mr. Lenox consisted of a number of Bibles. These were accordingly set aside as coming under the law of the bequest, and on coming Sundays when the public throngs the new library, the only books that will be hidden from its view will be a number of Bibles."

PROBABLY with a view to the imminence of war between this country and Spain, a bill has been introduced in the U. S. Senate to provide for an increase of chaplains in the United States army. The most interesting part of this bill consists in its citation, as a basis of argument, of a number of resolutions adopted recently by the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Pennsylvania. The bill says that, "Whereas, the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Pennsylvania, held recently at Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, unanimously adopted the following resolutions," "Therefore, Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to consider the propriety of increasing the corps of army chaplains as suggested in the foregoing resolutions, and to report at the next session of Congress the advisability of the same."

THE resolutions are as follows:—

"First That it is the unanimous judgment of this Synod that the present corps of Army chaplains should be increased to the number of the military posts, and to this end that our honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress be respectfully requested to give this important matter their early and earnest consideration.

"Second. That inasmuch as it is not the policy of the War Department to provide religious literature for the Army, therefore this Synod would suggest the manifest propriety of our Presbyterian people sending occasional gifts of Bibles, hymn books, and other valuable publications to the post libraries for the benefit of the soldiers.

"Third. That as ministers of the gospel believing in the power of prayer, we should ever deem it our sacred duty and privilege to pray often, both in private and public, for the salvation of our brave defenders on land and sea.

"Fourth. That the moderator, the stated clerk, and the chairman of the committee on army chaplains take such measures as shall most effectively bring the above resolutions before Congress; and that a copy of the report be furnished to each member of the Senate and the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania and West Virginia."

* * *

It is the policy of the Government—one of which most denominations approve—to supply the army with chaplains; but it is not the Government's policy (as the resolutions state) to supply the army with religious literature. But why should not the Government do one as well as the other? What difference is there, in principle, between them? It is certainly just as easy to select literature suitable for a proper ministering to the spiritual needs of the soldiers as to select mensuitable for the same work. The latter, indeed, is the more uncertain and hazardous enterprise of the two.

* * *

It is all well enough to supply the soldiers of the army with religious literature; no class of men need such literature more than they, and it is, we believe, the privilege of any person or persons to supply it. But it is not necessary nor proper, that this should be done by act of Congress recognizing a particular denomination. If Congress would cease to assume the prerogative of a spiritual director, it would be better for the army and for the country.

THE following statement was made in the Church News (Adelaide, Aust.), in March, 1897:—

"We, the members of the Church of England in Australia and Tasmania, desire that in the preamble of the bill which frames the Federal Constitution, some words may be inserted setting forth our national creed."

That it is the real object of all religious legislation—to get some of "our national [church] creed" into the fundamental law. That is what the churches always want on such occasions, but they are not always frank enough to say so.

"Babylon Is Fallen."

OUT in a certain western town where theatricals and similar shows have been given a prominent place in the program of church work, an opera house manager has addressed a protest and memorial to the city council upon this point. He sets forth that the churches and the halls connected with them are ruining his business by giving entertainments and concerts of the same description as those for which he has to pay $100 annually into the city treasury; they, on the other hand, being exempt from taxation. He asks that either his license shall be rebated, or that the churches shall be subject to the same charge; and in case this is not done, declares that he will put in variety shows Sunday afternoon and evening, to meet the competition of the churches!

How long will it be at this rate before enterprising theater owners will be converting their play-houses into "churches," something after the order of the "Raines-law hotels" in this city, to evade a tax on their property, and thus stand upon common ground with their religious rivals?

Can anyone, in view of such facts, wonder that a message is going to the people of the earth proclaiming, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen"?

Sunday Observance Measures in Massachusetts.

SEVERAL bills relating to Sunday observance have this year been brought before the Massachusetts legislature, with the object of securing a more rigid enforcement of Sunday observance in that State. The principal one of these reads thus:—

"AN ACT

"Relative to the Observance of the Lord's Day.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

"SECTION 1. Section one of chapter four hundred and thirty-four of the acts of the year eighteen hundred and ninety-five is hereby amended by striking out, in the second, third, fourth, and fifth lines, the words 'or an entertainment given by a religious or charitable society, the proceeds of which, if any, are to be devoted exclusively to a charitable or religious purpose,' so as to read as follows:—

"SEC. 1. Whoever is present at a game, sport, play, or public diversion, except a concert of sacred music, upon the Lord's day, shall be punished by fine not exceeding five dollars for each offense.

"SEC. 2. This act shall take effect upon its passage."

Another measure, having for its object "To further regulate the observance of the Lord's day," provided that "Any person, firm, or corporation who violates any provision of chapter ninety-eight of the Public Statutes [relating to Sunday observance] or of any amendment thereto, shall be liable to a fine of ten dollars for each and every man, woman, or child employed by them in violation of such provision."

A third measure provided that unincorporated religious and charitable societies should be included in the exceptions provided for incorporated bodies of this nature, in the Sunday regulations.

A hearing was recently granted the advocates and opponent of these measures by a committee of the legislature, and the occasion proved to be one of much interest. A correspondent who was present at the hearing sends us the following relative to its results:—

"In brief, it was a grand victory for the principles of liberty. The issue was a surprise to me, and I am certain it was such to the promoters of the bill; although if the testimony given is to be taken, this bill is like Melchizedek, in that it has neither father nor mother. The secretary of the New England Sabbath Protective League, in his closing speech, after the speakers for the remonstrance had riddled the Sunday banner for three days with telling arguments, positively denied any responsibility concerning the initiation of the movement, although the secretary of the legislative committee told me in private that said organization did originate the measure. The attorney for the petitioners, also, denied any responsibility in the matter.

"But it was a grand affair. Mr. Geo. Fifield spoke for the International Religious Liberty Association. Three speakers spoke for the 'Free Religious Society,'—an organization whose principles relating to the rights of conscience are identical with our own. I was overwhelmed with the thought all through the hearing that the future will witness a grand struggle over the rights of conscience here in New England, before the chains to enslave the souls of men are fully forged and fastened on the victims.

"It did me good to see those noble men declare so boldly for personal liberty. The hearing consumed four days, scarcely finishing on the fourth. When the committee reported to the general court, on the Sunday bills, the verdict was, 'Ought not to pass.' On the third, the principle measure, however, they granted 'Leave to withdraw.' That was the conclusion of what I regard as a very notable hearing. It was very evident that the members of the committee had been careful readers of the SENTINEL. Proof of this was evident from the manner in which the petitioners were questioned."

The great call of the hour is for education—education of the public mind relative to the principles which define the proper attitude of the state toward religion. There is no more imperative call than this.

Shall this "Christian Nation" Follow Christian Principles?

THIS is the question that has been raised by representatives of the peace loving Society of Friends of a neighboring district, in view of the threatened outbreak of hostilities between the Government and Spain. It is presented in the form of a memorial "to the President, his Cabinet, and the Congress of the United States," by "The Representatives of the Religious Society of Friends for Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, respecting the controversy between the United States and Spain."

The memorial recognizes that this nation has been adjudged to be a Christian one, and this being so, it calls for action in harmony with the principles of Christian conduct, as plainly set forth in the Word of God. The memorial is worthy of perusal. It "respectfully represents":—

"That for some months past we have regarded with deep interest and solicitude the disturbed relations between our Government and that of the Kingdom of Spain in connection with the insurrection in the island of Cuba.

"We sympathize with the friendly efforts that have been used by the present, as well as by the late Administration to interpose the good offices of the United States in bringing to a close the inhuman warfare between Spain and her insurgent colony, and we deplore their want of success and the continued sufferings of the Cuban people.

"Whilst desiring to uphold the hands of the President in all that may conduce to the benevolent end proposed by him, we are firmly impressed with the belief that this purpose is not likely to be attained by a menace of military force on the part of the United States. Should the irritation now felt by the two nations toward each other be inflamed to the point of open warfare, while we may profess to be actuated by the humane desire to relieve the sufferings of the non combatants in Cuba, shall we not be amenable to the charge of inconsistency by bringing on a second calamity which would add to, rather than remedy, a prior evil? The soldiers and sailors of the United States who will, in case of war, be thrust into the front rank of the battle, many of whom may lose their lives or limbs in the contest, and whose families must suffer the bereavement of husbands, fathers, and brothers, have surely no less a claim than the people of a foreign country upon the kind consideration of our rulers. Great and solemn indeed is the responsibility of men in power, whose action may light the flames of war and doom to death and untold misery many of their fellow beings, who have had no voice in its inception.

"We hold the belief that there can be no difference between nations that cannot be more advantageously adjusted to the real interests of both parties by peaceful negotiation or arbitration than by a resort to arms. That the principles of the Christian religion forbid war as emphatically as they do private combats; and that national honor cannot be vindicated by mutual destruction and injury.

"Should the United States and Spain be unable to adjust their present differences by the ordinary methods of peaceful diplomacy, we would urge the resort to arbitration as a course honorable in itself and in accord with the spirit which should animate a Christian nation. This method has been frequently and successfully resorted to by the United States in its intercourse with powerful governments, and would be no less just and honorable when a weaker one is involved in the controversy. In the intercourse between individuals, no dispute, however serious or however it may touch an imaginary sense of honor is regarded as beyond the ordinary peaceful process of the courts. Why then should the same principle be less applicable to the settlement of international differences?

"We call our Union a Christian nation. The Lord Jesus Christ, whom we thus claim to follow, inculcated a loving regard on the part of his disciples toward all men, even to their enemies. An inspired apostle has declared that 'the wisdom which is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, and the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace.' James 3:17-18.

"We would, therefore, express our earnest desire and hope that pacific counsels may still prevail with our honored President, as we have rejoiced to believe that they have in good measure done, in the management of the momentous questions now pressing upon him, and that all departments of the Government may calmly seek for Divine counsel so to direct them as to be instrumental in promoting the true interests of our beloved country, and receive the blessing pronounced by the Prince of Peace upon the peacemakers.

"By direction and on behalf of a meeting of the representatives aforesaid, held in Philadelphia, the 25th day of the third month, 1898.

"WM. EVANS,
"Clerk for the day."

The SENTINEL is, of course, in full sympathy with the framers of this memorial as regards the desire for peace; but the SENTINEL advocates peace as a principle of Christian conduct, and as such applicable alone to individuals. From its very nature, depending as it does entirely upon force, a civil government cannot be Christian; and it is therefore useless to instruct such a government in the principles and practices of Christianity.

A Decision Against State Gifts to Churches.

SUCH a decision has been recently rendered by the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. It appears, however, that the grounds upon which the decision rests do not deny the validity of the principle of such gifts, and therefore the decision does not bar such gifts in future under certain conditions. The facts relating to this decision are set forth in the following quotations, taken from the Truth Seeker:—

"In the city of New Orleans there are about two score institutions, all of them apparently sectarian, which have for years subsisted upon donations of money from the city. They have not been in any sense under the control of the municipality; they have been under no contract for the performance of any public service; they need not even report to the city how the money has been spent. Meanwhile legitimate public institutions have languished and the public schools been closed for want of funds to support them.

"In 1896 Henry Orr, Sr., sought in the District Court a 'citation upon the mayor, the treasurer, and the comptroller of the city, and also the common council, that relator have judgment against them decreeing all of said appropriations null and void, and prohibiting any further payment of the money appropriated by the budget of 1896 to the said private, charitable, and benevolent purposes, to said purposes and communities, and prohibiting the council from appropriating any money for said purposes out of the treasury for the year 1897, as proposed, or any subsequent year, and that the mayor be prohibited from approving and forbidden to approve any ordinance making such appropriation or appropriations; that the comptroller be forbidden from drawing and the treasurer from paying any warrant thereunder, or any money under color of appropriation for any private, charitable, or benevolent purpose whatever, to any person or community, or in aid of any church, sect, or denomination of religion whatever, and for all writs and orders necessary to enforce the judgment to that effect.'

"At the time this action was brought, Judge Rightor, of the District Court, decided that the appropriations had not been made to sectarian institutions for the reason that all sects shared alike! Mr. Orr appealed the case, and has just got the verdict of the Supreme Court reversing the lower. The decision is a good one as far as it goes, but it does not promise to correct the abuse of public appropriations to sectarian institutions, for Chief Justice Nichols, by whom it was written, says that 'had the city made express contracts either with individuals or with private corporations by which the latter would have come under a well-defined civil, legal tie to perform such duties for the city, the officers of the city having legal power to exact performance according to the terms of the contract, and to hold such parties liable for breach of the same, and had the city passed ordinances appropriating money to carry out its obligations toward the other contracting parties under such contracts, and had the validity of such appropriations been submitted to us, a very different question would have been presented from that actually before the court.'

We derive from this that Justice Nichols sees no objection to sectarian appropriations in themselves, but in the way they are made. Of course such a decision as that cannot be final. As hinted by the New Orleans Times-Democrat, the institutions will now have to revise and rearrange their scheme of charitable operations, and the city in its turn will have to make provision for the support of its indigent sick and poor and thus meet the points raised by the court. It is plain enough what kind of arrangements should be made. The city should take care of its own poor, in institutions under the sole management of the municipal officers, and the church should care for its own with its own means. Encouraging private enterprise in charity by means of public gifts or appropriations is a form of subsidizing calculated to increase the number of charitable institutions and to promote pauperism."

Political Scheming in Rio de Janeiro.

A FEW months ago there was an ordinance passed in Rio de Janeiro closing, with few exceptions, all shops and places of business at 12 o'clock on Sundays and prohibiting the sale of produce, merchandize, confectionaries, etc., etc., until the following Monday morning.

It is claimed that the ordinance has nothing to do with religion nor religion with it, but it is said to be simply for the benefit of clerks and employes, who were compelled to work all day on Sundays, that they might have Sunday afternoons for rest and recreations.

The ordinance did not give general satisfaction as it closed many shops where no clerks were employed.

A few Sundays ago a poultry dealer did not close his shop just at the hour appointed, and soon after the time to close, a boy came in and said that he would like to buy a chicken for dinner. The chicken was sold to him, and he had hardly reached the street before an officer entered and arrested the poultry dealer, brought him before the court and fined him $20. It was learned soon after, according to the poultry-man's statement, that the officer hired the boy to go and buy the chicken, and that the chicken was served on the officer's table for dinner, and the $20 was divided among two or three of his chum officers.

All sorts of iniquitous practices are carried on in Brazil under the pretense that might makes right.

W. H. THURSTON.

Rio de Janeiro, March 6.

Studies in French History.—16.

"PHILIP the Fair, or the Fourth," again began the teacher, "does not have a very good name in history as you see. He was a selfish and greedy man."

"I suppose those kings back there forgot that all their wicked capers would be written up for boys and girls to read in after years," said Florence Ray.

"Yes; they sometimes seemed to forget that they were making history, and I doubt not some of them would blush if they could see the pages which the historian has penned about them. But we must not forget that we are all of us making history as well as they, and that there is a faithful record kept of all our lives.

"Philip IV. coveted the country of Flanders, I presume, because it was very rich, and much to be desired. So he forthwith picked a quarrel with the inhabitants, and soon assumed control of it, declaring it annexed to France. The people, however, did not purpose to have their liberty thus taken away, and so one night in the city of Bruges, they rose as one man and put a great many French people to death; in fact the people enacted over again the tragedy of the Sicilian Vespers."

"What year was this, please?" questioned Edna Philips.

"About the close of the thirteenth century."

"Didn't Philip punish them for all this?" questioned Harry Ray.

"He tried to do so, but the French were obliged to confess themselves whipped, and were finally glad to make peace. But the king had no sooner made peace with his neighbor than he was overwhelmed in trouble with the pope, Boniface the Eighth. This pope took the grounds that the clergy ought to be exempt from paying taxes. This the king pretested against very vigorously."

"Well, he did just right, there, in my opinion!" exclaimed Joe Palmeter, who was quick to perceive any encroachment upon his ideas of justice, liberty, and equal rights for all.

"I don't think I can blame him, myself, Joseph; for he gave as his reason the very good one that the clergy was 'as much interested as any other one in the good order and prosperity of the country.' But the pope was very angry with him, and sent out many bulls, or decrees, of an abusive nature, against the king, who paid no attention to them in the least."

"I wonder he did not excommunicate him at once," remarked Ed Barnaby.

"O, he did, Edward, he did, indeed, and threatened to prohibit the clergy from officiating at funerals, marriages, or church services. This was called 'interdiction.' He even went so far as to declare King Philip deposed."

"Seems to me that is taking to itself a power God never intended the church to possess," said Julia March.

"My grandfather said this morning," chimed in Maggie Palmeter, "that Pope Boniface gave out word that he would grant a pardon to any man who would take matters into his own hands and kill the king."

"Did he forget the sixth commandment? or did he intend to ignore it altogether? I am quite surprised that anyone pretending to be a teacher of righteousness should so far forget the first principles of Christianity!" exclaimed Julia March.

"At last," continued the teacher, "some of the enemies of the pope took him prisoner,—they entered slyly into his palace,—and one of the party struck him a blow in the face with his iron glove which they called a 'gauntlet.' This was not at all right, even though he had certainly done very wrong; for the Master's way is to return good for evil. After a while he was liberated, but he became insane, and died shortly after.

"Finally, the king nominated a pope to suit himself, who went by the name of Clement the Fifth, and Philip was careful to see to it that he did suit him in every particular. The crafty king used him as a tool to extract money from the people, and Clement dared not refuse to do so; for, as the historian says, 'the king held on like a leech.' So the poor pope traveled around to get money for the greedy king, until the people could not bear to see his face."

"Was it King Philip IV. who destroyed the Knights Templars?" asked Edna Philips.

"Yes, Edna, and it was his covetous disposition which led him to do the cruel deed."

"Will you tell us a little about them, professor, and who they were? I'm afraid I don't know very much about them," said Charlie White.

"That is a very reasonable request, Charlie. We will have to go back to the time of the First Crusade. Who can remember who was king of France, then?"

"I believe it was Philip I, the fourth of the Capetian kings," said Edna Philips.

"You are right, Edna; your memory serves you well. Can you remember in what year the first crusade occurred?"

Edna blushed a little. "I'm afraid I can't tell you exactly, professor, but I think it was about the close of the eleventh century."

"That's quite right; Jerusalem was taken by the Christians during the first crusade, in the year 1099. There were men who were left by the Christians in Palestine to protect those people who were left in an unprotected condition. These men were called Knights of the Temple and Knights of St. John. The former of these bands or societies pledged themselves to live lives of purity and abstinence, and to fight if need be, for their cause. After many years these knights became immensely rich, and lived very luxurious and wicked lives, in spite of their solemn vow. So Philip IV. determined to make this an excuse for destroying them, and himself appropriating at least a large share of the plunder. This is the wicked scheme which he divulged to Pope Clement.

"Next week I would like Will Barnaby to find out as much as he can, by reading, etc., about the way Philip managed to bring about his cruel purpose, and tell us all he has learned."

Prescription for Fits.

For a Fit of Passion.—Walk out in the open air. You may speak your mind to the winds without hurting anyone, or proclaiming yourself to be a simpleton. "Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry, for anger resteth in the bosom of fools."

For a Fit of Idleness.—Count the tickings of a clock. Do this for one hour, and you will be glad to pull off your coat the next and work like a man. "Slothfulness casteth into a deep sleep, and an idle soul shall suffer hunger."

For a Fit of Extravagance and Folly.—Go to the workhouse, or speak with the ragged and wretched inmates of a jail, and you will be convinced

"Who makes his bed of briar and thorn Must be content to lie forlorn."

"Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not?"

For a Fit of Ambition.—Go to the churchyard and read the gravestones. They will tell you the end of man at his best estate. "For what is your life? It is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall."

For a Fit of Repining.—Look about for the halt and the blind, and visit the bed-ridden, the afflicted and the deranged; they will make you ashamed of complaining of your light afflictions. "Wherefore doth a living man complain?"

For a Fit of Envy.—Go and see how many who keep their carriages are afflicted with rheumatism, gout, and dropsy; how many walk abroad on crutches, or stay at home wrapped up in flannel; and how many are subject to epilepsy and apoplexy. "A sound heart is the life of the flesh. Envy is the rottenness of the bones."—Sel.

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, if not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

NEW YORK, APRIL 7, 1898.

Read the protest of the Society of Friends (Quakers) of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, to the President, his cabinet, and Congress, against settling the difficulty with Spain by war. See p. 218.

PRESS reports state that there is little doubt of the passage of the Weeks Sunday baseball bill in the legislature of Albany. The measure is one in the interests of Sunday ball playing, but does not stand for opposition to the principle of Sunday laws.

THE honor of being President of the United States is far less than the responsibility of the same. The truth of this statement ought to be plain enough just now, in view of the ridicule and abuse which the chief executive receives at a time when he most needs the sympathy and prayers of all the people.

THERE is a noticeable absence of that enthusiasm for war on the part of Roman Catholics in this country, which marked their demeanor at the time of the difficulty with Great Britain over Venezuela. With not one tenth of the provocation that is now felt by the American people, the Catholic press of the country was ten times as eager for a war which would have been ten times more terrible than a conflict with Spain could possibly be.

THE pope has finally interfered to prevent war with Spain. It is stated that he has directed Archbishop Ireland to bring his influence to bear upon the President and others to secure a pacific attitude on the part of the Government towards Spain. But why should the papal influence be brought to bear upon the United States?

It takes two parties to make a quarrel, and in this case the other party is a most Catholic and "Christian" government—Spain. While the pope's influence with the American Government is unquestionably great, his influence with the Spanish government is unquestionably much greater. It is natural to suppose that he would exert his influence where it is most powerful, and hence would be most productive of results, if his aim is simply to prevent an outbreak of hostilities.

THE motive for the papal policy in this matter can be readily perceived when it is remembered that the Spanish government and the papal church are in the closest union. The Spanish government supports the papal church, and the latter is bound in turn to support the government to which it is joined. And it seems now that the pope is making an effort to do so. He wants peace; but more than that he wants disaster averted from Spain; because disaster to Spain means disaster to the church.

THE pope wants Cuba to continue under Spanish rule; because Spanish rule means papal rule. A new government in the island may not be as useful to the church as the Spanish government was; and a revolution in Spain, which would probably follow any serious blow to the present government, might inflict upon the church great damage. These are threatening evils to the church which the resources of papal policy are now employed to avert.

THE history of the smaller American republics within recent years furnishes plain evidence that the pope desires only such peace as is advantageous to the church. The clerical party in those republics are always the most active plotters of revolution when the government has become one of which the church does not approve. The church is the same in a republic of South or Central America that it is in Italy. The head of the church party in any country, is the pope; and Roman Catholics in every part of the world are by their own profession amenable to the pope, as the head of the church, in all matters having to do with the church and the Catholic religion. In all such matters they are bound by the word of the pope, and when they plot revolution in any country, in the interests of the church, it must be with the sanction of the church, which is the sanction of the pope. There is no other logical or reasonable conclusion.

In former times the popes secured compliance with their wishes from the nations by threatening the rulers and their subjects with excommunication. And as this was a proper and laudable proceeding then—from a Catholic point of view—and can be no less proper now than it was then, there can be no reason why the pope should not employ the same means to-day, except that it is not considered good policy for this age of the world. Mr. Moody is quoted as having said recently that the pope could, by a word, put a stop to the horrors in Cuba; and this is true. The Catholic religion cannot be separated from politics; and the pope can dictate the political action of his subjects, in any part of the world, in the name of the religion which they profess, and threaten them with excommunication if they refuse to comply with his instructions. And since he has not interfered to save the lives of the hundreds of thousands of victims of Spanish barbarity in Cuba, it is altogether too late for him to enter a plea before the American government in the name of peace and humanity.

THE civil authorities of Plainfield, N. J., have decided that work done on Sunday by observers of the seventh day, in order not to be "to the disturbance of others," as the exemption clause provides, must be done so secretly that nobody except those engaged in it will know anything about it. See p. 213. This is about the value that this exemption for those who observe another day will have, in the heat of a Sunday law crusade.

JESUS CHRIST never declared war on anything but sin.

THE Christian alone can always maintain "peace with honor."

It is the age of gold; but we seem as far as ever from the golden age.

It is more dangerous to adhere to an evil principle than to a wicked person.

If the world could be reformed by law, God would have reformed it long ago.

A NATION of slaves—slaves to that which debases manhood—cannot hope to maintain its independence.

HE who cannot enter into the true spirit of Sabbath-keeping can find no rest nor benefit in it. The letter, without the spirit, is useless.

WHAT the church most needs to show to the world is not that she can wield the arm of civil power, but that she can move the arm of God.

WHY should any of the States of the American Union be afraid or ashamed to incorporate in its constitution the provisions against religious legislation which are contained in the Constitution of the nation?

If Sunday laws were really designed for the physical benefit of those to whom they apply, they would not seek to prohibit Sunday games and recreation, which offer a diversion from the week of labor healthful both to body and mind.

THE Sunday law takes away the privilege which every man has to make Sunday—or any day of the week—his weekly rest day, and puts in its place a stern necessity, backed by the terrors of civil pains and penalties. It really takes from the workingman the right it pretends to give him.

National Service to the Church.

It is the theory of the National Reform movement that the Government ought to serve the church. For years the leaders of this movement have been working to put the Government in a position where it would be subservient to the church,—that is, to the church as they represent it. And they claim to find Scriptural support for this theory. A recent issue of the Christian Statesman makes this statement:—

"We regard it as our imperative duty to warn this nation of the approaching judgments of the reigning Messiah, which history and revelation assure us follow quickly upon those nations which interfere with his messengers in the proclamation of his terms of peace. 'The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee (the church) shall perish: yea, those nations shall be broken in pieces.'"

If disaster to the country should follow upon an outbreak of war with Spain, the Statesman would point to it as evidence of the wrath of God against the nation for its "secularism," by which term is meant its refusal to "serve" the church.

It is true that the Scriptures do say of the church what is here quoted by the Statesman. The words are found in the 60th of Isaiah (v. 12). But it is equally true that no service to the church can possibly come through an alliance with the powers of the earth. It would be well if every religious body now seeking such an alliance would study and pay heed to the language of the chapter in which these words are found.

The chapter sets forth a condition of exceeding glory and power, as being that to which in the will of God it is the privilege of the church to attain. All that the church desires or is seeking to day in the way of success,—all that she can ask or even dream of—is here set before her as that which she may certainly have. There can be no doubt about it, for it is the promise of the Omnipotent. Here is power; here is glory; here is exaltation; here is influence; here is the “wealth of the Gentiles,” and the service of kings and of the nations. Does the church really want all this? Do those for which the Statesman speaks really want it? If they do, then let them by all means seek it in the appointed way.

That way is plainly set forth,—no less plainly than the glorious results which it brings. God says, “Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising.” V. 1-3.

The SENTINEL is set to warn the people of the nation against the fast-forming alliance of church and state. But upon the authority of the plain word of the Lord, it can say to the church, Your privilege—and your duty—is to arise and shine with a glory that will be seen with wonder throughout the earth. “The glory of the Lord is risen upon thee!” But not so if you are seeking glory from an earthly source—through politics, or through legislation. The glory of the Lord upon you is that which marks you as separate from all that is of the earth.

It was the glory of God that shone above the camp of the ancient Israel when they were separate from all the nations—the “church in the wilderness.” It was the glory of God that appeared upon the top of Sinai when the mountain was set off from all the surrounding land and guarded from every earthly tread, save that of Moses and the chosen elders. It was the glory of God that filled the Most Holy Place of the sanctuary, into which the high priest alone might enter, and that but once a year. And when the glory of the Lord is seen upon you, that will mark you as separate from the world—as set apart unto the service of God. And it will be seen upon you if you are thus separated, and only upon this condition.

Then “the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising.” You are not to go to the kings, but kings are to come to you, and that because of the glory of the Lord which they see upon you. You are not to be upon the level of the world or to travel with the world. It is in the order of God that his church should be above the world and ahead of the world—so far above and so far ahead of the world in all that is desirable that she will be the wonder of the world. But the church has never occupied her appointed and privileged place, save for a few brief intervals of time. Yet in those few brief intervals, the glory and success of the church was such as to be the marvel of succeeding ages.

Does the church, then, want the service of kings and of nations? It is for this that she is seeking. And she can have it, if she will so fully separate from the world that the glory of the Lord will be reflected upon her, in such measure as will astonish and draw the Gentiles and kings of the earth. She can have it by pursuing a course the farthest possible removed from that of seeking a union with earthly powers. She can have it—and only thus can it be had—by pursuing exactly the opposite course to that which is followed in the movement for National Reform.

Then “the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish,” as it is written; not because it refused to do your bidding, but because it set itself against God, and must meet the fate of all that fight against him.

If the church will turn her feet into the pathway of total separation from the world, the SENTINEL will be foremost to bid her “God speed.”

A “Christian Flag.”

THE fad of a so-called “Christian flag” is running like wildfire over the land. Doubtless the next thing will be that whosoever does not salute this so-called flag will be held as no Christian at all; and whosoever does not show respect to it will be denounced as an enemy of the church and a traitor to Christianity.

In behalf of this fad, it is claimed by its originator that “as every other nation on earth has its flag, so the kingdom of Christ should have one too:” which is but to say that the kingdom of Christ is earthly just as is “every other nation on earth.” This earthly, sensual, conception of heavenly and spiritual things coincides very aptly with the false “Christian citizenship” notion that is now so largely prevalent.

A “hymn” has been written and “dedicated” in honor of this so called flag. It is said that excursion steamers have ordered these things for their use when carrying Sunday-school excursionists. It would indeed be exceedingly appropriate on Sunday excursion steamers. No Sunday excursion steamer or train could justly be accused of disloyalty to the “Christian Sabbath” while flying the “Christian flag.”

We wonder what freak will appear next in behalf of a worldly, sensual “kingdom of Christ.”

Nevertheless, the word of Christ stands forever sure, “My kingdom is not of this world.” A. T. J.

DR. HIRSCH, of the University of Chicago, correctly states the aim of Christianity, as follows:—

“In strict theory Christianity’s aim is to establish a kingdom which is not of this world. The sermon on the mount preaches the principle of non resistance which the state cannot adopt, for one of its functions is to punish the hand that strikes and the thief who has taken the outer garment."

An Old Man's Contemplation.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

I'm growing old, my sight is dim, my memory doth fail
To bring to mind the good old times, in every small detail.

But yet, there's one thing that can ne'er my recollection slip,

'Though tempests fierce have well nigh sunk my weather-beaten ship.

Our old-time preachers used to talk of Jesus and his love,
Nor did they fear all kinds of vice to manfully reprove:
The cross was their attraction every erring soul to win,
Since well they knew the Spirit's power alone could cleanse from sin.

We never thought in years gone by to ask the civil power
To help our churches, rather we made God our strength and tower:

Believing He could best convert the sinner from his way,
We were content to let the Lord bring in those gone astray.

But to convert the people now strange methods are employed,

And some, the much-prized privilege which we have long enjoyed,

Would violate, and under foot would tread the rights of man,

To execute what they would call their glorious God-given plan.

The one great message preached to-day from pulpits one and all,

Is to seek legislative powers, to force both great and small

To become Christians, and if some to this will not consent,

Why whips and stocks—Rome's weapons old—must help them to assent.

The National Reformers too have aspirations great,
Since they, into a paradise our nation would translate:
So they petition Congress with an ill-directed zeal,
To decide that all are Christians, though made against their will.

To me these methods all seem strange, I cannot understand

The deep designs these "reverends" have within their wise heads planned.

But then, I am old-fashioned, I suppose behind the times:
And my music too discordant to mix with modern chimes.

But still I'm half inclined to think the ancient way is best,—

To convert the individuals; they'll then show interest
In seeking other souls to gain, by methods all divine,
Their weapons—love, nor can they e'er on government recline.

Avaunt! ye vile usurpers of man's rights, divinely given,
Would ye by human laws attempt to annul the laws of heaven?

Do ye profess to daily learn within the Saviour's school?
Strive then to practice in your lives his glorious Golden Rule.

By human statutes ye can ne'er regenerate our land,
The Spirit's sword alone should ye wield with a mighty hand.

Would ye be faithful to your Lord? place politics aside
And seek the heavenly POWER to preach—Christ Jesus crucified.

Republica Argentina.

In a paper treating on the subject of privateering, written in 1812, Thomas Jefferson made this statement of the nature of war:—

"What is war? It is simply a contest between nations as to which can do the most harm to the other. Who carries on the war? Armies and navies that are made up of individuals. How is a battle gained? By the death of individuals. What produces peace? The distress of individuals occasioned by the conduct of war."

This is true, and this is what war will be to day when it comes. The worst suffering and distress occasioned by war is not felt by those in the field, but by the people at home.

Why the People Want War?

It seems clear enough that the great majority of the people want war with Spain, but there is evidently a considerable diversity of sentiment among them as regards the reason why war should be declared. The New York Christian Advocate comments upon this fact and gives a number of illustrations, which are worth considering by sober-minded and peace-loving people. The Advocate says:—

"There have been some remarkable conversations of late. One citizen of good standing was heard to say to another, 'The government must interfere, or it will not succeed in the next election; prosperity lags; any government that starts a war is bound to be supported; that issue takes precedence of everything else; it has always been so in this country; it has been so in other countries; it always will be so.' 'Yes,' said his friend, 'and for that reason we free silver men have got to shout for war.'

"This explains the unanimity. 'Do you not remember,' said the first, 'what a mad race both parties ran after Cleveland issued his threat respecting Venezuela? Hardly a man dared to lift up his voice in Congress for some weeks, and it was clear as the nose on your face that party competition produced some of that unanimity.'

"Another conversation was on this wise: 'We want war; war makes business; thousands of people will be better off very soon if we have war.' 'How is that?' said his companion. 'Every man that leaves any kind of business to go to war makes a place for another. A great deal of work has to be done in the shipyards now, and everything that is likely to be destroyed by war has to be replaced. If you will stop and think you will see that nearly every kind of business would be improved by it.' Just before the 'Maine' sailed to Havana two men employed in the navy were talking in a hotel. One said to the other, 'If there is a war we will have a chance to show what we can do; pretty dry time we have had lately.'

"It has been said that the Spaniards' dispatching their flotilla justifies an immediate declaration of war on the part of the United States. Some of the most astonishing remarks have been made in the pulpits of the country, if they are properly reported. One minister is said to have called on God, in prayer, 'to wipe Spain from the face of the earth.' Another, between fifty and sixty years of age, and sure not to be drafted in case of war, used still more extravagant language and declared that he would head a regiment. Whether the amens that his remark elicited arose from sympathy with the cause or from a certainty that in such a case he would take his departure from those parts, it was impossible to determine, but that he evoked much enthusiasm is undeniable. Some ministers invited to preach to students in colleges, having one, and but one, opportunity to say something that would prepare the young men for their high destiny as citizens and Christians, ejaculated vehemently the fiercest war sentiments.

"Returning from a service where the pastor displayed more energy than he had done for a long time upon any subject relating to the ordinary work of a minister, the reformation of men, the edification of believers, and the salvation of souls, two members of the congregation were conversing. One said, 'I believe that our Government should now notify Spain to withdraw all its troops from Cuba and publicly declare that it will leave the people to govern themselves, withdrawing all claim; and if they do not at once declare they will do it, and begin to vacate the island, the government of the United States should declare war and wipe Spain from off the face of the earth.' The other said, 'Suppose that two hundred thousand of the citizens of the United States were to be killed in the war, do you think that (considering what the greater part of the population of Cuba are), they should be sacrificed to bring about that result?' The citizen hesitated, and finally said, 'No, it certainly would not be wise to kill two hundred thousand American citizens to bring about that.' 'Well, should the United States sacrifice one hundred thousand to do it?' He thought that would be too many, but finally said he would not stop for fifty thousand. 'You would,' said the other, 'if you were to be one of them.'

"Some of these conversations we heard; the others were reported to us by participants or auditors."

Yes, indeed; we wonder if, in most cases, the individual who has been shouting for war would not consider even ten United States citizens too great a number to be sacrificed in wiping Spain off the earth, if he himself were to be one of them. A great many people are willing to be patriots and kill the enemies of their country who are not willing to die themselves unless it can be by proxy.

But he who goes to war and he who calls for war, must then and there surrender his own life to his country. If the would-be soldier is not willing to do this he cannot consistently don the military uniform. And he who calls for war is only a hypocrite if he is not willing to put his own person into the forefront of the battles which war must bring.

It will need a higher patriotism than is indicated in the conversations quoted to sustain the country in the event of war. To want war for the sake of political success or to revive business is one of the most foolish as well as the most criminal of sentiments.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. L. HENRY.

THERE was at first no definite plan in any human mind by which we should proceed. All through the years since, as the work crystallized into form there have arisen those who have claimed to have "originated," "organized," or "named" it. There has been in later years system and method, but no one person organized the W. C. T. U., nor was its name the result of any one brain's cogitations.

Some have of late undertaken to prove that we are giving Miss Willard a place which belonged to some one else, in that she did not organize the W. C. T. U., but we do not claim that she was the organizer of the Union. She was the instrument by which the organization was perfected, but it was in existence while she was yet Dean of the Woman's College at Evanston, and it was the organization that voiced the call of God to her.

At first there was in the work no thought of continuance. It was an emergency effort. I suppose that every woman of us expected to do our part quickly, and then return to the same quiet lives which we had always known (for the W. C. T. U. was composed of home-keeping women).

The Crusade had been such a surprise to saloon men that they did not know how to stand before it. They were also intimidated by the thought that, at last, the sin of their business had found them out to such an extent that the whole Christian world had conspired to destroy it. They supposed that the Woman's Crusade was the advance guard of the church which was about to follow the voice of prayer with that of the ballot; and so, with apprehensions of the judgment of man as well as of God, and touched by the pleadings which were poured forth by heart-broken women, they closed up, all along the line.

Very soon, however, they found that the votes of the church were not behind the women. We were, to all human appearance alone, and therefore, although tears and prayers were very uncomfortable to endure, they were not to be allowed to "interfere with business;" and the saloons began to open up as rapidly as they had closed, and with a power of defiance before which it was impossible for any woman to stand, unless she was filled with the power of a conviction greater than had as yet come upon many of us.

We believed that the saloon was to be closed by faith and prayer; we had faith in God and also in man, and when we saw that the saloon still existed, believed that the lack was in our praying. We believed that God chose human means through which to operate, and that, therefore, when we had found and employed the right means for closing out the saloon business, it would cease to exist, and the world be free from its curse.

My readers will understand from this, the earnestness with which, when we met failure in one direction, we turned in another.

We had believed that since saloon-keepers were men,—that all that was necessary was to make them understand what their business was doing to the women, children, tempted men, and the homes of the land.

When a woman one day came and poured her complaint into my ears, I said, "Have you told that saloon-keeper what he is doing to you through John?"

No, she had not done that. "Then," I said, "go and tell him just what you have told me, and he will stop." I believed it, and my faith was no greater than that of the average woman.

For the sake of the fathers and brothers with whom we had grown up; for the sake of the lovers who had won us to their own homes, and for the sake of the little boys about our knees; all of manhood from the cradle up to old age was sweet, was noble, true and honorable; we believed that we could always trust it.

This was the confidence we had in men, and there is no sadder chapter in human history than the disappointment with which the men of that generation, Christian voters as well as saloon-keepers, disappointed the praying women. We still believed it was a question of faith and prayer toward men as well as God, but it was evident we must pray to another class of men.

We thought we discovered at length that it must be the man who drank, instead of the man who sold, who should close up the saloon. If the drinking man could but be persuaded to drink no more, then the traffic must cease for lack of patronage, and the evil would be wiped off the face of the earth. We wondered that we had not thought of that before.

The thing that remained therefore, was to pledge all men and women to total abstinence. To do this as quickly as possible would require systematic and united effort, and we began to organize all over the land. In almost every city and village organized bodies of women under many different names sprang into being almost simultaneously.

They were known as Woman's Temperance "Associations," "Leagues," "Societies," as "Crusade Unions," etc., etc.

The city or village was districted; the women, armed with pledges, would meet each day for prayer in some central place and then go out for the house to house canvass for signers. Everybody was asked to sign the pledge; the man best known as clean and upright in all things was asked to give the support of his name to the poor victim of drink, who would not like to advertize his "failing" by such a promise, made only by drunkards. He might stagger boldly on the street in company with other drunken fellows, but to sign the pledge with them alone we felt would make him "too conspicuous" altogether, and so we tried to make a shelter for him in this confession behind the respectability of the "very best."

To this pledge-signing work we found no opposition. The poor victims of drink seemed only to have been waiting a chance to sign; saloon-keepers smiled to see us take "dead beats" off their hands, and the roll of names ran up into tens and hundreds of thousands.

We said to each other that it was the beautiful old story of the prodigal son over again, only there was "so many of him," and the joy over one sinner that repents was so multiplied that the world was not large enough to hold it.

How our rejoicing filled all the spaces between the oceans with songs that echoed and reëchoed from every mountain and valley!

It was a time of triumph such as the world had never known. If only it might not have ended in such bitter mourning!

"Christian" Spain and "Christian" America.

AT the recent Methodist Conference held in this city, the Committee on National Affairs reported to the assembly "an indictment demanding the expulsion of Spanish rule from Cuba." Among the reasons set forth in the report for this action is this:—

"8. Its sacreligious pretense of claiming to be a Christian nation."

Yet this same Methodist body indorses the declaration of the Supreme Court that the United States "is a Christian nation;" and that decision, in laying the groundwork for such a declaration, goes directly back to the history of Ferdinand and Isabella, of Spain, and cites the religious auspices under which Columbus set sail for the New World, as one of the proofs that from the very first, the nation has been Christian in character. And as the religion of Spain has not changed from that day to this, it is perfectly plain that if it can be cited in proof that this nation was inaugurated under Christian auspices, it can be cited in proof that Spain is to-day a Christian nation. If Spain be not a Christian nation to-day, then it is absolutely certain that the commission given to Columbus by Ferdinand and Isabella in the name of religion, had nothing to do with Christianity in this country, and constitutes no evidence whatever in support of the Supreme Court's decision. But no Methodist body have dissented from this finding of the Supreme Court; or if they have it has been done so secretly as not to come to public notice. The Methodist Conference might just as well declare war on the Supreme Court as favor war against Spain for claiming to be a Christian nation.

The truth is that Spain is just as much a Christian nation as is the United States, or any other nation on the globe.

Objections to the Flag Salute.

BY AN ADVENTIST PASTOR OF BOULDER, COLO.

As announced recently in the SENTINEL, the flag salute used in the public schools of Colorado has been modified by order of the superintendent of public instruction, so that it does not require the pupils to make a profession of religion. The Seventh-day Adventists of Boulder have been prominent in opposition to this form of salute, and still object to it in its modified form, for the following reasons, set forth in a communication to the Rocky Mountain News, by the pastor of the Adventist Church in Boulder, Eld. F. M. Wilcox:—

"The salute, since Superintendent Harding's decision, has been changed so that the recognition of God has been eliminated from the formula, and the pupil is required to pledge his heart and his head to his country alone. Why, it may be asked again, do Adventists object to this? Is it because they are anarchistic in sentiment, and are disloyal to the flag? I answer, emphatically, No. Seventh-day Adventists believe that Christians should be subject to the 'higher powers' not from constraint, but for conscience' sake. Rom. 13:1-7. As stated above, government is ordained of God, and as God's ordinance, should be upheld within its proper sphere. Of all the governments of earth our own is the noblest and best. The great fundamental principles upon which our government is based are heaven born. For these principles and for the flag as representing these principles, the Adventist body cherish profound respect. And in their desire to see these principles preserved inviolate is based the opposition to the flag salute.

"PATRIOTISM.

"Patriotism, like religion, is a plant of voluntary growth. The patriots of the revolution were not hirelings nor slaves. They could not be intimidated by fear, influenced by flattery, nor bought with gold. Their service was a service of love and deep conviction born of the righteousness of their cause.

"Patriotism, like religion, is a matter of the heart and life, and not of form and ceremony. It is possible to pray to God and yet be a knave, and to salute the flag and yet be a traitor at heart. And as forcing a child to pray would naturally make prayer distasteful and the object of adoration despised, so compelling a child to salute the flag instead of inculcating patriotism, would but serve to create an enmity against the national emblem. Thus an enforcement of the flag salute begets a patriotism in form and name only, and not in fact.

"Seventh-day Adventists, like the followers of Penn, are non-combatants in principle. By every laudable means consistent with the principles of the gospel, they believe in supporting the government. But they recognize the authority of a higher law as paramount to human enactment, and that law says, 'Thou shalt not kill.' To maim and kill in warfare would be to them as much a violation of this precept as to commit murder in the ordinary accepted sense. To pledge the head and the heart to the flag could be nothing less than to defend that flag with the life did occasion and necessity require. This the Adventists could not conscientiously do, nor permit their children to do. Hence, they believe it contrary to God's Word to permit their children to pledge themselves to warfare or to have inculcated in their young minds a warlike spirit.

"In the action of the Boulder school board and in the sentiment favoring that action is seen the spirit of a departure from the fundamental principles underlying our national existence. It shows that there is a tendency to foster the spirit of interference in religious matters on the part of the state, that the danger of a union of civil and religious questions in this country is not by any means a thing of the past. The invasion of the rights of the Adventists of Boulder is an invasion of the rights of every American citizen.

"RIGHTS SHOULD BE GUARDED.

"True religion, true patriotism, true Americanism, demand that the natural and inalienable rights given of God to every man, and guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States—rights purchased and preserved at so great a cost—should be jealously guarded and preserved inviolate from every manacle and chain which would make America less than her reputation—the land of the free and the home of the brave.

"Boulder, Colo., March 11, 1898."

President Lincoln and Denominational Appointments.

New York "Christian Advocate."

Mr. F.—(a prominent historical writer) went to President Lincoln to get an appointment, and being asked of what denomination he was, answered that he was a Presbyterian. "Well," said President Lincoln, "I will have to look at my books to see." He further said, "I am not sure but the Presbyterians are full. I have to do this."

Mr. Lincoln then proceeded: "Bishop Simpson was here the other day complaining of my Cabinet's giving all the appointments to Episcopalians. I did not know anything about my Cabinet. I thought Blair a good old Presbyterian name, and as for Seward, I didn't know until I went to church with him that he was an Episcopalian." President Lincoln had said to Bishop Simpson, "You wait here; we are to have a Cabinet meeting here directly, and I will see to it," and when the Cabinet came, he said, "Here is Bishop Simpson making a complaint of our giving all the appointments to the Episcopalians." Said Seward, "That is not true in my department. I never give an appointment to any man because of his denomination, nor even know what he is." Said Bishop Simpson, "There was Dr. McClintock, appointed to go to Paris, a good Methodist, and Bishop Hughes was put in his place. I suppose you didn't know, sir, who Bishop Hughes was?" "O, I had forgotten about him." "Well," said Blair, "you've got him there, bishop, but there are not two in my department that are Episcopalians." "Sir," said the bishop, "there are not two that are not."

"Why," said Blair, "that is not true, and you may come to-morrow morning and look for yourself." "I will be there at such a time," and he was there. As he went in Blair said, "Ah, bishop, you got Seward splendidly yesterday; how the fellow lies!" Bishop Simpson said, "I do not come to hear about him, but about your department."

"I haven't time to see about that." "Sir, it is of more importance than you know. Yesterday you said there were not two who were Episcopalians, and I said there were not two that were not Episcopalians;" and so he forced him to look at it, and he found that the bishop was correct, and that there were not two that were not Episcopalians.

All this Mr. Lincoln said to Mr. F——, who communicated it to one of the best known citizens of this country, a man of unimpeachable veracity and equal accuracy, who communicated it to us. After listening to it, we summoned a stenographer, to whom, at our request, our informant dictated it.

Denominational distinctions should never be recognized in such things, or all denominations are entitled, and will be driven, to protect themselves. Nor is it beneath their dignity, for presidents, governors, etc., to consider whether there is a tendency on the part of members of Cabinets to give an unusual proportion of appointments at their disposal to those who are of their own communion.

Recognizing the Papacy.

THE efforts of the pope to mediate between the Government and Spain have not been regarded with complacency by some of the religious bodies of the country. Among these is the New York Conference of Baptist ministers, who at their customary weekly meeting in this city, April 4, gave expression to their sentiments in the matter by the following resolution:—

"In view of the published suggestion from Madrid that the pope mediate between Spain and the United States in the Spanish and Cuban difficulty, we, the members of the New York Baptist Ministers' Conference, desire to utter an emphatic protest against any present or future recognition of the pope by our Government. We regard such recognition as in direct violation of the principle of separation between the church and the state which has been thoughtfully adopted by us. It would be a precedent likely to be used in future to our discomfort, if not to the disturbance of our civic affairs.

"While appreciating the propriety of his counselling the church which recognizes him as its religious instructor and head, we do not regard him as having any office with which our Government should hold official relation."

But the worst form of recognition of the papacy is the recognition of the principles which underlie the papal system; and that is done in every instance of religious legislation. It is much worse to imitate the papacy than to recognize the pope as an earthly sovereign.

Those Christian Nations.

BY O. C. GODSMARK.

THE following extract from the pen of R. G. Ingersoll, in an article entitled, "How I would amend the Golden Rule," but fitly represents the prevailing idea of true Christianity and its relation to civil organizations. "People called Christians—or rather nations called Christians—are the most warlike of the world. Christians now have armies amounting to several millions of men. They have hundreds of iron clad monsters filled with missiles of death floating from port to port, ready to destroy and kill. Every Christian nation is guarded by fortifications to prevent other Christians from cutting their throats."

Now the simple fact is that Christians do nothing of the kind. The fact that the man is a Christian forever forbids his taking a single step in the direction above mentioned. A Christian is one who follows Christ, or does as Christ did and taught. The whole tenor of Christ's teaching is that of love—love to God and love to man. Not merely love toward our friends, but love, actual love for our enemies. Did our Saviour retaliate for the indignities heaped upon him? No. We do not read of his having so much as a body guard to protect his person from the blood thirsty Jews who ever sought his life, much less of his sending out troops of trained soldiers to destroy the property and take the lives of those who opposed him in his work.

A Christian nation would be a nation composed entirely of Christians—men, who, when they were reviled, would revile not again, when smitten upon one cheek would turn the other also; but this we fail to find. Where among the great powers of earth is there a nation composed of such men as our Saviour was? The fact is they do not exist. We find Christians, as individuals, scattered all over this wide world; but Christian nations, as such, exist only in the vocabularies of writers and speakers who but superficially study the Word of God. The mere fact that a nation depends upon its own strength or that of some other earthly power for protection, also that it provides itself with aggressive means of warfare, shows conclusively that it cannot, as a nation, be Christian, or Christ-like.

Jesus said to Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." John 18:36. Mr. Ingersoll truly states what the nations of earth are to-day doing; but when he attempts to make Christianity, or the teaching of God's Word, responsible for the present preparations for war, also the merciless shedding of innocent blood by nations falsely called Christian, he falls far short of the true conception of the relation of Christianity to civil governments,—that of entire separation.

Los Angeles, Cal.

"ONLY the Golden Rule can prevent the rule of gold."

THESE are days of uncertainty. The country doesn't know whether or not there is going to be war with Spain, and in case there is war, nobody knows what is going to be the outcome. The war will be fought out mostly on the water, and nobody can say how modern naval fighting machines are going to acquit themselves in battle. Are the little torpedo boats going to demonstrate an ability to blow up and sink the great iron-clads, upon which supposition they were built? or will it be shown that the latter, with their great cannon and smaller rapid-fire guns, and their powerful search lights for discovering foes in the darkness, can easily dispose of their swift-going but diminutive antagonists? It is a fact that while the nations have gone on for years expending vast sums in the construction of battleships, cruisers, and torpedo boats, there has been as yet no actual test of the "merits"—if we may use the word—of these fighting machines in real conflict. And the naval authorities of other nations are no doubt secretly hoping that Spain and the United States will come to blows, in order that it may be known what kind of ships are really efficient in modern warfare, and what kind—if any—represent a mere waste of time and money.

THEN there is the submarine boat, of which considerable is now being said as an engine of warfare, and with a sample of which the Government has been lately conducting experiments in New York harbor. It is plain enough that no ship floating on the surface, however formidable, can do battle with a boat that can dive and move about in the ocean depths and in this safe hiding place discharge a deadly missile against its foe. Should this projected species of war vessel prove a success, all the navies of the world, as they now stand, would be useless, and naval warfare would be revolutionized. This is one possibility of the near future, to say nothing of what may be evolved from the experiments constantly in progress for a practicable solution of the problem of navigating the air.

THE Spanish and United States navies are, so far as can now be judged, about evenly matched; but each one is strong where the other is weak. Should the heavy battleships and monitors prove to be a superior class of vessels in actual warfare, the advantage would lie with the United States. And on the other hand, should the swift torpedo boats and fast cruisers do all that is hoped for them, the advantage would clearly lie with Spain; and the issue of the conflict might be vastly different from what is so confidently anticipated in this country.

THE President is quoted as saying, "You may rest assured there will not be war, with my consent, except for a cause which will satisfy good men here, the nations of Europe, and Almighty God." Of course, good men here and the nations of Europe ought to be satisfied with any cause which will satisfy God; and whether they will or not, such a cause would be sufficient anyway. But who is to find out under what circumstances God will approve of war? What official will undertake to "sound" the government of heaven? We were not aware that the Government has at its command any means of conducting such investigations. Each individual can of course settle the question for himself, by means of the guidance of the Word and the Holy Spirit; but we do not know how any person can settle the question for some one else. For ourselves, we are satisfied that if war is deferred until God approves of it, it will be postponed indefinitely.

THE State of Georgia has a strict Sunday law, which prohibits the transportation of freight within the State on that day. This resulted, on the 13th of March last, in stopping at Atlanta two carloads of torpedoes which the Government was hurrying South to be used in completing the defenses for the harbor of Pensacola, Fla. The Government could make no objection, for the Supreme Court of the nation has pronounced the law to be constitutional. But it is probable that in future emergencies of the kind the Government will be careful not to send its freight South via Georgia.

THE present Congress is apparently a veritable Klondike for the claim agent, and indications are that the country will be "worked" most vigorously as long as the mine holds out. Two religious claims, one by the Catholic Church in Macon City, Mo., and one of $25,020 by the Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville, Tenn., were favorably reported in Congress last month, and church claims to the amount of $20,000,000 are hopefully waiting their turn to come before the body who have manifested such a willingness to satisfy them by appropriations of the people's money.

THE Episcopal Recorder tells of a queer lawsuit that has lately been begun in Switzerland, and says:—

"It is connected with the famous battle of Sempach in 1386, when Arnold von Winkelried's proverbial heroism enabled the Swiss patriots to rout Duke Leopold and his Austrians. During all the five hundred years since then a mass for the souls of the Austrians slain has been said annually by the monks of Munster in that romantic Munsterthal so familiar to all English visitors to Basle. In payment for the mass the Canton of Lucerne used to give the monks 520 fishes yearly out of the Sempach Lake. But ever since 1875 the economical Cantonal government has declined to provide the fishes. The monks have accordingly brought an action to recover their piscatorial arrears. If they win they will have ample provision for all their fast days for many a month to come; but if they lose what will become of the souls of the Austrians? As the latter are principals in the arrangement, it is to be hoped that the judge who tries the suit will cite them to appear in court and plead their claims."

Legislation to Regulate Marriage.

THAT tendency which is so common among people of this day to meddle in the personal affairs of their neighbors, and to seek to regulate the same by law,—as if there were in legislation a panacea for all evils, real or supposed—is illustrated by a bill lately introduced in Congress by a representative from Ohio. It is the same spirit which prompts the efforts to regulate personal conduct by Sunday laws. The New York Christian Advocate takes note of this proposed measure and makes the following pertinent comments thereon, under the head "Microscopic Legislation":—

"A representative from the State of Ohio has introduced a bill in the Legislature, which seeks to prescribe who shall and who shall not marry. The measure provides for a State Board of three managers, to be appointed by the Government, and a member in each county appointed by the Probate Court. Under this bill, if it becomes a law, the parties who make application for a marriage license will be required to submit to a physical and mental examination by the board of the county in which they live. The examination will touch the following subjects: Strong tendencies of the applicants to hereditary insanity, habitual drunkenness, criminal record, tendency toward crime or a liability to inherit a criminal inclination, imbecility, mental or physical constitutional diseases that might be transmitted to the progeny, skin, blood diseases, etc. The presence of any of these diseases, or the discovery of hereditary liability to them, will bar the applicant from the right to marry.

"Is not this list somewhat defective? Should there not be a careful examination as to whether there is any strong hereditary tendency to Protestantism, Roman Catholicism, or Mormonism; whether there is a tendency in the family to borrow money without any probability of paying it; whether any person stutters or stammers, or any of the family for three generations has done so? Is it not desirable that the County Board should decide whether the family has an hereditary tendency to what is known as 'quick temper' or 'to answer back'; whether the persons applying have come of a family using tobacco or excessively inclined to drink strong coffee or tea, and it might be well to add, whether the pedigree craze has struck them? And as it is well known that snoring and also a bad breath have separated thousands of ardent lovers and produced no end of domestic trouble, the board should be instructed to pay special attention to both these things. Some provision also should be made to examine the board, for it is obvious that if any member of it has 'a liability to inherit a criminal inclination,' he would be prejudiced and might corrupt the rest of the board, and forbid a worthy person to marry on account of the prejudices of those interested to secure a denial of the application."

IN lamenting the loss of the "Puritan Sabbath" Dr. Leonard Woolsey Bacon truly says:—

"The law of the Westminster divines on this subject, it may be affirmed without fear of contradiction from any quarter, does not coincide in its language with the law of God as expressed either in the Old Testament or in the New. The Westminster rule requires, as if with a 'Thus saith the Lord,' that on the first day of the week, instead of the seventh, men shall desist not only from labor, but from recreation, and spend the whole time in the public and private exercises of God's worship, except so much as is to be taken up in the works of necessity and mercy. Westminster Shorter Catechism, Ans. 60. This interpretation and expansion of the fourth commandment has never attained to more than a sectarian and provincial authority; but the over-mastering Puritan influence, both of Virginia and New England, combined with the Scotch Irish influence, made it for a long time dominant in America."

It is high time that a religious thing that has no authority either in the Old Testament or the New, and which rested only upon overmastering Puritan influence, were repudiated forever. Such a thing deserves only to be lost forever.

The Plainfield Sunday Ordinance Analyzed.

THE impropriety and injustice of the Plainfield, N. J., Sunday-closing ordinance, under which a crusade is now being conducted, is well set forth in the following contributed by Dr. A. H. Lewis, a prominent Seventh-day Baptist of that place, to a Plainfield journal:—

"Since the city of Plainfield has announced its determination to stop all Sunday selling, it will be well to get a correct idea of the situation. Carbone's case is the first under the ordinance, and as it is to go to the Supreme Court for review, much may be involved. The ordinance under consideration is eminently religious. It makes two or more distinct religious tests. It forbids nothing which is criminal in itself. The acts prohibited are necessary and commendable on all days except Sunday. According to the ordinance when the clock strikes twelve, and Sunday comes into legal existence, time is sacred and selling is criminal. Thus, certain particular twenty-four hours in each week are sanctified by the city of Plainfield and 'secular' business becomes a crime. When the clock strikes twelve twenty-four hours later, time is no longer sacred and men may resume secular affairs without fear of punishment. The ordinance creates crime and inflicts punishment on the basis of a legally sacred period of time.

"Next, it creates an arbitrary standard of righteousness by declaring that the man who chooses to regard another twenty-four hours in each week as sacred time, for reasons other than the ordinance, shall not be a criminal. It goes farther still. This interpretation declares that he who Sabbathizes at a time not designated by the city must do so from pure religious motives and not 'for revenue only.'

"Carbone is now condemned because he is not religious enough to be a legal Sabbath keeper. But since the ordinance has not been fully tested no accurate standard of religiousness has been laid down by the city, and that duty is forced upon the jury. It is a delicate duty.

"It is in evidence that Carbone has outwardly Sabbathized according to the law. But twelve men have determined that he has not added to this outward observance sufficient pureness of motive, to be entitled to exemption under the religious provisions of the ordinance. If it was criminal in Carbone to sell gum on Sunday because he had not religiously complied with the law, how about the other parties in the criminal act who purchased on Sunday in the ordinance 'secular' way without any pretence of Sabbathizing on the previous day?"

It is hardly necessary to add that all Sunday-closing ordinances are essentially the same in character.

Is He a Good Citizen?

THE following conversation occurred near this place a short time ago between two intelligent persons—one an Infidel and the other a Catholic—which is worthy of more than passing notice:—

Catholic.—"Old Boozle Jim is most always drunk; he is a poor citizen."

Infidel.—"Yes, John, I would hesitate to call a drunkard a good citizen."

C.—"By the way, Harry, what do you think of the citizenship of a good Roman Catholic; of course, you know there are some bad Catholics who cannot be taken into account."

I.—"Well, I think a bad Catholic, that is, in the eyes of the Roman Catholic Church, is a good, or at least a better citizen of the United States than a good Roman Catholic."

C.—"What makes you think so, Harry?"

I.—"I have so far failed to see how a man obeying the dictates of a foreign potentate, can be a good citizen of any nation, for that matter."

C.—"But have Catholics not done much to build up the welfare of the United States?"

I.—"A favorite maxim of the Roman Church is, 'The end justifies the means;' if that was not the principle ruling in this case, it was probably because these Catholic philanthropists were more liberal in their views."

C.—"But they were in good standing, I assure you."

I.—"John, will you answer me a few questions honestly?"

C.—"Certainly, Harry."

I.—"Supposing an election to be held between two political factions, say in three months hence; the platform of the first party being to the interests of the Catholic Church, but inimical to the welfare of the United States, whereas the platform of the second party is just the reverse—inimical to the Catholic Church, but for the welfare of the nation. Now, the pope hearing how matters stand, issues a 'bull,' causing it to be read in all the American churches, forbidding all loyal members to vote for the party who, on coming into power, would work against the church, and commanding all to vote for the party whose platform is in the interests of the Catholic Church, but inimical to the national welfare; would you obey?"

C.—"Yes; and every good Catholic would obey; for we should by right obey the holy father."

I.—"Yes, John; but a good citizen seeks the welfare of his nation; but if Catholics do as you say, they work against the welfare of the nation, and are therefore not good citizens, but traitors. Why, according to your testimony, Catholics would betray this nation if it would benefit their church. How can a traitor be a good citizen?"

C.—"They are good citizens because they are subject to the higher powers. The pope is higher than any nation composed mainly of heretics; and when we get contro—"

(Exits quickly in anger.)

I.—(Calling after) "John, you are a good citizen of Rome, but an alien in the United States."

Sunday and Tradition.

"Sabbath Recorder."

ONE of the most open avowals of the decay of faith in the sacredness of Sunday, on the part of Baptist leaders, is found in the records of the Baptist Congress held in Detroit, Mich., in 1894. A prominent theme in that gathering was this: "Tradition as a Formative Force in Baptist Doctrine and Church Life." Five prominent Baptists took part in the discussion of this theme. It goes without saying that such a theme must induce a consideration of the Sunday question. Rev. Augustine S. Carman said: "It is doubtful whether, if we were left to the scanty indications of the New Testament alone, unaided by the light thrown on the New Testament from subsequent times, we should have been able to arrive at that observance of the Lord's day, which has been the priceless possession of Christendom. At any rate we owe a large debt to tradition for facts which aid us in the interpretation of the scanty intimations of Scripture on this subject."

Rev. Levi D. Temple made a full surrender of the Sunday to tradition. He declared that tradition was the source of the introduction of the Sunday into the Baptist creed. It had been placed in their Standards like the "Philadelphia Confession," dating from 1784, without biblical support. He averred that the Baptist creed which claimed that Sunday has taken the place of the Sabbath

"has almost as little justification in the teachings of Christ and the apostles as the itinerancy of the clergy, or the Catholic doctrine of confession and absolution."

Doctor A. S. Hobart said that if Baptists give up tradition as a source of authority they must give up worship on Sunday, to begin with. Here is a representative sentence from Dr. Hobart: "I tell you, you may stand up in any pulpit in the land and quote the Bible, and it won't make any impression at all toward changing the practice of the church, for they would say grandpa did it that way, and it is good enough for us."

These men told the truth. Sunday has no ground except tradition.

Let Them Be "Non-Sectarian."

THE Roman Catholics, it is said, are calling for more Catholic chaplains in the navy. There are in the navy twenty-four chaplains, and only three of these are Roman Catholics. We believe the proportion is not far different in the army.

The Presbyterian Synod in Pennsylvania are petitioning Congress for an increase of military chaplains. Do they want an increase of Catholic chaplains? This can hardly be. Yet it would seem that the Catholics can reasonably claim to be favored in this respect, if any increase is to be made at all. Is there no preference among other denominations as regards the particular religious source from which such an increase shall be made? Are the Presbyterians willing that the new chaplains shall be all Episcopalians, or Methodists, or Catholics, or Baptists? These are questions that should be considered before Congress is asked to increase the number.

The Catholics, it is said, in this instance are trying to make capital out of the services rendered by the Catholic chaplain on the "Maine" on the occasion of the great disaster in Havana harbor. Other denominations frown on this action, but it rests upon just as good principle as does the appointment of chaplains by the Government at all.

We would suggest that if any increase is to be made, as prayed for by the Catholics and the Presbyterians, in order to avoid stirring up denominational strife, such chaplains be chosen as are strictly "non-sectarian"!

The Observance of Easter.

A DISCREPANCY IN COMPUTING THE DATE.

"THE observance of Easter dates back to about the year 68, at which time there was much contention among the Eastern and Western churches as to what day the festival should be observed. It was finally ordained at the Council of Nice in the year 325 that it must be observed throughout the Christian world on the same day. This decision settled that Easter should be kept upon the Sunday first after the fourteenth day of the first Jewish month, but no general conclusion was arrived at as to the cycle by which the festival was to be regulated, and some churches adopted one rule and some another. This diversity of usage was put an end to, and the Roman rule making Easter the first Sunday after the fourteenth day of the calendar moon was established in England in 669. After nine centuries a discrepancy in the keeping of Easter was caused by the authorities of the English Church declining to adopt the reformation of the Gregorian calendar in 1582. The difference was settled in 1752 by the adoption of the rule which makes Easter day always the first Sunday after the full moon which appears on or next after the twenty-first day of March. If the full moon happens upon a Sunday, Easter is the Sunday after."—April Ladies' Home Journal.

Sunday Crusade in Kansas City, Mo.

"Chicago Inter-Ocean."

KANSAS CITY, Mo., March 22.—The ministers of Kansas City, under the leadership of Dr. W. A. Quayle, of the Independence Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, have declared war on Sunday baseball and theaters, and promise to have both abolished within a few weeks. The first move was the circulation of a petition to the city council asking for a stringent Sunday ordinance, and this will be followed by bringing every possible influence to bear toward the passage of such an ordinance. It is hoped to induce the Civic federation to take the matter up. "We do not want to boss the city, and do not think regulating the government is the mission of the church," said Dr. Quayle to-day. "Sunday theaters and baseball have been abolished in New York, Buffalo, and Indianapolis, among other places, and Easterners are shocked and scandalized when they come out here and find everything open."

ROMAN CATHOLICS of Corning, N. Y., are incensed by a decision received from Superintendent of Public Instruction Skinner, prohibiting the Sisters of Mercy in St. Mary's School, which is one of the public schools, from wearing their religious garb during school hours. There can be no reason why a religious garb should be worn by instructors in the public schools. The desire for such a thing can be prompted only by a desire to utilize the public schools for sectarian purposes.

THE Bishop of London recently expressed his mind on the point of the propriety of the term "Christian" as applied to nations and countries. He said:—

"There is no Christian country in the world. Because a certain number of persons are Christians, it does not follow that the country deserves the title. England is not a Christian country."

There is scarcely anything better calculated to lower Christianity in the eyes of the world than the idea that the nations of earth, with all their quarreling and greediness, and their expenditure of time and money in getting ready to fight each other, are Christian.

Studies in French History.—17.

"Look here, Edna," said Will Barnaby, on their way home from school, "how in the world do you manage to remember facts in history so well—dates and things—that are important, you know? I never could, and I just try and try like a good fellow, but they will slip away from me," he added ruefully.

"Well, Will," said Edna, smiling, "I presume my memory is my strong point, but I do make lots of awful blunders; but I'll tell you what helps me more than anything else, it's talking the thing over that I want to remember, you see. We talk about the things professor tells us when I get home."

"That's a good idea!" exclaimed Will. "I guess we'll try it over at our house."

Will studied every history he could find, through the week, and he gathered a considerable amount of information about the destruction of the Knights Templars, so on the next Tuesday afternoon, at the request of Professor Carman, he arose and read:—

"As near as I can make out, King Philip IV. used a great deal of meanness and deceit in this cruel massacre of the Templars. He sent word to the grand master to come over to France and unite with him in preparing to begin another crusade. But the deceitful king had no intention of waging another 'holy war,' as they were called, and one day after the grand master had got over to France, the king gave the word, and every Templar in the kingdom was forced into prison. Then they were tortured to make them own up to things they never did at all. Of course they were bad enough, but they didn't like to admit doing things they were not guilty of doing.

"But the cruel king was on their track like a bloodhound, and it didn't make a bit of odds to him whether they confessed or not, fifty-four of them had to die at the stake, and Philip took possession of their temple, where were immense stores of wealth. Finally after a few years, Pope Clement abolished the entire society, and the king took a large share of the private valuables of those who had been killed. It was a common story in France, for a long time, that the grand master prophesied while burning at the stake, that both the king and Pope Clement would die within a year. Whether this story is true or not, the fact is that these two wicked men did die very soon after.'

"This is all I had time to write, professor," said Will, taking his seat.

"You have certainly brought out a great many facts regarding the abolishing of the Knights," said the teacher, as Will folded his manuscript. "You must have given the subject careful thought and study. I think you will find the practice of writing your thoughts a good and helpful one.

"Well, at last Philip IV. died, and his three sons, Louis X., the Quarreler; Philip V., the Long; and Charles IV., the Fair, one after the other ascended the throne. But as none of these sons happened to have any boys in their family, the kingdom passed over into the hands of Philip VI., of Valois. He was a nephew of Philip IV., the Fair."

"Didn't Philip IV. have any daughters?" asked Will Palmeter, "it seems as if I read that he did."

"O yes; his daughter Isabella married the king of England, Edward II."

"Why didn't she take the throne after her brothers died?" asked Florence Ray, raising her hand.

"Because of a certain law of France, which forbade a woman's aspiring to such a position.

"I wonder if that was what Aunt Eunice meant, this morning, when she spoke of the 'Salique law.' I intended to ask her what she meant, but it slipped my mind," said Julia March.

"I presume it may have been, at least that is what the law of which I was speaking, was called. During the reign of these three kings, the people were reduced to a state of great wretchedness and poverty; for the barons were very busy getting back their rights as they called them, which during the life of Philip IV., had been denied them. So, of course, this meant trouble for the poorer people.

"There was a class of miserable fellows called Lepers, who were falsely accused of poisoning people's wells. So these poor creatures were caught and burned alive; in fact, history says they were burned 'by hundreds.' Then it was reported that the Jews were in league with the Lepers. This was enough. They were not even allowed a trial. Once there was a large, deep hole dug in the ground, and the cruel Frenchmen threw one hundred and sixty Jews of all ages and both sexes into it, having first lighted a fire at the bottom. But the richer ones were kept in prison long enough for the king to take their property. Then they were taken from prison and sent out of the country."

"What! Were the poor fellows not allowed to live at home even when they had become poor men for the sake of the king?" said Robert Billings.

"No, Robert; people were very selfish in those days as well as now, and kings were no exception to the rule.

"Next week we will learn something of French history during the fourteenth century, when the unfortunate family of Valois first took the throne.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

We have just received the following from one of our subscribers in Meridan, Miss.: "I would live on half rations before I would do without the SENTINEL."

IN answer to our letter of March 24, Amos Reiff, of Esterlys, Pa., says:—"I have tried your SENTINEL three months, and am pleased with it. Enclosed find one dollar, which please place to my credit."

E. K. CASSELL, Catskill, N. Mex., sends us in an order for one year to a friend, and says of the SENTINEL: "I appreciate your visits very much, and I think you rightly deserve the name you bear."

Some Good New Tracts.

Apples of Gold Library, No. 48, is entitled, "Try the Spirits," and is written by L. A. Phippeny, 8 pages, price ½ cent.

"Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God" is the groundwork of this study. That these "spirits" are real personalities, possessing more than human power and intelligence, that they are ever 'round about' us, intently engaged in the battle of good and evil, that we as human beings constitute their field of battle, are all clearly demonstrated. New and valuable thoughts are advanced—thoughts deserving of the most careful consideration.

Bible Students Library, No. 151, "Christian Demand for War. A striking object lesson. By Dr. E. J. Waggoner, illustrated, 16 pages, 1 cent.

"In God's name let us raise an army and . . . sweep the old murderer and all his tribe into the sea," says one correspondent in a leading religious journal, referring to the Turks. Dr. Waggoner quotes such utterances because they indicate the "Christian" sentiment which is really consecrating the spirit of war. He asks those holding such sentiments, "When the name of Christ the Prince of Peace is used as a war cry, where shall we look for peace on the earth?" It contains some of the most powerful arguments against the use of force by Christians that we have ever read, and if widely distributed will awaken people to the iniquity of the principle involved. One of the illustrations is found on the cover page, and shows the Mosque of Omar where thousands of the Saracens met death at the hands of the "Christian" crusaders.

Bible Students Library, No. 152, "The Alarm of War." By Eld. A. O. Tait. Fully illustrated, 32 pages, price 2 cents.

"The alarm of war" is continuously sounding from some part of the world. Every few days the papers tell of new inventions or improvements in the weapons of war. Already the powerful cannon and torpedoes, the rapid fire and machine guns, along with all the other modern devices for killing men by the wholesale, are causing the questions to be anxiously asked, What are we coming to any way? Will the nations rush into war armed with these terribly destructive implements? What does it all mean?

These preparations are shown to be one of the signs of the end, and a fulfillment of prophecy. A series of vivid illustrations is an attractive feature and will gain the tract many readers. Every one is interested in, and will read on, this subject. Let us give them a chance.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, APRIL 14, 1898.

THERE is nothing certain about the present warlike outlook except the absolute uncertainty of what may come if war ensues.

SPAIN, with the assistance of the pope, has been making a desperate effort to gain the sympathy and support of the powers of Europe. If the effort succeeds, it means trouble ahead for the United States. The nation's chief enemy in Europe is not on Spanish soil.

"WE want no 'glove contests,'—no, indeed. What we want is war with Spain. It is a disgrace to permit a combat in which so little blood is shed and nobody is likely to be killed!" Does not this fairly represent the consistency of very many people in this country?

IF Havana is bombarded by the American fleet assembled at Key West, the spectacle will be such as has never before been witnessed in the history of the world. Never before have such terrible agencies as are now controlled by the nations, been let loose for a work of death and destruction.

THE Archbishop of Breslau, Cardinal Kopp, says a London journal, has gone to Rome, charged with a confidential mission to the pope from the German emperor. It is stated that this mission is for the purpose of arranging for concessions from the German government to the papacy in return for papal support of the emperor's naval bill in the Reichstag.

A CORRESPONDENT who takes exception to the work of the SENTINEL as tending to destroy the Sabbath, says that it is "better to have a Sabbath kept sacredly by a whole nation than to have several days," which would prevent any "sacred day of rest." This suggests the query whether it would not be better to have one god worshiped piously by the people than to have several gods. In reply it may be said, Yes, provided it be the true one. A false sabbath is just as bad as a false god. And as for keeping a day sacredly, the only day that can be so kept is the day that God has made sacred—the seventh day. God alone—not man—has power to make anything sacred.

THE assistant attorney-general of Kansas has decided that "divine healers" in that State are exempt from prosecution as quack doctors, on the ground that the deity, who is claimed to be the agent in such healing, is not subject to Kansas law. Divine healing is plainly taught in the Scriptures, and the right of any person to believe in it, and to act upon such belief, is as unquestioned as the right to believe in God.

A MAN in Georgia, the editor of the Lakewood Commercial, it is said, is actually going to run for public office on a platform advocating lynching as practiced in that and other sections of the South. In other words, he will bid for political support upon a platform of open lawlessness; for of course there is no law in any State which justifies mob law. If mob rule is the best way of protecting life and property, then all law would better be abolished.

FOR a fortnight past the daily press of the country has shown a wonderful capacity for criticism of the President and the Administration in general, and should there be war it will no doubt be found, as it was in the conflict between North and South, that the ablest(?) military commanders have been left at home to edit the newspapers. But the standard of reliability and accuracy to which the modern newspaper editor conforms would not very well suit the purposes of a military campaign.

SPEAKING of the attitude of the European powers in the Spanish-American crisis, the New York Sun of the 18th inst. says: "It is utopian and practically incredible, in the estimation of Continental diplomacy, that any nation should perform a stern and unwelcome duty to humanity involving serious sacrifices, when the reason for that duty is outside its own borders." In other words, the powers cannot conceive of a nation's acting from any other than purely selfish motives. And this is true of those nations which have a state church, and are commonly spoken of as being "Christian"!

SOME clergymen of Kansas City, Mo., having started a crusade against Sunday theaters and baseball, their leader, Rev. Mr. Quayle, explains that "We do not want to boss the city, and do not think regulating the government is the business of the church." Somehow it is usually deemed necessary in connection with these crusades, to say something to try to twist the public mind out of the channel of its natural thought; the natural conclusion in the matter being what the statement is made to deny.

THERE can be no better reading for these days of unrest, confusion, and "rumors of war," than is afforded by The Story of Redemption. This is the title of a handsomely-bound and illustrated book just issued by the Pacific Press Pub. Co., which tells the story of divine love and wisdom as manifested in human history from the fall of man down to the present, and onward to the coming restoration. The style is simple, clear, and entertaining, and priceless gems from the mines of sacred truth are made to sparkle throughout its pages. It is not designed as a substitute for the Scriptures, but as an incentive and aid to their study. A suitable present for young or old. Address Pacific Press Pub. Co., 39 Bond St., New York City.

WILL some one please enlighten us as to what connection there is between the resurrection of Christ and the Easter bonnet.

ONLY the power of God can enforce the law of God.

THE law of man lays hold on the sinner; but the gospel lays hold on the sin.

THERE is no consistency in taking your religion from one source, and your politics from another.

AN effort to force the world to conform to the church always results in conforming the church to the world.

WHAT the church needs to-day is not Sunday laws, but something to separate her more clearly from the world.

THE effectiveness of human law depends altogether upon public sentiment. The effectiveness of the divine law is altogether independent of public sentiment.

IT is better for the worldly man to be engaged in honest work on the Sabbath, or in innocent recreation, than to be going through the forms of Sabbath-keeping.

IF the apostles had turned from the preaching of reform through faith in Christ, to the preaching of political or legislative reforms, the world would have been sunk in evil long ago.

THE mightiest power in the universe is the power of God; and the mightiest manifestation of God's power is in the gospel. The gospel is the power of God against sin; and that power alone can overcome the evil that is in the world.

It is better to lean upon God than upon a Sunday law. He who leans upon God does not need any other support; and he who does not lean upon God will fall in spite of all the support that religious legislation can furnish.

IT is entirely useless for Christians to try to compel the world, by the force of law, to act in an unworldly manner. The unregenerate person must act out the nature that he has, until by the grace of God he is given another and better one.

A Groundless Apprehension.

A NEW ORLEANS paper makes note of an effort made during the Louisiana Constitutional Convention just closed, to eliminate from the Constitution the recognition of Sunday as a sacred day, and calls it "an outrageous proposition." It would be a terrible thing, in its view, if the restraints of the Sunday laws were removed, and people permitted to engage in worldly occupations on that day as on any other.

It is quite natural for religious people in states which have long maintained a Sunday law to hold this view, even though, as in New Orleans, the law has long been practically a dead letter. It seems to them that the removal of such a law would be the opening of the flood-gates of secularism, which would result in sweeping away the Sabbath altogether. But really, there is no foundation at all for this apprehension.

It may be that the removal of Sunday laws would result in an increase of Sunday business and of Sunday amusements. Very well, we say; suppose that it does. If people want to be worldly on the Sabbath (which however is not Sunday), if that is their nature and desire, let them be so. Let the world conduct itself after the manner of the world. How else could it be expected to act? It is only people who want to be worldly—people who could not keep the Sabbath anyway without a change of heart—who will not want to rest on the Sabbath.

All this will not affect the church; at least, there is no reason why it should. The church is in the world, surrounded by worldliness in every form; yet she is not to be of the world. The world is the proper place for the church, under the present constitution of things, just as the water is the proper place for a ship; but the world need not get into the church, any more than the water need get into a ship; indeed, the world can always be kept out of the church if the church so wills it. Sometimes water gets into a ship by unavoidable accident; but the church must first voluntarily open its doors to the world before the world can get into it.

Let people of the world, then, go about their worldly pursuits on the Sabbath, as on any day, and let the church spend the day in rest and the worship of God. This very thing would do much to mark a distinction between the church and the world. The great trouble with the church to-day is that this distinction is not plainly marked. The friends of the world know it is not, and the enemies of religion know it is not; and this is why the church to day has so little influence over them. And the reason it is not plainly marked is that hardly any distinction exists. In endeavoring to conform the world to the church by non-scriptural methods, the church has become very largely conformed to the world. And a Sunday law is one method—and not by any means the least—by which this conformity has been accomplished.

A Sunday law tends always to conform the church to the world.

The government—the state—is of the world. And it must always be of the world, for it is that into which every worldly element enters. The government cannot rise to the level of Christianity; but the Christian church can descend to the level of the world (of course losing her Christianity in the process). And when the government enacts a Sunday law, and compels the world to conform to it, the only effect is to obliterate, in part at least, the distinction between the church and the world. But that distinction ought not to be obliterated; it ought to be much sharper than it is.

When the church joins with the government in this (as she has done in every case, being always the foremost advocate of such laws), she simply joins with the world, and trails the banner of godliness in the dust.

There is a class of people in the country who do not observe the popular rest day, but keep the seventh day instead; and of all classes of religious people, none are more marked as being separate and distinct from the world. And nothing more plainly marks them in this way than their observance of the seventh day as a day of rest and worship, while all the world around them is engaged in its accustomed secular pursuits.

No one tries to force the world into conformity with this people. No law exists or ever existed—of an earthly sort—to curtail worldly business or amusements in any degree upon their day of rest. Yet their Sabbath is not overwhelmed and lost by all this secularism. The flood is beneath it, and can no more overwhelm it than the flood of water could overwhelm the ark.

Let Sunday laws be removed from the statute books everywhere, and the result will be for the good of the church and of all men. Let the church address her petitions to God and not to the state, and the fading line of demarkation between the church and the world will become much more clear and distinct.

For some reason this “Christian nation” shows no disposition to “turn the other cheek” to Spain; but is getting ready to do something quite different.

Sunday Laws and Sabbath Keeping.

In behalf of Sunday laws it is said that “Sabbath-keeping develops and strengthens the religious nature, and fosters reverence for God and his revealed truth, which is the basis of all well-being and prosperity.”

This is true, if it be God’s Sabbath that is kept, and it be kept in God’s appointed way. But how is it as regards the sabbath-keeping which is secured by Sunday laws?

Does a Sunday law develop and strengthen the religious nature? How is that nature strengthened? Is it not by faith in God? All must admit that it is; but what has a Sunday law to do with faith? What has the aid of the civil power to do with faith? Is not the act of seeking for and depending upon such aid the very opposite of faith in God?

“Thus saith the Lord: Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. For he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh; but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited.” Jer. 17:5,6. Thus has God answered those who would put their dependence upon an earthly power.

On the other hand, how is it with those who do the opposite? We read further in this chapter: “Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is. For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river, and shall not see when heat cometh, but her leaf shall be green, and shall not be careful in the year of drouth, neither shall cease from yielding fruit.”

This is the kind of experience that “develops and strengthens the religious nature”; and it comes altogether from faith in God. Faith in God is trust in God; and trust in the arm of flesh is the opposite of trust in God. It is the opposite of faith.

Can it be said, either, that Sunday laws “foster reverence for God and his revealed truth”? Do they call attention to God at all? The law calls attention to the legislative body which enacts it. A human Sabbath law, therefore, calls the attention of the people away from God to a human power as the source of authority in Sabbath observance; and this does not foster reverence for God, but the very opposite. God is the only authority for Sabbath observance, and he alone can rightfully be recognized in such a matter. Any other "authority" is self-constituted, and a daring usurper of the prerogative of Heaven.

And what have Sunday laws to do with fostering regard for God's "revealed truth"? What Sunday law ever called attention to God's truth? It is the very absence of such truth from the foundation of that institution which prompts its adherents to seek a declaration from an earthly power. It is the absence of any divine law in support of the day that calls for support from the laws of men.

For the very reason, therefore, that "Sabbath-keeping develops and strengthens the religious nature and fosters reverence for God and his revealed truth," no human law ought ever to intrude itself into the matter of Sabbath observance. A human law in the domain of religion can only act as a barrier between man and his God.

"THE meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

The Pope Is Grieved.

DISPATCHES from Rome state that the pope is "deeply grieved" by the apparent failure of his efforts to mediate between this country and Spain. In view of the prospect that war cannot be averted, he is reported to have said:—

"I have prayed to God with the whole force of my being, with the deepest fervor, to avert war, and not to allow my pontificate to end amid the smoke of battle. Otherwise, I have implored the Almighty to take me to himself that I may not behold such a sight."

The pope has a deep horror of the "smoke of battle," and the "sight" of fighting, when Spain is opposed to a formidable nation. But what about the smoke of battle that has for three years been hanging over the island of Cuba, and the starving of innocent women and children by the hundred thousand, which has been in progress ever since Weyler's order of concentration? Has he felt any horror over these? If he has, he has not expressed it.

The scenes which have been enacted in Cuba under the Spanish arms—arms to which, by the way, the pope has given his blessing—are far worse than any that are likely to attend a conflict between Spain and the United States.

If only the Roman pontiff could succeed in preserving peace between two great "Christian" nations, what a prestige would be given the papacy in the eyes of the world, and what a basis would be afforded for asking concessions to the papacy from the United States! No wonder "his holiness" is deeply grieved over his failure.

Natural Rights and the "Common Good."

THERE is no more fallacious theory extant than that which is embodied in the common idea that natural rights must be limited by law in order to promote the "common good."

Natural rights are the rights given to man by the Creator. They are neither more nor less than what the Creator made them. To say that they need to be clipped and pruned down to meet the requirements of a successful life, is to reflect upon the wisdom of the Creator.

Rights were given to the individual for his good. Among man's "inalienable rights" the Declaration of Independence enumerates "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." The more of these things an individual has, the better off he is, and the more of prosperity does he enjoy. And the more individuals there are of this kind in the community, the more prosperity and happiness is there in the community.

What, on the other hand, is the "common good"? It is a very indefinite term. Each person defines it to suit himself. Governments define it to suit themselves. Over in Russia it is declared to be for the "common good" that the little children of heretical parents should be taken from their homes and sent away to be brought up in the orthodox "faith." In Peru, until recently, it was considered to be for the common good that no Protestant marriage ceremonies should be recognized as valid by the state. In Spain it was for the common good that Protestants should not be allowed to worship in church buildings. The list of instances in which personal rights have been invaded under the plea of the "common good," might be extended indefinitely.

How are these things decided to be for the common good? Oh, it is by the decision of the majority, at least of those in power. And this is the way the question is always decided; this is the way it is proposed to decide the question to day, and the only way in which civil government can consider it, in this country at least. A natural right, therefore, as limited by the "common good," is simply such a privilege as the majority may see fit to grant. And this would take the matter out of the hands of the Creator entirely. It would leave no force to the term "natural" right at all. For what a person is allowed to have by the majority, cannot be his by nature—by birth.

And for what purpose is this limitation sought to be put upon natural rights? A quotation from the recent hearing on the Sunday bills before the Massachusetts legislature will explain. A speaker in behalf of the bills said:—

"When we speak of natural rights it must be with limitations. Natural rights of the individual in the community are subordinate to the common good. Sabbath laws have been proved to be for the common good."

Natural rights are sought to be curtailed in the interests of Sunday laws. Sunday laws are a denial of natural rights, and this is instinctively recognized by the advocates of such laws in the pleas made for their enactment. It is in behalf of religious legislation that natural rights are most commonly curtailed, in all countries. The two are antagonistic; and when one prevails, the other must give way.

This is not saying that the common good does not require that limitations should be set to individual freedom of action. It is not saying that an individual has liberty to do as he pleases. But we are not speaking of what an individual may please to do, but of what he has a natural right to do. He has no natural right to do anything that would conflict with the rights of his neighbor. Rights do not conflict. Any individual in the world may freely exercise the natural rights with which the Creator has endowed him, without interfering with the like exercise on the part of any other person.

Natural rights lie at the foundation of all proper legislation and government. Neither individuals nor governments may rightfully invade them. They no more justify wrong doing under the plea of "conscience," than under the plea that might makes right. Test all governmental measures by the touchstone of natural rights, and let it be remembered that natural rights are always individual rights. In this way secure the good of all individuals, and the common good will take care of itself.

"THE wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest; whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

The Church in Politics.

It was Christ, the founder of Christianity, who said, "My kingdom is not of this world."

It was the Apostle Paul who declared, "I am determined to know nothing among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified."

There are two kingdoms in this world, the visible and the invisible—the church and the state. Christ is the head of one, Cæsar is the head of the other. One is ruled by force, the other by love. One takes cognizance of the overt acts of man only, while the other goes beyond and judges the thoughts and intents of the heart. The one is of earth, the other of heaven.

There is a clear dividing line between the two, across which Christ taught that neither should go.

It is a sad fact, however, that this command has for the most part been disregarded by those who have been called to the exalted work of the gospel commission. They have dabbled in state matters, and through this intermingling the Christianity of its Founder has been trailed in the dust.

Rev. S. G. Smith, one of the leading ministers of Minneapolis, Minn., evidently does not fall in line with the 'church in politics' idea that is nowadays so prevalent.

In a late issue of the Minneapolis Times, he is reported as saying in a sermon:—

"Grant, for the sake of argument, that the churches, if they combine, can put down the saloon; that they can put down the social evil, that they can put down many other evils which, perhaps, they cannot in fact. But grant that they can, and when they have accomplished one of these reforms, it will be like the first taste of blood to the carnivorous. The tongue of cunning and the hand of greed will make use of them, as they have in the past, wherever the church and the state have intermingled. Whenever the church knows and others know it has such a power, bad men will use it to further their own ends. The pirates will board the ship of God."

He is right, and all the history of the past is but a monument of proof to the truthfulness of his assertions.

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee."

ONE of the leading pastors of the city of New York is reported as having said in a sermon that if war must come between Spain and the United States, "It should be a war for humanity, a war for truth, a war for God. It should be in a real sense, a holy war."

Many people think that Spain has not got beyond the Dark Ages in her conceptions of humanity. And the words of many preachers of these days show very plainly that they have not got beyond the Dark Ages in their conceptions of Christianity.

Think of making war for the God of peace! Think of destroying men for the Saviour! Think of making in a real sense, a holy war!

Until such men obtain better ideas of Christianity, it will be to very little purpose that they denounce the Spaniards' low ideas of humanity.

Thinking vs. Knowing.

BY E. J. WAGGONER.

How often we read with reference to something pertaining to the Bible and religion, "Dr. — thinks that this is," etc., and what the doctor thinks is then by many considered as final, until he "thinks" again, or until somebody else "thinks" something else.

"Then you would have us ignore the opinions and ideas of other men, and each one simply follow his own thoughts." Not by any means; our own thoughts are no better than other people's, and often not so good. I would have you follow, not what you or somebody thinks, but what you know. When you absolutely know a certain thing, you accept it not on anybody's authority, but for its own sake. Then you are sure of where you stand.

"Ah, but what conceit for a man to assume that he knows the truth in a case where more learned men confess their ignorance." Yes, indeed it is, if you assume that you know the truth. Don't assume anything, and when you are not sure that you know, don't be ashamed to say that you don't know. But what is there strange in a person's knowing what the Lord tells him, and in being sure that he knows it? In such a case it is sin not to know. Jesus says, "If ye continue in my word, . . . ye shall know the truth." The Word of God is sure, and whoever believes it may be sure.

"LET the peace of God rule in your hearts."

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

THE power of the drink appetite was yet to be discovered. As long as its cry had been answered, no one dreamed of its resources of torture, but soon after that pledge-signing period of our work we had a sudden and rude awakening. The men who had pledged themselves in the most solemn manner never again to touch, taste, or handle the accursed thing, were seen staggering, drunk, on the streets, and in and out of the saloons, just as before. We looked on, amazed, long enough to satisfy ourselves that we were not suffering from optical illusion, and then hastened to our places of prayer to inquire of the Lord what this could all mean.

In the process of the investigation we learned the depths of iniquity in which the liquor business had its root. First of all was that terrible physiological effect of drink on the human structure, which made its victim an easy prey to the tempter who would stop at nothing to gain his end—and for which we in our ignorance were wholly unprepared. It was not possible for us to imagine the diabolical means which were to be employed to undo our work.

The drinking water tanks at Temperance headquarters were not infrequently "doctored" with whiskey for the purpose of setting on fire the smouldering craze for drink in the man struggling to be free. The side-walks in front of saloons were sprinkled with saw-dust, which had been wetted down with "forty-rod whiskey;" this steaming up, and loading the atmosphere with poison, was a death-trap to any man with the appetite still lurking in his breast. In one instance which I know personally, a quantity of the same vile stuff was thrown splashing into the regular prayer-meeting of a church to which one of these pledged men had united himself. It was well known that the odor of strong drink made him powerless to resist, and it was also known that he never missed a prayer-meeting; so the enemy supposed that he was almost sure of his victim, and what a victory it would be to be sure to drag this man by that subtle cord, a depraved appetite, back into his old haunts again, right out of the bosom of the church.

The enemy knew his power, but he did not know the power of Christ in hearts that were filled with divine sympathy for a tempted man, and after making such an effort to get possession of the poor, struggling soul, the perpetrator of the deed had to stand at his saloon door and see the man for whom he had stooped so low, surrounded by a cordon of faithful Christian brothers, walk safely past, and so escape to his home.

The temperance work took on a very serious aspect in view of these facts, and we said one to another: "The saloon must be destroyed. It is still a question of faith and prayer toward man and God. We know that God is with us, but it is evident that we have not yet found the right men; there is some reason why neither saloon keepers nor drinking men can close out the liquor business. We must turn to the men who have the power to say what shall or shall not be in the village, the city, the state, and the nation."

This brought us to the petitioning period of our work. We drafted memorials to village boards, city councils, to state legislatures, praying in the name of God, of suffering women and children, and of tempted men, that no more saloons should be licensed to sell intoxicating liquors.

These petitions were presented in person. Solemn preparations were made for these visits to the august bodies of law makers, and our hearts were opened to them as only the most urgent necessities could have opened them. The appeals that were made by mothers with growing boys were such as to bring tears to the eyes of the grey-bearded "fathers" to whom our petitions were made; and as we went out from the presence of these law-makers, we said to each other, "Our petitions certainly will be granted. Did you not notice how Judge — looked at his wife, and how Lawyer — wiped his glasses more than once? These men can't refuse us when so many of their wives are with us."

The next morning the daily papers told the pathetic story of the woman's petition, rehearsed the speeches that had been so touching and eloquent; commented on the beautiful courage of the organization, and also its impractical way of dealing with the great questions of revenue, of demand and supply; and then told how the petition had been treated with great respect, but of course, had been laid on the table.

In a few instances the petitioners were very roughly treated. History could scarcely furnish anything more brutal than the mobbing of the women in Chicago as they were on their way to the City Hall with their petition; a chapter which every fair minded man must be ashamed to have stand open for the world to read; while the women of that devoted band now growing rapidly old still speak of the experience with reluctance, and shamefacedness because of the vileness with which its memory reeks.

"THE fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace."

The Nation's King.

BY M. E. KELLOGG.

To enthrone Christ as King of the American people is the avowed object of a large number of very zealous people of this country. But properly to enthrone a king it is requisite in the first place that he shall reign, not simply by force over unwilling subjects, whose hearts are full of rebellion, but really reign in the hearts of the people. Indeed this is the only way that Christ will reign.

At one time some of his very earnest disciples thought to take him by force and make him king over the people of Israel, but he would not permit them to do it. He would not reign by force alone. Christ desires no unwilling subjects. The gospel is gathering out of all kingdoms those who personally recognize his sovereignty. In the final end of all things, the great company gathered by the gospel—the multitude that no man can number—will constitute the subjects of his kingdom.

Christ will not rule over this nation literally, nor can it be supposed that he will select an agent to rule in his place. A vote of the people that they accept Christ as their ruler will not have the effect to bring down Christ from above, nor will it assure anyone that the man whom the people place in the highest position of authority is the vicegerent of Christ. About ten millions of the people of the United States now believe that the pope of Rome is the vicegerent of Christ for the whole world. Now if the people of this nation should invest their chief magistrate with the prerogative of a vicegerency of Christ for this nation, then one of two things would happen. The vicegerent of the United States would have to submit to the vicegerent of the whole world or there would be a great clash, and perhaps a great struggle to determine by earthly forces which was the genuine and real vicegerent of Christ.

Christ will never reign in this earth or on any part of it in any such way. That plan never will work in a world full of sin and wickedness. The only way for Christ to rule in the present condition of good and evil is that he shall reign in the individual hearts of those who love and obey him.

Have we reached a time when anyone dare say that Christ is ruling in the hearts of the majority of the American people, or that he fully reigns in the hearts of a minority respectable in size and numbers? No one dare assert it. It is a fact patent to everyone that mammon—the love of riches, which includes the love of self—is the ruling passion in this nation.

This love of self marks our national life in all its parts. It may be seen in the national statesmanship, as it relates to our relations to other nations; in the States in their relations to the Federal Government and to other States, in the counties and towns in the same way, and in the individual relations of men with men. To get, and to keep is the one supreme idea which to a greater extent than any other, dominates in the minds of men.

The Spirit of Christ is just the opposite of all this. "It is more blessed to give than to receive" is the Christian motto that stands out in opposition to this universal national and personal selfishness.

Hence when a nation that is selfish in its national affairs, selfish in its State affairs, selfish in the personal relations of men with men, declares that the unselfish Christ is its king and that they are loyal to him and to the principles of his government, what will it do but declare a lie and thus take upon itself a false profession? Should such a profession be made, should Congress, as the representative of the people and the nation, declare that Christ is the King of the nation, would there be any less of self, any less of serving Satan, any less of the wickedness both open and secret that prevails in high and low places? No one can claim that there would. Then why profess a lie? Why say that Christ is the King of the nation when mammon is king?

No one has the power to make Christ King over another. All that anyone can do is to make Christ his King, and serving him loyally, in this world and age of rebellion, wait patiently the coming of the King, who will then gather out of his kingdom all those who offend and work iniquity to destroy them; and will say to his loyal ones, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

Sunday and True Worship.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

It will be noticed that of the two-horned beast (Rev. 13:11) it is said "he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him [literally, "in his presence"] and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast whose deadly wound was healed." V. 12.

Remembering that these two beasts symbolize respectively the United States and the papacy, the reader will clearly see that the power of the United States is to be so used that it will cause all under its influence to worship the papacy.

But it is ever the duty of all God's creatures to worship only Him. Therefore the issue is to come before us clear and distinct, and all will be called upon to declare whom they will worship—God or the papacy.

While many are aware that there is such a power in existence as the papacy, there are not many who are aware that this power is a rival of God in that it claims homage. It may be possible that even Roman Catholics are not aware of this. But such is the case, whether they know it or not.

And inasmuch as both cannot be worshiped at one and the same time, and that one or the other must be worshiped, it becomes a matter of the highest importance to know how this can be done.

Now the highest form of worship is obedience. Without this there can be no true worship. This will be seen from the words of the Saviour: "Why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say." Luke 6:46. And again, when Christ was tempted of Satan in the wilderness, he replied, "Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God and him only shalt thou serve." Matt. 4:10.

This being true, the way in which the people will be called upon to worship the papacy will be by being made to conform to some standard set forth by that power. In other words, as set forth in the prophecy, the beast will be worshiped by its mark being received in the right hand or in the forehead. But it has been shown in these articles that Sunday is the mark of this papal beast. Hence it is certain that the keeping of Sunday will constitute the worship of the beast.

It is hoped that no one will get a misunderstanding here, and jump to the conclusion that all who in the past have kept Sunday, are beast worshipers. This by no means follows.

The writer believes that there are vast numbers who have served God and yet kept Sunday; and that even now there are many, very many, who keep Sunday, fully believing that this is the divinely-appointed day of rest. And walking in all the light they have they are accepted of God as his children.

But while they are honest and sincere in this belief, their sincerity does not make their belief right. A person may be honest and yet be wrong in some things.

In order for one to worship the papacy there must first be a turning away from the truth of God's Word, and a deliberate adherence to an institution of the papacy, despite the fact that there is no scriptural evidence for its observance.

In the way in which it is presented in the prophecy it will be seen that this work will not be done in a corner. The fullest light will shine forth from the Word of God, and all be given an opportunity to know the truth.

Hence we find that when this work is being done, a solemn warning is to go forth to every one against worshipping the beast and his image and the receiving of his mark in their right hands or their foreheads. Rev. 14: 9, 10. But this warning would be in vain if the people could not fully understand the issues involved.

However they may understand the matter now it is certain that at that time they will know fully what the mark is, and in receiving it will do so knowing there is no scriptural warrant for it. Moreover they will know that it is a test of worship.

From the foregoing it will be seen that this country will, by law,—for it can be done in no other way,—enforce the keeping of the mark—Sunday—and that it will be made a test.

Now everybody may know who cares to, that at this very time, and for a number of years in the past, there has been, and still is, a mighty organized effort, gathering strength year by year, to have Sunday enforced by law. And they may know, too, that it is confessed by at least those who are at the head of the movement that there is no Scriptural warrant for keeping Sunday; and yet it is being made a test of worship.

That this is true the following utterances will prove. Dr. Everts, at a meeting of the American Sabbath Union, spoke thus on Sunday: "It is the test of all religion." Again: "The people who do not keep the Sabbath have no religion;" and "he who does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God; and he who does not worship God is lost."

It is no light thing that is thus being contemplated, and that it will be fully carried out is shown by the "more sure word of prophecy."

But as already stated, when this Government does this, it will not be the worship of God. In the very nature of things it could not be. Enforced worship is not acceptable to God. But very plainly the Bible declares it will be the "worship of the beast"—the papacy.

And how is this regarded by the Catholic Church? The following from Father Enright shows their position: "The church changed the Sabbath to Sunday, and all the world bows down and worships upon that day, in silent obedience to the mandates of the Catholic Church. Is not this a living miracle—that those who hate us so bitterly obey and acknowledge our power every week, and do not know it."

This shows that the keeping of Sunday is homage rendered to the Catholic Church. And when this is enforced what will it be but exalting the papacy in the place of God? Thus at one stroke the Protestant principle upon which this Government was founded will be swept away, and thus it will be that the power of the United States will be arrayed against God.

These things are not written because of any hatred against Catholics or anybody else. It is simply that the people of the United States may know what these religious movements for Sunday enforcement mean.

It is not a pleasing task to have to speak of the papacy—a professedly Christian church—as has been done in these articles, nor of Sunday, which is so universally regarded as the day of God's own appointment.

The prophecy calls for some power to appear in fulfillment of its specifications. No other power fulfills them but the papacy.

The time has come for those things to be fulfilled and the truth concerning them could not be proclaimed—as it indeed must be proclaimed—without referring thus plainly to the Catholic Church. And the same is true of Sunday. If the mark of the beast could by any means have been anything else than Sunday, it would of necessity have been something long cherished and venerated. Were this not so it could not be a test.

THE lust of gold tends to obliterate the love of anything else.

THE following forcible sentences spoken by Sam. G. Smith, of the People's Church at Minneapolis, are worth passing round to all the people everywhere:—

"Julius Cæsar was a priest, the most renowned authority in Rome on matters ecclesiastical before he became a general in Gaul. Men of the church have been powers in the state from time immemorial. Kings and priests alike have done things that will not bear the closest investigation. This Government of ours was based on the theory that the church and the state should be kept separate, each working in its own way for the benefit of the people. Almost the last words of the father of his country were his admonition to keep these two factors in human civilization forever apart."

* * *

AN exchange which is a staunch advocate of Sunday laws, says:—

"There is no doubt that from a business point of view merely, the converting of the Sabbath into a work day will prove profitable. The firm that works seven days in the week has a decided advantage over the one that works only six. The capital invested yields one-seventh more. The output is one-seventh greater than in works of equal capacity. For a firm that closes its mills on the Sabbath to put out an equal amount as the firm that runs continuously, it would require an enlargement of its plant one-seventh, i. e., the investment, it may be, of a large sum of money."

* * *

AND yet this paper and all the rest of the Sunday "reform" organs have been telling us from time to time, that "from a business point of view merely," it did not pay to work machinery and men seven days in the week. They have elaborately and with great assurance explained to us that both machinery and men need a rest one day in each week; that without it, both will wear out quicker than would otherwise be the case, and that really more work would be accomplished in the six days, with the day of rest, than in the seven days without it, etc., etc. Which of these opposing views are we to believe? Or must we believe that neither was made so much with a view of stating the truth, as of offering an "argument" in behalf of their scheme of reform?

THE Christian Statesman, the leading exponent of the theory that a civil government is a moral person and as such is bound to obey the moral law, sees in the present crisis of affairs between the Government and Spain, an opportunity to illustrate its theory "with remarkable clearness." Proceeding, therefore, to improve this favorable opportunity, it says:—

"It is the belief of perhaps ninety nine out of every hundred American citizens that the battleship "Maine" was blown up by the Spaniards. . . . The belief of many of the American people is that the mine was exploded by Spanish agents. But Spain herself is held accountable for the deed of these agents.

"The same principle of political science finds illustration in the condition of affairs in Cuba. The policy adopted by General Weyler has reduced thousands of Cubans to a state of starvation. . . . But while Weyler is justly condemned for his inhuman method of carrying on the war, Spain as a nation is held accountable by the civilized world, for the cruelty and barbarity that have been practiced in Cuba by her accredited agents. Weyler is no longer there, but the suffering continues. Spain is the responsible person with whom to deal."

Now the truth is that international diplomacy does not consider the Spanish government, or any government, as a person. There is no personal reality to any government. The Statesman's illustration no more proves the personality of Spain than the well-known cartoon figure called "Uncle Sam" proves the personality of the United States, or than the stout figure labeled "John Bull" proves the personality of England. There is no way to represent the personality of governments except by a cartoon figure which everybody knows has no reality outside of paper and ink.

* * *

GOVERNMENTS conduct the business pertaining to their relations with each other through ambassadors, consuls, and other individuals who are the agents of the governments. And they cannot treat or negotiate with each other in any other way; they cannot communicate with each other at all independently of these agents. They cannot do anything independently of these agents. But a person can act independently of his agent, always; and a government, if it were a person in more than a figurative sense, could do likewise.

* * *

SPAIN, or any government, is very properly to be held accountable for the acts of its agents. But this is not saying that Spain can be held accountable as a person can be. When a person commits murder—as was done in the blowing up of the "Maine"—he is by the law of all nations punished with death; but how is a civil government to be thus punished? No one proposes to put the government of Spain to death for the thousands and millions of murders which its agents have committed in the last two or three centuries of its history. It was not proposed to kill the government of Turkey—the "sick man of the East"—because of the series of massacres of which it has been guilty during the present century. A civil government is not held accountable for murder, as persons are. It cannot be held accountable for anything, apart from its agents and representatives. It cannot be seized and put in confinement, as every person is when he is to be punished for crime.

* * *

APART from the people, civil government has no existence at all. Any dealings with civil government, therefore,—any punishment of it, or satisfaction exacted from it—must simply affect the people; and whatever affects the people must affect them as individuals, for they are individuals, and nothing more. The people are what the Creator made them, and they were created as individuals.

* * *

THE idea that a government is a person, in any other than a figurative sense, is ridiculous; and in the doctrine that it is a moral person, amenable to the divine law, it is presented in the most ridiculous light. A civil government cannot believe on Christ and be baptized; and therefore its salvation is impossible. There will be in heaven no United States of America or empire of Great Britain. There will be no political divisions at all. There will be no politics. There will be only the host of heaven and the host of the redeemed—redeemed as individuals and saved because they made the doing of God's will on earth an individual matter.

ONE of the heavy fighting ships of the United States Navy is named the "Puritan," and considering the well-known character of the Puritans, this name may not be inappropriate. But no one has yet ventured to suggest the name "Christian" for a ship of war, although according to the statements put forth by religious speakers and writers, such a name would be perfectly appropriate. If this name, displayed in large letters upon the hull of a ship engaged in pouring death and destruction upon another ship filled with human beings, is not entirely appropriate, will some of the religious speakers and writers who advocate war please tell us why.

A PROTESTANT Episcopal bishop of Maryland, Bishop Paret, has given the clergymen of his diocese some sensible advice on the subject of discussing political and "patriotic" issues in their pulpits. It is well that there are still some clergymen of influence left in the country who understand and are not afraid to say that the proper business of a Christian minister is to preach the gospel. He says:—

"God having brought us to times of uncertainty, trouble, and danger, he calls our nation and its authorities to use all possible patience and wisdom. And as helping to that, I expect that you keep your sermons free from all questions of war or of national politics, and from unnecessary professions of patriotism. True patriotism does not need to be boastful. Important as these things are, they have no place in the pulpit. Our Saviour and his apostles first are our best models for preaching the gospel. There were questions of deepest national importance then pressing upon the minds of the people, but they did not make them themes for preaching. They had something still higher to speak of—the spiritual truths of the gospel, and its great moral principles and duties. These prevailing would bring peace and truth as their results. . . . Keep Spain and points of national policy out of your sermons. Ask God's blessings on those who now have the great responsibility. Use at every morning and evening prayer the appointed prayer 'For the President and for all others in authority,' and at every litany service and at all other services the prayer for Congress."

THE Rev. J. M. Henderson, who assumes to speak for the African M. E. Church in America, is quoted as saying that the church is ready to fight in case of war with Spain, and that it could raise 150,000 men. Also that the ministers of the church, of which there are about 5,000, have been instructed by their bishops to do everything in their power to rouse the patriotism of the members of their congregations. In this the African M. E. Church is only following the example set by some other Methodist bodies in this country.

MORMONS of Rockbridge County, Va., have applied to the governor of the State for protection from the non-Mormon residents of the vicinity, who have become much incensed over the preaching of Mormon doctrine among them, and have threatened to tar and feather the Mormon band if the latter did not leave the country. It is a mistake when anything is done which is calculated to create sympathy for Mormon missionary work. The only way to overcome evil, is to oppose it with good.

A NATIONAL REFORM organ in Pennsylvania mentions that some large manufacturing establishments in Pittsburgh are operating their mills seven days in the week, compelling the operatives to do work on Sunday as on other days. And in discussing the obstacles which lie in the way of securing Sunday closing of these mills, it mentions that "many of them [the proprietors] are members of our large strong orthodox congregations." This only adds another testimony to many that have been given showing that church people themselves are largely responsible for the prevailing desecration of Sunday. And this being so, would it not be consistent for the church to set herself in order before calling on the state to provide a remedy for Sunday desecration?

THE Defender, organ of the N. E. Sabbath Protective League, announces the "cheering news" that the Sunday bill for the District of Columbia has been approved by the District Commissioners. "This," it says, "means much in the keen fight for Sunday laws, at our national Capitol."

Yes; there is a good deal meant by the persistent effort to get Congress to enact a Sunday law for the District of Columbia. It is meant by this to get Congress committed to Sunday legislation, and then from this vantage ground to demand a general Sunday law for the nation. The first step in wrong doing means a good deal, always.

A Case of Class Legislation.

WE learn that in Texas a law has recently been passed which is favorable to convassers of religious literature in that State. The gist of the law is given as follows:—

"A license of forty-five dollars is required of every agent, except those who are engaged exclusively in selling books of a purely religious character."

We haven't very much sympathy with it as a law, as it is a straight out and out case of class legislation, which is wrong first, last, and all the time.

What War Will Be on a Man of War.

THE conditions of a combat at sea between modern warships have vastly changed since the time of the last great sea fight between the forces of civilized nations; and the change, it appears, has not been in the direction of increased safety to the participants in such a contest. It might seem at first thought that the steel armor in which ships of war are now usually encased, would afford secure protection to all who would take care to keep it between themselves and the missiles of the enemy; but the fact is that in the race for supremacy the heavy armor has not kept pace with the heavy guns; and in coming naval battles the ships will be subjected to the destructive force of projectiles which the heaviest armor they can carry will not withstand. The torpedo, also, will play its deadly part, and the rapidity with which destruction and death may overwhelm both vessel and crew can be imagined from the disaster which overtook the "Maine."

Captain McGiffin, the American who commanded the Chinese battleship "Chen Yuen," in the battle of the Yalu, between the fleets of China and Japan, in speaking of the sensations experienced during the fight on that occasion, said:—

"A very great feeling of curiosity animates all hands in a battle at sea. Chinamen are about the least curious men in the world; yet the deck officers on my ship had great trouble in keeping the members of the black gang, the firemen and coal passers, and even the machinists, down below during the action. They kept poking their heads above the main deck, lifting off hatches for the purpose, to see how we were making out. On the whole, I think the men down below are more nervous during a fight than the men on deck. They are a bit afraid of what they can't see. It's just like the fear of a man lying in bed in a dark room when he knows there is a burglar within a few feet of him. The men on deck can see the whole game, and the smoke and the roar infuse the devil of battle into them, and they simply don't care whether the ship remains on top or goes down. They literally enjoy the fun. A lot of our gunners were positively hysterical with delight. Some of them laughed like wild men. They muttered to themselves and howled like drunkards. Indeed, half the ship's company looked to me as if they were three parts drunk after the fight, yet there was no grog. They reeled about, with silly, drunken expressions on their faces, although they knew we were licked."

When asked if he didn't feel like running when the fight commenced, Captain McGiffin replied, "Run where?" and added that in a fight at sea under the conditions of modern warfare, there is literally no place to run to, one part of the ship being about as safe—or as dangerous—as another.

In view of the fact that a conflict between this country and Spain would be fought out mostly on the water, the following description of the conditions which will be imposed upon those on board a man-of-war "in action," is of interest. It is furnished by a writer in the New York Sun:—

"Common and perfectly equal as the danger in which all hands on board a modern man-of-war unquestionably stand during a fight, there are, of course, some stations that appear to be more ticklish for the men assigned to them than others. For example, there is probably not a sea soldier in the United States Marine Corps to-day who is not figuring on the insignificant show he will probably have for his life if, in the event of his ship's getting into action, he is detailed with a picked few of his mates to man the rapid-firing guns in the fighting tops. At first glance the fighting top of a modern ship of war appears to be quite the most dangerous spot on the ship fore or aft in case of action. There has never been any good opportunity to test this, for fighting tops (rightly called military masts) are of comparatively recent development, and during the Chino-Japanese naval engagements no systematic attempt seems to have been made on either side to raze the fighting tops to the decks or into the sea. The proportion of killed and wounded in the fighting tops during those engagements was considerably less than on deck.

"In a sea fight between expert manipulators of ships, however, there can be no doubt that the vessels will go each at the other's military masts with enthusiasm at the very outset, for the purpose of silencing the deadly play of the rapid-firing guns, which are capable of making terrific havoc on an enemy's decks. The rapid firing guns only would be used for the purpose of chopping off or knocking over the enemy's fighting tops, for a fighting top is a small mark in long-range shooting, and no gunner would be so foolish as to waste big gun projectiles in an attempt to shave a mark the chances of striking which are about as a thousand to one against him. But rapid-firing guns are accurate and their projectiles are powerful enough to do for the strongest fighting top that ever reared its ugly circular head from the deck of a ship of war. The sides of the fighting tops are armored, but they are not armored sufficiently to render them impenetrable to the projectiles of ordinary rapid-firing guns. The sea soldiers man the fighting top guns, and it may be set down as something mighty certain that in the event of a war the duels between the marines in the fighting tops will be sanguinary features of the sea fights.

"The bluejackets who are stationed in the magazines during a sea fight are certainly no better off than their mates, either above or below decks. Each commander in a naval battle knows precisely where his foe's magazines are located, and there is likely to be some tall aiming for magazines in the next naval war. To those who are unfamiliar with the general expertness of modern great gun marksmanship and the extraordinary accuracy of some of it, it might seem pure foolishness for a gunner to make an attempt to hit any especial part of an enemy's ship at a range of several miles. Those who think it this way, however, have only to be referred to the bit of marksmanship performed by one of the 13-inch gun crews of the battleship "Indiana" the other day. This crew, using service projectiles and charges in practice, put two 13-inch shots right through the same hole. This sort of marksmanship is by no means uncommon in the United States Navy, the standard of which for great gun expertness is as high as that of any navy in the world. It is no unusual thing for gunners of American men-of-war engaged in big gun practice to tear the canvas targets to ribbons, at the very longest effective ranges, before the practice is well begun.

"This being the state of great gun marksmanship at the present time, it is reasonable to suppose that the men in the magazines in a sea fight should have no especial cause for being happy above their fellows over their stations. One great gun shell plumped well over a magazine (even though the magazines be all far below the water line) is likely to cause enough trouble to induce the magazine men to wish they were on deck, if they have a chance to think at all. Moreover, there is such a thing as a heavy projectile penetrating an armored ship below the water line, as was proved on the "Yalu," and if this should happen at a point of the ship where a magazine chanced to be located the men hauling ammunition and manning the hoists in the same would never know what had happened to them. Then there is always a likelihood of shells exploding on deck and bits finding their way through the open magazine hatches—and such a thing would be dangerous enough. The magazine men, moreover, have to work in practical darkness. Magazines on modern men-of-war are of course fitted with no standing lights of any sort. In times of peace, when the gunners' mates and inspecting officers wish to examine the interiors of magazines, they carry portable incandescent electric lights with them, but in handling loose ammunition during actual fighting even these portable electric lights would be deemed dangerous, so that the magazine men would no doubt have to grope for it and take out their nervous curiosity as to what might be happening to their ship or fleet in wondering.

"The officer would have no advantage whatever over the enlisted man in the matter of greater safety in a modern naval engagement. The sword-carrying men with the range-finders were lopped off with complete impartiality in the "Yalu" fight. An officer in command of a gun has even a bit the worst of the chance in comparison with the men handling the gun, for in order to get a line on the enemy he must necessarily expose himself to the enemy's scientific rapid-fire play, while the gunners have the protection of the gun shields and barbettes. Even the commanding officer is no better as a war risk than the humblest mess attendant in a fight. His station on modern ships will generally be in his ship's conning tower, and, well as conning towers on ships of war of to-day are protected, eminent naval authorities haven't much faith in their invulnerability. Conning towers are necessarily in exposed spots—almost always away forward, beneath where the bridge ought to be, but isn't, when the ship is cleared for action—and gunners of the enemy are naturally expected to do what they can toward sending the commanding officer of an antagonistic ship into the next world before his time.

"The man in the bunkers, viz., the humble coal passer, is likely to have a dismal, unsatisfactory time of it during the progress of a fight. He sees absolutely nothing, but what he does not see is more than atoned for by what he hears. Any man who has ever listened to the intonation of great guns during target practice from the shelter of a half empty coal bunker is likely to remember the twenty times amplified thundering that threatens to rip his ear drums in twain. Theoretically, the coal passer is supposed to shovel buckets full of coal and trundle them along the trolleys in the mellow light of many 16 candle incandescent lamps, and as a matter of fact all modern ships' coal bunkers are lighted. But the writer, who has crawled through the bunkers of many a modern man-of-war, American and foreign, has found that standing electric bunker lamps rarely illuminate. The glass around the wires is smashed in the process of coaling ship, and, of course, the lamps do not work. Naval constructors are still trying to find some scheme to illuminate bunkers. The coal passer, standing his watch in the bunker of a ship in action, then, has the additional gloom of darkness to fight, unless he violates a rigid regulation by carrying an open light into his bunker. He does not know when an armor-piercing shell is going to pass directly through the bunker he is working in, and altogether his station in a fight is not a desirable one.

"Nor has the fireman or the water tender a very cheerful station. Both of these members of the black gang, of course, are in the boiler rooms, and they have perpetually before them the possibility of a great shell ripping its way through a boiler, thus insuring them a death by scalding. The oiler is another man of the black gang who has a title to feel nervous when his ship is fighting, for he is always more or less tangled up in the machinery apparently endeavoring to see how near he can approach death without actually compassing his own, and in the event of a shot dropping through the deck and among the intertwined masses of machinery he is liable to be torn to pieces by the same, 'racing wild,' as the engineers call it, even if he is not done for by the explosion.

"The soft spot,' as an old gunner's mate put it, 'is about five fathom beneath her, in a diving suit.'"

THE Ministers' Alliance of Kansas City, Mo., has entered a protest against conducting funerals on Sunday, on the ground that it is a desecration of the Sabbath.

THERE are no people who are more marked as having a weekly day of rest than are observers of the seventh day. Yet they never had a law to "give" them their day, or to "protect" it, in any manner.

Studies in French History.—18.

"FROM the days of the first king of France, Clovis, to about the beginning of the fourteenth century,—where our last study closed—the country of France has been ruled by, first, the Merovingians, from 481 to 752 A. D.; next, the Carolingians, from 752 to 987; then the Capetians, from 987 to 1328.

"Now Philip VI. of Valois takes the empty throne, upon which none but the direct descendants of Hugh Capet had sat since that great monarch began his reign about 341 years before.

"Philip VI., the first of the Valois branch, was a vain man, fond of pleasure, feasting, and excitement. During the reign of Philip the Fair, the proud, over-bearing nobles were kept somewhat from lording it over the poorer people. But this man had no notion of restraining them in the least; so, of course, he pleased the aristocracy very much. About all he seemed to care about was to have a good time, and entertain the kings and princes of other nations in a right royal manner. In fact, historians say that he made Paris such an attractive place that kings of other countries much preferred Paris, with its life of gayety and pleasure, to their own dull capitals at home. So the accommodating king would keep many of them as guests, in grandeur and splendor."

"I should have thought Philip's pocket-money would have run short, after a while," said Jack Smith, who had already earned for himself the title of "practical Jack" among his friends.

"But the fact is, Jack, that it was the poor peasantry and the working middle class who really paid the debts incurred by the king, and who supported his idle guests in such regal splendor. And then, as if to add insult to injury, the king declared that those nobles who lawfully owed debts to the poor peasants, need not be holden to pay them.

"About this time, 1328, began the long feud between England and France, which is called the 'Hundred Years' War.'"

"Please, professor," interrupted Jennie Jacobs, "who was the king of England at this time?"

"Edward the Third. He was son of Isabella, who, you remember, was a daughter of Philip the Fair."

"I wonder if that was the reason for his beginning the hundred years' war with France," said Charlie White.

"Yes, he made it an excuse, and declared that he ought to be king of France because of it. So he sent some ships over the English Channel to Flanders. A battle was fought at Sluys, in which the king of France was badly beaten,—in fact, Philip's fleet was nearly destroyed."

"What did Philip do, when he found this out?" asked Will Barnaby. "I suppose he had no idea but that he would beat Edward."

"This was exactly what he did think. In fact, nobody dared tell him that he was beaten for some time. Then Edward waited to get a good excuse to strike another blow at his French cousin. About this time there was a miserable quarrel between two English counts, in which quarrel Philip was foolish enough to interfere. Of course Philip and Edward took opposite sides in the affair. Finally, the French were obliged to retire from the siege of Hennebon,—where they were besieging the brave countess of Montfort, wife of the count whose cause Edward had espoused.

"Another great battle between these two kings, in which the English gained a wonderful victory, and which they still point to with pride, was the battle of Crécy. The armor of the Frenchmen was so heavy that when they were once off their horses, they could not mount again."

"Was Philip of Valois a brave man? or did he object to being present in battle?" asked Rob Billings.

"No, Robert; that is something which cannot be said of him; no, he was no coward."

"I suppose you mean he was not a physical coward."

"A good point, Robert. You mean to ask if he were not a moral coward. I think he must have been, or he would not have encouraged the nobles in their unjust conduct toward the people. But he was physically a brave man. He would not leave the battlefield at Crécy, even after his troops were so badly beaten, that there were only five knights left with him on the field. Then one of them led him forcibly from the battle.

"It would be well to make a note of the fact," continued Professor Carman, "that it is said that it was at the battle of Crécy, about 550 years ago, that cannon was first used."

"May be the English used them, and the French hadn't got any made yet, and so were beaten," suggested Harry Ray.

"No, Harry; you have quite a wrong idea of what cannons were in those early days."

"I always suppose them to be very destructive weapons," whispered Will Barnaby, whose father was an old soldier.

"They were indeed weapons of destruction, even then. But the trouble was, they were quite as apt to destroy those who fired them as they were the enemy; for, as they were not built very strong, they would often burst. They then used stones instead of metal balls. The historian says that they no more resembled our modern cannon than a wheel-barrow does a locomotive.

"Next week we will learn something of the battle of Calais."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Artificial Natural History.

"Present Truth," London, Eng.

An exchange says:—

"The science of zoology, both for the extent and difficulty of terminology, makes the greatest demand on the memory. As illustration, there are over 5,000 known species of lizards, each with its distinguishing name. Here are four as samples: Phrynocephalus przewalskii, Cryptoblepharus poecilopleurus, Tracheloptychus petersip, Cordylusaurus Trivittatus."

That is called "Natural Science," when as a matter of fact it is not natural at all, but wholly artificial; neither is it science, for the knowledge of it is not the knowledge of truth. Let no one get disheartened at these long names. The animals are not born with them, neither do they carry them about. A person may know all that any man can know of an animal, without ever having heard of these yard-long names; and one may have them all at his tongue's end without knowing the real truth about a single animal. It is true that it is possible for a person to have his mind crammed with artificial classification and jaw breaking names, and at the same time to know the things themselves; but the chances are all against it. Remember that there is a vast difference between knowing the truth concerning a thing, that is, knowing the thing itself, and knowing the name that somebody has devised for that thing.

Judge Not.

"Sunday School Times."

INSTANTANEOUS photographs show the graceful trotting horse, or flying bird, or leaping hound, in apparently awkward and unnatural attitudes. Instantaneous judgments—judgments of men or the actions of men—may be just as misleading. Many a busy Christian worker indeed suffers from just such injustice, incomplete representation of his actions becoming misrepresentation.

We seldom have the right to judge another by a single action of his, in ignorance of his object ahead, and of his motives behind. We seldom do well to paint a fellow being from an instantaneous photograph. We are seldom justified in deciding, from an instant's glimpse of shadows on another life, that that life is all darkness, or is even tending toward darkness. There is a twilight of the morning, as well as of the evening. Those shadows may be tokens of the fading night, instead of the fading day. Up from darkness of early surroundings, sinful habits, wrong teachings, or neglect of teaching, or years of indifference, the soul beside us may be even now painfully struggling into the light.

Let us not criticise; let us help. Let us look more at direction than at instantaneous position; more at the general trend than at the occasional deviation. Two points, at least, are required to determine the direction of even an ideally straight line. Shall we decide the direction of a wavering human life by the single point of a single action?

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

(SECOND EDITION.)
BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, it not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 28 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

NEVER before in the world's history did the sound of war reverberate throughout the earth as it does to-day.

"PROCLAIM ye this among the Gentiles: Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near, let them come up. Beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears; let the weak say, I am strong." What more would be necessary than is seen and heard to-day to constitute the fulfillment of this prophecy of Joel? And this prophecy marks the proximity of the day of God.

BOTH branches of Congress having passed by large majorities resolutions which amount to a declaration of war against Spain, it is probable that by the time this paper reaches its readers an open rupture between the two countries will have become a reality. The pope, meanwhile, has tried hard to get Europe to interfere in behalf of Spain; but his propositions seem to have met with favorable response only from France and Austria, who are not able to do anything toward dominating the situation without the coöperation of the other Powers.

A DISPATCH from Washington quotes a member of the Administration as saying, with reference to the present outlook, "Events seem to be leading up to the last grand crash before the millennium."

Thoughtful observers can see that events are leading up to a "grand crash," and—very thoughtlessly—many persons associate this with the idea of the coming of a millennium of peace. But the war spirit, which is abroad in the earth to-day, does not beget the spirit of peace. It begets only that which is like itself.

There will be a "grand crash," truly; but it will usher in the "day of God," not the millennium of peace. Is the world ready for it? Are you ready for it? That is the important question.

THE partition of China among the powers of Europe seems now to be practically an accomplished fact, though there is opportunity for a good deal of quarreling in adjusting the details of the transaction. The whole Eastern hemisphere now scarcely affords elbow room for the "Christian" powers.

At the Academy of Music in New York City, Sunday morning, the 17th inst., after a stirring discourse by the Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., a resolution was passed by a practically unanimous vote of the congregation declaring that this Government ought to make war on Spain and bombard Havana by Wednesday next at the latest. And this resolution was proposed and the vote taken, that the announcement of the fact might be telegraphed to the authorities at Washington; the pastor stating that he would do this by 3 o'clock of the same day.

And so it has come to this,—that the church, which is supposed to preach the gospel of the Prince of Peace, now openly declares for war; and not only this, but wants war even more than the civil authorities want it, and urges the latter on to the conflict because they do not move fast enough to suit her! The church urging the world on to carnal warfare! This is "Christianity" indeed!

THE Christian Statesman, organ of the modern Puritanical element in religion, expresses (in its April issue) a fear that the Sabbath (Sunday) may soon become in this country "as it is in parts of Europe, a day of labor, of pleasure, and of crime." Probably the Statesman here meant worldly "pleasure," though it is quite in accord with the Puritan nature as it stands. For it is well known that the Puritans classed pleasure on the Sabbath with secular labor and crime. But God's Sabbath was made to be a day of the highest pleasure.

THERE is one kind of business now that will unquestionably "pay," if conducted with any kind of business ability; and that is the manufacture and sale of vessels of war. It seems that there is no likelihood of there ever being a "glutted market" in this line of manufactured "goods."

WHETHER or not the Government is going to drive Spain out of Cuba may be a great question; but it is not so important for you as the question whether self is going to be driven out of your heart. This is a question of what you are going to do, and not somebody else. Self has declared war against you, and you need not wait a moment to begin fighting the greatest and most important battles of your life.

THE history of one of the most important and interesting developments of modern times is being given in the SENTINEL, in the articles headed "Items of W. C. T. U. History." Probably no person living is better qualified to speak on the subject than is the writer of these articles; and we do not see how any person who feels an interest in human affairs can fail to be interested in them. We are sure they afford an excellent opportunity for introducing the SENTINEL to those engaged in the work of the W. C. T. U.

It is proposed to build another trans-continental railway through Canada, further north than the Canadian Pacific. The new route will run from Montreal direct to the upper end of Lake Winnipeg, thence northwest to the Rocky Mountains, crossing them at an elevation of 2,400 feet; thence down the valley of the Skeene to the Pacific. It is proposed to build also connecting branches to the Yukon.

When this is done, the trans-Siberian railway being also completed, as it no doubt will be, a journey from America to England can be made without going across the Ocean.

ONLY in the Christian warfare does victory always mark the side of right.

CHRISTIANITY is science; but "Christian science" is the opposite of Christianity.

DEPENDENCE on self alone is often mistaken for independence; but the two are vastly different.

CONSIDERING that "war is hell," it is strange that a Christian should ever feel bound to go to war.

THE Christian maintains peace by fighting self; the non-Christian seeks to get it by fighting some one else.

THE "deceitfulness of sin" often makes people believe they have defeated the devil, when the devil has in fact defeated them.

THE fact that the world is growing worse, does not constitute any reason at all why you should not be growing better.

THE marching orders of the Commander of Christians are, "Go ye therefore into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

It is religion alone that gives Sunday a different character from that of Monday or Tuesday; Sunday is different in character from those days only by being a religious day. And were it not for this fact, there would never have been a Sunday law enacted.

INTERVENTION—that is what Jesus Christ undertook in the terrible difficulty that arose between God and man. And it was not "armed intervention," but it was effectual.

THE more of the war spirit there is in the world, the more necessity is there that Christians should maintain peace.

THE question of whether the souls of men are to be saved or lost, is always the greatest question that can come up for settlement in this world; and when ministers of the gospel give precedence in their discourses to some other question, it only shows that they have themselves lost sight of the great truth which they are set to point out to others.

Does Christianity Justify It?

It has been decided by the United States Government that present circumstances relating to the condition of Cuba justifies war with Spain; and in this decision it has the support of the professedly Christian churches. Does Christianity justify this conclusion to which the churches have come?

Turning to the Text-book of Christianity, we find that, from the Christian standpoint, war was not justifiable when its object was to save the life of Jesus Christ. Is it then justifiable from the Christian standpoint now?

Jesus, in the Garden of Gethsemane on that memorable night, was surrounded by a mob who were bent on taking his life. They were determined to crucify the Son of God. Peter, realizing their purpose, drew a sword to defend the Saviour, and "smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear." Immediately Jesus said to Peter, "Put up again thy sword into his sheath;" and touching the wound made by Peter's sword, he healed it.

The Author of Christianity therefore plainly declared that such circumstances as had come upon Him and his disciples did not justify a resort to the sword. But if those circumstances did not justify it, what circumstances do?

It may be said that it was necessary that Jesus Christ should die for the salvation of the world. This is true; but God did not ordain that he should be betrayed and crucified. This was the work of wicked men—men whom the Christian church regards as the most guilty of their race. But to prevent this terrible deed,—the crucifixion of One who not only was the most innocent of all persons on the earth, but was the Son of the infinite God—a resort to arms was not justifiable.

A few hours later, standing before Pilate, Jesus said to him: "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." He did not say, If circumstances were different, then would my servants fight. If some greater crime than my death were being perpetrated, then would my servants fight. He did not say this. The reason his servants would not fight was because his kingdom was not of this world. Because that was so, fighting by his servants was not justifiable; and until his kingdom is of this world, the same reason must hold good. But Christ's kingdom is no more of this world to-day than it was then.

Peter, drawing the sword as a servant of Jesus Christ, is a figure worthy of note. Peter was an ardent disciple of Christ, a prominent member of the little band of Christians, but—he was not converted. Jesus told him, that same evening, that he was not converted; and the cock-crowing hour of the same night, brought ample confirmation of his words.

After his conversion, Peter never resorted to the sword. But standing there, sword in hand, bent upon its forcible use in the interests of Christianity, he well prefigured that class who, while professedly ardent servants of the Son of God, are nevertheless not sufficiently converted to have comprehended the truth that his kingdom is not of this world.

Mr. Moody on "Christian" Civilization.

At a recent address in the city of Evanston, Ill., Evangelist Moody spoke the following as his convictions regarding the difference between "Christian civilization" and Christianity:—

"Would we welcome Jesus to-day in America? People think the world is better than it used to be. But, do you know, if it could be put to a vote that Jesus Christ should come and reign as King upon earth, do you believe he'd carry a state in the United States? Do you believe he'd carry a county in this State? Do you believe he'd carry even a ward in this city? I don't believe he would.

"We're strong in churches, but when it comes to accepting Christ himself it would be different. Would the societies want him—the Odd Fellows or the Free Masons? Would the Republican party want him? They would vote for the greatest blackguard on earth, sooner. The Democratic party? They would go almost solid against him. Ah, but you say, the Prohibition party would want him. I guess not. Some of you are shaking your heads at that. Well, shake 'em! I'm talking facts.

"I'll come a little nearer home. Even the churches wouldn't want him to come, some of 'em. It would spoil some of 'em. There isn't a nation in all the so called Christian nations that would elect him. But I tell you we won't have peace on earth until he does come. The earth looks dark, now. It's going to be darker just before dawn."

If the Government hurries, it may be able to catch up with the church in the advance against Spain.

"Important—If True."

THE Rev. Dr. Charles Bridgman, of this city, has given us the assurance, that as regards the Cuban crisis, "It is God and not the devil who now calls the hosts to battle." Just how he has learned this we are not informed; but, being the word of a clergyman, it is supposed to be accepted as a fact without any great amount of accompanying proof.

Dr. Bridgman is chaplain of the eighth New York regiment, and his sermon last Sunday, the 17th, was preached to the regiment especially, that being the occasion of their annual church service. The opening hymn was—

"The Son of God goes forth to war,
A kingly crown to gain;
His blood-red banner streams afar;
Who follows in his train?"

And the discourse which followed was calculated to impress the soldiers with the idea that they were following "in his train" by going forth to engage in carnal warfare with the Spaniards. This mixing of the spiritual with the carnal, earthly, and sensual is the fatal defect in the conceptions of Christianity which prevail to-day. The Son of God never went forth to carnal warfare, and none who do so to-day can be following in his train.

Notwithstanding the Rev. Mr. Bridgman's assurance, we are not satisfied that the business of making war has in this instance passed out of the hands of the devil into those of the Lord. Christianity opposes evil with good—not with evil.

"His Holiness."

It seems that the title "His Holiness" is not exclusively the property of the pope, but is held by several leaders of religious sects in India, the title being recognized by their followers as that of the pope is by Roman Catholics. Of course, the title means just as much in their cases as in that of the pope. No person can become or remain holy by virtue of the position which he occupies. No person can be invested with holiness by vote.

Why non-Catholics should recognize this title as one properly designating the pope, is a question that is not clear. It is an assumed title, a title which no person or persons on earth have authority to confer on anybody, and which no mortal can take to himself without being guilty of blasphemy. Surely the Protestant world at least ought to be cognizant of these facts.

WHILE there is war with Spain, let it be remembered that Spain above all other nations stands for the principle of union between religion and the state.

Does Archbishop Ireland Rule the United States?

In the United States Senate the other day Senator Turner of Washington, standing in his place, "charged that the delay [in sending the President's Message] last week was not due to the request of General Lee; but to the fact that Archbishop Ireland had cabled to the Vatican in the hope that the holy father might be able to bring about a peaceful solution of the difficulty. The President was waiting upon the pope to secure that which American diplomacy had failed to obtain."

That a United States senator, speaking upon a question so grave as to be known by all to involve war between nations, would say such a thing as this at random is not to be believed.

The truth of the charge is favored by the fact that though the message was withheld professedly because the publication of it that day "would endanger the lives of American citizens in Cuba," yet when it was made public, unaltered, a week later, there was not in it a single sentence that could by any conceivable construction stir up any spirit that would in any way endanger the life of any American citizen. The World has asked the President or anybody to point out in that message any single sentence that would have endangered the lives of Americans in Cuba had it been published the day it was promised, and Congress and the country sat in suspense waiting for it.

Another pointer in favor of Senator Turner's charge is the statement of the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Times-Herald, April 14, that "Archbishop Ireland was again active to-day in the cause of peace, rushing from one embassy to another and from legation to legation, spending much time at the French minister's house, and an hour with the envoy of Austria-Hungary, in one last effort to preserve peace."

It is well known that no effort has been made by either the pope or Archbishop Ireland to secure peace between Spain and the Cubans; and also that there would be no such effort now were it not for the strong prospect of Cuba being lost to Spain. Under Spanish rule the church of Rome has governmental support and a practical monopoly in Cuba. The moment Cuba is lost to Spain, and is free,—that moment Rome finds her governmental power there vanished.

This is not peace for the sake of peace, but peace for the sake of power and revenue, that Archbishop Ireland and the pope are so busily working for just now as Cuba is about to be free. And that through the President, Archbishop Ireland and the pope should in such a cause, or any other, be able to play pitch and toss, and peek-a-boo with the Congress and people of the United States, is sufficiently suggestive to cause the American people seriously to think.

It can be remembered also in this connection that Archbishop Ireland dictated to the St. Louis Convention.

A. T. J.

"COME, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he hath wrought in the earth. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire. Be still and know that I am God; I will be exalted among the heathen; I will be exalted in the earth."

The Church in Civil Government.

It is a notable and very noticeable fact that the church, to-day, in this country, has become an ardent participant in the affairs of civil government.

It is no exaggeration to say that the church, as represented by the clergy, is abreast—if not in advance—of even the political parties in point of zeal to discuss and enact resolutions relating to affairs of a purely political character.

An illustration of this was given in the national campaign of '96. It is a well-known fact that the most powerful and the most radical oratory called forth by that campaign, was heard in the pulpit.

And now that the nation is on the brink of war with Spain, the church again assumes the lead in the discussions which relate to the proper attitude of the civil government. The most radical action that has been proposed is that which has been called for by the church. This is true of at least one church—that of the Rev. Thos. Dixon, in New York City—whose congregation on Sunday last, the 17th, passed a resolution calling upon the Government to make war upon Spain by the 20th inst. at the very latest!

The church speaks in a manner which assumes an actual identity with the civil government. As an illustration of this fact, some points in the indictment against Spain, drawn up by the Methodist Conference lately in session in this city, are worthy of note. For example:—

"2. Its insolence in searching our merchantmen on the high seas and repudiation of claims for restitution.

"3. Its cowardly insult to our honored President by its representative at our nation's capital.

"4. Its trivial treatment of international diplomatic relations," etc.

There are ten counts in the indictment, some civil and some religious in character. Examples of the latter are furnished by the 8th, 9th, and 10th specifications, thus:—

"8. Its sacrilegious pretense of claiming to be a Christian nation.

"9. Its prostitution of the moral sense of our citizens, by obliging them for years to look upon and become familiar with fiendish barbarism," etc.

"10. Its paralyzing power upon the Christian civilization of the country," etc.

Of this religio-political manifesto the Independent (N. Y.) says:—

"We deprecate the inflammable resolutions of the New York Methodist Conference as designed to arouse the fiercer passions, and especially their appeal to intense religious prejudice. A war with Spain is enough; we do not want any religious question mixed with it."

But a "religious question" is just what will be mixed with every important act of governmental procedure, when governmental action is dictated and controlled by the church. And as the church is intruding herself more and more into politics, and taking upon herself more and more the responsibilities of the civil government, there is nothing else to be expected in the future of this nation than that civil and political questions will be mixed more and more in matters with which the Government has to do. And it may be set down as certain that when the church takes up one of these great political questions for settlement, there will be "inflammable resolutions," "designed to arouse the fiercer passions," as in the present instance, and as it was in the fierce campaign of '96.

And it will be very strange if during the present national crisis, or in the events that result from it, the church does not find some occasion for taking further steps toward the attainment of that position of virtual control and dictatorship in national affairs to which she evidently aspires.

CHRISTIAN principles are especially adapted in this world to the needs of the minority.

What Needs to be Driven Out.

THE indictment of Spain, drawn up by the New York Methodist Conference, sets forth that "humanity, honesty, virtue, reason, liberty, civilization, and Christianity demand the expulsion of this last consummate specimen of the criminal cruelties of a Latin civilization from the island, whose shores are touched by the same ideas that wash the coasts of this Republic."

It may be well that Spain should withdraw from the shores of the Western Hemisphere, but her departure will be to very little purpose if her ideas are left behind. The principles of Spanish government are vastly more dangerous to America than are the Spanish fleet and army.

We wish the New York Methodist Conference would manifest a little more hostility to these principles; for instance, to the union of church and state. This represents, most of all, the "criminal cruelties of Latin civilization." And we would remind them that the union of church and state had its beginning in the enactment of Sunday laws, under the Emperor Constantine. It was the emperor of Rome—the same Rome that is now fast joined with the government of Spain—who enacted the first law for Sunday observance, and it is through Latin civilization that such laws have come down to us and have found a lodgment among the institutions of a civilization that claims to stand for liberty and progress.

In getting rid of Latin civilization, let us by all means recognize religious legislation as a prominent feature of that civilization, and expel it from the ideas which "wash the coasts of this Republic."

THESE are days when "patriotism" covers a multitude of sins.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

I WOULD ask my readers to try to comprehend the situation in which the Christian mothers of this nation found themselves when they realized that the petitions which they had presented to governing bodies all over the land had been rejected. Realize if you can the labor which the canvassing for names to both pledges and petitions had entailed; the weariness of the "crusading" which had preceded both; the confidence that had been disappointed in every case; the hopes upon which life itself seemed to hang which had been killed in their hearts.

These experiences had also been a constant education in things that filled us with amazement and alarm. It seemed that nothing but ruin awaited us and our children, and no one can wonder that we began to question as never before.

When the victorious saloon-keeper and subsidized press began to say to us, "Where is now your God?" for a time we could only echo in our hearts with an awful sense of despair, "Where is now our God?"

In this story as we have told it, we have come up to about April and May of '74, and it is safe to say that for three or four weeks of that time there was more of questioning and less of the ordinary form of prayer by the women of this nation than had ever been known before. We met as usual in the places of worship; we went into our chambers with our Bibles, read and knelt as had been the life long habit, but instead of praise and petition, there was dumb, yearning, heart-breaking waiting and listening for some voice to drop down through the darkness into our silent anguish, and give us hope, and the power to, spiritually, live on. It was not long that we had to wait. When we had become still enough,—when we had come to realize that vain is the help of man,—there came to some of us what we could but recognize as a revelation from God, in the light of which we saw that this great evil had its root in ignorance, and could only be killed by a process of crowding in the knowledge of the truth.

The man who sold the drinks; the one whose money was invested in the saloon; the politician who used it for his own selfish promotion to place and power; the poor victim who fed it, with his own body and soul, his home, his wife and children; all were in it through ignorance and unbelief. If they could come to know God and his truth as we women knew him, they could never stay as they were; the bartender must stop filling glasses and fly from his business; the brewer and distiller must cease to manufacture; the capitalist to invest his money in it; the aspirant for public honors must become afraid of power and position obtained by such means; and the victim who had become reckless because he was hopeless, must see that there was deliverance for him from the bondage of appetite.

It was plain that we could not at once close up the saloons. We had before us a life-long educational process in principles and truths; we must more thoroughly organize for the purpose of as rapid work as possible, for the need was great enough to excuse the most urgent haste; but the task was so delicate in its nature that haste would be fatal. It was the King's business, and required haste according to the King's calendar; but it was also husbandry of a sort that could not bring a harvest in a day.

At first our hearts had been filled with indignation at the sorrows inflicted upon the women and little children because of the drunken men with whom they had to live; but we had come later on to see that the drunkard was himself a sufferer second to none. His was the agony of a soul who could but feel and see his own degradation and that to which he was dragging his loved ones, and was yet powerless to save himself or them, and we were aroused to the profoundest pity for him, and to most earnest consideration of methods for his deliverance.

Out of the efforts to bring all of these various classes of men to see the truth as God had revealed it to us in his Word, and to inspire the despairing with a hope of salvation, there was organized the Evangelistic Department of the W. C. T. U.

The "gospel meeting" came to be a regular institution wherever there was a Union, and women who had never before been able to do anything more public than to teach a Sunday school class, led these meetings, giving the plain gospel message that Christ came to save sinners, of any and all classes; that drunkards, saloon keepers, capitalists, and politicians could never be any worse than sinners, and that therefore the invitation "Whosoever will, may come," was to them.

In those days were fulfilled in a remarkable manner the words of Christ when he bade his disciples to go to the lost sheep, into the highways and hedges and "as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." Our women with their Bibles in their hands went from morning until night, for weeks and months and years (many are still going), into all haunts, of vice and poverty, looking after those who were considered lost; holding daily meetings in all manner of places, railway stations, prisons, cottages, churches, and in market places, wherever they could find a listening ear, preaching Christ and his uttermost salvation.

No compromise with evil can be in the interests of Christianity.

Romanism As It Is.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

It may be asked, How is it that the Protestants are so easily deceived by the Roman Catholic astuteness? The answer is simple. First—Because the majority of Protestants have abandoned the use of the weapons stored in the celestial armory, the only legitimate arms allowed by God to bring people to the knowledge of the glorious gospel truth; and have resorted to methods of Roman origin, employed by them in the Middle Ages; viz., prison, force, and human laws, to make people Christians; thus acknowledging that their preaching is ineffectual and powerless to uplift fallen man. Thus immediately that Protestantism stoops to such means to convert people from the error of their ways, she becomes papal in everything but the name. Second—Protestants are deceived by the hypocritical workings of the mystery of iniquity.

In the United States there exists no nominal connection between the church and state; there Catholic prelates pose as the fathers of religious liberty; and by rhetorical dissertations and discourses upon the tolerant spirit of the "mother" church; and their denial of the massacres, dark crimes, inquisitorial dramas and persecutions, ascribed to them, they throw dust into the eyes of the "liberal" Protestants, who are as anxious as the Catholics, to narrow the breach which has hitherto separated them. But would the Protestant carefully study the pages of history, in an impartial manner, he will find that the terrible crimes committed by Rome, in the name of religion, have been glossed over and underrated by historians, and not exaggerated as Catholics would have us believe. And yet in the face of these historical facts, Protestants will allow themselves to be duped by papish falsehoods; forgetting that one of the principal doctrines of Rome is, The end justifies the means.

But why look back so far? for we see incidents transpiring daily which clearly demonstrate the intolerant spirit that saturates the entire Catholic system. In the United States and England, both of which are Protestant countries, the papacy continually clamors for a fair field, and no favor, and they aver if this is conceded they are contented; and at the same time they pretend to allow these same advantages to all comers. But for the present we shall cite but one case of many, to prove the fallacy of such action

About three years ago the Anglican Archbishop of Dublin, Ireland, made a tour to Spain to consecrate the first Spanish Protestant bishop, and to dedicate the first Protestant church in the city of Madrid. Scarcely had it become publicly known, when a great uproar was raised, and the Catholic Archbishop of Madrid breathed forth threatenings against those Protestant intruders, and immediately appealed to the legislative assemblies to invalidate the Protestant bishop's consecration; and to prohibit the continuance of dissenter's worship in the former headquarters of the Iberian inquisition. And although he was unable to fully execute his malevolent designs, he eventually succeeded in having a statute passed to prohibit the Protestants from building an entrance to their church on the main street, so they have to be content with a small entrance to their house of worship, on a narrow side street.

Now if the Catholic Church is content with a fair field and no favor, why did their ecclesiastical primate in Spain protest against the free worship of the Anglicans in Madrid? Simply because in Spain Rome has the majority, and there you see her in her true colors.

May the Sun of Righteousness so illuminate the minds of Protestants of all lands, that they may discern the danger of compromising in any degree whatever with Rome, since such a course would eventually carry them down the stream of error, over the rapids of delusion, finally to be cast into the boiling waters of eternal destruction. "Awake, thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

The Attractive Power of the Church.

THE house of God which becomes noted in a neighborhood as a place in which many sinners have been "transformed by the renewing of their minds," will, by a certain instinct of our redeemed humanity, soon become a center of attraction, not only to those who, with scarcely any light, are groping after the truth, but even to men who are still hardily going on in sin. The greatest fame of Christianity is the fame of the cures she works, her greatest glory the glory of the saints she trains, her own unshared renown the renown of sinners renewed in the image of God; and wherever works of this kind are noised abroad in any community, there the preacher will not want hearers, there the sower will not be without a field.—Rev. William Arthur.

"THE heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

"In Bonds."

"Unto the furtherance of the gospel." Phil. 1:12.

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

HAST heard the great apostle speak
Of bonds? Hast heard? Hast heard?
Art thou in bonds sad, tempted, weak,
And hast thou understood the word,—
How for the furtherance of God's grace
It happened by His ministry?
And art thou sighing in thy place,
When God will work the same for thee?

Look at the great apostle's face
Glorious as Stephen's, yet how wan!
Standing a king with royal grace
To preach to kings as man to man.
And yet if bonds had not been his,
No king had heard his message given.
Would he be free and fail of this?
Bound so of earth, freed so of heaven!

So God's beloved, where thou art,
Bound with temptation, sorrow, grief.
Lay thou no charge against God's heart.
Let faith reach up for love's relief.
And thou, for learning trust, shalt know
A secret that hath fragrant wings
For furtherance of the gospel. So
Thy gift shall stand thy feet with kings.

And when thou seest heaven come down,
And earth with ministering angels stirred,
When tears fall 'neath a monarch's crown
As he sits trembling at God's word,
When slaves about his throne are freed
To live or die for Christ through thee,
Thy bond-chains shall be light indeed
For such rewarded ministry.

Why It Will Succeed.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THERE are many religious organizations in this country which are doing all that they possibly can to have Sunday enforced by law.

If they can do it on constitutional grounds, by simply having the Constitution changed so that the law, as professedly a part of Christianity, can be incorporated into and made a part of the Constitution, well and good; but if they cannot do it constitutionally, they are determined that it shall be done anyway.

That they will ultimately succeed is certain, for the Word of God has clearly foretold this. But not only may one know this from this source. It may also be known from the fact, as Col. Richard M. Johnson, in his report to the Senate in 1829, says that "all religious despotism commences by combination and influence; and when that influence begins to operate upon the political institutions of a country, the civil power soon bends under it; and the catastrophe of other nations furnishes an awful warning of the consequences."

That this is true is proven from the fact that the foremost political institution of this country—Congress—has bent under it.

During the time of the World's Fair at Chicago, the determination of the church people to have the fair closed on Sunday was so great that by persistent threats of inflicting political death upon the members, Congress finally yielded, and in so doing took it upon itself to declare, notwithstanding the commandment itself to the contrary, that the day required to be kept holy is "the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday." And it is only a question of time when all that is in that step will be fully developed, and the people of this nation be compelled to accept Sunday as the Sabbath day, or be subject to imprisonment, and even worse, as traitors to their country and to God.

Sunday, it is claimed, is the mark of the nation whose God is the Lord. But the Lord is not yet officially recognized as the king of this nation. But it is the determination of a large religious element—the National Reform Association, the W. C. T. U., Christian Endeavor Society, and many other societies—that "Christ shall be this world's king—yea, verily, this world's king in its realm of cause and effect—king of its courts, its camps, its commerce—king of its colleges and cloisters—king of its customs and constitutions."

It has gotten to be so now that anything that passes under the name of Christianity is considered to be all right, and so without stopping to try the spirits they just take it all in.

But let it be remembered that in "all the religious persecutions with which almost every page of modern history is stained, no victim ever suffered but for the violation of what government denominated God's law." And consequently every religious persecution has been carried on to the "glory of God."

Of course those who waged them never intended to persecute. When the papacy had control of the civil power it did not punish heretics but for the purpose of saving their souls. Or if the heretic was incorrigible he was only put out of the way so that others should not be contaminated by the deadly error.

And so of this present movement to enthrone Christ as this nation's king and to enforce the keeping of his laws(?)—notably the Sunday—they do not intend to persecute; they only intend that the law shall be obeyed. But all history attests the fact that there is nothing worse than a religious bigot who has the opportunity to enforce his own ideas by law.

But when they shall have succeeded in crowning Christ on "Capitol Hill," and he begins his benign reign, how shall the fact be known? Why, simply by the enforcement of his sign—his mark—Sunday.

But, as before shown, Sunday is not the sign or mark of Christ. It is the mark of the papacy. And the very essence of the papacy is the putting of a man in the place of God—a man "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, . . . so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." 2 Thess. 2:4.

Hence, the enforcement of the Sunday will simply mean that by law man has been exalted to the place of God.

As before said of those that will persecute, they do not intend to do this. So of this matter of exalting man in the place of God, they do not by any means intend to do this. But it will be done nevertheless.

It was so in Christ's day. We have the testimony of the Holy Spirit himself that those who put Christ to death did not intend to slay the Lord of life and glory. 1 Cor. 2:8. Had they known that he was all this they would have drawn back horrified at the very thought of such a thing. But nevertheless they did it just as effectually as though they knew that he was the Lord of life and glory. And in doing it they fulfilled the prophecies that foretold it. How, then, does it come that those professed people of God could do such a thing. The apostle Paul gives us the answer in Acts 13:27, "For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets which are read every Sabbath day, they have fulfilled them in condemning him." They fulfilled the very Scriptures that they professed to believe, and which were read in their hearing every Sabbath. How blind they must have been!

But before we denounce them too severely let us be sure that we are not similarly situated.

Let those who now read the prophets that foretold the death of Christ and how it was to be done—having the same Scriptures before them, which they profess to believe, see if they may not be engaged in a similar work.

Had the Jews known him and the voices of the prophets, they would not have done what they did. And were the voices of the prophets known and believed now, men would not be seeking to put a man in the place of God.

The Jews of old were told over and over again, and were shown from the Scriptures that he whom they ultimately put to death was verily the Christ, but they refused to believe it. So it is to day. Over and over again the people have been told the truth, and the prophecies set before them that foretell what will be done in this country, but like those of old, they refuse to believe. And their very unbelief leads them to fulfil the Scriptures against themselves.

But a few saw the truth back there; thank God there will be those who will see it now.

"As to [Sunday] amusements, it seems to me that the less we depend upon legislation and the more upon education and the pressure of public opinion to keep the day from degenerating into one of mere self-indulgence, the better. It is putting Christianity in a false and ignoble position to even make it appear that her power and indeed her very existence are involved in a law-protected Sunday."—Rev. Hugh Pedley.

THE Government has issued a proclamation declaring that the people of Cuba are and of right ought to be, free and independent, but refusing to recognize the Cuban Insurgent government. But the Insurgent government is the only government on the island that stands for freedom and independence from Spanish rule. All those in Cuba which do not adhere to the Insurgent cause proclaim by that fact that they do not want to be independent. Hence the Government has undertaken the task of making free and independent a people who do not want to be free, but are satisfied to let the government remain as it was. How it will succeed in this rather curious enterprise, remains to be seen. But in any event, the resulting government can hardly fail to be an improvement over Spanish rule.

THE Washington correspondent of the Chicago Times-Herald, in speaking of the efforts of certain ones to make political capital out of the war question, says:—

"It is not believed the American Congress has sunk so low that it is going to convert a high Christian task into a mere political trick."

What "high Christian task" it is that the American Congress has on hand, this writer does not tell. The article in which the sentence is used is altogether devoted to the war situation over Cuba and the "Maine." Congress has no Christian task to perform at all, and never can have. It is neither a Christian body nor a body of Christians.

This sentence is a striking illustration of the utter confusion of thought that obtains with respect to what is a Christian, and what a Christian task would be.

"SCORES of protests against the Sunday work at the Brooklyn Navy Yard," says a New York daily, "have been received from ministers and other persons by Rear-Admiral Bunce, commandant of the yard. . . . Admiral Bunce has referred the objectors to the Secretary of the Navy. Most of them take the ground that by being fitted out on Sunday, disaster is sure to overtake these vessels."

It is all right to fight, say these same clergymen,—all right to kill people with the guns of these ships of war, and destroy cities and other property; all right to entail the misery and ruin which must come from war; the protest is not against this; it is against work being done on Sunday. If work were not done on Sunday, God would favor them in their mission of death and destruction; for God does not care how many people are killed and how many others are plunged into misery and ruin; what he is particular about is that there shall be no work done on Sunday. And since his will is not observed in this, he will bring disaster upon the ships of war, which means triumph to the enemy. God would rather the government of Spain in Cuba—with all its horrors—should continue than that American ships of war should be fitted out on Sunday. All this is said, in effect, in these protests against Sunday work. Evidently it would be difficult to name anything which, in the view of this class of persons, would be worse than the desecration of Sunday.

A FORCIBLE comment on the supposed antagonism between civilization and superstition, is the following, which appeared in a recent issue of the Cincinnati Enquirer:—

"Owing to the rapid rising of the Ohio River, the most reverend archbishop directs, that in order to avert the hardships and sufferings caused by a flood as well as other tribulations, the priests recite in mass, for three months, the collect Pro quacumque necessitate, and after mass, one Our Father and Hail Mary.

"After the expiration of the three months they will say for three days in mass the prayer Pro Gratiarum Actione, and after mass one Our Father and Hail Mary.

"By order of the Archbishop,

"HENRY MOELLER,
"Chancellor."

The only sure cure for superstition is faith.

"THE possibility of a republic in name, with scarcely a vestige of the substance of republican institutions, now presented by France," says the New York Christian Advocate, "should be a solemn warning to the United States jealously to watch all modifications that may take away the real liberties of the people enjoyed in the earlier days of the republic." France is a military despotism; and so likewise is Germany, Russia, and every other country where the war spirit has had full opportunity for development. The great armies "protect" the country against neighboring nations, but what is most wanted is something to protect the people from the terrible oppressions which the maintenance of the great armies forces upon them.

As a last resort to avert hostilities with the United States, it was proposed to Spain that she cede the island of Cuba to the pope, who, it was said, would then declare its independence. But if, in such a case the pope should choose to declare Cuba subject to the papacy, the administration of the "government" to be still in the hands of Spain—as the ally of the papacy—the Government of the United States would be placed in an awkward predicament, since it would be obliged to make war on the papacy, or recede from its demands respecting Cuba. And there is not a government on earth that would think for a moment of declaring war on the papacy. Such a step on the part of any government would be the signal for civil war at home, between the adherents of the papacy and other citizens,—an event which no government could afford to encounter.

* * *

THE question of a Roman Catholic chapel at West Point has again cropped out in governmental affairs, and it is stated that a bill providing for the erection of such a building has been favorably reported to Congress by the Committee on Military Affairs. The papacy is nothing if not persistent, and her machinations require the exercise of "eternal vigilance."

* * *

THE man who assumes to be the earthly head of Christendom, and who recognizes Spain and the United States as being Christian nations, has failed to prevent these same nations from fighting each other. He has the choice, now, therefore, of admitting either that he is not the head of Christendom, or that one or the other of these nations is not Christian. He is logically bound to do one of these two things.

* * *

"Of course it is the pope's duty," says the Independent, "to do what he could to prevent war. Those people have little sense of Christian duty who find fault with him, or call it interference." Was it his "Christian duty" to try to prevent the starving to death by Spain of several hundred thousand Cuban women and children? If he had done his "Christian duty" in that, his actions might with some reason not be regarded as "interference" now.

Papal Impertinence.

"The Examiner," New York City.

THE attempt of Pope Leo XIII. to thrust himself into the controversy between Spain and the United States, at this late day, is a forcible reminder of the fact that he has been a passive spectator of the frightful atrocities perpetrated by loyal sons of the Roman Church upon their helpless co-religionists during the past two years.

This crime of the centuries has met no rebuke from him. Hundreds of thousands of his own flock have been doomed to a lingering death by starvation, but no voice has thundered from the Vatican in denunciation of the villainy. But now that Catholic Spain is in peril, now that her wicked rule in Cuba is threatened, now that the interests of the church are likely to suffer loss through the losses of Spain, "His Holiness" is all anxiety and zeal.

We do not mean to be uncharitable; but we cannot but regard this sudden activity of the pope, so strongly in contrast with the indifference he has displayed toward the sufferings of the oppressed Cubans, as the result of anxiety for Spain and the Catholic Church rather than of desire for peace.

He cannot plead ignorance of the condition of affairs in Cuba. All the world knew of Weyler's edict and what it meant, and an official inquiry of the papal representatives in the island would have put him in possession of the facts. But he made no sign, and the infamy went on. The pope's eleventh-hour attempt to stay the punishment of the crime comes too late. He might have interposed to stop the Spanish atrocity with a good grace; his effort to save Spain from the consequences of her evil conduct is an impertinence.

Another Conviction in Plainfield, N. J.

ANOTHER of the individuals arrested in Plainfield, N. J., for keeping open store on Sunday—a man named Huff—has been tried and found guilty of this "crime." We have not yet heard what sentence was pronounced by the court.

As showing the religious character of the Sunday law, the following account of the trial, taken from the Plainfield Courier-News, of April 16, is of interest:—

"Two more of the Sunday-selling cases were tried yesterday afternoon in the City Court, and these two finish the test. All the eleven who were arrested on March 20, for violating the ordinance, have now been disposed of. The two tried yesterday were Fred Huff and Morris Kodenski. Huff was found guilty and sentence was deferred for one week. Kodenski, who is a Russian Jew, and keeps a store at 836 South Second Street, proved to the court conclusively that he kept Saturday for religious reasons, and Counsellor Craig A. Marsh promptly moved to have the case dismissed, and Kodenski was discharged.

"The city's witnesses were Roundsman Flynn and Patrolman McCarthy, who told how they went to Huff's stand at the end of the trolley line on Sunday, March 20, and purchased a package of tobacco and one cigar. Huff admitted the sale, but claimed that he had a right to keep open on Sunday as he was a 'Seventh-day.' When asked how long he had observed it, Huff said that upon reading the Bible and studying it he had come to the conclusion that Saturday was the true Sabbath, and consequently began to observe it early last September. When asked if he intended to unite with the Seventh-day Baptist Church, his answer was that he hadn't made up his mind yet.

"Another line of defense was that he made a specialty of lunches and sold cigars and candy only when he had to. Another point Huff made was that his waiting-room was a convenience to the church-going public. Huff had two witnesses who testified that he kept Saturday as the Sabbath. One of them, Mr. Weber, knew that Huff came around dressed up on Saturday, and on being told that Huff had turned 'Seventh-day,' believed it. When asked what churches he attended on Saturday, Huff refused to say, although he afterwards admitted that he went to the Catholic and Presbyterian churches."

It is clear from this fact that Mr. Huff was prosecuted because he was not sufficiently religious; and a law under which a man is condemned on religious grounds cannot be other than a religious law, which has no proper place in the machinery of civil government.

"Some dangers of a sea fight," are described in The Independent (N. Y.), of April 21, by Mr. Park Benjamin. We quote one paragraph:—

"In our last war the forts at Mobile and New Orleans used grape and canister shot with much effect against our attacking fleets; but this was at very close range. At long range, shell and the flying splinters of wooden vessels were the principal agents of wholesale destruction. But now the huge shells will begin to come on board from the high-power guns when the contending vessels are nearly three miles apart. The largest guns, twelve and thirteen-inch caliber, can be loaded and fired almost once every three minutes. At a little less than two miles' distance the five and six-inch rapid fire guns will begin to pour in their projectiles, and these weapons can be loaded and fired at the rate of from seven to fifteen aimed shots per minute. Then come the six-pounder guns, delivering forty shots per minute, the one-pounders, throwing a shot per minute, the machine one-pounders (Maxim-Nordenfeldt), two hundred shots per minute, and so on up to the Gatlings, fed automatically by electric motors and projecting bullets at the rate of 3,000 per minute. A man might brave a storm of grape and bullets with a chance of escape; but the battle of the Yalu River showed that under the quick fire hail of the Japanese ships the slaughter on the Chinese ships was so frightful that the Chinese with all their stolid contempt for death could hardly be kept at their posts. So fierce was the storm of steel around the attacked vessels that the sea was literally lashed into foam by it."

All of which only shows that General Sherman's remark—"War is hell"—will be even more true to day, if possible, than it was when he uttered it.

WAR is but the application of force to settle a dispute in which each of the contending parties claims to be in the right. It is upon the theory, therefore, that "might makes right." But Christianity recognizes no such theory as that.

ONE of the curious things which are happening in connection with the war scare is the exodus of Spaniards from New York and other American cities, to Havana, for the purpose of securing safety. It would seem that any person with ordinary sense would know that Havana is of all places on earth the most unsafe at the present hour.

A PROMINENT member of the Canadian Parliament, the Hon. John Charlton, recently introduced a bill prohibiting American Sunday newspapers from coming into Canada, and any paper from being published in Canada on Sunday. The measure was vigorously discussed in the Canadian House, and was finally defeated by a vote of 43 to 60.

Studies in French History.—19.

"I THINK," said Charlie White to his mother, when he reached home that night, "that Professor Carman's talks on French history are more and more interesting. It makes me very anxious to go with father next summer, and visit some of these places I have heard about so much; and I think Rob is as anxious as I am. I tell you, mother, we're studying hard, and I think we'll pass examination pretty well. Don't you think so?"

"I hope so, Charlie; but I trust you will not forget that you are building character all this time. I do not want you to study solely for the purpose of 'passing,' but because it will the better fit you for usefulness in the world."

The next Tuesday afternoon found the little class assembled in the professor's room, eager to hear about the battle of Calais.

"Who can tell me where the city of Calais is situated?" asked the teacher. "Edna, you may please locate it on the map."

"I suppose it's somewhere in France," said Edna, taking the pointer, and stepping up to the map, "but I don't see it just now."

"You are looking too far south, Edna," volunteered Rob Billings, "it's away up there on the northern coast,—that's right,—there it is, just across from England."

"You see, we are not done with Edward the Third, yet," began the teacher, "or, rather, he is not done with France. So he next goes over to Calais and lays siege to it. This siege lasted for more than a year. The town was strongly fortified, and so he determined to starve the wretched inhabitants until they would yield."

"Couldn't King Philip have reached them with supplies by sea?" asked Joe Palmeter.

"No; for Edward had the coast so securely guarded by his own ships, that no help could reach the miserable people from that quarter."

"Did Philip make any effort to save them at all?" asked Milly Brown.

"Yes; but when he came near enough to see how strong the English were, he became faint hearted, and went away, taking his army with him. So the joy and gladness of the poor people, caused by a sight of the king coming, as they thought, to help them, was short lived. They became at last so reduced for eatables, that every stray rat had been eagerly devoured, and the starving people were even forced to chew and swallow their boots and shoes. At last Calais was forced to surrender."

"I am thinking if this is not the time when those six noble men came from the city and stood before Edward, with halters around their necks, and whom the queen saved by her pleading," said Harry Ray.

"Yes, it was at Calais, Harry, that this occurred; but this belongs more properly to English history. But we are made glad to know that in those selfish and troublous times so kind-hearted a woman lived as Queen Philippa, of England.

"King Philip spent much time in massing together large armies. But he did not need to do this, as they were of little use. He might much better have spent his time more profitably. His poor people were in the meantime taxed most cruelly to support the useless armies."

"Speaking of taxes," said Joe Palmeter, "I have read about the 'Gabelle Tax.' What was that, if you please, professor?"

"It was an unjust tax on salt, and was forced upon the miserable inhabitants during this time. Then, as if the poor people had not suffered enough already, the cruel king began the debasing of the coin. After awhile, no one could be certain of the value of any money which he held, and it almost drove the unhappy people to distraction. It became almost impossible to do any business at all; and instead of the gay city of Paris, which was the envy of kings, at the beginning of Philip's reign, it is said that grass now grew in its streets. Of course the track of the English army was one of ruin and desolation, and the poor country of France no longer happy and flourishing, seemed blasted and withered with desolation.

"As if to add to the horrors of the time, a dreadful pestilence broke out, called the Black Death."

"Well, I should suppose this would put a stop to the fighting, at least," said Jennie Jacobs.

"It did, indeed. The people had enough to do now, without fighting. But, again, the voice of superstition and bigotry makes itself heard, and the miserable Jews are again the objects of attack. The frenzied Frenchmen accuse them again of poisoning the wells."

"What object could it have been for them to do that?" asked Charlie White, indignantly.

"None whatever, Charlie; but prejudice is blind and unreasoning, and never stops to ask if this or that is right or just. So, many thousands of the poor unfortunate wretches were cast into the flames without mercy."

"I wonder if the Jews who suffered so much at the hands of so-called Christians, ever remembered the awful words of their fathers: 'His blood be upon us, and upon our children,'" said Julia March.

"I dare say they did not. But still, even though they did the dreadful deed of crucifying their Lord, do you think that sinful men have any right to take it upon themselves to punish their descendants?"

"No, indeed, professor; they have none whatever," said Joe Palmeter, stoutly.

"No; for it is written, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord,'" exclaimed Professor Carman, earnestly, as he dismissed the class.

Mrs. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Charlie and Christian Citizenship.

"WHY, Charlie, my boy, how late you are from school to-day! Whatever has kept you?" asked Mrs. Ross.

Charlie's face told her that something unusual had happened.

"Something has happened," she said, pushing him toward a chair, and taking his books from his hands. "Tell me what it is."

"Yes, mama. We had a little of the Dark Ages in school to-day."

"What do you mean, Charlie?"

"You know with all the talk about war, that the spirit of patriotism is being aroused. To-day the superintendent came into the schoolroom with the American flag, and said that the Ladies' Relief Corps connected with the G. A. R. had been instrumental in a large degree in getting the flag a place in the schoolroom. He said that the wisdom of the movement was apparent to all statesmen, and asked us all to give the salute. It looks very innocent on the surface, and mama, if it had not been for the studies we have had on our relation to God as a Spirit to be worshiped in spirit and in truth, I do not know that I should have hesitated at the salute, and should probably have felt fully as indignant as some of the boys and girls were, when a few of us refused to do it."

"Why, Charlie, what could have kept you from saluting 'Old Glory?'"

"The words of the salute itself—'We give our heads and our hearts to God and our country.' This declaration is one that cannot be harmonized with the principles taught by Christ, or even with the principles taught by the signers of the Declaration of Independence. In the first place the school that represents the State has no right to demand that its pupils pledge their hearts to God. Has it, mama?"

"No, Charlie; such a requirement assumes the right of religious control, and no State has such a right. The Scriptures show us plainly that religion is a heart relation to God."

"Yes, mama; but in this salute the whole school is required to take the vow, and you know that the most of the school children would utter it without understanding its meaning, or if they did, without caring, or in hypocrisy. Many of the boys and girls have no regard for God, and would simply perjure themselves by taking the pledge. But beside the effect on the character in adding to iniquity hypocrisy, the State is overstepping its rights, and defeating the purpose for which it was ordained. This is the way I have looked at it, mama. Ever since we have been studying the principles of civil and religious liberty, a few of us boys have been spending our recess hour in talking things over. In fact we have organized a religious liberty circle, and have been reading the best authorities we could find on this question. And, mama, history furnishes plenty of examples of what this kind of interference leads to. Of course, mama, I do not think that the United States would ever be guilty of swaying back to the methods of the Dark Ages; but it is just as well to keep the camel's head out of the tent. Straws show which way the wind blows, and it does seem as one thinks on the demand for religious legislation, that it is time to begin to inquire what it all means. Some one has said, 'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.'"

"Yes, Charlie. But I am interested to know just how you met the demand, and how your refusal to salute was received."

"Why, mama, when the rest arose, we simply kept our seats. The superintendent asked us why we did not obey his request, and one after another we arose and gave our reasons."

"What did he say, Charlie?"

"O, at first he rather ridiculed us, and said that no doubt we were the people, and wisdom would die with us. He used many of the arguments that have met dissenters in all ages, and said it was a strange thing for a few puny boys to set up their judgment against the judgment of authority and wisdom. He intimated that we were traitors, and of the stuff that anarchists are made of."

"At this Richard Flanders rose up and asked respectfully if the flag were not an emblem of liberty."

"The superintendent had to acknowledge that it was."

"Richard then said, 'Very well; in refusing to surrender that of which the flag was an emblem, we did it the truest honor. He said true patriotism did not consist in a sentimental regard for the flag, but in standing stiffly for what the flag represents. He added that the past had proved that those who did this were its best friends, and the future might have occasion to find out the same fact. As an emblem of liberty long may it wave.'"

"Why, that was quite eloquent."

"Yes; and we all rose and bowed our heads."

"The superintendent saw that he was in some embarrassment, and the students began to prick up their ears. I felt that I must say a few words, and so arose and told them what I thought it meant to give our hearts to God. It meant to obey him, to keep his law, even if the law of the State forbade, to walk in the footsteps of Christ who said to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsars, and unto God the things that are God's. As it was not Cæsar's right to demand that I should give my heart to God, I would not render any concession to this unwarranted demand. To my country I would render only that which my country had a right to demand. As an emblem of liberty civil and religious, the flag should have my profound respect. Then, mama, something came over me, and I felt my face grow white. I said, This is our flag's glory; but it seems to me that there are many who, Judas-like, are seeking to betray it with a kiss. Once let the so-called friends of the flag make it an emblem of despotism, and its glory is departed."

"I believe, mama, if the superintendent had not frowned as he did, that the pupils would have applauded."

"During noon hour, we had quite an exciting time, and most of us boys made stump speeches for the glory of 'Old Glory.'"

"Our teacher is a strong Christian Endeavorer, and in the afternoon she had one of her comrades there to speak to us. You know, mama, how strong the Christian Endeavor movement has become. Why, I was reading only yesterday that in Great Britain last year, the membership increased 250,000. It numbers about 5,000,000, I think. It is made up, as you know, from young people, and they are fired with enthusiasm."

"Yes, dear, I know. No doubt they have done and will do a great deal of good. They certainly will if their zeal is according to wisdom."

"But, mama, they are in danger of being switched off from Christian Endeavor work to something that resembles the satanic endeavor that we have seen marked out in the history of nations that have compelled conscience, and turned men into hypocrites and knaves."

"What do you mean by that, Charlie?"

"I mean that they have allied themselves together for the enforcement of religion. They are talking of 'Christian Citizenship,' and holding out the idea that Christ's cause needs the support of State law."

"Is it so?" asked Mrs. Ross.

"Yes, it is. The young Endeavorer to-day told of conventions numbering thousands where this theme was the topic of consideration. Of course, mama, it sounds very grand to hear them talk of capturing the world for Christ, of going up in a body, like a company of soldiers, to subject the world to Jesus as King. But it is the method of doing the business that I object to; for the result will be nothing but a sham, and will leave the world worse than before. The old crusade spirit seems to be in the movement. They do not stop to consider that Christ said, 'My kingdom is not of this world,' and that his method for converting the world was by preaching the gospel, and not by appealing to law."

"Yes, Charlie; no Christian has a citizenship in this world. Our citizenship is in heaven."

"But the worst of it is that these ideas are being brought right into the school. They want us to pledge ourselves to vote for 'Christian Citizenship;' and one thing this means is to vote for Sunday laws."

"Now you know, mama, that I'm a temperance boy, and will vote prohibition if I ever vote at all, because liquor drinking is a menace to men's lives and liberties; but to enforce Sunday laws would be to take away men's right to worship or not worship God according to the dictates of their consciences. No one has a right to enforce Sunday laws. Of course I have lately begun to observe the Bible Sabbath—the seventh day—and do not

Mrs. Ross looked very serious. "We are coming to the times that try men's souls," she said. "God grant we may suffer only as Christians, and if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed." F. B.

Invaluable to Bible and History Students

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, APRIL 28, 1898.

THE only thing that Jesus Christ ever did in the way of using force among men was to take a "whip of small cords" and cleanse the temple of God. He used force—or its equivalent—to drive worldly men out of the temple of God; but to-day his professed representatives want to use force to drive worldly men into that temple.

"You can no more run a war on benevolent principles than you can let a gun go off easy." So says a leading secular journal of this city; but a good many of the clergymen are trying to convince the people that war can be conducted on Christian principles.

DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, in Madison, N. J., is threatened with the necessity of closing up because nearly all the theological students want to go to the war to fight. A secular journal makes note of the fact with the appropriate remark that the tender of their services constitutes "what is perhaps the most unique offer that Uncle Sam has yet received."

A CORRESPONDENT who is a staunch friend of religious liberty takes exception to the application made in a recent SENTINEL of the prophecy of Isaiah 60. He thinks that if it is true that this prophecy applies to the church of Christ, the position of National Reform advocates must be correct. We believe it will only be necessary in reply to remind him that the fundamental feature of the National Reform program is the coercion of worldly people to the observances of religion by incorporating the latter in the "fundamental law of the land"; while the prophecy in question presents the Gentiles as being drawn to the church because of the bright light which she reflects from the glory of God. There is no hint of coercion in it. It is the gospel principle that is set forth of drawing men from the world through the manifestation of the power and glory—which is the goodness—of God. National Reform coerces people, Christianity wins them. Here is the vital distinction between the two.

THE AMERICAN SENTINEL does not assume the position of an adviser of this or any other civil government. We say this in reply to the assertion some have made that the SENTINEL was trying to run the Government, while telling Christians that they could not properly take part in political affairs. If this were true, the SENTINEL's position would of course be very inconsistent; but it is not true. The SENTINEL says that civil government should not do certain things which constitute an interference with natural rights. This is not saying how the government should be run, but only how, as regards these rights, it should not be run. And it says this from the standpoint of Christianity; not as taking part in civil government, but as stating to men the divine truth which was summed up by Jesus Christ in the words, "Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." And it says these things to men in order that they may escape the condemnation and disaster which a different course from that set forth in these words of Christ must bring upon them.

AN Episcopal church in Detroit, says the New York Sun, gave this notice in an inscription nailed over its door, the evening of the 20th:—

"This church will be open for prayers until Spain answers."

The pastor and a number of the more devoted of his congregation, says the Sun, "assembled in the church at an early hour this morning, and throughout the day [April 21], at intervals of one hour, they besought the Almighty to avert war. The almost continuous service will continue to-morrow; but now that a conflict is inevitable, their invocations will be in behalf of the Michigan troops and the honor of the country. Other churches expect to begin similar services."

Of course, to pray in behalf of the troops sent to the war, and for the "honor of the country," is to pray that the troops may do some good fighting; since the better fighting they do, and the more of the enemy's ships and cities are sunk and captured, the more "honor" will there be in it for the victorious party. First, then the church prays that there may be no fighting; but that prayer not being answered, it turns and prays that there may be real hot fighting, such as the "honor" of the troops and of the country requires. Just where the consistency is in such procedure is not clear to us.

A STATE of war now exists between the United States and the government of Spain. And as Spain is allied with the papacy, there being in Spain a close union of church and state, the American government is virtually at war with the papacy. We would suggest therefore to those whom it may concern, that the occasion be improved by repudiating papal institutions and ideas which have fastened themselves upon any branch of the national or state governments; such, for example, as laws for the enforcement of Sunday observance. The papal origin of such laws is unquestioned; and being of papal descent, there can be no question as to their un-American character.

MISSIONARIES of the American Board in Spain have removed to France for safety, in view of the withdrawal of governmental protection from Americans residing on Spanish soil. The Omnipotent, however, is still there to protect those who put their trust in Him.

SPAIN is still working to gain the sympathy of Europe in her attitude towards this country and Cuba; but she is not likely to reap any practical benefit from the effort.

THE "force" which represents Christianity is the Holy Spirit.

THE blood that counts in the Christian warfare is the blood of Christ.

THE best protective armor that was ever devised is the "shield of faith."

No law of man ever contributed to the stability of the government of heaven.

THE best declaration of independence is an acknowledgment of dependence on God.

THERE is tremendous power in a thirteen-inch shell, fired from a modern navy cannon; but there is infinitely greater power in one word of God.

THE church is about the only body of intelligent people in civilized lands who cannot see that the future of the world is dark with the clouds of war.

IF God cannot preserve the Sabbath in the earth without the aid of civil governments, it is because he cannot preserve Christians; for Christians always observe the Sabbath.

You cannot appreciate the Sabbath unless you appreciate God; and you cannot appreciate God so long as you think you must have the help of an earthly power to enable you to do right.

THE giant of war has at last been roused from his slumbers, and he does not mean to go to sleep again until he has imposed a heavy task upon civilization.

"THE Sabbath was made for man," and when God had finished making it for man he gave it to man—to every man. And what is needed now is not more of the gift, but more people to accept the gift and appreciate it.

"Peaceful" War.

WAR is a terrible thing; and it was never more terrible than it is and must be to-day, by reason of the deadly elements with which modern science has supplied it. Appreciating this fact, but convinced that hostilities are a necessity of the situation, the Government is conducting a "peaceful" blockade of Cuban ports, the commanders of the naval forces having been instructed not to fire into the cities nor against the forts of the enemy. A blockade of course means the cutting off of supplies, with the object of forcing the enemy to choose between starvation and surrender.

But wherein is it worse to kill people by a bombardment than to kill them by starvation? Starvation is a lingering form of death and attacks every individual in the beleaguered place, while a bombardment would at the worst be short and would leave many of the inhabitants uninjured. There can be no question but that a bombardment is more merciful to a city than a "peace" blockade, when the blockade is, as it is meant to be, effective.

No, Mr. President; you cannot conduct war in a peaceful manner. War—if it is war in fact—is the opposite of peace, everywhere and always. There is no use trying to make real war by Christian and humane methods. Such methods do not apply to real war at all, and the attempt to unite things so incongruous can only make it worse in the end. "You can no more conduct a war on benevolent principles than you can let a gun go off easy."

In the regulations to which the "Christian nations," Spain and the United States, have announced that they will adhere in conducting the war with each other, we find no statement that there will be no "business" transacted on Sundays. We do not see why a battleship should not keep Sunday as well as a saloon.

A Christian Duty.

FOR two years or more the Cuban "reconcentrados" have been dying of starvation in the cities whither they were sent by the decree of the Spanish general Weyler. They are still dying from the same cause, and we are told that the American people have a Christian duty to perform in the matter.

Now it is a Christian duty to relieve distress, certainly. It is a Christian's duty to deal his bread to the hungry; there can be no doubt about that. And it is his duty to do this under all circumstances. If he has bread to give, he is to give it to those who are perishing for the lack of it, knowing that such is the will of God, and trusting in God to enable him to perform that will, and to take care of the results.

But what did the people of this country do in performance of this plain Christian duty toward their fellow-beings in Cuba during the two years following General Weyler's decree? That a little was done, we do not doubt; but it was only a little. It was not enough to prevent the death of hundreds of thousands of the women and children who were the victims of Weyler's cruelty. Plainly, they left their Christian duty in this matter unperformed.

It may be said that they could not do this; the Spanish forces would not permit it. But who knows that they would not? Perhaps they wouldn't, when supplies of food were to be sent in ships of war. Spain did object to that, and quite naturally. But would Spain not have permitted the Christian people of this country to feed the starving Cubans in a peaceable manner? There is no proof that she would not. Miss Clara Barton, we are told, testifies that the work of the Red Cross Society in Cuba was not hindered by the Spanish forces, and that the food brought and stored by the society for the Cubans was not disturbed by the Spanish troops.

The Christian people of this country might have fed the suffering people of Cuba in a Christian way, and thus have discharged a plain Christian duty and have received a blessing from the God of mercy. Of this we do not believe there can be a particle of doubt.

But is it not a marvelous thing that these Christian people, having failed for two years to discern this Christian duty, now discover that it is their Christian duty to relieve the suffering in Cuba by fighting the Spanish! And what seems chiefly to have impressed this duty upon them was the blowing up of the battleship "Maine."

The carnal mind can quite readily discover "Christian duty," when it is something to be performed in a carnal way.

The War, and the Result.

WHAT events will follow as a result of the outbreak of war between this Government and Spain, are as yet matters of conjecture; but there is one result which it requires no supernatural vision to foresee. It is one which the nations have already foreseen, and which is giving them no small concern. It is the development of militarism in the United States.

Whether this country wins or loses in the contest will not be a matter of so much consequence to this country and to the world as will the development of the military power in this country which the war must inevitably bring.

For be it remembered that the situation to day is governed by vastly different circumstances from those which prevailed at the time of the contest between North and South. At the end of that war the great armies which had been called into the field melted quickly and easily away into the general body of civilians engaged in the peaceful pursuits of life, and so far as the military power was concerned, there was soon little evidence remaining that the nation had fought one of the greatest wars in modern history. But the ascendancy of the military power to day would not be followed by a like result.

The world is dominated to-day by the war spirit to an extent that was not dreamed of thirty years ago. For years Europe has been a great armed camp, and the peace of the world has been in unstable equilibrium. The nations, in reaching out under the impulse given by advancing science, exploration, and the desire for colonial extension, have come into closer contact with each other; so that a move on the part of any one of them is liable to cause a serious disturbance. There has come to be a "balance of power"; that is, the military power of Europe is balanced, and as every person knows, it requires no great thing to upset things when they are evenly balanced. Let something be added to one scale, or taken from it, and the balance is upset at once.

And this "balance of power" really extends over the whole civilized world. For in these days of swift travel and intercommunication, even the broad expanse of ocean does not isolate the affairs of one nation from those of others. The interests of the nations of the Old World are in intimate contact with those of the American republic; they touch the shores of every nation of the Western hemisphere. And a disturbance on this side of the Atlantic may easily be of such proportions as to throw the balance of power out of its present equilibrium and necessitate a readjustment which could only come after a fearful expenditure of life and treasure.

It is stated—and there is every reason to credit it—that the real reason why the threatened “concert of Europe” against the United States was not put into effect, was that the Powers of Europe feared that such a step would so arouse the military spirit in this country that Americans would not be satisfied until they had built a navy which would be one of the most formidable in the world. The Powers fear that they will have to reckon with this nation, not only in maintaining their possessions in American waters, but in pursuing their policy of dividing up the rest of the world between themselves; and there is certainly ground for their apprehensions. Hence they are most unwilling to see the United States become a power which could back up any of its demands by a tremendous armament on the seas.

Already it is beginning to be talked that as an outgrowth of the present state of things, the near future will see an alliance between England, the United States, and Japan, which will entirely upset the present balance of power throughout the world. An alliance between nations of a common origin, language and religion is only naturally to be expected in the face of hostility from other powers; while force of circumstances has put Japan where she may be looked upon as a probable third party in such a compact.

But most significant of all is the fact that the United States itself is beginning to favor a departure from the traditional policy of keeping aloof from the affairs of other nations. That was the policy urged upon the Government by Washington, when the nation started out upon its career as an independent power. That policy, it is now said, was good while the nation was in its infancy and needed to give its attention to the development of its own territory; but—and this is said by men in positions of influence—it was not meant to be the policy of the nation for all time; and the time has now come when the United States should assert its position among the nations, and take a part in the dividing up of the territory of the earth.

This policy is being advocated to-day; this sentiment is growing, and it is growing rapidly. And these things being so, it is evident that whatever may be the events of the war, the outcome will be one which will vitally affect the interests of the nation, and of the world. For, at the least, the war will greatly stimulate the military sentiment which is already too prevalent in the land, as witness the “Boys’ Brigades” which are a common feature of the public—and even of the church—schools. It must greatly stimulate the growth of the navy, and the tendency to an alliance with some one or more of the Powers of Europe. In short, its direct tendency must be to join this nation with the military powers of the Old World in a general melee of war and strife for which the nations have long been in arms, and which is set down in prophecy as the final catastrophe of the world.

Archbishop Ireland Is Going to Explain.

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND has publicly announced that he is going to “make a public reply to the attacks made upon him.” By “the attacks made upon” him, he means what has been said upon his and the pope’s meddling with the affairs of the United States, and their manipulating the President, and making a Punch-and-Judy show of Congress. He says that when he does come out, “The publication of his letter will be timely.”

Yet, with this preliminary announcement of what he is going to do, he takes occasion to explain at considerable length why he did what he has already done, and to tell a good deal of what he expects to do. And in this there are some points worth considering.

He says that when the pope wanted to use his “good offices for the preservation of peace, it became necessary that some one in Washington should be in a position to send him hourly bulletins, if necessary, of the attitude of the Administration.”

Of course for anybody to do that, he would have to be in the very inner circles of the councils of the Administration. He says that the papal delegate “Martinelli was first selected for this place,” but that “he declined to act, upon the ground that he could not possibly have any standing at the White House, being merely an ecclesiastical representative of the Vatican.” And lo! when one who was “merely an ecclesiastical representative of the Vatican,” could not act, because he was that, then one who was an ecclesiastical representative of the Vatican was chosen to act because he was that—and more.

Martinelli could not act because, being “merely an ecclesiastical representative of the Vatican,” he could not possibly have any standing at the White House. Then the thing is shifted and an ecclesiastical representative of the Vatican is chosen who can have such standing at the White House, as to be able to send hourly bulletins of the Administration. In other words, in order to get in his work, the pope must have an agent, a representative, in the inner circle of the Administration; Martinelli did not have the qualifications; and Archbishop Ireland did have the qualifications; therefore Archbishop Ireland was chosen.

But what were these qualifications that adapted Archbishop Ireland for a position that the apostolic delegate could not fill. The archbishop tells us. And here they are: “It was then determined that the close and cordial friendship which existed between Archbishop Ireland and President McKinley and his whole cabinet, joined to the fact that he is an eminent American citizen, made him a fit instrument through which negotiations could be conducted.”

Now ecclesiastically President McKinley is a Methodist. How is it that there exists such a “close and cordial friendship” between a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic and him, as to gain for that ecclesiastic a position and knowledge that would enable him to send “hourly bulletins of the attitude of the Administration”? How is this, when it is perfectly certain that there is not a Methodist bishop in all the United States between whom and President McKinley there is such a "close and cordial friendship" as to gain for said Methodist bishop a position or knowledge that would enable him to send "hourly bulletins," or perhaps any bulletins at all, of the attitude of the Administration? How is it that ecclesiastically or otherwise there is a more "close and cordial friendship" between a Methodist and a Roman Catholic archbishop, than there is between that same Methodist and any Methodist bishop?

Of course everybody knows that this "close and cordial friendship" of the archbishop's, is altogether political and solely because of political advantage. Everybody knows that it is the archbishop's political power which was exerted at the St. Louis Convention and through the campaign of 1896, that makes "the close and cordial friendship" between him and "President McKinley and his whole cabinet" and which made him "a fit instrument through which negotiations could be conducted" that could not be conducted at all by Martinelli. Martinelli is an Italian and has no standing in American politics yet. All of which demonstrates that the greatest Roman Catholic official in the United States out of politics, has not the power and therefore is not so dangerous to the United States, as was, and is, a subordinate Roman Catholic official who is in politics. And this is equally true of every other ecclesiastical connection in the United States. No ecclesiastic or religionist of any kind can do the mischief out of politics that any one can do in politics. Therefore the eternal principle is, and this papal trick lately played is a forcible illustration of it, that ecclesiastics and religionists of every sort should forever keep out of politics.

And when it had been "determined that the close and cordial friendship which existed," etc., "made him a fit instrument," etc., the result was that "In view of this he received a formal letter from Cardinal Rampolla, papal secretary of state, authorizing him to represent the pope. This was presented to Judge Day, and semi-official relations began."

It is then a fact that the Secretary of State of the United States has formally received "a formal letter" from the "papal secretary of state," appointing a representative of the pope "through which negotiations could be conducted" with the Government of the United States in an affair with another nation. Accordingly the archbishop's statement proceeds: "Since that time Archbishop Ireland has been in communication with Europe. Through him the official texts of the concessions which Spain was willing to make for the sake of peace, have been laid before this Government, and before the European ambassadors. The composite news of the situation has been cabled to him, and by him disseminated."

The pope and his representative to the United States Government did not succeed in securing a peace to perpetuate the papal power and revenue in Spanish enslaved Cuba. But they did succeed in getting what the papacy for years has been working for—the formal receiving of a representative of the pope to this Government, upon a formal letter from the papal secretary of state; and thus established the precedent of formal official relations between the papacy and this Government.

This much has been gained already. And much more is planned; of which we shall have occasion to speak. Just now, however, the report says that when the archbishop shall have made "public his reply to the attacks upon him," in which he "will go into details," "he will proceed to Rome."

Of course he must hurry off now to Rome and the pope to report in full the progress made, and laugh together with him while they map out their program for further official recognition when the time comes to settle the terms of peace between Spain and the United States.

We hope he will go into details and give the whole story exactly as it is. And then we wish he would go to Rome at once, and, for the good of the United States, stay there forever. And then let all other ecclesiastics and religionists in the United States keep out of politics here forever.

The Sabbath Needs No "Fence."

MRS. J. C. BATEHAM, who has been prominent in connection with the "Sabbath reform" work of the W. C. T. U., makes the statement, in a contribution to a "Sabbath reform" journal, that—

"A Christian Sabbath cannot long be maintained if the protecting fence of civil laws be thrown down."

If this is true, then of course "civil Sabbath" laws are necessary, and we should have them by all means. But is it a fact that the Almighty is so dependent on human legislation for the perpetuity of one of his institutions? If we believed he was thus dependent, we would at once lose confidence in him as a God.

The very essence of Christianity, as we understand it, is the all-sufficiency of the power of God to uphold that which is his, in the face, if need be, of all the power of man and Satan combined. The church never lost anything by the attack of the world upon her. Christianity never lost anything because earthly governments failed to support her. Christianity and the church have always gained in such conflicts. The church loses only when those within her fold voluntarily relinquish their hold upon spiritual things. But whether Christians loosen, maintain, or regain their hold upon spiritual institutions are matters that human laws cannot affect.

So long as an individual really has hold upon the Lord, there is no danger that he will lose the Sabbath, even though all the laws of earth were against his keeping it instead of giving it their pretended support. When he relinquishes his hold upon God, it is always done voluntarily; otherwise he would not be responsible before God for his lapse from righteousness. And when he has lost his hold upon God, he is in a position to be frightened by the opposition of men, or even by their failure to give him their "support."

At the very beginning of the world, God set apart the seventh day of the week to be the Sabbath—his Sabbath, made for man—and from that day to this the seventh-day Sabbath has continued in the earth, and has a respectable number of adherents to-day, although no human law was ever enacted in its support, and many have been enacted against it.

The God to whom the Sabbath belongs is one in whom we can safely trust, without any anxiety as to the attitude of worldly governments. The Lord let Satan remove all the fence there was around Job, but he preserved Job just the same. There is no need that his Sabbath should be fenced about with the straw of human statutes.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

OUR evangelistic work revealed to us what a hard Jericho road a man must travel before he could come up out of the place into which strong drink had plunged him and know what manhood meant, and as we contemplated the situation it seemed well nigh hopeless. We could not comprehend the logic of the liquor traffic and the laws that protected it. We found strange utterances in the statutes of men. In reading the city law aloud to our Union one day (for we had determined to try to find what we had a right to expect from the government under which we lived, and by what right the saloon continued its depredations) I came to this clause: "As many saloons may be licensed as the public good requires." We thought this must contain typographical error somewhere, and appointed one of our number, the wife of a lawyer, to obtain the correct wording of this clause and report the next day. When the time came, and she arose to make her report, she began by saying, "I have some strange things to tell you, ladies, and before I begin I want to say that my husband is a good man, a good Christian man, yet I know you won't agree with what he says; I don't myself. I don't see how he can look at this awful business as he does, but he don't as a man; it is only as a lawyer that he said the things I have to report; and for my part, I don't see, and I told him so too, how as a lawyer he can look at things one way, and as a man so entirely different. I always thought men were very different from women for some strange reason, and these days we are all finding it to be true."

Then she went on to give us some points regarding the manner in which the licensing of a saloon might be supposed to conserve the public good. We could but recognize at sight the reasons which she unfolded to us as a part of that "wisdom of this world which is foolishness with God."

A few days later I went to this same lawyer to talk the matter over with him so that I might be sure of the position of our enemy, when, in reply to a little straight logic, he remarked with a laugh, "You women have a way of looking into things farther than the law allows;" and with this gave me very clearly to understand that he had no more time to give to the discussion, especially as he did not make, but only expounded the law, with which we had to deal.

We did not then know how to appreciate the position of such men, and were often lacking in the charity that thinketh no evil. We had been so outraged in our life-long understanding of things, had come face to face with such death-dealing inconsistencies between the teachings and the practice of men, that in our bewilderment we were almost constrained to say that "all men were liars," and to wish that our boys were all girls.

Through all these experiences we were being led up to the strategic point in our warfare. To make clear how it was finally discovered I must draw again from personal experience.

One day after all this pledging, petitioning, and public discussion had been going on for weeks, I was passing along the street when a lawyer, who was also a member of the city council, hailed me from his office door, and asked me if I would step in for a moment. I did so. He gave me his own arm chair, and standing before me explained that the work of the women had been under discussion by some of the men whom he represented, and he had been asked to see me, and say a few things, which he wished I would pass on to the others. "For," he said, "you women do not realize what you are doing; do you know that you are turning the country upside down?"

(The poor man did not realize how apt was his remark, inasmuch as the country was at best wrong side up.)

"Just think of it," he went on warmly, "meetings every day, sometimes at night, and such throngs; women everywhere in public, speaking and making such a commotion; some of us have talked it over, and we have concluded that it must stop." He paused and looked at me for a reply.

"I wish it might stop," I said, "we all do; we have got pretty tired, some of us, and would like to go back home and stay there quietly, and will do it quickly if you men will just do one thing."

"You mean close up the saloons," he said, angrily.

"No, I don't, this time; we have found out that you won't do that; I, for one, have no more heart to ask you."

"What, then, do you want? We will do anything in reason," he said, eagerly.

"Just this: invent some way to run the saloon business by machinery; you can get machinery to do everything else. Get an automaton and put it behind the saloon bar; a long procession of automata to file along the streets (we women will give them the pavement and walk in the gutters) and in at the saloon door so constructed as to throw down the nickels and dimes, while the automaton behind the bar slings the glasses, so that this little exchange of coin and whiskey that seems to be so necessary to the life of the nation may go on and hurt nobody. We will grant its necessity for the sake of peace if you will only have it done by machinery and spare our boys."

Liberty's Acrostic.*

"We, the people,"—sons and daughters of patriot sires,— should

Hold firmly to the vital truths which they upheld of yore.

These principles—maintain'd through many tribulations, are

Truths born of Heaven, and are older than the hills. The right

To have, and to enjoy liberty, to gain knowledge, to Be free!—free to think, to speak and to act!—such, indeed, is

Self-evident liberty! Such liberty is ours by
That law which says: "There is no respect of persons with God."

All are born free and equal. Despotism was unknown till Men sought to establish religions of their own. In such
Are the seeds of priestly assumption and intolerance.

Created as we are, with a free moral nature, with Equal rights in earth and the Heav'n to come, it is not well

That men should order the ethical bearing of others.

They that assume the prerogative to such a calling,
Are ever obnoxious to all thoughtful Independence.

Endowed by Omnipotence with those qualifications
By which men are enabled to judge the right and the wrong,

Their claim to office, or assent to plain untruths, mock the Creator who, in His great wisdom, saw fit to bless all

With individuality—with sacred "rights" which a Certain just—perhaps inspir'd soul—chose to designate as "Unalienable," because of divine origin. Those "Rights"—under church rule, live not. No slav'ry so abject as

That 'neath ecclesiastical despotism—an evil

Among other evils, now threat'ning the precious weal of These United States. It is clearly assur'd us that we Are "created in Jesus Christ," the all-potent Source of Life, True Light and Liberty. Then let us "stand fast in that

Liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free;" and, by all just

And valid means, endeavor to render innocuous

The efforts of would-be religious legislators. In Pursuit of that liberty warranted to citizens

Of this Union, one should not forget that the basis of Happiness lies in the freedom of a soul's convictions:

That Bigotry, Ballots and Bullets can never dictate

To Conscience a prescrib'd course of spiritual action.

Secure, heretofore, in the full and free enjoyment of These rare blessings, men see not the threat'ning evil; yet their Rights are in danger. Is the pow'r of God declining, that Governments assume the execution of His laws? What Are the duties of a just and progressive government, Instituted for the general good? Are they to raise Among the people, inquisitorial fires in which Men and women shall again die for their faith? Are they Deriving incomes from excesses of the people? Does

Their duty—the government's, rest in making men loyal,
Just, pious, by law, and pronouncing judgment on sin?
When

Powers of earth pretend to such Divine authority,
From whom is it deriv'd? What does it signify? Away
The union of church and state! No true American will Consent to such ignoble slav'ry. Sanctification Of man through compulsion, must nauseate e'en man himself.

"The law of the wise is a fountain of life;" and to be Govern'd wisely, is to live at most "perfect" liberty.

A Solemn Warning.—No. 1.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

"AND the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name." Rev. 14:9-11.

Such is the message that God gives against the worshipping of the beast and of his image, which is brought to view in chapter 13.

The beast, as has been abundantly shown in previous articles, is the papacy. The essential feature of the papacy is the union of church and state, with the church using the power of the state for the furtherance of its own aims, and with a man at the head of the church sitting in the place of God.

Also it has been shown that the "two-horned" beast (verse 11) represents the United States. That being so, it will be seen that this Government is to make an image to the beast—or papacy. See verse 14.

An image to the papacy would be a union of church and state, with the church predominant.

Furthermore, it has been shown that Sunday is the mark of the papacy. It is, therefore, against these things that the Lord solemnly warns his people.

Not a few doubtless will turn aside from these things and treat them with derision. Every reform of gospel work has been treated thus.

But the supreme danger that this will be done lies in the fact that Sunday has been so long observed as the "Christian Sabbath," that to the minds of many it would seem impossible that such awful results should follow. The temptation, therefore, would be to conclude that Sunday cannot be the mark of the papacy.

This might on the surface seem plausible; but it is not sound reasoning.

It cannot be denied (1) that there is not a single command in all the Bible for Sunday observance—expressed or implied: (2) that the papacy bases its claim to have the power to command men under sin, upon having the power to change the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, and that consequently Sunday is the mark of its power: (3) that there is now, at this very time, a strong organized effort to have Sunday enforced by law in the United States, and that it is the only thing sought to be enforced that is called a “mark.”

The position is therefore impregnable, the logic invincible, that it is against Sunday as the mark of the papacy that the prophecy speaks.

This proves two things; (1) that notwithstanding Sunday has so long been venerated by Christians, there are principles involved in this question that the people of God have not yet seen or understood; (2) it proves the long-suffering of the Lord in that the true Sabbath has been trodden under foot so long—innocently of course on the part of God’s people—and a pseudo Sabbath allowed to stand in its way.

There are thousands of Christians who do not realize that ages before the papacy substituted Sunday in the place of the Sabbath of the Bible, it was kept as a pagan festival. The origin of the day is set forth by its name—Sunday, the day of the sun—“the wild solar holiday of all pagan times.”

It was the day especially devoted to the worship of the sun, which was “the oldest, the most widespread, and the most enduring of all the forms of idolatry known to man.”

The limits of this article forbid an extended study in detail of what sun-worship really is. Our purpose is simply to give a few general statements concerning sun-worship in order that the reader may see the true character of the day that has for so long usurped the place of the true Sabbath.

That sun-worship was regarded by the Lord as the most abominable form of idolatry can be seen in Ezekiel, chapter 8. The prophet was shown various forms of idolatry, each in their turn being called a “greater abomination” than the preceding one, until he was shown the greatest abomination of them all. Thus we read in verses 15, 16: “Then said he unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations than these. And he brought me into the inner court of the Lord’s house, and, behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs toward the temple of the Lord, and their faces toward the east; and they worshiped the sun toward the east.”

Inasmuch as they turned their backs upon the temple of the Lord as they worshiped the sun toward the east, it will be readily seen that sun-worship involves turning their backs upon God.

Sun-worship in Egypt, in its various forms—as Pthah at Memphis; Tum at Heliopolis; Amun Ra at Thebes, etc., was the prevailing religion. And it was so in other nations under different names. But wherever it was, or under whatever name, it was accompanied with the most lascivious rites—rites too revolting to be named.

The Pope’s Mediation as Explained at the Vatican.

“The Ram’s Horn,” Chicago.

THOSE who looked with misgiving upon the spectacle of the Roman pontiff acting as an intermediary between the United States and Spain, have found ample grounds for their fears in the later developments of that controversy. The authorized organ of the Vatican publishes the dispatches which related to the inner history of papal machinations at Washington and Madrid. The first is a note, dated April 9, sent by the Spanish minister for foreign affairs, Señor Gullon, to Monsignor Merry del Val, the papal chamberlain, requesting him to inform the papal secretary of state, Cardinal Rampolla, so that the latter might communicate it to the pope, that the Spanish government, “in consequence of the ardent, noble and repeated urgings of the pope,” had decided to order Captain-General Blanco to “concede immediately a suspension of hostilities for the period which his prudence may deem fit, with the view to prepare for and facilitate peace.”

In reply to the above, the papal secretary of state directed the papal representative at Madrid to—

“Thank the Spanish government, in the name of the pope, and be good enough to assure it that the pope will not fail to use his influence where the occasion offers in order that the legitimate wishes of the Spanish government may be realized and the prestige of the noble Catholic nation be unimpaired.”

Our Roman contemporary concludes the publication of its series of documents with a dispatch from Washington dated April 11, the source of which is not indicated, saying:—

“The suspension of hostilities has produced an excellent impression. I have no doubt of the maintenance of peace. We shall have bellicose speeches in Congress, but without results. The influence of the pope in obtaining the armistice is fully recognized by the American people, and is hailed with gratitude.”

A CHRISTIAN(?) controversy lasting half an hour lately occurred between some of the forces engaged in the Christian(?) war on the coast of Cuba, the result announced being that the Spanish forces were completely converted by the weighty arguments of their opponents.

EVIDENTLY somewhat concerned over the apparent want of harmony between carnal warfare and the practice of Christian principles, The Independent, of this city, which feels bound to support the Government, has undertaken to satisfy itself and others of doubtful minds that the war undertaken with Spain is a Christian one.

"The serious question to a Christian man," it says, "is, whether the war in which we have engaged is Christian. As it is one in which we are the challenging, attacking party, this is a very serious, nay solemn, question."

THE Independent then goes on to say that if the reason for the war is a Christian one, the war must be Christian; and that the reason being not revenge or greed, but compassion for the suffering Cubans,—a desire to put a stop to the miseries imposed upon them by Spain—the war is clearly one which Christianity both justifies and demands. That "Christianity is peace on earth," we are told, is true "never to bad-willing men." In conclusion it is stated that "as a Christian nation we have the duty to demand that the long, devastating and cruel war in Cuba shall end."

THE war then, by this presentation, is a Christian war; the steps taken are Christian steps, taken for Christian reasons. Christianity is the impelling motive in the undertaking. But there is a question we would like to ask at this point. Do non-Christians engage in an undertaking from Christian motives? It must be admitted that very few of the men belonging to the United States navy are even professedly Christians. The great majority of them are certainly non-Christians; and these are the men by whom this "Christian" war is being carried on.

No; it cannot be true that non-Christians are actuated by Christian motives. The men who are actually conducting the war are not engaging in it from Christian motives. A non-Christian makes no account of Christian motives in his own life. A non-Christian is against Christianity, just as certainly as it is true that the carnal heart is enmity to the law of God. And that this is so is directly stated in the Word of God.

Of course, there are a great many "good" men who are not Christians. They are good from the ordinary, worldly standpoint; they are respectable, outwardly upright, obliging, regardful of the rights of their neighbors, etc., yet, by their own admission they are not Christians. They have not faith; they have not love to God. We are not talking about this class of good men or this standard of goodness. That is not under consideration. It is to Christianity that this discussion relates. It is asserted that the war is Christian; and to Christianity the question must be confined; not Christianity either as any one may choose to define it, but as it is in truth, by the testimony of the Word of its Author, which alone is authority upon the subject. By this testimony it is certain, beyond a shadow of doubt, that non-Christians are not, and cannot without a change of heart, be actuated by Christian motives.

"Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin."

It is certain, therefore, that the men actually engaged in prosecuting the war are not actuated in so doing by Christian motives. Their motives may be all right from a worldly standpoint; we do not doubt that they are. But that is not the question. The question is not whether the war is undertaken and conducted in a civilized and respectable way, and from motives of good will to one's neighbor which are shared by the atheist in common with the professor of religion. The question is whether the war is Christian. And it is evident that neither the motives of the men conducting it, nor the weapons employed, are recognized in the Text book of Christianity as pertaining to Christian life.

WHETHER in any case the principles of Christianity would admit of carnal warfare or not, it is certain that a war cannot be Christian which is conducted by non-Christian individuals. This one fact settles the question of the Christianity of the war with Spain.

A CHRISTIAN is one who follows Christ; and as Christ never drew the sword or sanctioned its drawing, no one can follow Christ in such a step. And this settles the question of the Christianity of carnal warfare in any case.

If missionaries in heathen and Roman Catholic lands—as for example those of the American Board in Spain—would not identify themselves with any earthly government, but let it be known that they are citizens only of a heavenly country, and "strangers and pilgrims" in this world, and then show forth the spirit of the heavenly citizenship, they would not have to leave the field of their labors because of an outbreak of war like that between Spain and the United States.

CANON SCOTT-HOLLAND, a well-known English clergyman, in a recent sermon made this pertinent reference to the spectacle which so many church people are prone to regard as entirely compatible with Christianity:—

"The outlook in Europe never presented so wholly an unchristian spectacle since the days of Constantine. Even in mediæval days, peace, and not war, was regarded as the normal condition of men. Now nations were watching one another like wild beasts in a jungle, and Christian Europe had armed itself in defiance of everything which Christ came to teach. Blood and iron rule; huge camps and seas, crowded with horrible ships of war, met the eye at every turn. Men scrambled for land, and the question was who should be first in the race. Are we to be swept away in the Pagan scramble?"

There is room in the world for a few more clergymen who are not afraid to call things by their right names.

A WRITER in a journal devoted to the cause of Sunday-legislation, notes the increasing desecration of the "Sabbath" in the United States, and adds that "the wickedness of the West is surely, but slowly, traveling East."

To which it may properly be added that it will be a very good thing for the West if the wickedness of the East can be prevented from traveling in that direction. For there is as much more wickedness in the East than in the West as there are more sinners in the East than in the West, and there are more sinners in the East than in the West for the simple reason that the East is more thickly populated.

It is characteristic of this National Reform standard of righteousness that it overlooks the wickedness of the "scribes and pharisees," while being profoundly shocked at the sins of the publicans. But the latter are the more righteous of the two classes.

A NEW YORK CITY daily which has earnestly labored to promote the war which is now begun, gives this quotation and credit, which is more pertinent than the paper intends it to be:—

"My sentence is for open war."
—Milton.

The quotation is from "Paradise Lost," and the words are there given as emanating from a council of devils. What seems to be the language of a Milton, often has its real authority from the devil.

* * *

THE NEW YORK Sun mentions that "a number of young men, who were formerly members of the Second Company, Boys' Brigade, of the First Presbyterian Church in Jersey City, have organized a company of volunteers and offered themselves as a nucleus for the regiment the Board of Trade proposes to organize," etc. The "Boys' Brigade" business is calculated to train the boys for actual war and to develop in them the military spirit which longs for the experience of real conflict.

The World Can See It.

It is a significant fact that the tremendous and unceasing preparations for war which are in progress the world over, call up even in the minds of the irreligious the words of prophetic Scripture which connect "wars and rumors of wars" with the troublous times of the last days of the world. The following in a recent issue of a London (Eng.) secular journal, the Evening News, is an illustration. It points out what is being done by only one of the great Powers, England, and that at a time when "Her Majesty's government"—as stated in England's proclamation of neutrality a few days ago—is happily at peace with all other civilized governments. The News says:—

"'Wars and rumors of wars' is an ancient prophecy with nearly two thousand birthdays; and judging from the strange stories which are floating about just now, the latter part of the prophecy is being fulfilled with a vengeance. Eyes are at this moment naturally being turned toward the government dockyards and factories, and any extra activity in them is attributed to impending warfare.

"Woolwich Arsenal is extremely busy at present, busier than it has been probably for half a century, for England has been making ready for the worst for some years.

"For two years, at any rate, work at the Arsenal has not ceased day or night in several of the departments.

"One good reason for this is the keen competition of the rival Powers.

"Altogether there are at the Arsenal some 17,000 employés, and about 4,000 of them are engaged in night work, starting at six in the evening and leaving at five in the morning, three of these hours are overtime, and the day workers are doing about the same extra work.

"In the torpedo factory there are 400 men working overtime; there are the same number in the fuse factory, and, so far as can be ascertained, other departments are proportionately busy.

"But overtime at the Arsenal is not a novelty, and has caused no trepidation or anxiety among the employés. The more work the more pay, and the has done good all round. Through overtime the engineers, says one of the men, have made £4 a week, skilled laborers £2 5s., and unskilled men £1 10s.

"A casual visitor to Woolwich with the China situation in his mind might see in the bright glare at the Arsenal the beacon of a coming warfare, in which all the nations of the earth shall participate. Those who live in Woolwich are used to this, however, for they have seen the factories lighted up for the last two years or more.

"Nevertheless the employés at the Arsenal are working with increased energy just now.

"The War Office has ordered half a million cartridges a week in excess of last year, bringing the total weekly output up to 2,000,000.

"In the fuse factory the men are engaged on 2,500 fuses of one make, and 1,800 of another, and orders have been received to push along with the quick firing guns.

"Many of the orders on which the men are working are not of a very recent date, but by April it is anticipated that the men will be busier than ever they have been before."

The children of the world are still wiser in their generation than the professed "children of light."

THE Independent (N. Y.), of April 28, prints the following from a correspondent touching the treatment meted out to dissenters in "holy Russia," where the theory that religion and the state should be united is carried into full effect:—

"A poor fellow named Simerenko has arrived in Tulcha in Rumania, having escaped from Russia, where he had been cruelly tortured by his neighbors for leaving the Orthodox Church and joining the brethren [Stundists]. His hands and feet were tied, and then he was strung up to a rafter in the ceiling, in which position burning cigarettes were put on his naked body until he yelled in his agony. The torturers told him they would let him go if he abjured Stundism and returned to the Church. When about to cut him down they first cut the cords attaching his head to the rafter. His head came down with such force that he was almost rendered senseless, and from that day to this he suffers pains in the back of his head. On another occasion his head and hands were fastened in a vise and over fifty wounds were made on his bare back with hot irons. The brethren in Tulcha have seen the scars. On yet another occasion his wife, who was with child, was violated by the peasants. It seems that all this was done with the connivance, at any rate, of the local village authorities. As soon as Simerenko could he fled; and, as I have already said, he is now in safety in Tulcha, but in abject need."

THE following item from the Inter Ocean (Chicago) states the outcome of the controversy in Ohio over the question of Sunday baseball:—

"The law prohibiting the playing of baseball Sunday was sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of John Powell against the State yesterday at Columbus, Ohio. Powell was arrested at Cleveland, but his case was dismissed by the common pleas judge, who held that the law was invalid. The prosecuting attorney excepted to this ruling, and the Supreme Court sustained the exceptions, dismissing Powell's petition. A member of the court is authority for the statement that the principle applies also to Sunday theatricals."

THE ambitious South African, Cecil Rhodes, seems to have regained his lost prestige in South African affairs; and this means that the Transvaal will soon have to fight again to maintain its independence of British control.

THE further an individual gets from God, the more clearly(?) does he see that there are imperfections in the divine character.

Studies in French History.—20.

WHEN the class again assembled for their customary chat, Milly Brown raised her hand.

"Please, professor, about what time did the facts happen which you told us about last week?"

"I can tell, I believe," volunteered Jennie Jacobs. "I think it was about the year 1300."

"A little later than that, Jennie," corrected her teacher; "the lesson closed with the history of 1345, or very near that time. The people of France being very much frightened and disheartened by the horrors of the Black Death, began casting about in their minds, to discover some cause of it, or some way to check its frightful ravages. At last they came to the conclusion that the nation was so wicked that the Deity could endure it no longer, and so had determined to punish the people with war and pestilence. So they decided to help matters by inflicting punishment upon themselves. A class of fanatics sprung up, called 'Flagellants,' who took it upon themselves to appease the Deity by wandering about half naked, and whipping themselves with whips, which had steel on the ends of the lashes. This they did until the blood would run down their naked shoulders."

"I should think that the French people would not have allowed such work," said Charlie White, indignantly.

"They did put a stop to it at last, or rather, the pope did, for even he grew tired of their dreadful excesses."

"Well, did this stop the pestilence?" asked practical Jack.

"Indeed it did not, Jack," replied Professor Carman, "and it seems strange to us now as we look back over the centuries, how any one could have been so foolish as to believe and practice such follies, when nothing but the blood of Christ will pay the debt of sin. Even an angel's death and suffering would not atone for sinful man; how much less then can we, by self torture or penance, pay the debt for ourselves."

"It reminds me of what I read quite often in the papers," interrupted Joe Palmeter. "Some people say that all the trouble this country has is caused by the careless way folks keep Sunday. So they propose to make a law forbidding anyone doing any work, and making them go to church, whether they want to or not. O, I guess this country is quite a little bit like France was in the days of the Flagellants; don't you think so, professor?"

"Your argument seems to prove your point pretty well, Joseph."

"But don't you think people ought to keep the Sabbath?" asked Milly Brown, with a shocked manner.

"O yes, Milly; but I think I am right when I say that I believe it to be very offensive in the sight of God, to coerce or force anybody against his will in such matters. God says he delights to be worshiped in spirit and in truth,—which worship is prompted by love alone,—not by force."

"The wife of King Philip died of the plague, and when at last it began to abate, he married again. These wedding festivals must be attended to, even though the nation itself wore a badge of mourning on account of war and pestilence. To pay for these, the wretched people were taxed anew, and it was without doubt a relief to them when King Philip died, directly after his wedding."

"Did he leave any son to take his throne?" asked Edna Philips, who had kept a careful record of the kings, from Clovis.

"Yes; his name was John, and he was very inappropriately called The Good. He began his reign in 1350, and reigned fourteen years. The last words of his father to him were not words of good advice,—to rule his kingdom wisely, and to be warned by his own sad failures,—but he died urging his son to maintain his right to the kingdom at all hazards and against all rivals."

"John knew that France was in a sad condition, but he was a foolish, extravagant fellow, and imagined that if he would just make a journey through his country and let the poor people gaze upon his royal face, it would help things amazingly. So out he started over the plague-blackened and war-distracted country to have a good time and hold tournaments, which by the way, the people must pay for."

"Will you please tell us what tournaments were?" questioned Harry Ray.

"They were a kind of mock fight between a number of people and were once quite in vogue."

"I should think King Edward of England had given the people as much real fighting as they needed by this time, without any make-believe fights," said Edward Barnaby.

"Indeed; and even then there was real fighting enough that he could do if he liked, for Edward was still in the country; but John did not consult the people or trouble to ask them what their wishes were in the matter. Of course all this fuss did not help the people to pay their heavy taxes, nor did it put food into the mouths of the famished wretches, or wipe the blinding tears from their eyes, or put hope into their disconsolate hearts."

"King John must have been a very silly sort of fellow," said Jack Smith.

"Yes; and one reason for this was, he had been fond of light reading all his life, Jack," answered Professor Carman, "and so his head was full of trashy ideas. That, you know, my boys and girls, will almost always have the same effect. Those who indulge in reading trashy books and stories are apt to grow to be as foolish and addle-pated as King John. And certain it is that no one in this day of good books and cheap printing has any excuse for reading trash of any kind.

"King John was perfectly happy if he was only surrounded by gay ladies who flattered him and humored his foolish vanity."

"I presume he thought he was as great a man as Charlemagne himself," smiled Joe Palmeter.

"I dare say he did. But it seems to me that instead of John the Good, he should have been called John the Foolish."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

An Inconsistent Symbol.

"MAMA, I have been reading the 13th of Revelation to-day, and I am anxious to know what government the beast with the two horns represents."

"You remember, Charlie, that the 13th chapter opens with a description of the beast. We have already located the beast as a symbol of the papacy, or the system of control that includes a union of church and state, the enforcing of religious observances by the power of the law."

"Yes, mama, I think it was made very plain up to the time that papal power was broken in 1798 by the captivity and death of the pope and the overthrow of his temporal power."

"That brought us to the 10th verse. You may read that verse, Charlie."

"He that leadeth into captivity, shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword."

"We have already recalled his captivity, and the time of his overthrow."

"At that time what does the prophet behold?"

"And I beheld another beast coming up."

"You may pause there, Charlie, and in 1798, take a bird's eye view of the world. Under the symbol of the beast with ten horns, we have the old world established. No new government is springing up into power. The dominions under the ten kingdoms took in the world with one exception. Can you tell me what the one exception was?"

"Yes, the United States."

"When did the United States become independent?"

"In 1776."

"From that time until now it may be described as coming up. Its power in the world so far, has ever been in the ascendancy, commercially, educationally, and religiously. The world has looked toward the United States, and all nations have been influenced by her policy."

"You may read on, Charlie. Where does this Government seem to spring from?"

"Out of the earth," read Charlie.

"Where did the beast come from?"

"From the sea."

"You recall the fact that water is a symbol of multitudes, nations, and tongues as we learn in Rev. 17:15.

"The beast rose from an inhabited place, and merely organized the people, nations and tongues into its own spirit and system. The government symbolized under the two-horned beast grows out of the earth, as a plant. This is the original meaning of the verb. From the time of the landing of the pilgrims, who fled from the oppression of the beast for 'freedom to worship God,' until the present hour, the United States has been growing as a plant, reaching out its roots into unacquired soil, spreading its branches into new atmosphere.

"What is the next specification?"

"And he had two horns like a lamb."

"What is the chief characteristic of a lamb?"

"Harmlessness, meekness, inoffensiveness, I should say."

"Yes. What difference is marked between these horns like a lamb and the ten horns?"

"The ten horns represent the monarchical form of government. But the two horns of the lamb represent something inoffensive and full of liberty. For what two civil and religious principles has our Government stood as a distinctive exponent?"

"For the principles of civil and religious liberty."

"Yes; in our country the value of the principles enunciated by Christ has been demonstrated, and these two principles may well be represented by the harmless symbol here presented. Christ bade men to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's. Church and state have been kept separate by these harmless principles that have their origin in the Lamb of God. Had they always been inculcated in the functions of government, the bloody acts that have disgraced the annals of history would never have appeared. The Constitution of our country forbids Congress the making of laws that will prohibit men the free use of their religious rights, to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience, does not require any religious test to qualify for office, and holds all men equal before the law."

"O, but mama, times have changed since Thomas Jefferson and the framers of our Constitution lived. If religious tests are not now required, it certainly will not be long before they will be required. Can't you see yourself that a great change has come over the people? Last summer all the ministers preached on religious legislation, and urged the church to take a lively interest in politics, and especially to vote for the enforcement of Sunday laws. They even enrolled their congregation by a standing vote as in favor of petitioning Congress for such enforcement. Bills and bills have been presented. Here is a note from a late paper that says, 'Strong organizations are being marshaled to get the passage of a Sunday rest bill.' Petitions are going to Congress for a reversal of the principles of civil and religious liberty."

"Yes, Charlie, I have seen all this; but did not know that you were becoming so well informed. This very change is indicated by the prophet. What inconsistent combination do we find in the symbol?"

"And he spake as a dragon."

"Here is foretold a striking reversal of policy. The inconsistency of the symbols has already been made clear in the manner in which dissenters have been treated. The Puritans banished Roger Williams, whipped Quakers, and burned witches; and though men have laughed at the idea that this wonderful Government should ever again indulge in the spirit of the Dark Ages, yet in the last ten years observers of the seventh-day Sabbath have suffered for their faith by the enforcement of religious laws that conflicted with the law of God. Men have languished in prison, and have died as the result. In the South they have been relegated to the chain gang, dependent women and children have been the victims of religious bigotry backed by unrighteous legislation. Some of the leaders in the movement for Sunday enforcement have put themselves on record as determined to push such legislation for the sole purpose of oppression. Of course the masses who are not acquainted with history, who do not understand prophecy, who cannot see the logical outcome of a union of church and state in our land, honestly think that Sunday laws would be a great benefit. Brought up to regard Sunday as a holy day, it pains them to see it turned into a holiday. Avaricious employers take advantage of our freedom, to compel their employes to labor, and the zealous Reformers, some honestly and some dishonestly, plead for the working man's right to rest one day in seven."

"Well, that's so, mama; it does seem as if the people's right to rest would be interfered with unless some kind of a law could be established."

"Charlie, who gave men a right to rest one day in seven?"

"God did."

"Cannot the God who gave protect that right?"

"Yes, mama; but"—

"But there's no but about it. Who could take away my right to observe the Sabbath, or the rest that God has given? It is simply a matter of asserting and claiming the right that is involved."

"But, mama, if a working man did assert and claim his right, he would be thrown out of his position, and starvation for himself and family would stare him in the face."

"No, indeed, Charlie; God provides for such an emergency. He says, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.' The right to rest, and there can be no Sabbath rest without worship, is based solely on the command of God. This command must be obeyed by faith that acknowledges its possessor wholly dependent on God. He who claims he cannot exercise his God-given rights without the power of human law, casts reproach upon God. All are free to do what God commands, and he who is all powerful, all wise, all love, will take care of the consequences."

"O, mama, I see the principle; but how hard it will be for the world to acknowledge it. The enforcement of Sabbath observance by human law would indeed be an interference with God's government, an insult to heaven. And yet," Charlie spoke slowly, "and yet those who stand stiffly for God's honor in this matter, will surely hear the voice of the dragon."

"Yes," said Mrs. Ross, "but they will also hear a voice from heaven, saying, 'This is my beloved Son.' 'Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the tree of life, and enter in through the gates into the city.'"

The Noble Art of Self-Defense.

"Do you think it would be wrong for me to learn the noble art of self-defense?" a religiously-inclined youth inquired of his pastor.

"Certainly not," answered the minister; "I learned it in youth myself, and I have found it of great value during my life."

"Indeed, sir! did you learn the old English system, or Sullivan's system?"

"Neither. I learned Solomon's system."

"Solomon's system?"

"Yes; you will find it laid down in the first verse of the fifteenth chapter of Proverbs: 'A soft answer turneth away wrath.' It is the best system of self-defense of which I know."

Cultivate consideration for the feelings of other people if you would not have your own injured. Those who complain most of ill-usage are those who abuse themselves and others oftenest."—Self.

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

IN the present crisis England and the United States—the representatives of Anglo-Saxon civilization—have drawn together, and it is well understood that an unwritten but nevertheless actual alliance exists between the two great divisions of English speaking people. And this leaves the rest of the world in another division,—a division which does not represent Anglo Saxon ideas and institutions, but those of autocracy and despotism. And in the light of the fact that these two great divisions of civilization represent respectively the camps of liberty and of despotism, it is evident that it was not by chance that the English speaking race has spread its rule over so large a portion of the habitable globe, while the once-great empire of Spain has shrunk up to its present insignificant dimensions.

A COLONY of the Waldenses, whose history adds a long and thrilling chapter to the annals of religious persecution, has been established in what is called the Piedmont Section of the Tennessee mountains. The colony owns ten thousand acres of forest and cleared land, and have built a thriving town, which is called Valdese. They observe Christmas, Good Friday, and Easter; and also the 17th day of February, which is their "emancipation day."

THE effort to enact a strict Sunday law for the province of Manitoba, Canada, seems not to have met with much success. A long and heated controversy has been in progress there over the question but the committee of the legislature who were given charge of the proposed measure finally decided upon radical changes from the provisions of the bill as presented to them, so that but little if any addition is made by it to the law now in force. The bill as thus amended has passed the House.

SIGNOR CRISPI, ex-Prime Minister of Italy, and generally recognized as Italy's greatest statesman, is quoted, as saying that the decadence of Spain is due primarily to the Roman Catholic religion. "The prime cause of Spain's condition is the general state of ignorance—in the upper, as well as in the lower classes. It is the priesthood, absolutely sovereign everywhere, which has led that fine country into ruin." Such is the statement recently given by the ex premier to a press representative in an interview touching the probable results of the war.

Signor Crispi is not an opponent of the Catholic religion. In the same interview he said, as quoted: "The Catholic religion is indeed a beautiful religion. Christianity has done much good. But through an ever retrograde spirit the clergy has done irreparable damage to the Latin races." The view of this eminent observer is not biased by religious hostility. It is not colored by Protestantism. It is the view of one who though a confessed admirer of the Catholic religion, sees too plainly the facts of which he speaks to speak as one who confounds that religion with Christianity might naturally be expected to do. And it is the truth observed from the eminence of position of a statesman, which commands a clearer and broader view than that of the ordinary man.

It is worth while also to note some of the views held by this eminent man regarding the present outlook for the world, to which he gave expression in this connection. "If the United States," he said, "defeat Spain, as is probable, they will be obliged, in order to maintain their position, to have recourse to costly armaments; and Europe, which is looking forward to the time of actual disarmament, will more than ever be plunged into an endless expense. After armies for lands the navies must now be increased. Where it will stop I do not know. In any case it seems to me that the war has in store some unpleasant surprises."

In reply to a question relative to European intervention, Signor Crispi said that in Europe "anarchy is dominant everywhere;" that "to speak frankly, there is no Europe; the 'European concert' is only a sinister joke;" and that "nothing can be expected from the concert of Powers"

But "we must," he added, "have confidence in the future."

The world offers no source from which confidence in the future can be drawn. The source of such confidence is supplied alone by Christianity.

THE existence of unselfish love in this world proves the existence of the God defined in Scripture.

THERE can be no true patriotism apart from loyalty to the right.

THE Christian is the one man in the world who can have perfect confidence in the future.

TRUTH is intolerant of error; and good, of evil. This is the "intolerance" of true Protestantism.

A PATRIOT is not always known by the multitude of his words; but a fool, according to Solomon, most always is.

EVERY person whom God trains in this world has an experience of standing with the minority against the majority.

NOR the doctrine of evolution, but the doctrine of unchangeableness, is the hope of the world to-day,—Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever."

BOAST not thyself of loyalty to this Government if you are not loyal to the principles upon which it is based. Many who boast of their loyalty, it is certain, have not even a clear conception of what these principles are.

As well might this country be conquered by a foreign foe as that the people now here should change the institutions and principles of its government to correspond with those of a foreign land. Bad people do not need to be watched so carefully as bad principles.

PRESERVING a religious institution by legislation is like preserving a thing by pickling. At best only its form is retained. Its flavor, freshness, and power of growth are lost. It is a curiosity, not a thing of use. God's word alone can preserve a religious institution in the condition necessary to supply continuously the spiritual wants of the people.

THE Government is making good progress in blowing up, sinking, and keeping away from our shores the Spanish war ships; now let us have something done to get rid of the Spanish ideas which have already invaded the country and apparently with success. The worst thing about Spain is its principles of government; and it is these, and not the Spanish ships, which constitute the chief source of danger to this country. We refer chiefly to Spain's union of religion with the state.

Archbishop Ireland's Scheme.

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND has not yet published his promised "reply to the attacks upon him" in which he is to "go into details" about his manipulating the Government of the United States. However in his explanation to the effect that he is going to explain, there are statements sufficiently suggestive to cause serious thinking and careful watching on the part of all who care for true American liberty and independence.

Having failed to preserve peace in the interests of papal power and revenue, his plan is next to make the war turn to the credit of the papacy—and especially to the power of the papacy over the United States. The scheme announced in behalf of the archbishop and endorsed by "one high diplomat," before the war was actually begun, is as follows:—

"He [Archbishop Ireland] expects to bring about a congress of nations. If this is considered impracticable, such a concert will be arranged that the possible elements and factors in the situation may be eliminated by friendly pressure upon Spain and upon the United States.

"It is possible and probable that a congress of nations will be called immediately after a positive declaration of hostilities.

"The whole matter will then be taken up and adjusted. Spain will receive some adequate compensation for the loss of the Island of Cuba, if the experiment now on trial fails through war, and at the same time Cuba will be put under stable rule and government, probably under the protectorate of the United States.

"In doing this the wisdom of the Monroe Doctrine will be acknowledged, but the incidental responsibility of the United States thereunder will be defined and demonstrated. This will work greatly for the preservation of the peace of the world. As matters stand now, there is constant danger that some puny nation may through braggadocio or truculence, involve some great powers."

Thus the papacy is determined to make herself felt, and will force herself into recognition, in the affairs of the United States. Having failed to hold her power and revenue in Cuba by holding that suffering people under Spanish despotism, she now proposes to accomplish that purpose and a good deal more by engineering a settlement in which she will have to be recognized as a chief party to be reckoned with.

And notice how coolly her arrogant position is assumed. See with what an air of superiority it is that she announces that "friendly pressure" will be put "upon the United States" as "upon Spain"—as though the United States were her subject as Spain has always been.

Notice, also, and inwardly digest the deep and sinister meaning of it, how self-confidently it is declared that by this "congress" or "concert" of her calling, "the whole matter will be taken up and adjusted." See the assumption of supremacy displayed in telling just how the parties interested will be dealt with—"Spain will receive some adequate compensation": "Cuba will be put under stable rule and government" and "probably" this will be "under the protectorate of the United States." Cuba declared, and made, "free and independent" by the United States; and the United States, professedly at least, free and independent in her own right, are to be taken charge of by the papacy and her "concert" and to be dealt with as she decides, as though they were her absolute subjects to be placed and moved like "men" on a chess-board! And then to cap it all "the incidental responsibility of the United States" under the Monroe Doctrine, "will be defined and demonstrated" for the United States.

There cannot be the least doubt that the papacy will do every possible thing to carry out this program announced from Archbishop Ireland.

And who is prepared to say that she will not succeed in having this program carried out according to her own ideas and wishes—if not in every detail, largely in very substance? Especially who is prepared to say that she will not succeed in it, when at her very first move she has been successful in gaining official recognition from the Government of the United States? when at her very first step she succeeded in having an official communication from her "secretary of state" officially received by the Secretary of State of the United States, and her "representative" recommended in this official communication, also officially received, through whom afterward "the official texts of the concessions which Spain was willing to make for the sake of peace" were "laid before this Government." When she can do all that at the very beginning of difficulties, what will she not do before the difficulties are ended?

Another thing that just now makes all this worthy of only the more careful consideration is the movement to have the United States enter the lists as one of "the Powers," and form alliances and carry on intrigues with the other "Powers" in the affairs of the whole world.

Just now is a time for deep study and careful thinking.

A. T. J.

Great Desecration and a Great Victory.

THE first real battle of the war with Spain was fought in the harbor of Manila, May 1—Sunday.

It was a terrible desecration of Sunday,—worse than is ever caused by Sunday baseball or any other worldly amusement. It was Sunday fighting,—fighting in which men were being killed, and where devastation and death were being spread faster than is being done by the open Sunday saloon. It was Sunday desecration in its worst form.

Under such circumstances the only expectation at all in harmony with the repeated and positive assurances given by a certain class of clergymen touching Sunday desecration, is that the party by whom such glaring desecration of Sunday was inaugurated, would meet with crushing defeat. But lo, instead of this they met with the most brilliant success!

The American commander was not obliged to give battle to the Spanish fleet at Manila on Sunday. He might have delayed the attack for a day, mindful of the terrible incubus which—by the prediction of these clergymen—his disregard of Sunday would cast upon his prospects of success. But he did not wait. It was simply a case of daring defiance of all the principles and precepts upon which the Sunday National Reform theory is based.

More than this: if the accounts given be true, the feat which the Sunday-desecrating commander undertook was one of unusual hazard; for he had not only to engage the Spanish fleet in battle, but in doing so had to force his way into a strange harbor filled with mines and to sustain the fire from a humber of formidable fortifications. Yet, where a fatal slip would have been so easy, Providence gave him none. His success was signal and complete.

If his ships had run aground in the darkness of night under cover of which he entered the harbor; or if they had been blown up by the mines as was the "Maine" at Havana; or if they had been sunk or disabled by the fire of the enemy's guns, the country would have been pointed to it as a clear and terrible result of disregard of the "Sabbath." And being the opposite of the result which we are assured Sunday desecration must bring, it is clearly true that either Sunday is not the Sabbath at all, or that there is nothing in the theory by which temporal judgments are threatened to desecrators of the day; or both.

It is to point out how utterly valueless and unworthy of notice is this principle of National Reform doctrine, that we mention the coincidence of this naval battle and victory, with Sunday. The doctrine that Sunday desecration brings disaster upon the nation is just as weighty with truth—and only so—as were the curses pronounced by the Catholic priest upon the crops of one of his flock who had dared to break away from his control, with the result that the next season the farmer came to the priest with the request, "If ye please, sir, would ye come again and curse me crops?"

Romanism—Retrocession.

Translated from the "Estandarte," Buenos Ayres.

FROM the archbishop downward the Catholics do not tire of claiming that the world owes its progress and advancement to the Catholic Church; and even dare to affirm that to effectually cure all social evils, the only remedy is to diffuse the doctrines of the Romish Church. However, this is nothing more than ecclesiastical music. Romanism and Retrocession are synonymous. One has but to look to the nations where the papist teachings are dominant, to clearly prove this great truth.

We do not wish to refer to Spain now, which owes all her misfortunes, all her evils to Romanism—the unsurmountable stumbling-block in her way—which hinders her from taking a single step, and which binds her to such a degree, as to incapacitate the wings that could help her rise to great and noble heights.

Romanism, we have said, is synonymous with Retrocession, and as a proof of this in America, we shall transcribe what is editorially written in El Radical, of Colquechaca, Bolivia, with regard to what transpires in the Republic of Ecuador:—

"The presidents of the republic of Ecuador are nominated by the pope. The priests are authorized to dictate all laws there; consequently, the country lacks railways, telegraphs, telephones, mail coaches, high roads (with the exception of those roads which the Incas opened up before the conquest).

"In the city of Guayaquil, the only Ecuadorian port, there reside many foreigners. These have long desired to extend a telegraph line to Quito, but the fanatical populace, urged on by the priests, cut the wires each time they are extended. They have no wish that modern ideas should penetrate into their midst. There is also a law that prohibits the importation of books without previous ecclesiastical sanction. The expurgatory index is placed in charge of the Jesuitic fathers. There is no account given of the income or expenditure of the national treasury, but it is well known that the funds that are not transmitted to Rome are filtered into the churches and convents for the protection of priests and monks. When the income does not cover the expenditure, the deficit is demanded, sword in hand, from the merchants of Guayaquil. This proceeding in no way pleases the foreign element, and to free themselves from these unpleasant military visits, they nail in the front of their houses shields upon which are painted their national colors, also placing beneath some phrases similar to the following: 'Here lives a Frenchman.' 'He who lives here is an American.' 'The owner of this house is a German.'

"One can only go from Guayaquil to Quito the Capital by making a nine days' ride on mules. The road is mountainous and wretchedly bad, nor can one see throughout the journey a single wayside inn or hotel in which to repose. Quito is a city populated by about 200,000 inhabitants, yet it is found in exactly the same benighted condition, morally and intellectually, as it was 300 years ago. There, they receive no communication from the rest of the world. There, they publish neither daily, weekly, nor monthly papers. There, they have no schools outside of those under the auspices of the monks, wherein the pupils are taught to count the beads very well, but to read very bad. There, the lives of the 'saints'—stupid Romish fables—take the place of scientific instruction. The moral and intellectual degradation of Quito exceeds that of Egypt and India. The clergy teach with the most correct example gluttony, drunkenness, indolence, and voluptuousness. In fact the whole course of instruction received there can be summed up as follows: Daily mass, auricular confession, full submission to the priests, license to the evil propensities of corrupt nature to run their full course; the people knowing that the priest is ever at hand to pardon all lapses from morality. Four fifths of the population can neither read nor write. The republic is one only in name, because its constitution declares that the nation exists wholly and entirely consecrated to the service of the holy church.

"The army is divided into four corps, called 'The division of the Holy Virgin.' 'Division of the Holy Spirit.' 'Division of the Son of God.' 'Division of the body and blood of Christ.' The 'Sacred Heart of Jesus' is the national emblem, and the president's staff are denominated 'The holy lancers of the Holy Mary.' It is to be supposed that there are no Protestants in Quito, since they would not be tolerated in the place. Even the faithful who does not frequent the sacrament is stoned.

"Behold the republic of Ecuador beneath the baneful power of the pope of Rome! Behold also an unimpeachable witness, and an incontrovertible proof of what the fruits of Rome are; intolerance and ruin in every sense! Quito, the city, geographically, the most elevated of the globe, is to day, from the moral, intellectual, and political point of view, the most depraved in the universe, thanks to Romish theocratic influence.

"Behold here a small picture of the benefits, progress, and civilization, such as proceeds from Romish domination. Alas for the people and nations in which the papacy is permitted to spring roots, and take possession of the government!"

Frances Willard's Last Saying.

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

WHEN on a dying bed our loved lay low,
 With faintly beating heart and brow of snow,
 That heart that loved the world in all its woe
 Filled with a tide of love's own overflow,
 That brow whose circle spanned the thought of man,
 Was all engrossed with love's redemption plan,
 And rising on her couch of death, love's power
 Sustained her for a long exhorting hour,
 In which she urged the world's need be sufficed,
 Its hunger stayed by Christ and only Christ.

Had she not known of science? Seen with awe
 The working of God's unremitting law
 In star and flower? Aye. Had she not Compassed the economics with her thought?
 Pledged the arm of state should stern withhold
 The weak from sorrow at the hands of bold?
 Had she not planned to thwart heredity
 That brought to man an evil destiny?
 Been philanthropic to the utmost stint,
 And fed and clothed the poor from liberal mint?
 Preached measures of reform for field and city,
 And whelmed all nations in our woman's pity?
 Yet when the rustle of all plans were still,
 She saw the cross alone on Calvary's hill,
 And stood with one, the Man of love in tryst,
 And said with her last breath, "Preach Christ, preach Christ."

Felt she the world's need less at last, that she Should urge one plan alone with urgency?
 Ah no. Her soul with love more strong than death
 Held for the world the service of her breath,
 To tell the standard bearers mid all loss
 To raise aloft the banner of the cross,
 And rally men beneath Emanuel's sway.
 With eyes more clear to the great need to-day
 With heaven's Holy Ghost to show love's plan
 She bade with urgency to speak to man
 Of that one Fulness that for all sufficed;
 To preach to souls the power of God in Christ.

This was Paul's message, and he would naught know
 Save Christ, Christ crucified mid men below.
 "Not I, but Christ," he said, "and yet I live
 The life of Christ through my dead self to give,"
 As one raised out of time, and for such soul
 There'll be a crown of life, a well-won goal.
 This message that for souls like these sufficed,
 Surely shall do for us. "Preach Christ, preach Christ."

We've laid her mid the lilies as 'tis meet.
 She breathed the fragrance of the lily sweet.
 We've planted roses o'er her grave. E'en so
 She breathed the rose's perfume here below,
 And in her dying hour saw only Him
 Who dwells in love amid the cherubim,
 The altogether lovely,—He who came
 To save men by the power of His name.
 In Him for life and death she was sufficed.
 O let us heed, and preach to men but Christ.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

HE looked at me a moment as though my proposition was the raving of an insane woman, unworthy of even contempt; and then turned to close the interview, but I said:—

"No, you must listen to me. You called me in and threw down the challenge, so I must be heard. You men insist upon the necessity of this business, and you know, every man among you, that the saloon could not live on much longer if our pure, clean, sweet little boys should not learn some time to drink rum, and start into the awful procession of drunkards. You will have the saloon; you will not devise any plan to run it by machinery; you will have our boys; you catch them, or what is just the same, you license the saloon to do it. It lies in wait for them as they are growing up, and as soon as one gets a little taller than his mother, and that doesn't takelong for he grows so fast, you catch him and throw him into your mill, and grind him up into devil's meat, and still you expect the mother to sit quietly at home and sing to the younger boys, and teach them the principles of truth and purity until they grow big enough for you, and then you catch them and grind them up, for the sake of revenue, and still demand that the mother must stay behind her closed doors and sing on, and pray on, and believe on, and be as gentle and saintly as though nothing had happened. No, sir; Satan has over reached himself; the mothers of this country are awake at last, and I assure you that they will never go back into the old quiet life as long as a saloon, and a law protecting it, exists in this nation."

He had become flushed with anger, as, I suppose I was myself; and as soon as he could find a chance to put in a word he exclaimed:

"Well, what are we to do? When we men, who are supposed to know something about public affairs, have done the very best we know how to do, if you women are not satisfied, what are you going to do about it, anyhow?"

This question came to me with the force of a stunning blow. What could we do? We had done everything that we knew how to do, and still the saloon was here. Might it not be possible that "the men" had tried just as hard as we had, and had as honestly failed? What was the trouble? We had prayed to God, and to every class of men who seemed to have any sort of relations to the saloon, or to the laws under which it existed; and the only results so far as yet appeared were of a nature to arouse the gravest anxieties. We were helpless indeed; and as for myself, I was at that moment more nearly hopeless and faithless than at any other time in my life. I thought of my children with a sense of despair that could not be expressed in words.

The man whose question had completely silenced me, stood a moment watching the effect of his words, and then with a sarcastic expression flavored with a sort of a patronizing pity for my evident distress, turned to his desk, and began, I suppose, to try to get hold of the work which had been interrupted; while I sat, turning his question and the situation over in my mind, and wondering if indeed God had hidden his face in anger, or if we had as yet failed to find his way out of this perplexing labyrinth of evils and of sorrows which are included in the intricate windings of the "Sum of all Villainies."

As I sat brooding over the question, suddenly a thought flashed into my mind, and then followed what I have always called my revelation. My heart gave a leap of joyful surprise, for I seemed to see the end within reach, by a way so simple and natural, so philosophical, so in harmony with every principal of righteousness, so far-reaching, that I was thrilled and enthused with a new courage.

I said to the man at the desk, "Come here, please, I have something to say to you;" and he arose and came toward me.

"I have an answer to your question," I said. "You want to know what we women will do about it. I will tell you, for I have just found out. The trouble is that, while there are a great many good men who look at this question of the saloon just as we women do, there are not enough of them; that is all. They are in the minority, and must be reinforced, and we women must do it. The majority of the members of the W. C. T. U. are mothers; of the rest the majority are teachers. We have the crude human material in the cradles, the schools, the Sunday and mission schools, and the slums are full of it waiting to be gathered up and utilized. We will go to work on this crude material—the boys of this nation. Some of them are pretty young yet, but that is a defect that time will remedy; give us a little time"—and I began to tell off the years rapidly in my mind. "Give us thirty-five years at the furthest, and, by a process of education, training and development, we will produce and present to this nation a majority on the right side of this question; men who will look at it as we do, and will some day snow the liquor traffic under with a pure man's clean ballot so deep that it will never know a resurrection. This thing will we do, God helping us."

O, the inspiration of that possibility—of what then appeared to be a certainty! I have many times tried to repeat these words in telling this story, just as I spoke them that day to my audience of one; but the fire that burned in them at that moment could never be reproduced. And how true it seemed! Surely nothing could be more logical. It evidently struck my audience as a foregone conclusion. He turned white as death, and for a moment had nothing to say; but rallying himself, with a light nervous laugh, he turned on his heel, saying,

"That will be a good idea; I would advise you to do it; it will keep you out of mischief."

"I will," I retorted, "I will go out and begin now."

Four Acts in a National Drama.

BY H. F. PHELPS.

FEBRUARY 29, 1892, will ever be memorable from the fact that it was upon that day that Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court of the United States sent forth his dictum, that "This is a Christian nation." Not only did he do this most un-American act, but he did lay hold of that sacred document, the Constitution of the United States, and declared that that instrument "voiced the same thing." It is scarcely necessary to say that in so doing he misinterpreted, and misconstrued, and perverted the Constitution from its original intent and purpose.

The next event in the scene was the establishment of a papal court at Washington, D. C., with Mgr. Satolli as its first delegate; and that for a wicked purpose,—a jesuitical act in the final subjection of this nation to papal control. Referring to the appointment of Satolli as papal ablegate in this nation, the Rev. Joseph Cook says: "But Satolli is in America to make the most of press, pulpit, platform, and the secret power of the confessional to advance Romish pretensions smoothly. . . . His taking up his residence among us as first incumbent of the office of a permanent apostolic delegate, is an omen of mischief to American institutions." For had not the Supreme Court of the United States, in that dictum of Justice Brewer, declared for a legalized Christianity, the very image and likeness of papalism? And would not Rome lay claim to that which was her own?

Then quickly followed the third act in the drama, that of Bishop O'Gorman, at the World's Catholic Congress, taking out of the mouth of Justice Brewer, the very line of argument which he used to prove that "this is a Christian nation," as proof that this is a Catholic Christian nation. In the meantime, as a sort of an accompaniment of this third act in the drama, the nation in the person of its citizens and officials engaged in extending congratulations and welcomes to this emissary of disruption of our institutions; which thing was again repeated at the coming of the second ablegate, Mgr. Martinelli. Satolli, in turn, shouted to his countrymen, for he saw that the way was clear, "Go forward! In the one hand bearing the emblem of truth—the Bible (the Catholic Bible, of course), and in the other the Constitution" (of the United States as interpreted by the Supreme Court, of course). From that time to this, Rome has put on a bolder front than before, declaring that she was preaching "bold doctrines to Americans;" and doing all in her power to make this a Catholic Christian nation.

And now comes the fourth act in this greatest of all tragedies—for it is and will be nothing short of a tragedy from this time forward to the end. This fourth act is in connection with the Hispano-American controversy. There is no room for doubt but that Pope Leo would most gladly have accepted a call from this Government to act as arbitrator of this trouble with Spain, according to the traditional policy that the popes should be at the head of all civil governments,—the father of nations, if not in one capacity then in another. But no one would like to believe that this Government would be guilty of so great a blunder as to ask the pope to intermeddle himself in the affairs of this nation. But, blunder or no blunder; guilty or not guilty; with or without official request, it now transpires that Pope Leo and Archbishop Ireland are, to say the least, the semi official arbitrators between the government of the United States and Spain. It will be well if the people of this country would open their eyes and see things as they really are. It seems that the queen regent begged the pope to use his good offices to bring about peace; all naturally enough. Then why did not the pope ask the Spanish government to stop their butchery in the island of Cuba? Did he do this? No. He turned his eyes toward the United States, and desired some one to represent his "holiness" in Washington. Martinelli was first selected, but he refused on the grounds that he could not possibly have any standing at the White House. "It was then determined," says a St. Paul daily, "that the close and cordial friendship which existed between Archbishop Ireland, President McKinley and his whole cabinet, joined to the fact that he is an American citizen, made him a fit instrument through which negotiations could be conducted. In view of this he received a formal letter from Cardinal Rampolla, papal secretary of state, authorizing him to represent the pope. This was presented to Judge Day and semi-official relations begun. Since that time Archbishop Ireland has been in communication with Europe. Through him the official texts of concessions which Spain was willing to make for the sake of peace have been laid before this Government and before the European ambassadors. The composite news of the situation has been cabled to him and by him disseminated."

The iniquity of this movement will be more apparent when we remember that Spain has an officially-recognized representative in this Government, through whom the pope could have officiated. But this would have been to acknowledge the authority of civil governments as being above that of the pope.

It is claimed that the mission of Mr. Ireland is "to find and to make practicable some plan of honorable peace." Of course, this is a good mission, if only he would give his time and efforts to it as a citizen, as an individual; but when he does it as a representative of the Vatican, there is mischief in it. Rome has always been an enemy to the principles that underlie a republic; and although she now makes professions of friendship with such governments, it is only because she can the more easily carry out her ruinous schemes. Rome is here to stay; and, as a recent writer has said, "All over this fair land Rome is piling up her massive structures, in the secret recesses of which will be repeated the persecutions of former days."

I am aware that this is a strong arraignment of Rome; but some so-called Protestants are doing far more than she can possibly do, to turn this Government over into her hands. Let them awake to the study of the first principles that gave the name "Protestant" to the world. If only they would do this, they would not do that which they are now doing.

True Loyalty.

BY E. W. WHITNEY.

DURING the agitation here in Boulder over the "flag salute," much has been said of the "disloyalty" of Seventh-day Adventists because of their refusal to use the formula connected with the salute. In the face of repeated explanations to the effect that Adventists do not object to showing respect to the flag in a proper manner, and that they are loyal to the principles of which it is the emblem, but that their objection is simply to the use of words which are inconsistent with both the religion of Jesus Christ and with the principles expressed in the Constitution of the United States, there are still those who persistently charge them with disloyalty to the Government. This charge will, doubtless, become more common as the contrast becomes more apparent between true Christian loyalty and that pretended loyalty which places allegiance to the laws of men above that which we owe to God. This possibility should lead to the careful study of what constitutes

TRUE CHRISTIAN LOYALTY.

Can the Christian be loyal to both God and the government? The answer depends, perhaps, upon the definition we accept of the word loyal. If we use the word in the narrow and limited sense of implicitly obeying in detail whatever law a government may enact without regard to the higher law of righteousness, it is evident that he cannot always be loyal to both. But if we regard the term in the more comprehensive and better sense of steadfastness in and loyalty to the principles of right upon which all government is supposed to be based, then he can be loyal to both God and the government; rather he must of necessity be loyal to both. Indeed in this true sense the Christian is the most loyal man—the only truly loyal man—that walks the earth.

A familiar yet striking example of such loyalty to God and government is that of Daniel. In his position of president of the princes of Media he was certainly loyal to the king—the government—in the true sense for he was "preferred above" his associates "because an excellent spirit was in him." Yet when it came to obeying specific requirements of the king which were in conflict with Daniel's obligation to God, the very principle of excellence which made him loyal to the government of man in everything consistent with his allegiance to God, made him just as bold to disobey an inconsistent requirement, in his loyalty to the higher government of God. This true loyalty in him was not manifest alone during the reign of one king, Darius, but also during the reign of Cyrus, for the record runs: "So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius (the Median) and in the reign of Cyrus, the Persian." Thus in his loyalty to God and to God's government first, he could also be loyal to the principle of human government under two forms represented by Darius and Cyrus. Though this loyalty led him to utterly refuse to obey the king's decree, and, as a consequence to be cast into the den of lions, yet it proved a blessing to the king, the nation and the world. It caused Darius to acknowledge the true God, and to publish his acknowledgment "unto all people, nations, and languages that dwell in all the earth."

A most important lesson for the present time should be learned from this experience, viz., That true loyalty to God and his government first, last and all the time is the truest loyalty to human governments.

GOVERNMENTS ORDAINED BY GOD.

The principle of government originated with and is ordained by God for a purpose, and whether in the nation or in the church—two distinct fields for its exercise—this principle is to be recognized and respected. But as thus exercised by men as God's agents its recognition is never to supercede the individual recognition of that higher allegiance which every man owes to the author of the principle. Christ and Paul both taught very distinctly that governments should be respected and sustained (see Luke 20:19-26, and Rom. 13:1-7); yet never by precept or example did they teach that such support and recognition should be rendered, either to national or church government, in matters conflicting with any requirement of God upon the individual.

The true attitude of the Christian, then, is that of loyalty to God first, and this principle will make him loyal to any government under which he receives benefits and protection just so far as that government requires nothing of him contrary to his personal obligation to his God. This view of loyalty draws a clearly-defined line between civil and religious requirements. In the one we are to respect the governmental authority of men though their requirements may conflict with our personal selfish interests, for this is for the common good of society, and does not encroach upon our conscientious service to God. In the other, men, no matter what their position or authority, have no right to interfere, and if they do so, true loyalty demands that the individual shall obey God rather than men. Such loyalty will in fact prove better for all concerned, though it may be unjustly adjudged as disloyalty and treason.

GOD ALONE INFALLIBLE.

It is well to note in this connection that the same principle holds good whether in respect to government as exercised by a church organization or by a state organization. Both are, as at present constituted, organizations of men for a purpose. Both are, however, ordained of God. Each has a different field, but neither, even in its specified field, is infallible. God alone is that. To him each individual, whether ruler or subject, priest or layman, has equal access. And when one avails himself of such access it places him outside and beyond the authority of any man or body of men, either judicial or ecclesiastic, as to matters of conscience in understanding and obeying God's Word.

Perhaps no better presentation of the true principle in its application to both the state and the church can be given than the answer of the apostles when forbidden to teach in the name of Jesus by the "rulers," "elders," "scribes," and "priests." These men, notwithstanding the fact that at that time the Jews were under Roman rule, represented, in their relation to the apostles, both the authority of the church and the state. Paul recognized such relation later (see Acts 23:4,5; and 28:19). Yet with this relation existing and with a just sense of loyalty to both human and divine authority, Peter and John and the other apostles answered and said: "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than to God judge ye. . . . We ought to obey God rather than men."

In the time of Christ the Jewish rulers in their blind zeal to support their national and church customs repudiated, in fact, every principle of true loyalty. In principle it is just as possible now that the same mistake be made by others besides Jews. Christ was the only one truly loyal to the Jewish church and nation when he declared, "Woe unto you, scribes and pharisees, hypocrites; because ye build the tombs of the prophets and garnish the sepulchers of the righteous and say: If we had been in the days of our fathers we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves that ye be the children of them which killed the prophets." And again, when he told them that it was vain for them to worship God while they were "teaching for doctrine the commandments of men."

This is the kind of loyalty needed to-day, rather than that pretended and spurious kind which exalts custom, courts the favor of and stands by men and institutions simply for the favor one hopes to receive in return. In the latter there may seem to be present gain, but it will result only in future loss and eternal ruin. In the former may be seeming present loss, but it will prove future gain and eternal salvation.

Boulder, Colo.

THE sect of the Nazarenes in Hungary is increasing so rapidly that its growth threatens the Austro-Hungarian government with an additional burning question. These people, whose tenets with regard to military service and swearing allegiance closely resemble those of the English Friends and the Russian Mennonites, refuse to perform the military duties imposed on them.—Literary Digest.

A TRIBE of Christian savages are much to be preferred for all good purposes to a company of savage "Christians."

THERE was a great Roman Catholic jubilee held in this city May 4, 5, the occasion being the twenty-fifth anniversary of Archbishop Corrigan's investiture with the office of bishop. The first day was devoted to the honors conferred upon the papal prelate by the Catholic Church; and if the proceedings had stopped here they would have possessed far less of baleful significance. But it was thought that a great ovation might be secured for this Roman ecclesiastic by the citizens of the metropolis, both Catholic and Protestant—so-called. Accordingly, the second day was set apart for this purpose, and the event amply fulfilled the expectation. The Metropolitan Opera House was filled with the throng that came out to do honor to the representative of a foreign government, foreign institutions and principles. The archbishop was clothed in the vestments of his ecclesiastical office, and entered arm in arm with Justice Daly, who presided over the meeting. He was followed by Mgr. Martinelli, the papal plenipotentiary in America, and by other archbishops, bishops, justices, etc.

JUSTICE DALY opened with an address, in which he said:—

"It was the pure patriot Archbishop Hughes who laid the foundation of America's greatest cathedral; it was the equally patriotic Cardinal McCloskey who reared its walls and who began the successful work of the parochial schools; and it was our archbishop who completed the one, extended the other, and has crowned all the achievements of his predecessors with the magnificent pile that now rests upon Valentine Hill, and which we know as St. Joseph's Seminary. Let me say that this is a distinctly American success—a monument of our national progress in science and art. [Applause.]

"As we look back over the path we have trod in following our archbishop we are moved to turn to him and say: 'Lead on still further, and we will follow, and this community will sustain you. May strength and joy be yours, and may you round the golden circle of years that brings you to another jubilee, and see our fair land the greater and better for your work.'"

* * *

A ROMAN CATHOLIC seminary a "monument of our national progress in science and art"! Let us hope that he spoke of it merely from an architectural standpoint.

* * *

AND at this gathering, which was in the name of American citizenship, this representative of American institutions of government said to this prelate of Rome, "Lead on still further, and we will follow." It is to be feared that his words are only too true. But every person worthy the name of Protestant will respond, Not I! And no loyal citizen of this nation will follow, as a citizen, where any ecclesiastic, Catholic or otherwise, may lead.

* * *

AN archbishop, or any other church dignitary, Catholic or Protestant, is an ecclesiastic under all circumstances so long as he continues true to his office. He cannot be considered as a citizen, apart from the religious office which he holds. His citizenship only serves to unite, in himself, the state and the church. While men may make such a distinction in theory, it does not exist in fact. The idea that a Catholic archbishop, or any other ecclesiastic whose time and energies are occupied by the duties of his office, is working for the nation separate and apart from the church, is simply ridiculous. If he does anything which he believes to be for the interests of the nation, it is simply that he may thereby serve some end of his church. The church is first with him, and the state comes in secondarily, and incidentally to the church. This must be so with every ecclesiastic who is true to his calling; and there can be no serious doubt that it is true in the case of the archbishop of New York. And therefore the honors paid to him "as a citizen" by Protestant and other citizens of this city, were actually paid to him as an ecclesiastic; and upon analysis the whole proceeding clearly resolves into a tribute from the American state to the papal church.

* * *

THAT the papal church is pleased to receive such tributes, is a fact of which few intelligent people need to be told.

* * *

AMONG other speeches of adulation that were made before the archbishop, was one by the noted politician, Mr. Bourke Cochran, in which he took occasion to deny that in this country church and state are divorced. They are not, he said, and cannot be. "No, the church and the state cannot be separated. The Christian state is the child of the Christian Church." And as the child should be guided and controlled by its parent, so, of course, must the "Christian state" be guided and controlled by the "Christian [Catholic] church"; the American Republic must be controlled by the papacy,—unless the "Christian church" means to abandon her offspring, which we may rest assured, in this case, she does not.

* * *

MR. COCHRAN is right; if there is a "Christian state" it must be the child of the "Christian church." And it being asserted by Protestants even more than by Catholics that this is a "Christian state," it is incumbent upon both parties to settle the question of its parentage; in other words, to determine which one is the "Christian church."

* * *

It is such occasions as this that reveal the real danger which threatens this country and Government,—a vastly greater one than that which its military resources are now being employed to avert.

* * *

THE other day in Chicago the national flag was 'consecrated' by a Catholic priest and afterwards hoisted to the spire of his church. The proceedings are thus described in the Inter-Ocean:—

"One thousand people were in and around the Church of the Nativity this afternoon when Rev. Father J. M. Cartan, a veteran of the Civil War, officiated in the ceremony of blessing the national emblem. Solemn services in the church prescribed by the ritual for the blessing of battle flags preceded the opening exercises. A chorus of forty voices sang Mozart's 'Gloria.'

"Seventy acolytes assisted at the ceremonial, and at its conclusion the flag was lifted from the altar by two boys attired in silver embroidered robes of white, and was kissed by each of the seventy boys in turn. It was then brought out by the priest, who said: 'We are met here under thrilling circumstances. We are about to raise the greatest emblem of justice and civilization on earth, next to the cross.'"

* * *

THE national flag was "the greatest emblem of justice and liberty on earth, next to the cross," after it had received this Catholic blessing. After being thus Romanized, it was fit to be raised to the spire of the Catholic Church. If not so, what was this blessing for?

Of course, the "blessing" amounted to nothing; otherwise the flag would be fit for nothing as the emblem of a free government.

* * *

A SHOEMAKER in Kansas City, Kan., says a dispatch to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, of April 26, had a narrow escape from lynching on account of what was construed by his neighbors to be a lack of patriotism. When the announcement came that war had been declared with Spain, he closed his shop, hung crepe on the door, and posted this notice: "Closed in memory of a Christian nation that descends to the barbarity of war."

* * *

THE result seems to have been not what he anticipated. "In ten minutes," says the dispatch, "a vast crowd had gathered, the door was burst in, and in another minute Collins would have been dangling at a rope's end from the near-by telegraph pole. But the police rushed in and rescued Collins, and hustled him off to the police station, followed by a howling, shouting mob. Collins will be compelled to leave town to avoid the vengeance of the patriots."

If this account is true, as it seems, it clearly shows that there is in this country a sentiment of false patriotism which is the most dangerous enemy of that liberty of thought and speech which all true patriotism upholds. Every individual has a right to protest against the barbarity of war and to point out the incongruity of war with the assumption that the nation going into it is Christian; and true patriotism does not deny the rights of the people.

* * *

WE have heard much in this country from certain ones about the horrors of the "Continental Sunday." The part which imagination, under the stimulus of religious emotion, may play in such descriptions is suggested by some words that were uttered at the hearing at Winnipeg on the proposed Sunday law for Manitoba. Mr. J. S. Ewart, Q. C., had spoken against the measure, on the ground that it was not needed. "Dr. Duval," says a Winnipeg daily, in its report, "then engaged Mr. Ewart in a lively skirmish on the Sunday of the United States and Mexico, and stated that that day in those countries was so desecrated that decent people did not care to live there. Mr. Ewart answered that this was due to other influences which were not at work in Canada."

In the mind of this Canadian clergyman the horrors of the American Sunday evidently exceed those of the "Continental Sunday," as pictured by his brother clergymen in the United States.

Manitoba Workingmen on Sunday Legislation.

At the hearing recently given at Winnipeg, Manitoba, on the bill for Sunday legislation brought forward by Manitoba ecclesiastics for passage by the legislature, the workingmen of the city, through their representative, declared their antagonism to the proposed measure. The following from a Winnipeg daily gives the substance of the speech made by the workingmen's delegate:—

"Mr. W. Scott said he was present on behalf of the Trades and Labor Council and the Labor Party in the city. When these men's rights are assailed they generally make a good outcry. These men whom he represented are not asking amendments to the bill, but asking that it be dropped altogether. Those he represented repudiated the assertion made at the second reading of the bill, when it was said that those who opposed it were asking for a continental Sunday. It had been said by the sponsor of the bill that this legislation was required to prevent the spread of secularism. What is secularism? Is it not a protest against certain creeds which clergymen themselves believe to be obsolete. By passing this act it would tend to the spread of secularism. The whole bill was class legislation. Why should a livery man be allowed to hire out a livery rig on Sunday, and the man who owned a few row boats on the river be prevented from hiring out his boats? He supposed it was because the livery rigs would be hired to drive people to church. In fact the whole bill was of the tendency to close every door but the church door. He then discussed the various games prohibited, saying that in this respect the bill was both arbitrary and invidious. He hoped the government would not forfeit the confidence of the people which they now enjoy, by passing such an act."

This is how the workingmen of Winnipeg feel on the subject of Sunday legislation. They do not want it. As their representative stated—and this is true of the workingmen everywhere—they are able to make a "good outcry" for what they do want; and this has never been made by them anywhere in behalf of compulsory Sunday observance. What sentiment has been expressed by them in favor of such legislation has been worked up by dint of much exertion on the part of religious zealots. The workingmen do not want more restriction; they want liberty.

Lawfulness of the Inquisition.

In the Nineteenth Century, for March, Mr. W. S. Lilly states some interesting facts concerning the nature and workings of that infamous institution, the Inquisition. It appears that the Inquisition was conducted strictly according to law, and its proceedings were based—in the minds of its defenders—upon the principles of sound reason. The author quotes as his chief authority on the subject the writings of a Dominican monk, Father Elisha Masini, published at Rome and Bologna in 1716, with authorization of the church. This writer's object was to magnify "the divine, the heavenly occupation" of the Inquisitor; and among those of this class he enumerates "Almighty God," David, Christ, St. John, John the Baptist, and St. Peter. We quote from a summarization of Mr. Lilly's article, by the Literary Digest, of April 30:—

"A trial before the Inquisition was instituted in one of two ways, by denunciation, when some one came before the tribunal as an accuser of another, and by inquisition by the tribunal into the truth of some rumor. The former was the more common way, and Father Masini's 'Sacred Arsenal' gives full information on the methods to be pursued, the questions to be asked, the nature of the tortures to be administered, the distinctions between different offenses, and the reasons for everything. It even gives a model trial of one Beltramo for blasphemy. The first step is the denunciation and the interrogatories addressed to the one making it. Then comes the summoning, one by one, of the witnesses to the blasphemy, and the questions in each case. Then Beltramo, ignorant of the charge against him, each witness having been sworn to secrecy, is summoned. If he denies the charge and makes a defense he is entitled to an advocate, but from the advocate as well as from Beltramo all the facts that might disclose the identity of the denunciator are concealed. We quote now from Mr. Lilly's translation from the 'Sacred Arsenal':—

"If the accused denies the offenses laid to his charge, and they are not fully proved, and if within the time assigned him for making his defense he has not stated anything in his exculpation, or, having attempted a defense, has not in any way cleared himself from the charge which results against him from the process, it is necessary, in order to have the truth of it, to subject him to rigorous examination, the torture having been expressly devised to supplement the oral testimony of the witnesses when they can not bring complete proof against the accused. Nor is that at all inconsistent with ecclesiastical mildness and benignity. Even when the proof is legitimate, clear, and, as the phrase is, conclusive in suo genere, the inquisitor may, and ought, without in any way incurring blame, to employ it, in order that the accused, confessing their crimes, may be converted to God, and, by means of this chastisement, may save their souls. It would be an unbecoming and unjust thing, repugnant to all laws, human and divine, to subject any one to torments save in a lawful way, and upon evidence; and besides that, the confession so obtained would be invalid and of no account, even though the accused should persist in it, for we must never begin with torture but with evidence. And even if subsequently evidence should be forthcoming, such confession would not be validated. But since in a matter of so great importance errors may easily be committed, either to the notable prejudice of justice, if crimes remain unpunished, or to the most serious and irreparable loss of the accused, the inquisitor, in order to proceed cautiously, should put before the consultors of the holy office the case for the accusation and for the defense, and be guided by their learned and wise opinion—although they have only a consultative, not a decisive voice. Or, if the matter be grave, let him put it before the sacred and supreme tribunal of the holy and universal Roman Inquisition."

"The most common of the tortures applied in Italy was the strappado. The person tortured had his hands bound behind his back, then by means of a cord attached to the wrists he was elevated to the roof of the chamber and then let fall to within a short distance of the floor. The torture of fire was the exposure of the bare soles, anointed with lard, to fierce heat. The boot and thumb-screws were also employed. Any confession thus obtained had to be ratified afterward, without the torture; but refusal to ratify would subject the witness to renewed torture."

Such is a glimpse of the workings of the Romish Inquisition, which continued in force in Italy up to the time of the papal overthrow in 1870. It put no person to the torture "save in a lawful way;" and the fiends who presided over its operations, bearing in mind no doubt its scrupulous regard for the requirements of law and reason, appeared as men pursuing a most honorable and even saintly calling. "Saint" Peter Martyr, who as president of the Inquisition, "achieved fame as one of the most relentless exterminators of heresy the world has ever seen," was a man of "sweet benignity, of exhaustless compassion, of wonderful charity." But a devil is never so fully a devil as when he appears as an angel of light.

THERE is no tyranny so cruel, no yoke so intolerable, as priestcraft vested with temporal authority.—Bishop Venner.

If the gospel was of a nature to be propagated or maintained by the power of the world, God would not have entrusted it to fishermen.—Luther.

Studies in French History. —21.

"THE ravages of war, although somewhat kept in the background, were not entirely stopped," said Professor Carman, as he arose and began his visit with his pupils.

"Why, professor," said Will Barnaby, "I thought that the plague was the means of stopping the war with the English."

"It was, practically speaking, at least for the time being, for the French were in no condition to fight. But the English king roamed around all over the country, wherever he chose to go, making conquests of cities and villages, as he wished,—the wretched inhabitants almost utterly incapable of helping themselves or of offering any resistance."

"Did King John feel any like fighting back?" asked Jennie Jacobs, "or didn't he care so long as he had a good time?"

"Yes, he did care, and began to prepare to drive Edward out of France. So at last John, and the Black Prince, son of Edward, met near Poitiers, the same place where Clovis fought and defeated the Visigoths. In this battle the English were the victors, and King John and his youngest son, Philip, a boy of only fourteen years,—who really behaved himself more bravely than his three older brothers,—were taken prisoners and carried off in triumph to England."

"I suppose King Edward was glad to be able to vent his spite on the French king and prince," suggested Will Palmeter.

"No, Will; you are quite wrong in your opinion, for really they were very kindly treated."

"About this time we have the strange spectacle of a king voluntarily giving up his kingdom and throne to another. This was the king of Dauphiny, that country in the southeast of what we now call France, lying between the river Rhone and the Alps. Other kings sacrificed the lives of their subjects and everything dear, to acquire more territory and to become great in the eyes of mankind. But unlike them, this man grew weary of the life of a prince, and he wished to become a humble monk. So he agreed to give his kingdom to Charles, the son of John, and afterward called The Wise."

"I wonder the king of Dauphiny's son did not oppose this thing," said practical Jack.

"I presume he would have, but as it happened, there was no son, so the Dauphin Charles took possession of the easily acquired territory. However it was agreed beforehand that Dauphiny should never belong to France, and that when a prince of Dauphiny succeeded to the French throne, he must lay down his title to Dauphiny, which, of course, he would naturally give to his eldest son."

"Where was King John all this time?" asked Edna Phillips.

"He and his young son were having a very comfortable time in England as Edward's royal prisoners. After a little the Dauphin took it upon himself to try to collect money from the impoverished people, with which to ransom the king and his son."

"I don't see how it was possible to get much money from the poor peasants in such a time as this," whispered Max Smith.

"It was indeed like taking their heart's blood," sighed Professor Carman. "But they were wise enough to declare that they would not pay a copper until the king agreed to cease corrupting the coin, and until the Dauphin promised to take no more of the people's money for his private use."

"I suppose he would not agree to that," commented Will Palmeter.

"Yes, he said he would agree; but he deceived them most wickedly until they finally rose up in their anger and killed two of his counsellors, and had it not been that the leader of the insurgents listened to the Dauphin's piteous cry for mercy, they would have killed him as well."

"It's a wonder they didn't kill him before he had time to beg," said Edna Phillips, excitedly.

"It was the red cap, the sign of the revolution, which the leader hastily put on the Dauphin's head, which saved him, more than his begging."

"The situation among the peasants was so unendurable that they rose up also, while this trouble was brewing in Paris, and the terrible Jacquerie insurrection took place, in which the poor wretches seemed to care only to vent their rage on the rich. They tortured them cruelly before taking their lives, so they might know how it felt to suffer as they declared. Brutal and terrible as it was one can hardly wonder at it, considering their great provocation. There seemed to be nothing too dreadful for the frenzied wretches to do. The peasants had been placed in a horrible condition; even their grain which they had secreted for seed had been seized, with all their miserable possessions, to raise the money with which to redeem their detested king. In the language of a French writer, 'Something perhaps might still be got out of him; perhaps he had some hiding place where he kept his money, so they scorched his feet. Neither fire nor iron was spared.'

"It seems as though they had so very much trouble! It is dreadful to hear about it," said Julia March. "But Aunt Eunice says she thinks the times are getting to be very much the same as they used to be in France, in our own country."

"O professor!" exclaimed Milly Brown. "You don't think it will ever be like that in this country, do you?"

"I very much fear that the labor question is destined to make us much trouble, Milly, and that in the near future. But the time is coming soon when the rich men who have extorted money from the poor, whose hire they have kept back by fraud, will weep and howl for the miseries which shall come upon them."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

"He Doeth Great Wonders."

"WELL, Charlie, you may review our last talk briefly, and then we will go on," said Mrs. Ross.

"In our last talk we studied about the beast with two horns like a lamb, but who spake as a dragon; located the symbol as applying to the United States, which has practiced the two lamb-like principles of civil and religious liberty, and which now is on the way to contradicting her former policy by the enforcement of religious laws by which it will speak as a dragon, and prove itself the exponent of this prophecy."

"What is the next specification?"

"And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him."

"What was the first beast before him?"

"The papal power."

"How much power did the papal beast exercise?"

"Why, the power to compel conscience and to cause the death of those who stood for their God-given rights. But, mama, do you think the United States will ever go to such lengths as that?"

"Charlie, the enforcement of any law that conflicts with men's God-given rights has for its final penalty the death penalty. No man can surrender his God-given rights, without dishonoring God, and losing his soul, and the loyal one prefers death to that. He will contend for his God-given privileges."

"Do you mean that he will fight for them?"

"No, indeed. Jesus did not fight for his rights. He committed himself to Him who judgeth righteously. 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.' I read lately of a young Christian Hungarian who was drafted into military service; but no amount of persuasion or threatening could induce him to surrender his right to keep the commandment, 'Thou shalt not kill.' But he submitted meekly to five years of penal servitude. He suffered as a Christian, but did not surrender his rights."

"What was the two-horned beast to do?"

"He causeth the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast whose deadly wound was healed."

"The first beast we have located definitely to be the papal system that finds its flower and fruit in a church-and-state union. Then, to cause the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the beast, would be to cause them to yield obedience to the church and state principle. Obedience is the highest form of worship. Samuel said to Saul, 'To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.' It says, 'he causeth the earth to worship.' We have already proved in former talks that Sunday as a day of worship has been given to the world through the command and influence of the papacy. When Sunday laws are enforced to such a degree that land is untilled, unsown and unreaped because of this enforcement, the earth itself will be rendering obedience to the papal mandate."

"What is the next specification?"

"And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men.' There, mama, at last we have come to the point I asked you about when we studied about Elijah commanding the fire from heaven to consume the sacrifice."

"You may recall the story, Charlie. For what did Elijah call down fire from heaven?"

"To prove that Baal was not God, but that God was God, and to enable the confused people to choose to keep God's commandments."

"For what purpose does the two-horned beast call down fire from heaven? Will you read the next verse?"

"And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do? O mama, what a dreadful thing! Why, the people will surely think that such a sign as this is from God."

"Certainly they will; but it will be because they will not believe God's word. Do you think, Charlie, that when this is fulfilled that those who have read and believed this prophecy will be deceived?"

"No, mama, they will know for what purpose the fire is called down, and who is the agent that commands it."

"The time is coming, my boy, when we shall not be able to safely trust our senses. The Word of God must be the Rock on which our feet are planted. The hosts of evil are busy these days in leading men to close up their Bibles, to ignore history, and to seek into forbidden mysteries. Men are consulting clairvoyants, mediums and wizzards, holding communion with fallen spirits, and putting themselves at the mercy of demons. The devil and his agents work through the senses, and are only too willing to gratify the people's desire for some manifestation from the unseen by making them believe that they may hold communion with the departed dead. This puts men where the malignant spirits can control and deceive them. There is no need of any being deceived; for the Word of God is unimpeachable, and will be found to be so. But the carnal craving for something by which to gratify the senses leads them to welcome the spirits of devils, who are represented as going forth unto the kings of the whole world to gather them together for the battle of the great day of the Lord.

"The Word of God brings out the fact that as sharp a line of distinction is to be drawn in this day as was drawn in Elijah's day between the worshipers of God and the worshipers of the beast, Baal, or self. On one side of the controversy will stand those who keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, and on the other side those who worship the beast and his image. But instead of a prophet of the Lord, there will stand an emissary of Satan who will seek to confirm the worshipers of the beast by the test of Elijah, and at the command of Satan's agent, fire will fall from heaven to establish souls in error, and to bring upon those who worship God and who keep his law the unrestricted enmity of the world.

"An unseen, malignant intelligence is ever on the alert to corrupt every civil government, and turn it into a cruel despotism. This world has been usurped by Satan, and there is a controversy going on that has waged through all ages. The point in dispute is the question of who shall possess the earth as a kingdom. The history of the past shows the struggle of two opposing forces, and the victory and defeat of the two forces may be traced in the power exercised by the church-and-state union, and the undoing of that power. The tidings of the battle between principalities and powers may be read in the daily papers. To day the hosts of evil are rallying for a final battle, and the malignant spirit wars with desperate earnestness for the mastery of the world. It is he who is behind the movement for the revival of the beast-like principles and policy in order that the machinery of the state may be manipulated by the church, to blot out all who would be loyal to Christ; for such will yet be counted as traitors to human interests.

"He has led men to believe that if religious observances can be compelled by law (but this would only turn men into hypocrites and knaves), that the millennium will soon be ushered in and the kingdom of Christ will be set up on earth. This malignant spirit allures souls along forbidden paths to chase the will o' the wisp of a supposed golden age, in order to overwhelm them at last in the morass of destruction and death. Christ's kingdom is not of this world, and he who in the name of Christ would pose as its king, is an impostor and a usurper. Yet so deceived will men be that they will actually think that they do God service in persecuting those who will not bow down before the arch deceiver."

"O mama, what will keep us in such an hour of temptation?"

"Jesus says that he will keep us if we will keep the word of his patience."

"May God help us to do it."

"Amen."

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, MAY 12, 1898.

IF the church had never gone into politics, religious persecution would never have been a political proceeding.

HUMAN nature moves a person to nothing more readily than to a usurpation of prerogatives which belong to no human power.

JESUS CHRIST, as he is to-day, is the divine standard of manhood. In the school of Christ, and that only, can that standard be attained.

"I DETERMINED," said the Apostle Paul to certain of his converts, "to know nothing among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified." Not much politics or war would be preached by ministers to-day if they were like Paul.

THE past week has brought the details of a great victory for the American arms at Manila, in the Philippine islands. It was, of course, an equally great disaster for the Spanish; hence the theory is still unimpaired that the desecration of Sunday brings disaster.

WHEN the church leads the state, there is a fulfillment of the proverb of the blind leading the blind into the ditch. In such a case the church is blind to her true calling or she would never want to lead the state; and the state is blind to its proper mission on earth or it would not allow the church to be its leader.

MEN do not pay very much attention these days to the word of the Lord, except to pass criticisms upon it; but there is a time coming when their most earnest attention will be given it unasked. That time will be the day which will unmask its power over physical things. A great nation, with its power expressed in the ponderous guns of its battleships, is the most conspicuous thing before men's eyes to-day; but the day cometh—and cometh soon—when "the Lord also shall roar out of Zion and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake: but the Lord will be the hope of his people." Joel 3:16. God's Word is the most powerful thing in the earth to-day, and as such should receive the most earnest attention of mankind, for whose salvation it is now employed.

WHAT a strange thing is worldly "honor." The man who has been insulted must not be satisfied until he has given his enemy a chance to kill him; and Spain's "honor" can only be satisfied when all the world has beheld her in the ignomy of defeat and seen how vain were her boastings. Not so the honor that is from above.

THE Sun, of this city, refers to the ovation given recently to Archbishop Corrigan, in the name of the city of New York (see p. 296), as being a marked evidence of the "decay of Protestant intolerance." Yes; it is truly a marked evidence of the decay of that which papal writers term intolerance, but which in reality is adherence to the principles of divine truth.

It is reported that Spanish bishops have asked the permission of the Vatican to sell part of the treasures of the churches in Spain, for the purpose of providing funds to aid the Spanish government in prosecuting the war with the United States. If the Vatican refuses, it will savor of unfriendliness to Spain; and if it gives permission it will be construed as hostility to America. The incident shows how impossible it is for the Vatican to be really neutral in the Spanish-American contest.

ROMAN CATHOLIC writers are in the habit of designating Protestantism as a mere negation; and some even of those who call themselves Protestants are inclined to consider Protestantism as being faulty in this respect. But such have only the most superficial view of what Protestantism is; so superficial, in fact, as to be altogether erroneous. Protestantism is truth, and truth is always first; error comes afterward and denies the truth, and then the truth also denies the error; but error is the negation, in the truest sense. Protestantism denies papal doctrines just as all truth denies error; but it is no less positive than as though there were no error for it to contravene.

THE pope is reported as having been deeply horrified over the naval battle at Manila, in which several hundred Spanish sailors lost their lives. This however is not the first battle that has been fought in the island of which Manila is the capital, since the present war in that section began. There have been battles between the Spanish forces and the natives, in which it is reported that hundreds of the latter were killed. But the Roman pontiff never expressed any horror over these occurrences, any more than he has over the starvation of Cubans. And the reason why is obvious.

THERE is great rejoicing throughout the land at the victory of Commodore Dewey over the Spanish forces in the Philippine Islands. This is natural, and quite proper from the standpoint of an American citizen. But from the Christian standpoint—the standpoint of the heavenly citizenship—the knowledge of superiority over our enemies, is not an occasion for rejoicing. When the disciples came to Christ exulting because "even the devils are subject unto us," Jesus said, "In this rejoice not, that the devils are subject unto you; but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven."

LET your Christianity recommend your creed.

It is better to know how to live, than how to die.

INTOLERANCE is always glad to shake hands with error.

If you do not have religious liberty to grant to others, you do not have it at all.

To submerge individualism in nationalism, would be like trying to have dollars without cents.

Not "Remember the Maine," but "The faith of Jesus," is the watchword of Christian warfare.

A SINGLE dollar saved for eternity is better than a million dollars saved for a few years of time.

A CHRISTIAN loves peace; a "Christian power" loves piece, and is always willing to fight to keep it.

THE choice is laid before every person in the world, of denying self or denying God. He must do one or the other.

If this nation should acquire the "big head" by victory over Spain, it might be worse in the end than if it were now to suffer defeat.

If the papacy can harmonize with Spanish government in Spain and Cuba, she can, and would, harmonize with Spanish government in the United States.

God could destroy the whole world in a moment of time, but his wisdom is made known in the gospel by which he would save the world. True wisdom seeks to save life, not to destroy it.

THE barbarians conquered Rome, but the principles of Rome conquered the barbarians. Shall those principles now conquer the Anglo-Saxons? If so, then the overthrowing of Spanish armadas will have been a useless task.

"THE powers that be are ordained of God." So saith the Scripture; and strangely enough, this text is used to justify obedience to the "powers that be" in opposition to the commands of God.

Can the thing ordained be superior to Him who ordained it? If not, as is self-evident, then cannot the command of men be superior to the precept of Jehovah. "His kingdom ruleth over all."

It is declared by both Catholics and Protestants in this country that "this is a Christian nation."

Now it is a fact that Catholics do not admit that Protestantism is Christianity. Even the stoutest defender of Catholic "liberality" must admit this.

When Catholics, therefore, say that "this is a Christian nation," they mean that it is a Catholic Christian nation. Whatever Protestants may mean by the expression, it is certain that this is the meaning, and the only meaning, it has for Catholics.

Roman Catholics and Protestants, therefore, are arrayed against each other in this claim for national recognition,—each one claiming to be the party which makes the nation Christian, and the Catholics at least, denying the position of the Protestants.

The Supreme Court decision raised this controversy, and now it "will not down." It is here and must be settled. That it is not very prominent as yet does not lessen the significance of the fact. It will grow more and more prominent as time goes on.

And what a bitter controversy must ensue before it is settled! More than this: what a change its settlement must effect in the principles of this Government! for it can be settled only in accordance with papal claims. The principle of both claims is papal.

HE who engages in war, must obey absolutely the commands of his military superiors. This is the first principle of military discipline.

Now there is a command of God which says, "Thou shalt not kill;" and another which says, "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." In time of war the soldier must disregard both these precepts at the order of his commander. He must kill men of the opposing force, and must do this, if so ordered, on the Sabbath day.

Is it not plainly evident, therefore, that the soldier must have another god than the Author of the Ten Commandments? Is it not evident that the Government stands to him in the place of God?

But what man can afford to make this exchange? God has not authorized it, and the eternal interests of every man forbid it; for what James Russell Lowell wrote of war is the truth,—

"If you take a sword and dror it,
And go stick a feller throu',
Guv'ment aint to answer for it;
God 'll send the bill to you."

Alas for him who expects government to answer for his misdeeds at the bar of God.

THE salvation of God is brought to the world in Christianity. That which is Christian will be saved from the final dissolution which is to come upon earthly things. All believers in Christianity agree to this.

It is said by leading representatives of the state and of the church in this country, that "this is a Christian nation." This nation, therefore, will be saved in the kingdom of God.

Every citizen of the United States is a part of this nation. The salvation of the nation must of course include the salvation of its parts.

To secure salvation, therefore, an individual needs only to become a part of this nation. If already such, he needs only to remain in it; and if not, he can become such by taking out papers of naturalization.

He may believe in Christianity, or he may not; he may be a Jew, or an agnostic, or an atheist; it matters not. His salvation is certain, yea, unavoidable, if he remains a United States citizen. And all this by virtue of Christianity!

Such is the logic of the National Reform doctrine that "this is a Christian nation." It simply makes the gospel of God of no use to the individual, as such.

And this being so, that doctrine is as clearly anti-Christian as anything that ever emanated from the "father of lies."

WHEN we point to the atrocities perpetrated upon Christians in times past in various lands, and call it religious persecution, some are ready to exclaim, "Oh, no; it was the civil power that inflicted penalties upon them. They suffered for political reasons, and for that the church is not responsible."

Yes; very likely they did suffer for political reasons. But how came such reasons to be political? How came matters of religious belief to be mixed up with politics, so that political measures had to be instituted against people on account of Christianity?

Oh, it was because the church went into politics. It was because religion and the state became united. And then religion found its way into the laws of the land, and people who opposed that religion were persecuted and put to death by the civil power, for disobedience to the civil law. And that was only a political proceeding, of course!

If the church had kept out of politics, Christians would never have been persecuted for political reasons. And when the church goes into politics, persecution for political reasons is sure to follow.

Let the church keep out of politics. That is the plain lesson taught by the history of every land where Christians have been put to death by the civil power.

The Papacy and the Monroe Doctrine.

A PART of the scheme of Archbishop Ireland and the pope, as announced, is that "The wisdom of the Monroe Doctrine will be acknowledged; but the incidental responsibility of the United States thereunder will be defined and demonstrated."

This statement is worth some examination. It was in direct antagonism to a scheme in the interests of the papacy, and at least of which the papacy was a willing party, that the Monroe Doctrine was announced. And now it is announced on the part of the papacy, and as a part of a scheme guided by the papacy, that "the wisdom of the Monroe Doctrine will be acknowledged." Does the papacy really intend now to acknowledge the wisdom of that act which defeated a cherished plan to which she was a party? In other words: Does the papacy intend really to confess to the whole world that she was wrong—even once?

About 1820, a certain "Holy Alliance" was formed by the "powers" in Europe, to maintain and propagate the absolute monarchical government in Europe. And what holy alliance of European powers ever was, or ever could be, formed without the coöperation and benediction of the papacy to give to it the character of "holiness"? as for instance the "Holy Roman Empire."

In 1823, this "Holy Alliance" was about to exert its power to bring all the South American colonies back in full subjection to Spain, and so to confirm and enlarge the dominion of Spain on this continent. And this of course would open the way for the planting or extension of the power of the other parties to the "Holy Alliance" on this continent also; also extending here their absolute monarchical governments; and with it all would be the extension of the power of the papacy which alone could give to the alliance the character of "holy."

Information of this scheme was conveyed by England, which was not one of the allied powers, to the United States Government. Whereupon President Monroe, in his annual message of the year 1823, published the following sentences:—

"We owe it to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and the allied powers, to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

"With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power, we have not interfered, and shall not interfere; but with the governments which have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and just principles, acknowledged, we could not view an interposition for oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power, in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

He also declared in another place in the same message that "The American continent should no longer be subjects for any new European colonial settlement." And it is said on authority that "These words of President Monroe were addressed especially to Spain and Portugal."

That is the Monroe Doctrine, and such was the occasion that called it forth. And that Monroe Doctrine is the thing, the "wisdom" of which the papacy now says "will be acknowledged."

Yet this is to be done with a "but." It is not to be a plain, open, and free acknowledgement. It is to be an acknowledgement with a string to it: "The wisdom of the Monroe Doctrine will be acknowledged; BUT the incidental responsibility of the United States thereunder will be defined and demonstrated."

That is to say that the papacy will acknowledge the wisdom of the Monroe Doctrine, "but" she will interpret the doctrine for the United States. She and her proposed "congress of nations" will acknowledge the wisdom of the Monroe Doctrine, "but" she and her "congress of nations" will define it, and also will define and demonstrate the incidental responsibility of the United States under it" as thus defined and interpreted by herself and her "congress of nations."

And thus it is that the papacy assumes and publicly announces the prerogative of supremacy over the United States, to interpret the most cherished doctrines, and to decide the most important affairs of this Government.

Again, we say, When the papacy takes this bold stand at the very beginning of complications between the United States and a European power, what will she not do when complications have deepened, when other European interests have become involved, and when in it all settlements must be made?

In this affair between the United States and Spain, there are more points of interest and solemn importance than the movements of the army and navies.

A. T. J.

"Is life worth living?" Yes, it is worth living in the Garden of Eden. "But I am not in the Garden of Eden." Well, then, let God create you new in Christ, and he will put you there. He laid down that rule in the case of Adam.

The Last War Scene.

PUBLIC interest centers just now upon the news from the seat of war. People would like to know in advance what is going to happen during the continuance of the conflict; but this not being possible, they scan the "extras" and the bulletin boards to get the news of an event as soon after it has happened as the facilities of modern science can set it before them.

What events may transpire before the present war is concluded, no one can foretell. What other conflicts between the nations may be inaugurated, and what results may attend them, are matters hidden behind the veil which no human hand can draw aside. It might not be of any benefit to us if we could know them. But there is one thing we can know, and it is the thing we would naturally want to know most, and which it would be most to our benefit to know; that is, what is to be the final outcome. How does it all end,—all the war fervor and all the vast preparations made by all the powers for an expected conflict? We may know the answer to this question because the Word of God has set it plainly before us.

Turn to the 19th chapter of Revelation. There is given a description (v. 11 and onward) of One who comes forth from heaven upon a white horse, followed by the armies of heaven, down to the earth. The description leaves no room for doubt that the One who thus rides at the head of the armies of heaven is the Son of God. He goes forth to war, and "out of his mouth," says the Scripture, "goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations"; and all the fowls of the air are called to come and eat "the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great." And what of the nations at that time? What will be their attitude? The chapter says (v. 19):—

"And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against Him that sat on the horse, and against His army."

The prophet saw the "kings of the earth and their armies," gathered in battle array against the Son of God and his army. Whatever power we may believe to be represented by the "beast," there can be no uncertainty as regards "the kings of the earth and their armies." This is a plain reference to the powers of earth,—the great powers—the nations of Europe, and of America as well. These are found, with their armies, arrayed against the forces of heaven. It is a "holy war," but the holiness is not on the side of the powers of earth.

Of course there can be but one result. The prophet describes it:—

"And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshiped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. And the remnant were slain with the sword of Him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth; and all the fowls were filled with their flesh."

This is the last war scene in earthly history; this is how it all ends. And there is no discount on this "news." No sensational rumor or "fake" of "yellow journalism" is this, but a strictly "official" announcement from headquarters. It is absolutely reliable. Now, we see all the world arming for war. We see the war spirit overtopping every other sentiment. We see everywhere the "kings of the earth" getting their armies in readiness to take the field. Nothing like it was ever witnessed in the earth before. Never such a general preparation, such a general sound of war, was known before in human history. It is the beginning of the end, and the prophetic description tells us what the end will be. The final gathering together of armies and navies will be to make war against the forces of heaven, in the great day of the second advent of the Son of God to the earth, in power and glory.

It is certain that no Christian will be found in the armies of the kings of the earth at that day. No Christian will be found fighting against God. Every Christian must, before that day comes, draw out from the military forces; he must renounce the spirit of war and fighting, notwithstanding what may be said by ministers of the gospel in its favor. And since he who is a Christian, or would be one, must do this sooner or later, or be found ere long on the side of opposition to the Commander of heaven, is it not obvious that the best time to take the step is just now? Since the Christian must separate himself from all this, as being contrary to God, the separation cannot be made too soon.

The Word of God throws more and surer light on this subject than can be derived from any other source of information.

It is terrible to be so short sighted that you cannot look beyond your own interests.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

I HAVE often tried to recall the mental processes out of which the events that followed that eventful interview were evolved, but they seem to have left not the faintest trace in memory. I only know that I was under the most intense pressure of earnest determination; that things altogether undreamed of before, developed day by day under my hands, as though by order of a Master mind, until we had before us the nucleus of an almost perfect system for preventive and educational methods, which has since in other hands ripened into the Loyal Temperance Legion of the world.

From the office of the lawyer referred to I went quickly to that of the agent who had the rental of "Brown's Hall," the largest auditorium in the city at that time, and where many of our mass meetings had been held.

"Is the hall engaged for Saturday afternoon," I asked, "or can I have it for a mass meeting of children, and how much will it cost?"

"It is not engaged," he replied, "and if you want it for a children's temperance meeting, you can have it and welcome."

I thanked him and hastened to the place where our daily meeting of women was held. I told the women what had transpired, and to what I had pledged them; and every woman of them saw the logic of the argument and accepted the conclusion to which I had come, and promised to "stand by" in this effort to get hold of the children, and make Saloon Destroyers out of them.

On Saturday afternoon (my readers will remember that that was all the day was to me then) we had the hall filled with children, who were fired with enthusiasm at the thought that they were at last to have a share in the great temperance movement. This was about the middle of April, 1875, and as a result of what was then begun and carried forward, in three weeks' time we presented to the public on the Court House Green a "Cold Water Army;"—three full companies of a hundred men each (the men between the ages of eight and sixteen), uniformed and equipped with wooden guns. The guns had painted on the barrel in white letters the legend

"Our guns are ballots,
Our bullets are ideas."

One of the manufacturers of the city who had three boys in the army had turned all his force of workmen into making the guns for us gratis; others had helped us to the uniforms, which consisted of white blouse waist and cap, with belt and bands in the national colors; and an old army drill master, who had been rescued from drink, undertook to teach and exercise the "soldiers" in the manual of arms. They had daily practice in one of the parks, followed by a study in temperance principles in an adjacent church, which the soldiers called "loading up." The Bible was our only resource as to the lessons, and it did not fail us, although our knowledge of the subject, and of how to teach it, was meager.

As I look back to that time and realize the ignorance and error out of which we were struggling, I can but wonder that God could use us at all; it was only because he knew we were struggling out that he could use us. I have felt during this narration that I am writing of the days when I was a heathen; and before I proceed farther I must leave recorded on the same page with the story of the guns, the fact that it did not take us long to find out that our leader was the Prince of Peace, and that anything like an instrument of war was not pleasing to him; so that the gun was replaced by a rattan, and the manual of arms by a simple code of physical exercise suitable for both boys and girls. But this was not yet; and I must give the history as it was, even if I reveal how obscure was the light which was as yet shining on my own path.

The day that our Cold Water Army took its first march and formed in hollow square on the Court House Green for the first time was a memorable one. Our progress had been noted in the city papers, and everybody knew about our movements. I think it is safe to say that this little army excited an interest as deep, as true and tender as any that had ever started out on its first parade. Thousands of people came from all the country about to witness the ceremony of "swearing in the troops" which was to take place on the Green. This was to consist in the public administration of the Triple Pledge which had been adopted by the army, and which as nearly as I can remember was as follows:—

"I do solemnly promise that I will forever abstain from the use of all alcoholic beverages, including wine, beer, and cider, and from all profane and impure expressions, and from tobacco in all its forms, God being my helper."

The army had met on the drill ground, had gone through a little exercise to freshen them up, and then had marched through the throngs that followed and with wet eyes watched their every movement; and at last stood in a perfect hollow square in the wide open Court House yard.

A dense mass of men, women, and children surrounded them and stretched off down every street; windows and roofs were filled with eager spectators. How beautiful, how brave, how pathetic is that scene as I look back on it through the years! Those little white-capped and jacketed men, with the soft blending of the red, white, and blue; the guns held at rest; the banners at the head of each company, and "Old Glory" dipping and swelling from the standard in the gentle May breeze; and about them loyally "standing by" those six hundred girls in white with national sashes, ready to "do or die," which to them meant to sing, smile, and be happy for the blessed temperance cause.

When at last the moment had come it was my office to step to the center of that hollow square and "administer the oath" as the men and newspapers called it. I lifted my right hand and every soldier standing with his gun at rest in his left hand raised his cap with his right, and repeated after me the solemn promise, which meant so much more than they or any of us had as yet dreamed.

"It is announced," says the Herald and Presbyterian, "that the pope of Rome has bestowed his special benediction upon Spain in her war with the United States." We do not know upon what authority this announcement rests; but it is strongly corroborated by the news of the great Spanish disaster at Manila.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE worship of Jehovah could have nothing in common with idolatrous worship, and especially was this so of sun-worship.

When in Egypt the children of Israel had been brought into contact with this degrading worship. And when the Lord delivered his people from Egypt he purposed to separate them entirely from it.

Accordingly, wherever the Israelites encamped, God gave instruction that the tabernacle should be pitched so that the entrance should face the east. This would necessitate the people of God, in coming together to worship him, facing the west, and so turning their backs upon the sun. This would be a continual reminder to them that the two systems of worship could have nothing in common.

Notwithstanding all this, it can be plainly seen in the Bible that as often as the people apostatized from the Lord and turned their backs upon him, they turned to the worship of the sun.

Nor was this sun-worship confined to the nations prior to the coming of Christ. It was the prevailing religion long after his time. And we are told that it was the plan of some of the Roman emperors to unite all the religions, including the Christian religion, into one; the sun to be the central object of adoration. Thus we read of Elagabalus, the Roman emperor: "If we may believe the biographies on the Augustan history, a more ambitious scheme had dawned upon the mind of the emperor. The Jewish, the Samaritan, even the Christian, religions were to be fused and recast into one great system, of which the sun was to be the central object of adoration."—Milman's History of Christianity.

Later the ambition of this emperor was accomplished to the extent that even before the beginning of the fourth century Christianity had united itself to paganism in the worshipping of the sun.

This may appear strange to many who have been taught to look to the early "fathers" for example. But it is nevertheless true.

Even of Christianity of the second century, Mosheim, in his Church History says: "It is certain that to religious worship, both public and private, many rites were added without necessity, and to the great offense of sober and good men. This was because the Christians did not wish to appear inferior to the Greeks, the Romans, and the other people."

The simplicity of the worship that the Christians offered to the Deity was such that they were by the pagans pronounced Atheists. And to silence this accusation the Christian doctors thought they must introduce some external rites which would strike the sense of the people; so that they could maintain that they really had all those things of which Christians were charged with being destitute, though under different form. So that it is said. "A large part . . . of the Christian observances and institutions, even in this century had the aspect of the pagan mysteries."

What connection all this had with the prevailing sun-worship may be seen from the following: "Nearly all the people of the East, before the Christian era, were accustomed to worship with their faces directed towards the sunrising; for they all believed that God, whom they supposed to resemble light, or rather to be light, and whom they limited as to place, had his residence in that part of the heavens where the sun rises. When they became Christians, they rejected, indeed, the erroneous belief; but the custom which originated from it, and was very ancient and universally prevalent, they retained. Nor to this hour has it been wholly laid aside."

The above quotation from Mosheim will also show that the then prevailing Christianity had become so effeminate and weak, that when they left the grosser forms of paganism, on becoming Christians, they retained some practices that were "very ancient and universally prevalent."

The foregoing quotations pertain to the second century of the Christian era.

Of the third century, during the reign of Diocletian, Milman says: "From Christianity, the new paganism had adopted the unity of the Deity, and scrupled not to degrade all the gods of the older world into subordinate demons or ministers. . . . But the Jupiter Optimus Maximus was not the great supreme of the new system. The universal deity of the East, the sun, to the philosophic, was the emblem or representative; to the vulgar, the deity. Diocletian himself, though he paid so much deference to the older faith as to assume the title of Jovius, as belonging to the Lord of the world, yet, on his accession, when he would exculpate himself from all concern in the murder of his predecessor Numerian, appealed in the face of the army to the all-seeing deity of the sun. It is the oracle of Apollo of Miletus consulted by the hesitating emperor, which is to decide the fate of Christianity. The metaphorical language of Christianity had unconsciously lent strength to this new adversary; and in adoring the visible orb, some no doubt supposed that they were not departing far from the worship of the 'Sun of Righteousness.'"

This proves what has already been stated—that Christianity had united with paganism on sun worship.

With all this there came in the Sunday—"so called because the day was anciently dedicated to the sun, or to its worship" (Webster), "the wild solar holiday of all pagan times"—and finally displaced the Sabbath of the Bible—the seventh day.

"Not to Condemn."

By Rev. F. W. Aveling.

CHRIST came not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. Let us beware lest we play the Pharisee, and glibly condemn our fellow-creatures instead of trying to win them by mercy unto the Lord. We frail, feeble, faulty mortals have no right to condemn anyone. Our condemnations are such hypocritical performances. One man condemns his drunken brother in the harshest manner, when all the while he is as much the slave of avarice as his brother is of drink; when, perhaps, one of the strongest motives for his abstinence from liquor is a mercenary one; when perhaps he keeps from drink more for the sake of economy than from any higher motive.

One man glibly condemns his brother for telling lies because he himself has no temptation in that direction, and yet he himself is as close-fisted as a miser. Another condemns the foolish, youthful pursuit of pleasure and worldliness, when he himself is too old to have any temptation that way, while all the time he is as tricky as tricky can be in business transactions. Another condemns his gambling brother, when perhaps he would gamble himself if he could only be sure of winning, and not losing his much loved gold.

If we only look honestly into our hearts we find so much that is shaky, so much that is faulty, that we cannot consistently condemn our brethren. We can only rejoice with joy unspeakable that Christ does not condemn us if we are truly penitent.

Who now shall accuse and arraign us?
What man shall condemn and disown?
Since Christ has said only the stainless
Shall cast at his fellows a stone.

For what man can bare us his bosom,
And touch with his forefinger there,
And say, "'Tis as snow, as a blossom"?
Beware of the stainless, beware.

THE Herald and Presbyterian, a well-known Presbyterian journal, says that "The fourth commandment enjoins industry and thoroughness. For six days we are to labor, and during this time we are to do all our work. Anything less than this is idleness and neglect. The man who falls short here does not keep this commandment."

This being so, how then can Presbyterians support Sunday laws, which would compel conscientious observers of the seventh day to rest two days in the week, unless they should abandon their conscientious convictions.

By their own statement of the case—if this journal represents Bresbyterian belief—a Sunday law would compel an observer of the seventh day to break the fourth commandment. And by the Lord's statement of the case, the seventh day, and not the first, is the Sabbath, and is to be observed by all persons who would respect the moral law.

Americanism.

"The Christian Register," May 12.

THE American people are rapidly coming to the parting of the ways which lead, the one to the highest ideals of the republic, the other to prizes which are attractive but mercenary. Frederika Bremer said, half a century ago, after visiting the United States, that our people seemed to be marching in a procession, carrying on their banners the symbols of lofty ideals of which they had forgotten the meaning. This was true only in seeming. Every great struggle through which our nation passes brings out anew the great ideas upon which the fathers founded the republic. But at every such crisis in our history comes the temptation to lower thoughts and meaner ambitions.

Our first brilliant success at the Philippine Islands has brought into view with startling suddenness un-American ideas of our place among the nations and our mission to the world. Already we begin to talk about buying and selling a nation, as if seven millions of people in the Philippine Islands were of no more importance than a bale of cotton. With the capture of that Spanish colony, some of the gravest problems, not merely of diplomacy, but of common humanity, will rush upon the minds of our statesman.

The majority of the inhabitants of these islands belong to the yellow and black races. Shall we accept the principle upon which "the great powers" act, and, seeing that they are not capable of intelligent self-government, treat them as simply a prize of war? Nothing could be more un-American and degrading to our people than such a treatment of a foreign race.

An American idea of great value is that the United States is set to guard the liberties of the American continent, to see to it that there shall be here no arbitrary rule of a foreign power. To maintain this high position as umpire and guardian, it has been our policy to abstain from entanglement in the political affairs of the other three-quarters of the globe. But now some of our statesmen see our fortunes written large, as they think of Cuba, Hawaii, and the Philippines as American possessions to be exploited for the benefit of our manufactures and our commerce. The very conception is un-American. It belongs to a "strong government." The word "empire" only befits it. When once we have committed ourselves to such an idea of aggrandizement, we must take our place beside the great empires of Russia, Germany, and England. With "empire" goes of necessity "emperor."

The French Republic seems for the moment to be an exception, and yet the perils which surround the President's chair are things which come from military rule. The freedom of France is to-day threatened by the army, which is necessary, not merely for her defence, but for the maintenance of her empire in Africa and Asia. A cry which almost instinctively come to the lips of a French military man when the mob assembles in the streets of Paris is, "Vive l'Empereur!"

Cincinnatus should set the United States its example. As he returned to his plough when his campaigns were ended, so should the United States, after striking a manful blow for human liberty, retire to the pursuits of peace and the liberal arts of republican sympathy. There is nothing which would so ennoble our own people, nothing which would so increase our influence among the nations, as such a spectacle of self control. As Washington refused to be king, so must America refuse to join the partnership of the giants who are dividing among themselves the spoils of the half-civilized world.

Our American policy has been interference in foreign affairs for good cause, followed always by a prompt withdrawal when our work was done. Mr. Tiffany calls attention to the part played by the United States abroad, illustrating this policy. Our Government destroyed that nest of pirates in the Mediterranean Sea. It abolished the tolls at the mouth of the Baltic, claiming that the seas were the highways of all nations. It opened to the world the ports of Japan. These things were done without expectation of reward.

A still more brilliant and telling illustration of our American policy of disinterested intervention in the name of liberty and justice may be found in the case of Kosuth. He sought refuge in Turkey after the Revolution of 1848. His extradition was demanded by Austria and Russia. The sultan offered to protect him if he would become a Mohammedan; but, in accordance with a resolution of our Senate, the war steamer "Mississippi" demanded him at the hands of the Turks, and brought him to the United States as the guest of the nation. That is an example of true Americanism.

A LONDON journal reports these words from the Bishop of Marlborough, spoken recently in allusion to the martial aspect of affairs throughout the world. They are the words of one who distinguishes between Christianity and "patriotism":—

"Look out upon the world from Klondyke to Rhodesia, and from the banks of the Niger to the Far East where the four Christian vultures, Russia, England, Germany, and France, are gloating over the moribund Empire of China, claiming it not for Christ, the Master of the Nations, but passionately claiming it for commercial purposes. Mammon, Mammon, Mammon! Can your Christian consciences be satisfied with the aspect of things represented by those Christian vultures, not having claimed China for Christ, but for cotton or gold?"

THE other day—Sunday—we listened to a discourse by one of the best known ministers of this city, based upon the text, “Be ye also ready.” The words are a part of the solemn admonition of the Saviour to his followers with reference to the time of his return again to earth, to reward the just and bring doom to the wicked. For that most solemn event we are to be ready; we are to have our “loins girded about,” and our “lights burning,” and to be waiting for the return of the “nobleman” from the “far country.”

* * *

A DISCOURSE with this thought as its theme would have been most timely. It would have been spiritual meat to his congregation, upon whom, in common with so many others in the church as well as out of it, the great day of God is coming unawares; nigh at hand even now, and stealing on like the thief with muffled tread in the gloom of night. It would have set before them the matter of their highest possible concern.

* * *

BUT what did this preacher say? What were they told to be ready for? Oh, it was to be ready to invade Spain with an army of 500,000 men! They were to be ready to fight, so that they—or the nation—could enforce its demands in the face of the opposition of other powers.

* * *

WE mention this as a sample of the way in which ministers who profess to speak the words of Christ are feeding with chaff the people who are perishing for want of bread. Words of Scripture have no force when separated from the theme to which they plainly relate.

* * *

THE leading organ of the Methodist Church in this country—the Christian Advocate, of this city—in its issue of May 5, lays down the law for the people of the country regarding expressions of opinion upon the war. All who are opposed to the war, it says, must keep their views to themselves; or at the most indulge them only to their families and intimate friends. Anything more than this is denounced as savoring of treason.

IT sounds a little strange for a religious journal to come out with a pronouncement upon such a matter, especially before the Government has thought it necessary to say anything on the subject; but it is only a natural result of the growth of the religio-political spirit which has become so marked a feature of the times. When the church goes into politics, she goes in to lead in that as she does in religious things, and in the natural course of events she soon assumes to lead the government itself. The extent of the prohibition which the Advocate assumes to lay upon the people may be seen from the following:—

“Nothing short of silence meets the conditions of patriotism. If one shall say, ‘How can I be silent when I believe the war uncalled for, sinful, unjust?’ the answer is, ‘Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; the powers that be are ordained of God.’ The subjects of this Government must obey it.”

* * *

It is, then, declared by this leading organ of the Methodist Church in America, that it is the duty of every person, to obey the command of the civil power, in that which he believes to be unjust and SINFUL! A strange position, truly, to be taken by a journal which calls itself Christian!

And this only illustrates what becomes of the Christianity of the church which goes into politics.

WE have said, and shall continue to say, that we regard war—all war that is fought with carnal weapons—as wrong. But mark, we do not say this from a political standpoint. We speak from the standpoint of Christianity. We do not say the Government should not go to war. We do not pretend to advise the Government, or any political body, as to what they should do and how they should do it, save only that they should keep the state separate from the church; and we say that on the authority of God’s Word. We say it because it is a Christian principle.

LET civil governments, and all non-Christian bodies and individuals attend to political matters as they see fit. War is a political measure, and whether it is justifiable or not, as such, we do not pretend to say. Let the question be settled by the authorities in whose province such things belong. And let those whose opposition to war is political, be governed by the decision of those in political authority. We have nothing to say on that point. But we do say that war is not Christian. A great deal is being said by ministers and religious journals to the effect that the war with Spain is Christian; that it is a “holy war,” etc. We say that it is not Christian, and that no person can engage in it and be a Christian while doing so. Christianity is not carnal warfare; its weapons are not carnal, but spiritual. This is plain Bible doctrine; and when the church denies it, and then says that those who hold it as such must not proclaim it, but must be enjoined therefrom by the civil power, it shows plainly enough that the church has become a political, and has ceased to be a Christian, organization. It may be that the Methodist Church would not endorse this utterance of its leading representative journal; we hope so. But these are times when things are being said and done which give occasion for the most serious thinking; that much is certain. And we hope that this thinking is being done by the observing, seriously-minded people of this nation.

* * *

NEWSPAPER report states that the plan is being considered of employing magnetic preachers to visit the camps of the soldiers engaged in the war and talk to the men for the purpose of counteracting the effect of the moral evils which naturally attend the life of a soldier in active service. Doubtless much good will be accomplished if the plan can be carried into effect. But the greatest difficulty of all, we think, will be that of convincing men that they ought to abstain from all evil ways, at the same time that they are taught that it is their duty to kill their fellow men. Somehow men who take their guns and shoot other men down in battle—men against whom they have no personal grievance at all—cannot feel over scrupulous with regard to deeds which injure their fellow-men to a less extent. There is a natural instinct against taking life which cannot be blunted without disastrous moral effect.

THE Madrid correspondent of the New York Evening Post, writes that the war is strongly supported by religious sentiment in Spain. "Patriotic demonstrations," he says, "are reported to have occurred everywhere. Special religious services of prayer, day and night, are being organized for the success of the Spanish arms." Doubtless they think in Spain even as strongly as people do here—perhaps even more so—that the war is a "holy war," and doubtless "patriotism" coincides as fully with "religious duty" there as here. It is customary in war for both sides to go to the conflict calling heaven to witness to the justice of their cause, and professing an implicit reliance upon the favoring assistance of the Omnipotent. Of course, at least one side of the controversy must be mistaken and suffer defeat; but mankind seems never able to learn the lesson taught by such an experience.

CHAPLAINS in the United States navy are regular officials of the Government, like any other persons who fill positions by virtue of governmental appointment. And to be eligible to such office, it is required by the Government that they "must be, upon appointment, ordained men, and in good standing in their respective communions." And yet there is an article of the Constitution of the United States which plainly says that "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." As religious fitness—real or supposed—is made the primary qualification in all such appointments, it is perfectly plain that every such appointment is a violation of the Constitution, the fundamental law of the land.

And this plain violation of the fundamental law is demanded by, and made in deference to, the papal principle that religion and the state should be united.

Sunday-Law Exemptions in Maine.

EVENTS of recent occurrence in the city of Lewiston, Me., throw more light upon the nature of the exemption for seventh-day observers, which is usually contained in the state laws for the observance of Sunday. And very interesting to such people is the court decision from which this new light comes. The matter is reported in the Boston Globe, of May 8. Speaking of the closing of business places in Lewiston on Sunday the Globe says:—

"Two or three of these places are kept by Hebrews, who have closed their places regularly from sunset Friday night until sunset on Saturday, and have therefore claimed the right to keep open on Sunday, but most of them have been kept by people who, whether Hebrews or Christians, have made no pretense of closing on any day of the week.

"A test case of the former was brought this week in the municipal court. Herman I. Berman, a Hebrew, who has conscientiously closed his store every Friday night for the last five years, and kept it closed until sunset of Saturday, and then opened it all day Sunday, was brought before Judge Cornish, of the municipal court.

"He claimed that section 23 of chapter 124 of the revised statutes, which provides that 'no person conscientiously believing that the seventh day of the week ought to be observed as the Sabbath, and actually refraining from secular business and labor on that day, is liable to the penalties for doing such business or labor on the first day of the week, if he does not disturb other persons,' applied to him and released him from the penalties provided for the transaction of business on Sunday.

"The court held, however, that the provisions of this section, while it permitted him to labor and transact business for himself, did not permit him to open his shop Sunday and solicit business from the general public, and fined him $10 and costs.

"Mr. Berman appealed to the Supreme Court. But it is understood that his counsel has since advised him to pay his fine and keep closed in the future, as the precedents are clearly against him, the question having been decided in precisely similar cases in Massachusetts in accordance with Judge Cornish's ruling."

In the light of this decision, it can be clearly seen that no exemption can be relied on to shield an individual from attack by those who, moved by the spirit of religious prejudice and intolerance, are determined to override it. Religious animosity always finds a way to reach its mark; and Christians need not expect that a different order of things will ever prevail in this world.

THE shortest crop this year seems to be the peace crop.

A Conflict of Centuries.

AN editorial in The Outlook, of May 14, presents some interesting ideas relative to the historical significance of the war with Spain. The writer points out that the present conflict is but the breaking out in acute form of a struggle that has been going on for centuries between Spanish and Anglo-Saxon civilization,—a conflict involving the destiny of the world,—the first great act in which was the attempt of Philip II. and his Spanish armada to overthrow Protestant England.

"The war now being waged," says the writer, "is the end of the campaign which began in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is the last act in the great drama which stirred the world when little England faced the immense power of Spain on the high seas, and English pluck, skill, and audacity nobly dared and won, as did American pluck, skill, and audacity at Manila. Between Anglo-Saxon and Spanish civilization there is an irrepressible conflict. The differences are not merely in habit, dress, and taste; they are divergences of principle so fundamental that they cannot co-exist in the same quarter of the globe. The two civilizations are mutually antagonistic at every important point in civil, religious, and social ideas; wherever they meet they are compelled by their very nature to close in a death struggle.

"That struggle began when America was discovered, and it will be ended only when the last Spanish official leaves the shore of the New World. Martin Luther nailed his theses on the door of the church in Wittenberg in the same year in which Spanish troopers were exploring and conquering Central America. In the struggle for religious and civil freedom which the Reformation inaugurated, Spain stood for merciless and arbitrary suppression of freedom of faith, worship, action, and thought. The implacable bigotry of the Spanish priest has left an indelible image in the memory of Christendom. England and the Low Countries fought not for their own existence alone; they waged a war for humanity. All the dearest interests of the race were in their keeping; and nobly did they guard the spiritual and civic life of the future. The heroic figure of Drake stands out, despite his faults, like a minister of light against the relentless and saturnine genius of Philip II.

"In that struggle for the right to live, breathe, think, and worship, England and the Low Countries fought against great odds. Spain had the treasures of the New World at her hand, and she set the New World against the Old. When she was driven out of the Netherlands in 1609, she had already taken from this continent hundreds of millions in gold and silver, and had spent the greater part of it in the futile endeavor to annihilate Protestantism, and with it civil and religious liberty. The great English sailors saw early that the only way to destroy the power of Spain was to destroy the sources of her revenue, and it is to the foresight as well as courage of such men as Drake that the English-speaking peoples in all parts of the world to-day largely owe their freedom and their prosperity. The indomitable admiral 'sing'd the King of Spain's beard' on both sides of the continent, and his name became a terror in that far Pacific which had until his coming been like an inland sea of Spain.

"Out of that deadly conflict Spain emerged crippled and maimed. The Dutch had taken her Eastern possessions, and the English had secured the conditions necessary for English supremacy on the American continent. For the fate of America hung in the balance when the armada sailed; if Philip had crushed England, no English-speaking colony would have been planted in the Western World. 'The defeat of the invincible armada,' says Mr. Fiske, 'was the opening event in the history of the United States. It was the event which made all the rest possible.'"

Make a Note of This.

ALL advocates of Sunday sacredness; all zealous opposers of Sunday labor; all who believe and teach that God favors those who show special regard for Sunday, and frowns upon those who desecrate it; all who maintain that God will prosper this nation in proportion as it honors Sunday by enacting Sunday laws, closing all places of secular business, stopping all work in navy yards and other government works on that day; but that on the contrary he will not fight for them in their battles, nor prosper them otherwise unless they do thus exalt the man-made institution of Sunday as a holy rest day, should make careful note of the fact that the most important event and victory for the United States forces in the present conflict thus far, the destruction of the Spanish fleet at Manila, occurred May 1st, on a Sunday.

This circumstance would not appear so peculiarly noteworthy were it not for the universal exultation in the victory and praise for the man who led in it, equally by these zealous advocates of Sunday sacredness as by others, and without even a protest heard against such a battle being fought upon Sunday, so long as the victory was ours. Had the issues of the engagement been reversed we, no doubt, would have heard much from these people giving as a reason for the defeat the fact that the encounter was upon Sunday, and therefore the Lord could not prosper our forces. But the glory of conquest, the spirit of pride and boastfulness over an enemy, for the moment outshine and eclipse the sentiment of religious regard for the day, whose only sanctity, at best, is that with which man has attempted to invest it.

And what could more conclusively show that the glory and honor claimed for and bestowed upon the Sunday is but on a par and of the same character, in principle, with the glory and honor conferred upon the warrior and conqueror in human warfare, viz., the glory in and honor to, men?

"Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise lovingkindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord." Jer. 9: 23, 24.

Boulder, Colo.

Studies in French History.—22.

"O PROFESSOR CARMAN!" began Milly Brown, "I have thought so much of the dreadful state of affairs you were telling us about in our last study! Please tell us if the poor, outraged peasants had things their own way very long."

"I see your sympathy goes with the poor serfs, Milly," answered her teacher, with a smile, "and I cannot blame you for feeling pity for them, for although they certainly did at this time some acts of great cruelty, their provocation was so great, that, looking back, as we now do, over a number of centuries, we are inclined more to pity than to censure them. But to answer your question more directly, No. Though at first the aristocracy seemed to be too dazed to fight back, they soon aroused from their stupor, and the vengeance which they wreaked upon the peasants was terrible."

"What did they do to them, teacher?" asked Jennie Jacobs.

"It is not always best, I think, Jennie, to describe too minutely such scenes of horror," said Professor Carman, "so we will let it suffice to say that they were hunted down like wild beasts, and it was not long before a death-like quiet in their old homes told the story of their miserable fate more eloquently than words could do."

"King John, you will remember, was still in England; for his ransom money had not yet been paid. But after a deal of diplomacy, Edward finally allowed him to go home again if he would leave his second son, as assurance that it would be paid."

"It is something like Simeon's being left in Egypt as a pledge that his brother Benjamin should be brought to Joseph," said Julia March.

"Yes, only in this instance, unlike Simeon, Louis, the son left in England, managed to escape. He considered liberty more to be desired than the honor of keeping his word—which is quite doubtful, I am sure, even in time of war."

"What did King John do then, I wonder?" asked Charlie White, eagerly.

"He did a very strange and unexpected thing indeed. He voluntarily returned and delivered himself up to Edward again, which deed ought to have made the sneaking son quite ashamed of himself. I think John must have had a very high sense of honor, for he said that 'good faith ought to be found in the heart of kings if nowhere else.'"

"Did Edward receive him kindly?"

"Yes, with every demonstration of kindness, but John died shortly after his return to England as a royal prisoner, and the dauphin, or Charles the Wise, took his place, in 1364.

"That's right, Joseph; I am glad to see you making a note of this date. I hope none of you will forget your pencils and notebooks, and then at the close of these chats on French history, you will each have a little history of your own, which you yourselves have written."

"Charles did not have very good health, and he looked so thin and pale that people did not think he would amount to very much in the way of governing. Then besides his own natural ill health, he took a dose of poison which was treacherously given him by his own cousin. Yet still he lived, and as it turned out finally, he knew better how to govern France than his father had, and Edward III., who still lived, counted him as one of his most dangerous enemies. About this time, Charles sent his great general, Du Guesclin, to help conquer the king of Spain, Pedro the Cruel, who was finally driven from Spain, into Bordeaux, which the Black Prince of England had taken possession of."

"Was the Black Prince able to hold this conquered territory of France very long?" asked Will Palmeter.

"No; the people rebelled against his cruelty and unjust taxation; and as his health had failed, after a few years he went back home to England to die. Meantime, the brave Du Guesclin kept fighting to win back French territory which Edward and the Black Prince had taken away. But it was not destined that he should live to enjoy the fruits of his hard-earned victories, for a fever laid him low, and he died just as a place he was besieging was about to surrender; for the man who commanded the fortress having given an oath to surrender on a certain day if help did not arrive from England, kept his word by pulling down his flag, and solemnly marching out with his men, and laying his keys upon the breast of the dead warrior."

"Well, that's what I call honorable," said Joe Palmeter.

"It was indeed; and it is refreshing to learn of deeds like this occasionally, in those dark days, when it sometimes seemed that integrity and honor were perished."

"Now what practical lesson can we learn from the talk to-day?" asked the teacher.

"We ought to learn, for one thing," said Julia March, "that to tell the truth and be honest-hearted, is more noble than anything else, and that truth even in a prison is better than liberty—"

"Yes,—even in a palace," echoed Joe Palmeter.

"I would be glad to have Charlie White make a note of everything he can learn concerning the duties of knights, how they were educated, etc., and bring it in and read to us what he has written at our next study," said the teacher, giving Charlie a kindly smile, as they marched from the class-room.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

An Image to the Beast.

"CHARLIE, for what purpose was the two-horned beast to call down fire from heaven?"

"To deceive those that dwell on the earth," said Charlie.

"With this manifestation, what does he command men to do?"

Charlie opened to Rev. 13 and read, "Saying to them that dwell on the earth that they should make an image to the beast."

"Now, Charlie, what is an image?"

"Why, it's a likeness, a resemblance."

"Then as we are dealing with symbols, and have located the beast as a symbol of the papacy, what would making an image to the beast mean?"

"Making something like the papacy."

"And what was the papacy?"

"It was a union of church and state, or a system by which men who served God in opposition to unjust statutes, were dealt with as malefactors."

"Why, mama, that is the way Jesus was dealt with. In our worship this morning I read the verse that says, 'If he were not a malefactor we would not have delivered him unto you.'"

"Yes, the Jews represented the religious factor, and the Romans the law. But as a civil power Rome found no fault with Jesus. Neither would any civil power within its legitimate sphere, find any fault with Christ's followers. But Jesus was crucified for his Godlikeness. The accusation was, that he made himself the Son of God. Yet his crucifixion was not counted persecution by Rome. The tortures of the Inquisition have been justified by the papacy, because the persecutors had worked until their malignity to the followers of Christ could be gratified in the name of law. The events of our own day show that men are following in the same cruelty-beaten track, and the beast in men is saying, 'Let us make an image to the beast.' Let us make religious laws that have no right to a place among civil laws—laws that conflict with men's rights and the plain statements of God's Word, in order that we may afflict those who are loyal to God, and do it in the name of law, to place them before the world as malefactors. But shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? God will be able to see and to sweep away the refuge of lies."

"But, mama, the mass of the people who will be led into this kind of iniquity will be ignorant of the real purpose of the movement."

"We will talk of that another time. I want to ask you if this movement for the union of church and state will simply end in talk,—end in placing upon our statute books dead-letter laws? Please read the next verse."

"And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that he should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed."

"You remember Jesus said that the servant was not greater than his Lord. He said, if they have persecuted me, they will persecute you also. Many of the religious and scientific teachers of to-day contend that the world is growing better. Though they have to face appalling records of growing crime, see poverty increasing and wealth growing unfeeling, look upon all nations as a huge armament, and see a fallen church suing for civil power, yet they soothe men's fears by crying 'peace and safety.' They scoff at the Word of God that declares evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, and that the last days are to be perilous. They declare that the spirit of the Dark Ages has departed, that never again will persecution stain the hands of men. But the infallible Word declares that 'all who will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.'"

"And so, mama, do you think that the followers of Christ before this age closes will be killed for their faith?"

"The prophecy declares that the decree of death will certainly be passed upon them. There are other scriptures that we will examine later that indicate that a supernatural deliverance will hinder the fulfillment of the death warrant. But you may read on in the prophecy."

"And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand or in their foreheads; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name."

"The mark that men will be required to receive is not a literal mark. We have found the prophet speaking in symbolical language all along. It is a mark that is received in the mind, something that is assented to and received by belief. It is also to be received in the right hand. Those who do not assent to it in their minds, will nevertheless yield the hand for its requirement. Now whose mark is it, Charlie?"

"The mark of the beast."

"Yes. It is the sign or mark of the authority and nature of the beast. We have located the beast as the papacy, and have already proved that Sunday observance is claimed by the Catholic Church as a mark of her authority. It is certainly a sign of the nature that seeks but its own gratification. In presuming to change God's law, of which Jesus said, not one jot or tittle should pass till heaven and earth passed, we can see that the papacy has set aside the authority of God and exalted itself above God. God is love, and in setting aside God, they have set aside love. Love is spiritual, and in setting aside love, they have set aside the spiritual, and the thing that is left is the carnal mind. But the carnal mind is enmity against God, it is 'not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.' The characteristic of the beast is made manifest in self indulgence, self-exaltation, in outward display, in enmity toward those who stand loyal to God, who are in harmony with his nature. So in substituting Sunday, the first day of the week, for the Sabbath, the seventh day, they have substituted the mark of the nature and authority of the beast. The authority of the beast is the authority that is backed up

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, it not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

NEW YORK, MAY 19, 1898.

THE richest man in the world is he who has a sound body and a sound character. And God means that every person shall have both.

SOME interesting facts relative to the drift of the nation away from American principles of government, are set forth in the article on "Americanism" (see p. 311). There is more of serious import in such facts than the writer is willing to admit.

APPROPRIATIONS for the war made by the Government have "footed up" thus far to about $200,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury, it is said, figures on an expenditure of $25,000,000 monthly after July 1 till the war is ended.

AT the great papal jubilee held in this city a few days ago, one speaker made what some Protestants have said was a "good point," by mentioning that the starving reconcentrados in Cuba were Catholics as well as the Spanish; and hence entitled to the sympathy and aid of Catholics in this country. Very true; but Catholics here did nothing in behalf of these poor people until the United States Government took action in the matter against Spain. It was plainly the attitude of the Government that developed this sudden interest on their part in the poor reconcentrados.

AN interesting decision was rendered the other day up in Maine on the question of exemptions in the law for Sunday observance (see p. 313). The reader will remember that recently in Plainfield, N. J., where seventh-day observers are exempt by State law, the authorities decided that such persons might work on Sunday provided it was done so secretly that nobody would know of it. They might keep open store on Sunday, if it was done with doors closed and windows curtained. This was the way the authorities construed the exemption there. And now a Maine court has passed upon the same question and announces that seventh-day storekeepers in that State must close up on Sundays, because while they may do work themselves under the exemption, they are not allowed by it to cause others to work. It is a queer decision, but it is very instructive, in a way.

MOMENTOUS results have already developed from the war, apart altogether from the field of its operations. This country—nay, all Europe—will never be after the war what it was before; this much is evident even now. The policies of all the Powers will be different. An Anglo Saxon alliance is foreshadowed—is indeed already a virtual fact; and the other great powers realize that they must shape their plans to meet it. The papacy also is taking a hand in the matter and manipulating schemes which have vast possibilities behind them. This little war, in short, is big enough to most profoundly affect the history of the world.

THE Spanish forces in Cuba are hard pressed for means of subsistence, and the Cuban forces are reported to be almost destitute of provisions. Under such circumstances the condition of the non-combatants can be imagined; and unless relief reaches them soon, not many of them will be left to reap the benefits which it was supposed the war was to bring them.

INTERNAL disturbances almost as serious as those which are shaking the throne of Spain, have broken out in Italy. At Milan, the center of the disorder, a pitched battle was reported between the rioters and the troops, resulting in terrible loss of life. It is asserted as a truth which the Italian authorities are doing their utmost to keep quiet, that parts of Italy are in a state of actual revolution. In one province—Tuscany—martial law has been declared.

And there is distress in other parts of Europe besides Italy. France, almost simultaneously with Italy and Spain, gave notice of distress among her people by suspending the import duties on wheat and other grains. The wheat crop in Europe has been a short one; and Europe, in such a case, looks largely to America to supply the deficiency. But on account of the war, the importations from America are greatly restricted; and the effect of the war is felt by some of the nations of Europe almost as severely as would be the case were they engaged in war themselves. This is one reason why Europe does not want the war to continue, and would intervene if she could do so with good prospect of success.

In one way or another, it is war that is at the bottom of the distress in Europe everywhere. Italy has for years been staggering under the terrible incubus put on her by the "Triple Alliance." She was bound by it to maintain an enormous armament; the result being quite satisfactory to Germany—the chief party in the alliance—but most distressing to the poor Italians. It was like a poor man joining a rich man's club; in the endeavor to keep pace with them he only makes himself poorer than ever. The money of the poor people that should have been spent for bread has been spent for munitions of war.

It is getting to be with the masses of Europeans very much as it was with a certain body of French knights some centuries ago in a battle with the English. The knights wore armor so heavy that when they were unhorsed in the combat they were unable to remount or to wield their arms with effect, and were at the mercy of their opponents. Under the weight of the vast military armaments, the people of Europe are hardly able to move, and the protection they most need is something to keep them from being utterly crushed by the burden of militarism they are supporting. Militarism is getting to be as great a curse to the civilized world as rum.

THE cross of Christ is sent to all countries, but against none.

HE who is at peace with God will naturally be at peace with his fellowmen.

THE battle ground of Christian warfare is not Cuba or the Philippines, but the human heart.

THE greatness of a nation depends upon the number of its men who are great as individuals.

BIGOTRY defines the unpardonable sin as being the expression of dissent from its opinions.

POLITICS comes as near to being Christianity as federation comes to being the "unity of the Spirit."

ALL history shows that it is better that the state should dominate religion, than that religion should dominate the state.

IN the Christian warfare every soldier is sure to get killed; for he cannot be of any use as a soldier of Christ until he has been crucified with him.

THE greatest victory that was ever gained since time began was announced in these words: "I have overcome the world." And this victory is for every Christian.

THE only thing for which God gives an individual superhuman power, is to resist temptation.

CHRISTIANITY says that Spaniards and Americans should stop fighting, and be brethren. "Patriotism" says that they should fight to the bitter end, because such is the call of country.

MANY people scoff at the idea of creating money by governmental fiat, who seem to think it quite proper that there should be laws to make people good. But it is just as easy to create money by law, as to create character.

TAKE four individuals—Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln; only these four—out of American history, and the reputation of this nation would suffer an incalculable loss. Any one familiar with United States history must admit this.

These four individuals were great men. But the nation did not make them great; they, on the contrary, added much to the greatness of the nation.

They became great as individuals, and it was only the recognition of this greatness which gave them national reputation. They were not great because they were put at the head of the nation; they were put at the head of the nation because they were great.

Having the same opportunities and advantages which hundreds or thousands of others about them had, they rose to positions of pre-eminence by virtue of the inherent power that was in them,—the power of character. And by the same power they acquitted themselves well at the head of public affairs.

A small man—small as an individual—would look a good deal smaller at the head of a nation than he looks as a private character.

These are truths, and plain truths; yet in spite of them the notion is getting to be prevalent that individualism is a dead issue, and a doctrine of no value to mankind to-day. The talk is all about "nationalism"—as if there was something in nationalism that could elevate or save mankind.

The nation cannot help the individual. Give him all the wealth of the nation, or give him all the power, and what would he do without a strong, upright character? He would do a great deal worse with them than he would without them.

Without individualism, there can be no nationalism that amounts to anything. And if the day of individualism be passed, then the day of national greatness is passed with it.

THE fourth commandment, it is claimed, does not specify that the rest day is the seventh day of the week. But this claim will not bear investigation. For the Creator, when he rested on the seventh day, completed and marked off the first week of time; and the day on which he rested, and which he blessed and sanctified, was necessarily the seventh day of the week. The week has continued unchanged from that time to this.

ONE of the greatest kings of antiquity, was Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. He was one of the few monarchs that have sat upon the throne of universal earthly dominion.

This Nebuchadnezzar at a certain time in his reign made a great image of gold, which he "set up in the plains of Dura," and commanded all the "people, nations and languages" of the province of Babylon to worship it.

There were three officials of the government—Hebrews—who refused to obey the king's command, and declared that they would worship the God of heaven and none other. They flatly refused to obey the law of the land.

The government said that they should do a certain thing, and they absolutely refused to do it. That was plain disloyalty to the government.

Was it? So Nebuchadnezzar thought, and he commanded them to be cast into the "burning, fiery furnace." And they were bound and cast in; but lo! another power greater than the power of Babylon interposed and by a wonderful miracle vindicated them in their refusal to do that which had been commanded.

When Nebuchadnezzar, who was looking on, saw that, he changed his mind; not as regards their opposition to the law of the land, for he said that they had "changed the king's word"; but as regards their loyalty. And the indisputable proof that he changed his mind on this point is the fact that he then promoted these three individuals—"Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego"—in the province of Babylon. Dan. 3:30. And every Christian will admit that in this the king did what was proper and wise.

These three men, by their firm adherence to the right in opposition even to the law of the land, gave better proof of their loyalty to the government than was given by the men who obeyed it simply because it was the law. Nebuchadnezzar recognized this fact.

That was loyalty to the government then; and what true loyalty was then, it is to-day.

An Anglo-American Alliance.

FRIDAY, May 13, Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies of the British Empire, in a public speech at Birmingham, Eng., used the following words:—

"The time has arrived when Great Britain may be confronted by a combination of powers, and our first duty, therefore, is to draw all parts of the empire into close unity, and our next to maintain the bonds of permanent unity with our kinsmen across the Atlantic." [Loud cheers.]

"There is a powerful and generous nation," said Mr. Chamberlain, "speaking our language, bred of our race, and having interests identical with ours. I would go so far as to say that, terrible as war may be, even war itself would be cheaply purchased if in a great and noble cause the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack should wave together over an Anglo-Saxon alliance." [Prolonged cheers.]

"It is one of the most satisfactory results of Lord Salisbury's policy, that at the present time these two great nations understand each other better than they ever have done since, over a century ago, they were separated by the blunder of a British government."

Of course this remarkable statement has attracted attention, as undoubtedly it was intended to do, in all the nations. As might be expected, Spain was the first to remark especially upon it. Senor Gullon, of the Spanish government, said that the speech has "real importance, not only for Spain, but for the future of Europe."

Everyone may say that this speech has importance not only for Spain, and not only for Europe, but for the whole world. For if such an alliance shall be formed, which indeed we do not doubt will be, it will assuredly mean much for the whole world.

At present, however, we do not purpose discussing the meaning and effect of such an alliance when it might be formed; but rather the prospect that there is of its being accomplished.

Strictly, Mr. Chamberlain's words can hardly be reckoned to be more than an open reply, in the hearing of all the world, to suggestions to the same effect from the American side. In an interview, published in the New York Herald, April 17, Hon. E. J. Phelps, who was formerly U. S. Minister to Great Britain, said:—

"The Chinese question has assumed an importance that under all the circumstances makes it necessary for us to look seriously upon the suggestion of an alliance with England. I am not prepared to say that we should or should not form an alliance so far as individual questions are concerned. The only point of view from which we can now consider the matter is on the basis of the broad principle itself—on the broad ground of general advisability.”

Among the reasons given by Mr. Phelps in favor of an alliance are the following:—

“It seems to me there are several reasons, the first and most important being one which I fancy may not meet altogether with the approval of the masses—the benefit England would be to us under such circumstances. She is a far older nation, and therefore more experienced, possessing the calm wisdom that comes with age and the power to judge dispassionately. We should be to her like the young partner to the old one, and as in the case of such a partnership the younger always gains through the ripe knowledge of his elder. The calm, firm, wise policy of England results in the settlement of difficulty, where often the ephemeral passages of our diplomacy accomplish little or nothing.

“Another reason which might weigh in favor of an alliance is the presence of our great neighbor to the north, that stretches from sea to sea—Canada. But for the presence of Canada nothing would confront us at home which would make it possible that we might have serious difficulty with England, but no man can foresee what will happen. There are difficulties between nations under such circumstances just as there are between landowners or in business life. Therefore I say that just so long as Canada exists, so long is there a possibility of difficulty which an alliance would be very apt to remove.

“Again, there is the moral strength that we should enjoy through an alliance with England. I mean the moral strength resulting from the effect of such an alliance upon other nations. It is not to be supposed for a moment that any power would attack the United States and England if those two nations presented a solid front. For that reason an alliance might be advantageous.

“Still another fact we must consider when surveying the field of reason opened by the question of an Anglo-American alliance is the effect upon commerce. We are not a nation of seamen; England is. Our marine is not developed; hers has gained with every year. It is as a sea power that she holds her high position. Were it otherwise she would never be able to maintain her dignity and power in all parts of the world. On the sea an alliance would be of unquestioned advantage to us.”

Three days later, April 20, Hon. John Hay, present United States ambassador to Great Britain, in a speech at the Easter Banquet at the Mansion House, London, said:—

“The good understanding between us is based on something deeper than mere expediency. All who think cannot but see there is a sanction like that of religion which binds us in partnership in the serious work of the world.

“Whether we will or not, we are associated in that work by the very nature of things, and no man and no group of men can prevent it. We are bound by ties we did not forge and that we cannot break. We are joint ministers in the same sacred mission of freedom and progress, charged with duties we cannot evade by the imposition of irresistible hands.”

About the same time Lord Charles Beresford, Vice-Admiral, and Member of the British Parliament, said:—

“Such an alliance is natural, and I believe the mere fact of its conclusion would deter others from attacking any adequately-defended interests of either country. Now is the time to accomplish it, when advantages are apparent to both countries. . . . And Anglo-American alliance would be the most powerful factor in the world for peace and the development of commerce.”

This suggestion by such representative men has been widely discussed in the press, both secular and religious, of both countries, and even in the pulpit in the United States, with the vast majority of voices in its favor. For instance, at the conference of Methodist bishops lately held at Albion, Mich., Bishop Hartzell, in speaking to the students of Albion College, said:—

“The time will come—and may it come—when the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack will fly from the same staff and American and Englishmen will fight shoulder to shoulder for liberty and against the cause of oppression and barbarism. England is our natural ally, and the time is past when America can live its own life in and of itself. We are competent to take a part in the affairs of the great world of nations, and we are proving our right to such a course.”

And now that such a high representative of Great Britain, as is Mr. Chamberlain, has so plainly announced to all the world that such an alliance would be “cheaply purchased” even by war, it may be counted as a foregone conclusion that such an alliance will be accomplished.

This is an exceedingly important matter, and we shall have more to say upon it.

Of What Spirit is This?

THE London Truth, of Canada, in a recent issue thus speaks of an actual occurrence that took place in that city:—

“At a meeting of the Local Women’s Temperance Union at Ottawa the other day a lady gave a shocking example of the indifference to Sabbath observance which is creeping over the modern world. She stated that she had, to her shame and sorrow, seen two men looking in at the window of a well-known tailor’s shop on the Sabbath day, evidently engaged in selecting the materials for their new spring suits. She added that she had consulted a solicitor as to whether there is no law which could be invoked for the purpose of putting a stop to such profane conduct, and that she had been informed in reply that, though there is at present no law under which tradesmen can be compelled to pull their blinds down on Sundays, it was quite within the power of the legislature to pass such a law. She asked the meeting to join in a petition to the legislature in favor of such an enactment, and the matter was referred to the Lord’s day committee.”

This incident very well illustrates the spirit that actuates a large share of the zealous advocates of enforced Sunday observance. If they had the power and public sympathy, what wouldn’t they do?

Twelve Reasons Against Union of Church and State.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

1. BECAUSE Christ himself has drawn the line of demarkation between the two, by teaching us to "Render to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's." Matt. 22:21.

2. Because such a union proves how weak and powerless must be the religion professed by those who seek political power to sustain it by legislation, since they thus make man their stay instead of God.

3. Because when a church unites with the state, and receives governmental support, the church must preach only that which the government may decide, which must naturally be according to the ideas of the majority.

4. Because when the ideas of the majority are accepted as the national religion, the natural result of such an illegitimate union must be the enactment of religious laws to strengthen their unlawful position.

5. Because immediately a government discriminates between religions, and would favor one sect more than another, it by so doing poses as a judge of the consciences of the people, and thus would steal the prerogative that appertains to our Eternal Father.

6. Because the inevitable result of enacting religious laws must be religious persecution to those of different views from the majority.

7. Because in so doing the government forfeits the right to demand obedience, since God himself has laid down the line of action to be taken in such a case, recording in his holy Book that it is better to obey God than man. Acts 5:29.

8. Because there was never inaugurated a religious persecution, in the whole world's history, in a country where there was no union of church and state.

9. Because the union of church and state instead of promoting true religion, impedes its progress, and germinates more religious hypocrites and atheists, than anything else can do.

10. Because Christianity can never seek the aid of any earthly power, to advance its teachings, since the Author of the Christian religion when on earth, taught that his kingdom was not of this world. John 18:36.

11. Because the union of church and state is absolutely opposed to the fundamental principles advanced by the founders of Protestantism.

12. Because when I seek to enact laws that would intrude upon the religious rights of others, I at once prove that I do not love my neighbor as myself; and should I profess to love God while occupying that position, the Bible says I am a liar (1 John, 4:20, 21); and liars can never enter the kingdom of God. Rev. 21:8.

It is strange that professed ambassadors for the Prince of Peace should have so much to say about war.

Marching to Zion.

BY MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

TUNE—"Marching Thro' Georgia."

RAISE the banner of the Lord, unfurl it everywhere,
Cry aloud, O watchman brave, His glorious truth declare;
See the banner of the foe,—'tis waving in the air,—
While we are marching to Zion.

CHORUS.—O glory, glory! raise the banner high,
We'll fight beneath this ensign till we die;
Our weapons are not carnal, for we're marching to the sky,—
Yes, we are marching to Zion.

Come, my brother, haste thee; for I hear the battle's din,
Wield the Spirit's mighty sword, the Word of God will win;
Take the shield of faith against the mighty hosts of sin,
While we are marching to Zion.

Jesus is our Leader, so our hearts are full of cheer;
He will have a kingdom, but His kingdom is not here;
Take the helmet of salvation, fight but never fear,
While we are marching to Zion.

We will win the victory by watching unto prayer;
Let us never ask the State, Christ's uniform to wear;
Let us conquer souls for Him, and bravely do and dare,
While we are marching to Zion.

Though through persecution dark and bloody we may wade,
Though through dangers wild and fierce the Christian's path is laid,
We can hear the Captain cry, "'Tis I, be not afraid,"
While we are marching to Zion.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

I MUST ask my readers to indulge me if I adopt the method which is often necessary in telling a story and "go back" from the point at which the last installment left us to the August of '74, when at the Chautauqua (N. Y.) Assembly a handful of women, with Mrs. Jennie F. Willing as president, and Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller as secretary of the meeting, organized the National W. C. T. U. and issued a call for a National Convention to be held in November.

Miss Frances E. Willard had, for the sake of a principle in government which she could not conscientiously yield, a short time previously resigned her position as Dean of the Woman's Branch of Northwestern University at Evanston, Ill., and in so doing had sacrificed largely enough to reveal the heroic truthfulness of her nature. As soon as it became known that she was "foot free" other positions were open to her of sufficient influence and salary to still further demonstrate these same qualities, when, in answer to what she recognized as the call of God, she declined every offer and entered the ranks of temperance women, who, depressed by the reaction of the crusade, bewildered by the overwhelming evils of the world upon which they had just opened their eyes, were unconsciously waiting a leader.

In October she accepted the presidency of the Chicago Central Union, and at the Cleveland Convention in November, was elected corresponding secretary of the young National. In the following December ('74) occurred the first meeting between us. We had corresponded. She was in deepest sympathy with the evangelistic phases of the work, and as this was my work, being the one and only line in which I had then, or have ever been led out, it was through the hallowed medium of a gospel practically applied that we formed our acquaintance.

That no one may by this misunderstand my relation to the general plan of departments, I will explain that I have always held that any line of work that was not a means of evangelization had no place in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union; and, although we might not all agree as to just what was "gospel," each woman from her own standpoint, would agree with me in this view of the case.

At her return to Chicago from the Cleveland Convention, Miss Willard wrote asking me to come for a month at least, to assist her in organizing the work along these practical gospel lines. I took leave of absence from the home field to answer this call, and met her for the first time in a basement room of Dr. Goodwin's (Congregational) church (at least I am quite sure that was the place), where a meeting of Chicago women had been appointed to consult together about the most direct methods of saving lost men.

The memory of that month of labor with Miss Willard is to me among the most precious of all the years. We were necessarily associated in the closest intimacy, and under circumstances which brought to my knowledge that rare strength and sweetness of her nature, which later on, as she came to her world-wide fame, gave her such a hold upon an all but universal sympathy.

Upon my return home we were in constant correspondence, and when I wrote concerning the crisis which led to the organization of the Cold Water Army, she at once responded with the keenest appreciation of the situation, and signified her intention of coming to Rockford to see us. As our plans for the Fourth of July developed and I acquainted her with them, she wrote saying that she was going to "drop all" and come. Accordingly we had her name on the program with that of the three captains of the companies, who each were to make a speech as well as one of our girls who led the "Sisters of the Regiment."

Miss Willard as the platform queen, was at that time unknown; but it did not require a prophetic gift for any one who once saw and heard her to know that she had a large mission in a wide field.

The army did honor that day to all the teaching and drilling which had been given it. Miss Willard and I sat together in the carriage as the "troops," uncovering and saluting us in fine style, passed in review; and it was then, I am quite sure, that she first made that epigrammatic utterance, which with slight modification has become the watchword of the L. T. L. of the world. "Tremble King Alcohol; these will grow up!"

As my own two little boys passed us in the parade she said with the most sympathetic quaver in her voice:—

"Just look at them! those dear little legs; bound to keep up. Anyone can see how you came to get hold of this splendid idea. If I had only had some boys of my own I might have got in ahead of you, though, SMI dear. It was the boys as did it."

In driving to the ground chosen for the celebration, we kept the army in sight, for neither of us could keep our eyes off of those dear little men. O how much they meant to us! And all the way we exchanged plans and hopes and prophecies of the future of the work which began to loom up greater than we had ever dreamed.

"I tell you, SMI," said Miss Willard once, "this is the right end to begin at. Nothing is so discouraging as a hopeless man, and nobody that I know of comes so near being that man as a drunkard; in my short experience I've found that out. We must grow a crop of Hopefuls—that means men chuck full of hope; and this is the way to commence. We must have this down at our convention at Cincinnati in November. You must come; bring a boy, gun, togs and all, and we will make him national."

The Seed of Popery.

"Present Truth," London, Eng.

"LET us not be desirous of vainglory, provoking one another, envying one another." Gal. 5:26. That is to say, Let us have done with emulations and strife. Emulation and strife is the natural outgrowth of self-righteousness, the exaltation of self above God's law. This is the very essence of popery. If there were no emulation, no strife, there would be no pope. The papacy,—the existence in the world of such a thing as a pope,—is the result of the strife for the supremacy among the early bishops. At first all bishops or elders, or presbyters, or pastors, for all mean the same thing, were equal. "All ye are brethren," said Christ, and for a little while they lived as brethren. But soon there was a strife as to who should be the greatest, and the streets of more than one city, Rome especially, ran with blood which was shed in these contests. The final result was the recognition of the bishops of Rome as supreme.

"But how can it be that so many acknowledge the pope's supremacy, if the popish spirit is inherent in human nature?" Thus: when the popish principle is admitted, some one must be chief, or else there will be a war of extermination. So the others unite in homage to the fortunate one, in hope that their turn may come next, or in the knowledge that they will at least be popes of lesser rank, exercising lordship over those who are beneath them.

Wherever there is emulation, there is the papacy; and wherever the papacy is, there is every evil work. The Spirit of God casts out the papacy from the individual human heart by producing meekness, faith, goodness. He who knows that from self only evil can come, and that all good things come only from the Spirit, is made humble by that very knowledge. Knowing that he is nothing, he gives place to the Spirit, and the fruits of the Spirit grow in him. Such an one is truly happy, because he is through the Spirit, "perfect and entire, lacking nothing."

Loyalty to Government and to God.

CIVIL government is necessary to the well being of social, moral beings in alienation from God. God had so constituted man that he naturally seeks civil society. It is thus that the Creator has ordained "the powers that be." It is thus also that governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed." All usurpation is sin, for it is theft, and God ordains no sin.

But in making man such a being that he naturally organizes civil society, God has not made him in any sense independent of Himself. No man is so high and none so low that he is free from the claims of the divine law. In no way can the individual escape this responsibility. He cannot organize a government, a society, a state, with power to release him from moral obligation. No created thing, much less something of man's creation, can in anywise rise superior to the divine law and abrogate or suspend it in any degree. That which is wrong in itself, that which is forbidden by the divine law, cannot become right simply because it is permitted, or even because it may be commanded by government. Nothing can be right because done by several millions of men that would not be right if done under similar circumstances by a single man. God holds not the government, the state, responsible for violation of his law, but the individual. As Lowell has expressed it:—

"If you take a sword and dror it,
And go stick a feller throu',
Gov'ment aint to answer for it;
God 'll send the bill to you."

Therefore, no man can be guiltless in taking human life simply because he does so in battle, in company with ten thousand others, unless he would be equally guiltless if God, the enemy he slays, and himself were the only parties concerned. There never have been and there never can be men enough in this world to abrogate or even to suspend one jot or one tittle of the law of God.

The foregoing being true, it is evident that no human law can alter in any degree the divine law, and the man who would be loyal to God must own only a qualified loyalty to any human government upon earth. He can never say: "My country; may she ever be right; but my country right or wrong." He can say, May my country ever be right; he may pray and ought to pray for his country and its rulers, but he can give unqualified allegiance only to the Ruler of the universe, to the law of the Lord which "is perfect, converting the soul."

Good men have in all ages recognized this principle and been obedient to it. The three Hebrews, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, though subjects of the king of Babylon and standing high in official position, doubtless under some form of oath binding them to allegiance to their monarch, held the law of their God as superior to the decree of the king, and their deliverance from the burning, fiery furnace proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that Jehovah approved their course.

Daniel, prime minister of the empire, utterly disregarded the law which forbade his accustomed devotions; and when, after having passed a night in the den of lions into which he was cast for his disobedience, the king asked after his welfare, the prophet with holy boldness answered, "O king, live forever; My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt."

The man who is indeed loyal to God can always truly say to any civil ruler, "Before thee have I done no hurt;" but neither will he do any hurt nor neglect to do any good in obedience to any command of any man or of any government. This was true in Old Testament times; it is equally true in New Testament times as is proven by the words of the apostle in Acts 5:29: "We ought to obey God rather than men."

These truths may not be palatable in these days when the war spirit fills men's hearts and occupies their thoughts, too often to the exclusion of the consideration of eternal interests. But truth does not cease to be truth because it is unwelcome, nor does responsibility to receive and obey truth begin only when it is gladly received. Man's unbelief makes neither the promise nor the law of God of none effect. God cannot deny himself. Let us, then, "Hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil." Eccl. 12:13, 14. C. P. B.

National Christianity.

THE Reform Press, of Pueblo, Col., recently touched on the idea of national Christianity, as follows:—

"There is not a Christian nation in the world to day. A Christian nation would be a nation composed mainly of Christian people and conducted on Christian principles. Such a nation is not to be found on the face of the earth. There are some nations which have a measure of civilization, for which we thank God. But such a thing as a Christian nation does not exist now and never has in the past."

This is quoted in a Nebraska journal, the Central City Democrat, with the following pertinent comments:—

"And yet we have been told that all civilized nations are Christian, and each one a little more Christian than the balance. England has claimed to be a Christian nation for many centuries, and was particularly so when Catholics and Protestants were cutting throats and burning heretics. France had a spasm of Christianity once which culminated in St. Bartholomew's day. New England was so much Christian that her people burned all the wicked witches and drove all the heretics into a lifelong exile. We are Christians in America with ten thousand churches closed six days out of seven and four times as many saloons open every day of the week; with ten thousand devoted ministers and forty thousand accomplished gamblers; with a few thousand millionaires and a few million paupers; with the poor oppressed by law and the rich setting the laws at defiance. You can just bet we are a Christian nation, and if anybody dispute it we will fight him."

A Solemn Warning.—No. 3.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

SPEAKING of Christianity in the third century during the reign of Diocletian, Milman, in his History of Christianity, as quoted in last week's article, says, among other things, "It is the oracle of Apollo of Miletus, consulted by the hesitating emperor, which is to decide the fate of Christianity. The metaphorical language of Christianity had unconsciously lent strength to this new adversary; and in adoring the visible orb, some no doubt supposed that they were not departing far from the worship of the 'Sun of Righteousness.'"

But they were. Rapid strides were being made towards that of which the Apostle Paul wrote in his second letter to the Thessalonians (chap. 2:3,4): "Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

Here is foretold a falling away—an apostasy—which was to result in the development of a power spoken of as the "man of sin," who was to exalt himself above all that is called God. And that which was to bring about this awful thing is spoken of as the "mystery of iniquity" or of "lawlessness." (V. 7, R. V.)

Keeping this clearly before our minds, let us now turn to other scriptures which show that what is before us in the scripture above quoted is a reproduction of that which was once sought to be set up and perpetuated in heaven. In Isa. 14:12 we read: "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! How art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations! For thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north; I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like [equal to] the Most High."

No one needs to be told that this Lucifer is none other than Satan. Exalted to a place of high degree in heaven—perhaps to a position inferior only to Christ—he is not satisfied with his position. He determines to be equal with God. This would mean that he would receive honor and worship from all of the created intelligences of God. This of course could not be. But even though it could have been, would this have been the end of the matter? By no means. Such a spirit as Satan was cherishing could never be satisfied without reaching, not simply to a station equal with another, even though that other be God, but the highest place, even above God. .

That he aspired to this may be seen when Christ was upon the earth. Christ was "God manifest in the flesh;" he was "God with us;" and yet we read that Satan would have "God manifest in the flesh" bow down and worship him. Matt. 4:1-11. Who does not see that if Christ had done this, Satan would have been acknowledged as being above God?

In this, however, Satan failed; but he was not to be satisfied with this defeat so as to give up all hope of ever accomplishing his purpose. What he could not do in one way he planned to do in another. So he determined to do this by instilling his spirit, as it were, into man, and revealing himself as supreme in man.

That Satan would succeed along these lines, and get man to worship him, God saw beforehand and foretold it in his Word. And so we have the scripture which we have already read in Thessalonians.

There is only one way in which one can exalt himself above all that is called God. That is by changing the law of God and demanding obedience to it as changed; and in receiving that obedience only can he sit in the temple of God and show himself as God.

And there is only one power in all history which claims to have done this, as has been shown in previous articles; and that is the papacy. This being so, the papacy is the fulfillment of 2 Thess. 2:3, 4.

PROTESTANT missionaries in Madagascar, it is said, are anxious—some of them—that their work should receive political recognition from the French government. There are some, however, among those most interested in this mission work who realize that governmental recognition would be disastrous to spiritual progress, and earnestly opposed it for this reason.

THE National Reformers, it is stated, have petitioned the Government to appoint a day of national fasting and prayer. They have a precedent—or what may be claimed as such—in the proclamation of a similar kind issued by President Lincoln during the darkest period of the civil war. It is proper enough at any time, of course, that the people of the nation should seek the Lord with fasting and prayer; but the civil government has neither the authority to call for such a step nor the power to make it effective.

WE have received a circular sent out in the name of the Red Cross Society and Central Cuban Relief Committee, inviting our coöperation in raising a "war relief fund," to care for "sick and wounded soldiers and for starving Cubans." Among other statements, it says that "millions of dollars in contributions are needed to take care of the hundreds of thousands of reconcentrados in Cuba, return them to their homes, and start them again in life."

WE are entirely in sympathy with the purpose for which this relief fund is supposed to be raised. But it must naturally occur to the person who has kept the run of events in this matter, to ask how these hundreds of thousands of starving Cubans are to be reached by their would-be rescuers. The United States troops cannot reach them at present, and whether they will be able to do so in the near future, is a question to which only time can give a reliable answer. And the Red Cross Society with its relief purposes to go behind the United States troops.

BEFORE the war broke out the Red Cross Society was doing a good work in Cuba in relieving the starving women and children who were victims of the cruel order of concentration. To abandon this work and withdraw behind the guns of the American army and navy, upon the rupture of governmental relations with Spain, is a proceeding which we cannot reconcile with the dictates of Christianity. Christianity does not retreat before the dangers which threaten life and limb from the hostility of any of the forces of this world. If it did, the gospel would never have been carried to savage lands where there was no knowledge of or respect for the principles of civilization. But gospel missionaries have gone to such lands everywhere, and there, under circumstances which afforded no reliance upon any human arm, the power of Christianity has been most signally shown.

It is, apparent, of course, that very great difficulties and dangers would naturally confront relief workers in Cuba, under the circumstances which exist to day. But what of that? "Man's extremity is God's opportunity." The relief of the starving Cubans is Christian work, just as much as the preaching of the gospel to the heathen. To "deal thy bread to the hungry" is as positive a Christian duty as is any other of which we have mention in the Word of God. Being thus a part of Christianity, God himself is responsible for the success of those who faithfully engage in it; and this is all that any Christian can ask. It is his part to go forth in the name of his Master to the relief of his fellow men, wherever the victims of misfortune are to be found; and God's part to take care of the results. And this is one of the beauties of Christianity, that it throws the responsibility of right doing entirely upon the Omnipotent. The Christian need have no care or anxiety in anything, save in keeping his own heart right with God. It is worth all that it costs to be a Christian, to be thus relieved of the worry and fearfulness for the future which is the nightmare of so many lives.

WHEN the Christian goes forth to duty, he goes behind the Omnipotent. God does not ask any person to go before him. He goes first, always; and the Christian's part is to follow and see the salvation of God. And it is a great deal better to go behind the Lord than behind the army and navy of a great nation. It is a great deal safer. The army and navy are powerful; but they are not omnipotent. But God is omnipotent; and it is as easy for him to brush aside all the obstacles that lie in the way of feeding the starving in Cuba, as it is for him to feed people in any other part of the world. It is a greater miracle to cause the grain to grow out of the ground and the fruit to develop and ripen on the trees than it is to overcome all the Spanish forces in Cuba. The United States army can do the latter; but all the military power of the world could not bring forth from the earth a single stalk of wheat. When we see God doing the greater miracles before our eyes, shall we not have confidence that he will perform the less, if we ask it according to his will?

THE poor Cuban women and children have been left to themselves, and they are fast dying of starvation. That is the result of the policy that has been adopted. How many there will be left to relieve when the war is over, no one can tell. Could these lives have been saved if Christians in this land had gone forth to them, not identifying themselves with the civil government, but with the kingdom of Christ, and in the name of Christ braving the difficulties and dangers of the task? That is a question for Christian people to answer to their own hearts.

Press dispatches of recent date contained the following item of news from the Philippine Islands:—

"The archbishop of Manila issued a pastoral letter on May 5 calling on all Christians to defend the faith against the heretics, who designed to erect an insuperable barrier to their salvation, they intending to enslave the people and then forbid the sacraments of baptism, matrimony and burial, and the consolation of absolution.

"The archbishop declares that if the Americans are allowed to possess the islands their altars will be desecrated and the churches changed into Protestant chapels. Instead of there being pure morality, as now, examples of vice will only be inculcated."

* * *

THE "pastoral letter" of a Roman Catholic archbishop ought to contain good Catholic doctrine; and if this is good Catholic doctrine in the Philippine Islands, it is good Catholic doctrine anywhere. The item concludes:—

"The archbishop appointed May 17 as a day of rejoicing over the renewed consecration of the islands to the sacred heart of Jesus."

Being thus "consecrated" according to the valid Roman Catholic form, how can good Catholics anywhere give assent to the invasion and forcible seizure of the islands by the American troops? We do not see the logic in Catholic devotion to a non-Catholic country, against one that is strictly Catholic.

In the Name of Hypocrisy.

THE Methodist Ministerial Union of Omaha, Neb., are hard at work to secure Sunday closing of the gates of the Trans-Mississippi Exposition. To this end they have circulated petitions throughout the States participating in the Exposition, to be filled with signatures and forwarded to the managers of the same. The petitions as sent out by the Union for circulation were accompanied by the following printed note:—

"DEAR BROTHER:

"Inclosed find a petition for the closing of the gates of the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition on the Sabbath.

"The management has received some petitions in favor of Sunday opening, and we believe they are predisposed in favor of granting that request.

"Nothing but prompt, energetic action on the part of lovers of the Sabbath will prevent the opening of the gates on that day.

"Please circulate this petition quickly. The case is urgent. Much depends upon you. Secure all the signers possible and return to Rev. J. B. Maxfield, D. D., 2202 Miami St., Omaha, Neb., as early as May 1, 1898.

"By order of the METHODIST MINISTERIAL UNION."

The petition, with some reasons alleged in its support, reads thus:—

"PETITION FOR SUNDAY CLOSING.

"To the Management of the Trans-Mississippi and International Exposition.

"Town....., State....., 1898.

"GENTLEMEN:—We are not advised as to whether you intend to open the gates of the Exposition on Sunday or not, but in advance of any announcement regarding this feature of the case we do not hesitate to express our convictions touching the question; and, as citizens and voters of this great Trans Mississippi territory, like yourselves we are interested in the success of this great International enterprise and make use of our privilege in petitioning your honorable body in the interests of good order and morality; and, therefore, as men over twenty-one years of age, and women more than eighteen years of age, we beg leave to say we would regret the demoralizing effects of opening the gates to the public on God's holy day; and, furthermore, we believe that more people would gladly contribute to the success of the enterprise if the gates shall be closed on the Sabbath.

"We hereby record our opposition to the opening of the gates on the Sabbath for the following reasons:—

"1. It would be a violation of God's law, upon the keeping of which depends the prosperity and perpetuity of this nation.

"2. It would be in violation of the statutes of the commonwealth of Nebraska.

"3. Many employes would not only be deprived of the rest and privileges of the Sabbath, but would be compelled to work in violation of their consciences.

"4. Many would be obliged to forego the pleasure of a visit to the Exposition, on account of the conscientious conviction that it would be wrong to patronize an institution that desecrates God's holy day.

"5. It would be a scandal to the fair name of our great West.

"6. It would weaken the public conscience, lessen the reverence of the masses for law, and render the enforcement of law much more difficult than heretofore.

"7. It would set a dangerous precedent for all future enterprises of a similar kind."

This Exposition being, as we understand, a private enterprise, not under the management or control of any department of the Government, there can be no objection to Sunday closing based on the principle of separation of church and state. But the reasons alleged in support of the petition are, for the most part, in violation of this principle, and its circulation is designed to create a sentiment in favor of enforced religion. Petitions do not represent persuasion, but the force of public opinion.

The petition is entirely uncalled for, for two reasons. First, if the managers really have a regard for Sunday, they will close the Exposition on that day of their own free will and accord, without any pressure being put upon them. And, second, if they have no regard for Sunday as a sacred day, it will be but a hypocritical pretense for them to "keep" it anyway, and not an act that will strengthen the cause of righteousness and truth.

Sunday is not the Sabbath. But even supposing it were, its cause could gain nothing by its being forced upon the people. God wants people to regard the Sabbath day—to love it. And if they have no regard for it as his holy day, they will not stand any better with him by adding hypocrisy to their disregard of God's commandment.

That is what the Methodist Ministerial Union really ask by this petition. Evidently believing that the managers of the Exposition have no real regard for the day, they ask them to become hypocrites before God and man, in order to strengthen the public conscience and maintain the reverence of the masses for law; in short, in order to save the nation.

We do not believe in a scheme of national salvation which puts a premium upon hypocrisy.

A Great Difference.

BY C. H. K.

THERE is a wide difference in the preaching of "one of the most influential and eloquent" ministers of apostolic times, and that of some "of the most influential and eloquent" ministers of this city at this present time. Samples of sermons that are preached nowadays are given us in the New York World, May 16, 1898, which sermons were delivered the day before.

The burden of one of these "influential and eloquent" ministers was to set before his audience, and through them, before the Government of the United States, the course that this nation must follow since the "Philippines have fallen into our hands."

One thing that is clear to his mind is that "we shall draw closer than ever before to our mother country." An Anglo-Saxon Alliance, to his mind, would mean peace. Thus he says, "Could the English-speaking peoples stand together, the destinies of the world would be in their hands. When England and America shall say together in the presence of any wrong, 'This must stop,' it will stop. Then from the soul of the English-speaking race which stands for peace will be heard, with the tone of an authority not likely to be slighted, the sacred words of our greatest soldier, 'Let us have peace.'"

Another prominent minister preached in a similar strain, his subject being "The Anglo-Saxon Alliance." In such an alliance he saw the sure preservation of the whole world and a peace that could not be disturbed. Still another influential speaker took for his subject—not Jesus, the crucified—but "Helen Gould, patriot." Among other things the speaker said, "I hail Miss Gould's gift as a sublime challenge to all our nation's wealthy families to go and do likewise, and thus to mollify the bitter and discontented feelings of the struggling masses."

From the foregoing it appears that entangling alliances are the means by which the peace of the world is to be preserved, while the munificent gifts of money would "mollify the bitter and discontented feelings of the struggling masses."

As reported in the papers there is absolutely nothing said of the gospel of Jesus Christ, through whom alone there can possibly be peace.

In contrast with all this, we have the utterances of an "influential and eloquent" minister of apostolic times, —one who was called to "fully preach the Word of God," being "separated unto the gospel." He declared, "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." And to such an extent did he realize the importance of this work that he exclaims, "Woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel."

Paul knew, and so taught, that the preaching of Christ, and its acceptance, was the only solution of every difficulty that could possibly arise.

The truth is that this world, like an old sinking ship, is doomed—it is going down. And while statesmen and others are seeking to keep together its rotten timbers, the ministers of the gospel should be lifting their voices with one accord, in the power of the Holy Spirit, in urging the people to get ready to take their departure to the new and better world—the "world to come."

If it is seen by politicians and statesmen to be necessary that the nations should draw near to each other in the way suggested, let them attend to that; but let the preachers adhere to their high calling of persuading the people to draw nigh to God. This is the most important work; for if the people draw nigh to God there is no question but that they will draw nigh to each other. And this really is the only way in which this can be done.

"Not all is gold that glitters," and not all is patriotism that flaunts the American flag. The saloons are making about the most conspicuous flag display just now.

THE following from the New York Journal, of the 17th inst., presents some questions worthy of serious consideration by those who hold to the idea that the war with Spain is a philanthropic one:—

"There is one question which Americans who are not strategists are asking themselves more seriously every day as this war goes on. It is this: What do we expect to accomplish by the blockade of Cuba?"

"We know what we actually are accomplishing. We are killing off our friends, the reconcentrados, by hundreds if not thousands every twenty four hours. We are finishing Weyler's work with a thoroughness that must fill the butcher with ghoulish glee. But what end do we hope to achieve by inflicting all this misery?"

"It seems to be forgotten in some quarters that this is not an ordinary war. If we had begun to fight Spain on account of some injury to American citizens in Madrid, and if Cuba had been a loyal Spanish colony, there would have been nothing illogical in striking at Spain through the Cubans, either by blockade or in any other way. But Cuba is only nominally a Spanish colony, and as far as we are concerned she is not one at all. We have officially announced that the Cuban people are and of right ought to be free and independent. They are our friends and the enemies of Spain. Is it not a curious policy, then, to strike at Spain by starving the Cubans?"

"It has been demonstrated that as long as there is any food in Cuba the Spanish soldiers will not starve. Before they go hungry every Cuban within their lines will be dead. To bring about such a result will be to destroy such foreign confidence as now exists in our profession that we have undertaken this war from motives of humanity."

THE timely suggestion is made by the Christian Citizen that as it is likely Spain will kill as many American men before the war is over as the nation can afford to spare, it would be well to take some measures to provide that no more of our boys be killed on the Fourth of July than is absolutely necessary to the proper celebration of the day.

Studies in French History. -23.

"WHEN the brave constable, Du Gueschin died," began Professor Carman, "the king appointed Oliver De Clisson to take his place, to try to reconquer that part of France which had passed into other hands. This man was so very cruel that he was called The Butcher. Once when some of the poor people who had held out against him till he was very angry, finally surrendered, he stationed himself at the gateway where they passed out, and the cruel monster killed them one by one with his heavy battle ax; for as they were starved until they were nothing but tottering skeletons, they could not resist him. He killed fifteen in this way, and then the horrible work was given to another executioner.

"Poor King Charles did not live but a few weeks after this, and let us hope that he did not approve of the cruelty practised upon these helpless men. The people really began to respect the king, and the wisdom which he showed in this troublesome time. He neither corrupted the coin, increased the taxes, nor spent the people's money in tournaments and feasting. The soldiers were paid promptly, and the king had no favorites."

"Was Charles the Wise the same as Charles V?" asked Edna Philips, note book in hand.

"The same, Edna, and he was well named 'The Wise.'"

"Would you please tell us something about the customs and manners of folks who lived at this time—let's see; this is in the fourteenth century, isn't it?" asked Milly Brown.

"Yes, Milly, the last half of the fourteenth century. I think your question is a reasonable one. We ought to know something about the ideas of the common people regarding right and wrong, refinement, courtesy, etc.

"The French people had been getting to have more and more refinement ever since the days of Charlemagne and his famous School of the Palace. But you may be sure their ideas of morals and decency were not by any means up to the standard of civilized people to-day."

"Grandma said this morning," remarked Maggie Palmer, "that she believed it was during the reign of Charles the Wise, that people began to wake up to the fact that it was at least not in good form to steal and tell lies."

"I think she was right, Maggie," said Professor Carman, smiling at the look of astonishment upon the faces of his young hearers, "for it is recorded of a certain nobleman who felt anxious that his daughters should shine in society, that he once gave them some fatherly advice by which he hoped they would as far as possible try to regulate their conduct. He requested them to keep their hands clean when at table, and thought it would be well to keep their nails trimmed; and that when passing a private house they should not stop and look in at the windows. He also thought that as far as they could, they would better keep from telling lies and stealing."

"The very idea!" cried Milly Brown, who was a prim little woman.

"How preposterous!" exclaimed Edna Phillips. "Just imagine our father's having to give us such advice as that!"

"It does seem rather amusing, Edna, but we must not become self-righteous, or measure ourselves among ourselves, for the Bible says those who do this are not wise. Now," continued the teacher, "I think we will hear the essay which Charlie White has kindly prepared."

"I couldn't find out so very much about knights and their duties, professor; but I have a few facts," replied Charlie, unfolding his paper, and as he took his place by the side of his teacher, began as follows:—

"When a boy whose parents intended him to be a knight, was a little chap only seven years old, he was sent away from home to live with a very brave knight in his castle. I presume the poor little fellow got pretty homesick, but that didn't make the least bit of difference, —he had to stay,—in fact, as people would say now-a-days, he must have staying qualities. He was called a page until he was fourteen. He was in the meantime made to study those things which would help to make him a great knight. But he did not have to study books, as we fellows do, for there were lots of them who could not even write their own names, and who had to make their mark with their sword, when there was any paper they wished to sign. What he had to learn was how to take care of horses and armor, and manage the dogs when chasing game.

"Sometimes when I get a lazy fit on, I wish I lived in those days, and didn't have to study; but I'm glad to say those moods don't last long. I'd be real ashamed if they did. But there was one good thing about it,—the page was expected to be truthful, and to obey his superiors.

"When he was fourteen years old, he felt quite grand, for he then became a squire, and began to grow very anxious to begin his career and to distinguish himself. His imagination had been kept right up to a white heat, by hearing stories told and songs sung in praise of the valient deeds of the knights of other days.

"All this time he was wearing great iron spurs, until he could earn gilded ones by some deed of valor. When he was twenty-one, he was a real knight.

"In times of peace there used to be held mock fights or tournaments. Then the knight who, it was decided, had done the best, went and knelt down at some beautiful lady's feet, and received from her the prize.

"Of course when gunpowder was invented, the 'era of knighthood' practically closed; but still the restless, excitement-loving people still held their tournaments."

"You have done very well, Charlie. I advise you all to preserve your essays for future reference. Next week we will begin the history of poor Charles the Sixth, the fourth of the Valois Branch."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

God's Message of Warning.

"MAMA," said Charlie Ross, "I am troubled about the people. It seems a cruel thing to think that such societies as the Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League, the Christian Citizenship League, the W. C. T. U., and church organizations should be left to the vain hope that they will better the world, and bring in the millennium by bringing about religious legislation, and enforcing Sunday laws. No doubt they are ignorantly rushing on, deceived by the good they suppose they will do, and do not have the least idea as to what the dreadful result will be.

"Isn't there some way to stop them? Isn't there some way to warn them of their danger? Surely God, who has opened up the events of the world in prophecy, will help them to see where they are going."

"Surely he will," said Mrs. Ross, "if they will only read, believe, and receive. Amos says, 'Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret to his servants the prophets.' In regard to the making of the image to the beast, or bringing about the enforcement of religious laws in our own country and in the countries of the world, the Lord has sent out a warning. You may turn to Rev. 14, and read the 9th and 10th verses."

Charlie read, "'And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, if any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation.'"

"This is the message to be given to men. The angel is symbolical of the messengers of God. This message is to be given with a loud voice. Men will have no excuse for being deceived. To every soul light will come that will illuminate the real situation. If this light is refused, of course, it will leave the soul in darkness, because he loves darkness rather than light. But you may rest assured that God will see that this message is fully understood by men. It is not his will that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. The consequences of making an image to the beast are of unparalleled seriousness,—the penalty being the unmingled wrath of God. Through all ages we have had judgments mingled with mercy. It is true that nations who have filled up the cup of their iniquity, have been destroyed from the earth as so much refuse. They stand as examples and beacons of warning to the world to-day. This warning applies to the whole world, and to every individual soul. It reads, 'If any man worship the beast, . . . the same shall drink.'"

"Then, mama, it would seem that every soul is to be warned, as every one is to be held accountable."

"He who died for every soul, will see that every soul has light as to whether he will receive the purchased salvation or not. But no force is employed in the gospel, save the power of divine love."

"How is the worship of the beast to affect the whole world?"

"Who are to worship the beast? Read Rev. 13:8."

Charlie read, "'And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.'"

"We have seen in our former talks that the beast is simply the outworking of self, the manifestation of the natural, carnal, mind, whose origin is found in him who said, 'I will exalt my throne. . . . I will be like the Most High.' There are only two classes in all the world, Charlie. One class have submitted to the divine spirit to be cleansed from the carnal, selfish mind; the other have cherished the selfish, sensual, and devilish principles that lead to the oppression and murder of those who are unlike them. The beast is seen in every land where selfishness is displayed, and the mark of the beast, the sign of the exaltation of self above God, will surely be seen and enforced.

"You know, dear, this is an age of signs. Every secret order has its sign. Of late the Christian world have been talking of adopting a flag as an emblem of Christianity. It is a white flag with a red cross, I believe. But this is not the sign that God would have displayed to mark out his true worshipers. To-day the line of demarkation between the true follower of Christ, and the lover of the world, is to become very distinct. The religious legislation that will enforce Sunday as a day of worship, will call forth a protest, and excite an investigation of the Word of God and the history of the past, that will result in making the truth clear, and in causing a division among men. Already thousands and tens of thousands have investigated this matter, and have taken their stand on God's side. They wear a sign of loyalty to Jehovah. It is the sign of his creatorship, and therefore of his right to the service of the soul. 'For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it.'"

"That's a new thought to me, mama, but I can see that the Sabbath is a sign of God's authority and nature. He alone has a right to us."

"Yes. He says, 'I gave them my Sabbaths to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them.' Again he says, 'Hallow my Sabbaths, and they shall be a sign between me and you.' The true Sabbath is a sign or seal of God. Looking forward to this very time when men should be seeking unto wizards, as we saw they were in our last talk, Isaiah says, 'Seal the law among my disciples.' Looking at the law, we find that every specification of a seal is found in the fourth commandment. Can you tell me, Charlie, what is necessary in a seal, and for what a seal is used?"

"It is a stamp that is appended to a document of law to show who is its author, what is his authority, and over whom he has jurisdiction. It is generally stamped by the law-giver on human documents."

"God's law also has its seal. We could not tell from any of the commandments except the fourth, who God was, or what was his authority or jurisdiction; but in the fourth commandment all the specifications of a seal are met.

"While all men belong to God, yet Christians are his people in a peculiar sense. Others are his rebellious subjects, not submitted to his law; but in the Christian's heart his law is to be written. The seal of the law has been torn away, and a false seal substituted, and we as Christians have been ignorant of the deception; but now God commands every soul to repent, to tear away the false seal, and to receive the seal of God. You may turn to Rev. 7, and read the first three verses, in regard to the work that is to be done in the earth."

"And after these things I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree. And I saw another angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God; and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea, saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads.'

"O mama, what a work there is to be done! Is it true indeed that this sealing work is being accomplished, and that we to-day are receiving living light from heaven?"

"Yes, indeed, Charlie. This ought to greatly encourage and inspire us: we are chosen of God by this very light, to hasten on with his messengers in persuading men to receive the seal of God, and to refuse the mark of the beast.

"What did we find winds were symbolical of?"

"Strife, war." Dan. 11:40.

"Yes. Who are said to be holding the elements of strife in all parts of the world?"

"The angels."

"From time to time, war has threatened in different parts of the world. There have been little bursts of strife that have quickly been subdued; but the world, armed to the teeth, stands in an attitude of inevitable war. Our own country is suddenly plunged into war with Spain. God only knows how soon the fierce winds of strife will fill the world with war tempests of carnage and death. These winds would have burst on us long ago if the angels had not been bidden to hold them. Heaven is put into service for one purpose—to make a space of peace that the servants of God may be sealed. As the mark of the beast is the sign of the nature and authority of the beast, so the seal of God is a mark of the nature and authority of God. Only those who have the mind of Christ will receive the seal of God. Let us be willing to give up every vestige of self, that the precious seal may be fixed upon us. When all the servants of God are sealed,

"Then forth the stern command will go, Unbind the winds, and let them blow."

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, MAY 26, 1898.

ENGLAND is reported to have sent a "practical ultimatum" to France regarding their contention over territory on the Niger River, in Africa. And this is only one of many existing circumstances from which the long expected general war may break out.

THE Sunday law in Berlin and throughout Prussia, says the Christian Citizen, has recently been strengthened by substituting jail terms for money fines as a punishment for its violators. And this has been done by direction of the emperor and empress.

THE difference between God's character and man's is indicated by these words of the 25th Psalm: "For thy name's sake, O Lord, pardon mine iniquity; for it is great." The slightness of the trespass, not the greatness of it, would be the ground on which pardon would be asked of man.

It needs not faith, but only intelligent observation, to see that now—

"We are living, we are dwelling,
In a grand and awful time."

The times call for some decisive action on the part of everybody. The person who sets out to be merely a looker-on in the great earth-drama, will be overtaken by a grievous surprise.

GREAT things are going to take place on the high seas in the vicinity of Cuba as soon as the American and Spanish fleets come together. This is the substance of the "news" which the journals of "war extra" notoriety have been selling to the public for the last two weeks. Admiral Sampson has orders to destroy the Spanish fleet and is all ready to do so just as soon as he can get to it. This much is obvious to any intelligent person without the aid of enterprising journalism. And every intelligent person knows also that no newspaper can tell anything about when or where the hostile fleets are to come together. The Spanish fleet is composed entirely of fast ships; from which fact it may be inferred that it was not sent to this coast for the special purpose of fighting. And as its speed is several knots an hour faster than that of the American fleet, it is plain that under ordinary circumstances it will be able to keep out of Admiral Sampson's way. And this fact may postpone a decisive encounter for a considerable time.

Meanwhile it is obvious that every day's delay in the matter tends to make the situation more complex and critical. Another decisive victory like that of Commodore Dewey at Manila would probably be the signal for European intervention to force Spain to submit; but Spain is counting on securing European aid, and while she can postpone decisive action there is a chance that complications may arise which will provide her with a powerful ally. Nothing could be more unfortunate for the United States and for the world than such an outcome; and therefore the situation calls for the utmost decision and celerity of action on the part of the United States.

THE Roman Catholic Church and the Spanish government are united. This is a plain, undeniable fact. In belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, therefore, a person is bound to be at least friendly to Spain. His church, while the union lasts, goes with that government, and he must likewise go with it or withdraw from his church. This is what is demanded by logic and consistency.

And it is the same as regards the person who is a Protestant. If he is a part of the state he must go with the state; and if he is a part of the church he must also go with the church. Then when the church and the state go different ways—as in the case of Spain and the Catholic Church in America—he must withdraw from one or the other. No person can ride two horses at once, going in different directions. Of course, he may still profess allegiance to both; but logically—and actually—he must repudiate one or the other.

And it is a fact that the Christian church and the state—any state on the earth—are not going in the same direction. The Christian church is going to heaven; but the state is not going there; no state is going there. Individuals from every country on earth are going there; but no state will go there. Every state is moving toward extinction; for no state has immortality now any more than Babylon, Greece, or Rome had it. The end of the world will be the end of every state and government in the world. And, therefore, the Christian church cannot be joined with any state, and no individual can be at one and the same time, joined with the state and with the Christian church.

THE "almighty dollar" is just now a potent factor in quieting French hostility toward the United States, which has shown a disposition to make itself felt in the controversy with Spain. The French are getting ready for a great display at Paris in the year 1900—a great world's fair which is to eclipse any former thing of the kind—and the prospect that American dollars will be withdrawn from the enterprise is one which they would willingly make some sacrifice of sentiment to avert. And besides this, says the New York Sun, the big shopkeepers in Paris are greatly concerned over reports of the banding together of patriotic women in America to resent French hostility towards this country by discarding French dresses. We hope the report is true; for whatever the action may count for patriotically, it is much to be commended from that of good sense. We can think of nothing more deserving of eternal boycott than the fashions of "Paree."

THE supreme court of West Virginia has given a decision sanctioning the custom of reading from the Scriptures in the public schools.

MIGHT does not make right, but right makes might.

To have faith means to stand alone against a multitude.

In Christian warfare the soldiers daily rations are drawn from the Word of God.

Not legislation, but faith, is the lever which lifts fallen men to the plane of righteousness.

The true Protestant is not he who opposes Roman Catholics, but he who opposes Romish principles.

The real battles of the world are not fought with armies and navies, but with principles of good and of evil.

The Christian religion looks so high for its sustaining and energizing power that it does not behold the state at all.

An alliance with one another may suffice for the nations; but nothing will answer for the interests of the individual but an alliance with the Lord of hosts.

The first things human that were established on earth were the individual, and individual rights. These are, therefore, the most venerable of all things human.

To deny the rights of the non believer in Christianity—as for instance by a law forbidding him to work or seek amusement on Sunday—is to put a barrier across the way of his possible conversion.

THE question whether war is a proper means of accomplishing Christian work, is but the question whether carnal weapons are more effective than spiritual weapons. Christians believe the latter are more effective, always.

THE only army that Christ ever commissioned is that to which he said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature;" and "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

It is not always safe in this world to be on the side of the majority.

It was not safe in Noah's time, or in Abraham's time, or in Elijah's time. There is no evidence that it was safe in anybody's time. The Word of God expressly cautions the Christian that he shall "not follow a multitude to do evil."

The history of the cause of truth and righteousness is but a history of the minority who have stood for God against the spirit and will of the majority. It presents many a picture in which an individual stands alone against a multitude.

Christianity does not rest upon the decisions of majorities. It cannot recognize their authority in religious things.

The last view, prophetically given, of the majority, in the history of human events, is an interesting one. It is given in the 20th chapter of Revelation. The prophetic description is:—

"And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison; and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea.

"And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them."

In the beginning the majority were destroyed by a flood of water; and in the end they are found overwhelmed in a flood of fire.

There should be in this sufficient warning to Christians against building their hopes upon what may be done in this world by the majority.

RELIGION—the Christian religion—is a law. It is "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." So the Apostle Paul speaks of it; and he says that by its power he was made "free from the law of sin and death." Rom. 8:2.

Being a law itself, it must be obvious that Christianity does not need a law to give it support. One law is not made to support another. A law that could not support itself would be useless altogether.

Any law that is passed for the support of Christianity, therefore, is but a declaration that Christianity is, in itself, a powerless and useless thing. It is a reflection upon God himself.

But this "law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" has power to deliver men from the "law of sin and death." This is power vastly superior to any that ever was or can be exercised by any legislature or government on the earth.

To be certain of this, it is only necessary that the individual should experience the deliverance of which the apostle writes. Try it, if you have not already, and be convinced.

It may be truthfully said of the present that it is an age of federations and fortifications.

There is federation everywhere among men and among the nations; and there are vast armies and navies created by the nations in the hope of securing a defense behind which they will be impregnable against attack.

These represent the greatest power of which the world knows. In them the world is obliged to put its trust. But will they be sufficient for the test of the day that is coming?

The world hopes that they will, but it feels no assurance. Its statesmen look to the future with forebodings. What is there that will really prove a safe defense when the forces of destruction that have so long been gathering are unloosed?

He will be safe in that day who is behind the Lord of hosts. The winds of the final commotion are held by the angels in the "four corners of the earth" until the final choice of the people in the earth is made. Rev. 7:1-3.

There is a choice for every person to make in this matter. There is a choice to be made by you. Will you choose the means of safety that are being provided by the world? Will you be secure behind the defense of an international alliance, with the resources at its command? Will you be secure behind anything less than the shield of Omnipotence? And can you afford to place yourself behind any other defense than this to-day?

Washington's Advice.

In view of the favor with which the suggestion of an alliance between England and the United States has been received, and the readiness with which it is advocated in influential circles in the United States, it is of real interest to every American to know just what Washington said on that subject. We therefore present in full that part of Washington's famous and solemn address to his countrymen:—

"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation, and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil, and even second, the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

"The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

"Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

"Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance, when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected—when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation—when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

"Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

"It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold that the maxim is no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise, to extend them.

"Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

"Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying, by gentle means, the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing, with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinions will permit, but temporary, and liable to be, from time to time, abandoned or varied, as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay, with a proportion of its independence, for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon, real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

"In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations; but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good, that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigues, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated."

A. T. J.

THE following petition has been presented to the President by a committee of Southern Baptists:—

"To the President: We, citizens of the United States, looking to the probability that our Government may be called to exercise its office in the adjustment of the pending difficulties in Cuba; and whereas the doctrine of the equality of religious rights of all men is a doctrine dear to the heart of every true American; we therefore earnestly request the President of the United States that in such contemplated adjustment the influence of this entire Government be employed to secure equality of religious rights to every inhabitant of Cuba."

As between Catholics and Protestants, it is altogether likely that the influence of the Government will be exerted in Cuba in harmony with the terms of this request. But unfortunately, this Government has not within its own borders secured "equality of religious rights" in cases of controversy which have arisen between Protestants and Protestants. "The influence of this entire Government" has by acts of Congress and the decisions of its courts been thrown upon the side of religious intolerance. And by this the Government has unfitted itself for sincere and consistent action in behalf of religious freedom for the Cuban people.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

DURING that summer of '75 our work was in the two lines of Reformation and Formation or Prevention. The reformed man as an evangelist had arisen on the world's horizon, and through the marvelous experiences of salvation from the rum curse which he related was moving all hearts. The enthusiasm of pledge signing and soul winning was such as our generation had never seen before. The most thrilling experiences of Crusade days were improved upon in the meetings which were held from twice to thrice a day wherever these returned prodigals appeared.

We had Francis Murphy, who was just beginning his career, at Rockford; and between his meetings and the "army," were kept busy early and late.

All the while I kept in view that coming convention in Cincinnati, and was preparing myself to make a presentation of this line of preventive work before the women who should there assemble. I learned the manual of arms, or at least so much of it as was necessary to make it possible for me to train a boy to appear with me before the convention to illustrate my theme, or to drill a company if one could be raised quickly for the occasion.

When the time came I took a uniform and a gun; I borrowed a Cincinnati boy, who proved to have the right material in him. The manner in which he wore that uniform and followed my leadership during that memorable week will never be forgotten. He stood with me for hours on that platform, the sole representative of a whole generation, while we discussed him and his cotemporaries, and their place in the redemption of society. He was always ready to respond instantly when in the progress of discussion he was called upon for anything "in his line."

The women were feeling their way through mists out of desuetude and narrowness into things that already loomed like mountains and spread out like seas before them; and among these mists was the parliamentary fog, so that it was not an easy process to arrive rapidly at a conclusion in such a manner as to keep everything "straight on the minutes."

In this, as in every later discussion, we had all phases of temperament and belief to deal with. There were among us "friends" who objected to the "war footing" upon which we had put the boy in the uniform, and while there was not a dissenting voice concerning the proposed line of work, while this was recognized as the strategic point in the battle with the liquor traffic, yet there were many minds as to methods.

One sweet-faced "Friend" from Philadelphia, at last, however, practically settled the question by saying:—

"Mrs. President" (Mrs. Annie Wittenmyer, of Penn., had been called to that office) "I have been on principle opposed to anything which savored of militiaism, but as this discussion has progressed I have thought that truly the 'Lord he is a man of war,' and if it will hasten the destruction of King Alcohol to equip the boys of the nation after this fashion, and drill them in the use of a wooden gun, making this the means of holding their attention to the truth as it is in the Word of God, I am ready to vote 'aye' and go home and help to raise and equip a regiment of Philadelphia boys."

There was a perfect storm of applause at this concession; the question was called; the vote taken; and the Cold Water Army was a recognized department of the W. C. T. U., and Miss Julia Coleman, of New York, was appointed to prepare for us a text book on alcohol to accompany our Bible temperance lessons.

The work of organizing the children began at once in nearly every state, and went forward with the energy of a forlorn hope; for the more we tried to "evangelize the masses" the more we saw of the desperate need of preventing the formation of such a vicious, sensual appetite as that for strong drink.

The next May, I think it was, I made my first visit to Evanston, called by Miss Willard, for the purpose of organizing an army among the children in whom she was especially interested. I was entertained at what was afterwards named, and has come to be known all over the world as "Rest Cottage," with her as my hostess; and I have a pathetic pleasure in remembering that we sat and talked in the evenings on the very spot which she occupied during the little time that she lay in her last sleep under her own roof that day before she was taken to her final resting place.

If I were writing my own experience I should have a thrilling one to tell of this meeting at Evanston; an experience like that of a bird whose wings had never been discovered, but who, suddenly conscious that it must fly or die, unconsciously spreads a pair of pinions, strong and instinctive with power, and sails away to its own amazement and delight; if not to that of those who are looking on.

A BAPTIST minister in the West, Rev. Stephen Northrop, is quoted in the Kansas City Journal as having said in a recent sermon that "the men who have achieved glory on fields of battle have all been followers of the Master." When clergymen indulge in such "patriotic" nonsense they invite people to believe that the doctrines of the religion which they profess are only about as near the truth as the idea that Hannibal, Julius Cæsar, Alexander the Great, and Napoleon, were all faithful Christians.

Rev. John Leland on the Congressional Sunday Mail Report.

REV. JOHN LELAND was a Massachusetts clergyman who had passed the greater part of his life before the dawn of the first day of the nineteenth century. He was a college mate and close friend of Thomas Jefferson, and this fact lends interest to his presentation upon the subject here considered. Upon the occasion of President Jackson's message to Congress, shortly after the Congressional Sunday Mail Report, written by Col. Richard M. Johnson, Mr. Leland addressed to Col. Johnson the clear and forcible arguments in support of the latter's position which are given following. It is much to be regretted that clergymen of our own day do not see with equal clearness the importance of maintaining separation between religion and the state.

We give Mr. Leland's communication just as it appears in a clipping from a New York daily bearing the date of the year 1830, which reprints it from the Washington Telegraph. We are indebted for the clipping to Mr. F. B. Reed, of Lakeville, Conn.

Mr. Leland's letter is dated "Cheshire, Mass., Jan. 3, 1830." As printed it reads:—

"Rev. John Leland, to Col. R. M. Johnson, on the Message of the President, and Transportation of the Mail.

"The Message of the President proves that he is as wise to rule in times of peace, as he is brave to fight in times of war. It embraces the whole ground. Our relations with European powers, the Barbary States, and Indian tribes, are clearly stated. The rights of the people, the integrity of the authority of the States, and the specific powers of the General Government, he delineates with the hand of a master. Where he believes the Constitution can be amended, for the better, he recommends an amendment, and gives his reasons why. And where he judges the laws are deficient to check frauds, or too obscure to be well understood, he advises a new enactment. A giant genius, tempered with a conciliate spirit, runs through the whole of it; and a conviction fastens on the minds of those who read it, that his words flowed from his heart. His friends, who feared he would be deficient in the Cabinet, have their fears turned into admiration; and his enemies, who have vilified him, must stop their mouths, and own that it is a message of wise measures and necessary business. The document reminds us of the ancient sages who had knowledge of the times and knew what Israel ought to do.

"Our relation with foreign powers—intercourse with the Indian tribes and internal regulations, cannot be developed with a word, no not with a thousand; hence the message is lengthy, but not superfluous. Long as it is, I wish it contained another solemn warning to Congress, to do nothing (in a legislative capacity), that would have any bearing on religious opinions.

"A large number of people, in concert, have petitioned Congress to stop the transportation of the mail on Sunday; because they believe in their consciences that Sunday should be kept holy and free from all servile labor. The report of the Committee of the Senate, last session, on the petition, is replete with candor and strength of argument; the radical parts of which never have and never can be confuted; but still it has not put the matter to rest. New memorials are to be presented to Congress—irreligion is trumpeted—and the learning and religion of the petitioners are to outweigh all opposition.

"The Constitution of the United States is a charter of powers granted and rights maintained; among all the enumerated powers given to Congress, there is none that authorizes them to determine which day of the year or week the people shall abstain from labor or travel.—Should they therefore make such a powerless law, it would be unconstitutional. There are many thousands in the United States, who conscientiously keep the seventh day of the week for Sabbath. Should Congress stop the transportation of the mail on the seventh day, and continue it on Sunday, what would the petitioners say? Would they not complain of a partiality shown to the Sabbatarians, to the grief of the Sundarians? It amounts to nothing to say, 'there is a majority that prefer the observance of Sunday to any other day,' for minorities have unalienable rights, which ought not, and cannot, be surrendered to government. The God we adore—the worship we pay him, and the times of performing that worship, are articles not within the compass of any Gentile legislature. The design of civil government, which is to protect the lives, liberty, and property, of the many units which form the whole body, is every way answered without that surrender. Government should defend the rights of the religionists (as citizens), but all religious opinions of none. If the petitioners are secured in their persons and rights, why should they desire more? Their consciences can never be charged with guilt for what others do; for conscience belongs alone to the home department. Why should they wish to stretch and top off (like Procrustes) and bring all to their standard? The driving of a carriage will neither terrify them nor break their devotion; for many of them are drivers to the places of their devotion. If sabbatical laws are necessary to govern the people on Sunday, and keep them from all business but religious duties, why not make a law to prevent Sunday schools; for there is no greater relation between education and religion, than there is between traveling and religion. Paul and his company and baggage, were five days traveling by water from Phillipi to Troas. In Troas they tarried seven days, the last of which was the first day of the week: of course one of the five days was Sunday; and yet there was no law of conscience, or law of Congress, to prevent them from transporting themselves and goods on Sunday.

"Should Congress indulge the petitioners, and pass a law to stop the transportation of the mail on every Sunday, it would be a nest egg for themselves and for others. Encouraged by success, they would next proceed to have the days of Christmas and Easter, and their associations and synods exempted in the same way, and where would it end? The Sabbatarians with the Jews (finding Congress flexible), would, with equal right, claim a law to sanctify Saturday for their convenience. Whenever a legislature legalize holy-days, creeds of faith, forms of worship, or pecuniary reward for religious services, they intrude into the kingdom of Christ, and impeach the wisdom of the divine law giver (for not knowing how), or his goodness, for not giving ALL laws in his government. The deadly pill, at first, will always be rolled in honey. The honor of religion—the spread of the gospel—the piety and research of the reformer—the good of society—the safety of the state, and the SALVATION OF SOULS, form the syrup in which the poisonous pill is hidden. It is from men, high in esteem of holiness and wisdom, that the worst of usages and most cruel laws proceed; for base characters defeat their own wishes. The heart of King Asa was perfect all his days; yet he oppressed some of the people—was mad at a seer who reproved him—and made a law, that whosoever would not seek the Lord, should be put to death.

"Admit of the principle that religion is an institute of state policy, and the people hold their liberty by the tenure of the will of the legislature; which is very changeable—often corrupt, and many times very cruel. Admit of the principle, and you approve of that which has reared an inquisition and drenched the earth with blood.

"Many plead for an equality of all Christian societies, and plead as strongly that they should become bodies politic, and be supported by the civil law. If this is proper for Christian societies, it is as proper for Jews, Pagan, or Mahomedan societies; but the liberty contended for, should be guaranteed to each individual, as his inalienable right, which cannot be meddled with, without usurpation in the rulers, which turns them to tyrants.

"Those who wish to call in the strong arm of law to defend their opinions, give evidence that they have not logical reasoning, on moral and religious subjects, to support their weak dogmas.

"I am sorry that Congress have committed themselves by a precedent of giving their chaplains a legal reward for religious services. How preposterous the sound!—A far-fetched construction supports it. The law of reason and revelation enjoins a reward to the laborer; but if Congress should reward the chaplains with their own contributions, it would look more like simple Christianity. The people at large, have none of the devotion or instruction of the chaplains; nor any voice in electing them; why then should they be taxed where they are not represented? The chaplain who would not attend, on request, and trust to the promise of Christ, and the benevolence of his friends for his reward, without legal obligation, would be selling his prayers for money and turning the gospel into merchandize. The thing here spoken of, is a small moiety which the nation can never feel; but trace it to its root and it contains that principle which is so pernicious in the world; and is now used as a stirrup by the petitioners to mount the steed and ride down the people.

"In all other respects Congress has been cautious and wise in every thing that has any bearing on conscience and religious rights; and even in this particular they have made the best of a bad; for they have shown no partiality to sects or sentiments in their elections.

"I have written a long epistle, but it is not likely that I ever shall write any more; for my age advises me that the time of my departure is near.

"Yours, with respect,

"JOHN LELAND."

Strange If True.

"It may be regarded as a strange fact," said the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, of March 12, "that at a time when the sentiment of the civilized world is the strongest in opposition to war, and the implements of warfare are most destructive, nearly every nation in existence is making greater preparation for the exigencies of war than ever before."

But is it true that at the present time "the sentiment of the civilized world is the strongest in opposition to war"? Have not recent events proved quite the contrary? Did we not see not only the "civilized world" but the "Christian world" ablaze with the war spirit less than three years ago over the outrages in Armenia? Did we not witness the spectacle of nearly the whole "Christian world," through the various churches, demanding action at the hands of the so-called Christian powers, especially at the hands of England, that would have deluged the world in blood? Was it not indeed churches, synods, conferences, etc., that were in the van of the movement in England that well-nigh caused a cabinet crisis in that country because the government was not willing to set the world ablaze with war—to enter upon a crusade to drive the hated infidel from the sacred soil of "Christian Europe"?

Was not the same spirit again manifest in large measure when "Christian" Greece declared war against infidel Turkey? And in the case of the present war between our own land and Spain, where, north or south, east or west, has even "Christian sentiment", voiced by the churches, been against it? The pope and his prelates were almost alone in their efforts to preserve peace, and their motive was too evident to deceive anybody. So far as sentiment was concerned they were not able to control or mould that of even their own people; while Protestant pulpits have all the while been ablaze with the war spirit, and thousands of them ring weekly with arguments in justification, if not of war in general, of this war in particular.

No it is not true that at the present time "the sentiment of the civilized world is the strongest in opposition to war." It is, as a secular paper remarked recently, true that "civilization has not lessened the war spirit in men, it has not made them less ready to fight; it has only changed the reasons for war. Given what appears to men to be an adequate reason for war, and they are as ready to fight to-day as they ever were." And it might truthfully have been added that the causes which are supposed to justify war are not so very different to-day than they used to be. National honor, territorial extension, the collection of claims, the protection of citizens, and even revenge for real or fancied wrongs, are still held as they have ever been, to be just grounds for war.

Even in the present war with Spain, undertaken so far as Mr. McKinley is concerned, the writer believes, only for the freeing of Cuba, the mass of the people are moved far more deeply by a desire for revenge than by motives of philanthropy, and the battle-cry alike on land and sea is, "Remember the 'Maine.'" Dewey's fleet went into action at Manila under the inspiration of these words signaled from the flag ship. The same thing is true of several actions in West Indian waters, and every cracker in an order of over six hundred thousand pounds of hard bread for the army, now being filled in St. Louis, bears and is to bear the same motto of revenge, "Remember the 'Maine.'"

Now the writer believes that Cuba ought to be free and that Spain has by injustice and oppression forfeited all just right to govern that island: he also believes that the destruction of the "Maine" was due to a plot that must have involved Spanish officials, and that the perpetrators of the crime deserve punishment; but from the Christian standpoint these facts warrant neither individuals nor nations in seeking revenge. It is written in the Christian Scriptures, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." And let true Christians everywhere say, Amen.

The moral of this is that we should not deceive ourselves with the thought that civilization, even "Christian civilization" will ever abolish war. The Scriptures tell us very plainly that the last days of this world's history are to be days of unparalleled strife. And at the same time they tell us the people will be deceiving themselves with the cry of "peace, peace, when there is no peace." Unexampled preparation for war and unparalleled talk of peace,—much-talked of but never materializing sentiment against war,—are signs of the last days; and their language to all who will hear is, Get ready for the great day of God! Get ready! Get ready! GET READY! And the preparation that God would have all men to make is plainly indicated in Zeph. 2:1-3. "The great day of the Lord is near, it is near, and hasteth greatly, even the voice of the day of the Lord." God help his people everywhere to heed the warning, and Get Ready.

THE American Review of Reviews gives the following in explanation of the pope's desire for peace so fervently expressed in connection with the Spanish-American conflict:—

"In the early part of this century the property of the Roman Catholic Church in Spain absorbed a large part of the wealth of the country. In 1820 there were 150,000 monks and priests in Spain, besides many thousand nuns. At present there are only about 35,000 priests and monks in Spain, and 15,000 nuns. In all the struggles of factions and parties in Spain, clericalism has played a large part. In 1835 the success of a particular faction meant the crushing defeat of the clerical party. This led to sweeping confiscatory decrees, and these led to a long quarrel between the Vatican and the Spanish government. This was kept up for nearly a quarter of a century, when a new concordat between the Spanish government and the pope was established. In harmony with that a large amount of church property was sold off, and there was issued to the church several hundred millions of dollars in interest-bearing Spanish bonds. This huge block of securities is now held by the Roman Catholic Church. No wonder the pope is anxious to intervene. The interest on these bonds cannot be paid unless Spanish credit is maintained, and protracted war between the United States and Spain means Spanish bankruptcy."

A Solemn Warning.—No. 4.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

WE have seen that before the beginning of the fourth century Christianity had united with paganism in sun worship. This was made more complete by Constantine at the beginning of the fourth century.

With this union of Christianity and paganism in the worship of the sun, we have perpetuated the day which had centuries before been dedicated to the sun. Thus from this time forth we have Christianity and paganism united in the worship of the sun, and even known after Constantine's professed conversion to Christ as Christianity; thus we have in the Roman Catholic Church sun worship as Christianity—thus we have in time Christians unconsciously rendering homage to the "Unconquered Sun," at the same time thinking they were rendering homage to the Sun of Righteousness—Christ—and unconsciously keeping the day of the sun, the first day of the week, thinking all the time that they were in reality keeping the Sabbath of Jehovah.

It has been shown in former articles that sun worship was the "oldest, the most widespread, and the most enduring of all" pagan religions, and that God regarded it as being in his sight the most abominable of all.

Previous to the coming of Christ, sun worship, bad as it was, was at its worst only the rival of the true worship of God; but after Christ's time gradually, almost imperceptibly, it not only took the place of Christianity, but it was accepted as Christianity. This was the climax; the very "mystery of iniquity." Yet not quite.

The reader who is familiar with the history of sun worship will remember that the sun was worshiped under various forms and names. But whatever the form was, it was not that that was worshiped. That but served to remind the worshiper of something else.

It would not be strange if this practice should be continued after this sun-worship had taken the place of Christianity and bore its name.

In Roman Catholicism, it is carried out in the images that are erected ostensibly to this or that saint, but really in perpetuation of the old pagan practice. When Catholics bow down before the images representing some of the dead saints, and even of those representing Christ, and are charged with worshiping and adoring them, they deny the accusation. There is some truth in these denials. They do not worship them; but only that which they represent.

Ostensibly, it is Christ and these dead saints that are worshiped; in reality, it is the "Unconquered Sun."

In speaking thus of Roman Catholicism, it is not charged that Catholics understand this matter as presented. Indeed, one could hardly expect them to understand it in its true light. As before stated, it is the "mystery of iniquity." Outside of the Bible it is impossible to comprehend it fully. And here they handicap themselves; they cannot receive the testimony of God's Word, as they are forbidden to judge of the sense of Scripture only as it is expounded to them by the Catholic Church, and interpreted according to "the unanimous consent of the fathers." This may be seen from the following quotation found in the creed of Pope Pius IV., and to which all Catholics are bound to subscribe:—

"I also admit the Holy Scriptures, according to that sense which our holy mother the church has held, and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures; neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers."—Catholic Belief, p. 251.

To a greater or less extent this "Mystery of Iniquity" has prevailed. For a thousand years and over, this papal darkness—this Christianized paganism—has held sway more or less in every heart. But now the time has come for the truth to be known.

Let it be borne in mind always that sun worship was the most abominable in God's sight, and was the greatest rival to the true worship of Jehovah. And let it also be borne in mind that this system, through the papacy, has been perpetuated in some of its forms to this present day. And let it further be borne in mind that Sunday,—the "wild solar holiday of all pagan times,"—is the sign or mark of this great system of false worship; even as the Sabbath of the fourth commandment—the seventh day—is the sign of the true God and his worship.

But at this time, when the light of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ is to shine forth with a splendor never before witnessed, not even in apostolic days, it is sought to enforce this mark of sun worship upon the consciences of the people—sought to perpetuate it as Christianity and in the name of Christianity. And this, too, when the chief apostles of this movement know perfectly well that the Bible is utterly silent concerning the observance of Sunday, and that its uniform testimony is, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," and when they know too, or may know, if they will only stop and study, that Sunday was always and only the sign of the most iniquitous worship that ever arrayed itself against the worship of the Lord.

And it is because that in spite of this knowledge they persist in this work, which is virtually to put the creature in the place of the Creator, and which in turn is virtually to make God to cease to exist (see Isa. 30:11), that the solemn warning of Rev. 14:9–11 is given.

RELIGION furnishes the deepest motives of human action.

METHODIST journals and some others have of late been discussing the question of the cause of Methodist "statistical sterility," shown by the last denominational census, which reports an addition of only about 19,000 members to the denomination during 1897. The Rocky Mountain Christian Advocate gives this explanation, which is worthy of note:—

"Full many a time the devotional meeting of the chapter closes with tear wet cheeks, and the uplifted hand or voice of penitence and desire for a saving knowledge of Christ; and the leaguers coming from the inner sanctuary of the mercy seat pour into the evening services only to hear a discussion of social science, or local politics, or an adjudication of science, or a manifestation of temper on this or that. The stricken lad hearing this kind of thing, crying in his soul, 'Sirs, I would see Jesus,' and hearing not, 'Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world,' but — goes out into the darkness, after the service is over. 'And it was night.'"

While this may not fully explain the statistical loss in a church of the size and popularity of the Methodist body, it does present a sufficient reason for the failure so far as concerns those whose desire is to see Jesus, rather than to engage in the various church schemes for cleansing politics and reforming society.

The Christian Citizen says that this is a "strange explanation;" and so it is from the "Christian citizenship" standpoint. That is a political standpoint, and not one from which an individual can "see Jesus;" for the Saviour of men was never in politics, and from this it is perfectly plain that there is nothing in politics that can save mankind.

THE chaplain of a Missouri regiment which is to participate in the war is Father Thomas Sherman, a Jesuit priest. In a recent address to the regiment he gave the Catholics enrolled in it permission to eat meat on Fridays and on fast days, saying that in so doing they would not be false to their religion. He assured them that God would forgive them for eating meat on such days, considering that they were supporting the hardships of a war waged for the freedom of their fellow-beings. His remarks, it is said, were hailed with delight by the soldiers.

THE motive for this absolution is not hard to discover. It is evident that without it the Catholic Church would be very likely to be brought into conflict with the Government by the circumstances attending a campaign. The rations of the troops are supplied by the Government; and in an enemy's country provisions are apt to be scarce. So that it might easily happen that at times meat in some form would be the mainstay of the soldier in keeping up his bodily strength, without which he would be of little service to the Government. The Government would insist, of course, that the soldiers keep themselves, when possible, in condition to do battle with the enemy; and it would be necessary for the Government or the Catholic Church to give way in the matter of eating meat. It would seem that in this case the Catholic Church has deemed it wise to give way before raising an issue in such a controversy.

THE incident calls attention to the primary principles of the papal religion. By the word of a man—a fellow-mortal like themselves—these Roman Catholics felt themselves absolved from what they believed to be the command of God, but which was in fact nothing more than the decree of man, since the Word of God says nothing at all about eating meat on Fridays or observing certain days as fast days. They receive the decree of men as the command of God, and then accept the word of man as having authority to release them from their obligations to God. It is thus that the papal religion puts man in the place of God.

It is generally known that in Spain there is a union of religion with the state. The particulars of this union however, are not so well understood, and we present a few of them as given by a journal of this city:—

"The constitution of Spain says: 'This nation binds itself to maintain the worship and ministers of the Roman Catholic religion.' Of the 17,565,600 inhabitants, in 1887, 17,535,300 were Catholics. Public notice of any other worship than that of the Roman Church is prohibited by law. 'Spain has 65 cathedrals, 30 religious colleges, 18,564 churches, 161 monasteries, 1684 monks, 1,027 convents, 14,592 nuns, 11,202 sanctuaries and other religious houses not churches, and 32,435 priests.' The people know nothing but their catechism. A recruit must pass a religious examination before he can enter the army or navy, and the same is true of a candidate for any public office. The priests are active politicians, and ecclesiastics sit in the national parliament by virtue of their sacerdotal office. The prison doors are ready to fly open to any Spaniard who 'insults' the Catholic Church, and now, as in the days of Philip II., there is no place in Spain for a heretic."

All this reveals the internal rottenness that has made the once vast and mighty empire of Spain weak before the power of nations which, while vastly inferior in size, have embodied the virile principles of civil and religious freedom.

The Churches Losing Faith.

"THE Waning of Evangelicalism," is the title of a seriously-written article in a recent issue of the London Contemporary Review, from the pen of an English writer, Mr. Richard Heath.

That the decay of evangelical enthusiasm in English-speaking lands is a plainly-apparent fact, is evident not alone from this article but from comments made upon it by the New York Sun. In summing up the situation the Sun says:—

"In the English Church the Evangelical party distinctively has almost ceased to exist, and the same is true of the Episcopal Church in this country, though at one time it included a great part of the pulpit eloquence of both. The Low Church school, once powerful, if not dominant, has passed away, and there remains only the two parties, the Broad Church, or liberal, and the 'Catholic,' or ritualistic, closely approaching the Roman Church in its devotion to church authority and sacerdotalism. The Congregational churches departed long ago from earnest sympathy with the Evangelical movement, and consequently the Unitarian rebellion, once active, is now quiescent.

"It is a receding movement, for Unitarians are finding that Evangelical orthodoxy itself has thrown down most of the barriers separating it from them. They are no longer fighting against it, for there is nothing of importance left to fight against. Presbyterianism, a very citadel of Evangelicalism, is surrendering the stronghold to its skeptical enemies. Some of its most prominent theologians are rejecting the infallibility of the Bible, and thus leaving it no ground on which to stand. A critical instead of a believing spirit prevails, and the latitude of Broad Church Episcopalians is attracting many of the laity. Defense of the Bible as the only rule of faith and opposition to the pope as the antichrist and to the church of Rome as the sum of all abominations have been succeeded by Presbyterian laudation of a Roman Catholic archbishop at a recent celebration, and sympathetic treatment of the church of Rome as one of the greatest and most valuable of Christian agencies.

"The Contemporary Review writer undertakes to discover various remote causes of the 'waning of Evangelicalism,' but there is no need of going further or deeper than this waning of earnest religious belief. The vital warmth of faith is passing out of it. It has become skeptical, or at least a spirit of skepticism has entered into its theological seminaries and thence spread widely through its pulpits. The Baptists and Methodists, especially bred or stimulated by the Evangelical movement, are less affected, perhaps are little affected as yet by this destructive spirit of criticism; but it is devitalizing the Presbyterian Church. How could it be otherwise when this new movement, now so powerful in Presbyterianism, is directed against the very foundation of its faith and whole system of theology?

"That is enough to account for the 'waning' of which the Contemporary Review treats. What can remain of Evangelicalism if the source from which lone it draws its inspiration is degraded by its own appointed defenders into a polluted stream of superstition, delusion, fraud, and ignorance, having its springs in the groping of mere human intelligence incapable of penetrating the mystery of life?

"Without an infallible Bible, sent as a revelation direct from God, Evangelicalism must necessarily wane and die."

We have an "infallible Bible, sent as a direct revelation from God;" that much is secure. That is as real now as it was in the days when evangelical enthusiasm was at its height. But that infallible Book contains the query, "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" Faith is dying out, and we are in the days when "the Son of man cometh."

Retrogression.

BY C. H. K.

PRINCE BISMARCK, according to the New York World, May 19, makes the following statement concerning the United States: "America's change of front means retrogression in the high sense of civilization. That is the fact most to be regretted about this war. The war cannot have a wholesome result either to America or Europe. The United States will be forced to adopt an intermeddling policy leading to unavoidable friction. She thus abandons her traditional peace policy, and in order to maintain her position she must become a military and naval power—an expensive luxury which her geographical position rendered unnecessary."

There is much food for thought in these utterances. They are the words of one who for years has stood in the front rank among statesmen, and who has watched closely the history of this country, and knows whereof he speaks.

"Retrogression" is an awful word at any time, meaning, as it does, a "going backward," a "declining from a better to a worse state;" but it is especially so when used in this connection. "America's change of front means retrogression in the high sense of civilization." And from now on she will be "forced to adopt an intermeddling policy leading to unavoidable friction."

This "intermeddling policy" is the one that has marked the history of the nations of the Old World, and it has always led to "unavoidable friction."

Therefore, from this time on, America will be on the down grade, from "a better to a worse state," until it reaches the level of these other nations.

Bismarck's words are a confession that the "traditional peace policy" of the United States has lifted her, to put it no stronger, above the nations of Europe in the scale of civilization.

But now, forsaking this peaceful policy, she must adopt an "intermeddling policy" which must lead her to "unavoidable friction."

"Friction" means the "rubbing of one body against another." The continual rubbing together of two bodies that are in their nature combustible must produce fire.

And everybody knows that nations—especially Christian(?) nations—are “combustible.” To-day this world is like a vast powder magazine. So when this rubbing begins and is continued, sparks at least will follow, and falling somewhere in this vast powder magazine, the result will be a tremendous explosion.

Let everybody take note that “Old Glory” is no longer the emblem of a peace-following nation; and that the unseen hand of Destiny is even now writing “Ichabod” upon her banner.

Prayer and Battle.

“Oswego Daily Times,” May 6.

THE queen of Spain has asked the pope to pray for the success of the Spanish arms, and from a thousand pulpits in America invocations have gone up to heaven for Spanish defeat. At a recent church conference, in particular, the delegates fairly shouted for war against “Catholic Spain.”

What is a perplexed Providence to do—assuming that Providence hearkens to all the prayers of the faithful? . . .

What is the real “Christian spirit” in such a case as the present? Shall we, in view of last Sunday’s victory at Manila, sing a new doxology, as suggested by a flip-pant New Yorker?—

“Four hundred Spaniards gone below,
Praise God from whom all blessings flow.”

It is a hard question, nor does it seem to grow easier however fast the advance of civilization (with a big C). After all, are we a whit better than our savage forbears? A year—two years—ago, we were talking as if the day of battles and bloodshed had passed, to make way for the new era of arbitration. Who talks of arbitration now? If anyone, his voice is lost in the clamor for the latest news from the fleet, raised in the blood-thirsty hope that the remnant of the Spaniards may all have gone to Davy Jones’ locker.

RECENTLY a Spanish gunboat in a Cuban port fired into a British ship which was near by, loaded with coal, and apparently about to leave the harbor. Later the Spanish officials represented to the British authorities that the shot was an accident, and this explanation seems to have been accepted; on account, perhaps, of the fact that the shot took effect in the hull of the British vessel.

It is reported that the Jesuit order numbers 14,251 members. Of these 6,000 are priests who read mass and 4,416 are students and novitiates. Of the twenty-two provinces into which the world is divided Germany is the strongest, having 1,662 fathers and 1,141 students; Spain comes next with 1,002 and 1,070; France, 1,633 and 689; England 989 and 920; Italy 782 and 601. The smallest province is that of Mexico where there are only 186 members in all.

Natural Enough.

EDITOR SENTINEL: When the news of Admiral Dewey’s victory at Manila reached this country an officer of Commodore Schley’s Flying Squadron stated, so it was reported in one of the New York papers, that he would willingly have given his right arm for the privilege of being in that battle. The reason assigned was that he had been educated for that kind of work, and he wanted an opportunity to put his knowledge into practice; and, it is to be presumed, show how well he had learned his art.

This is natural enough. What is an education for if it is not to put the knowledge acquired to the use for which it was intended? This man has been taught how to kill men in the most scientific manner, and it seems to him that without the chance to do this work his life is a failure, and his time wasted.

Never before, in this country, was the spirit of militarism so prevalent as it is now. It is everywhere. Even the school children, boys and girls, in some places are being taught the use of weapons of war.

Who cannot see that the same desire to kill men will be the logical outcome of this, as in the case of the naval officer referred to above.

The chances are quite good that opportunities for this kind of work will not be lacking from now on. The war spirit has taken hold of Americans. It will not easily let go.

It is plainly seen at home and abroad, that the military and naval strength of this country must be increased so as to make this nation second to none in the whole world. We see the beginning; who will see the end, and what will it be?

C. H. K.

A New Map of the World.

EDITOR SENTINEL: The following editorial statement by the Chicago Times-Herald, April 27, was very significant when published. It is now doubly so in view of the threatened complications over the Spanish war:—

“Metaphorically, Europe is a powder magazine, which one spark would ignite. If a nation like France, for instance, should espouse the cause of Spain, all Europe would be ablaze with war within a fortnight. A new map of the world would have to be made when hostilities were ended, and on that map there would be no such country as Spain.”

There will, indeed, have to be a new map of the world after this looked-for conflict of the nations, and it can be said just as confidently that on that map there will be no such country as the United States. For “the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up,” and there will follow “a new heaven and a new earth,” where there will be “no more sea.”

J. D. BRADLEY.

Studies in French History.—24.

"CHARLES the Sixth," began Professor Carman, as he called the class to order, "was named 'The Well-beloved.' Poor boy! he took his father's throne when only twelve years old. He was a light-hearted and handsome youth, and his uncles did everything they could to prevent him from taking any interest in public affairs, for they wanted the reins of government in their own hands. These men did not have the real interests of the government at hand; all they wanted was to get rich at the expense of the people; so that all the benefits which Charlie the Wise had brought about, soon gave place to oppression and unjust taxation."

"Didn't the people complain any?" asked Edward Palmeter.

"They did, indeed, and most bitterly; so the royal dukes made them fair promises which they at once proceeded to break, when the danger to themselves was over, and then they punished the ones who had dared to complain, most cruelly."

"Probably they were killed, weren't they?" asked Milly Brown.

"O yes, and then sewed up in sacks and thrown into the river."

"About this time, the patriot Van Artevelde was having trouble with the Count of Flanders. So the young king's uncle took sides in the quarrel against the people of Flanders, and in a terrible battle which followed, the patriot was killed, and his army defeated with dreadful slaughter. Then the foolish uncle took poor little King Charles to gaze upon the awful sight of a field of mangled and dying men, giving the child to understand that he had won the great victory."

"I wonder the boy did not almost lose his reason—I'm sure I should have!" exclaimed Julia March.

"It was a severe shock to him, indeed, and he never seemed quite himself ever after it; in fact, he soon began to manifest those strange traits which showed unmistakably that insanity had marked him for its victim."

"O, the poor fellow! did he really go mad?" asked Milly Brown, shuddering.

"He did, finally, though not until after a number of years. But to show you how sadly unbalanced his mind must have been, I will just mention as an example of his strange freaks, his causing the city of Courtrai to be robbed and burned, and this when he was only fourteen years old, and for a cause that was too trivial to mention. You can form no idea, perhaps, of what that rash order from his boyish lips meant. Immediately the streets of the ill-fated city were filled with a howling, frenzied mob. Neither women nor little children were spared and finally nothing was left to mark the spot where a few hours before was a pleasant town, but smouldering ruins."

"Was it this boy king, who formed the project of invading England? It seems as if I had read lately something of him in connection with this crazy plan," said Joe Palmeter.

"Yes; or it was during his reign, and a wild scheme it was, which resulted, of course, in a dismal failure—dismal at least to the poor fellows who had to be outrageously taxed to bear the expense of it."

"We were all talking about Charles the Sixth, this morning, and each one tried to tell some fact about him," said Edna Phillips.

"Well now, Edna, suppose you just mention briefly what was said."

"Mother said that once he got to feeling so big and pompous that he made the soldiers take the gates of Paris down and lay them on the ground for him to pass over, so the people might understand how far superior to them he was. And Uncle Jack said that the king forbade the citizens of Paris stretching chains across the streets as their custom had been, so as to keep people out of their city whom they did not want in. He said the people considered this as one of their few especial rights."

"What did you find out, Edna?"

"Not much; only that he married when very young a vain woman named Isabella, and that it was a sadly unfortunate marriage."

"Good!" said Professor Carman. "I sincerely hope you will each make these lessons the subject of conversation. It is the very best way to keep them fixed in your minds; and if we have our minds stored with useful facts and historical truths, there will not be much room left for trash."

"It seems to me, professor, that if King Charles became a maniac, that left the country without any king," said practical Jack.

"It was in a sad condition, indeed. The Duke of Orleans, who was the king's brother, and the Duke of Burgundy, his uncle, were in a perpetual struggle for the chief power. Then when the old uncle died, his son, John the Fearless, entered into the unhappy strife, with great eagerness. Meanwhile, with a crazy man at the helm, poor France became a hot-bed of strife and robbery and violence."

"Was he insane all the time, or only occasionally?" asked Julia March.

"No; he had intervals of comparative soundness of mind. His first serious attack was when the young king was only twenty-four. How sad it seems to think of his unhappy fate: his madness incurable, his friends false, and not one true heart to befriend or care for him, for as Edna has told you, his marriage was a very unhappy one.

"Now, as considerable remains yet to be learned concerning this unhappy monarch, we will stop for to-day, and ask Edward Barnaby to write a few of the most important facts of this king's life which we have not mentioned to-day, and read to us next Tuesday what he has written."

"I'm afraid I can't find any facts to help me," said Edward, slowly, blushing. "You know, professor, we haven't many books at our house."

"I think I can lend you some helps, my boy," said his teacher, kindly, as he dismissed the class.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

"A Time of Trouble Such as Never Was."

"MAMA, when we were talking about making an image to the beast, you said that a decree would go forth to put to death those who would keep God's commandments in spite of the laws of the state; but that before it was carried into effect, the Lord would come, and deliver his own."

"Yes, Charlie. Though the world will be arrayed against commandment-keepers, and they will be looked upon as troublers in Israel, as Elijah was, yet the time of trouble such as never was, will fall upon the world, and not on the servants of the Most High. Please read what Daniel says of this time. Dan. 12:1,2.

"And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time, and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."

"The next verse speaks of the resurrection. Michael is another name for Christ as you will find by comparing 1 Thess. 4:16, John 5:25 and Jude 9. The voice of the archangel is the voice of the Son of God, and the archangel is called Michael. So Christ stands up, or reigns for his people, and delivers them in the midst of a time of trouble such as never was."

"Mama, what will make this terrible time of trouble?"

"The cause of the trouble will be the same cause that has always resulted in trouble—the forsaking of God, the transgression of his law. In forsaking God, the world puts itself from under God's protection, and abandons itself to the will of the powers of evil. We have already spoken of the agency of evil spirits in deceiving the people. These will act a large part in bringing about this time of trouble; for one result of forsaking God and his law will be world-wide war. You may read what the apostle John, in vision, saw done by evil spirits in gathering the nations to war. Rev. 16:14."

"They are the spirits of devils working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty.'"

"You know, Charlie, that the war spirit is now working among all nations. The most terrible war implements have been invented, and nations are groaning under taxation to sustain vast armies. Our own nation is involved with Spain in an apparently righteous cause—that of delivering the oppressed Cubans; but before long, all nations will be in bloody strife, that will have no semblance of righteousness to justify or excuse it. James says, 'From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts? . . . Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war.'"

"I know, mama, that when war does become general, it will be more terrible than any war of the past."

"Yes. It will not only bring frightful suffering to soldiers, but to those who do not go to the battlefield. Famine, pestilence, outrage, devastation, and death follow in the wake of war."

"Mama, how soon do you think these terrible troubles will break on the world?"

"I cannot tell, Charlie, how soon the world-wide aspect will appear; but, no doubt, the beginning of the time of trouble is upon us. The rich oppress the poor; the poor are becoming desperate. There will not only be war on the battlefield, between armed enemies, but war between rich and poor. James says, 'Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. . . . Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days.' Only yesterday, I saw an account of a bread-riot in Italy. You remember Coxey's army of unemployed men, who a few years ago marched to Washington. There are mutterings of the coming socialistic outbreak, when the cry of 'Bread or blood' will be the watchword of men and women made desperate by starvation."

"Mama, when all these horrors come upon us, who will have time to think of Sunday laws, and of persecuting Sabbath-keepers?"

"These very horrors will be attributed to Sabbath-keepers. They will be charged with bringing down the wrath of God on men."

"Why? What for?"

"Because they refuse to receive the traditions of men, and persist in keeping God's commandment. You must remember, Charlie, that Satan and his hosts are working to marshal the whole world against Christ. Those who stand loyal to God against the laws that Satan has instigated to force allegiance to him, will be a target for his malignity. Men will be deceived as they have been in the past, and will think they do God service in ridding the earth of the just, but the prince of evil will know what he is doing. He will work on the superstitions of men as he did in the Dark Ages, misapply God's Word, and hold up the innocent as malefactors. All the old agencies for deceiving the world are becoming active. Wizards, necromancers, mediums, astrologers, diviners, miracle-workers, etc., are beginning to swarm over the earth. False prophets will tell the people that a millennium of peace and plenty is just beyond these terrible troubles, and that the silencing and subjection of those who break the Sunday law, is the only thing that stands in the way of its realization. Then the enmity of the world will focus on God's commandment-keeping people. You may read Rev. 12:17."

"And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ."

"The people of God will be tried as by fire. Daniel says, 'Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand.'"

"But, mama, I thought you said they would be delivered."

"So they will, my boy. They will be tried; but not destroyed. Satan would delight to have Christ come, and find no living witness; but the martyrs of the past suffice to show his purpose, and so in the very midst of falling plagues, of war, pestilence, famine, and the general upheaval of earthly things, the heavens will depart 'as a scroll when it is rolled together,' and the King of kings will appear in awful majesty, with all his holy angels. Then the righteous dead will be raised, and the living children of God will be 'caught up together with them to meet the Lord in the air.' A happy day will this be for those whose names are found written in the Book of Life; for they are the ones that shall be delivered out of the time of trouble such as never was."

New Tracts.

THE three new numbers of the Apples of Gold Library treat of The Power of God, The Sabbath, and Coming of the Lord. Following is a description:—

Kept by the Power of God, No. 49, price 25c per 100. In this tract we are shown in verse and scripture how, when, where, why, and from what we are "kept by the power of God." Judging from the depth of thought and earnestness expressed, the author wrote from experience gained by a living faith. The reader will find in this tract much that will inspire to a life of faith.

The Day of the Sabbath, No. 50, price $1 per 100. A series of earnest questions on the subject of the Sabbath, covering most of its scripture phases, and bringing the truth home to every candid mind in the most direct, convincing, and least prejudicial way. Many of these questions have been successfully used by the author, Eld. S. W. Raymond, in his experience in the past.

The Heralds of His Coming, No. 51, price $1.50 per 100. Presents in a brief, yet clear and convincing way the fact that our Lord is coming again, the manner of his coming, and many of the chief signs which conclusively show that his coming is near. It is illustrated with a helpful diagram.

The coming of Christ is the greatest event before the world to-day, and this little tract is sent out with a prayer that it may, under the blessing of the Lord, convince men that this is really so.

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

(SECOND EDITION.)
BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrilling in many respects than a romance. But most, if not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, JUNE 2, 1898.

Do not skip the article beginning on page 340 because of its length. It is of historic interest, as well as a valuable presentation of the principles demanding separation of the state from religion. Long articles are printed in the SENTINEL not because they are long, but because they are good.

THE examination of volunteers for service in the army and navy, which has been in progress at the recruiting stations since the President's call for troops, has emphasized the fact that bicycle riding, as commonly indulged in, is detrimental to health. Derangements of vital organs of the body sufficient to debar the victim from enlistment on the ground of physical unfitness, were in many cases directly traceable to the cramping caused by the common bicycle posture. The bicycle rider should take pains to sit up straight.

VIEWED from any other than a diplomatic standpoint, some of the ways of civil government are mysterious. For example, the state forbids two persons engaging in a fight for pugilistic supremacy, but is now itself engaged in a fight for supremacy with the forces of Spain. The captain of a filibustering ship is held in prison by the Government for doing exactly what the Government itself is now doing with all the forces at its command. The state hangs a person for settling his differences with another person by killing him, and then proceeds itself to settle its differences with a foreign power by killing the subjects of the latter by wholesale. We wonder if there is more than one rule of moral conduct for citizens and members of society in this world. One—the Decalogue—is all that we have seen so far.

THE Universal Peace Union was recently granted free use of rooms in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, for the pursuance of their work, which they did by hanging up the Spanish flag and writing a letter of warm sympathy to the Spanish premier and the Queen Regent. Quite naturally, the Government authorities did not take kindly to peace work conducted on this line. The Government refused to transmit the letter, and the Spanish flag was torn down by indignant citizens as an emblem which had no business in Independence Hall.

We believe in peace; but not on the basis of sympathy for Spain or regard for the Spanish flag. Sympathy for Spain in her present attitude is not sympathy with the cause of peace and justice; and peace work conducted upon that line will not attain nor deserve success. Efforts for peace should be made beneath the banner and in the name of the Prince of Peace; and this means the exaltation of his principles as the proper principles of human conduct.

SOME W. C. T. U. ladies of New England have sent a protest to Secretary Long against the use of the battle cry, "Remember the Maine," which has become so popular. It does not savor of the proper spirit, they say, which should animate American sailors and soldiers in this war. In view of which a New York City daily raises the query, Why not? and inquires if these people would have the brave sailor and soldier lads go into action chanting the mellifluous phrases of Sir Edwin Arnold. True enough; what consistency would there be between a peace phrase in the lips and an instrument of death in the hands, about to be brought into use? If Americans must engage in the business of killing the Spanish, we can think of no more appropriate phrase to accompany such action than "Remember the Maine."

THE Knights of Labor have announced opposition to the "deals" which force up the price of the necessities of life, by resolutions denouncing "the system which allows Leiter and his backers to succeed in placing a tax on 70,000,000 of people in this country, and in placing the staple article of food almost beyond the reach of millions of working people;"

and demanding that Congress "enact laws which will make it impossible for any one man or body of men to corner or to gamble in food products."

Gambling, to be legal in this country, must be done on a large scale. The Knights of Labor think gambling in wheat is as bad as any other kind of gambling, or worse; and have petitioned Congress for a remedy; but all such efforts are made in the face of the discouraging fact that human selfishness and greed, backed up by wealth, always find some way to evade any legislation that can be enacted for the protection of their victims. Only Omnipotent power can say to these enemies of human happiness, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further.

THE threatened departure from the traditional policy of this nation, bequeathed by Washington and others of its founders—a departure which seems certain to be made—will be a stepping down from the heights of its greatness and prosperity, to the arena of international contention and strife. Founded upon the principles of civil and religious freedom, and pursuing a policy of non-interference in the affairs of other powers, this nation has been a beacon light to all mankind; and from all lands men who prize the privileges and principles of free government, have contributed to its greatness and strength. Now it is proposed to abandon this attitude and this policy, as something that has been outgrown, and which would hinder the nation's progress to a field of greater usefulness and glory. But that which has made the nation great, cannot now be discarded without the loss of that which has been gained by it. National greatness is not secured by numbers or by armaments or by the arts of diplomacy. It is secured by strict adherence to the principles of free government and to a policy of peace. It is not a coincidence that a national departure from the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and of the Constitution, and from the traditional policy of peace, should be almost simultaneous in their occurrence.

IN the Decalogue, God addresses individuals only.

THE law is all right as a fence, but it is of no use as a walking-stick.

WHEN a nation tries to make itself Christian, it always makes itself anti-Christian.

NOT the Spaniards in Cuba, but the saloons in America, are the real curse of the Western hemisphere.

THERE is no person so dextrous that he can wield both the sword of steel and the "sword of the Spirit" at the same time.

IF professors of Christianity had never gone into politics, the professedly Christian Church would never have been responsible for religious persecution.

"REVERENCE for law" does not go to the foundation of good government. Without reverence for right, there would be few laws in the land that were worthy of reverence.

To say that the government is superior to the individuals who have formed it, is to say that the creator is inferior to the thing which he creates. But even God cannot create a thing superior to himself.

PUBLIC sentiment should not be confounded with Christian sentiment. Public sentiment may be manufactured by various expedients known to politicians and others; but Christian sentiment comes altogether from the Word of God.

THE question of how much rest a person needs, and when it should be taken, is one to be settled by the physicians and not by the preachers, if it is to be settled outside of individual preferences.

"CIVIC righteousness," as defined by its advocates, is something altogether inferior to the righteousness which will count with God. It is, in fact, a counterfeit, and goes hand in hand with the counterfeit sabbath.

"EXCEPT your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees," said Jesus Christ, "ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven."

What was the matter with the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees? Oh, it was all on the outside. It was all a matter of forms and ceremonies and respectable appearance. It was not a matter of the heart.

And this must be the case with all righteousness—so called—which is the product of civil law. The law cannot change the heart; it can affect only the outward deportment.

Reform by law can go no deeper than the outward deportment. But—to paraphrase the Saviour's words—Except your righteousness shall exceed that of a pious and respectable outward deportment, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven. Or, in other words, Except your righteousness shall be greater than "civic righteousness" ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven.

Civic righteousness—the righteousness of outward forms, of scrupulous regard for the letter of the law, and of pious look and demeanor—did not stand very high in the estimation of Jesus of Nazareth. And it does not stand any higher in his sight now than it did when he rebuked the Pharisees and Scribes. The only righteousness we want is that which bears the genuine stamp.

Reverence for Law.

"REVERENCE for law" is a very essential thing in good government, but it is not the foundation stone.

Reverence for law is not in itself an energizing, purifying force in government. Its value in government is not intrinsic, but is conferred by something else.

Reverence for law never shook the throne of a despot, or broke the shackles from a slave.

Reverence for law did not inspire the writing of the Declaration of Independence.

If our forefathers had always adhered to the doctrine of reverence for law, the world would never have heard of that Declaration, nor of Magna Charta.

The pathway from despotism to liberty in government has been along the line of revolution, and often squarely across that of reverence for law.

Law, in itself, is not entitled to reverence. If it were, then the worst law ever enacted would be entitled to it equally with the best, and the "three worthies" in Babylon of old did wrong in not worshipping the golden image.

In the Declaration of Independence, our forefathers took a step from the standpoint of reverence for law, to that of reverence for right. And it was a very long step; it meant revolution.

The law of Great Britain said one thing; but right, as they asserted it, said another thing. Right said that human governments were instituted to preserve the unalienable rights with which all men are endowed by the Creator. From the standpoint of reverence for law this was treason; but in the conflict, right prevailed.

Reverence for right is the pole star of good government. It cannot be lost sight of without a resulting deviation from the course which leads to national prosperity.

A person who has no reverence for right, can have no true reverence for anything.

All Christian institutions are founded in right, and hence are entitled to reverence, irrespective of any law in their behalf; nor can any such law contribute at all to the reverence felt for them by human beings.

But there are religious institutions which have no foundation in right; and it is now sought to secure reverence for these from the people by pointing to them as being part of the law of the land. Prominent among these is the institution of Sunday rest.

In behalf of this institution very much is said about the necessity of reverence for law; but nothing at all about the necessity of reverence for right. All the right in the case has to be assumed; it does not rest upon evidence.

Reverence for right is reverence for the higher law of God,—that law which says nothing about the first day as a day of rest, but commands the observance of the seventh day. As against that law, and against the requisites of good government, the doctrine of reverence for human law can be of no force at all.

Which Is the Safest Course?

HAVING had Washington's advice against the United States ever forming any entangling alliance with European or any other foreign power, it will not be amiss to set down, for comparison, the arguments now offered in favor of such alliance and indeed directly against Washington's advice. Then the reader can estimate the relative weight of argument, and wisdom, of the two courses advised.

Hon. Richard Olney, who was attorney general and secretary of state in President Cleveland's cabinet, writes in the Atlantic Monthly, thus:—

"The rule of international isolation for America was formulated by Washington, was embalmed in the earnest and solemn periods of the Farewell Address, and has come down to succeeding generations with all the immense prestige attaching to the injunctions of the Father of his country and of the statesmen and soldiers who having first aided him to free the people of thirteen independent communities, then joined him in the ever greater task of welding the incoherent mass into one united nation. The Washington rule, in the sense in which it has been commonly understood and actually applied, could hardly have been adhered to more faithfully if it had formed part of the text of the Constitution.

"What is it that these utterances enjoin us not to do? What rule of abstinence do they lay down for this country? The rule is stated with entire explicitness. It is that this country shall not participate in the ordinary vicissitudes of European politics, and shall not make a permanent alliance with any foreign power. It is coupled with the express declaration that extraordinary emergencies may arise to which the rule does not apply, and that when they do arise temporary alliances with foreign powers may be properly resorted to. Further, not only are proper exceptions to the rule explicitly recognized but its author, with characteristic caution and wisdom, carefully limits the field which it covers by bounds which in practice are either accidentally or intentionally disregarded.

"If the Government can do its duty with an ally, where it must fail without, and even if it can more securely and efficiently do that duty with an ally than it can without, it would be not mere folly, but recreancy as well, not to make the alliance.

"If we shall sooner or later—and we certainly shall—shake off the spell of the Washington legend and cease to act the rôle of a sort of international recluse, it will not follow that former alliances with other nations for permanent or even temporary purposes will soon or often be found expedient. On the other hand, with which of them we shall as a rule practically coöperate cannot be doubtful. From the point of view of our material interests alone, our best friend as well as most formidable foe is that world-wide empire whose navies rule the seas and which on our northern frontier controls a dominion itself imperial in extent and capabilities. There is the same result if we consider the present crying need of our commercial interests.

"But our material interests only point in the same direction as considerations of a higher and less selfish character. There is a patriotism of race as well as of country, and the Anglo-American is as little likely to be indifferent to the one as to the other. Family quarrels there have been heretofore and doubtless will be again; and the two peoples, at the safe distance which the broad Atlantic interposes, take with each other liberties of speech which only the fondest and dearest relatives indulge in. Nevertheless, that they would be found standing together against any alien foe by whom either was menaced with destruction or irreparable calamity, it is not permissible to doubt. Nothing less could be expected of the close community between them in origin, speech, thought, literature, institutions, ideals."

Lyman Abbott, editor of The Outlook, published in the North American Review, an article on "The Basis of an Anglo American Alliance," in which he says:—

"The time has therefore passed when the United States can say, 'We are sufficient unto ourselves, we will go our way; the rest of the world may go its way.' The question is not, 'Shall we avoid entangling alliances?' We are entangled with all the nations of the globe: by commerce, by manufactures, by race and religious affiliations, by popular and political sympathies. The question for us to determine is not whether we shall live and work in fellowship with European nations, but whether we shall choose our fellowship with wise judgment and definite purpose or whether we shall allow ourselves to drift into such fellowships as political accident or the changing incidents of human history may direct. . . .

"It is for this reason I urge the establishment of a good understanding between the United States and England, in the hope that in time it will grow to a more formal alliance—civic, commercial, and industrial, rather than naval or military—and yet an alliance that will make us, for the purposes of our international life, one people, though not politically one nation. . . .

"It is true that in a sense the United States is neither a Christian nor an Anglo-Saxon nation. It is not officially Christian, if thereby is meant a nation which gives political or financial advantage to one religion over another. It is not Anglo Saxon, if thereby is meant a nation which sets itself to confer political power upon one race over another. But though it is officially neither Christian nor Anglo-Saxon, it is practically both. Its ethical standards are not those of Mohammedanism or Confucianism, but those of Christianity. Its ruling force in the country, educational, political, and on the whole commercial, is not Celtic, nor Slavic, nor Semitic, nor African, nor Mongolian, but Anglo-Saxon. Thus in its religious spirit, though not altogether in its religious institutions, in its practical leadership, though not in the constituent elements of its population, and in its national history and the genesis of its political institutions, the United States is of kin to Great Britain. The two represent the same essential political ideals—they are both democratic; they both represent the same ethical ideals—they are Christian; and they both represent the same race leadership—they are Anglo Saxon. . . .

"It [an Anglo-American Alliance] would create a new confederation based on principles and ideas, not on tradition, and bounded by the possibilities of human development, not by geographical lines. It would give a new significance to the motto E Pluribus Unum, and would create a new United States of the World, of which the United States of America would be a component part.

Who can measure the advantage to liberty, to democracy, to popular rights and popular intelligence, to human progress, to a free and practical Christianity, which such an alliance would bring with it? Invincible against enemies, illimitable in influence, at once inspiring and restraining each other, these two nations, embodying the energy, the enterprise, and the conscience of the Anglo-Saxon race, would by the mere fact of their coöperation produce a result in human history which would surpass all that present imagination can conceive or present hope anticipate."

In an interview a member of President McKinley's cabinet is reported as follows:—

"Under a broad and liberal territorial government established by the United States the people of the Philippine Islands will eventually be raised up to a condition of enlightenment and civilization that will make them able to establish a firm government.

"It is time that the people of this American Republic began to realize the greatness of their mission among the nations of the world. They must broaden their horizon, enlarge their views. Some people in their shortsightedness say that we cannot hold the Philippines without interfering with our established Monroe doctrine. So much the worse for the Monroe doctrine. Others say that we cannot hold outlying territory under the Constitution. We amended the Constitution at the close of the last war this country was engaged in. Why cannot we amend it again?

"An amendment to the effect that the United States may extend a protectorate over the islands of the sea (without assuring them a state government) for the purpose of affording the inhabitants thereof a good government, security to life and property, freedom of religion, etc., till they are able to set up a stable government of their own, would be agreed to by the people of this country if it were ever submitted to them.

"At the close of this war with Spain the United States will hold a very different position among the nations from that which it occupied previously. Our destiny is to extend the sphere of Republican government. Our Government will have an opportunity to show whether or not it appreciates the importance of that mission.

"These great questions have been brought to the front very suddenly. But I have no doubt that the American people will use their opportunity wisely and well."

In individual life when a person has great influence, he always lessens it by trying to exert it. It is admirable to have great influence for right principles. But it is possible for a person to become proud of his influence and be ambitious to make it felt. Such pride and ambition, however, is just as subtle and dangerous as is any other sort. And all this is true of nations, which are but collections of individuals.

Right influence is most powerfully exerted, whether by individuals or nations, always in quietness and humility.

"Cromwell, I charge thee, Put away ambition.
By that sin fell the angels."

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

I AM not quite sure of my dates, but I think it was that same summer of '75 that a great temperance meeting was held on the fair ground at Bloomington, Ill., at which I was invited to speak for the growing boys of the nation; Hon. B. Gratz Brown, of Missouri, being announced to give an address on "Prohibition." The Cold Water Armies of the State were invited, and came by special train from every direction, dressed in nobby little uniforms of navy blue, carrying rattans instead of guns, for we had before this time seen that the gun and the military maneuver were not in harmony with the principles of peace which we believed, and must be repudiated by us as an organization.

The speakers of that meeting had arrived the evening before, and were taken in a carriage to meet the companies of the C. W. A. as they arrived. The city was full of people; long before sunrise they had been pouring in from all the surrounding country, and Mr. Brown and I had the felicity of trying to make a crowd hear, which by actual count of admission tickets (not for money, however), numbered more than twenty thousand. I state this to give my readers some idea of the interest that attached to the discussion of the temperance problem in those days.

A little later in the annals of our work, Mrs. Beal, of Wisconsin, came forward with an improvement on the Cold Water Army idea in the "Band of Hope." At least, in some features it was an improvement; not entirely up to the need, however. But the work grew in spite of all blunders and apparent failures, until Anna Gordon and Mrs. Rice, who are now so well known by the children of the world, found out how to select and combine the best from all former organizations into the Loyal Temperance Legion, and we became satisfied that we had the most complete system for training the young idea that could be developed in our generation, at least.

It has been the rule in the growth of the plan of work of the W. C. T. U. that one department calls for another almost ad infinitum; the limit of probable extension being found only at the boundary line of human needs.

"Applied gospel" might well be the name given to all our methods. We believed the salvation of Christ to be the one panacea for all human ills, and purposed to bring it to bear on all those sore places upon the body, politic and social, which had not as yet been "mollified with ointment" through other channels. When we have found a field thoroughly occupied by the church in any direction, we have not concerned ourselves so much with it; but we have believed ourselves especially called to supply the connecting links along the various lines of church effort, by which the truth, of which the church was the recognized depository, could be made practical to those who in every condition, rank, tongue, and nation the world over were perishing for lack of it. Wherever the church in its regular methods had failed to reach the people, we must go; whatever it had neglected that salvation required we must perform; and when we found that for any reason the acknowledged teachers in any school of practical knowledge were withholding any essential truth from the people, then it was our office to promulgate that truth everywhere, anywhere that we could find ears to hear.

We have gone on the principle that was recognized by Paul when he stated his purpose to know nothing but Christ. Dogma of any sort, any points of necessary disagreement among denominations, we were sure must be avoided in all our associations. Many of us have labored together from the first without as much as asking "What church do you belong to?" Christ as All and in all was a large enough theme for us, and upon this we were always at one.

No more interesting study could be opened to the analytic mind than that of the machinery of W. C. T. U. departments; finding the logical beginning of each, and tracing it out from thence through divisions and subdivisions as it has at last become manifest in local district, state and national methods. It would be a speedy means of learning a new lesson in charity by those who do not understand what are the motives of W. C. T. U. work, either because they have never had the opportunity, or have been too prejudiced.

As we came partially at least to comprehend what was involved in physical ruin, the fact that Christ came to save the whole man to the uttermost assumed a new meaning; and "bodily religion" the "whole gospel for the whole man under all conditions," became as watchwords, and the old commission, "Go ye," took on an imperative mood, even in the lips of the most gentle of us all.

In the work for the children we soon saw that those who most needed the teaching (if there could be any such distinction) were not being reached at all; and many were the questions which arose as to how we could get out to this little "every creature"—to the children of the unchristian and the unchaste, as well as the worldly, to whom temperance was a by-word.

In our efforts to go out to this whole infantile world, the Band of Hope was soon supplemented by a department of Sunday-school Temperance Instruction under the superintendence of Miss Lucia Kimball, of Chicago, who devoted many years of her bright beautiful life to the most heroic efforts to win a place and recognition from ministerial bodies and Sunday-school lesson committees for temperance, as a real sound fruit of the Spirit; and when this had been in a measure accomplished, still there was left a large majority of the children who were hopelessly entrenched behind an environment which we could not penetrate; and to an organization less determined, less fruitful in expedients and resources, less rich in the All-things of the Holy Spirit, the cause would have seemed lost, crippled, or at least lame beyond remedy. But we were too earnest to know discouragement, and

He who said "according to your faith," had seen the need, recognized the determination, and had provided a woman to meet it in Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, of Boston, Mass. By many rare gifts of opportunity, culture, and by peculiar steadfastness of conviction she had been made ready to seize the opportune moment.

IF laws could make men good, man could become his own saviour, and the fundamental doctrine of heathenism would be vindicated as truth.

The Everlasting Gospel.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

IN the last four articles of this series attention was called to the solemn warning found in Rev. 14:9-11 against the worshiping of the beast and his image, and the receiving of the beast's mark in the forehead or in the hand. It was pointed out in part why it could be that the unmingled wrath of God could be poured out in the manner described. Further study of this question will make it still plainer.

The text above referred to reads: "And the third angel followed them," etc. Going back to the sixth verse and reading from thence onward, we have brought to view three angels, the one mentioned in verse 6 being the first of the three. Of the second and third angels it is said that they "followed" the first angel. This does not mean that they followed each other in succession, each taking up his work when the preceding one had finished his particular work. The meaning of this word "followed" will be seen by referring to 1 Cor. 10:4, where precisely the same word is used. The text reads, "And did all drink the same spiritual drink, for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ." The marginal rendering of the word "followed" is "went with them." Thus it will be seen that the word "followed" in the Scripture before us signifies "to go with." It is important to bear this in mind, as the meaning of them will be more clearly seen. It is as though it read, "And the second angel went with him," etc.; "And the third angel went with them." The idea, therefore, is that soon after the first one begins his work, the second and third angels unite themselves to the first angel, and then they all go together; their messages becoming a three-fold message.

This proves that the people to whom the message of the third angel is proclaimed have the others proclaimed to them also.

It has been proven in these articles (1) that the beast of Rev. 13:1-10 and the two-horned beast of verse 11 are respectively the papacy and the United States; and (2) that Sunday is the mark of the papacy. It has also been clearly proven that the work having in view the enforcing of Sunday upon the consciences of the people is now being done. Therefore the conclusion is inevitable that the three messages under consideration are to be proclaimed at the same time and to the same people.

That being so, the attention of the people must now be called to these messages just as they read. That this is being done no one who cares to investigate can possibly deny.

What is the burden of the message of the first angel? It reads (Rev. 14:6,7), "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth, to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people; saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea and the fountains of waters."

There is only one gospel by which sinners are to be brought into harmony with their Creator—the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is therefore the gospel of Christ that is thus proclaimed in the scripture under consideration; not the gospel in part, but the whole.

That being so, it is evident that the words, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea and the fountains of waters," include all that God can possibly require, and all that man can possibly render—no more, no less.

It is perfectly natural that when the prophecy of Rev. 13:11-18 is being fulfilled and the work of compelling homage to the beast (papacy) by the enforced reception of its mark (Sunday) is going on, the gospel, demanding that worship be rendered to the Creator, to whom it belongs, should be proclaimed.

It must be clear to every candid mind that with the preaching of the everlasting gospel at this time, there can be left no possible excuse for anyone's worshiping the creature instead of the Creator.

What does the gospel require?—That we fear God and give glory to him. Anything that detracts from this cannot possibly be the gospel.

Before pointing out what is involved in the thought of fearing God and giving glory to him, it will be well to remark that at this time when the gospel is to be preached in the form in which it is here given, there must be some object, other than God, that man has been fearing; some object to whom or to which man has been giving glory. And further, we can see from the prophecy that the attempt at least will be made to continue this.

It is also natural that this gospel should be preached at this time, and with direct reference to the prophecy before us, in which the question of religious liberty is involved. When the consciences of all men are thus sought to be enslaved, even of those who in theory believe in religious liberty and in separation of church and state, what more fitting thing could be done—what less could a gracious God do—than to cause the gospel of Christ to be preached, through which alone true religious liberty can ever be obtained.

The Absurdity of It.

BY H. F. PHELPS.

SOME people seem determined to make themselves, and all others, believe that there is such a thing as a "public conscience," and that said "public conscience" is very much disturbed by the possible opening of the doors of the Trans-Mississippi Exposition on Sunday.

In the Minneapolis Times, of May 21, is found a report of the proceedings of the Presbyterian General Assembly at Winona, Ind. A resolution was adopted asking that the doors of the exposition "shall not be opened on the Lord's day;" and asking the directors to "announce that decision so that the public conscience shall be at rest on the subject."

Now there can be no such thing as a "public conscience," except it be the combination of the individual consciences. The consciences of the individuals, considered individually and taken collectively, must determine whether there is any special unrest upon this subject. Now, the truth is that there is no such unrest as would be indicated by the resolution, except it may be in the minds of a few misguided religious zealots. As a matter of fact, this nation is a nation of Sabbath-breakers, and no amount resolutions will make it otherwise. Nothing but the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ as it is in Christ will make a Sabbath-keeper out of a Sabbath-breaker.

To an outsider there appears to be a very peculiar condition of things in the assembly. They were very much disturbed over the possible opening of the doors of the exposition, and adopted a resolution against such a desecration of the supposed sacredness of Sunday, and then they "turned down" another resolution "urging that President McKinley order that no unnecessary Sabbath work be done by the army and navy in the present war, and that battles be not begun on Sunday." It is stated that one of the "commissioners protested that the assembly should not advertise its folly by adopting the resolutions." But the assembly did "advertise its folly" by adopting the one, and its good sense by turning down the other.

However, there is an inconsistency in the action of the assembly which will be apparent on a moment's reflection. If it is wrong for men, women and children—if it is wrong for Christians—to visit the exposition and view the wonderful works of art on Sunday, why, in the name of true Christianity, would it not also be a wrong thing for Christians to fight on Sunday? Why would it not be wrong for them to fight on any day of the week? And if it is right for Christians to fight on Sunday, and it appears that this assembly thinks that to be the case, for they turned down the resolution against commencing battles on Sunday; then most certainly it cannot be a wrong thing for the directors to keep open doors, nor for the people to visit the exposition on Sunday.

But all this goes to show the utter absurdity in which religionists involve themselves in attempting to regulate the consciences of their fellow men by resolutions or coercive measures. It also emphasizes the folly of their intermeddling with governmental affairs. If civil governments deem it necessary to go to war, even on Sunday, and directors of corporations will to open their doors every day in the week, let them do so, for such is the right of each. But let ministers preach the gospel, and let all live the gospel. For in the doing of this they will do far more toward the accomplishment of the purposes of the gospel than anything else they can do. If they do this they will forever leave off this continued effort in the using of coercive measures, or in the doing of that which inevitably tends toward coercive measures. Will our Presbyterian brethren consider this carefully.

An Unfortunate Comparison.—No. 1.

BY JOHN D. BRADLEY.

It was hardly to have been expected that the national game of "ball" would become the redeeming virtue of the American people, or that this country would ever have its sports cited as the convincing evidence of the civilization, bravery, and enlightenment of its inhabitants. Nevertheless, one of the leading journals of the country (the Chicago Times-Herald), and one that is usually quite sound in its conclusions, has attempted in good faith to score a point against the Spanish people and in favor of the American people by a comparison of the national sports of the two countries.

It says truthfully that "sport after all is a serious matter," and that "the play hour and the manner of its spending, recreation, and the character of its indulgences, are considerations which become national in importance." It then portrays the brutality and cowardice of the Spanish bull fight in which the matador fights "with an inferior with tremendous advantage in his favor," and how "every lad from Barcelona to Cadiz dreams—sleeping and waking—of the hero in the ring, and imbibes in infancy, cultivates in growth and exercises in manhood the essentials of the ideal character." This character must first be cruel and then cowardly. All Spaniards, however, are not bull-fighters, the majority being even too cowardly for that, so that there is but one matador to many spectators, the spectators being fighters only "in their souls."

It then proceeds to compare with this the national game of America which "is said to be baseball, although football has gained a wide popularity." Its remarks are confined particularly to baseball, although we see no reason why they are not just as applicable to football.

The American in attending the national game finds the "very essence of his enjoyment in the equal terms—of intelligence and muscle and training—on which the contestants meet." The participant in the game "is training good human muscle and developing good human brain in the only way which can yield a nation of men. He is matching human against human—not man against brute.”

No one having the slightest acquaintance with the subject will wonder that football was shunned in this connection, notwithstanding its “wide popularity.” It is virtually admitted, however, to be as much the American game as baseball, but whether it be admitted or not, we know that it is. It has all the virtues here ascribed to baseball. The game is too notorious and the tragic results of its “training of good human muscle” and its “matching of human against human” too fresh in our memories to require details here. Suffice it to say that during the last season eleven deaths, not to mention all the accompanying evils and minor brutalities, were reported in a short time, and one state was sufficiently aroused to abolish the game by rendering it a criminal offense.

An investigation of the details will not lead anyone to question the statement in the editorial under discussion, that “no bull-fighting nation on earth ever could come creditably out of a war with ball-players.” There is one point in this connection that we wish to emphasize. With all their boasting the Spaniards have not, to our knowledge, pointed to the picadors and banderilleros of the bull-fight as the representatives of either their honor or their bravery, and we do not believe they represent the little intelligence with which Spain is credited. But the names and achievements of the “rusliars” and “backs” of the American game of football, together with the accounts of the deaths, maimings, and injuries occasioned by them, are invariably connected with such names as Yale, Harvard, Brown, Pennsylvania, Princeton, and the various state universities. On the one hand we have the ignorant matador tormenting and slaying an animal in the arena; on the other we have the inmates of the highest educational institutions of this country, who are supposed to be basking in the full blaze of our enlightenment, and enjoying the very heights of its attainments, trampling over and kicking each other on the football ground almost in the shadow of those institutions. Is that a spectacle to be held up with pride as an evidence of our superior civilization? It would seem that all ordinary motives of humanity and self-respect would have led us, instead of glorying in this our shame, to have sought with averted gaze to cover the deformity. To what lamentable lengths do we go when determined to ignore the truth, and to substitute “gross darkness” where there is the clearest light.

There is another sport which has attained a “wide popularity” in this country and which also possesses the virtues mentioned above. In it the contestants meet “on equal terms of intelligence [which isn’t saying a great deal] and muscle and training.” They “match human against human—not man against brute,” and they consider that they are using muscle and brain in a way which will show them to be “men.” And it is not too much to say that many a youth from New York to San Francisco aspires to be just such a “man,” and that he, too, “dreams—sleeping and waking—of the hero in the ring, and imbibes in infancy, cultivates in growth, and exercises in manhood the essentials of the ideal character” fully as much as does any lad between Barcelona and Cadiz. It need not be said that the sport to which we refer is prize-fighting. The fame of the light and heavy weights of Spain has never reached us, but reliable statistics on prize fighting show that thirty-one pugilists have been killed in the arena between the years 1832 and 1897, and of these deaths, three occurred in England and the remaining twenty-eight in this country. No credit need be taken from the fact that the time extends back to 1832. Nine of these deaths occurred in 1897, and the whole twenty-eight in this country have occurred since 1876. It may be that there is more brutality in matching “man against brute” with “tremendous advantage” in favor of the man, than there is in matching “human against human” with the deliberate intention and expectation that one or the other will be cruelly maimed if not killed outright; but a person of average sensibility will not be able to realize it. To our mind it is “man’s inhumanity to man” that is the great offense, and in that respect we think this country will have little difficulty in maintaining its reputation with Spain.

There is something else which sometimes occurs in this country, and which has an important bearing in determining the relative brutality and cowardice of the Spanish and American people. In it “human is matched against human” and in one respect it closely resembles the description of the bull-fight—“tremendous advantage” is on one side. But it is not necessary that we should add to the horrors of this list those of lynch law. Nor need we add many other things which properly belong in this category.

We are by no means defending the bull fights of Spain. We regard them as both cruel and cowardly. In fact, we know of but one thing which exceeds in barbarity the cruel and wanton destruction of animal life, and that is the cruel and wanton destruction of human life, whether it be on the football ground; in the prize ring, or on the deck of a man-of-war. The one exceeds the other in brutality just to the extent that the life of a human being is of more value than that of an animal.

The plain truth is that by nature and of himself the Spaniard and the American is one and the same. The average American goes to the football game or a prize-fight for exactly the same reason that he goes to war, or that the Spaniard goes to a bull-fight—because he experiences a certain infatuation and delight in seeing life and limb risked in a brutal encounter. But notwithstanding the fact that all men are of “one blood,” there have been certain great influences which have operated for the elevation of the one nation and the degradation of the other. Next week we shall point out those influences by quoting from an authority who has investigated deeper than the “play hour and the manner of its spending.”

SOME interesting correspondence relative to the Red Cross Society's work in Cuba, as affected by its alliance with the United States military forces, is given in an article by George Kennan, in The Outlook, for May 28. It is related that on May 2, Miss Clara Barton addressed a letter to the commander of the blockading squadron, Admiral Sampson, asking permission to land supplies of food in Cuba for the starving reconcentrados, from the steamer chartered by the Red Cross Society,—the "State of Texas." The quotation following is from this letter.

"PAPERS forwarded by direction of our Government will have shown the charge intrusted to me; viz., to get food to the starving people of Cuba. I have with me a cargo of 1,400 tons, under the flag of the Red Cross, the one international emblem of neutrality and humanity known to civilization. Spain knows and regards it.

"Fourteen months ago the entire Spanish government at Madrid cabled me permission to take and distribute food to the suffering people in Cuba. This official permission was broadly published. If read by our people, no response was made and no action taken until two months ago, when, under the humane and gracious call of our honored President, I did go and distribute food, unmolested anywhere on the island, until arrangements were made by our Government for all American citizens to leave Cuba. Persons must now be dying there by hundreds, if not thousands, daily, for want of the food we are shutting out. Will not the world hold us accountable? Will history write us blameless? Will it not be said of us that we completed the scheme of extermination commenced by Weyler?

"Fortunately, I know the Spanish authorities in Cuba, Captain-General Blanco and his assistants. We parted with perfect friendliness. They do not regard me as an American merely, but as the National representative of an international treaty to which they themselves are signatory and under which they act. I believe they would receive and confer with me if such a thing were made possible.

"I should like to ask Spanish permission and protection to land and distribute food now on the 'State of Texas.' Could I be permitted to ask to see them under flag of truce? If we make the effort and are refused, the blame rests with them; if we fail to make it, it rests with us."

* * *

To this the American commander replied, that he was charged with the duty of keeping supplies of food out of Cuba, believing that supplies sent to the island unaccompanied by a military force would fall into the hands of the Spanish; and that therefore he could not grant her the permission asked.

This conclusion of course was natural enough from a military point of view. But this is not the Christian point of view. This is not the point of view of one who believes in the power of God and in God's readiness to exercise that power for the accomplishment of Christian work. Christian work must be undertaken with a reliance upon the power of God, and not upon the power of man. The feeding of starving women and children in Cuba should have been undertaken by Christians in the name of Christ and with a reliance upon divine power and protection. Let the civil government undertake the work, if it will, relying upon the power of its army and navy. Civil government cannot be expected to proceed in any other way. Its whole stock in trade is force; it must use this or nothing. But let Christians proceed by the power of love and of the Spirit of God. Not to do this is to demonstrate that they are Christians only in profession.

COULD not Christian people have had sufficient faith in God to have believed that he would open the way for them to have rescued the perishing, through the opposition of Spain and even of the American forces? As Miss Barton's letter indicates, there is reason to believe that Spain would not have been hostile to work done by the Red Cross Society, as such, and without an alliance with any military power; and as regards the opposition of Admiral Sampson, it is to be noted as a significant fact that an unarmed steamship—the "Gussie"—was permitted to attempt to land supplies in Cuba, unaccompanied by any armed force, precisely as Miss Barton requested permission to do.

* * *

ALL facts considered, it is clear enough that the work of relieving the suffering Cubans has been undertaken with very little if any manifestation of faith in God. The Government, of course, cannot be blamed for this; it could not proceed in any other way than it has done. But people who profess to be Christians, and who talk about this war as being undertaken from Christian motives, may well pause and ask themselves how much real Christianity there has been manifested in it, and how far they themselves are responsible for the terrible conditions that are now known to exist in the island. It is a serious matter, and will warrant serious reflection on their part.

* * *

THE well-known writer, George Kennan, in describing some recent experience at Key West, tells of meeting some of the captured Spaniards, who with their ships, had been taken by the vessels of the American fleet. In speaking of these he says that "On the schooner 'Power of God,' there seemed to be more wild, cruel, piratical types than on any other vessel, except perhaps 'St. James the Apostle.'” Imagine the incongruity. It is just such ridiculous travesties of sacred truth that are always furnished by a union of religion with the state.

* * *

ONE can hardly blame Mr. Dooley, a character discovered by the Chicago Journal, for being more impressed with the religious aspect of the controversy with Spain than with the material aspect, in view of the tremendous activity of the ecclesiastical powers engaged, and the comparative quiet in the operations of the fleets and armies.

* * *

RELATING his impressions of the war recently to an acquaintance, Mr. Dooley is quoted as saying that while the “sthateejans” in Washington have been holding their discussions “they’s been goin’ on the mos’ deadly conflict iver heerd tell iv between th’ powerful preachin’ navies iv th’ two counthries.” The bishop of Cadiz, he went on, “fired the openin’ gun,” and “sint a storm iv brimstone an’ hell into us,” and was immediately “answered be our whole fleet iv preachers. Thin he was jined be th’ bishop iv Barsaloona an’ th’ bishop iv Mahdrid an’ th’ bishop iv Havana,” and “to meet thim we sint th’ bishop iv New York, th’ bishop iv Philadelphia, th’ bishop iv Baltimore, an’ th’ bishop iv Chicago, accompanied be a flyin’ squadhron iv Methodists,” Presbyterians, Baptists, and others. “Th’ bishop iv New York” is now “blockadin’ th’ bishop iv Santiago de Cuba, an’ they’s bin an’ exchange iv prayers between th’ bishop iv Baltimore an’ th’ bishop iv Havana without much damage.” His impression was that we were having a shade the best of it so far, but the Spanish bishop, he said, “prays har’rd, an’ ’tis no aisy wurruk to silence him.”

* * *

MR. DOOLEY’S observations would be perfectly in order if we were to take seriously the attitude of the ecclesiastics belonging to the opposing sides in the war. As it is, they illustrate the absurdity of the idea which both parties are seeking to carry into effect, that God can be made a party to the mixing of Christianity with carnal warfare.

ONE of the speakers at a recent mass meeting of citizens of Nashville, Tenn. (mentioned in another column), called to consider means for suppressing the Sunday saloon, said he thought that saloon men ought to form an alliance to keep the laws, and in case one of their members should break over, “kick him out” of the organization.

THIS might be good policy for the saloons. But the fact is that the saloon is essentially a law-breaking institution; it is in its very nature an outlaw. Hence it is not to be expected that the saloons would be able, even were they willing, to form and maintain an effective organization for the promotion of obedience to law. All they ask is to be let alone; and all their power is naturally exercised in the direction of securing conditions in which they will be let alone to the fullest possible extent.

* * *

THE saloon is a positive force only in the direction of evil.

“Civic Righteousness” in Nashville, Tenn.

THE “Ministers’ Alliance” of Nashville, Tenn., has inaugurated a campaign for “civic righteousness” in that city. What is meant by “civic righteousness” may be seen from the following resolution, which is one of several passed at a mass meeting called by the Alliance, the evening of May 23:—

“Resolved, That it is the sense of the people of Nashville that gambling houses and open saloons on Sunday are a serious menace to the peace and good order of the city, and to the manhood of our youth, especially so since Nashville is an educational center and hundreds of young men are residents here during the formative period of their lives.”

In other resolutions following, the meeting called upon the city authorities to permanently close the gambling houses and shut up the saloons on Sunday.

Righteousness has nothing in common with the saloon any more than it has with gambling or with any vicious indulgence. But “civic righteousness” says that the saloons may remain open and transact their nefarious business all days of the week except Sunday. It is evident, therefore, that “civic righteousness” is not righteousness at all.

It was not the fact that the saloons and gambling houses were open that draw the attention of the Ministers’ Alliance; but the fact that they were open on Sunday. It is needless to say that it is regard for Sunday which prompts people to feel more concerned at evils seen on that day, than at those which show themselves on ordinary days of the week. But regard for Sunday is a religious sentiment purely, and one with which civil government has no concern.

“Civic righteousness” has its origin in religious sentiment. It means a form of city, state, and national government which has for its main object the exaltation of Sunday.

A MEETING of ministers of Jefferson, Ia., and vicinity, was held in that city recently, to devise a plan of action for opposing Sunday excursions on railways. Four Protestant clergymen and the Catholic priest joined in the call for the meeting, and all Catholic priests within a considerable distance of Jefferson were invited to participate in the conference. The effort resulted in the production of resolutions designed to create public sentiment against this form of Sunday desecration. These resolutions were forwarded to all ministers in the vicinity of Jefferson, to be used by them in creating sentiment among the people within their reach. An appeal will also be made to the railway companies to run no Sunday excursions, and petitions to the same end will be forwarded to the railway officials by the middle of June. The Jefferson Bee says that the ministers are taking vigorous action in the matter, and their efforts may be expected to produce results.

THE New York Sun, of the 23rd inst., gives the following interesting observations on the session of the Presbyterian General Assembly, which began at Winona Lake, Ind., May 19:—

“Dr. Sheldon Jackson, the retiring moderator, preached a notable sermon, so far as concerned pulpit eloquence, but he made no direct reference to the lapse of faith manifested in some parts of the Presbyterian Church, here in New York, for instance, unless in the remark that ‘we are living in one of the greatest crises of the world’s history.’ In saying this he may have had in mind merely the political conditions of this period, for he spoke surrounded by national flags and to an audience which was roused to enthusiasm by every appeal to patriotism. Unquestionably, however, we are living in a time when religious faith is passing through the greatest crisis in the history of Christianity and of all religions. It is a time when supernaturalism itself is assailed as mere childish superstition, a tissue of fairy tales and ghost stories, even by theologians themselves, and when the Bible, the source whence is derived the whole Protestant belief in supernaturalism, is relegated by a distinguished theological school to the place of a criticisable human production.

“Among the reports presented in the early routine of business was one complaining that the standard of ‘Sabbath observance’ has been lowered constantly in this country, the ‘Continental Sunday’ replacing the ‘American Sabbath’ in many places. Undoubtedly the old severity of Sabbatarianism has yielded under the pressure of both popular distaste and religious doubt. It is not surprising that when people begin to lose faith in the Bible, under the teachings of the Presbyterian critical school, they should become careless about keeping Sunday in the old Presbyterian fashion. Various suggestions were made against the reading of Sunday papers, bicycling on Sunday, and other and almost universal departures from the strict Puritanical observance of the day; but nothing definite as to them was done by the General Assembly.

“Whatever may be done in the way of prohibition will be of no practical consequence. Presbyterians, clergy and laity, will do as they think best in this matter without regard to the precepts of that body. They are now as eager as the rest of the people to get the news of the war, and they want it on Sunday as much as on other days. Sunday bicycling, moreover, has been encouraged by some pastors in the provision of receptacles for the machines in their churches; and, by means of a wheel, a missionary is enabled to conduct Sunday services at widely removed places.

“Moreover, when a Kansas delegate offered a resolution earnestly requesting President McKinley to use his influence and prevent ‘needless work by the navy and army, and especially the beginning of movements or battles upon the Lord’s day,’ the resolution was tabled almost unanimously, the Rev. Mr. Hudnut, of Brooklyn, arousing patriotic enthusiasm by declaring that ‘Dewey did a holy thing in striking at Manila on the Lord’s day.’”

“The Greatest Enemy of Christ and Humanity,” —Phariseeism.

Extract from a paper read at the Willard Hall Conference, Chicago, April 18, by Rev. G. A. Luckerman.

LOW HIGH CLASSES.

SHALL we ever learn the fact that there is not a single social evil which has not its root in respectability, modern phariseeism, the spawn of special privilege—that there is no corrupting influence which takes not its rise in what are called the higher classes? If we ever do we may learn, in the name of betrayed humanity, to say to all such influences, no matter how bold their effrontery, “Thou couldst have no power at all against me were it not given thee from above. Therefore he that delivereth me unto thee hath the greater sin.”

Oh, for an Isaiah to sound his Woe to them that call wealth success and poverty failure; that call pauperization charity and bribery legislation; that call policemanization law and love anarchy; that put respectability for righteousness and make the bestowal of hush money their religion. Woe to the Esaus, who rate man below property and mind below matter. . . . Woe to the professed followers of Christ who seek to be ministered unto rather than to minister, whose aim in life is to get without earning, who fear nothing in comparison with losing their social position and their soft job, who say “Master, master” with one breath and with the next “We have no king but Cæsar.”

For surely the picture is not overdrawn nor the implied comparison unwarranted. It was the dominant social class, the respectably religious, that rejected him then, not the rabble nor the Romans, and to-day it is the counterpart of the same class that hourly rejects his claim and delivers him up to be crucified; these, and not the saloon-keeper.

And, as of yore, that class is organized, has its hierarchy and its myrmidons. There is the eminently respectable and next to him the quasi respectable, and next to him the boss and the ward politician, and so on down the descending scale to disreputability of the lowest sort. And the man at the top is at the bottom of the devilry. He is the arch-corrupter of youth, and not the saloon. He is the arch-debaucher of women, and not the saloon. He is the arch-foe of justice, and not the saloon. Indirectly, of course, and in the majority of cases unconsciously; but really and truly, nevertheless, for he holds himself aloof; he moves in the best set, so far as any one knows, never moving out of it. The grievous and heavy-to-be-borne burdens of his business schemes and legislative measures he lays upon the back of his so-called attorney, whom he of course pays liberally, and who in turn employs others for the dirtier and less arduous work. These last he never sees, does not know, nor want to know. It might make him uncomfortable if he did. They are paid for what they do and are satisfied, presumably. What affair is it of his? Indeed, he seldom if ever thinks of them; the ward politician looks after all that.

AN EVIL HERITAGE.

He is blind; yet his blindness is not altogether willful, and in so far, therefore, he is not to be blamed. He was the product of the existing social order before he became one of its chief upholders, and the church which he supports has never told him—shall we say never dared to tell him?—in language he can understand that he is daily responsible for the crucifixion afresh of the Son of God through coöperation in a system which gives the lie to professions of faith in Christ and renders incapable of fulfillment the definite, practical injunctions of his teachings.

In this respect his experience is not unique. Each of us enters upon life with the innate capacity for Christlikeness, and the equally innate tendency toward Phariseism, and the very worst that can be said of the existing order, this so-called Christian civilization, is that it develops the Pharisee and kills the Christ in us. All of us are under its spell, and so the objects of divine displeasure. The differences are only differences in the degree of culpability dependent on the measure of received enlightenment and they who really see are the first to feel the force of the Master's command: "He that is without sin, let him cast the first stone."

AN EX-PHARISEE'S EXAMPLE.

Let us would-be reformers, therefore, not judge one another any more, but judge this rather, that no one of us put that worst of stumbling blocks, Phariseism, in his brother's way. To do this is not easy, but it is possible. For from out that old party of self-righteousness, respectability and special privilege there came a man who, having suffered the loss of all things of that sort, did count them as so much dung in comparison with the knowledge of Christ and acceptability with him, consequent upon that knowledge and that loss. In saying "Be ye followers together of me, even as I am of Christ," Paul, the ex-Pharisee, prisoner of Jesus Christ, said what each one of us, lay as well as clerical, must be able to say if he would be other than a blind leader of the blind. For the Master's requisition the necessary qualifications for real discipleship is the same to day that it was in the first century: If any man would come after me let him turn his back upon respectability and social station. Let him come out of that smug little world of his own imagining, out into the real world of the common people, bearing his cross of misrepresentation and ridicule and scorn, and let him follow me in the search for rightness of personal relationship with publicans and sinners.

A REPRESENTATIVE of the Society of Friends, Mr. Richard Henry Thomas, writes the following to The Independent, in justification of the Society's attitude on the question of war:—

"We are unable to find anything in the example of Jesus, or in the spirit of the New Testament that justifies the assertion, when made without qualification, that 'self defence is Christian.' Within certain limits it is, as is also the defense of the weak, and the defense of the right. These limits may include any amount of suffering on the part of the defender, even unto death; but they admit of no departure from the spirit of love or from the spirit of His example who came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them, and to give his life a ransom for many."

THE following item from a Manitoba journal states in detail the "destruction of the enemy's fleet"—so to speak—in the battle between the forces of liberty and of religious legislation in the Manitoba legislature:—

"Clause two of the Sunday observance bill, prohibiting the sale of goods and the performance of ordinary work was struck out, as was also clause three, prohibiting political meetings; clause four relating to games and amusements and clause five, with sub-sections relating to Sunday excursions. In place of clause four a provision was inserted making it illegal to advertize or attend games or entertainments for which a fee is charged. A clause was added providing that this bill did not repeal the general Sunday act now in force."

War About a Bucket.

"The Oriental Watchman."

EVERY one knows that a very small matter may grow into a quarrel, when two small people feel quarrelsome. And when grown people allow pride and selfishness to rule their hearts they can quarrel about as small a thing as children. So nations may fall out and fight, spending large sums of money and many lives over a very little thing. The following shows what "standing up for their rights" may lead men to do:—

"In the year 1005 a soldier of the commonwealth of Modena ran away with a bucket from a public well belonging to the State of Bologna. The bucket might have been worth a shilling; but it produced a quarrel which was worked up into a long and bloody war. Henry, king of Sardinia, assisted the Modenese to keep possession of the bucket, and in one of the battles he was made a prisoner. His father, the emperor, offered a chain of gold that would encircle Bologna, which is seven miles in compass, for his son's ransom; but in vain. After twenty-two years' imprisonment he pined away. His monument is in the Church of the Dominicans. The fatal bucket is still exhibited in the Cathedral of Modena, enclosed in an iron cage."

Studies in French History —25.

"I DON'T believe Professor Carman thought twice, or he would not have given Ed Barnaby that job to do," said Charlie White to Rob Billings, on their way home from school.

"What job?" asked his companion.

"Why, that essay to write. He never could write a composition worth a fig. I expected he'd refuse, point blank. Besides, you know, the Barnaby bookshelves are as barren of books as a Kansas garden is of vegetables after the grasshoppers have put in their work."

"I know it; I'm just sorry for those boys. Their father lost his job after his last spree, and Mrs. Barnaby has begun to take in washing, mother says, to support the family."

"I think its wonderful how Ed and Will have stuck to school, and especially to the French history class."

"Well, I don't know; Professor Carman makes them pretty interesting. But what can we do to help Ed with his essay?"

"I'll tell you," said Rob. "Mother has a history of France which tells lots of interesting stories; maybe that would help him. I'll ask mother to lend it to him, and, then, besides, Professor Carman said he'd let him have some helps."

Robert Billings was as good as his word, and the next Tuesday afternoon, thanks to his kindness and the thoughtfulness of his teacher, Edward Barnaby had an essay, which he had worked very hard to prepare, and which, as the teacher has just called him up, we will hear him read:—

"King Charles VI. of France," began Edward, bravely, though his voice shook a little, for he always had a great dread of essays, "was also called the Well-beloved, though why, I can't see for the life of me, unless it was because he was so crazy, most of the time, that he did no particular harm. His people never seemed to pay much attention to him,—only they liked to see him out in public when he was able. I don't believe he knew they thought much of him till he died—and then of course he didn't know it. But then they cried and took on pretty bad. I'm sorry to say that's the way people do nowadays,—they wait till a fellow dies before they find out that he amounts to anything."

"That's true, Edward," interrupts the teacher, "and more's the pity."

"After the king began to get better from his first crazy spell, which lasted near a year, one of his silly courtiers thought he would invent a kind of fun that was entirely new. He did. It was a masked ball, in which the inventor of the sport, the king, and four or five knights dressed up in linen suits, which they covered all over with pitch, and then attached tow to the sticky pitch,—they must have looked odd, I think. At last the king's brother, the Duke of Orleans, carelessly held a burning torch so close to one of these human pieces of kindling wood, that the tow with which he was covered took fire, and that set all the rest afire except the king. His aunt threw her cloak around him, and so managed to get him out. The inventive genius who got the play up was burned to death. This man was so cruel toward the people that they hated him and were glad when he died. He used to whip them cruelly, and then, calling them 'dogs,' would tell them to bark. So when the funeral procession was going along the streets, these poor fellows would call out, 'Bark, dog, bark!'"

"Of course the king was too weak in the head to endure so much excitement, and he was soon crazy as ever. He even imagined his own wife was a stranger; but I don't know as there was anything so very queer about that, seeing she was so unkind to him. But he thought a great deal of his brother's wife, the Duchess of Orleans, and used to call her his sweet sister; he was always contented when she was near him.

"For weeks and even months the poor king was so neglected when in his crazy fits, that he did not even have his clothes changed. All this time he stayed in the Hotel St. Pol. His wife, Queen Isabella, was just as heedless of her children's comfort as she was of his; in fact the young princes and princesses were allowed to go quite destitute. Once when the king was told of this he cried, and took his cup of gold and told the attendant to sell it to get what was needed.

"At last he died after reigning from 1380 to 1422, or about forty-two years."

"Come now, Edward, never think again that you can't write an essay," said Professor Carman, as Edward took his seat. "You're good for any number of them, I'll guarantee.

"Now, though Edward has done well and has brought out many good points, he has omitted a number of incidents in the reign of the crazy king, which it will hardly do to let pass without notice. Almost his entire reign was one dreary quarrel for the supreme place, between the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans. At last the latter is most cruelly betrayed and assassinated by order of John the Fearless, Duke of Burgundy. This strange man wept at the funeral, when he saw the disfigured remains of his relative, and at last confessed the crime, but declared it was only an act of patriotism; and strange to say, although the murdered duke was a great favorite among the common people, he made a great many people believe it."

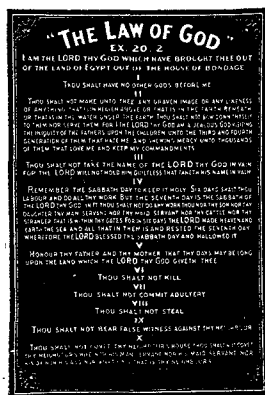

"Well, I think that when so-called patriotism leads to

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

(SECOND EDITION.)

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, it not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

THE discovery of rich gold fields is reported from the Philippines. This will make the question of their future ownership a more perplexing one than ever for the "Christian" powers of the world to settle.

MINISTERS of Milwaukee have recently sent out a denunciation of Sunday baseball, and have appointed a committee to decide upon a plan of action for its suppression. Now let the baseball players and others appoint a committee to prohibit the ministers from palming off their opinions about war and politics upon the people in the name of religion.

"THE kingdom of God is within you," said Jesus Christ. Is it so? Is the kingdom of God within you? If it is, then you are not affected by the commotion and strife that are in the world. Commotion and strife are filling the world, and if the world is in you, its commotion and strife are there with it. But the kingdom of God is pervaded by peace and love. No matter how bad things get in this world, it is your privilege to live in the enjoyment of peace. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

THE other day the historic "Sixth Massachusetts" regiment passed through Baltimore on its way South, and was received by the people with an ovation. The soldiers received flowers instead of the stones and bullets hurled at them back in '61. The incident was a very pleasing one, and is one of many indications that the old dividing line of animosity between North and South has passed or is rapidly passing away. Perhaps by the time the war is over there will be nothing left to mark this dividing gulf of former days, except—except the dividing line perpetuated by the "Church North" and the "Church South," as found in the Methodist and some other denominations. How would it seem if the church should come to have a monopoly in this unbrotherly business?

JUST when the seat of European political disturbance has been transferred to the precincts of the crumbling empire of China, and the forces of the powers are gathering by land and sea to enforce their respective claims for territory and commercial privileges, a new figure appears upon the scene, as "Uncle Sam," with one giant stride, steps clear across the Pacific and plants one foot squarely down almost at the edge of the field of controversy. What is now to happen? is the question in the minds of European statesmen, as they contemplate this new and not very welcome addition to their "war concert." Will "Uncle Sam" lift that foot and step back again to his own side of the earth? or will he keep it where it is? The indications are that the latter will be his choice. But the decision which is made in the matter will be of far greater consequence than any of the battles that may be fought in the existing war.

SOME idea of what would be involved in carrying out an offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain may be obtained from these figures applying to the British Empire, given by the N. Y. Christian Advocate:—

"At the present moment the British Empire is fifty-three times the size of France, fifty-two times that of Germany, three and a half times that of the United States of America, thrice the size of Europe, with treble the population of all the Russias. It extends over 11,000,000 square miles, occupies one fifth of the globe, containing one fifth of the human race, or 350,000,000 people, embraces four continents, 10,000 islands, 500 premonitories, and 2,000 rivers."

The United States may well pause before making an agreement to share with Great Britain the task of defending this vast realm.

Down in Louisiana the other day, if press reports be true, a crowd of white people took a negro criminal, chained him to a stake, and burned him after the fashion of the auto-da-fé of the Dark Ages. The whole affair was executed as deliberately as heretics were wont to be executed by the church-and-state authorities in the days of papal supremacy. This and other like occurrences will constitute convincing proof in the eyes of European powers of the desirability of driving Spain out of Cuba and supplanting her rule with the "Christian civilization" of this Republic.

WHAT is the matter with the Sunday-school? is a question considered recently by Mr. Edward Bok, who is well known as the editor of that popular magazine, The Ladies' Home Journal. Mr. Bok says that there is decidedly something the matter with the Sunday-school; that, in short, its old-time efficiency is almost wholly gone. His statements raised a storm of protest, which he probably foresaw; but he spoke with a tone of conviction, fortified by his own experience and observations.

BUT the question, What is the matter? covers a broader field than the Sunday-school. Recently we printed an article from the New York Sun, on the subject of the decay of orthodoxy. There is something the matter with the orthodox churches in general. This is more especially evident in the Presbyterian body, where there is a feeling of dismay which cannot be disguised. The church and the Sunday-school are bodies so closely connected that it is only to be expected that a serious malady in one will make itself felt in the other. But whatever cause may be assigned for these alarming symptoms, one thing is certain: there is nothing the matter with the Christian religion. Man is a frail creature, continually failing and wandering away from the right path; but the wisdom and power of God are manifest in the gospel still, as they have been since time began.

A CIVIL government cannot practice the principles of self-denial.

THE outlook is just as bright for the Christian to-day as it ever was.

THE gospel is the best remedy for the ills of humanity; war, the worst.

SUNDAY laws stand condemned by the premium they are obliged to put upon idleness.

No character is ever strengthened by leaning upon public sentiment or popular custom.

SIN entered the world through the individual, and through the individual it must be cast out.

THE power which is most to stir the world is not that of armies and navies, but "power from on high."

UNDER existing conditions the peace lover can well count himself, as Abraham did, a stranger and pilgrim in the earth.

A RELIGIOUS state cannot be an effective remedy for evil until it is possible for one person to be righteous for another.

THE devil never worries over any movement for moral reform which invokes the power of the state instead of the power that comes through faith.

THE duties an individual owes to God, and the manner of discharging them, are matters which stand unaffected by the fact that there are a great number of individuals in the world.

ANY religious action by the state means the interposing of man between God and man,—the substitution of a sinful, fallible mortal for the "one Mediator between God and man," Jesus Christ, and of human wisdom, authority and power for that which is divine.

LIEUTENANT HOBSON and his crew who took the "Merrimac" into Santiago harbor are not braver than the one who storms and takes the citadel of self, in the face of the fire from the forces of evil within it, and of the world without.

FOR religiously-inclined people, Sabbath laws are superfluous, since such people observe the Sabbath by their own preference.

For other people, Sabbath laws can do nothing but put them in a condition of enforced idleness. But such a condition is unnatural: Nature abhors it as she does a vacuum.

The only periods of absolute idleness for which nature provides are the hours of sleep.

As a worldly-minded man cannot be active except in a worldly way, and Sabbath laws are directed against the manifestation of worldly activity, they can, at most, only reduce such a person to a condition of idleness which is contrary to the laws of nature.

And as the laws of nature are the laws of God, it is plainly true that Sabbath laws, to be enforced by civil authority, have no place in the economy of God.

That Southern Methodist Church Claim.

THERE is a very bad odor arising from that Southern Methodist Church claim of $288,000 which Congress kindly disbursed from the pockets of the people a short time ago. The hope in the minds of the beneficiaries that the "incident was closed" when Congress had capitulated to their demands, was not to be realized. And while the case cannot be reopened by Congress, it can and will be reviewed by the general public in the light of facts which reflect anything but credit upon the Southern Methodist Church.

It was represented by those through whom the claim was brought before Congress, that no claim agents or paid attorneys were concerned in the matter, but that the money would all go for religious and benevolent purposes under the management of the religious corporation to whom it would be paid. Of course, this would in no way have justified the appropriation, if it had been true. But it was represented to be true when in fact it was utterly false. A telegram from Messrs. Barbee and Smith, managers of the Methodist Book Concern in Nashville from which the claim for damages proceeded, was read during the discussion in Congress, stating that no attorney or claim agent was financially interested in it. The truth is that no less than thirty-five per cent of the whole sum, or $100,800, went as a fee to the agent through whose efforts the claim was successfully engineered through the National Legislature. This was the largest fee, and there were other smaller ones. The New York Journal, of June 10, gives these details:—

"The claim passed Congress after a hard fight. The principal argument in its favor was that the Methodist Church South would be the beneficiary, and the 'book agents' feature of it was always mentioned in small type. It turns out that the book agents were the principal beneficiaries, and that the lobbyists came next.

"Colonel Stapleman, it is reported, divided with Colonel Thomas, president of the Nashville Exposition. There were some smaller people in the deal, who are called 'holders of a five congressional flush' in lobby parlance—who received several thousand dollars each. One of them paid off an $800 hotel bill of two years' standing. The money is out of the treasury, however, and no investigation can put it back."

And this was sanctioned by the Conference of the Southern Methodist Church, recently held at Baltimore. A minority of the conference, to their credit, wanted the whole transaction disavowed and the money returned to the Government; but the majority were not of this mind.

Probably no more effective comment upon the character of this transaction could be offered than the following from a Methodist lady of the South, Mrs. W. H. Felton, of Cartersville, Ga. In a letter to the Atlanta Journal, this lady says:—

"I have read very carefully the debate that took place on March 8, at the time when Messrs. Barbee & Smith exploited that telegram of positive denial. The Methodist Church was put on her knees before Congress, begging for money to keep her worn-out preachers and their widows out of the county poor-house. That beggar role was worked for all it was worth. And now, when I find out that the claim agent was pumping up tears for that supposed class of our citizens, meanwhile holding a contract that he should get more than one dollar every time he pumped up three out of the strong-box of the nation, I feel as if the great Southern Methodist Church has been dragged through the mire and filth of humiliation and falsehood to very little purpose. I am ashamed that so much was done to humiliate, and I loathe the falsehood that made their success possible. I have no disposition to discuss the claim agent, nor do I care whether he got his pay out of the mission fund, the school-book fund, or whether the 35 percent was delivered at the very counter at which Messrs. Barbee & Smith cashed that check on the United States Treasury for $288,000.

"But I do care that I, in common with the rank and file of Southern Methodists, are now placed before the United States Senate in the attitude of swindlers, because the avowal was decided and complete that no money would be paid to claim agents, attorneys, or lobbyists, for pushing that war claim on the present Congress.

"I do not blame Messrs. Barbee & Smith for their official part in this matter. Doubtless they obeyed their superiors in office—however much I may condemn their individual weakness in doing evil that supposed profit might follow—but I do not hesitate to say that the general conference, in failing to rectify the mistakes of these persons, has placed the entire responsibility upon the body itself. It is now their act. Their agents, Messrs. Barbee and Smith, have been protected, and the odium of that false telegram lies at the door of the only legislative organization of the Methodist Church. . . .

"It will be some time before the stain of such a falsehood will be eradicated from the official pages of our church and our national reputation. The time to remedy the evil has surely passed, because that lying telegram has been assumed and condoned by the general conference at Baltimore. If protests were privately made, the edict prevailed—'Division and silence!'

"I fancy that august body in session, with the odor of that Barbee-Smith telegram in their nostrils, with saintly attitude and pious ejaculations, as the claim agent raked in the 35 per cent. Alas! Alas!!

"If those senators who heard Senator Bate [Pasco] read it could have attended some of their discussions as to where the remainder could be placed, to make most noise, either in China or Nashville, they would have wondered where were the starving old preachers and agonized widows who figured before the Senate after the fashion of Cuban half-breed reconcentrados when jingoism was in the political saddle some two months ago. What a spectacle for men and angels!

"And what a game for preachers to play at! Actually raiding the United States treasury by the art and tricks of claim agents (the new name for lobbyists) to rob the taxpayers!

"And Messrs. Barbee & Smith are to get $500 each annually for being so sharp in politics! Thirty-five per cent. to the claim agent, $1,000 per annum to these sharpers in canonicals, $50,000 for a similar book concern plant in China (and as much to some other schemes far and near); this war claim vanishes like 'butter before the sun,' and we have nothing left but that malodorous incident in the United States Senate, where Methodist preachers added falsehood to trickery to get in reach of the money to be thus spent in ventures and experiments, like other tricksters and traders in politics. Alas for the honor and good name of the Methodist church!"

It remains for the church people of this land to decide how much stigma of this sort they want fastened on the church, and for the people in general to decide how many times more they want Congress to be a party in such fraudulent business. Let no one be surprised that such fraud was connected with. The very principle by which the people's money was given by the Government to a church, is as fraudulent as anything can be. That such a principle should be recognized by Congress, is the worst thing in the whole transaction; and that there should be paid lobbyists to push the claim through Congress, is just as natural as that evils should associate together. The union of religion with the state always begets fraud and hypocrisy; and in this affair Congress and the people of the United States have a warning to keep religion and the state separate. Whether they will heed it or not remains to be seen.

A Rare Occurrence.

It is not often one hears of a person accepting the Catholic faith through the exclusive reading of the Bible. But that such a thing is possible seems to be the case according to the Catholic News, of April 2, 1898.

Even to the News it must have been an incident of rare occurrence, for it makes the most of it that it can, devoting exactly a column to the narration of the fact.

The News is careful to state that the one who did this "read no Catholic books, heard no sermons, was influenced by no living examples of the excellency of the true faith, but by the serious and unbiased reading of the Holy Scriptures, discovered the pearl of great price."

But the convert himself in giving his testimony as to how he was led to embrace Catholicism, says: "I profited by the warning of St. Augustine, 'Fly to the tabernacle of God, the Catholic Church.'"

If this man "read no books, heard no sermons, was influenced by no living examples of the excellency of the true faith," where did he ever learn of St. Augustine, and in what part of the Bible did he ever read St. Augustine's warning, "Fly to the tabernacle of God, the Catholic Church?" The writer has several versions of the Bible, including a copy of the Douay Bible. In none of the former has he read such a warning, nor has he any recollection of seeing it in the Douay version.

This convert is so glad that he has found the "pearl of great price" that he says, "The English language is inadequate to express my gratitude to many kind friends who lent me a helping hand to bring me into the true fold, especially Father Wagner, of Champaigne, Ill., for his unrelenting kindness throughout my instructions."

Notwithstanding we are told that the man "read no books, heard no sermons," etc., from the fact that he knew of St. Augustine and his warning to flee to "the tabernacle of God, the Catholic Church," coupled with the fact that there were many kind friends, especially a "Rev. Father," ready to help him, it is not clear by any means that the New Testament is responsible for the man's conversion to the Catholic Church.

An Unfortunate Comparison.—No. 2.

BY JOHN D. BRADLEY.

WHILE we are absolutely certain that if America must depend upon the character of her sports as the evidence of her civilization she must at once take her place on a level with Spain, we are no less certain that in all lines of material and intellectual progress she far outranks Spain. We are fully conscious of the blessings and enlightenment of liberty; we recognize the ignorance and barbarity of Spain. But never shall we seek to explain that difference by such a piece of puerile sophistry as a comparison of ball and bull-fight. We are thoroughly convinced that that difference is due, not to "the manner of spending the hour of recreation" (for as we have seen there is here essentially no difference), but to the facts stated by Macaulay more than fifty years ago in language which no one may misunderstand. He says in his essay on Von Ranke:—

"It cannot be doubted that, since the sixteenth century, the Protestant nations have made decidedly greater progress than their neighbors. The progress made by those nations in which Protestantism, though not finally successful, yet maintained a long struggle, and left permanent traces, has generally been considerable. But when we come to the Catholic land, to the part of Europe in which the first sparks of the Reformation were trodden out as soon as it appeared, and from which proceeded the impulse which drove Protestantism back, we find, at best, a very slow progress, and on the whole a retrogression. . . . Compare the history of England and that of Spain during the last century. In arms, arts, sciences, letters, commerce, agriculture, the contrast is most striking. The distinction is not confined to this side of the Atlantic. The colonies planted by England in America have immeasurably outgrown in power those planted by Spain. Yet we have no reason to believe that, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, the Castilian was in any respect inferior to the Englishman. Our firm belief is, that the North owes its great civilization and prosperity chiefly to the moral effect of the Protestant Reformation, and that the decay of the Southern countries of Europe is to be mainly ascribed to the great Catholic revival."

Again, in his History of England, chap. 1, par. 22:—

"During the last three centuries, to stunt the growth of the human mind has been her (the Church of Rome) chief object. Throughout Christendom, whatever advance has been made in knowledge, in freedom, in wealth, and in the arts of life, has been made in spite of her, and has everywhere been in inverse proportion to her power. The loveliest and most fertile provinces of Europe have, under her rule, been sunk in poverty, in political servitude, and in intellectual torpor; while Protestant countries, once proverbial for their sterility and barbarism, have been turned by skill and industry into gardens, and can boast of a long list of heroes and statesmen, philosophers and poets. Whoever, knowing what Italy and Scotland naturally are, and what, four hundred years ago, they actually were, shall now compare the country around Rome with the country around Edinburgh, will be able to form some judgment as to the tendency of papal domination. The descent of Spain, once the first among monarchies, to the lowest depths of degradation, the elevation of Holland in spite of many natural disadvantages, to a position such as no commonwealth so small has ever reached, teach the same lesson. . . . On the other side of the Atlantic the same law prevails. The Protestants of the United States have left far behind them the Roman Catholics of Mexico, Peru, and Brazil."

Whatever has been, or is now, the enlightenment of the American people, we confess that we have little heart to congratulate them upon it, when the very moment they are denouncing another people for their ignorance, and barbarity, and general lack of all humane principles, past and present, they are themselves yielding to the control of the very power of lawlessness to whose domination is due the blackest pages of that history and the largest share of the present deplorable conditions. When the people of this country have so far forgotten the great Reformation and its benign influence upon their own destinies; when they have so far forgotten why their fathers came to this continent and why they established the American government; when they have so far forgotten the great and eternal principles of justice and liberty pronounced at the formation of that Government and which have ever been its true glory; when they have so far forgotten all the lessons taught both by the history of their own country and of Europe; when, in fact, they have so far forgotten everything that is worth remembering, as on the one hand to ascribe their national greatness to the fact that they "match human against human—not man against brute," and on the other to allow themselves without a word of remonstrance and almost with sycophantic complaisance to become "enclosed in the coils of the insidious diplomacy" of a power whose history for upwards of thirteen centuries has shown it to occupy "the highest place among the contrivances which have been devised for deceiving and oppressing mankind,"—we say when all this occurs with them, their condition stirs indeed with deep emotions the heart of every true patriot, but they are emotions not of pride and congratulation, but of pity and despair—of pity for them and of despair of their future freedom. Madison and Jefferson, were they living to day, would exclaim with even more vehemence than in its original utterance, "We know no name which will too severely reproach our folly!"

Would it not be vastly wiser and better in every respect, for the Times-Herald, instead of attempting to make capital out of Spanish bull-fights, and publishing laudations on "the patriotism of the Roman Catholics," and accounts of Archbishop Ireland's wonderful "peace efforts," to awake to the real danger to this country and speak accordingly—speak as would Jefferson, Madison, Macaulay, and every lover of liberty who has ever lived, were he and they alive to-day?

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

"THE universal education of successive generations" in the science and ethics of alcoholic beverages was Mrs. Hunt's burden, and she saw the public school as the medium by which this must be accomplished. Every boy and girl was due some time for a longer or shorter term at the public school-house, and here at this gate of entry she would station the representatives of truth. She would appeal to the boyish pride of strength, and the girls desire for grace and beauty; she would make nature itself cry out through these instincts that are as universal as life, against that indulgence which destroys the fine proportions of the growing animal; dwarfs, deforms, and degrades all loveliness. She would pit science as well as revelation against custom and appetite and see what it would do for the race after the third and fourth generation.

She began the discussion of her great theme in her home Union, and from thence worked out to the National, which in 1880 created for her the Department of Scientific Temperance Instruction in Schools and Colleges, and made her its superintendent (which position she still holds), and promised to stand by in her arduous undertaking.

Her's was the dream of a prophetess. All that she saw ought to be soon, will be by and by in the restoration of all things; but by "faith she brings it nigh," at least near enough to keep her in perpetual courage. No more practical woman can be found among us; none stronger nor more God-reliant as she keeps working away at her part of the great problem.

Mrs. Hunt recognized at once the relation of law to public school education, and with the habit of directness which is peculiar to her, she went for the legal end of the question at once. Since it was the law that fixed the school curriculum, she would make the law the friend of her client, the child of to-day, and those that should be of him.

She drafted a bill, and with such limited help as the National could give her, succeeded in persuading the legislature of Vermont to make it a law in November of 1882.

This law provided that all pupils in every school should be instructed in physiology and hygiene with special reference to the effect of alcoholic drinks, stimulants, and narcotics upon the human system; and that no certificate should be granted any person to teach in the state who "shall not pass a satisfactory examination" (after a certain early date which I cannot recall) "in physiology and hygiene, with particular reference to the effects of alcoholic drinks, stimulants and narcotics upon the human system."

The legislature of Michigan passed the same or a similar law in '83, and from that time Mrs. Hunt and her heroic band of state superintendents have been bringing state after state into the temperance educational procession, until at this date but four remain to be persuaded.

The National Congress quite early in her campaign passed a law making this line of instruction a part of the regular course in the District of Columbia; in all territories, and all naval and military schools; this being the extent of their power to legislate in school matters. During all these years Mrs. Hunt has almost lived in state legislatures personally watching every bill on its passage and all for the sake of the growing children in your home.

We are now far enough away from the first starting point in the Cold Water Army movement to begin to reap samples of the harvest, and while some of us know from the statement of the Word which is given for our counsel that these dreams of a reconstructed and purified society cannot be realized in this age of the world's history, yet we do know that the labor is not in vain in the Lord, because of results which have already been harvested. Thousands of men have grown up under this better teaching to be strictly total abstainers who under the influence of their natural environment would otherwise have necessarily been left untaught to fall a prey to the same evils which had slain their fathers; and thus the fact is attested that God was in the principle of "Prevention" as it had been revealed to us, that it was an essential part of that All that is in Christ, and that he was pleased to honor the efforts, which if not perfect, if not even the best that we ought to have done, were yet so honest in the motive which was behind them that he could recognize and use them in bringing men to the knowledge of his Son.

I have myself had many beautiful surprises in the years that have passed since the organization of that first Cold Water Army, and they are still coming in the nature of firstfruits of the harvest which shall be reaped by and by. The personal correspondence and experiences of all our women are full of just such tokens of the truth that "Ye shall reap if ye faint not."

I was invited to a certain western city for evangelistic work. Upon my arrival I was met in the most cordial manner by four bearded men who greeted me almost like sons, and in explanation told me that they had been in my first Cold Water Army; had taken that "oath" on the Court House Green, and had been kept by it from falling into the drinking habits of their associates in the new West, for they had determined never to break that solemn promise. They had all become Christians; were members of the three churches, and honoraries of the one W. C. T. U. of the town, and had united to invite me to bring the gospel to their neighbors.

Will you wonder if I tell you that I looked at them through wet eyes out of a laughing heart? And that I enjoyed the two weeks of service in which I was constantly supported by these four men and their wives, pastors, and associates in church work? The memory of it has always been refreshing, and also has served to illustrate the principle with which we started out, that all truth leads to Christ.

The Duty of the Christian Soldier.

JOHN the Baptist was the forerunner of Christ. His work was to "prepare the way of the Lord," to "make straight in the desert a highway for our God." All things which John spake of Christ were true as even the Jews admitted; while our Saviour himself declared that "among them that are born of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist." Therefore no doctrine can come to us with any higher sanctions than the teaching of John.

It was John's work to prepare the way for the new dispensation, therefore he spoke not alone to the Jews but to us as well. The morality which he taught was the morality, not of pagan philosophers, nor yet of self-righteous Pharisees, but the morality of Christ. The duties which John enjoined may not be neglected; the rules of conduct which he prescribed are in force to-day. What, then, did John declare to be the proper course of action for one who being a soldier would become also a Christian?

"And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages." Luke 3:14.

Obs rve that John did not say, Do violence to no man privately, or until commanded so to do by your superiors, but "Do violence to no man." The marginal reading is, "Put no man in fear." It must be evident that a "war" conducted on such principles would be even more peaceful and bloodless than Mr. McKinley's peaceful blockade of Havana which has caused no little dissatisfaction to the advocates of an energetic prosecution of the war with Spain. And not only would it be more peaceful than a peaceful blockade, but it would be likewise infinitely more effective, for only the Christian is capable of waging such a war; and his weapons "are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." 2 Cor. 10:4.

Of course, from the standpoint of the world, the soldier who would heed the inspired admonition, "Do violence to no man," would be of no use as a soldier; but this only shows that Christianity, as taught in the Scriptures, and the spirit of war are irreconcilable. The follower of the Prince of Peace cannot and will not fight with carnal weapons; his weapons are mighty but not carnal. He wields a sword, but it is the "sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (Eph. 6:17), he has a defense—not indeed bags of sand, walls of granite, or armor of nickel-steel, but the breastplate of righteousness and the helmet of salvation. The rule of the Christian's life is "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." 1 Cor. 10:31. The Christian must be Christlike. Christ lives and works in and through him. Gal. 2:20. The Christian fights, but his enemies are not his fellow men, creatures of the same divine hand, bound to the same judgment bar; but the devil and sin. Like the Master his mission is not to destroy men's lives but to save them.

Such is the work and the only work of the Christian soldier, for "as he [Christ] is so are we in this world." 1 John 4:17. And again, "He that abideth in him [Christ] ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked." 1 John 2:6. Notice, the text does not say, "As He is so we must be in the future kingdom of God, but it does say, "As He is so are we in this world." "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." It is not what one hopes to be in the future, but what he is at the present moment that determines his standing in the sight of God. The Christian can engage in no business, occupation, or calling in which Christ himself might not engage were he living as a man here upon earth, even as he once lived.

These things being true, will those who are engaged, or who are proposing to engage in Christian work among those who have enlisted to fight against Spain, will these Christian teachers, I ask, teach the soldiers and sailors of the United States these vital truths from the Word of God? Will they seek to make them real soldiers of Jesus Christ—to walk as he walked, to do in all things as he did, to revile not when reviled, to threaten not when they suffer, to retaliate not when smitten? Or will they teach them the gospel of force, of revenge, of destruction? To teach the first would be to disqualify for military service as many as received it; to teach the second would be to misrepresent Christ and to destroy souls for whom he died.

Christianity is opposed to war. True an apostate church has caused men to lose sight of this truth; but during all the years that it has been covered up it has not ceased to be truth; and to-day the word of Christ to each of his followers is, "Put up again thy sword into his place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." To obey this injunction requires courage, and that of a higher order even than to face the foe upon the field of carnal strife. Moral courage, the courage of Christ himself, will alone enable any man to be a Christian indeed in a time like this when God's word to every man is, "Choose ye this day whom you will serve."

The choice to be made is between the sword of Cæsar [the civil power] and the sword of the Spirit. The same individual cannot wield them both, for "no man can serve two masters." It is not for Christians to right wrongs. "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." God will in his own good time "Remember the 'Maine'"; he will also remember the oppressed in every land, the poor, the down-trodden of every age, and will visit with swift and terrible retribution all the guilty not only in Spain, but in every land. Let God's people bide God's time.

What Is the Everlasting Gospel?—No. 1.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

In the first chapter of Romans, sixteenth verse, the Apostle Paul declares: "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek."

The reason for this statement is that Christ is the sum and substance of the gospel, for Christ is the "power of God." 1 Cor. 1:24.

Any gospel that has no Christ in it does not have the power of God, and is a worthless thing.

Therefore the preaching of the everlasting gospel by the angel of Rev. 14:6, 7, is the preaching of the everlasting power of God, which is Christ.

That being so, that which Christ has to say to us in this everlasting gospel is: "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters."

As said last week, anything that detracts from this cannot possibly be the gospel, and therefore must be opposed to Jesus Christ.

What the result must be in such a case may be seen from 2 Thess. 1:7, 8: "But to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that OBEY NOT the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The gospel requires all to "Fear God." It must be perfectly plain that those who fail to do this do not obey the gospel, and therefore it must be on such that Christ will come to take vengeance.

How shall we fear God? The failure to do this as shown above is no light thing. No human authority is sufficient to answer this question. It must be settled by the Word of God, than which there is no higher authority. "For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven." Ps. 119:89. "Thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name." Ps. 138:2.

Before answering the question "How shall we fear God?" let us remember that all that the gospel requires of mankind is that we "fear God and give glory to him" . . . and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea and the fountains of waters." When man does this he does all that God himself can possibly require of him.

Now let us appeal to the Scriptures in finding the answer to the question "How shall we fear God?" The answer is found to be: "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man." Eccl. 12:13. Put this scripture by the side of the one in Rev. 14:6, 7, and let the reader point out the difference between them. There is none. But we read further: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; a good understanding have all they that do his commandments." Ps. 111:10. And yet again: "And unto man he said, The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding." Job 28:28. If to keep the commandments of God and to depart from evil are both "understanding," then to depart from evil is to keep the commandments.

Thus from all these texts it is plain that to "fear God" one must keep his commandments.

As therefore the everlasting gospel calls upon "every nation, kindred, tongue and people" to "fear God," and as to fear God one must keep his commandments, it is as plain as language can make it that the everlasting gospel calls upon all to keep the commandments of God; and it is equally plain that he who does not keep the commandments does not obey the gospel of Christ.

Another thing is equally plain. As has been already pointed out, anything that detracts from the fear of God cannot be the gospel, and as to fear God one must keep the commandments it is everlastingly true that anything that detracts from the commandments of God cannot possibly be the gospel of Christ. Still further: As Christ himself is the substance of the gospel, and anything that detracts from the commandments of God cannot be the gospel, it is absolutely certain that in the thing that so detracts there is no Christ.

The warning of the third angel could not be proclaimed until the time had come for that to be fulfilled against which the angel lifts his voice. And no one can deny that that against which the angel warns the people is the work brought to view in the prophecy of Rev. 13: 11-18.

Concerning this prophecy it has been shown that the beast that had the deadly wound and was healed (Rev. 13:2, 12) is the papacy; and that the two-horned beast (v. 11) is the United States. It has also been shown that the first beast mentioned above is identical with the "man of sin" (2 Thess. 2:4), who was to "exalt himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped, so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God showing himself that he is God."

That being so, the enforcement of the mark (Sunday) by which all are to be made to worship the papacy, would be a work carried on in this country ostensibly that worship may be rendered to God. In other words it would be represented as being genuine gospel work.

It has been further shown that that work has been going on for upwards of forty years, and it has been and still is being represented as gospel work. But as the prophecy shows, its success does not exalt God, nor does it result in causing him to be worshiped.

When therefore this work is carried on professedly as gospel work, and when the third angel lifts his warning voice, it is perfectly fitting that the first angel should be present with his message showing what the gospel of Christ really is. It could not be that which results only in causing the papacy to be worshiped; it could not be that which would enforce upon the consciences of the people that which the prophecy calls the "mark of the beast;" but it would be that which calls upon all to "fear God, and give glory to him;" it would be that which calls upon all to keep the commandments of God; and it would be that which furnishes the power in order that those commandments might be kept.

"A Sword in Every Line."

BY T. R. WILLIAMSON.

THAT is what King Olaf of Norway called for according to Longfellow, a song that should have "a sword in every line." Olaf was a heathen in spirit though a Christian in name. He had advanced toward the religion of Christ only far enough to wear the title of Christian, but his heathen blood still leaped at the sound of clashing steel and his ears tingled with pleasure at the singing of war songs.

When we think of the literature that has been fed to the people of the world for ages, for all the ages so far, we cannot wonder that the war spirit so easily rouses to life, and that men crowd the martial ranks at the call of the bugle and the drum. You can scarce find a poet of fame either in old times or later, whose most popular lines, the verses into which the utmost energy was thrown, were not a war poem. English and American young men attending college have been exercised in Homer's Siege of Troy, or Cæsar's Commentaries on the Art of War, or have been given Shakespeare to read, full to the brim with deeds of strife and bloodshed, or Scott with his talents all sounding out notes of battle, or Moore, or Byron, or Campbell, or Macaulay, and history itself is but a succession of descriptions of fights—Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander, Cambyse, Scipio, Pompey, Antony, Marlborough, Wellington, Napoleon, Washington, Grant.

These are the names that are spoken again and again, that histories are lighted with, and that the young male sex have always idolized, and do yet idolize. And the hosts of war always glare and blare in gold and blue and yellow and scarlet and feathers and brass.

And telling of these things, the literature of the world, history, poetry, or oratory, has through all time, like the song that King Olaf wanted, gleamed with a sword in every line. If a militia company is formed in a country town, they must, forsooth, march to a church, every once in a while, in full uniform, and have the minister preach to them, and set the eyes of the young all gazing with envy at the show of color, and glint of cloth and steel.

The military must have the place of honor every where, in a civic parade, in an agricultural fair, where stock and merchandize are supposed to be the chief attractions. And the crimes or misdeeds of a soldier, plundering, pilfering, marauding, are so covered over with glamour and splendor that they become deeds to imitate and emulate, rather than things to avoid.

Oh that people, especially young people, would learn that it takes just as much steady, honest, and honorable manhood to faithfully face irksome tasks day after day, at a continual plodding pace, as it does to storm a breach or to sink a fleet. It is the steady effort, continued through years of toil, either at study or at muscular labor, that builds the true heroic manhood.

Some time after the pension list of the last war had begun to grow large, a great laugh went the rounds at a joking pension claim, printed in the newspapers, that asked a pension for a crippled and ruined character, as a result of the war. The claimant urged that he had gone into the army a sober, modest, honest young man, and that in the service he had learned to drink, to smoke, and chew, to steal, to swear, and to be unchaste, and he thought these were as grievous hurts as if he had received a gunshot wound.

This may have been—presumably was—put out for a joke; but it was really no jest at all, and it will be repeated in this present war and in every war the world may ever see. That is what war does for its servants, its soldiers. That is war's natural teaching and tendency. I wish it were otherwise, or I wish it might be popular and pleasing to good people everywhere to tell them these things; but alas, people see heroism, where there is in addition to heroism all debasing circumstances. In active life the soldier is a marauder; in his quiet camp life he becomes an idler. And the accompaniments of his idleness are, in every camp, liquor, tobacco, gambling, and the other vices.

At home a man may have a wicked man for a neighbor, but he need not associate with him. In camp you have such for tent mates and for file comrades, for such men get into every company.

War draws such, and it makes more of the same kind.

Oh let us all pray that the day may hasten when the nations shall learn war no more.

THE last war between Russia and Turkey was undertaken by Russia in behalf of the Bulgarians, who had become the victims of Turkish atrocities. Of the result of this "war for humanity" the following is said in a recent number of the Review of Reviews:—

"To avenge the Bulgarian atrocities the Russians invaded Turkey, and for every Bulgarian man, woman and child who had been massacred by the Turks, two Russian soldiers fell in battle or died of disease, and probably at least double that number of non-combatant peasants—Bulgarian, Armenian, Turkish—were done to death between the contending armies. The Bulgarian atrocities were avenged, no doubt; but at a very low computation it cost five lives to avenge one."

Upon which a London journal makes the pertinent comment that war, as a remedy for the ills of humanity, is worse than the disease. Must this not be the thought that is to day in the minds of many of the starving Cubans?

The Bible and the Catholic Church.

As stated in another article, the Catholic News is so elated over the fact that an individual was led into the Catholic Church through the exclusive reading of the Bible that it gives over a column in the telling of it. After saying, "This man read no Catholic books, heard no sermons, was influenced by no living examples of the excellency of the true faith, but by the serious and unbiased reading of the Holy Scriptures discovered the pearl of great price," the News continues, "Yet the majority of adherents of Protestantism believe that the Catholics remain such merely because they are forbidden to read the Bible, and if once they could be induced to take it up and read there would be an overwhelming exodus from Rome."

If it is possible for a man to find his way to the Catholic Church through the exclusive reading of the Bible, why would not a careful reading of it keep him in the church after he gets there? If the reading of the Bible is not inimical to the Catholic Church, why are its members forbidden to read it? Yet everybody knows that the Catholic is forbidden to read the Bible, unless it is the Catholic Bible which has Catholic annotations.

Such confidence does the News have in this matter of reading the Scripture that it says, "The church may appropriately use to these outside her fold the challenge which her divine Founder uttered to the Jews on one occasion, 'Search the Scriptures, for ye think in them to have eternal life, and they do give testimony of me.'"

It is all very well to express such confidence in the reading of the Bible in this country which for the present is professedly Protestant; but it is an entirely different matter in countries which are dominated solely by the Catholic Church; for instance, Spain.

A CENTRIFUGAL gun, discharging 30,000 bullets a minute, has been invented by an English engineer. The bullets are poured into a case from a hopper and guided into a disk, three feet in diameter, revolving in the case at the rate of 15,000 revolutions a minute. They are discharged from the edge of the disk.

A PROCLAMATION has been read in the camps of the United States troops calling attention to an order by the President directing that no Sunday work be done by the military forces except work of necessity. Has the President forgotten about Manila? In view of what recently occurred there, it would seem very inopportune to overlook Sunday as a day suited to the successful prosecution of military operations.

* * *

This proclamation, of course, reflects the Sunday-observance sentiment that is always seeking for recognition in governmental affairs. It has for a precedent the proclamation issued during the civil war by President Lincoln, which enjoined "the orderly observance of the Sabbath by the officers and men in the military and naval service." This proclamation was issued November 16, 1862, and was followed in December by the disastrous battle of Fredericksburg, and by other misfortunes to the Federal arms which made the close of that year a time of marked depression and gloom throughout the North. If any attention was ever paid to these instructions by the armies in the field, it has not become a matter of history. But whether there was or not, it is certain that this document contributed nothing to the success of the national cause.

* * *

BUT on the first day of January, 1863, the President issued another proclamation—not a restrictive measure, but one of liberty—the Proclamation of Emancipation. The hand of the chief executive had at last touched the plague spot which had long been poisoning the body politic, and the beneficial effect was felt at once. When it was decreed that the image of God in man should no longer be degraded to the level of the brute creation, as a thing to be bought and sold, but that there should be "deliverance to the captives and the opening of the prison doors to them that were bound," the right chord was struck at last which gave forth the tones of victory. Almost from that day success came to the Federal arms. In the early spring General Grant moved against Vicksburg, and before the middle of summer the fall of that stronghold and the decisive defeat at Gettysburg sounded the knell of the Confederate cause.

IT is a curious fact which this religious proclamation brings to view, that the Government should feel bound to obey the fourth commandment, while it feels at liberty to break the sixth. If it is so essential to observe the one commandment, why is it not also essential to observe the other? The Government disregards the commandment which says, "Thou shalt not kill." It is held, of course, that it is all right for governments to do this; it is wrong for individuals—acting in a private capacity—to kill; but in war the killing is held to be justified because done by the government. But if breaking the sixth commandment is justifiable because done by the government, why is not breaking the Sabbath also justifiable when done by the government? While neither of these commands—or any others of the moral law—are as we believe addressed to civil governments, this fact does not relieve the inconsistency of the Government's attitude in this matter.

* * *

PROHIBITIONS of Sunday work are wont to exempt "works of necessity and mercy." This is the usual provision in the Sunday laws of the States. Now, since the war with Spain is, as we are told, a work of mercy in behalf of the suffering Cubans, who are doomed to starve while they wait, why should it not be considered proper to prosecute the war as vigorously on Sunday as on any other day of the week? If it be true that the war is one undertaken in the cause of suffering humanity, why is it not at all times a work of necessity and mercy? Is the President's proclamation to be taken as a denial of the necessity or mercy of this war?

* * *

ANOTHER curious thing—which looks inconsistent to us—about the war is the fact that the Government holds an indictment against General Calixto Garcia, a prominent Cuban leader, for aiding the Cubans against Spain, while it is now actually joining hands with him in carrying on that very work. The troops of the Government, acting under the orders of men who represent the Government, are coöperating with General Garcia's men in the attack on Santiago; and at the same time the Government holds this same General Garcia to be a criminal, he having "jumped" bail after having been indicted as above stated. The judicial authorities of the Government have refused to quash the indictment against him, while at the same time the military authorities of the Government are coöperating with him, and that in the very work for which he is held under the indictment. To comprehend the ethics of such matters is beyond our power. We can only fall back upon saying that "all is fair in love and war."

* * *

THERE is a popular belief that the command "Thou shalt not kill," does not apply to the case of the man who goes to war. Seeing this view set forth in a recent letter from a correspondent, we fell to pondering the question as to which act is really the worse—to kill your private enemy in time of peace, or to kill one or more of the "public enemy" on the field of battle?

* * *

IN the one case the individual kills a person against whom he has some grievance. His victim may be one who has done him a grievous injury. He has a reason in his mind which to him seems sufficient, for taking the other individual's life. But in battle, on the other hand, men shoot down other men who have done them no injury at all,—men against whom they feel no personal animosity, and with whom, under any other circumstances, they would be on terms of cordial friendship. We make some excuse for the man who acts in the heat of passion. Without at all justifying his deed, we recognize that there is a difference—all laws relating to murder and homicide recognize it—between such a case and that of the person who takes life with cool, deliberate calculation. In battle men take the lives of their fellows deliberately, urged neither by the heat of sudden passion nor by the sting of real or fancied injury. In which case is there shown the most cool disregard of human life and of the divine image which God has stamped upon his creatures?

* * *

A GOOD illustration upon this point is furnished by an incident of the civil war which devastated this country back in the sixties. The incident is that of the feat of a Confederate sharpshooter, Lamar Fontaine, in killing sixty men in sixty minutes. Mr. Fontaine carried after the war a written certificate of his deed signed by General Robert E. Lee, who witnessed its execution. The following mention of it was made not long since by a New York City paper:—

* * *

"It was in the battle of Waterloo Bridge, just below Warrenton, Va., in August, 1862, and immediately before the second battle of Manassas, that General Lee witnessed Fontaine's feat of killing 'sixty Yankees in sixty minutes.'

"Stonewall Jackson, under whom Fontaine served, was flanking Pope. The Confederate sharpshooters had possession of a long frame building, and were pouring death into Pope's ranks, when Lee rode up.

"The general had heard of Fontaine's wonderful ability as a marksman, and paid him a visit. A Federal battery was then directed on the sharpshooters.

"'Train your glass on No. 1, at gun No. 1,' Fontaine said to General Lee, 'and you will see him jump up in the air in a minute, and another man will have to take his place.'

"Then he went on and killed sixty men, one after another, each in about a minute, until Lee told him to stop.

"Doesn't your conscience ever hurt you when you do work of this kind?' inquired Lee.

"Why, general,' replied Fontaine, 'when I enlisted in the army it was with the understanding that I was to kill as many of the enemy as I could. If I had any conscientious scruples against it I would quit the army. Don't you expect us to kill?'"

AND thus, minute after minute for an hour, this man went on coolly taking the lives of his fellowmen, making widows and orphans, inflicting the most cruel suffering upon innocent people, taking away the natural protector from innocent little children, leaving them to suffer for want of the things the father would provide for their comfort,—and all this was a matter of no more concern to him than the killing of game by the sportsman; it did not cause a ripple upon the surface of his conscience. We cannot avoid querying if this represents the normal condition of the human mind. To us it appears monstrously abnormal, fully as much so, certainly, as that condition in which an individual does that which the law calls murder or homicide.

* * *

FONTAINE was a model soldier, so far at least as his conduct in battle was concerned. It is always desired that soldiers in battle shall take life coolly and deliberately, just as he took it; nor is it desired that they shall feel any conscientious scruples against it, for that would seriously detract from their value for military purposes. But we do not believe that such a condition of mind can be regarded as normal, much less Christian. In its normal condition there still remains in the human heart enough of the uprightness implanted by the Creator to cause an instinctive aversion to the taking of human life, whether for personal or political reasons.

The Significance of the Policeman.

THOSE persons who seized with such avidity, and who are constantly reiterating, the assertion of the Supreme Court "that this is a Christian nation," and who insist that civilization will soon produce the millennium, will do well to ponder carefully the following words by Editor Ridpath in the May Arena:—

"There is more in a policeman than appears on the surface. He is not so much a person as a fact. He is representative of much and expressive of little. He is said to stand for the state. If so, the state has a remarkable manner of revealing herself to the senses. This is true in particular of the Christian state. The Christian state is a sort of a professional entity that ought for the sake of consistency to be represented by something different from a bluecoat, a leer, and a billy.

"It seems, however, that civilization demands a policeman. If we are to reason from the facts, the higher stage of the civilized life requires an increased supply of policemen. This is what I am trying to explain. The more we civilize, the more we enlarge the Department of Public Protection. The Indians had no policemen. The seventy thousand inhabitants of Iceland have only one. A small Christian town in America requires several. The city must have many; the metropolis, an army. New York requires five thousand to keep her from robbing and killing herself."

And no larger "force" was required on the 28th of February, 1892, the day before these cities and towns were made(?) Christian by the declaration of the Supreme Court than has been required every day since. The policeman does mean something. He means for one thing that the authority which he represents is in no sense Christian. He is the living and substantial contradiction of the whole "Christian nation" fallacy. And if he means so much, what shall we say of armies and navies?

J. D. B.

Murderous Millinery.

"Present Truth." (London, Eng.)

THE following letter was sent to the editor of the Christian World. It can hardly be wondered at that Christianity is regarded by so many as a sham when those who appear in public as its advocates and adherents manifest so inconsistent a disregard for its principles of kindness and all-embracing love. If not a sparrow falls to the ground without the notice of the Father, how must he regard the slaughter of his creatures for the adornment of those who profess to be his servants?

"Sir,—It is an extraordinary thing that, despite all that has been said on the subject of 'murderous millinery' and the proved and reiterated statement that every graceful 'osprey' plume nodding in a woman's bonnet means the slaughter of a whole family of birds, under circumstances peculiarly revolting, Christian women, some of whom are leaders in Christian work, still wear these barbarous adornments. At the May meeting of the different religious societies, ospreys are everywhere—even on the platform. At one meeting a woman pleaded for self-devotion—with ospreys in her bonnet! At an important ladies' missionary gathering the lady who presided, and one of the missionaries who described the cruelties of Indian life, both wore ospreys. It is hardly conceivable that, after all that has been said and written on the subject, any woman can be unaware of the barbarity of the trade in ospreys. Perhaps some comfort themselves with the idea, sedulously fostered by drapers and milliners, that their ospreys are only 'imitations.' But in nineteen cases out of twenty the plumes are real, and are only called 'imitations' in order to salve the easily soothed consciences of the women who buy them. As Ruskin says, a woman who will wear relics of murdered birds in her headgear would almost make her dead baby into an ornament if fashion demanded it.

"Yours truly,

"A MAY MEETING WOMAN."

A letter to the Chronicle states that—

"Setting aside the sales in all cities and the sales that are made in towns and villages, and taking only the auctions in the city of London, there were recently sold the feathers or skins of 11,000 ospreys, 35,947 humming birds, 16,107 jays, 1,327 kingfishers, the aigrettes from 20,000 herons, and thousands of other birds."

Studies in French History.—26.

JULIA thought a great deal about the question her teacher had promised to answer. She had already made up her mind that the man who yielded moral principle to the force of circumstances, even to save his neck and his credit, was at least not the kind of man she should call a moral hero, even if he were a great preacher. Still, she was a little anxious to know how the teacher would decide the question. So when Tuesday afternoon came again, Julia was on hand a little more promptly than usual, and listened attentively to every word, as Professor Carman arose and began:—

"Before we begin the regular study to-day, I will answer Julia's question as to whether it is right to yield a point even to save life, when Christian principle is at stake. The good Book certainly admonishes us to live peaceably with all men as much as in us lies, but that does not warrant us in weakly yielding to evil. We have the example of many noble characters in the Bible, and also of Christ himself. Who can mention any of these instances? let's see the hands."

"The three Hebrew worthies," replied Joe Palmeter, quickly. "They ran the risk of the king's displeasure, and even when they knew it meant death to them, they would not yield."

"Well, teacher, seems to me there's a text somewhere about being in subjection to the powers that be," said Milly Brown, who could never bear to offer any opposition to anything for fear of hurting some one's feelings.

"But the very case that I have mentioned proves that this text doesn't apply in matters of conscience, Isn't that so, professor?" urged Joe, earnestly.

"I am certain it is so, Joseph. Now who can think of another case to the point?"

"I believe Daniel would insist upon praying with his windows up, when it meant death by the lions if he did it," said Max Smith.

"Seems to me, professor, it's almost a question of religious liberty, isn't it?" said Joe Palmeter—Joe never could hold his peace whenever that point was touched.

"Yes, I think so; for certain it is that to force anyone to make a statement which is known to be both false and unjust is not allowing him liberty of conscience. Now I think we may consider Julia's question answered.

"The quarrel for supremacy between the houses of Burgundy and Orleans did not end with the murder of the duke of which you learned last week. However, the Orleans party now came to be called the Armagnac, because of the marriage of the murdered duke's eldest son to a daughter of the Count of Armagnac. The next seven years was one period of unrest and trouble. First one and then the other of the contending parties was in the ascendancy.

"The worst class of society made this condition of things an excuse for all kinds of debaucheries and riots. If a villain wanted anything which he could not get by fair means, all he need do was to don the hood of blue worn by the Burgundians, or, if the other party happened just then to be the stronger, the white scarf of the Armagnac."

"I should imagine that the king of England would have taken advantage of the awful fix France was in, and have come over for a finger in the pie," said Florence Ray.

"Precisely what he did do, Florence. You are quite a strategic general. Yes, Henry V., of England, and many Frenchmen of royal blood met in the battle of Agincourt. The English were victorious; for the French were hot-headed and impulsive, while the English king took every advantage. After a while Normandy was entirely under the English rule.

"It was thought best, finally, to try to unite the two opposing French factions, and thus be better able to drive back the English. Finally, John the Fearless, the murderer of Orleans, met the young Dauphin Charles, son of the crazy king, on a bridge, where, under a pavilion raised for the purpose, terms were to be agreed upon whereby to ensure the greater peace and good of France. But while the duke was bending his knee to his sovereign's son, one of the king's attendants treacherously struck him on the head with a hatchet."

"I supposed that deed only aggravated the Burgundians," said Harry Ray.

"Of course; they did not seem at all to remember that God has said that vengeance was his, but they strove to mete it out themselves to their enemies, and a dreadful time they had of it; for now, instead of the two factions being united, Philip, son of John the Fearless took the side of the English, hoping thus to be better able to wreak his vengeance upon the hated Amagnacs.

"Queen Isabella, who hated her son, the dauphin, also joined the English, and the poor insane king signed a most shameful treaty, agreeing that he would give his daughter Catharine to England's king, and that after his death, Henry should be the king of France—thus virtually signing away his people and his country to England. Still the trouble does not end between the French people—they fight as desperately between themselves as ever.

"At last, after about two short years more, both the poor crazy Charles and King Henry die, though the latter dies first, and is constantly mourned for by King Charles, in whose wild fancy he takes the place of his own children, and when he died shortly after, it was with the name of 'dear son Henry' upon his lips. Then, as Edward Barnaby has told us in his essay, the people of France mourned for their hapless king, and when it was too late, arose to do him honor."

New Tracts.

THE three new numbers of the Apples of Gold Library treat of The Power of God, The Sabbath, and Coming of the Lord. Following is a description:—

Kept by the Power of God, No. 49, price 25c per 100. In this tract we are shown in verse and scripture how, when, where, why, and from what we are "kept by the power of God." Judging from the depth of thought and earnestness expressed, the author wrote from experience gained by a living faith. The reader will find in this tract much that will inspire to a life of faith.

The Day of the Sabbath, No. 50, price $1 per 100. A series of earnest questions on the subject of the Sabbath, covering most of its scripture phases, and bringing the truth home to every candid mind in the most direct, convincing, and least prejudicial way. Many of these questions have been successfully used by the author, Eld. S. W. Raymond, in his experience in the past.

The Heralds of His Coming, No. 51, price $1.50 per 100. Presents in a brief, yet clear and convincing way the fact that our Lord is coming again, the manner of his coming, and many of the chief signs which conclusively show that his coming is near. It is illustrated with a helpful diagram.

The coming of Christ is the greatest event before the world to-day, and this little tract is sent out with a prayer that it may, under the blessing of the Lord, convince men that this is really so.

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

(SECOND EDITION.)

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, it is not all of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one of the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, JUNE 16, 1898.

LAW is to be respected, not because it is law, but because it is the embodiment of right and justice. The fiat of the legislature cannot add anything to our personal obligation to do right.

THE New York Sun is authority for the statement that on June 9 the Western University of Pennsylvania conferred the degree of LL.D. on Admiral Dewey, in consideration of the fact that Dewey's ships have Pittsburgh armor plate on their sides, and that a member of the faculty manufactured some of the "range finders" used on Dewey's guns. It seems there are various ways in which a university degree may be gotten hold of these days.

"THE most murderous weapon ever invented" is a thing that is frequently being invented in these warlike days. The latest thing of the kind is a gun for throwing an aerial torpedo, and is devised by Mr. Hudson Maxim, brother of the inventor of the well-known Maxim gun. The projectile fired from this new gun can be filled with half a ton of high explosive, and be hurled—so it is said—as far as a shell from a modern high-power gun. Mr. Maxim is so anxious to try his new invention that he is trying to persuade the Government to let him use it against the Spaniards in Cuba, at his own expense for transportation and necessary preparations. He came all the way from England for this purpose. That is always the way with men who invent weapons of destruction, or who carry them around. They are always itching for a chance to try them; and if they can have a human target to experiment on, the affair simply becomes so much the more interesting to them.

A COMPROMISE seems to have been effected on the question of Sunday opening of the Trans-Mississippi Exposition. The present policy is to open the grounds and buildings Sunday afternoons, and to make religious gatherings and sacred concerts features of the fair at such times.

KENTUCKY distillers, it is said, propose to send 50,000 "one drink" bottles of whiskey to Cuba for the use of the American soldiers when they occupy the island. As the soldiers in Cuba evidently do not need anything beyond what the climate provides to keep them warm, at this season of the year, it is explained that the purpose of the whiskey is to put them in good fighting trim. That whiskey will do this for a soldier or any other person, is a perfectly sound claim; but it would be sad indeed if the men who went to the war under the inspiration of patriotism and love for humanity—as it is supposed the men of the army have gone—should have to fall back on whiskey to be enabled to prosecute the campaign. It is to be hoped the Government will not lend itself to any such scheme.

As has been stated frequently and at considerable length in the press reports, the volunteers for the army have been subjected to a rigid examination to ascertain their fitness for serving in the war. So rigid has this examination been that a large per cent. of the number failed to secure enlistment. But there is one thing that seems to have been strangely overlooked. It will be remembered that this is a Christian war—a war not only perfectly justifiable but actually demanded from the Christian standpoint. This has been declared so many times and with such positiveness by men in the pulpit as well as out of it that it is not to be supposed any question can be raised on that point. And yet we have not seen, so far, any intimation that a single one of the applicants for enlistment has been examined with reference to his Christianity. Apparently no interest whatever is taken by the authorities in the question whether the men are qualified from a Christian standpoint; but how can a Christian war be conducted by men unqualified as Christians? What is the explanation of this seeming oversight?

WHAT are you doing to educate the people of this country in the principles of religious liberty? What do you purpose to do during the remainder of this year to help preserve the freedom which has been the heritage of the American people? Nothing—did you say? Then do not fall into the error of thinking there will be nothing done on either side of this controversy. There are people in this country who are not so indifferent toward what they regard as their opportunities and duties in the matter. The other side are doing something. They are doing a great deal more than they ever were before, to create public sentiment in favor of the rigid enforcement of religious laws. They believe in a campaign of education, and they have begun such a campaign in earnest. If you do nothing to educate the people, they will be educated, nevertheless; but it will be just the opposite of the education they ought to receive; and a heavy load of responsibility and of consequences will fall upon you who know the evil and the danger of the modern "reform" movements which involve a union of religion with the state. The activity and earnestness of the church and-state party proclaim that the hour has come for the decisive effort in setting the truth before the people. The wise man is he who sees the opportunity when it comes and grasps it. Don't merely say, "I'm going to." The good things you are going to do never gave the devil any concern.

THE Ministerial Association of Reading, Pa., are conducting a prosecution of the Reading baseball club for Sunday ball playing. A press item says: "The regular city ball ground was not used, but another ground two miles from the city, far away from any houses. The games were quiet and orderly, and pleased thousands."

"BLESSED are the peacemakers."

"In the direction of peace," is upward.

THE natural offspring of tradition is error.

WAR and sin will go out of the world together.

THE carnal nature is always "spoiling for a fight."

To know God, is the only sure way to "know thyself."

EXPANSION is not always an indication of healthy growth.

ANY day in the year is a good day to declare your independence of the powers of evil.

It is better to be a "pessimist" with your eyes open, than an optimist with your eyes shut.

THE world has yet to invent a protective armor that is equal to the shield of Providence.

NATIONS, like individuals, perish far more frequently from internal disorders than from causes that operate from without.

WHEN the majority cease to feel any regard for the interests of the minority, the state has become unfit for self government.

THE person who believes that "the voice of the people is the voice of God," shows thereby that he is not familiar with the voice of God.

It is beyond the power of legislation to broaden the "narrow way" of righteousness so as to accommodate the multitudes who are under the sway of civil authority.

AN erroneous but all too common idea of patriotism makes it a pedestal for the exaltation of self. The true patriot is willing to serve others without the hope of acquiring wealth or fame.

It is affirmed in the Book of divine truth that there is "one God" and "one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus."

All men may come to God through Jesus Christ; and only through him can they come to God; for "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

But Jesus Christ is "the man Christ Jesus." And being a man, he is become the representative of the human race.

Thus in the government of God, which covers all our relation to him, we have a representative, "the man Christ Jesus." He stands before the Father's throne as the representative of all on earth who have accepted him as their Saviour. And God views all such as complete in him.

There is, however, a doctrine in the land which proclaims that man may represent his fellowman in religion; that religious acts may and ought to be done by the Government, in which each official is the representative of the people. It is the very common doctrine that "this is a Christian nation." The declaration means that the officials of the Government ought to act for the people in religion.

Manifestly, this idea is wholly contrary to Christianity. One person cannot have faith for another; nor can one be righteous for another. If the people are sinful they must suffer for their sins, and no righteousness on the part of any official, from the President down, could save them. Speaking of a sinful land, the Lord by the prophet Ezekiel says (Eze. 14:13, 14): "Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness."

The only righteousness which can save the sinner is the righteousness of Christ, which every person may receive by the exercise of faith. No government can give righteousness to anybody. There is no righteousness in the universe but God's righteousness, for he alone is righteous of himself; and his righteousness is the righteousness of Christ. And having God's righteousness Christ is perfectly fitted to be man's representative in religion; and he alone, of all beings in heaven or earth, is so fitted.

The "Christian race" must be run—the Christian life lived—looking not to the state, but "unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith." Heb. 12:1, 2. To look to the state in any matter of religious faith or practice is to look away from Jesus and to depart from the foundation principle of Christianity.

THE state is the embodiment of power. By power it lives and moves and has its being. Take away the power and there is nothing left of the state.

States are, by their very nature, independent powers. When the state yields to another power, its own identity is lost, and it remains but a part of the conquering power so long as the authority of the latter is exercised over it.

But the state cannot be Christian without yielding to another power and thus surrendering its independence. For the first step in Christianity is submission to the will of God. The state therefore would simply lose itself in the government of God. In that government there are no states.

And it is a truth which all Christians know, that no person can become Christian without first passing through death. The Apostle Paul says that he was "alive" before being converted to Christianity, but that "when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died." Rom. 7:9. And his experience is that of all Christians. Man, as he was before conversion, must die, before he can become Christian.

Christianity means a new creation. All that is of earth, must have a new creation before the stamp of Christianity can appear upon it.

And this utterly debars the state. For as nothing can become Christian without first passing through death, the state would simply pass out of existence in the endeavor to acquire the stamp of Christianity.

There is no "new birth" for a state.

The New World-Power.

BETWEEN Spain and the United States there exists, and there has existed for some time, a state of war. As for the actual element of war, there has been so far very little. Yet from the little that there has been, there have already sprung prospects of possibilities that are of most profound interest to every soul in the United States, whatever his view or his attitude concerning it.

As a matter of fact, the incidents of this controversy are of far more importance to the country than all the actualities put together, so far. It is these things that the AMERICAN SENTINEL is watching and studying with most absorbing interest. We are not, in these things, criticising; we are simply calling attention to important developments.

One of these, which we have pointed out, is the distinct advance made, and point gained, by the papacy in her designs with regard to the United States. More will be heard from that before the controversy shall be ended.

Another is the proposal and prospect of an alliance between Britain and the United States.

And now a third is the proposal and serious prospect of a world career to be seized and followed by the United States all on her own part. This prospect has already become so tangible as to excite the serious attention of leading and thinking men both for it and against it. The most calm and considerate view of the situation as it is, that has yet appeared, is set forth by Col. T. W. Higginson in Harper's Bazar of June 11, under the title "A New World-Power," the substance of which is as follows:—

"It startles one a little to turn back to Bacon's Essays and read there the quiet remark, made three hundred years ago (in the essay on the 'Greatness of Kingdoms'), that the only two nations of Europe which excelled in arms were the Spaniards and Turks; though he admits 'great declination' as to the latter race. He little dreamed that a few hours in the bay of Manila were to reveal the existence of a wholly new power, which in his day had not even been born on the planet, and before which the Spanish race should apparently be destined to yield. It has been given to few men and to few events to construct so much of human history as was accomplished in those few hours by Admiral Dewey. Not only did it seal the downfall of one great world-power, but the arrival of another; and it will cost all the power of resistance on the part of moderate men to keep this country from following the steps of England into an imperial position on the globe. It is a curious fact that the Monroe doctrine—'let the Western Hemisphere alone and we will let the Eastern Hemisphere alone'—was the attitude held to be radical only so long ago as the days of Cleveland and Olney. Yet those who now hold that same Monroe doctrine, and propose to abide by it, are taunted as conservatives. There have been in political history few greater and more sudden transformations of public opinion.

"When the Athenian general Themistocles was asked to touch a lute at a feast, he said that he could not play on that instrument, yet he could make a small town into a great city. No matter how large the country, the temptation to make it larger is just as strong. Rome means to us the Roman Empire, and England the British Empire. There are none now living who can personally recall the excitement provoked when Jefferson bought the vast Louisiana territory in 1803; but although it was a direct violation of all his political theories, and perhaps actually unconstitutional, it evidently swept the nation and practically annihilated the opposing party. There are many living who uttered the threat, 'Texas and disunion;' yet who would now be willing to forego the national possession of Texas? It would certainly be the same with the much distrusted Alaska. It is inevitable that those who have seen, again and again, these successive steps in enlargement of our territory should be tempted to raise the cry of 'manifest destiny.' It is inevitable as the temptation, when a man has already enlarged his farm by buying an adjoining lot on the northeast, that he should look with increased favor on the offer of another adjoining strip on the southwest, and so on indefinitely.

"Yet the farmer who yields much to such temptations is pretty sure to come to grief sooner or later, and it is the severest test of the judgment and self-control of a nation when it knows how to stop. Practically, this nation holds Alaska by the grace of England, just as England holds Canada by the grace of this country; and perhaps this recognized interchange of hostages is a sufficient guarantee. The case is very different when we plan to go far from home and to become occupants of islands which may involve us with all the leading powers of the world. All the entanglements of the older nations become partly ours when we once set foot on their very ground. What is worse, all the safeguard of the Monroe doctrine vanishes, for there is no reason why those nations should not proceed to parcel out South America as they have Africa, the moment we depart from the traditions of Monroe. All this is to bequeath to our children a wholly different world of policy from that which their parents have dwelt in—a formidable result to follow from a few hours of target-practice at Manila.

There will be involved also the enormous expense and labor of keeping up an army and navy on the scale of European nations. And this, with our vast scale in the payment of pensions—an expense far exceeding that of European nations—will affect all taxation, and consequently our whole habits of living. Nothing that we can do in any foreign waters will be worth half so much to the world as to perpetuate a successful republic on this continent; and to endanger that is to forfeit our chief mission on this planet.

The only republic that ever went over this ground before was the republic of Rome. And when Rome once became imperial in territory, it was but a little while before she became both imperial and imperious in spirit, and then it was but a little while before she became imperial in government.

Anybody who is really acquainted with the course of Rome, can readily appreciate the wisdom of the following words of Harper's Weekly of June 11, 1898:—

"The sound American believes in the genius of the republic and in the virtue of its institutions. His government was founded for the benefit of the individual citizen. Its task is the most beneficent of all the tasks performed by government the world over. Its burdens rest so lightly upon its citizens that they hardly realize its existence. It makes mistakes; it is sometimes ignorant; it is often awkward; it exasperates us; it is frequently inefficient as it is; it would be always inefficient if the burdens of large military establishments and of colonial government were imposed upon its executive power. Its virtues lie very largely in this executive weakness. But awkward and mistaken, inefficient and exasperating as it often is, it has worked more lasting good in the world than all the other governments combined. It does not govern colonies. It governs no man against his will, or without his consent expressed as to the smallest detail. Its accomplishments for the human race and its virtues are the consequences of its differences from other governments. Other governments can manage colonies because they possess the machinery for ruling men against their wills, for levying taxes without the consent of those who pay them. In the elements and features of our Government, which differ from those of Europe, lie its Americanism, and those who wish to maintain the government as it was framed and as it has existed until now are the true Americans, while those who want to go abroad in distant oceans for new territory thus express their distrust in our institutions, and their longing for a return to the flesh-pots of Egypt."

A Higher Motive Needed Than Patriotism.

BY T. R. WILLIAMSON.

PATRIOTISM of the right kind is certainly a noble quality. Any man with a man's heart in him must love the neighborhood where he was brought up, where his parents lived, and his near and dear relatives, his playmates, and where he went to school, or to the worship of God on days of worship. These scenes are invested with a sacred charm and a man naturally loves them. And to love the nation is simply a broadening of this love of home, of neighborhood. But no matter how strong this love of country may be, it is not the highest actuating motive in human life.

The newspapers are blowing great gusts of fervid patriotism over the land, in order, largely, to sell papers, and from the way they go on, and from the way people talk who are set going by the papers, one would naturally suppose that there was no other main spring to life and action that can compare with love of country.

But this is a mistake. The highest life motive is that which prompts a man to high, pure living, to noble manhood, to making the best of himself in every way that he knows in order that he may correctly represent and serve the cause of humanity, the interests of the race. Millions are ardent patriots who yet debase their manhood in the very dust by using intoxicating drinks.

Patriotism, though a noble passion, yet may be and often is fervently and strongly felt in saloons as the drinks go around to "one country and one flag," or as the German patriots put it, "Ein country, ein flag, zwei lager."

Patriotism may and often does stir the hearts in dens of vice to earnest wishes for the success of the national arms, but the love of country does not mold anew the character, the aspirations, the life, of any who frequent those places. Patriotism as a life reformer is altogether inadequate to the task.

The nation has called out two hundred thousand men to fight its battles, and seven hundred thousand have applied, and yet it has been a difficult matter to fill the call with healthy, able men, because of the prevalent habit of cigarette smoking. And though this fact is widely known it is certain that cigarette smoking, unless the law shall stop it in defense of the needs of the army, will go on as largely as ever.

Men and boys are ready to rush headlong into a charge, for their country, ready to sail straight into the teeth of deadly batteries, over mines and torpedoes and hidden death and mangling, ready to do and dare to the very utmost to serve the nation; but where are the men who are willing to live a pure, manly, noble life, for the nation?

It is not only charging, fighting, dying, frenzied heroes, that the country wants. It is men who shall be able to endure all hardships from day to day with the best possible chance of living through them, who shall be able to stand coarse fare, sleeping out, unhealthful surroundings, and to take all these with equable temper and patient performance of duty. And this want patriotism alone can never fill.

What is wanted by the nation and by the times is men of character, of pure life, of right habits, of earnest will, of loyal behavior, under all circumstances.

Such men are always in demand, and not the love of any earthly country can train them. Such men can only be trained by the love of heaven, the love of God, the enduring love of the meek and holy Christ.

A Dark Future.

It is surprising with what unanimity thinking men of every complexion and shade of political faith recognize the unwelcome truth that by the present war and, especially by the capture of the Phillipine Islands, the United States has been drawn into the maelstrom of world politics.

Only a few weeks ago the leading powers of Europe, the kings of the West, became by the initiative division of China, "kings of the East" (Rev. 16:12); and now by a war, started with no reference whatever to Eastern affairs, but wholly for the liberation of Cuba, the United States has become an interested party,—one of the powers that must necessarily have a voice in all matters affecting the East. It is thus that suddenly and unexpectedly the world is prepared for the final act in the tragedy of history.
