That the very last days of the history of this present world are to be marked by armies of unparalleled magnitude, and by conflicts the most bloody ever witnessed, is known by even the cursory reader of the Sacred Scriptures. For a quarter of a century soldiers and statesmen, judging alone from the condition of affairs in Europe and in the East, and without reference to the word of God, have foreseen a conflict likely to change entirely not only the map of Europe but of Asia and Africa as well. And while all this time the evidence has been sufficient to convince practically all men that such a conflict was impending, it has within the last month become almost a matter of sight. The world sees that it is coming. The only question is, when will the storm burst that is to wreck empires, overturn kingdoms and swallow up in its vortex of destruction the flower of the manhood of all civilized nations.

Ever since war with Spain became a fact, and even before hostilities actually commenced, an Anglo-American alliance was hinted at as one of the possibilities. It was even suggested that a triple alliance might be formed between the United States, England, and Japan. Now that war is no longer an eventuality but an accomplished fact, the friendly attitude of England cannot be mistaken. That some sort of an understanding exists between the authorities at Washington and the British Government, can scarcely be doubted. That it is in the form of an alliance nobody believes, for under our system of government such an alliance would have to be entered into by treaty, which would have to be ratified by the Senate; but that England is rendering the United States a service in the present emergency for which she may in the future justly expect a substantial return is not open to question.

Of course from the standpoint of patriotism and without reference to the future, the idea of an alliance of the Anglo-Saxon nations appeals strongly to most Americans, but in view of the impending conflict which all men have long seen must involve all Europe, and which it is now seen will almost certainly involve the whole world, one can only tremble at the knowledge that this Government has entered upon a career that can end only in involving it in a war more awful than anything that this world has ever yet witnessed.

Discussing this question editorially, in connection with the recent significant speech by Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, British Secretary of State for the Colonies, the St. Louis Republic, of May 17, asks, "Is it possible that we have been swiftly swept into this tempestuous sea of world politics?" and then says: "Chamberlain assumes that we have and rejoices because of it. Mr. Chamberlain counts on too much. We are not ready to enter into foreign alliances." And then as though overwhelmed by a sense of the stupendous force of probable circumstances, the Republic adds: "But the future may force us beyond our traditional policy."

Sure enough! And not only may the future force us beyond our traditional policy, but the future is certain to so force all who do not speedily avail themselves of the only refuge that can possibly be of any avail in the time of trouble just before us. "God is our refuge and strength. A very present help in [this impending] trouble." In Him is safety. Out of Him there is nothing but certain destruction.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

IN prosecuting the Scientific Temperance Educational work of the W. C. T. U. as it concerned schools and colleges, it would have seemed when a State legislature had been persuaded into giving the authority of law to our efforts that at least the Rubicon had been crossed; and I am afraid that many of even our most earnest women had such an impression, and thought the time to "slack up" a little might be at hand. But there was yet many a perilous passage for the heroic leader in this enterprise and her band of devoted co-laborers. Not yet did the wisest fully understand the cunning of the foe with whom we had to deal; nor could they dream of the alert interest with which that foe watched every move of the W. C. T. U.; nor how deeply he was concerned as to the possible consequences to his business of even a simple call to prayer, or a meeting for consultation by a little band of timid women known as a "committee."

It took us years to find out how we were appreciated by the saloon power and why; we could not comprehend the motives that were back of its activities. It was almost impossible for us to separate the father from the man. We could but suppose that every father would be glad of any truth that would save his son from drunkenness, and protect his daughter from the fate of a drunkard's wife, even if it did interfere with so called business. So we felt that in this Scientific Temperance Educational plan we had something upon which all would unite, especially if the legislatures would give us the right sort of help. We had become a little shy of legislatures; but the people—they would surely be with us in this. And after the laws had been granted in State after State, with so many tokens of appreciation, what could be in the way of success?

The next step was taken with new courage. A literature was demanded. School books would be a necessity, such as would clearly set forth the principles which the new law required should be taught in the public schools. Mrs. Hunt, as the head of this department, began at once the labor of supplying this demand from the most scientific sources; and others began to make provision also; for the eye of greed had at once seen that there was "money in it;" and the liquor traffic, realizing what it would mean to its business to have the boys made afraid of all alcoholic liquors; and the dealers in tobacco, what it would mean to them to have the true science of their product fully unfolded to the ambitious minds of growing athletes, both had their eyes upon that Scientific Temperance Educational department and its laws, and began to plan to meet it on its own ground.

Books was a game that two could play at; and could not publishers and school superintendents, as well as teachers, be influenced by such considerations as great business interests might possibly bring to bear? Judging all the world from their own standpoint, they naturally thought that any people but "women who had no sense" could be influenced; and thus began a war of wits and of influences; with truth, prayers, and life itself on one side; error, destruction, hard cash and cunning on the other. Books have been met with books; total abstinence, as a scientific principle by a so-called science, which is always willing to lend itself against truth for the sake of its client, Self-Indulgence. It has been a bitter contest and the end is not yet.

It would be of interest to read the history of investigation and its counterfeit, assumption. It would be a revelation of intrigue, duplicity, and fraud, such as could scarcely be believed, but of which the reports are carefully kept, as one belligerent always keeps any weapons which chance to fall into his hands, against a time when they might be turned upon the enemy.

The position of the W. C. T. U. concerning the use of alcoholic drinks was taken at first on what might be called a deliberate impulse; and, because it was so manifest that the drug was an enemy to every live tissue, we had the utmost confidence that science would "support the motion," with the force of a "unanimous vote." And yet as attack after attack has been made upon the point in question, while we have never for an instant doubted that the eternal truth was standing by us, it has often been a question as to whether we should be so able to bring those who were standing between us and the growing children, to acknowledge it; and so give the children a fair chance to know, beyond cavil, just what the truth is, before this generation, like so many before it, should become a prey to vice. And as so many years have already passed, and the controversy is still so fiercely waging, and the laborers are dropping so rapidly by the way, but for the knowledge that truth is truth forever although it may lie covered with chaff at the bottom of the bin, the stoutest hearts would begin to fail them in this struggle.

At different times it has seemed as though the enemy had really stolen a march on us, captured the fort, and turned the long range guns of educational influence which the White Ribbon Host had mounted, directly upon the innocent rank and file of the Nursery Brigade, and were about to sweep them all into the awful ruin of a besotted age. But by the almost superhuman efforts which have been put forth, and by the blessing of the Holy Spirit whose light sets all things in their true relation one to another, the danger that science shall be made to even appear to stultify herself on this question seems to have passed. She has spoken for us in reply to our questioning, and it is now a recognized fact that the text books on physiology which carry the indorsement of the National W. C. T. U. are scientifically accurate; all so-called scientific utterances against our position to the contrary notwithstanding; and from this time on, as Mrs. Hunt said at the last National Convention, "Negligent school boards will be responsible for the drunkenness of the future."

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

It has already been shown that the message of Rev. 14:6, 7 is due to be proclaimed to the world at the very time when the work having in view the enforcing of "the mark of the beast" (papacy) upon the consciences of the people is in progress whereby they will be compelled to render homage to the papacy instead of to God.

The proof that this is so lies in the fact that the three angels of Rev. 14:6-9, each having a special message to proclaim, go together, as is indicated in the word "followed" which here means "to go with," and so they proclaim their messages at one and the same time, and, be it remembered, to the same people. And the message of the third angel is a solemn warning against the worship of the beast and his image, and the receiving of his mark, etc.

It has also been pointed out that the work of enforcing the mark of the beast would be carried on under the idea that it was a gospel work, and with the thought that thereby God would be honored and glorified.

This will be still more apparent when we remember that were it carried on under any other guise the truth concerning it would be perfectly understood, and many, who now will be deceived by it, would turn away from it with horror. In no other way than as a gospel work could it possibly succeed.

This is not to be wondered at, for we are told that "Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light; therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed into ministers of righteousness, whose end shall be according to their works." 2 Cor. 11:14, 15.

But none need be deceived by this work, for all who will may know what the genuine gospel is; and "if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost; in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ should shine unto them." 2 Cor. 3:3, 4.

This genuine gospel is preached, when it calls upon all to "fear God, and give glory to him." There is no other gospel, and there can be no other. And in this most direct way we are brought face to face with the supreme question as to whether we will "fear God and give glory to him;" at a time too when even superhuman—not supernatural, be it observed—power will be displayed to prove that the mark of the beast is the mark of God. For the controversy is to reach a point when to apparently settle the question, fire will be brought down from heaven (Rev. 13:12, 14),—the great masterpiece of deception,—and thus a lie will be proven(?) to be the truth.

In the last article it was shown that he who fears God will keep his commandments; and as the message of Rev. 14:6, 7 is a call for all to fear God, it is really a call to keep the commandments.

If in these articles there has been given a correct exposition of Rev. 13:11-16, and the work brought to view would be carried on as a gospel work—inasmuch as the true gospel, in the scripture under consideration, is a call to all to keep the commandments of God, it would follow that this pseudo-gospel work would also be a call to keep, professedly, the commandments of God. In either case, then, in the very nature of things, some point in the commandments would be the test of our obedience to the gospel, and that particular point would be the mark. Let this point be noted carefully. It will lead us infallibly to the absolute truth in the matter. There is no possibility of making a mistake.

As we have seen, the gospel of Rev. 14:6, 7 is a call to keep the commandments. That being so, and it being therefore a question of keeping the law, appeal must be made to the law itself. From this there can be no escape. The law itself must be the standard. What saith the Scripture?—"To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Isa. 8:20

There is only one commandment in the Decalogue over which there could possibly be any controversy of the nature brought to view in the prophecy under consideration. For be it remembered, as set forth above, there is some point in the law concerning which the people would be at variance, and it is over that particular point concerning which efforts would be made to coerce the consciences of men. That particular point is the Sabbath of the fourth commandment. We repeat: Concerning the fourth commandment only could any one's conscience be coerced, so that before his fellowman he would be made to appear as though he were reverencing God.

The inevitable logic of the whole matter is that the Sabbath of the fourth commandment is the test of one's obedience to the law and to the gospel, and is therefore the mark of loyalty to God.

That being so, as already shown, the law itself must decide the question. There can be no other source of appeal.

What, then, does the law say with reference to the matter of the Sabbath? The answer is plain and unmistakable: "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." The seventh day therefore is the mark of God. Any other day claiming to be the Sabbath, and sought to be enforced in the place of the seventh day, would be the mark of the beast.

The Lust of Conquest.

"The Christian Advocate," New York City.

THE intoxication of partial success and the mania for expansion have already so turned the heads of many that they say Washington in his farewell address did not have in view the possible development of the United States, but only suggested the course for the republic to pursue in its infancy. No sober mind can believe this proposition.

"Europe," said Washington, "has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. . . . Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyances, when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest guided by justice shall counsel." The underlying idea of Washington in his address is the permanent isolation of the United States, the keeping ourselves free from such relation to foreign governments as would necessitate us "to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of the politics of Europe, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities."

He knew perfectly well what tendencies would be developed in the nation. No prophet saw more distinctly the peril which prosperity would bring in its train; hence he closed by saying:—

"In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish,—that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism, this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare, by which they have been dictated."

Toss Washington's farewell address to the winds; affirm that the time has come for the United States to set up a policy of imperialism, to compete with England, France, Germany, and Russia in colonizing the far East! That will at least have the merit of consistency; but the insinuation that Washington did not foresee the very situation in which we now are, stamps the person or the paper who makes it as already far along toward that color-blindness which puts "bitter for sweet, and calls evil good."

made necessary by the capture of Manila." "Reassert our claims upon Samoa; we shall then have stepping-stones through the whole Pacific." "Awake to the fact that together with the Philippines come the Mariana Islands, the Pelews, and the Carolines." These stretch eastward from the Philippines about forty-five degrees of latitude. On that basis the cry is raised "that a little further north and east are the Hawaiians. Should the United States then build one of the isthmian canals, she will not only control the oceanic water passage, but in the most strategic portion of the Pacific Ocean she can, as it were, cross that vast expanse of ocean upon her own stepping-stones."

Nor have the buccaneer party forgotten the Canaries and Balearic Isles. The former they will turn into a huge fortified sanitarium and prospecting center for our share of Africa. The Balearic Isles will intrench us in the heart of Europe. They add that "of course these acquisitions will widen the market for American capital and products; and we must be ready to dig ship canals, lay ocean cables, and enlarge our army and navy so as to equal those of any other nation."

Judging from what we have seen as respects war and other measures, and the efforts of the majority of the representatives in Congress and in the press, of each of the great parties, to outrun each other, it is quite within the bounds of possibility that there may be "a division of parties on issues compared with which tariff and finance may seem small."

It is cause for regret that the President of the United States has committed himself so earnestly to the annexation of Hawaii as to make it almost necessary, in the estimation of many of his congressional constituents, to enter upon this course. It has been a great stimulus to all other schemes of territorial aggrandizement.

Once entered upon, we may be sure that it will be carried to the last extent. One of the greatest evils resulting from one act of folly, in individuals or in nations, is the necessity, under the color of consistency and under the impulse of the force developed, of an indefinite number of acts of equal or greater folly. Rarely are men or nations willing to acknowledge in the face of the world that their past actions were unwise.

When that great standing army and that immense navy shall have been gathered, and the United States shall be competing with the monarchies and republics of the Old World, the idea that it can escape the complications and the final overthrow which destroyed every large republic on the face of the globe, prior to itself, is an illusion born of covetousness and vanity.

The worst of it is that those legislators who launch it upon such a career will neither suffer upon the field of battle, in the present war, nor have to endure any of the final consequences which their frenzy will entail upon the generations that come after them.

"My sheep hear my voice."

WAR, though it may be begun professedly in the name of humanity, is never long conducted, even professedly, on that principle. Sooner or later it becomes a war of retaliation and conquest, and beside these every other sentiment sinks into insignificance. It was all very well to talk about the high and unselfish motives which prompted the interference with Spain in Cuba, before any loss had been sustained by the American forces; but when the "Maine" was blown up, the cry was everywhere raised, "Remember the Maine," and in every engagement that has been the animating sentiment in the minds of those representing this country; and now that some loss is being sustained by the troops investing Santiago, and Spanish soldiers have committed barbarities upon the dead bodies of some of their foes, the cry is raised for vengeance upon them because of these indignities.

* * *

THAT is the way it always has been and will be. When one side inflicts a severe loss upon the other, or sustains such a loss, as must sooner or later happen, the burning desire is to get even, to avenge the loss, and to wipe out the memory of the disaster. Such are always the animating motives in carnal warfare; and this war with Spain is no exception. First it was said that it must be undertaken as a high and sacred duty. Next it was said that Spain must be chastised on account of the "Maine;" then when the country had heard from Manila, it was said that the war must be prosecuted to establish an American Empire; and now it is said that Spain must be chastised as a nation of barbarians. And with every fresh ground for indignation and fresh desire for retaliation and conquest which is furnished in the course of events, there will be less said or thought about the interests of humanity which seemed to be paramount at the start. The church must find some other ground for giving her sanction to the war.

THE physical examination of applicants for military service under the Government, has revealed a fact which the Government may well view with apprehension. It has been found that a large per cent. of such applications have to be refused, because of injury the applicant has experienced from the use of tobacco; principally in the form of cigarettes. And what lends particular force to this fact is the further fact that this percentage has largely increased since the time of the Civil War, when similar examinations were conducted under the calls for volunteers then made.

IN the light of these facts it is easily seen that the cigarette is nothing less than a deadly enemy of the United States Government. It is really a much worse enemy than Spain. It disqualifies for service a much larger number of American citizens than would be disqualified by death and wounds in any ordinary war; and for all this there is no compensation in the way of loss to the enemy. The enemy keeps ever fresh and vigorous. Its harmfulness is not particularly felt under the circumstances attending war with a decadent power like Spain. But should there be war with a strong power, the seriousness of the evil which the cigarette has inflicted upon the nation would be painfully felt. A soldier physically unable to execute orders in a military campaign is as useless as one who would refuse to obey them.

NOR all the spies that Spain is reputed to have in her employ, nor all the traitors that may be in the land, can do the Government the injury that has been and is being done by the cigarette. Will the Government then recognize this baneful thing as a deadly foe and make its attitude toward it that of an enemy? If the cigarette is an enemy to the Government—as it clearly is, and a most dangerous one at that—why should not the Government be an enemy of the cigarette? Clearly, that would be the only consistent course.

* * *

UPON physical grounds, it is much better that men should not indulge in tobacco and intoxicants than that they should not rest from labor one day in seven. Yet the Government has never shown any disposition to curtail indulgence in these things, while it has exhibited unmistakably a disposition to curtail popular indulgence—if we may use the term—in work. The inconsistency can be explained only by admitting that the real reasons for the curtailment of labor one day in the week, are religious.

* * *

RECENTLY the "dynamite cruiser"—"Vesuvius"—was given a trial of her qualifications for actual warfare, in front of the fortifications of Santiago harbor, Cuba. Three shots were fired from her pneumatic guns, and upon observing their effect, the idea of which the "Vesuvius" is an embodiment was pronounced to be of the greatest practical value. The vessel is looked upon as a great success, and it is probable that steps will soon be taken by the Government to extend its military power in the direction of that which this new type of vessel represents.

THE underlying idea of the pneumatic gun is the use of high explosives. These could not be used in the projectiles fired from ordinary cannon, on account of the danger of explosion from the shock the projectile receives when propelled by gunpowder. This danger is overcome in the dynamite gun by using compressed air in the place of gunpowder as the propelling force. The projectiles are filled with gun cotton or nitro-gelatine, the latter being a more powerful explosive than dynamite. The guns of the "Vesuvius" can throw two hundred pounds of this high explosive a distance of several miles; and no vessel afloat would be able to survive even a single blow struck by such a power. There are some of these guns in the forts at the entrance of New York harbor, and some at the entrance of San Francisco harbor. As an experiment one of the latter was used recently to throw a projectile filled with this high explosive across the Golden Gate, a distance of one mile, into some rocky hills on the opposite side; the result being that a hole was blown in the solid rock where the projectile struck, thirty feet deep and sixty-five feet in diameter.

THAT we have reached a time in the history of the world when such appalling agencies of destruction are being discovered and eagerly sought for by the governments of the earth for military uses, is a very significant fact. The use of such things in warfare cannot but have a most baneful effect upon the minds of those who become familiar with them. Human life has been held cheaply enough in the past, even in the most "civilized" warfare; but with the use of these new agencies, it is only to be expected that it will soon come to be held more cheaply than ever. And when human life is held cheaply there is not likely to be a very stable condition of peace.

Futility of Arbitration to Avert War.

In making note of the "fourth annual Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration," recently held at Lake Mohonk, the New York Sun makes the following comments upon the idea of a coming era of general peace through the establishment of the arbitral method of settling national disputes:—

"It is a queer time for plans of international arbitration. The war between the United States and Spain is a striking evidence of the futility of international arbitration, except in comparatively picayune matters or where one of two nations at controversy is really willing to yield to the other. When the feelings of either nation are strongly stirred, as the feelings of Americans were by the long misrule of the Spaniards in Cuba and by the destruction of the "Maine," the talk of arbitration is preposterous. . . .

"It may be taken for granted that so long as a majority of the American people retain their common sense they will not submit any really important matter to arbitration. If any vital interest of the United States is menaced seriously, it must be protected by the strong hand. There is no other sure way of protecting it. A claim of right cannot be sacrificed to the chances of arbitration, which at the best is a mere lottery.

"Judge Rufus B. Cowing, of this city, told the Mohonkers, perhaps with some ironical intention, that 'altruism' was needed to 'secure arbitration and the dethronement of our armies and navies.' Precisely. But what would an altruistic nation be? A nation ready to prefer the interests of some other nation to its own. In other words, a fool nation. A country conducted on the altruistic plan would soon be driven to the wall.

"In view of the fact that arbitration is a hopeless humbug in the case of many strikes of workmen, the attempt to apply to the nations of the world a principle that is frequently a failure when applied to a bakery or shoe shop or any other small concern is amusing. Do the Mohonkers want an International Board of Arbitration that will vie in usefulness with that illustrious court, the New York Board of Mediation and Arbitration?

"Until national patriotism dies, and is supplanted by a feeling of international solidarity, or whatever our Socialist philosophers call it, international arbitration, save in the matter of unregarded trifles, must remain a foppery and a toy. The reasonably distinguished and generally amiable gentlemen who aired their views of arbitration at Lake Mohonk might, with as much practical effect upon the policy of nations, have discussed the question, 'Do the inhabitants of Mars shave?' "

"War About A Bucket."

Co. 12, Nat. Mil. Home, Ohio, June 11th, 1898.

EDITOR OF AMERICAN SENTINEL:—As a subscriber to and reader of your paper, please permit me to make a small complaint. On p. 363, you quote from The Oriental Watchman an article, "War About a Bucket"—"a long and bloody war"—while in your comments thereupon you do not so much as mention to your readers another "War About a Bucket" quite as notorious and promising to be as bloody as that of A. D. 1005. Your paper is not lacking in comments elsewhere upon the "Bucket War" to which allusion is here made; but the subject was made so very apropos by your excerpt from the Watchman, that a more extended comparison might have been reasonably expected. The writer does not wish to burden your columns with what is flooding our daily papers (or would be but for military censorship); therefore will only add that according to a Spanish Lexicon owned by the writer, the Spanish word "Cuba" is defined as meaning "Bucket."

Very Respectfully Yours,

ALLEN M. BLANCHARD.

SENATOR LODGE has introduced a resolution in Congress calling for an investigation of the charges which have been made concerning the disposal of the $288,000 appropriation recently gained from the national treasury by the Southern Methodist Church.

An Illustration of Papal Intolerance.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

WE hear much now-a-days of Catholic liberality. Papist historians, and theologians do their best to deceive the present generation, by glossing over the barbarous and unchristian acts of the Dark Ages, either by denying papal responsibility for the same, or by falsifying the facts in such a manner as to make it appear that the victims were criminals of the vilest class, which disqualified them from being tolerated in any civilized society.

We have before us a book by the Catholic bishop, Right Rev. John Milner, the "End of Religious Controversy," and in studying its pages we find that this complaisant bishop, tries to persuade his readers that the Roman Catholic Church never has persecuted those opposed to her doctrines; never authorized persecution even in the most minor degree; and in fact has even discouraged all idea of employing force to win converts from the ranks of heresy. Ed. 1895: pages 320—335:

To disprove and give the lie to such writers, we shall quote for the benefit of our readers, an incident of vital importance, to demonstrate how intolerant are the people who have been under the thumb of Rome for centuries. The republic of Peru is looked upon by the Papal See, as an exemplary republic, since the inhabitants of the same with rare exceptions, are members of her "communion." About eight years ago a friend of mine, the Rev. Penzotti, went to Peru to labor as a missionary and colporter, under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He, by consecrated labor sought to turn people from the obscurity of error, to the truth as it is in Jesus. Soon the zeal he manifested in doing his "Father's business," drew the attention of the Catholic priests to him, and immediately they began to preach death and destruction to all heretics.

The fanatical populace, learning from their priests, that eternal rewards awaited all who should in any way maltreat, persecute, or kill the heretics, inaugurated a religious persecution against all who were favorable to the doctrines preached by the Rev. Penzotti; and not content with opposing the free preaching of the gospel, they actually sequestered all the Bibles and books of the aforementioned brother, and publicly burnt the same in the principal plaza. Now as is the case in nearly all strictly Catholic countries, the head ecclesiastical dignitaries, also occupy the principal judicial positions; so bigotry and fanaticism have an untrammelled course; so that after the priest in his capacity as "spiritual guide" of the people, advised the seizure of all "heretical books," and the persecution of the "heretical" invader, then the priest in his "judicial capacity" steps in to execute judgment against the disturber of the public peace, who had dared to disseminate "pernicious doctrines."

Now as heretics in those poor, benighted countries, are counted of lower order than a thief or a murderer, one would expect that their degradation would be of a more debasement character, than would be allotted to either of the above criminals. And such indeed transpired in the present case, since the priest-judge, afraid to confine our brother within the prison walls, in company with the other prisoners, lest he should follow Paul's example, and preach the gospel there, decided to isolate him; and ordered him to be kept within a place in which pigs had formerly been confined, with a guard near by to watch his every action. Thus was this good brother detained for nine months. This cruelty and savage treatment would have continued for a much longer period, had it not been for diplomatic intervention, which delivered him from the paws of the beast, that would have crushed out his very life.

A Catholic journal or historian would tell you that such was not true; or if true, such an act was committed against the wishes of Santa Sede. But let me ask, why do priests seek to occupy political or judicial positions, if it is not to prosecute those whom they fail to convert to their ideas by logical reasoning? Yes, this is the only reason; and in this way the Catholic Church can disclaim that she, as an ecclesiastical power, ever persecutes; but hides the fact that the same church dignitaries in judicial capacities are guilty of such persecutions.

Many Protestants(?) closing their eyes to these facts, clamour for a union with the "Mother Church"; to gain which end they are willing to surrender every principle of truth that is so precious to the true believer. But let them understand that Rome yields nothing; she—according to the dignitaries occupying the most exalted positions—never changes; hence when she obtains the power to legislate as she did down in the middle ages; when the congresses and senates of the world are her slavish instruments, we may be confident of a re-enactment of the same diabolical methods as were then employed, to compel by innumerable tortures all to acquiesce to this man-made, and anti-christian religion.

Let not lethargy possess thee for a single moment my brother; be vigilant and valiant in the cause of truth; rally around the heavenly ensign carried by Jesus himself. It is true the conflict will be hottest there, it is also true that there are greater hardships for those who faithfully follow Jesus all the way, who will not compromise with error in the least degree; but only by fighting the good fight can we hope to overcome; and since only overcomers can ever enter the pearly gates of the Heavenly Jerusalem, the Holy City, this involves upon us the duty, or better still the privilege, of fighting against the powers of darkness with the divinely-appointed weapons; by beating down tradition, error, and erroneous dogmas with the sword of truth; knowing that eventually we shall be "more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

It is said of Benjamin Franklin that to the end of his life he maintained that "there never was a good war."

Subjects of the Kingdom.

"MAMA, I've been thinking of Christ's coming, and trying to understand how everything fits together, and I must say I feel puzzled. I understand something about the reason why we have had such a history of woe for six thousand years. It is because earth has been the stage upon which the drama of good and evil has been working out—not only before men, but also before the angels of God. Lucifer's war against the government of God in heaven was transferred to the earth through the voluntary choice of Adam; for he was disloyal to God. I understand some things; but, mama, why has the world gone on six thousand years in sin and woe? Could not the angels see the malignity of Satan's plan of government long before this, and could not the government of heaven have been sure of their loyalty long ago?"

"Yes; I think so. It has been for man's sake, for Christ's sake, for the fulfilling of the purpose of God."

"How, mama?"

"What did God create this earth for, Charlie? You may read Isa. 45:18."

"For thus saith the Lord that created the heavens, God himself that formed the earth, and made it; he hath established it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited."

"Well, I am sure I cannot see how that answers the question. It only mixes things up more. If the world is to be inhabited, why does it have to come to an end?"

"I am going to ask you a few questions now," said Mrs. Ross. "How many people out of each generation do you think have been loyal to God?"

"There were not very many in Noah's day," said Charlie, thoughtfully. God told Elijah that there were seven thousand in his day. At the time of Christ there were not very many, but afterward a good many thousand were converted. During the Dark Ages there were millions who were true unto death, and to-day there is a very great number who believe in Jesus. I suppose, though, that when the test of the last days comes, many will go back to this world."

"No doubt," said Mrs. Ross. "But what proportion of the generations of the world have been heirs of the kingdom of God?"

"O, only a small proportion," said Charlie.

"Do you remember who is called the father of the faithful?" asked Mrs. Ross.

"Yes, Abraham."

"You remember that Jesus said to the Jews who claimed to be Abraham's seed, that they were not the seed of Abraham, because they did not believe on him. I am speaking of this to show you that God compares his children to seed. 'If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.' God has chosen those who are rich in faith to be heirs of the kingdom; but it has taken a long time, and many generations to gather out a sufficient number of faithful souls to repeople the earth. It was to redeem an inhabited earth that Christ died on the cross. Lucifer, under the blaze of the throne, doubted God's love. The people of God are to be under the blaze of the throne; they must be tested on the point of faith in God as a God of love so that 'affliction shall not rise up a second time.' Now do you see why the history of the earth has dragged through six thousand years?"

"Y-e-es; but how is it, mama? Is the number nearly made up?"

"It is, Charlie. You remember reading how Satan, who is called the prince of this world, because he has usurped Christ's place, is said to have come down having great wrath because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. He is having his last chance to display his scheme of government."

"How will Christ come?"

"John says, 'Behold, he cometh with clouds and every eye shall see him.' Matthew tells us that 'all his holy angels will come with him,' that 'he will sit upon the throne of his glory.' He whose right it is to reign will confront his rebellious world: Those who have cast aside his law will then be in view of what they have lost, and will 'wail because of him,' crying for 'the rocks and mountains to cover them.' But the heirs of the kingdom will say joyfully, 'This is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us. This is the Lord, we will rejoice and be glad in his salvation.' At that day those who have loved God and made their love manifest by loyalty to his government, will be vindicated and exalted."

"I see," said Charlie. "It is just as if a king of this world had been thrust from his throne by a usurper who won part of the subjects away from the true king, and then the king comes back with an army and power to overcome the enemy. But, mama, will Christ begin his reign on the earth immediately?"

"He will manifest his power, but will not come to the earth. Paul says, 'The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air.' Jesus says that he will send forth his angels to gather together his elect from all parts of the earth. This gathering together of the resurrected and living saints will be the gathering together of subjects of Christ's kingdom. The coming of Christ is compared to the harvest. 'The harvest is the end of the world.'"

"What does that mean, mama? Will the earth be burned up, and then will Christ make another world for his kingdom?"

"O no." He says he will 'not make a full end.' The end of the world means the end of the age, the end of human affairs as they are run to day. You can see that by the gathering up of Christ's subjects from the earth, the wicked alone will be left."

"Will they be alive, mama?"

"No, Charlie. The prophet says, 'The slain of the Lord at that day shall be from one end of the earth to the other.' The cities will be broken down at the presence of the Lord. Every island and mountain will be removed. The atmospheric heaven will pass away, and total darkness will reign. The birds of the heavens will eat the flesh of the slain and die, and in the midst of silence, darkness and chaos, Satan and his angels will be bound for a thousand years."

"Where will God's people be, mama?"

"They will be in heaven with Christ. Before them will be unfolded the whole history of the controversy between good and evil. Judgment will be given unto them, and the saints will judge the world and fallen angels. Things will be reversed when Jesus comes."

"But, mama, when will Christ's kingdom be set up on earth?"

"At the end of the thousand years. Then 'the glory of the Lord will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea,' and 'the meek shall inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace.'" F. B.

Studies in French History —27.

"MEANTIME it was quite hard to tell, for sure, just who had a right to France, whether it was the Dauphin Charles or the infant king of England, who was only a very little babe when his father died. However, he was proclaimed King Henry the Sixth, in Paris."

"I imagine that business didn't suit the dauphin very much," said Florence Ray.

"No; it was not at all to his taste, but he was of an indolent, lazy disposition, not inclined to anything harder than dancing and having a good time. Of course he was very young at this time (1422), being only twenty years old. Perhaps this may in part have accounted for his indolent, careless way of living. But when we stop to consider the condition of France at this time; that England had actually conquered a goodly portion of it, and that the infant Henry, of England, had been proclaimed king, right in the ancient capital and metropolis of the land of the Capets, we are astonished that Charles VII. could have been so reckless as he was,—even thinking of going out of the country entirely, and leaving his people to their fate."

"He did not seem to inherit much of the blood of Hugh Capet," observed Edna Phillips.

"No; he inherited his throne, though indeed it had become a tottering one, but he did not fall heir to his patriotism or his courage. The English, indeed, claimed the most of the northern part of France, but Charles might have busied himself to good advantage in relieving the terrible necessities of his poor, starving people. But he seemed incapable of doing anything more serious than dancing."

"Perhaps he did not know of the bad state of things," said Milly Brown, with characteristic sympathy.

"It seems that he could scarcely have been ignorant of the fact that his people were so starved that the poorer classes were very glad to get the dead carcass of a dog to devour. It was at this time that the horrible amusement called the 'Danse Macabre' became quite popular among the wretched people."

"It seems so sad, professor, that I do not like to think about it, and it almost seems a pity to learn about those dreadful things. One almost gets tired of the same old story of horrors. Don't you think so?" asked Julia March.

"Yes; it seems sad to think about or even to learn about. But of course we must take history as it comes to us. We can neither make it better nor worse. But one thing we may do: we can make such a history of our own lives, Julia, that we shall not fear or blush to have it read."

"Will you please tell us a little about that awful play, or something of the kind, you mentioned? I want to know more about it," said Charlie White.

"Certainly; I will tell you all you need to know about it. Remember this was in the early part of the fifteenth century. The name, Danse Macabre, signifies the dance of death. It consisted only in wild and aimless dancing and yelling among the graves. It was participated in by hundreds who desired to do something to forget for a while their miserable existence. This wild revel they would keep up till morning, and then, exhausted and wretched, they would slink away, to return again at night."

"Didn't these horrors disturb the mind of Charles?" asked Will Palmeter.

"Not in the least; nothing of a serious nature ever disturbed him."

"I can't see what made them call him The Victorious, if he was so cowardly," said Will.

"I think they had no reason for it; but I suppose the title pleased his vanity."

"Was this king as eager to get money from his people so that he could live in luxury as some of the other kings had been?" asked Max Smith.

"No; this did not seem to be his disposition. He was too indolent to let money matters trouble him. You will believe this the more readily when I tell you that it is related of him that he once needed a pair of shoes, and ordered them delivered. But the shoemaker, being of a more thrifty disposition than Charles, seeing that the money was not forthcoming, refused to leave the shoes. So the king had to get along as well as he could without.

But this neither disturbed his peace of mind nor robbed him of his determination to have a good time."

"I think you said that little Henry VI. of England had been announced king in Paris, after his father died," said Edna. "Didn't he appoint some one to act as king till the baby grew?"

"O yes, indeed; he did not forget that. He was too cool-headed to neglect to make secure the great victories he had won. So the important office of regent was held by the Duke of Bedford."

"I think I've read that he was a wise and good man," said Edna; "affairs must have prospered with him at the head of government."

"I've no doubt they would have prospered better, but for the fact that the duke was more anxious to gain the rest of France for the English crown than to mitigate the sufferings of the people, though he would gladly have done both."

"I would like to know what became of Queen Isabella. I think you have not mentioned her since poor crazy Charles died," said Maggie Palmeter.

"She lived in the very place—the same hotel St. Pol, where her poor neglected husband passed so many years. She lived for a long time, and let us hope she was sorry for the wretched part she had acted before she died."

"Why, let me see," said Will Palmeter, "she must have been the grandmother of the little English king, Henry, wasn't she?"

"Why no; how could that be?" chimed in Rob Billings. "I thought she was the French queen, and the mother of the Dauphin Charles the seventh."

"She was all of that, and yet Will is right. Who can explain? Hands up! Who remembers about this? Jennie Jacobs may answer."

"Why, it is easy enough, I think. Rob forgets that King Henry V. married Catharine, the daughter of crazy Charles and Queen Isabella, so of course their little boy Henry would be the grandson of Isabella."

"I remember it now," said Robert. "I'll just note that in my book, and then I won't be apt to forget it again."

"When the kings and queens of different countries marry each other, it is apt to make quite a change in the map of the countries concerned, and so it is well to make it a point to remember such things."

"Uncle Jack says that when Isabella died, they put the image of a wolf over her as a monument," said Edna.

"So they did, and it was not at all complimentary to her disposition and virtues. Though once she wept when little Henry lifted his baby cap to her, in token of respect, I suppose she did not think she deserved so much. So let us hope she was not entirely without feelings of tenderness."

"About this time a remarkable woman named Jeanne Darc arose, claiming that she was sent of God to deliver France. I would like Robert Billings to tell us all he can of her history, either verbally or in writing, just as he likes, at our next study."

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

(SECOND EDITION.)

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, it not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born.
Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 36 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, JUNE 23, 1898.

"EDUCATE, educate, educate." This is the duty call of the hour.

OUR next issue will illustrate, by original and specially designed cuts, some very pertinent points in the present status of religious liberty in this country.

Extra copies can be had at the regular price. One dollar per hundred; $8.00 per thousand.

To those of our readers who are deeply interested in the special line of work to which the SENTINEL has been called, but who have not had the privilege of being thoroughly conversant with it in the past, and to those also who value the SENTINEL for reference and help in their work, we would respectfully call their attention to our "Bound Volume" ad. which appears in this issue of the paper.

It is pointed out by some who defend the policy of territorial extension upon which the nation has entered, that the same objections now made against this policy were made when the nation acquired "Louisiana" and other territory on the North American continent. But this comparison loses its force in view of the fact that the present policy is one which will plant the national flag in the midst of the political strifes of the Old World. To keep possession of the Philippine Islands, the United States will need as big an army and navy as if "Uncle Sam" himself were an Old World power.

INTERNATIONAL diplomacy was defined recently by a well known clergyman of this city, as being "the art of lying;" and this definition finds support in a statement credited to Bismarck, that the surest way for one diplomat to deceive another in a matter of international controversy would be to tell him the exact truth.

And yet this diplomacy is considered an indispensable thing by all the powers which are called "Christian."

SOME people are so short of time in this world that they are very likely to be eternally short of time in the next.

GERMANY has reinforced her naval squadron in the Philippine Islands, and now has a naval force in Manila bay that is considered quite the equal of that under command of Admiral Dewey. This is done, of course, with friendly assurances on the part of Germany; but probably it is nowhere more true than in diplomacy that "actions speak louder than words."

THE present war, ostensibly Christian though it be, furnishes illustrations of the spirit of war that do not at all differ from those furnished by war in general. A young sailor on the cruiser "Montgomery," writing to a relative in Jersey City, describes a battle with two Spanish gunboats, and makes these illustrative remarks about himself: "I look like a pirate;" "I don't know if we killed any Dons or not, but I hope we did." A victory is always welcome in war; but somehow it is never so welcome to the winning side as when there has been a tremendous loss of life on the other side.

A JOURNAL of this city quotes Justice Brewer, of the Supreme Court, as the author of a recent decision which for lack of solid ground to stand on, is comparable only to his decision in 1892 affirming that "this is a Christian nation." The case was that of a railway which had entered into a contract with Mercer County, Ky., to run "through" the county, but had terminated two miles short of the county line. Justice Brewer held that this was to be considered a fulfillment of its obligation in the matter, and in proof quoted from John Bunyan: "As I walked through the wilderness of this world I lighted on a certain place where there was a den," etc. As Bunyan had not gone from one end of the wilderness to the other, it followed that to go "through" a place might mean to go only part way from one side to the other! From this it would appear that the dictionary is not held at a premium in the Supreme Court.

THE Wisconsin W. C. T. U. have dropped the "Department of Sabbath Observance" from their program of work for the coming year.

EVERYBODY seems to be agreed that the exploit of young Lieutenant Hobson and his handful of men in Santiago harbor is almost beyond praise as an exhibition of courage, skill and patriotism. But precisely what advantage it is to have the harbor of Santiago blocked against a powerful fleet lying outside, and which would quickly terminate the campaign if it could only get at the enemy's forces lying within the harbor, does not seem to be so clear in the public mind. At least nobody seems disposed to point it out.

It is reported that Spain has made another appeal to the pope to use his influence in securing peace, by calling for intervention from the Powers of Europe.

ROMAN CATHOLIC priests in Mexico are reported to be lending their influence to the cause of Spain. The Catholic clergy are generally favorable to Spain outside of the United States.

UNCONSCIOUS influence is the most powerful influence. Both individuals and nations make a failure of trying to be influential.

A NEW CATALOGUE of all our publications, circulars of our new line of Combination Family Bibles, and a fine circular showing full-size illustrations of our SENTINEL Premium Bible, both closed and open, will be sent to any one sending their name and address together with a 2-cent stamp.

THE important question is, not what the country did for you a century ago, but what you are doing for the country to-day.

"HIGHER criticism" will have to get a good deal higher than it is before it reaches the level of that Word which it professes to dissect.

"I demand one seventh of your time; it is the law of the land."

UNJUST TAXATION.—A century ago, our forefathers made war with Great Britain and declared their Independence, because they were required to pay an unjust, though very slight, Tax in Money. To-day, vast religious organizations purpose, through the Sunday Law, to impose upon the American People the enormous Tax of One Seventh of All Their Time. This will become a reality if the Sunday Laws are revived and enforced. Will the American People submit to this most unjust Tax? Or will they declare their Independence?

THE Christian Statesman, in an argument made to demonstrate the awful recklessness of deeds which constitute a desecration of Sunday, says that "Every battle begun on the Sabbath as a historical fact resulted disastrously to the aggressor."

This was printed by the Statesman just about the time that news came of Dewey's great victory in Manila harbor, on Sunday. As a matter of fact, it is not historically true that battles fought "on the Sabbath" have always resulted disastrously to the aggressor; but the engagement in Manila harbor, fresh in the minds of all Americans, should constitute a complete answer to the current sophistry that the Government ought, as a measure of safety, to avoid the desecration of the first day of the week.

THAT which is of most value to any person, is character.

And that which, above all other things, is effectual for the development of a strong, sound character, is faith.

But faith does not call the individual's attention to the multitude of other people around him. It does not call attention to public sentiment nor to popular customs and maxims. By faith, the individual sees none of these.

By faith, the individual beholds Jesus Christ, the author of salvation to all who believe on him. The life of the Christian is lived by "looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of faith." Heb. 12:2.

By faith the individual sees "no man, save Jesus only." If he is looking at some other man or set of men, or if he is looking at human customs, opinions, and laws, contemplating the question of how much help he may derive from them in right doing, he is not beholding Jesus at all. He is not walking by faith; he is not forming a character which will be worthy of perpetuation beyond this life.

And when laws are passed to prescribe moral duties to the individual, or those things necessary to the formation of right character, their only effect must be to point him away from Jesus Christ to the multitudes of the world, and to the sentiment of the multitudes, which the law embodies. Such laws can tend only to weaken character, not to strengthen it.

Jesus Christ is the standard of righteousness. He is the divine standard; and any standard set up by human law, whether by people in the church or out of it, can be only a human standard, and altogether below the required excellence.

Laws which are passed with the intent of doing more than to protect the rights of the individual, are worse than useless.

Be true to yourself by being true to God.

"Imperial America."

"IMPERIAL AMERICA" is a term now seriously proposed and actually used to suggest the "manifest destiny" of the United States in the "enlarged sphere" opened to her by the guns directed by Dewey on the morning of May day at Manila. This sentiment is fast growing. In a speech at a dinner tendered to him a few days ago at San Francisco, Major-General Merritt, the proposed military governor of the Philippines, said:—

"I believe in the new national policy of the United States, which looks to the acquisition of additional territory represented in outlying islands that are requisite for the development of national strength and growth. The war was begun for the enforcement of the idea of human liberty, and with no thought of national aggrandizement; but the logic of events has brought about an unexpected result and the Government has taken the Philippines by right of conquest. What the navy has won the army will hold. The strong hand of the Government on those islands ought never to be loosened. This great people is in need of room in which to spread. The people feel this, and the Government will never be able to let go of the islands that have been won by American prowess."

The Chicago Times-Herald is almost strictly an administration paper. With General Merritt's words—"What the navy has won the army will hold"—for a text, the Washington correspondent of the Times-Herald tells what he finds at the National Capital as follows:—

"What the navy conquers the army must hold."

"So said Major-General Wesley Merritt, prospective military governor of the first colony of the United States, and his sentiment has awakened a responsive echo from the nation.

"Admiral Dewey's victory at Manila has filled the American blood with the fever of conquest. Conservatives may preach on the 'policy of the fathers,' but they cannot hold the ears of the masses while the fever is on. The cooler judgment of the second sober thought may quiet the public pulse, but there is abundant evidence that for the time being the sentiment of the nation is against the surrender of any territory wrenched from the grasp of Spain, with the exception of Cuba.

"FLOOD OF PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

"Hawaii will be annexed as one of the first results, and, once launched on a policy of colonial expansion, who can say where it will end? Speaker Reed and the sugar trust and other powerful interests were opposed to Hawaii, but they have been engulfed in the flood of public sentiment. The House of Representatives will vote for annexation Wednesday afternoon. The opposition in the Senate may filibuster indefinitely, but the wearers of the toga might better accept their fate gracefully, for the handwriting is on the wall.

"But it is the jewels of Alfonso's crown at which the newborn lust of conquest aims. It is the Spanish isles of the Orient and Occident that have challenged American prowess. It is the idea of empire that has filled the American soul with world-wide ambitions. These aspirations are a new force in American life, and sooner or later the guiding statesmen must face that force. Washington is the nerve center of the country, and the new sentiment is surging to this center with such intensity as to command earnest attention.

"SPAIN'S ISLAND POSSESSIONS.

"Already the cry is that Spain must be stripped of all her island possessions in American and Asiatic seas. Let the figures tell the price of that stubborn quality termed 'Spanish honor.' This is the list of the principal islands, with their area and population, according to the latest statistics:—

AMERICAN.

	Square Miles.	Population.

Porto Rico.....	3,670	806,708

ASIATIC.

"President McKinley has no colonial policy. He is not counting any chickens before they are hatched. He will not cross the bridge until he comes to it. It is his purpose to bring the war to a successful end before formulating any policy for the disposition of the pearls of the sea garnered by American valor, but there is a tide of public opinion already set in for colonial expansion that may sweep all opposition before it. This statement must not be taken as an implication that the President will oppose such a policy, for he has stated distinctly to close friends that he will not be diverted by such problems from the main purpose of crowning American arms with complete and lasting victory.

"MERRITT HITS POPULAR CHORD.

"Unused to the possession of insular colonies, taught by a hundred years of precept and example to avoid it, the first thought of Americans on learning of the triumph of Admiral Dewey was that Spain should not be punished by the loss of the Philippines. American sentiment has changed. It has become familiar with the thought of 'colonial empire,' and there is something in the sonorous term that appeals to the imagination. Advocates of colonial expansion have sprung up on every hand. The disease is contagious, and the masses have caught the fever.

"General Merritt not only touched a popular chord, or at least awoke a dormant chord to responsive rhythm, but his phrase has furnished the country with a telling shibboleth. Statesmen may make the laws, but greater than they is he who turns the sentiment or passion of a nation into a pat epigram. General Merritt has made the epigram, and if he were a younger man it might make him President of the United States and its dependencies.

"NEW NATIONAL DESTINY.

"By one of the accidents with which all history is strewn the American people have a new destiny opened before them. One need not be for or against a policy of colonial expansion to recognize the fact that the nation is at the parting of the ways, nor should one be blind to the wonderful possibilities and the grave responsibilities presented to the United States for its choosing, but a calm survey of the field from Washington is calculated to convince one that there has been a remarkable transformation in the American habit of thought. It has been revolutionized, apparently, within a few weeks. The change is reflected in Congress, for the representatives of the people are quick to catch the public pulse.

"The American Government entered on this war to free Cuba and hand it over to the Cubans, but the American people may change their mind. Influences are at work that may ultimately force the retention of the pearl of the Antilles, though this Government would be quick to disavow such a possibility. It is conceded that a protectorate will probably be established over Cuba for a time, until the Cubans shall have organized a competent government of their own, and from a protectorate it may be a short passage to actual possession. There are faint murmurings that betoken the growth of a new sentiment for the retention of Cuba, and the Government may have to face a tidal wave when the war is over and the cost is counted."

In a sermon only a few days ago President Patton, of Princeton, said:—

"History knows not what it is to retreat. Every step we take shuts a door behind us. The boom of Admiral Dewey's cannon across the Pacific made us forget Washington's farewell address and throw the Monroe doctrine for a time into the background. It is impossible, some one says, for a nation to secede from the family of nations, and if it stays in the family it is going to have family complications."

All these things are worthy of thoughtful consideration; for no one knows what "manifest destiny" may produce. And if we mark events as they pass, we shall be able better to understand each new phase that may open to the world. These are times in which the world moves rapidly, and much may occur in a day. "Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments."

Which Is Lawful?

BY JOHN D. BRADLEY.

ONCE there was a set of religionists bent on having other people follow their ideas of Sabbath observance. Certain things were being done that they could not endure. At the very moment when they were eagerly seeking what they might do to prevent these things, this question was presented to them: "Is it lawful on the Sabbath days to do good, or to do evil? to save life, or to destroy it?" They did not go so far as to declare in words their answer, but they proceeded forthwith to declare by their actions that in their minds the destruction of life was better Sabbath observance than those acts of mercy which they were seeking to prevent. For they "went forth and straightway took counsel with the Herodians against Him, how they might destroy Him."

On May 20th, in the town of Winona Lake, Ind., another company of religionists were assembled. They, too, were grieved by certain things which conflicted with their ideas of Sabbath observance, and were seeking how they might stop the one and carry out the other. While engaged in this work substantially the same question was presented to them. And they answered it as unmistakably as did the others, and declared in words, and as far as actions could go on the occasion, exactly what the others declared.

It came about on this wise. And, by the way, this assembly was the 110th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. In the discussion of what could be done and what could not be done according to their ideas of Sabbath observance, they naturally came to the point as to what the President of the United States should be allowed to do and what he should not be allowed to do. It was proposed that he use the army and navy as little as possible on Sunday. But, lo and behold, the exclamation went up in a moment, "If Dewey had not struck the blow in Manila Bay—and I claim it was a holy act—he might never have ———" That was enough; the conclusion was lost in a burst of applause by the assembled ministers. Some one exclaimed, "We as a church have every confidence in the President's ability to direct the armed force of the nation," and "another volley of cheers and applause shook the auditorium." A spectator declared that "it was just as significant as though a formal vote had been taken on the President's war policy." And it was. But later they "most earnestly recommended to the directors of the Trans-Mississippi Exposition to be opened at Omaha June 1, immediately to decide that its doors shall not be opened to the public on the Lord's day."

If these actions mean anything, they mean that the Presbyterian Assembly looks upon the destruction of 400 lives on Sunday as a "holy act," but that they cannot bear such desecration as an exhibition on that day of the fruits of peace and industry. This need not be regarded as a strange thing. There is an affinity between even the slightest enforcement of religious ideas and the taking of life. The spirit which inspires the one is the inspiration of all the other steps in the career of intolerance. And every step in that career is animated by the father of lies who "was a murderer from the beginning." It is therefore not remarkable that the first and last steps are avowed at one and the same time.

No result of the present war could be so disastrous to America as a relapse on our part from this Christian temper of cosmopolitan love, to an insular and barbarous hatred of other nations. Interruption of commerce, loss of property, the sacrifice of some, or even of many, lives, would not be so deplorable; for no one of these, nor all of them combined, could turn back or materially retard that majestic march of civilization in whose van we have been grandly holding our place for more than a century. But if our hearts should be hardened toward men beyond our own borders, if our sympathies should be chilled and our respect turned into suspicion and enmity, we should suffer a loss in our national character that it would require several generations and incalculable efforts to repair. "Confidence is a plant of slow growth," even between individuals; proportionately more so between communities and nations. And impairment of national, like personal character, is inestimably more serious than of national wealth or even of national domain.—Teunis S. Hamlin, D. D.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

It is not possible for me to give the chronological order in which the departments of the W. C. T. U. work developed. All I can do is to present them in what might be called their logical order.

We had not been long at work for the children until we discovered the ignorant mother and needy home, in which the profligate, careless or absorbed father was an important factor; and this led out to many other discoveries which filled our hearts with a great longing after all the powers with which it is possible for the Spirit of God to equip a human being for service.

The Department of Work among Mothers was made one of the first subdivisions of the Evangelistic Department, and nowhere have we been made to realize in a greater degree than here the force of this evil against which we have dared to array ourselves; for one woman who was intimately associated with the work of this department, while still in active service, was compelled to live through the arraignment, trial and execution of her son for one of the most terrible crimes in history, and is lingering out the life of a heart broken mother, while her sisters who knew and loved her, are continually sending after her in the seclusion from which she never comes, tender thoughts and prayers that all of comfort that can possibly be administered to her from the Holy Spirit of God may be granted until the end.

The principle that is at the foundation of our work among mothers, is that of the right of God in every human being, as stated by David in Ps. 127:3: "Children are the heritage of the Lord, and the fruit of the womb is his reward." In connection with this we have taken the statement of Paul in 1 Cor. 3:9, that "we are laborers together with God." In these words of divine authority we have all these years found our inspiration and consolation, for we are sure that the blessing of God must follow every effort that we make to preserve his heritage and to assure his reward to him; and that since he has chosen to be our fellow-laborer, he will be at least as faithful in doing his part as we can be in doing ours.

We have been a long time in getting down to the meaning of that "working together with God," but some of us saw years ago that it covered a vast range, touching not only the drink question, but that of food for body and soul and all habits of thought and action, dress reform, and every point of education; a field so wide that the only possible provision for it must be found in the whole Gospel for the whole man.

No more remarkable experience could ever come to a Christian worker than to our women when, filled and enthused with the greatness of this gospel, seeing it in its own clear setting of eternal glory, realizing what it and it alone can do, they have gone for the first time into some home in which Egyptian darkness reigned, and have begun the effort to awaken an ignorant and prejudiced mother, perhaps a hardened, discouraged and vicious one, to some understanding of her responsibilities and privileges as one who has been entrusted with a portion of God's heritage and reward.

In my work as National Evangelist it was my duty to hold institutes and teach methods of reaching mothers of all classes; and I can probably do no better than to give an outline of the plan of work which has been followed for years, and which has borne blessed fruit. The first point emphasized was to keep the work as near the cradle as possible. Let any father and mother discover that you have a genuine interest in the baby, and they will listen to anything which you may have to say that concerns the life and well-being of any child. I have known men of the world to abandon the use of tobacco as well as strong drink, and make as thorough a reformation as possible in their habits of life, because of truth which the mother had learned in the talk of the W. C. T. U. evangelist over the cradle of her child, or in a mother's meeting, and which she repeated to the father. One father came to me at the close of a Sunday service and said:

"I thought you might be glad to know that what you have said to the mothers has led me to give up my tobacco entirely, and reform in many other things."

"Then," I said, "you believe that I told the truth."

"As to that," he said, "I thought it might be that some things were put rather strong, but I reasoned this way: I am absorbed in business; I have not time to look into these subjects that you have, and I had to believe that there must be truth in it, for you would not dare to go out representing that great body of the best women in the world and teach falsehood, and I concluded if there was a shadow of truth in what you have taught about parental responsibility and pre-natal influence, and the effect of a father's habits on his children, that I could not afford to risk it any longer for the sake of the children which I expect to have; so I have set myself to work to clean my life up to the best of my ability."

And I am sure no one will be surprised to know that as he went on honestly in this endeavor, he soon found his need of a power greater than his own will, and so surrendered to the Holy Spirit, accepted Christ, and began with his wife to make a truly Christian atmosphere into which to welcome the child that was expected in their home.

The Everlasting Gospel.—No. 3.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE gospel of Rev. 14:6, 7 is the gospel of Jesus Christ, for there is no other. All that the gospel requires is expressed in the words: "Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea and the fountains of waters."

With reference to the foregoing it has been shown that the call to "fear God," etc., is really a call to keep the commandments of God.

It has also been shown that this gospel message, as expressed in those words, must be proclaimed at the time when the prophecy of Rev. 13:11-17 is being fulfilled. Furthermore it has been shown that the two-horned beast of verse 11 is the United States, and that consequently it is in this country and by this Government that the work of enforcing what the prophecy calls the "mark of the beast" is to be carried on.

With reference to this work, it has been pointed out that in the very nature of things it would be propagated as a gospel work, having for its object that which would be professedly the worship of God, but which in reality would be the worship of the "beast" of verse 1, which is a Jesus Teaching His Disciples that Gospel Work Does Not Sanction the Destruction of Men's Lives.

Because the people of the Samaritan village refused to receive Jesus, his disciples asked him, "Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did? But he turned, and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them."

symbol of the papacy; and that this worship would be realized in the reception of that which the prophecy calls "the mark of the beast;" and further, that as the true gospel is a call to keep the commandments of God, so in this professedly gospel work which embraces the mark of the beast, a like claim is made with reference to the commandments of God.

Let it be remembered that when this mark, and consequently the worship, is enforced, it will not be openly as the mark and worship of the beast, but professedly as the worship of God. As already shown in previous articles, anything else but that would be simply to expose the whole thing. It must be claimed as the work of God, although such a claim will be absolutely false.

Now as the everlasting gospel calls upon all to "fear God and give glory to him, . . . and worship him that made heaven and earth," etc.; and as this gospel is proclaimed at the very time when by the enforcing of the mark the beast itself is to be worshiped, it will be perfectly clear that the worship of God and of the beast cannot possibly be represented by the same mark. If such were the case it would be equal to saying that the beast is a symbol of God. This indeed would be most dishonoring. But this will be still more apparent when it is remembered that the third angel warns against the worship of the beast and the reception of his mark. But God will certainly not punish those who worship him.

Furthermore, if it should be that the mark of the beast is also the mark of God, it could not be distinguished, so far at least as outward appearances are concerned, who it was that was being worshiped, God or the beast.

Now, leaving out for the time being what has been said thus far in these articles with reference to the question of what the mark of the beast is, let the reader bear in mind that whatever the mark is, it cannot be found anywhere in the Bible. If it could, it would not be the mark of the beast, and the writing of the prophecy and the warning against it would be an absurdity, and an impeachment of the wisdom of the Holy Spirit, by whose inspiration it was written.

In view of the fact that the gospel of Rev. 14:6, 7 is a call to keep the commandments of God, it will be well just here to recall a statement made in last week's article: "There is only one commandment in the decalogue over which there could possibly be any controversy of the nature brought to view in the prophecy under consideration." It was shown there that that commandment is the fourth.

Now recall that which has been stated in this article, that in the very nature of things the mark of the beast is something that cannot be found in the Bible; and then recall too that the mark is enforced with reference to the commandments, and it will be still more evident that the controversy is narrowed down to the fourth commandment.

But what does the fourth commandment require? Simply that we keep holy the Sabbath day.

Now it is a fact that for upwards of forty years a strong effort has been made, gathering strength year by year, until now there are millions of people, represented by various religious societies, committed to the movement, to have a day enforced as the Sabbath of the fourth commandment which cannot be found in the commandment itself, nor anywhere else in all of God's word; and that day is the Sunday. And Sunday—mark it well!—is positively the only day sought to be enforced by civil law which has ever been called a mark.

Concerning this day (Sunday) it is everlastingly true that in the Bible it is never called the Sabbath day; there is not a text which says directly or indirectly that at any time it was to take the place of the Sabbath—the day that God blessed and sanctified—only as such an attempt would be made by the "man of sin" (2 Thess. 2:3, 4; Dan. 7:25). Never does the Bible say that either Christ or the apostles ever kept Sunday as the Sabbath or Lord's day; nor is there the slightest proof that it was ever regarded as a sacred or holy day. And when those who for years have been at the head of this work for the enforcement of Sunday as the Sabbath—when they have been asked, and that, too, repeatedly, for such evidence, they have been forced to acknowledge that the Bible is silent concerning it. And this again proves that which in these articles has been abundantly proven, that Sunday is not the mark of God, but the mark of the papacy.

Lord Erskine on Religious Liberty.

THE universal God of Nature—the Saviour of mankind—the Fountain of all light, who came to pluck the world from eternal darkness, expired upon a cross—the scoff of infidel scorn; and his blessed apostles followed him in the train of martyrs. When he came in the flesh he might have come like the Mohametan Prophet, as a powerful sovereign, and propagated his religion with an unconquerable sword, which even now, after the lapse of ages, is but slowly advancing under the influence of reason, over the face of the earth. But such a process would have been inconsistent with his mission, which was to confound the pride, and to establish the universal rights of men. He came, therefore, in that lowly state which is represented in the Gospel, and preached his consolations to the poor.

When the foundation of this religion was discovered to be invulnerable and immortal, we find political power taking the church into partnership; thus began the corruptions both of religious and civil power, and hand in hand together, what havoc have they not made in the world!—ruling by ignorance and the persecution of truth.

Constraint is the natural parent of resistance, and a pregnant proof that reason is not on the side of those who use it. You must all remember Lucian's pleasant story:—Jupiter and a countryman were walking together conversing with great freedom and familiarity upon the subject of heaven and earth. The countryman listened with attention and acquiescence, while Jupiter strove only to convince him; but happening to hint a doubt, Jupiter turned hastily round and threatened him with his thunder. "Ah! Oh!" says the countryman, "now, Jupiter, I know that you are wrong; you are always wrong when you appeal to your thunder."

In Puritan Days.

THE wish which some good people in this country have expressed, for a return of Puritanism, is one which, charitably construed, may be attributed chiefly to ignorance. At this distance, under the softening but deceiving touch of time, it is easy to mistake the austerity, intolerance, and rigid formalism of Puritanism for the higher qualities of character imparted by true religion, the need of which is so strongly felt in all lands; but a closer view of Puritanism will convince any candid observer that were Puritan ways, customs, and ideas of morality to become again prevalent here, many of those who are now foremost in asserting the country's need of Puritanism would be foremost in raising an outcry against it.

It is well known, for example, that Puritanism was very tolerant of indulgence in intoxicating drink. The following "ordination bill," dated at Hartford, Conn., in 1784, is one that has been recently printed as a curiosity:—

"To keeping ministers.....	0	2	4
" 2 mugs tody.....	0	5	10
" 5 segars,.....	0	3	0
" 1 pint wine.....	0	0	9
" 3 lodgings,.....	0	9	0
" 3 bitters,.....	0	0	9
" 3 breakfasts,.....	0	3	6
"15 boles punch,.....	1	10	0
"24 dinners,.....	1	16	0
"11 bottles of wine,.....	0	3	0
" 5 mugs flip.....	0	5	10
" 3 boles punch,.....	0	6	0
" 3 boles tody,.....	0	3	6

Alice Morse Earle, well known as an authority upon facts of Puritan history, says of this bill, of which she was the modern discoverer: "I sadly fear me, that at that Hartford ordination, our parson ancestors got grievously 'gilded,' to use a choice 'red-lattice' phrase."

The same authority mentions other ordination bills which included among the items of expense barrels of rum and cider and metheglin, bowls of flip and punch, toddy, etc.

Not quite so bad as this, but no more justifiable from a Christian standpoint, was a feast held on the occasion of the ordination of Dr. Cummings as pastor of the Old South Church, of Boston, in 1761, which is thus described:—

"There were six tables that held one with another eighteen persons each, upon each table a good rich plum pudding, a dish of boiled pork and fowls, and a corn'd leg of pork with sauce proper for it, a leg of bacon, a piece of alamode beef, a leg of mutton with caper sauce, a roast line of veal, a roast turkey, a venison pastee, besides chess cakes and tarts, cheese and butter. Half a dozen cooks were employed upon this occasion, upwards of twenty tenders to wait upon the tables; they had the best of old cyder, one barrel of Lisbon wine, punch in plenty before and after dinner, made of old Barbados spirit. The cost of this moderate dinner was upwards of fifty pounds lawful money."

The dinner given at the dedication of the Old Tunnel Meeting House, of Lynn, Mass., in 1682, is described as follows:—

"Dainty meats were on ye table in great plenty, bear-stake, deer-meat, rabbit, and fowle, both wild and from ye barnyard. Luscious puddings we likewise had in abundance, mostly apple and berry, but some of corn meal with small bits of sewet baked therein, also pyes and tarts. We had some pleasant fruits; as apples, nuts, and wild grapes, and to crown all we had plenty of good cyder and ye inspiring Barbadoes drink. Mr. Shepard and most of ye ministers were grave and prudent at table, discoursing much upon ye great points of ye dedication sermon and in silence laboring upon ye food before them. But I will not risque to say on which they dwelt with most relish, ye discourse or ye dinner."

The following relates to a different matter, but is no less characteristic of Puritan times. It is a leaf from the diary of Obadiah Turner, dated at Lynn, Mass., two and a half centuries ago. The diary was discovered recently by an antiquarian, and the extract was published in the Christian Advocate, of this city:—

"1646. Iune ye 3. Allen Bridges hath bin chose to wake ye sleepers in meeting. And being mch proude of his place, must needs have a fox taile fixed to ye end of a long staff wherewith he may brush ye faces of them yt will have napps in time of discourse; likewise a sharp thorne wherewith he may prick such as be most sounde. On ye laste Lord his day, as hee strutted about ye meeting house, hee did spy Mr. Tomlins sleeping with much comforte, hjs head kept steadie by being in ye corner, and hjs hand grasping ye rail. And so spying, Allen did quicklie thrust his staff behind Dame Ballard and give hjm a grievous prick vppon ye hand. Wherevppon Mr. Tomlins did spring vpp mch above ye floore and with terrible force strike with hjs hand against ye wall, and also, to ye great wonder of all, prophainlie exclaim, in a loude voice, cuss ye woodchuck; he dreaming, as it seemed, yt a woodchuck had seized and bit his hand. But on coming to know where hee was and ye great scandall hee had committed, he seemed mch abashed, but did not speake. And I think hee will not soone againe go to sleepe in meeting. Ye women may sometimes sleepe and none know it, by reason of their enormous bonnets. Mr. Whiting doth pleasantly say yt from ye pulpit hee doth seem to be preaching to stacks of straw with men sitting here and there among them."

Certainly there can be no good reason for desiring a return to Puritan ways, or as some deluded persons have expressed it, "a rain of Puritanism." The independence of Puritanism which the country achieved through the efforts of Washington, Jefferson, Madison and their co-laborers, is as worthy of perpetuation as is its independence of Great Britain.

PUBLIC opinion is an unstable thing. Only a few months ago, when President McKinley's predecessor was in office, the whole country gave a shout of approval over the message of the chief executive which threatened Great Britain in the matter of Venezuela, and declared that the "Monroe doctrine" must be upheld at all hazards. Now, the whole country signifies its approval of a national policy which is the opposite of that doctrine. While a few dissenting voices are heard, public sentiment as voiced by both press and pulpit strongly approves the idea of an American empire which shall extend to the very borders of the Asiatic continent. But the Monroe doctrine forbids American conquest in the Old World as certainly as it forbids the extension of European conquest in the New.

THIS change in public sentiment is a very significant fact, and one worth bearing in mind. It admonishes us that we may be greatly mistaken in counting on the stability of public opinion, even for a short period of time. Men say that this or that thing can never happen because public sentiment is strongly against it; but the fact affords no real evidence in support of such a conclusion. The only sure evidence of what is to be expected in the developments of the future, is found in the statements of inspired prophecy. Those statements are the guide of the Christian, and by their light he is saved from the fatal blunders of those who try to forecast the future by means of the finite resources of the human mind.

THE word of prophecy assures us that some things are soon to take place which have not as yet been strongly indicated in public sentiment. And now, in addition to that word—if any further evidence could be needed—we have this object lesson on the point of the great rapidity with which public sentiment may undergo a complete change. Events that cannot now be foreseen, but which may be very near, may contribute as powerfully to turn public sentiment into channels leading to the fulfillment of the prophetic word, as Dewey's victory at Manila did to turn such sentiment in favor of a world-wide American empire.

THE political machinery necessary to the government of an empire is altogether different from that suited to a republic. The American people seem to want an American empire—do they also want a revolution in the American system of government? France, with her foreign colonies, calls herself a republic; but in fact, as recent events have shown, she is a military despotism; and France is the only colony-holding nation which is a republic even in name.

THE following resolution recognizing the dangerous character of much that passes for patriotic teaching, was passed recently by the Women's Press Association of Michigan:—

"Recognizing that in the efforts to inculcate patriotism in the minds of our youth there is a danger that we may teach militarism, and in trying to incite to duty to country we shall induce a spirit of retaliation, therefore,

"Resolved, That we will use our best efforts to teach the young that war is greatly to be deplored, even when a necessity; that mercy is compatible with justice, and that defense of the weak and oppressed should not arouse a spirit of revenge toward the oppressor."

PRESS reports state that the State Prohibition party of Kansas have nominated Senator W. A. Peffer for governor, on a platform in which appears this declaration:—

"We regard civil government as an ordinance of God and recognize the Lord Jesus Christ as King of Kansas, and therefore believe that the administration of civil affairs should be in harmony with the law and in his spirit."

IN making note of this the New York Sun observes that these Prohibitionists are "violating the spirit of the Constitution, and presenting a totally false theory of the relation between religion and civil government in the United States. This same platform 'claims for all persons of legal age and requisite qualification, regardless of race or sex, the right of a free ballot;' and yet if the Kansas Populists carry out the theory set forth in their politico-religious resolution they must hold that no atheist or agnostic or disbeliever in the divinity of Christ should be allowed to vote; and so they would restrict instead of enlarging the right to vote."

NOTHING but inconsistency, injustice, and hypocrisy can come out of the effort to join Christianity with the State. The Prohibition party make a fatal mistake when they put this into their program of work.

* * *

THE attitude of the Prohibition party towards Sunday observance in many places leads a journal of this city to remark that "it is sometimes hard to tell whether the Prohibition party seeks to suppress liquor because it is an evil or because saloons violate the Sunday law."

The Prohibition party would gain immensely by a change of attitude in this respect.

Is This a Christian Nation?

No, it is not; and it is gratifying to find those who have such sound ideas on the matter, as is indicated by the following, which we take from the editorial columns of the American Banner, of Philadelphia, Pa.:—

"Many people, of all shades of belief, have become very fond of claiming that 'this is a Christian nation.' The thing is ABSOLUTELY IMPOSSIBLE! Only an individual can become a Christian, and a comparatively few Christians in a nation does not make it a Christian nation, any more than a few righteous people in Sodom and Gomorrah made those cities righteous. To claim that this is a Christian nation is tantamount to saying that religion and civil government are already united in this country, for no government becomes 'Christian' without forming a union with the church, the same as the individual does upon joining, to be subject to her laws and doctrines."

SOME idea of the reasons which are usually set forth in an application for appointment to the office of chaplain, may be had from a published letter of application made by a minister of Iowa to Governor Shaw, of that State. A religious journal enumerates the points made in the application:—

"He was a missionary to South America in Panama and Aspinwall, and was chaplain of the Panama Canal Company. He is immune against yellow fever, having been through a siege of it, and is familiar with the diseases and dangers of the climate. He has preached on decks, wharves and streets, in city and country, for twenty years. He is an American and has great hopes for the future of the country. His father raised a company at the outbreak of the war in 1861; his grandfather was in the War of 1812; and his great-grandfather and three brothers were soldiers in the War of the Revolution. The first of the family came over in 1635, landed at Cape Cod, and dwelt in Plymouth. He can read Spanish well and speak it some. He says that if appointed he will wage war against 'Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion,' which he charges have been the curse of all the republics in South and Central America."

We see nothing in this to prove the applicant was spiritually qualified to minister divine grace to the soul; but this is a point about which a civil ruler is not supposed to concern himself, as there is nothing in a civil office which qualifies the holder for discernment in spiritual affairs. In such appointments, the spirituality of the applicant is the least of all matters considered. In the very nature of things, it could not be otherwise.

THIS is the resolution with regard to the claim of the Methodist Church South, introduced in the Senate June 9 by Mr. Lodge, of Massachusetts:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire and report to whom the money was paid under the claim of the Methodist Book Concern South; and also as to all circumstances connected with the passage of the bill providing for the payment of said claim, and with the subsequent payments of the money under said act of Congress."

Since the trickery of the Methodist agents in getting this claim allowed has been exposed, some of the ministers are trying to save the reputation of the church by loudly demanding that the money be returned to the treasury of the United States, which of course cannot be done, as the attorney already has his fee of $100,800, and a large part of the balance has been distributed by order of the conference. Zion's Outlook, a Methodist paper published in Nashville, has three condemnatory articles in one issue, perhaps inspired by the proposition to make a rival Methodist paper, the Advocate, a daily on a capital of $75,000 drawn from the fund. The Rev. Dr. Lovejoy, of Atlanta, one of the most prominent Methodists in the South, calls the money tainted because some of it went to a lawyer for lobbying the claim. But all these gentlemen are too late in discovering the "taint," which does not consist so much in hiring an attorney on commission as in presenting the claim in the first place. Every dollar paid out of money raised by general taxation, for the benefit of ecclesiastical institutions, is tainted with the corruption of illicit relations between the state and the church.—The Truth Seeker.

SOME timely observations upon the duties which a true patriotism imposes upon American citizens in the situation which has arisen from the prospect of territorial extension in foreign lands, were made by ex-President Cleveland in his address to the students of Princeton University, June 21. In part, Mr. Cleveland said:—

"The American people are tempted every day and every hour to abandon their accustomed way and enter upon a course of new and strange adventure. Never before in our history have we been beset with temptations so dangerous as those which now whisper in our ears alluring words of conquest and expansion and point out to us fields bright with the glory of war.

"Since patriotism underlies good citizenship you should avoid a misconception of the meaning of this word. I believe there is sometimes a tendency to think of patriotism as something bellicose and defiant, best illustrated by noisily bragging of our national prowess, quarrelsomely seeking some one who dare dispute it and threatening war against the combined world on the slightest pretext. Of course true patriotism is a very different thing. If it is exhibited by the man who leaves home and friends to follow our flag in war and risk his life in his country's quarrel, it is none the less exhibited by the wife or mother who remains at home to weep and mourn."

"Do not fail to gain by study and reflection a just apprehension of the purposes and objects for which our Government was established to the end that you may detect any proposed departure from such purposes and objects and be able to form an opinion as to its justification or desirability. You will probably be led by your study and reflection to the conclusion that our Government was formed for the express purpose of creating in a new world a new nation, the foundation of which should be man's self-government, whose safety and prosperity should be secure in its absolute freedom from Old World complications, and in its renunciation of all schemes of foreign conquest, and whose mission should be the subjection to civilization and industrial occupation of the vast domain on which it has taken root. If you believe these things do not permit any accusation of ultra and unprogressive conservatism to trouble you. If the suggestion is made that the time has come for our nation to abandon its old landmarks, and to follow the lights of monarchical hazards, and that we should attempt to force the simple machinery of our popular and domestic Government to serve the schemes of imperialism, your challenge of the proposition is entirely in order. If you are satisfied that foreign conquest and unnatural extension or annexation are dangerous perversions of our national mission, and if it shall seem to you, in the light of reason and history, that such perversions bring in their train a people's demoralization and a decay of popular contentment and virtue, more surely destructive to republics than armies with banners, you will not necessarily be wrong.

"Recalling what we have done and what yet remains for us to do under the guidance of the rules and motives which have thus far governed our national life, you surely are entitled to demand the best of reasons for a change in our policy and conduct, and to exact a conclusive explanation of the conditions which make our acquisition of new and distant territory either justifiable, prudent or necessary. Perhaps you should be satisfied with the excuse that such acquisition is necessary by way of warlike preparation or precaution. This, however, will immediately suggest to you that we have found heretofore a constant source of congratulation in the fact that the contemplation of war and its contingencies is not, and should not be, familiar to our ordinary national life; that it has always been our boast that a large standing military establishment and warlike precautions are not among the needs of a people whose victories are those of peace, and whose immunity from armed conflict is found in their freedom from the foreign relationships that give birth to war; and that, though it has been abundantly demonstrated that the courage and splendid fighting qualities of our countrymen will never fail in time of need, it is still a grave question whether the cheapening of our estimate of the value of peace by dwelling upon war and warlike preparation is calculated to improve the quality of our national character.

"It is difficult to deal with the question of war just at this time and avoid misconception and misrepresentation; but we are considering American citizenship and endeavoring to find its bent and most useful characteristics and how they can be most effectively cultivated and securely preserved. From this standpoint war is a hateful thing, which we should shun and avoid as antagonistic to the objects of our national existence, as threatening demoralization to our national character and as obstructive to our national destiny. If you believe this you should stand bravely for your belief, even though a shower of stupid cat-calls may fill the air. If, on account of this belief, you are called milksops and cowards, wanting peace at any price, you will find yourself in splendid companionship."

DIPLOMATIC relations between the pope and the republic of Chili have been resumed, after an interruption of ten years.

Studies in French History.—28.

"WELL, Rob, you're in the limboes, as they say, now, I suppose," said his friend, Charlie White, as they walked home from school that afternoon.

"Good enough!" chimed in Edna Phillips, it will be good for you,—strengthen your memory, you know."

"Well, you are about as comforting to a fellow as Job's three friends, I must say!" exclaimed Rob. But I imagine I can find more to say of interest about Jeanne Darc, Charlie, after you and I have been to visit the very places where she lived and moved and had her being;—let's see," mused Rob; "it isn't so very long now. Examination comes,—and I suppose that decides it,—in only three weeks, and if we pass,"—and Rob drew a long breath.

"Yes," echoed Charlie; "if we pass."

The boys had been in the habit of counting the weeks to examination, and at last the days, for a long time. They were to start on the long-anticipated journey in a few weeks afterward.

"Mother," said Rob at the breakfast table next morning, "Professor Carman has appointed me to read something about Jeanne Darc,—it must be original, you know; or I can give a little talk about her, just as I like."

"I am thinking it would be well to talk instead of write; you are quite handy with your pen any way, much more than with your tongue."

Tuesday afternoon came once more, and all too soon for Rob, who thought he had never seen a week pass so fast, for he had been very busy. But although he hardly felt equal to the task before him, he stepped to the desk in response to his teacher's invitation, and began his little story:—

"The home of Jeanne Darc at the time when she began to fight for her country, was a little village in the north-eastern part of France called Domrémy.

"This girl pretended to have visions, which fact led her to leave home and go to Orleans as fast as she could, to raise an army to fight the English. She didn't like English people at all, and she didn't want them in her country."

"I wonder if we would confuse Rob if we asked questions once in a while," piped Will Palmeter.

"No, I guess not; if I can't answer them, may be Professor Carman will help me."

"Well," said Will, "I was wondering if this girl had any parents or relatives, and if they were willing for her to go."

"Why, yes; she had folks, and they tried their best to keep her at home, but she was bound to go,—I forgot to speak about that. When she was only a little girl, the English came and drove all the native French people out of the little village where she lived with her parents, and ever since then she had an awful horror of the English. Of course when the people came back there was not anything left to speak of, of their pretty homes, only just ashes."

"I wish Rob would please tell us something about her looks," pleaded Milly Brown.

"Well," said Robert, good-naturedly, "I have read in something, somewhere, that she was 'tall and fine looking.' She wore men's clothes, though, and that would spoil any woman's looks, I think."

"May be that was so she could ride her horse easier," remarked Julia March.

"I think so; but she did not appear to make a very favorable impression on the French general who had command of the French forces at Orleans. When he received word that the Maid, as she was called, was coming, and had promised to 'raise the siege of Orleans, and crown the French king, the Dauphin Charles, he said they would better 'box her ears and send her home.'"

"That was not a very gallant reply for a French general to make," smiled Professor Carman.

"No, not very; I presume the French were not so noted for their polite manners as they are now. The general soon saw the time when he repented his speech, for the brave girl did as she had said. She entered the city in triumph, though it is awfully queer that the English ever let her do it; but they did, and after very much coaxing from the Maid, the indolent Charles at last consented to go to Rheims, and be crowned king. This city was also in English hands, and here again, strange to say, they opened the gate, and surrendered the keys to Charles.

"After the king was crowned, this simple-hearted girl only asked to go back to her parents, and take care of her sheep. But the king did not let her do this, though I don't think he half appreciated what she had done for him and for France. At last, while in a battle, the Maid and a few soldiers found themselves surrounded by the English, who captured them."

"Where was this battle fought, please?" asked Harry Ray.

"I don't believe I can remember that. Will you please answer, professor?"

"This was the battle of Compiègne," replied the teacher. "Most of the French troops had already entered the city, when 'the drawbridge was raised,' and thus the poor girl was made an easy captive."

"Count John, one of the Burgundians, which party, don't you remember, had joined the English so they might have greater vengeance on the Armagnacs, is the man into whose hands the maid fell. He sold her to the English—the Duke of Bedford, regent of France,—for 10,000 francs, in spite of his wife, who tried her best to prevent it."

"How much would that be in our money?" asked Will Barnaby, pencil and note book in hand.

"I think a single franc is nineteen cents in our money, so you can soon reckon it for yourself.

"The English finally burned the poor maid alive, and a great shame it was, indeed."

"Bravo!" said Professor Carman, as Rob took his seat.

"We will study a little more about this strange maiden on next Tuesday afternoon."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

An Opposition Kingdom.

"MAMA, since our last talk about the subjects of Christ's kingdom, I have heard Mr. Metcalf talking about the millennium. He says that all the world is to be converted; but it seems to me he has some very strange theories about how it is to be done."

"What were his theories?" asked Mrs. Ross.

"Well, in the first place, he thinks that we will have a terrible time of trouble,—war among nations, socialistic revolution, famine and pestilence. But out of this state of things will evolve peace and righteousness on earth. He said that a taste of war now-a-days, would result in men seeking arbitration; that riots among the poor against the rich, would cause an equal distribution of property; that famine and pestilence would lead the state to legislate in harmony with God's laws; and that everybody would learn that he must do right. Then the millennium would begin, and God's will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

"Mr. Sawyer did not agree with him about the time of trouble coming, but said the world was growing better, kinder, and that in the course of time we would see the golden age. Neither of them think that Christ will come very soon. Mr. McAllister said that it was nonsense preaching so much; that what we needed was law to compel men to do right until they learned to like to do it. He said this was the only scientific way to convert the world. He said that sensation had to be specialized along moral lines as well as along mental and physical, and that people had 'to learn righteousness' by right doing; and as they would not do right without law, that it was clear that law was the solution of the world's problem. He said he was glad that there were thousands of people waking up to the fact to-day, who were not theorists; but were going to see to it that religious reforms took the form of law, and that those who would not now do right, would soon be placed where they could not do wrong."

"Righteousness on earth by law, has ever been the will-o'-the-wisp that the prince of this world has kept the world chasing after. It is not strange that just as the subjects of Christ's kingdom are about to be made up, there should be a renewed effort to make men trust more fully in the delusion that his kingdom is to be of this world. But of how much value to God or man would the righteousness be, that is the result of law?"

"Mama, they said the Bible said that there was to be a millennium on earth, and that nations would beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks."

"No, Charlie; the Bible says that the nations will say that they will do this. But saying and doing are two different things. Suppose we turn and read the passage referred to in Micah 4:2, 3.

Charlie read, "'And many nations shall come and say, Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.'"

"Now read the first four words of the first verse to answer the question, when will many nations be talking like this."

"In the last days," read Charlie.

"Timothy says, 'In the last days perilous times shall come,' that men will be 'lovers of their own selves,' and that even in the church there will be 'a form of godliness' without the 'power thereof.'"

"Why is it, mama, that people believe the world is growing better?"

"It is because they are deceived by appearances. The whole world is running into sentimental delusion. In the time just before the French Revolution, the people at Paris were under the same impression. Because they could weep over the sorrows and trials of the hero of a novel or drama, they reckoned themselves sympathetic and noble; but they were content with emotional nobleness, as it seemed, and never gave it a practical outlet. The poor who were ground down on their country estates, felt the outrage of this kind of goodness, and hurried their tender-hearted oppressors to the guillotine and gallows."

"What a delusion that is!" said Charlie. "And it is one that is easy to fall into."

"So it is. While the church will profess to be more religious than ever before, it will depart more fully from God's word. We can see to-day how 'higher criticism' so called, has presumed to throw aside God's word; how infidelity is preached from professedly Christian pulpits; how the church, that has long been wooing the world, now comes to lean on the arm of human law for the enforcement of religious observances. While professing to trust in God, she denies it by her dependence upon the state. The same inconsistency is in the world. While nations say they will not learn war any more, they 'prepare for war, and wake up their mighty men.' While they talk of arbitration, they send forth armies. While they prate of brotherhood, they reduce the poor and grind down the weak. While their wickedness brings its own result,—famine, pestilence and perplexity—they charge these evils upon those who obey God. The plea has already been urged that Sunday observance must be enforced by law, because the Bible says that judgments will fall on those who fail to observe the Sabbath, and those who have presented this plea for Sunday enforcement, know that the Sabbath is the seventh and not the first day of the week."

"Mama, how do you account for these inconsistencies?" asked Charlie. "It seems as if they were losing their minds."

"There is a verse that accounts for it. It is the one that says, 'The devil hath come down unto you having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.' Falsehood is always inconsistent. Those who choose to be deceived will have strong delusion, that they may believe a lie. One of the most pleasing delusions is the delusion of a temporal millennium. It is the siren's song of this century. Bellamy's 'Looking Backward' was a dream of a millennium that has taken hold of the popular desire. In that book he pictures the world under the working of what would seem righteous laws, aided by invention, education, religion and brotherhood.

"Men are chasing up this delightful delusion, while Infinite Love points them to the New Jerusalem, to the coming of the King of kings, and urges souls to prepare for 'him whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders,' for when they shall say 'peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them.' Satan will keep up his idea of an opposition kingdom to the bitter end." F. B.

FOR three centuries after the beginning of the "Christian era," Christians refused to enter military service, because they regarded such an occupation as contrary to the spirit and teachings of their Master.

THE American Bible Society, after an interval of sixty years, has obtained a footing once more in Ecuador for Bible work. Sixty years ago its agent was banished by the Government at the request of the bishop of Quito. Repeated efforts have been made since that time to renew the work, but in vain. Eleven years ago a ton of Bibles was barred out because the ecclesiastical authorities were not willing to have them circulated without accompanying notes. Under the new political régime in Ecuador the Bible Society is again at work. There is at present a large measure of liberty. The agent of the Society, Señor Antay, a Peruvian, recently had access to President Alfaro, who became much interested and bought a Bible for himself, paying $7.50 in currency for it. It is hoped that by legislative enactment the Scriptures may be made entirely free from import duty. The difficulties the agent has met so far are the indifference of the Liberals toward religion and toward the Society's books and the general prejudice against Protestantism.—The Independent.

At the late session of the Presbyterian General Assembly the "Committee on Sabbath Observance" presented a report, which was adopted, "declaring the law of the Sabbath to be a perpetual obligation upon all men; calling upon all within the church to use their influence for the biblical observance of the day by abstaining from the purchase and reading of the Sunday newspaper, from all forms of amusement and unnecessary work on the Lord's Day; deprecating the opening of the gates of the Omaha Exposition on Sunday; commending the American Sabbath Union and its allied societies, and recommending that each pastor preach on the subject on some Sabbath in next October. The Board of Publication and Sabbath-School Work was requested to prepare a lesson on Sabbath observance."

New Tracts.

THE three new numbers of the Apples of Gold Library treat of The Power of God, The Sabbath, and Coming of the Lord. Following is a description:—

Kept by the Power of God, No. 49, price 25c per 100. In this tract we are shown in verse and scripture how, when, where, why, and from what we are "kept by the power of God." Judging from the depth of thought and earnestness expressed, the author wrote from experience gained by a living faith. The reader will find in this tract much that will inspire to a life of faith.

The Day of the Sabbath, No. 50, price $1 per 100. A series of earnest questions on the subject of the Sabbath, covering most of its scripture phases, and bringing the truth home to every candid mind in the most direct, convincing, and least prejudicial way. Many of these questions have been successfully used by the author, Eld. S. W. Raymond, in his experience in the past.

The Heralds of His Coming, No. 51, price $1.50 per 100. Presents in a brief, yet clear and convincing way the fact that our Lord is coming again, the manner of his coming, and many of the chief signs which conclusively show that his coming is near. It is illustrated with a helpful diagram.

The coming of Christ is the greatest event before the world to-day, and this little tract is sent out with a prayer that it may, under the blessing of the Lord, convince men that this is really so.

ALL human laws are a failure which aim either to make it as easy as possible to do right, or as hard as possible to do wrong.

"OLD Glory" bears neither mark nor sign suggestive of empire or a colonial government. Will the nation adopt a new flag?

A VERY good thing, in its place, becomes a very bad thing, out of its place. The church, out of her proper place, becomes one of the worst institutions in the world.

THE law of the land says that you shall not spend your time in doing that which interferes with the rights of your neighbors. And this is as far as human law has a right to go.

THE Rome (Italy) correspondent of the New York Sun states that the health of the pope is very feeble, and that the chief cause of his indisposition is anxiety over the outcome of the Spanish-American war.

WITH the invasion of Cuba by the United States troops, the war is taking on an aspect which brings the reality of it painfully home to this country. With every day of the fighting around Santiago American citizens are falling in battle, and homes and hearts far away from the battle field are filled with gloom and pierced with the deepest sorrow. Creation groans for the time when wars shall forever end,—when "the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

THERE are a number of calls going to the world to-day; to which are you listening?

THE illustrations in this issue were made expressly for the AMERICAN SENTINEL. And there will be others following, if not in every issue, at least at frequent intervals. These will help much to sell the paper, and may be counted on by those willing to work to extend its circulation.

FOLLOWING our usual custom of omitting one paper at or near the completion of the half volume, we drop an issue at this time; so there will be no SENTINEL next week. The date of the next issue will be July 14. It will be a good number, and illustrated. Look out for it.

OUR forefathers of Revolutionary days fought against the principle of arbitrary government embodied in an act of Parliament imposing a tax on tea. The tax itself was very mild; but the unjust principle was just as big in the mild tax as it would have been in a heavy one. And so of a Sunday law; the unjust principle embodied in the law is in no wise affected by making the requirements of the law mild instead of severe. It is against the principle of such measures that we need to be guarded.

"WHY don't God kill the devil?" some people foolishly ask. The answer is that God believes in religious liberty, and is now giving the human family an opportunity, through the enjoyment of that liberty, to develop character. God purposes to dispose of the devil and sin and all that is evil at one and the same time; for all these things belong together and all tend toward the same end. But if God were to destroy sin now, all sinners would be destroyed with it; but sinners are yet on probation, and have an opportunity to separate from sin, so that the destruction of sin will not involve them with it; and besides, God is able to deliver all persons from the devil, so that so far as that is concerned, the devil doesn't need to be destroyed. If God were to kill the devil now it would be an acknowledgment that he could not successfully contend with him on even terms.

SOME people find fault with the AMERICAN SENTINEL for speaking so much in a tone of challenge. They think it should have more to say in the line of "All's well," or "Good time coming." We assure our friends that the SENTINEL would be glad to make this report if it could do so upon evidence. It proceeds upon the principle that it is better to know an unpleasant truth, than a pleasant lie. There is a good time coming, but we will not survive to see it unless we know how to meet and escape existing perils.

To those of our readers who are deeply interested in the special line of work to which the SENTINEL has been called, but who have not had the privilege of being thoroughly conversant with it in the past, and to those also who value the SENTINEL for reference and help in their work, we would respectfully call attention to our "Bound Volume" ad. which appears in this issue of the paper.

News received from Havana and other parts of Cuba under Spanish control discloses a terrible condition of affairs due to the blockade, which has shut off almost all supplies from the island. Nearly all the reconcentrados around Havana, it is stated, have died from starvation, and the poorer classes in other parts have only death staring them in the face. And the end of the war is seemingly a long way from being in sight.

A NEW CATALOGUE of all our publications, circulars of our new line of Combination Family Bibles, and a fine circular showing full-size illustrations of our SENTINEL Premium Bible, both closed and open, will be sent to any one sending their name and address together with a 2-cent stamp.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, JULY 14, 1898.

NUMBER 27.

THE carnal nature is the architect of hell.

—O—

NOT all is Christian that appears angelic.

—O—

"THE weapons of our warfare are not carnal."

—O—

THE gospel of God cannot be preached by the law of man.

—O—

ANY "moral reform" that is not wrought in the heart is a delusion.

—O—

CONSCIENCE is one of the things which the Sunday law aims to close up.

—O—

"CHARITY" is never found far from her sister graces faith and hope.

IT is useless to invoke the aid of human law in the warfare that is not against flesh and blood, but against "spiritual wickedness in high places."

TRUTH and righteousness cannot fall to the ground while God remains upon his throne. That which embodies truth and righteousness needs no support from the civil arm.

Which Path: to the Word of God or to the Legislature?

This all-important question is being settled to-day by great organizations of Christian young people, of which the Society of Christian Endeavor is now the foremost example. Shall they seek to the legislature—to politics—for power to accomplish the Christian work they have undertaken? or shall they seek "power from on high"—the power of God? In the illustration the movement seems to be towards the legislature; and this, unfortunately, correctly represents the situation. And in this lies the gravest peril to them and to the country.

"THUS saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the OLD PATHS, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." Jer. 6:16. "I am the Lord thy God, which teacheth thee to profit, which leadeth thee by the way that thou shouldest go." Isa. 48:17.

IF law could make men better, there would be no need of the gospel.

—O—

NO amount of legislation can separate conscience from the Sabbath.

THE "snapshot" is a poor way to get a correct photograph of character.

—O—

ALL Christian institutions have their support in God; and they need no other.

—O—

THE institution of the Sabbath can be neither civil nor uncivil. It is purely religious.

—O—

ANY religion might as well go down which cannot be sustained by love to God and to one's fellowmen.

SOME of the most troublesome people in the world are those who have a surplus of conscience—enough for themselves and for all their neighbors.

THE test of Christianity is love; not that which men may call love, but the love of God. Christianity means being like God in our disposition toward others.

But what is the love of God? The Scripture says: "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins;" and "God commendeth his love toward us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." John 4:10; Rom. 5:8.

As God loved those who were his enemies, so must Christians love their enemies. They must love all men and count all as their brethren.

But how is love of our enemies to be manifested? The answer is plain. If we are actuated by the spirit of God, our love for all men will be manifested in sacrificing for them even as God did. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life." John 3:16.

How then can the spirit of love—the love of God—be reconciled with the spirit of war? We cannot reconcile it. The spirit of love says that we should lay down our lives for our enemies. The spirit of war says that our enemies should lay down their lives for us.

The Christian warfare does not mean death to our enemies, but death to self. And if Christians are engaged in this warfare, they will not at the same time be engaged in any other.

Persuasion Vs. Compulsion.

BY H. A. HELLIER.

IT is the duty of the State to protect liberty of conscience, and in matters of religion the extreme limits of its authority have been reached when it does that. It was because they recognized this principle clearly that the evangelical princes of Germany uttered that memorable protest, when in answer to the decree of the papacy, demanding the suppression of the Reformation, they said, "Let us reject this decree. In matters of conscience the majority have no power."

The annunciation of this principle is made more significant when we remember that when the princes said that, they realized that they were fighting against the powers of earth and hell, and that they would probably pay the penalty with their property, freedom, and even their lives. It is in the footsteps of these noble men that the Protestants of the world to-day profess to be following, yet how far have they strayed from that path! All over the land they have organized societies that have as their object the domination of the State by the Church. This they deny, and say, "We merely wish the State to put on righteousness," or "We wish to see Christ enthroned as King of the Commonwealth."

Now, religion has nothing to do with the State, or the State with religion if they both keep in their proper sphere, and only when religion has lost its vitalizing principle, and has become but a form, does she seek union with, or aid from, the State. Therefore, those, the majority who are clamoring for Sunday laws, and insist that the minority must observe their Puritanical Sabbath in deference to the majority, have, in this age of enlightenment lost sight of the vital principle of freedom of conscience, which was so clearly recognized by the evangelical princes amid the moral darkness of the sixteenth century.

How strange it is that these people cannot see that the State cannot put on righteousness, and how strange that they do not realize that this movement betrays the print of Satan's cloven foot, inasmuch as it is, like everything else emanating from him, the antipodes of the teachings of Christ; for he never attempted to legislate righteousness onto the State, or on the individuals composing it. No, indeed; his gentle voice of entreaty sinks into the hearts of individuals, saying, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," and "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." Again, "If any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world."

In everything Christ leaves the individual to choose whom he will serve; but his professed followers instead of following him and presenting his righteousness, thus persuading the sinner individually to accept it, must needs make(?) the sinner righteous by legislating righteousness onto the State. How they can make the State holy without first converting every sinner composing the State, they do not undertake to explain, for they cannot. If those who are doing this work of Satan, but who do not realize it as such, and who honestly think as did Paul, that they are doing God's service, would only go on bended knees before the throne of grace with hearts humbled by Christ's Spirit and ask for light on this question, God would flood them with light, and his Spirit would show whither their feet were tending, and lift them from the groveling ranks of the arch-enemy to the mighty ranks of the Omnipotent Prince who will soon vanquish all intrigue and sin, and rule the universe in peace and righteousness.

THE city authorities of Cleveland, Ohio, maintain an attitude of firm hostility to all desecration of Sunday by baseball games and public sports, and as a result it is said the Cleveland League Ball Club will be transferred to some other city.

A Little Piece of Ancient History Which Is Also Modern.

IN considering the new and "imperial" career that is being opened before the United States, and sanctioned by so many in high positions, we have remarked that there was one republic that had passed over this ground once before in the history of the world. That republic was Rome. It is interesting to read the statements made to-day concerning this "colonial policy" and "colonial career" that is opening up before "imperial America," and compare it with what has long been written of the course of Rome as she passed over the same ground. It is now claimed on behalf of the new, "Imperial America," that she must accept this great responsibility that has fallen upon her of extending the blessings of liberty to the world. And that she must discharge this sacred office by beginning to deliver from the oppressive rule of Spain, the people of the Phillipines, San Juan, Cuba, perhaps the Carolines and so on to the other oppressed peoples of the world. It is said that America will thus extend the blessing of liberty, just because of the blessing of liberty, she will bestow freedom, entirely from love of human freedom as far as possible to all the world.

All this is precisely what Rome proposed to do. Rome claimed that she never wished to make any conquests of any people, nor to control any territory, outside of her own boundaries of Italy. All that she ever did outside of Italy was altogether out of pure benevolence and solely to extend to oppressed peoples the blessings of liberty, of which the Romans were the exemplars before the world, and in behalf of the world, and which they so sincerely loved that they couldn't be content at all so long as any other people were not enjoying this wonderful liberty. Therefore they would man fleets and raise armies, send them over seas at great sacrifice and immense expense to fight battles for strange peoples, only that those peoples might have the blessing of liberty of which Rome was the world's conservator.

One example will illustrate this whole subject. The Romans had sent an army into Macedonia to fight against Philip the Second in behalf of the States of Greece and to save them from being oppressed by Philip. The Roman army was successful, Philip was thoroughly conquered and a treaty of peace was concluded, but "all Greece was in uncertainty" as to what should be their fate, now that the Roman power was predominant in both Greece and Macedonia. It was the time when the Isthmian games were celebrated in which all Greece participated and where vast crowds were assembled to witness the contests, then "the multitude being assembled in the stadium to see the games, a herald came forward and published with a loud voice" the following proclamation:—

"The senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius, their general, having overcome Philip and the Macedonians, ease and deliver from all garrisons, taxes and imposts, the Corinthians, the Locrians, the Phocians, the Euboeans, the Phthiot Achaeans, the Magnesians, the Thesslians, and the Perrhoeians; declare them free, and ordain that they shall be governed by their respective laws and usages."

"At these words, which many heard but imperfectly, because of the noise that interrupted them, all the spectators were filled with excess of joy. They gazed upon and questioned one another with astonishment, and could not believe either their eyes or ears; so like a dream was what they then saw and heard. It was thought necessary for the herald to repeat the proclamation which was now listened to with the most profound silence, so that not a single word of the decree was lost. But now, fully assured of their happiness, they abandoned themselves again to the highest transport of joy and broke into such loud and repeated acclamations that the sea resounded them to a great distance; and some ravens which happened to fly at that instant over the assembly fell down in the stadium; so true it is, that of all the blessings of this life, none are so dear to mankind as liberty! The games and sports were hurried over with neglect and disregard; for so great was the general joy upon this occasion that it extinguished every other thought.

"The games being ended, all the people ran in crowds to the Roman general, and every one being eager to see his deliverer, to salute him, to kiss his hand, and to throw crowns and festoons of flowers over him, he would have run the hazard of being pressed to death by the crowd had not the vigor of his years, for he was not above thirty-three years old, and the joy which so glorious a day gave him, sustained and enabled him to undergo the fatigue.

"The remembrance of so delightful a day and of the invaluable blessing then bestowed was forever renewing and for a long time the only subject of conversation in all times and in all places. Everyone cried in the highest transports of admiration and a kind of enthusiasm that there was a people in the world, who at their own expense and the hazard of their lives, engage in a war for the liberty of other nations; and that not for their neighbors or people situated on the same continent, but who crossed seas, and sailed to distant climes, to destroy and extirpate unjust power from the earth, and to establish universally, law, equity, and justice. That by a single word, and the voice of a herald, liberty had been restored to all the cities of Greece and Asia. That a great soul only could have formed such a design; but to execute it was the effect at once of the highest good fortune and the most consummate virtue.

"They called to mind all the great battles which Greece had fought for the sake of liberty. 'After sustaining so many wars,' said they, 'never was its valor crowned with so blessed a reward as when strangers came and took up arms in its defense. It was then, that almost without shedding a drop of blood, or losing one man, it acquired the greatest and noblest of all prizes for which mankind can contend. Valor and prudence are rare at all times, but of all virtues justice is most rare. Agesilaus, Lysander, Nicias and Alcibides had great abilities for carrying on war, and gained battles both by sea and land; but it was for themselves and for their country, not for strangers and foreigners, they fought. That height of glory was reserved for the Romans.'

Honest old Rollin's "reflections" upon this, are important to-day, as the United States seems about to start in this same identical path. These reflections run thus:—

 “The reader may perceive in the events above related one of the principal characteristics of the Romans which will soon determine the fate of all the States of Greece and produce an almost general change in the universe; I mean a spirit of sovereignty and dominion. This characteristic does not display itself at first in its full extent. It reveals itself by degrees; and it is only by insensible progress which at the same time is sufficiently rapid, that we see it carried at last to its greatest height.

“It must be confessed, that this people, on some occasions, show a moderation and disinterestedness, which from a superficial view, seem to exceed everything we meet within history, and which we feel it incumbent on us to praise.

“Was there ever a more glorious day than that in which the Romans, after having carried on a long and dangerous war, after crossing seas, and exhausting their treasures, caused a herald to proclaim in a general assembly, that the Roman people restored all the cities to their liberty and desired to reap no other fruits by their victory, than the noble pleasure of doing good to nations, the bare remembrance of whose ancient glory sufficed to endear them to the Romans?

“Had this deliverance of the Grecian states, proceeded merely from a spirit of generosity, void of all interested motives; had the whole tenor of the conduct of the Romans been of the same nature, with such exalted sentiments, nothing could possibly have been more august, or more capable of doing honor to a nation. But if we penetrate ever so little beyond this glaring outside, we soon perceive, that this specious moderation of the Romans was entirely founded on a profound policy; wise indeed, and prudent, according to the ordinary rules of government; but at the same time very remote from that noble disinterestedness so highly extolled on the present occasion. It may be affirmed that the Grecians then abandoned themselves to a stupid joy: fondly imagining that they were really free because the Romans declared them so.

“The Romans declared loudly in favor of those republics [of Greece]; made it their glory to take them under their protection, and that with no other design in outward appearance, than to defend them against their oppressors; and further, to attach them by a still stronger tie, they hung out to them a specious bait, as a reward for their fidelity—I mean liberty, of which all the republics in question were inexpressibly jealous, and which the Macedonian monarchs had perpetually disputed with them.

“The bait was artfully prepared, and was eagerly swallowed by the generality of the Greeks, whose views penetrated no further. But the most judicious and most clear-sighted among them, discovered the danger that lay concealed beneath this charming bait; and accordingly they exhorted the people from time to time in their public assemblies, to beware of this cloud that was gathering in the west; and which, changing on a sudden into a dreadful tempest, would break like thunder over their heads to their utter destruction.

“Nothing could be more gentle and equitable than the conduct of the Romans in the beginning. They acted with the utmost moderation toward such states and nations as addressed them for protection; they succored them against their enemies; took the utmost pains in terminating their differences and in suppressing all trouble which arose among them; and did not demand the least recompense for all these services done for their allies. By these means, their authority gained strength daily and prepared the nation for entire subjection.

“Under the pretense of manifesting their good will, of entering into their interests, and of reconciling them, they rendered themselves as the sovereign arbiters of those whom they had restored to liberty, and whom they now considered in some measure as their freedmen. They used to depute commissioners to them to inquire into their complaints, to weigh and examine the reasons on both sides, and to decide their quarrels; but when the articles were of such a nature that there was no possibility of reconciling them on the spot, they invited them to send their deputies to Rome, but afterwards they used to summon those who refused to be reconciled; obliged them to plead their cause before the senate and even to appear in person there. From arbiters and mediators, having become supreme judges, they soon assumed a magisterial tone, looked upon their decrees as irrevocable decisions, were greatly offended when the most implicit obedience was not paid to them, and gave the name of rebellion to a second resistance. Thus there arose in the Roman senate, a tribunal which judged all nations and kings, and from which there was no appeal.

“We see by the event to what this so-much boasted lenity and moderation of the Romans was confined. Enemies to the liberty of all nations, having the utmost contempt for kings and monarchy, looking upon the whole universe as their prey, they grasped with insatiable ambition the conquest of the whole world. They seized indiscriminately all provinces and kingdoms, and extended their empire over all nations; in a word, they prescribed no other limits to their vast projects than those which deserts and seas made it impossible to pass.”

This extract will be good to keep, and to read along with much spread-eagleism that has been and that will be manifested upon “Imperial America,” “our colonial policy,” and “our obligations to extend the blessings of liberty to oppressed peoples” and “to all the world.”

IN Congress recently, during the consideration of a bill appropriating $25,000 to make improvements upon a piece of ground near the city of Washington, it was intimated that this was desired mainly to increase the value of a tract of land held by Methodists, who hoped to erect upon it a Methodist college. Mr. Henderson offered in favor of the measure the argument that “we have in this city a Catholic university, and Congress has given it every facility, by roadways and street improvements, to afford it easy facilities in connecting with the city.” This illustrates how easily and naturally one wrong is sought to be justified by another wrong, when a wrong precedent has once been established.

“ACQUIRE a government over your ideas, that they may come down when they are called, and depart when they are bidden.”

Three Sabbaths.

THE LORD'S SABBATH—THE JEWISH SABBATH—THE POPE'S SABBATH.

BY E. J. WAGGONER.

ONE can in truth speak of sabbaths in the plural only as one can speak of many gods. "There is no God but one. For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or on earth; as there are gods many and lords many; yet to us there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we through him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him." 1 Cor. 8:5, 6. So, though there be various sabbaths, so-called, there is but one true Sabbath, the Sabbath of the Lord.

THE LORD'S SABBATH.

The word Sabbath means rest. It is a Hebrew word transferred into the English language. When the Hebrews used the word "Sabbath," it conveyed the same idea to them that the word "rest" does to us. The fourth commandment therefore really says to us: "Remember the rest day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the rest of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the rest day and hallowed it."

We must not make the mistake of judging the Lord's rest from what men are accustomed to call rest. God is not a man. We should rather learn from God's rest what rest really is. God's rest is not mere physical rest from weariness. This we know from two facts. First, "God is Spirit." John 4:24. Not "a spirit," as though he were one of many; but he is Spirit, as it is rendered in the margin of the Revision. Second, "The everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary." Isa. 40:28. The Lord therefore did not rest because he was tired, and his rest is not physical, but spiritual, since he is Spirit. "They that worship him must worship him in Spirit and in truth."

God rested, not because he was weary, but because his work was finished. When work is finished, and is well done, nothing but rest remains. In six days God finished his work, and as he surveyed it, he pronounced it "very good." There was no flaw in it. It was without fault before him. Therefore since God's work was done and well done at the close of the sixth day, "He rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made." He had no sad reflections, no regrets. His rest was not marred, as what man calls rest so often is, by any such thought as, "To-morrow I must go at that work again;" nor, "I wish I had done this portion a little differently;" nor, "If I could do that over again, I could make an improvement;" nor, "That last day's work is so bad that I cannot bear to look at it; I was so tired when I got to it that I couldn't half do it." Nothing of the kind. Every portion of the work, even man, was as perfect as it was possible for it to be, and God took pure delight in contemplating the work from which he was resting because it was complete and perfect.

This is the rest which he offers to us. It is not something he imposes on us, but which he in everlasting love and kindness gives to us. Rest is not a task that is laid on one. It is not a burden. They who look upon the Sabbath as a burden, have no idea of what the Sabbath of the Lord is. It is rest, perfect, unalloyed rest.

Jesus Christ is the One by whom the worlds were made, "for in him were all things created, in the heavens, and upon the earth," therefore he is the One who offers us this rest. To every soul he cries, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Matt. 11:28. The rest is found in him, because in him the works of God are completed. In him is the new creation, and if any man be in him, he is a new creature. On the cross Jesus cried, "It is finished," thus showing that in his cross we find that perfect rest that comes alone from the finished work of the Lord.

This rest is gained by faith. "We which believe do enter into rest." How so?—Because by faith we have the finished, perfect work of the Lord as our own. "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." John 6:29. Believing him means receiving him; and since in him the works of God are complete, it follows that by believing on him we find the rest.

The rest that Jesus gives is rest from sin. The heavy laden whom he calls to him are those who are burdened with the weight of their sins. All men are thus burdened, "for all have sinned." Our best works are utterly worthless. Christ will have a people who are "zealous of good works" (Titus 2:14, 15), but the good works must be those which God himself has wrought for us in Christ. Only his work is enduring. "His work is honorable and glorious; and his righteousness endureth for ever." Ps. 111:3. Therefore, "by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast; for we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before prepared, that we should walk in them." Eph. 2:8-10. It is "not by works done in righteousness, which we did ourselves, but according to his mercy he saved us, through the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he poured out upon us richly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour." Titus 3:5, 6.

It is by the works of God, therefore, that we are saved, and not by our own. Good works there are in abundance, and they are for us too, but through no work of our own; solely through the perfect work of God in Jesus Christ. If the works were our own, then the rest would be our own; but God gives us his rest, not ours, because only his works can yield perfect rest. "He hath made his wonderful works to be remembered" (Ps. 111:4), or, literally, "He hath made a memorial for his wondrous works." That memorial is the seventh day, the day on which he rested from all his works. That day he has blessed and sanctified, made holy. Its holiness has never departed from it, for "whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever." No matter what man does, nor how man regards the day, its holiness remains.

"There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God;" and the seventh day, which God for ever declares to be his rest, is that by which he makes known to us the perfection of his rest, because it calls us to contemplate a finished and perfect new creation. It reveals to us the everlasting God, the unwearied, almighty Creator, who has wrought and laid up great goodness for them that trust in him before the sons of men. Ps. 31:19. It reminds us that we are "complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power." It tells us that, although we have sinned, and brought the curse upon God's perfect creation, the cross of Christ, which bears the curse, restores and perpetuates the perfect work of God, so that through it we may stand without fault before the throne of God, just as when man was first made. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."

THE JEWISH SABBATH.

There is such a thing as "the Jewish Sabbath," or the Sabbath of the Jews, but it is a far different thing from the Sabbath of the Lord. Many people imagine that if one observes the seventh day he is keeping the Jewish Sabbath; but that does not at all follow. No one keeps the Jewish Sabbath if he keeps the Sabbath "according to the commandment." There is the same difference between the Jewish Sabbath and the Sabbath of the Lord, that there is between a man and God. Let us explain:

"The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord;" but we have seen that the Lord's rest is spiritual rest, which the seventh day commemorates. A man may cease from physical toil on the seventh day of the week, and not keep the Sabbath of the Lord. If a man stops work on Friday evening at sunset, and abstains from all labor until the next day at sunset, merely as a form of worship, and in order that he may be physically better able to go at his work again, or with the thought that he is thereby discharging a duty, and gaining the favor of God, that is not keeping the Sabbath of the Lord. To keep the Sabbath of the Lord is to delight in the Lord. Those who do not delight themselves in the Lord, do not keep his Sabbath, no matter when they abstain from labor.

It is absolutely impossible for one who is not a Christian to keep the Lord's Sabbath; for, as we have seen, God's rest comes only from his perfect work, which is found only in Christ. "We which believe do enter into rest." Therefore no Jew, so-called, as distinguished from a believer in Christ, keeps the Sabbath of the Lord, even though he apparently rests on the seventh day of the week. His rest is his own rest, and not the rest of the Lord.

Do you see the difference? The Jewish Sabbath falls on the same day of the week as the Sabbath of the Lord, but it is not by any means the same thing. It represents only the man himself, and his own work. Instead of being the sign of justification by faith in the work of the Lord, it is the sign of self-righteousness, as indicated by the question which the Jews asked of Jesus: "What shall we do, that we might work the works of God?" They counted their own works equal to God's works. Their obedience was not the obedience of faith, but only of form. From such a Sabbath may the Lord deliver us. It is from it that we are delivered in the Sabbath of the Lord, for we are saved from our own works, and given the perfect works of the Lord. "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord," but let us beware of making it a mere caricature of rest. Let us take it for what it is: the rest of the Lord.

THE POPE'S SABBATH.

This is something entirely different from the Sabbath of the Jews, and infinitely different from the Sabbath of the Lord. The Sabbath of the Lord is the acceptance of God's own works, and rest in them alone, allowing him to work both to will and to do of his good pleasure; the Jewish Sabbath represents the vain attempt of zealous and self-confident men to do the works which God himself does, and which God alone can do; but the pope's sabbath signifies the substitution of man's work for God's work, as being not only as good, but even better. It dispenses with even the form of the commandment of the Lord. Let us see how this is.

The Lord's Sabbath has been sufficiently dwelt on for the present. We know what it is. We have seen that the Jews' sabbath is the observing of the form of the Lord's Sabbath, without the substance which can come only by faith. It falls on the same day, but is man's sabbath, not the Lord's. The pope's sabbath has nothing in common with the Sabbath of the Lord, not even in form, but utterly repudiates it. Thus, a papist book, entitled, "A Sure Way to Find Out the True Religion," says:—

"The keeping holy the Sunday is a thing absolutely necessary to salvation; and yet this is nowhere put down in the Bible; on the contrary, the Bible says, "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy (Ex. 20:8), which is Saturday, and not Sunday; therefore the Bible does not contain all things necessary to salvation."

This is only one out of many similar citations that might be given, but is sufficient to show that in the observance of Sunday the Catholic Church deliberately repudiates the Word of the Lord, and sets itself above it. It has placed its sabbath on an entirely different day from the Sabbath of the Lord,—a day which even God himself could not possibly have made his Sabbath since on it he began his work,—in order to emphasize its claim to be above God. It would teach men that they are to obey the church rather than God.

Notice that the citation speaks about the necessity of "keeping holy the Sunday." But God has not made the Sunday holy. In fact, the Bible knows nothing about such a day. It does know the first day of the week, which it calls a working day, but the Sunday, a day composed of parts of two days, was made in Rome. The only day that God has ever spoken of as holy is the seventh day of the week. That day He himself has made holy, and all he asks of us is to keep it holy. But since God has not made the Sunday holy, it follows that if man is to keep it holy, man himself must make it holy. All the sacredness in the world that Sunday has is that which man gives to it. The Sunday-sabbath, therefore, stands as the sign of man's pretended power to make things holy. For if man can make one thing holy, it is evident that he can make anything holy. If man can make and keep a day holy, then he can make and keep himself holy. The pope's sabbath is thus the sign of his claim to take the place of the Lord as the sanctifier of sinners.

While the seventh day is the sign of God's power to save by his own works, the Sunday is the sign of man's assumed power to save himself by his own works entirely apart from, and in spite of the Lord. It repudiates the Lord, in repudiating his Word. Take notice that this is said of the pope's Sunday, and not of all those who regard it as a holy day. There are thousands who are keeping the pope's day, honestly supposing it to be the Sabbath of the Lord. Such of course believe in justification by faith, although they unwittingly observe the sign of justification by works. It is for the benefit of such that this article is written, that they may be wholly consistent in their profession of faith. We are dealing with facts, regardless of how men may stand related to them; and the facts are that the Lord's Sabbath is justification by faith; the pope's sabbath means justification by works, and that man's own works. On which side will you stand?

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE everlasting gospel, as brought to view in Rev. 14:6,7, is to be proclaimed at the very time when the work of enforcing the worship of the beast through the reception of the mark, is in process of fulfillment. Not only is this so, but it is with direct reference to this work that the gospel is to be proclaimed. This will be seen from the reading of the message itself: "Fear God and give glory to him . . . and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea and the fountains of waters."

It has always been the duty of all created beings to worship him that made them. No one will dispute this. To this end has the gospel ever been preached. Why then should it be necessary to give a special message for this purpose as expressed in the Scripture under consideration? It is in view of the fact that at such a time a professedly gospel work is being carried on with the avowed object of compelling the people to worship God. But as we have seen, the truth is that those who would yield to the influences brought to bear upon them, would not be worshipping God, but the power symbolized by the beast of Rev. 13:1, which we know is the papacy. And there are many true-hearted Christians, who are walking in all the light they have, and who have no other desire than to serve God with undivided affection. For their sakes, as well as for others who would heed the invitation, the gospel must be proclaimed.

Being professedly a Christian work, it could not be wondered at that at first there would be thousands who would have no other idea but that such a work was really Christianity, and so for a time be deceived. And they would also be given to understand that the mark to be enforced would be set forth as the test of Christianity as to whether one was really worshipping God or not.

Inasmuch as this work would be professedly gospel work it will be clear to all that when begun it must be started by Christians.

It is of the highest importance that we do not lose sight of the fact that the gospel call to "Fear God" etc. is really a call to keep the commandments of God; for it will then be seen that the point wherein one is failing to fear God and to give glory to him is with reference to one of the commandments.

In view of the fact that this work will be carried on by Christians we may ask what has been the attitude of the Christian Church with reference to the law of God and one's obligation to it? From the time of the Reformation the church has been divided on points of doctrine, but never in their teachings have they been disloyal to the law of God. With one accord they have taught that it is necessary for the commandments to be kept by all.

But while this is so they have with one accord taught their communicants and others to violate one of the commandments. The fourth commandment, as all know, requires that the seventh day shall be kept holy unto the Lord. But notwithstanding it is so plainly enjoined, another day has been put in its place—a day, as pointed out last week, that was never kept by the Lord Jesus; a day that he never commanded his followers to keep; a day that his apostles never did keep, nor thought others to keep; a day for which in the Scriptures there is not the slightest hint of sacredness or sanctity. And that day is the day commonly called Sunday.

We have pointed out that the mark, whatever it is, is something that cannot be found in the Bible, and yet would be enforced as one of the commandments of God. Yet the fourth commandment is the only one concerning which the church fails, in her practice, to regard, putting this other day (Sunday) in the place of the day the commandment itself requires, and this Sunday is the only day ever sought to be enforced by civil law and called a mark. Thus again it is proven that SUNDAY IS THE MARK OF THE PAPACY (or the beast). And thus Sunday being the mark of the papacy it is absolutely certain that it is not, cannot be, nor ever was rightly the mark of God.

But while this is so, it must ever be remembered that it by no means follows that those who have honestly observed Sunday supposing it to be the Sabbath of the commandment, have been accounted by God as beast-worshippers; nor would we insinuate such a thing. To quote the language of another on this point, we would say that "the test upon this question does not come until Sunday observance is enforced by law, and the world is enlightened concerning the obligation of the true Sabbath. Not until the issue is thus plainly set before the people, and they are brought to choose between the commandments of men, will those who continue in transgression receive the mark of the beast."

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

WE instructed our Unions in this work among mothers to organize what we called "Mothers' Circles" to meet once a week if possible. First, in order, was to district the village or city, and make a canvass of all homes. We were to go to rich and cultured who might be totally unconscious of any lack in themselves, and arouse them to interest in the poor, the ignorant and degraded. By this means two purposes would be served; the poor would have friends raised up for them, and the rich might be led to discover their own hearts and their own needs.

I could draw from many experiences to illustrate how this worked, and will select one notable case.

I had held an institute in an eastern city and given this plan of work, and a year or so later was recalled to continue it by a series of evangelistic services in the churches. I was met at the depot by the president of the leading Union, and she said: "I came for you myself because I have something to tell you at once. We have carried out this plan of work which you gave us, and as a result one of the wealthiest ladies of the city is waiting with such eagerness for your coming that I expect she will be at your home to meet you before you will get your lunch eaten. It came about in such a way that we all see that God was in it. The member of the Union to whom the district was given in which this lady lives is not such a very able woman, nor very courageous, but good and true as gold. She was very timid about calling on this rich lady but she came to the visitor of another district and said 'I want to borrow your drunkard's family with the crippled child for a lady in my district. I don't know of any other way to approach her.'

"This lady is literary, artistic, beautiful; has always been in society, and seems absolutely beyond us, but this funny borrowing was agreed to, and our little timid visitor called on her rich lady, and without any preliminaries began to tell her about our work for mothers and children, and about the poor little baby who had been crippled by its father in a drunken outbreak. The child needed many things that would cost money, and which the Union would not be able to provide. There was hope that its condition might be greatly bettered by treatment if it could be provided. She told the story with all the earnestness of a thoroughly aroused motherly woman, and the Spirit of God helped her. Before she got to the end the eyes of her listener were full of tears, and she began to express herself by saying,

"I thank you for coming to me with this. I did not suppose any one would have so much confidence in me; no one ever did before. I will be glad to help. I am thoroughly sick of the selfish life I have lived. I will order the carriage and we will go at once to see this poor baby."

"So the carriage with the coachman in livery was called and the two went together to the drunkard's home.

"The interest aroused in this woman did not stop in one child, but reached out to all the sin-cursed children of the city, and the result was a plan for many things by which it was hoped to alleviate the distress of the victims of vice and poverty. Among the plans which she is hoping to realize is a free kindergarten, and it is about this that she is so anxious to see and talk with you."

I was still at my lunch when she came. She was as full of projected good works as an egg is of meat, and eager for information as to how to proceed. She said:

"This work has been such a blessing to me that I wish to give everybody a chance to help in it, and will it be too much to ask you to mention it in your meetings, and tell every one who would like to assist that they can have an opportunity by handing their contribution to the Treasurer of the W. C. T. U."

She did not dream of the delight and wonder with which I looked at her and listened, nor of how more than glad I was to say "it will be no trouble. I will gladly aid you all I can in every meeting. Please write out a statement of what you would like to have me present and I will use it as a mark for my Bible lesson, so I will never forget it."

This she did, and was then so interested to know just how I would present her plan that she came to every service following the meeting from church to church all over the city, and before we had finished she came and said:

"I want to join you and put on the white ribbon. I will banish the wine from my home forever."

This she did and soon added thereto the consecration of herself to Christ and work for his neglected poor.

"God has so framed us as to make freedom of choice and action the very basis of all moral improvement, and all our faculties, mental and moral, resent and revolt against the idea of coercion."

THE country is at war. It has been at war for two months and more; but now that heavy fighting has begun between the armies on Cuban soil, and many are falling in battle, the terrible fact of war becomes far more real to the public mind than it could be made by reports from the blockade around Havana. The fighting spirit of the people is aroused, and war and fighting are glorified in the popular sentiment of the day.

You are one of the people. The events which are transpiring upon the fields where the honor, prestige, and power of the Government are being put to the test, have an effect upon you, as they do upon others. The nation is developing national character, and this must affect, sooner or later, the fortunes of every individual under its jurisdiction; but more important to you is the fact that you are developing individual character, either through the influence of public sentiment around you, or from some other source. No one is an idle spectator of the great change that is in progress in national policy and sentiment. It affects in some way every person who dwells under the national flag.

THE question is, Do you realize what duties and responsibilities are brought to you by the swift procession of events? Do you stand as an individual? or do you stand as one of the mass? To do the former means more than to do the latter. Do you act upon your own judgment? or upon the judgment embodied in public sentiment? Are you willing to stand, if necessary, upon your own convictions of right, against a multitude who hold different views? These are questions that an individual may properly propound and answer to himself at any time after he has arrived at years of discretion.

THE tendency of the age is to lose individual identity in the mass. The teaching which comes from sources regarded as authoritative says that individual judgment must be sacrificed to that of the majority, for the general good. This is quite proper in all matters which do not involve questions of moral right or wrong. But it is now said that public morality is paramount to individual morality; that there is a State conscience, and that to this the individual conscience must give way. And let no one imagine that these are questions which do not personally concern him. The issue may arise at any time which will oblige you to choose whether you will stand with the crowd upon their convictions, or against the crowd upon your own convictions; and the decision will depend upon the nature of the elements you are putting into your character to-day.

* * *

CHARACTER is the essential thing; not the character of a state or government, or of a body of men taken together, but individual character. Upon individual character depends national character. But whether politicians and legislators recognize this truth or not, it is important for you to recognize that your own character is, for you, more important than all things else. It is more important for you, that your own character should be upright, than that the like character should belong to the nation.

THE first step in the formation of a proper character is independence. The national character began with the Declaration of Independence; and that was a result of the individual independence which ruled in the breasts of its signers. Independence means simply cutting loose from unnecessary supports. It was not intended that you should lean mentally upon some one else, any more than that you should lean upon some one for physical support. The child learns early to stand alone, and then to walk alone; and to the mind is due the like degree of development. Some people never get beyond the creeping period, mentally, and must depend all their lives upon others for mental support; but this is a terrible misfortune. The mind, no less than the body, was endowed by the Creator with the capacity for independent action; and it is an important moment in the life of an individual when he stands for the first time—mentally—alone; even more so than when he first stands alone or takes his first step unsupported, physically.

It is not intended that you should lean upon public sentiment. Public sentiment is not an argument,—at least not a conclusive one. And in questions relating to moral right and wrong it is to be remembered that public sentiment is most often in the wrong. That public sentiment now glorifies war and demands an expansion of military power and of territory, does not settle the question for you. The decisions of other people do not settle any question of moral right for you. You must settle such questions for yourself; not of yourself, but by your own judgment, your own conscience, and that Word which is the divine standard of righteousness. Anything less than this is popery, and will if continued result in failure to form that character which is the all-important thing to be gained in this present life.

the masses. History bears no record of such persons as individuals. And not only do they fail of true success in this life, but they lack the faith to lay hold upon the greater life to gain which all sacrifice in this life is but cheaply made.

DANIEL WEBSTER gave utterance to these forcible words: "If clergymen in our day would return to the simplicity of gospel truth and preach more to individuals and less to the crowd, there would not be so much complaint of the decline of true religion. Many of the ministers of the present day take their text from St. Paul and preach from the newspapers. When they do so, I prefer to enjoy my own thoughts rather than listen. I want my pastor to come to me in the spirit of the gospel, saying: 'You are mortal. Your probation is brief. Your work must be done speedily. . . . You are hastening to the bar of God. The Judge standeth before the door.'"

SENTIMENT against the new policy of imperialism upon which the nation is entering was voiced in a recent mass-meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston, at which a large number were present. Mr. Moorfield Story was the principal speaker, and presented the following among other reasons against the annexation of Hawaii and the Philippines:—

"We are here to insist that a war begun in the cause of humanity shall not be turned into a war for empire, that an attempt to win for Cubans the right to govern themselves shall not be made an excuse for extending our sway over alien people without their consent. It is said that the people are unfit for self-government. Not such the spirit of our fathers. There was no exception in their generous statement that all men are equal before the law and have equal political rights.

"Nothing can wipe from our flag the disgrace if it floats over any but a free people. It should be enough that if we adopt this policy of conquest we are false to our principles and false to our express promises.

"But this case does not end here. We not only disregard that wise policy of non-intervention in European troubles which Washington preached and which until now we have followed. We become a military power, burdened with a standing army and an enormous navy, threatened with complications thousands of miles away, and exposed to constant apprehension. We take up the burden which is crushing Europe. Our domestic difficulties will be neglected, for our attention must be divided.

"When we undertake to govern subject peoples separated from us by half the world, let us remember how we despoiled the Indians at our doors, and how impossible it has been to keep that service pure. Let us not forget the carpetbag governments of our Southern brothers, whose complaints fell on deaf ears, though they spoke our language and we heard them every day. What, think you, shall we hear of wrong in Manila or the Ladrões, and how can we reform abuses there? Such a system means great increase of wealth and fresh fields for corruption. It means a growth of a class little accustomed to respect the rights of their inferiors. It means the spoils system enormously extended."

There are some people who see the injustice and the danger to the nation involved in the new policy, but they are in a hopeless minority. The sentiment of the majority will prevail, and the ship of state will set sail upon the untried seas where so many nations before her have followed after glory and met shipwreck.

THE Constitution of the United States provides that no slavery nor involuntary servitude, save as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the territory or under the jurisdiction of the United States.

This is in harmony with and demanded by the idea of "government of the people, by the people and for the people." It means that no people shall be governed by the United States without their consent.

But it is now proposed to annex the Hawaiian and Phillipine Islands and to extend over the inhabitants of the same the jurisdiction of the Government, independently of their consent. The case of Hawaii is especially prominent at this time. The question of annexation has long been before the peoples of both countries, and the Hawaiians have never signified that they desired it. Their attitude, on the contrary, has been distinctly against it. By annexation, therefore, they will be brought involuntarily into subjection to the American Government.

But the experiment of involuntary subjection has already been tried by this Government, and the result was such as should never be forgotten by the American people. For many years after the establishment of the Constitution involuntary servitude was maintained in many of the States, and was sanctioned by the Federal authority. And the final result was the terrible civil war.

With that warning lesson before their eyes, the American people may well hesitate to approve that which will again violate the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution, and set up the ensign of liberty and union over a people held in subjugation.

This nation was established to proclaim to the world liberty in government; and when it ceases to do this, by annexing to itself a conquered territory and people, it becomes useless for the purpose for which it was divinely ordained and may no longer count upon a favoring Providence.

"Ye cannot hear my word," said Jesus to the angry Pharisees. The voice of prejudice and the clamor of self made it impossible for them to hear the simple truths which the common people heard gladly. He was speaking of life and righteousness, and simple souls who wanted help and strength for right living hung upon his words. The proud and worldly leaders of the church, to whom religion was unconnected with life, heard the same sound of words, but the words of life fell on deaf ears.—The Oriental Watchman.

Sunday Closing in Brewer, Maine.

"Bangor Daily News," June 27.

THERE is a strange condition of affairs in Brewer now, as a result of the effort to have all the stores, except drug stores, remain closed during Sundays.

A petition to the mayor last week, asking that the law against transacting unnecessary business on Sunday be enforced, resulted in City Marshal Fickets making a tour of the city on Saturday and notifying the dealers who have been keeping open shop on Sundays to close up in the future.

The dealers didn't like it a little bit, but it was thought that they would obey the order and keep their doors locked on Sunday.

They didn't close, however, for there was no time Sunday when a person could not have purchased anything that he wished in the way of ice cream, soda, cigars and groceries, and it must be said that many—yes, a great many Brewer people availed themselves of the opportunities, as they have for years past; and appeared glad that the order had not been obeyed.

It is understood that the signers of the petition are going to do their utmost to have the law enforced, while on the other hand the business men affected by the order say that they will make a fight.

Said one of the business men: "If they make us close our stores on Sunday, which is our best day, we'll take a hand at having the old Blue Laws enforced. They've no right to say that the soda and cigar stores shall be closed, but that the drug stores can keep open. The law doesn't give the drug stores the right to sell cigars and soda on Sunday, while the straight cigar and soda places must close.

"Another point if they persist in closing us up, we will see what we can do about closing business of all kinds, stables, drug stores, street cars, milk wagons and bakeries, and I guess we can stop Sunday pleasure riding and walking.

"Yes, sir; I think we can be able to give them all the Blue Laws they want."

A CIGAR dealer of South Norwalk, Conn., was recently fined for selling cigars on Sunday, the judge of the court holding that tobacco is not a necessity of life, and hence cannot be included among the things exempt from the law. In this the judge has struck out one of the absurdities of the Sunday law,—that which allows the sale of tobacco and forbids the sale of bread—but the unjust principle of Sunday laws is not made any better by relieving them of their inconsistencies.

Studies in French History —29.

"Who was the Duke of Bedford?" asked Charlie White, as the scholars took their places in the pleasant class room. "Rob and I both got a little mixed over that point."

"Can any of my girls or boys help him out? if so, don't be afraid to speak," replied the teacher.

"I was a little uncertain on this very point, and so I asked Aunt Eunice," said Julia March. "She said that the Duke of Bedford was the man whom the king of England—Henry Fifth—before he died, appointed to act as ruler in France till the baby king of England grew up big enough."

"That is quite good, Julia. I'm glad you care enough about these lessons to ask questions about them. Now we will go on with our lesson about Jeanne Darc, or Joan of Arc, as she is sometimes called.

"Charles VII. was an extremely selfish and ungrateful fellow, for he made no effort to do anything for the poor creature who had done so much for him,—not even offering a ransom for the devoted maid, who had risked all for love of her country and her king. The English duke dared not put her to death, for he feared as well as hated her. So he did a contemptible thing; he set human blood-hounds,—the bishops of the church,—upon her track."

"I don't see what right the bishops had to meddle with the matter," protested Joe Palmeter, indignantly.

"They ought not to have had anything to do with it, Joseph, but alas! they did,—they did; and they pretended to find some trouble with her religious belief. At least they did not agree with her in every particular, and this was sufficient to send her to the stake."

"You don't mean to say, professor, that this is the reason she was burned," said Florence Ray.

"They made it an excuse, and over her head the cruel bishop wrote the words, 'Heretic, Apostate, Idolator.' The work of the Maid of Orleans, as she was also called, did not stop at her death," continued the teacher, "but it was taken up by others,—the Count of Richmond taking a prominent part, until the country was all retaken from the English, and Charles the Victorious, as he was called, marched into Paris a proud conqueror."

"Who was the Count of Richmond, professor?" asked Will Palmeter. "You say he acted a prominent part in the retaking of France from England."

"He had been Constable of France, but on account of some jealousies had been banished. Charles finally sent for him and made him prime minister."

"I can't see how France could prosper enough to become free while the Burgundians and Armagnacs were quarreling among themselves," commented Julia March.

"I'm glad you spoke of that point, Julia, I was forgetting to mention that these two factions had about become tired of fighting each other, so the Burgundians became reconciled to their own king, and Charles forgave them. However, it is almost doubtful whether France would have recovered herself, had it not been for the help given to Charles by a very rich merchant, who helped him to large sums of money. But as was his disposition always, he was very ungrateful to him.

"This, you must remember, was in the fifteenth century.

"It seems almost impossible that only about 400 years ago there could have been such dreadful crimes committed and left unpunished as these were. The most horrible crimes were tolerated, provided the actors were only of noble blood,—and yet we can see something of the same condition of things to-day, not only in this country, but all over the world. Juries and judges are bribed, and money frees the greatest villains very often, even to-day; it seems to me indeed that truth has fallen in the streets. History tells us of a man who puts his own brother in prison and starved him to death; of an inhuman son who forced his old father to walk through the snow a long way, only to be imprisoned in a loathsome dungeon at his journey's end; and of a wretch who cruelly murdered 100 innocent children. Although this man was executed finally, yet he was shown some clemency on account of his noble blood."

"Well, Professor Carman, I very much prefer a noble character to all the noble blood in the world," said Julia March.

"Was King Charles always just as lazy and indolent as he was when Jeanne Darc had to coax him to go to Rheims to be crowned?" asked Jennie Jacobs.

"No; he seemed to become quite an energetic fellow along in middle life, and it was well for the country that he did. The year 1453 saw the entire country taken from the English, only Calais and a little bit of land around it. So at last the hundred years' war was over, and poor bleeding France might again breathe freely.

"But Charles now began to have trouble of a serious nature right in his own family. His oldest son, the Dauphin, Louis, tormented him in many ways, till at last the king became demented like his ill-fated father, Charles VI., and imagined that the dauphin was trying to poison him; so he refused to eat, and after a few days of suffering, died.

"Now," continued the professor, earnestly, "as examination day is approaching, I must speak a word of warning. I hope none of you are studying simply to pass. If this is your highest motive, it would be better to stop where you are. I trust your object is the more noble one of so improving the talents given you that you may be better fitted for usefulness."

Charlie White glanced a little uneasily at his friend Rob, who blushed deeply; and on the road home, if you and I had followed them, we would have heard him say:

"Look here, Charlie, I'm afraid I'm thinking more about that trip to Paris than any higher motive."

"That's so," replied Charlie. "Say, Rob, let's try to forget all about going, till after examination."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

The Millennium On Earth And In Heaven.

"WHERE do men get the idea of a millennium on earth, mama?"

"The only place where the word millenium is found in the Bible is the 20th chapter of Revelation, where it is translated 'a thousand years.'"

"Yes, I have read the chapter," said Charlie.

"Do you understand it?"

"No; not fully."

"Hand me the Bible, then, and find the place.—Who have a part in the first resurrection?"

"The blessed and holy," said Charlie.

"What is the resurrection of the blessed and holy, called?"

"The first resurrection."

"How long before the rest of the dead are raised?"

Charlie read, "The rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were finished."

"Then you see clearly that there is a millennium, or a thousand years, between the resurrection of the righteous and of the wicked?"

"Yes, mama."

"Now when does the resurrection of the blessed and the holy take place?"

"When Christ comes. I remember reading, 'The Lord himself shall descend . . . and the dead in Christ shall rise first.'" 1 Thess. 4:16.

"The next verse says, that those who are raised from the dead at that time will be caught up to meet the Lord in the air. Now if they are caught away to be with the Lord at the beginning of the thousand years, who will be left to have a millennium on earth?"

"The wicked dead, and Satan and his hosts."

"That is right. And how do you think they will enjoy the millennium?"

"Not very much, mama. It says an angel comes down from heaven and lays hold on Satan, and binds him for a thousand years in the bottomless pit. Does that mean the earth?"

"Yes, it is the same word that is translated 'deep' in the first chapter of Genesis, where the earth is described in a state of chaos. Darkness, desolation, and death will surround him who has deceived the nations of the dead. This is the kind of a millennium that will be on earth; but it is not the only millennium; for there is a millennium in heaven. How long do the saints reign with Christ?"

"And they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years."

"This is the reign that Satan hates. He who hated and defied the law of God, and sought to set up a rival government, to make his authority supreme on earth, will have the bitter privilege of pondering on the results of rebellion against omnipotent love."

"And mama, will it subdue him, and cause him to repent?"

"No Charlie. He repents his failure, and laments the results; but knows nothing but hatred against God and his law."

"Then why does God let him live on?"

"For our sakes, for the sake of the universe. We are to judge the world, to judge the fallen angels. When the death-sentence is finally executed, the whole universe will cry, 'True and righteous are thy judgments.'"

"At the end of the thousand years, the camp of the saints, the beloved city, the New Jerusalem, will be found on earth. Some day the glorious city, with walls of jasper, garnished with all manner of precious stones, will come glittering down from heaven. The chaos of earth will present one plain of order for the beautiful city. The saints of the most High will be within, the Lamb will be the light of it. Then the voice of the son of God will break the long silence of the grave and the hosts of the wicked will be raised that they may fully understand the malignity of evil, and the goodness of love. But this revelation, despised during probationary years, will not change their spirit after death and the resurrection, though it will compel them to acknowledge the love of God, and to assent to the vindication of the Most High.

"As soon as they are raised from the dead, Satan is loosed out of his prison for a little season. And now, Charlie, what does he do?" Rev. 20:7,8.

"And when the thousand years are expired Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations, which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: The number of whom is as the sand of the sea."

"Whatever does he think he can do with the nations, mama?"

"He thinks, or at least, he makes the nations think, that they can still war against God, that they can still make the earth a kingdom of hell, capture the city and the saints of God, overcome Him who once was crucified for the world's sin, and wrest from heaven the planet earth, so that never can God's will be done on earth. Now read the first part of the ninth verse."

"And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city."

"What a scene that will be, Charlie. Around that glorious city whose builder and maker is God, will stand the hosts of evil. The same contrast will be seen between them and the redeemed as will appear between the city and the desolated earth. Through the transparent walls of the New Jerusalem, the rebel armies will see the holy people, radiant in light and love. They will behold the king in his beauty. What a contrast will they present! Marked with evil, scarred with sin, sorrow, sickness and death, ruled by the tyrant king, the deception of hell will be masked, and the end of delusions be made manifest. Rage and horror will mingle in the acknowledgment of God's justice and love; but the fire of heaven will fall upon the refuse of the kingdoms. Please finish the verse."

"And fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them."

"This will be the last event of the millennium. Then the universe will ring with untold praise and joy; for God's kingdom will have come, his will be the law of all worlds, the will of every creature."

NEW YORK, JULY 14, 1898.

THE Editor is in attendance at the International Convention of the Christian Endeavorers, now in session at Nashville, Tenn., and we shall probably hear from there in our next issue. Don't miss it.

THE Canadian Parliament has excluded from Canada newspapers published in the United States on Sunday. By this the Parliament is enabled both to demonstrate its high morality and gratify the natural instinct of the flesh to speak disparagingly of one's neighbor.

THE battles now being fought in Cuba are the first in which civilized nations have used weapons of modern manufacture against each other. The result is terrible execution when the projectiles reach their mark; but the casualties do not seem to be greater on the whole than occurred in the battles of former wars.

THE army of the United States now in Cuba is probably the finest for its size that ever fought under the stars and stripes. Both physically and in point of morale and enthusiasm, the men are almost above criticism. And probably no American army ever surmounted such difficulties as have been overcome without a murmur of discontent by the soldiers at Santiago. And this suggests one of the worst things about war: its victims are not the worst men in the country, but the best.

SOME things that seem mysterious in the circumstances of the war are, that after having repeatedly cut the "last cable" between Cuba and other lands, Havana still remains in cable communication with Madrid; that the Spanish destroyer "Terror," after being sunk by the fleet in an effort to run into Santiago, is able to make an attack on the "St. Paul" at San Juan; and that the decrepit Spanish government is able to supply its soldiers in Cuba with smokeless powder, to their great advantage, while the soldiers of "Uncle Sam" can only be supplied by their great country nearby with ordinary powder, the use of which in battle makes them a conspicuous target for the enemy.

THE American "reconcentrados"—the wives and children of our great army of drunkards—are suffering and starving by thousands all over the national domain. For them no army appears with its devoted heroes ready to brave any danger and difficulty to effect their rescue. It seems to be the opinion of those who justify war in Cuba on the ground of humanity, that the cause of humanity is not represented in these hapless women and little ones at home.

THE "Centerist" or Roman Catholic party in the German Reichstag, have recently so gained in strength that they have demanded the repeal of the law banishing the Jesuits, and the re establishment of the Catholic department in the Ministry of Public Worship. Emperor William, however, is reported to have said that as long as he is King of Prussia there shall be no vote sanctioning the return of the Jesuits.

POLITICAL corruption is apt to be far more manifest in the government of a colony than in the administration of home affairs. The N. Y. Voice declares that the government of the territory of Alaska is almost as corrupt as is that of Spain in her colonies; and if this is true, the prospect for good government in territory so far distant as Hawaii or the Philippines cannot be said to be bright.

We are told disaster will befall the nation because of its disregard for Sunday; we are told that God's displeasure is upon those who desecrate it; we are told that God will not fight the battles of those who do not honor that holy (?) day; and yet, in spite of all this, it would seem that the very opposite is the case. Two whole fleets have been wiped out of existence, with not the loss of a ship and only the death of one man on the American side; and to-day the nation is rejoicing because of the favor which they say God is bestowing upon them in their war with Spain.

It will now no doubt be the order of the day for the churches throughout the land to erect their poles and have their flag-raising exercises. The initiatory, we believe, has been taken in this direction by the Trinity Baptist Church of Jersey City. On July 4, on a grass plot in front of the church, an American flag was hoisted to the top of a sixty foot pole, and unfurled to the breeze with much ado. Patriotic addresses were made by several ministers from other churches; the Declaration of Independence was read, and "America," "The Star Spangled Banner," and "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," were sung, and a gun salute was given by the Boys' Brigade.

Christ said to his church: "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Has the church received the power? Are they His witnesses? Christ said to the church: "Go ye into all the world, and PREACH THE GOSPEL to the whole creation."

Is the church preaching the gospel? Christ said of his church: "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Reader, is that true of the church to-day?

RITUALISTIC practices are found in fully half of the churches in England, according to the Tourists' Church Guide, published by the English Church Union. Out of 8,183 churches 4,334 use altar lights, 4,030 the mixed chalice, 2,026 vestments, while in 7,044 the eastward position is observed for the altar.

AN ounce of consecration is worth a pound of talent.

RELIGIOUS legislation puts law in the place of conscience.

NO STATE was ever known to be saved by a profession of religion.

HUMAN nature and heathenism have been in partnership since the fall.

NO MAN who appreciates liberty desires to withhold any degree of it from his neighbor.

THE peace which is needed in this world is not the kind that has to be imposed on people by force.

THE Sabbath, as God's memorial, can no more be lost or changed by the acts of men than can the rainbow.

JESUS CHRIST is the true rest-giver; but he commands no person to receive it; he only invites men to come to him.

THE country has plenty of men who are willing to die for it; what it needs is men who are willing to live for it.

THE world's peace is maintained by the rule of earthly powers; with the Christian, peace itself is the ruling power.

A LEGISLATURE can enact a Sabbath law with exactly the same propriety that it could set about the task of manufacturing rest for the people.

THE boy who tries to lift himself by the straps of his boots, is father to the man who thinks people can be made better by religious legislation.

THE Sabbath day is restful only to him who uses it religiously, as the Creator designed. It is God's rest, and therefore the rest cannot be other than religious.

Defining Sin.

A PRESS item announces that "By invitation of their General Assembly, the United Presbyterians are to vote in their presbyteries on the question whether the use of tobacco is a sin."

But how can the vote of the presbyteries settle the question, any more than a certain Presbyterian vote some years ago settled the question of infant damnation, or than the vote of the papal Ecumenical Council settled it that the pope is infallible? The principle of all such voting is papal and not protestant.

The Apostle Paul tells us that he discovered what was sin by means of the law. "I had not known sin, but by the law; for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet." Rom. 7:7.

And the Apostle John says also: "Sin is the transgression of the law." 1 John 3:4.

And that law demands that an individual love the Lord with all his heart, mind, and strength, and his neighbor as himself. Is this consistent with the love of tobacco?

We think not. The smoking and chewing of tobacco is an utterly useless indulgence, to say nothing of its harmful character, as established by medical testimony and the facts of observation; or of its filthiness, utterly inconsistent with sanctification of the flesh and spirit. And being utterly useless, the love of it, which all users of the weed acquire, is certainly altogether inconsistent with that love to God which demands that we devote all our energies and means to the service of God and our fellowmen. Every useless indulgence proclaims that the individual does not love God supremely, as the law requires.

Just what the law does require, in any case, must be brought to the consciousness of the individual by the Word of God, and the convicting power of the Spirit.

It is useless for any assembly of men to try to define sin. The law of God has settled every such question for all time. The principle of such a proceeding leads directly away from the law, and from its Author.

The Christian Endeavor Convention.

THIS convention—the seventeenth annual convention of the united societies of Christian Endeavor—was held in Nashville, Tenn., July 6-11.

In one respect the convention was a disappointment to the friends of the Endeavor movement,—the attendance fell far below the number that had been anticipated. Those in attendance were only about one third of the number that had been counted on by those in charge of the gathering. But the usual zeal and enthusiasm which has marked the Endeavor work hitherto, was manifested on this occasion, and the president and other leaders betrayed no doubts, if they felt any, that the convention was in every way a grand success.

Two large buildings on the grounds of the recent centennial exposition held in Nashville were utilized for the large general meetings of the convention, and at other times meetings were held in the various churches, which were plentifully scattered throughout the city. It is proclaimed as a cardinal feature of Christian Endeavor that the movement aims to teach loyalty to the church, and to closely identify itself with the regular church work in the respective denominations which it represents.

It would not take an observer long to discover what was the spirit of the convention. Fraternity was the uppermost thought in nearly every speech, and the verse of the familiar hymn beginning "Blest be the tie that binds" seemed liable to be called into use at almost any moment. There was fraternity between North and South, there was fraternity between white man and negro, and fraternity between American and Canadian, the latter being represented by a delegation from Toronto. In fact there was a very fraternal feeling for the people of all nations and countries, with one exception. That exception was a marked one; namely, the poor Spaniards who were in resistance to the arms of the United States. Whatever brotherly feeling for them might and doubtless would have been manifested under other circumstances, was on this occasion swallowed up in the tremendous enthusiasm felt and shown for the success of the national arms.

This indeed was the dead fly in the ointment of Christian love which seemed to be so prominent a feature of the gathering. In all justice to the rank and file of the Endeavor army, it must be said that one cannot long associate with them without receiving the impression that they are as sincere as they are earnest. They simply do not see that the spirit of Christianity and the spirit of nationalism do not harmonize with each other. The idea of working for Jesus in fulfillment of the great commission by him to his disciples, was made to blend completely with that of working to further the interests of the United States Government; and if there was in the minds of the speakers any conception of a difference between Christian warfare and the warfare of American soldiers before Santiago, there was nothing said or done to indicate the fact.

The report of the secretary, Mr. Baer, showed that there are Christian Endeavor societies in nearly every land, not excepting Spain. Indeed, it was mentioned in the report that Spain stood at the head of all countries in point of the proportionate increase of Junior societies; so that it is plainly to be inferred that the Endeavor movement has made considerable progress in that land. It was mentioned also that there are Endeavor societies among the troops now at the front fighting the battles of the nation in Cuba; and this statement led us to query whether there might not also be some societies among the troops on the Spanish side, and if so, what would become of the "tie that binds" when two societies should meet and stand opposed to each other in arms. It is strange that with such considerations plainly before them, Christian people should fail to see that "patriotism," which calls to the defense of the national flag, in Spain as well as in every other land, cannot harmonize with a work which embodies the divine principle of love to all men, without distinction of class or nation. We cannot say that we love those whom we are trying to kill.

An incident related by one speaker at the "Sabbath Observance" meeting, held in the First Presbyterian Church of Nashville, on Sunday, the 10th, illustrates how the spirit of "patriotism" tends to substitute itself even for religion in the unguarded mind. A teacher of a youthful Sunday-school class was questioning his pupils on the subject of the ten commandments. Coming to the fourth, he asked who could repeat it, and no one responding, he thought it might be well to prompt them a little, and so he began with "Remember," when with a look of sudden confidence one boy with upraised hand signified his readiness to answer.

"You may tell us," said the teacher.

"Remember the Maine!" was the prompt reply.

And one would have thought, from the prominence given at the convention to the glorification of the war spirit, or rather, of the spirit of nationalism which at that time was finding its fullest expression in the war, that "Remember the Maine" was accounted even there as having almost the moral obligation of a command of God.

There was no manifest move made on this occasion in the direction of influencing legislation for the promotion of religious ends, or of exercising the power of the society through political channels; though it is not to be supposed that the society has changed its attitude toward such projects from that shown at previous conventions. The ideas which have been put to the front by the war with Spain and the projected Anglo-Saxon alliance, overshadowed others which, had the situation been different, would no doubt have been given some prominence. It was evident that the society considers itself an important factor in the solution of problems of national and international importance. It will lend its power in this way to the Government, and—what would naturally follow, though perhaps not now contemplated—will receive in return the exercise of governmental power and authority for the promotion of its ends. The society takes to itself—rightfully perhaps—no small credit in bringing about the happy obliteration of sectional animosity between North and South, and it was affirmed by one speaker that had the society been in existence previous to 1861, the Civil War would never have occurred.

The prominence given to the idea of Anglo-Saxon fraternity was indicated by draping the speaker's desk in the auditorium with the English and American flags; and with the various military airs which were rendered, the convention did not forget "God Save the Queen." The statement was made by a prominent speaker that at the convention of 1900, which is to meet in London, Eng., there will be drawn up, signed and sealed, through the influence of Christian Endeavor, the long-talked-of international alliance between Great Britain and the United States. This was received by the audience with great applause.

And thus, by its blending of Christianity with nationalism,—with the aims and purposes of civil government, carried forward by carnal agencies, as is the present war with Spain; by its adoption, in short, of the idea of national Christianity—does the great Christian Endeavor movement lend itself—unconsciously it may be but none the less truly—to the general movement so widespread throughout the religious world, which aims at the establishment of an earthly, political, sensual, impossible, kingdom of God.

The convention of next year will be held in Detroit, Mich., and will no doubt be largely attended, not presenting the objection of a long journey to the South which seems to have been mainly responsible for the absence of so many expected delegates from the convention of 1898.

Another Piece of Ancient Republican History Which Is Also Modern.

THE example of the republic of Rome in becoming imperial in territory, is a point worthy of careful consideration just now in view of the career of imperialism in territory that is just now opening before the republic of the United States. This, because imperialism in territory was the open road through which the republic of Rome walked to every other sort of imperialism.

Foreign territory once acquired, must be governed, and the governors must be sent from Rome. The Senate was the governing power of the provinces, and had the appointing of the governors. And the governorship was the goal of wealth. A governor could go out from Rome poor, perhaps a bankrupt, hold his province for one, two, or three years, and return with millions.

"To obtain a province was the first ambition of a Roman noble. The road to it lay through the praetorship and the consulship; these offices, therefore, became the prizes of the State, and being in the gift of the people, they were sought after by means which demoralized alike the givers and the receivers. The elections were managed by clubs and coteries; and, except on occasions of national danger or political excitement, those who spent most freely were most certain of success.

"Under these conditions the chief powers in the commonwealth necessarily centered in the rich. There was no longer an aristocracy of birth, still less of virtue. . . . But the door of promotion was open to all who had the golden key. The great commoners bought their way into the magistracies. From the magistracies they passed into the Senate."—Froude. And from the Senate they passed to the governorship of a province.

To obtain the first office in the line of promotion to the governorship, men would exhaust every resource and plunge into what, otherwise, would have been hopeless indebtedness: yet having obtained the governorship, when they returned they were freely able to pay all their debts and still be millionaires.

The highest officers of the State were open, in theory to the meanest citizen: they were confined in fact to those who had the longest purses, or the most ready use of the tongue on popular platforms. Distinctions of birth had been exchanged for distinctions of wealth. The struggle between plebeians and patricians for equality of privilege was over, and a new division had been formed between the party of property, and a party who desired a change in the structure in society."—Froude.

Everybody can see how exactly this sketch of the political character of Rome in her republican days is paralleled already in the political character of the United States. And now this prospective imperialism in territory of the United States opens the door to be a further parallel and a further development of the imperial spirit, through provincial and colonial systems of governments.

Of course, republican Rome did not go the full length at a plunge. She began in genuine "republican simplicity." Indeed, "the governor was bound by law to administer his office with republican honesty and frugality." Accordingly, "Cato, when governor of Sardinia, appeared in the towns subject to him on foot and attended by a single servant who carried his coat and sacrificial ladle; and, when he returned from his Spanish governorship, he sold his war-horse beforehand, because he did not hold himself entitled to charge the State with the expenses of its transport."

But, "The new provincial system necessitated the appointment of governors, whose position was absolutely incompatible, not only with the welfare of the provinces, but with the Roman Constitution. As the Roman community in the provinces took the place of the former rulers of the land, so the governor appeared there in the position of a king." "But it is not practicable for any length of time to be at once republican and king. Playing the part of governors demoralized the Roman ruling class with fearful rapidity. Haughtiness and arrogance toward the provincials were so natural in the circumstances, as scarcely to form matter of reproach against the individual magistrate."—Mommsen.

Now read the following analysis by Harper's Weekly, of what will be the governing power in the colonial possessions, which by the present war, are being almost forced under the authority or the protectorate of the American republic:—

"There is no doubt as to the power of Congress to acquire territory. The power to declare war and the power to make treaties imply the power to acquire territory. There is no one who questions its existence. It has been declared over and over again by the Supreme Court. Neither is there any doubt as to the power of Congress to govern territory so acquired. This is expressly granted to Congress in the provision of the Constitution which authorizes the legislative branch of the Government to make needful rules and regulations respecting territories. As Justice Bradley said in 'The Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints vs. United States': 'It would be absurd to hold that the United States has power to acquire territory and no power to govern it when acquired.'

"Nothing, then, can prevent the annexation of territory that may be acquired in war with Spain or through a treaty of peace; whether a resolution of annexation would hold is another question, which, however, is not likely to be raised. And territory once acquired, it will be governed absolutely by Congress; the President and the regular judiciary having nothing to say in the matter after the organic law establishing the territorial government, if such a law be passed, is once in operation. If, however, Congress assumes full control as a local government, it will be free to do as it will—to pass one law for one territory and another for another, or to neglect all impartially; while as to the executive and judicial authorities of these territories, they will be such men as the politicians of Congress prefer."

Thus in this "imperial" career that opens before the republic of the United States, and which the multitude are insisting that she shall accept, the Congress of the United States will stand exactly in the attitude in which the Senate of the Roman republic stood. And with politics already in this republic, an exact parallel with that in the Roman republic, who can soberly and honestly doubt that the like results will follow here, that followed there, as certainly as this republic allows herself to be drawn into this course of imperialism which now is opened?

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

It has seemed the rule among our departments that one very soon called for another; and in giving these items of history I must adopt the method that is often employed by story tellers; breaking suddenly off in one scene to introduce another for the purpose of maintaining the real connection between incidents and revealing the true line of progression.

The scheme of departments as it has been perfected leaves them grouped under six general heads—Organization, Prevention, Education, Evangelistic, Social, and Legal. From the beginning the Evangelistic was in the lead of all our methods, as I have endeavored to show in articles already written, and it still remains as the heart and soul of every line of work. We all agree that no department can get on without an intimate relation with the truth as given in the Word of God, and it is generally recognized that the inspiration of every line of work must be from the source of all power, which is the Holy Spirit. In addition to this there is recognized the necessity of correct methods. Each department grew out of some urgent necessity, which arising in some little corner became recognized as universal, and as soon as discovered the question would be asked, "What shall we do about it?" and immediately that question would become as universal as the need, and the effort to answer it would engage the attention of the entire body. "What shall we do?" "How shall we go to work?" "How shall we meet this obstacle?" "How shall we carry forward this important truth?" were always live questions to every white ribboner.

Trained workers was one of the earliest necessities realized among us,—women skilled in dealing with souls, in giving practical help of all kinds such as would meet all sorts of needs. It was in the Evangelistic Department that this necessity first became urgent, and, I think, in '76 or '77 at the Temperance Convocation held at Lake Bluff, Ill., I made the first effort to organize a Training School, at which we discussed principles and methods, as well as needs, and how to bring about the very best application of the one to the other.

We began in the little hall which had been erected by the W. C. T. U. of Chicago for their meetings on the Assembly Grounds. The beginning was small and all the efforts were of an experimental nature. None of us had any really definite idea as to what we should teach, or how to teach it. We only knew it was necessary to learn from some source how to do our work; and with a profound sense of our dependence upon God, we came together for our first session. Among the number present and interested was Mrs. Jennie F. Willing, not at that time especially active in the W. C. T. U., because her time was fully occupied as wife of a city pastor, but she had been one of that company at Chautauqua who took the initial steps toward the organization of the National, and being interested in everything pertaining to W. C. T. U. work, she became one of the most faithful and earnest attendants and helpers in this first training school, and is at present in her widowhood superintendent of the last and best result of this growing idea, which is to be found in the Home and School for W. C. T. U. evangelists and missionaries located in "Hell's Half Acre," New York City.

The advantages to accrue from trained workers became at once so apparent, that the Training School was adopted and made a department of the National at the next convention, with the writer as superintendent. I could not, however, possibly accept this addition to my responsibilities, since I already had the superintendency of the Evangelistic Department, and my work as evangelist also. This was not an easy department to fill, but after a while Mary Allen West, of most blessed memory, a practical teacher, and for many years superintendent of public schools in Galesburg, Ill., was induced to take the work of organizing in this important line, and the "School of Methods" grew up under her forming hand into a power that was felt far and wide. She gave to this effort her most earnest service, and accomplished for the untaught and untrained in our ranks what can never be adequately appreciated. Her work was of the same character as that which is to be found in the silent forces of atmosphere, gravity, sunshine, cause and effect; things which are so necessary, so unconsciously appropriated, that sometimes we even forget to say thank you for them. Mary Allen West was a woman whom we could not afford to lose, but in the midst of her most arduous labors she died after a short illness in Japan.

The Evangelistic Institute was one of the developments of the new department, and was my own special field. In prosecuting the work of this institute, my plan was to occupy the early morning hour at conventions with an Institute drill, taking up each department, and teaching the gospel principles as related to it, and the methods required for its successful operation. Local unions would also call for an institute, sometimes two or three combining for a week's study. Sessions of two hours each would be held during the morning and afternoon, with a public lecture in the evening. The women were enrolled, and came to the work like pupils in school. We would study together everything that was involved in the departments grouped under the six different heads which I have already given. These institutes were always occasions of great spiritual growth and power. They were not confined to members of the Union. Ministers, teachers, members of churches, and all who were interested in philanthropic work would come and study methods with us. Many times beginning in a small room in some church, we would be obliged after two or three sessions to take our school into the Auditorium, and it not infrequently developed into a regular revival in which souls would be converted, and workers brought out into a rich experience, in both truths and methods, such as they had not known before, by which men and women were rescued from vice.

From "Gospel" to "Patriotism."

BY L. W. FELTER.

JESUS said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature;" but one might be led to believe at the present time, judging from the popular oratorical efforts called sermons, that the great commission had been revised to read as follows: "Go ye into all the world, and preach patriotism to every creature."

"God forbid," exclaimed the apostle, "that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ;" but the cross has been placed in the background, and the flag is the supreme object of adoration.

The truthfulness of the above was witnessed in Kansas City, Mo., Sunday, July 3, when the different ministers seemed to vie with each other in the effort to work their audiences up to the highest pitch of patriotic excitement. One said, "God has placed his choicest vine, the Anglo-Saxon race, in this most fruitful of all hills—America. The race is the foremost in the world, and if but combined can dictate and enforce universal peace in the present and future."

But peace which has to be enforced is not the peace of the gospel. That is the "peace of God which passeth all understanding," which is in the heart and life, and keeps everyone who possesses it at peace with all mankind. But the peace which has to be enforced is like a caged tiger, ready to tear and destroy the moment the restraint is removed. Surely ministers of the gospel should preach the peace of the cross and not of the sword.

Another statement was, "The other stones that he has removed are slavery, bigotry, and religious persecution—all gone, forever gone." That was a pretty bold statement to make in the face of the fact that within the last few years there have been something like one hundred and fifty cases of religious persecution under the shadow of the much-lauded emblem of liberty—the stars and stripes. Does this minister not know that as high as eight men at one time have been worked in the chain-gang as common criminals just because their religious ideas and practices happened to differ from those of their persecutors?

These apostles of patriotism do not agree concerning the course the nation should pursue. One says, "No nation ever had a more noble cause than that which led us to the Philippines, to Cuba, Porto Rico, and will soon lead us to Spain, where the thunder of our artillery shall strike terror into the hearts of the proud Spaniards, our shells shall silence her batteries and lay her cities in the dust," encouraging the spirit of conquest; but another chimes in with, "A righteous purpose should not be endangered by patriotic ambition. America should not make territorial conquest. To do so is to bring upon us sin's reproach. I make no objection to reimbursing ourselves for actual outlay but to make conquest for one penny additional is to belittle ourselves before God and men."

And thus it goes, confusion upon confusion, and that too at the very time of all times when the ministers should stand as faithful watchmen on the walls of Zion, sounding the invitation to the marriage supper of the Lamb. "Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments."

A "Declaration of Dependence."

THE "National Christian Citizenship League" has published a "Declaration of Dependence," for which it would like to have the indorsement of all American citizens, or at least of a sufficient majority to give it national recognition. It was written by President M. Woolsey Stryker, of Hamilton College. It reads as follows:—

"God alone is the author of being and the head of nations. His service alone is liberty. Law has its authority and its sanctions in him. Freedom, security, truth, concord, peace, are his gifts. Obedience to him comprehends and guarantees all personal and all public blessings.

"Therefore we, the citizens of the United States of America, do pronounce this Declaration of Dependence upon his gracious care and government.

"We acknowledge his revelation of human duty and hopes, declared in the Son of man as the Redeemer of all souls and of all peoples, and we affirm that the gospel of God has been and shall increasingly be the light of the world.

"We avow our singular history to have been an exhibition of his merciful providence, and we hold our land, our government, our resources, to be a holy trust for the blessing of all mankind. The peoples of the earth are the wards of God's love, and their enlightenment and responsibility to God alone must be the goal and true glory of nations.

"We implore this Supreme Ruler to vindicate Himself anew in overruling the forces of unrest and hate, and in hastening the abolition of war with its attendant cruelties and burdens.

"We declare that the law of Christ is the only solvent of false conditions, and that its application to all relations affords the only security against social disaster and international catastrophe. Whatever is unmindful of God's one Fatherhood, and man's one brotherhood thereunder, is the foe of order, of justice, and of the freedoms so hardly won.

"We confess our personal and national sins against this Blessed and only Potentate. We deplore our unmindfulness of his promises and his patience. We entreat his pardons and his gracious recovery of our alienation and his merciful succor that we may yet abide his whole decree.

"We humbly supplicate his grace that our rulers and magistrates may become such as fear him, and that in all our communities a new spirit of righteousness may live and abound. And therefore we do pledge ourselves to seek those ways which exalt a nation, and to resist the selfish and corrupt forces which lie against the Creator and frustrate the common good.

"That 'his will may be done on earth' we will unite our hearts, our thoughts and our hands; and to this Declaration and testimony we offer our lives, our fortunes and our honor. So help us God!"

This "Declaration of Dependence" says, in principle, exactly the opposite of what is said in the Declaration of Independence. This will be evident upon examination.

The Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are created equal, and are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, to preserve which governments are instituted among men; and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

But this Christian citizenship document asserts that citizens of the United States must be Christians. "We, the citizens of the United States, do pronounce this Declaration," etc. It denies to all others the right to be citizens of this nation. And thus denying to them participation in the affairs of the government, it denies that all men have those rights which are affirmed in the Declaration of Independence. Only "Christians" participating in the government, and applying the "law of Christ" in governmental procedure, the "consent of the governed" would become the consent of "Christians" only; and all others might be governed without their consent and forced to conform to "Christian" laws of the government, or they could emigrate to some distant and more hospitable land.

The government founded upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence gives equal rights to all persons, without distinction of race or sect. By those principles it has grown great, and by them its greatness, if not lost, will be maintained.

It is strange that many people do not see—or profess not to see—that what would be proper and fitting for an individual, or for a church, in respect of an acknowledgment of dependence upon God, would be an utterly improper policy for a civil government. The government represents force, coercion, and cannot combine with religion without bringing coercion to bear upon some at least in religious matters. And this is directly contrary to Christianity.

CHRISTIANITY still shuns the road to popularity.

What Is the Everlasting Gospel?—No. 5.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

In following these articles, and noting especially what has been said with reference to the Sabbath, it may still be possible that some one will contend that we are attaching too much importance to this question—that we are making one's loyalty to the whole gospel hinge upon the keeping of the Sabbath. With regard to this last point we confess that it is logical and accept the conclusion.

But the reader will please bear in mind that we are not alone in this. The logic of this whole question was seen long ago by National Reformers and their allies.

Leaving out for the moment the question of which day is the Sabbath, we could not put the matter more definitely and clearly than they have done it. To show this we will recall a few utterances that have already been quoted in these articles, and which were made by National Reformers. Speaking of Sunday, Dr. Everts says: "It is the test of all religion." Again he says, "The people who do not keep the Sabbath have no religion." These statements are strong, but the climax is reached when it is said, "He who does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God; and he who does not worship God is lost."

Keeping these quotations in mind we will now read from the Scriptures as to how sinners are saved. The apostle says, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." Rom. 1:16. The gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation, because the gospel of Christ is Christ himself, for he is the power of God. 1 Cor. 1:24. What this salvation is, we are told in Matt. 1:21: "And thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." It is not necessary to multiply scriptures on this point, but we will quote one more to show what the result will be to the sinner who rejects the gospel: "And to you who are troubled rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." 2 Thess. 1:7-9.

From these scriptures it will be seen that he who rejects the gospel is lost. Now place by the side of this the words of Dr. Everts, "He who does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God; and he who does not worship God is lost." No one will fail to see the argument of Dr. Everts. If his proposition is true, then it is true that he who does not keep the Sabbath is lost. But those only are lost, as we have seen from the scriptures, who reject the gospel. That being so, it is as clear as day, according to Dr. Everts, that he who does not keep the Sabbath rejects the gospel. It is therefore the truth that those who are laboring so earnestly to have Sunday enforced by civil enactment hinge one's loyalty to the gospel upon the keeping of that day, supposing it to be the Sabbath. And it is because of this that they call Sunday a mark or sign.

The logic of the whole situation therefore is this: no matter on which side of the question one stands—whether he believes the seventh day or the first day to be the Sabbath—he is bound to the conclusion that one's attitude to the Sabbath determines his attitude to the gospel. From this there is no escape.

But the seventh day and the first day cannot both be the Sabbath any more than the mark of the beast can be the mark of God. And as one's attitude to the gospel is determined by his attitude to the Sabbath it is impossible that too much importance can be attached to the question. And that being so, it is of the highest importance that we know which day is the Sabbath. And further, it is of the highest importance that we know the relation that the Sabbath sustains to the gospel.

The Wisdom of Solomon.

"Present Truth" (London, Eng.)

SOLOMON wrote, "He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not unto him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears." Bishop Thomas W. Dudley, of whom the following story is told, had evidently learned some lessons at the same school that Solomon did:—

"When it was first known in the city in which he was settled that he was to go to Kentucky, some of his friends were disposed to be critical.

"You are not going to Kentucky, are you?" asked one.

"Yes, indeed."

"Do you know what kind of a State that is? I saw in the paper that one man killed another in a Kentucky town for treading on a dog."

The bishop said nothing, and the man continued, impatiently, "What are you going to do in a place like that?"

"I am not going to tread on the dog!" was the calm reply.

The quarrelsome man is the one who is always in difficulty. A man of peace can live peaceably even among ill-disposed people. No man ever has any use for weapons, except the man who always carries them.

THE poor shooting in the war is not all on the side of Spain. The Government struck at Spain in Cuba, and the first shot hit Manila, on the other side of the Pacific.

THE lesson of the war as regards the most efficient type of naval architecture, is that the prowess of torpedo boats and "destroyers" has been greatly overrated. A heavy battery of rapid-fire guns, and the use of smokeless powder, are demonstrated to be essential to success.

WE are told in the Scriptures of divine truth that "God hath made man upright, but they have sought out many inventions." "Invention" is from a Latin word meaning to come upon, to discover. Men have made many discoveries, and by these things they have been led away from their uprightness.

* * *

THE only discoveries the Creator intended man to make, are those to be met with in the field of divine truth. But when man fell, he turned away from this field into a realm where he was led on by the imaginations of his own heart. As a result he has ever since been making discoveries—so called—which would better never have been made. There is a saying attributed to "Josh Billings,"—"It's better not to know so many things, than to know so many things that ain't so." The observation is a very apt one for this time. In the midst of all the "things" that one reads, and hears, and imagines, to day, it requires a superhuman power of discernment to avoid acquiring a large amount of that "wisdom" which is foolishness with God.

* * *

MAN started out on his career of separation from God and uprightness by making a "discovery" that "wasn't so." He had been commanded, in the Garden of Eden, not to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. But after listening to a persuasive speech by the serpent, Eve "saw" that the fruit of the tree was to be desired to make one wise. This is what the devil had told her, and this is what she "saw." That was a discovery, and she communicated it to Adam; and the only wisdom they got out of it, along with all their misery and the ruin of the race, was that God meant exactly what he said, which was a thing they ought to have known at the first.

TO-DAY the world is full of the "discoveries" that have come down to us from past times, and those that have been and are continually being added to the number in our own day. In very many things men have discovered, as Eve did, that it is "wisdom" to disobey God. They have discovered, among other things, that they can't get along well in life if they are to be strict in observing the divine requirements. They have discovered that they can't well keep God's commandments when the majority of people are doing otherwise. They have discovered that they can't do right when some man who is their employer doesn't want them to, and hence must have a law passed to coerce the employer and help them to obey the dictates of conscience.

* * *

THEY think that with the help of the law they can stand upright, when the truth is that doing "right" by law is not obeying conscience at all. Conscience never says anything about any law but the law of God. And conscience never hints that you need any help to do right but the help that comes from God. An individual who obeys the dictates of conscience, steps out in the path of duty simply because it is right. God gives him, and every one, the opportunity to do right from the simple, sublime motive of love for the right; but with the pathway of right all hedged about by the law with its pains and penalties, as some men would have it, it would never be known whether men would be true to the dictates of conscience or not.

THE Creator made man upright; and he would have him upright to-day. That means that he does not have to lean on something to stand erect. It means that he is not to crouch down into a servile attitude for fear of losing the favor of his fellowman, or for fear of his displeasure and the temporal loss which the ill will of men may occasion. It means that he is not to wait to see how somebody else thinks before daring to think for himself. It means that he is without fear—that the love of truth and of right has cast out all fear—save the "fear of the Lord," which is an abhorrence of evil. Uprightness is the birthright blessing of inestimable value which the foolish and profane sell for a mess of pottage. It is the blessing which is restored to man by the gospel. It is the blessed condition of the upright One dwelling in the heart by faith—"Christ in you, the hope of glory." To be upright, is better than to be president or king.

REFERRING to the political attitude taken up by the Council of Churches, the Australian Christian World says: "The day has come when the Christian church must be the ruling power in the State." "The Council of Churches is working toward this end, and we wish it success."

But Jesus has said, "My kingdom is not of this world." "Be subject to [not rulers of] the powers that be."

To see the world ruled in righteousness by the Lord Jesus Christ is a consummation devoutly to be desired, but to see it ruled by any set of men who may assume to themselves the right to govern as his viceroyents and to interpret his law, is another matter altogether.

The former is to be brought about by the coming again of the Lord in the clouds of heaven. The latter, with its attendant dangers is all that can be expected from religio-political agitation.

Let no one be misled into hoping to see the kingdom of heaven advanced by political schemes.

The gospel, and not the ballot box, is the power of God unto salvation.—Bible Echo.

Religious Conditions in the Philippine Islands.

A STUDY of the religious conditions prevailing in the Philippine islands, is of particular interest at the present time in view of the prospective absorption of the islands and people by the United States. From what is said on the subject by individuals who can speak from personal observation and experience, it appears that changes of a most radical nature will be necessary to bring about conditions there, in harmony with free government and separation of church and state.

In the Literary Digest for June 25 some quotations are given upon this subject from the Rev. F. De P. Castells, a missionary now in Guatemala, and Professor Worcester, of the University of Michigan. The former claims to be the only Protestant who ever tried to preach in the Philippines. As may be conjectured, he had a trying experience. He was thrown into prison, and in various ways persecuted till he was compelled to leave. He asserts that the Catholic clergy derive from the islands a yearly revenue of nearly $24,000,000 in gold. This is one thing that Spanish rule in the Philippines means to the Catholic church, and throws light upon the intense desire of the head of that church for peace between Spain and the United States before the islands should be wrested from Spanish control. Of the power of the Friars in the Philippines he says:—

"The Spaniards wonder at times that the priests should have gained so much influence over the natives. How has this come about? It was simply through the king lending them his authority and military power, and allowing, what we find even now in Spain, a servile subordination of the civil to the spiritual power. The maxim underlying all their 'mission work' was this: All the king's subjects shall be Catholics. And no territory was considered altogether conquered until its inhabitants had been baptized. When once the friars had obtained control of the islands, they were careful not to let their power be lessened. Orders came, indeed, from the Spanish government for the establishing of schools and the teaching of Spanish to the natives, but these laws were disobeyed. It was proposed that the Mohammedan populations of the South should be subjugated, but the friars invariably hindered this by turning the expeditions into a sort of religious crusade. In spite of all the precautions taken, however, some of the natives have learned to read Spanish, and have imbibed Western ideas. It is this class which started the revolution—and their attitude to the church of Rome is shown by the fact that, whenever they capture convents, the inmates are ruthlessly butchered."

"The great power in every native village is the padre or village friar. Friars belonging to orders not allowed to hold parishes in any other part of the world, have no difficulty in securing them here. Recruited as they are from the lower classes in Spain, their ignorance is, in many cases, almost beyond belief. Once settled over an out-of-the-way parish the friar becomes a demigod. He is regarded with reverential awe by the native members of his flock, who kiss his hands whenever he appears in public, and obey implicitly his every order, while Spaniards living near him learn to know and fear his power, and, as a rule, act upon his suggestions. In spite of their vows of poverty and chastity, two or three of these orders of friars constitute the wealthiest, as well as the most shameless, class in the islands."

"Nominally, the highest power in the Philippines is the governor-general. Actually the controlling power is vested in the clergy, and woe betide the official, be he civil, military, or religious, who attempts to interfere with Philippine monastic life as it exists. One of two results has invariably followed any vigorous attempt to correct the crying evils which I have enumerated. The too ambitious official has found that money would procure the recall even of a governor-general, or he has met a sudden and mysterious death."

Under such conditions as are here set forth, the task of establishing a government in the Philippines which will be consistent with American principles of liberty and separation of church and state, must be one from which any nation might well shrink. These are internal difficulties which must be met in addition to the complications sure to arise from the jealousy of European powers in case the United States decides to make the islands a part of American territory.

The "First Fruits of Imperialism."

Now that Hawaii has become a part of United States territory, it is beginning to be realized that the acquisition is accompanied by some complicated and curious—not to say undesirable—results, growing out of the relation of such territory and its people to the Government, as determined by the decision of the judicial authority of the nation. It appears, in fact, that the present government of Hawaii, and that which must continue for an indefinite period of the future, under the authority of the United States, constitutes the most perfect type of absolute monarchy to be found anywhere in the civilized world. This is a rather startling thing to contemplate from the standpoint of the Declaration of Independence, of the Constitution, and of the national traditions handed down from the days of Washington and Jefferson; yet probably but few people in the land will be startled at it to-day. Some are, however, including the editor of the Baltimore Sun, who states some interesting facts concerning the situation in a late issue of that journal. As these are worthy of consideration by every American interested in the national welfare, we reproduce them here, as follows:—

"Now that Congress has declared the Hawaiian Islands to be 'a part of the territory of the United States and subject to the sovereign dominion thereof' the exact legal effect of that declaration becomes a matter of interest. As was pointed out, repeatedly, during the discussion of the annexation resolutions in the Senate, there is no precedent in our history for the proceedings taken in the case of Hawaii. Previous acquisitions of foreign territory by purchase, cession, and by annexation there have undoubtedly been. The only case of the annexation of an independent foreign State is that of Texas. Louisiana, Florida, California, Alaska, were all acquired as so many square miles of territory; acquired by purchase or cession from the previous owners. Texas, like Hawaii, was a sovereign and independent State, having an organized government and a separate national existence, which was extinguished by the fact of annexation and absorption into the American Union. Louisiana, Florida, California and Alaska had no such separate national existence, but were ceded by France, Spain, Mexico, and Russia, precisely as one individual might cede or deed a farm to another. Texas came into the Union as a sovereign State, and was admitted to all the privileges of statehood at once.

"The precedent of Texas, however, has not been followed in the case of Hawaii, nor was there any proposition made to Congress looking to the admission of the republic of Hawaii into the Union of States. On the contrary, it was freely admitted by some of the most earnest advocates of annexation, that Hawaii, although an independent nation, recognized by ourselves and by foreign powers as such, is not fit to become a member of this Union.

"The immediate effect, therefore, of annexation is that Hawaii ceases to be a State altogether. She is no longer an independent state, neither is she nor can she become without further action on the part of Congress one of the United States, a State of this Union. She is simply like Alaska, a dependency, a territorial possession, 'subject,' as declared in the annexation resolutions, 'to the sovereign dominion' of the United States, and to the operation of that clause of Article 4 of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress to dispose of and to make rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States. Moreover, this power of Congress, which is unrestricted by any further provisions in the Constitution, has been held to be an absolute, and, it may be said, a despotic power. Without reference to other and earlier decisions of the Federal courts upon this point, there is a recent decision of the United States Court of Appeals, sitting in the city of San Francisco, respecting the extent and nature of the legislative authority of Congress over the territory of Alaska, which strikingly illustrates this principle.

"The question which arose upon an appeal from the district judge in Alaska, was as to the power of Congress to subject the liquor traffic in that territory to executive regulation and restriction. Various objections were urged upon constitutional grounds to the act of Congress and to the executive orders issued under it, but are all disposed of in the following sweeping sentences of the opinion of the Court of Appeals:—

"The answer to these and the other like objections urged in the brief of counsel for defendant, is found in the now well-established doctrine that the territories of the United States are entirely subject to the legislative authority of Congress. They are not organized under the Constitution, nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are the creation, exclusively, of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control. The United States having rightfully acquired the territory, and being the only government which can impose laws upon them, have the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, federal and State.'

"Under this full and comprehensive authority,' the opinion goes on to state, 'Congress may legislate in accordance with the needs of each locality and vary its regulations to meet the circumstances of the people, . . . in a territory, all the functions of government are within the legislative jurisdiction of Congress, and may be exercised through a local government, or directly, by such legislation as we have now under consideration.'

"In accordance with this view of the unfettered and 'sovereign dominion' of Congress the annexation resolutions provide temporarily for the government of the Hawaiian Islands. 'Until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands all the civil, judicial, and military powers of the existing government in said islands shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, and the President shall have power to remove said officers and fill vacancies so occasioned.' In all but name Mr. McKinley is constituted by Congress King of Hawaii, with greater powers than Queen Liliuokalani or King Kamehameha ever possessed. The President may vest all the executive powers of government and all 'civil, military, and judicial powers,' in one person or in several. He may make anybody he pleases Pooh Bah of the islands, captain-general, governor, lord high chancellor, chief justice, and everything else. The commissioners, whom, by the resolutions, the President is authorized to appoint, and has already appointed, are not clothed with any powers except those of suggestion and recommendation. 'They shall as soon as reasonably practicable recommend to Congress such legislation concerning the Hawaiian Islands as they shall deem necessary and proper.'

"Meanwhile, and until Congress shall otherwise determine, the municipal legislation of Hawaii, not inconsistent with the joint resolutions, nor contrary to the Constitution of the United States, and not enacted for the fulfillment of any of the treaties of the Hawaiian republic with foreign nations which the joint resolutions profess to abrogate and annul, is continued in force. The present Hawaiian legislature, of course, disappears. While there is no express declaration to that effect in the resolutions, it necessarily follows from the fact that all legislative authority over the islands in matters great or small, is by the act of annexation and absorption vested exclusively in Congress.

"It is clear that no legislative powers are given to the five commissioners, but only the power to recommend legislation to Congress.

"It would be an extreme construction of the power conferred upon the President to designate 'the person or persons' in whom the civil, judicial, and military powers exercised by the officers of the existing government shall be vested, to say that the President may appoint a legislature, as well as a court and a governor, and may unite all these functions in one 'person.' Still, as the United States Court of Appeals say in the Alaska case, acquired territory, such as Hawaii, is not subject to the Constitution, 'nor to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law.' Executive orders may take the place of legislative acts. The provisional government of Hawaii as arranged for by a republican congress, appears to be the most perfect type of an absolute monarchy on the face of the earth. Hawaii has no constitutional status. It is the mere creation and offspring of legislative caprice, turned over, provisionally, to executive discretion to nurse, absolutely without legal restrictions or constitutional guides or safeguards of any kind or description. Is this the first fruit of imperialism?"

Studies in French History.—30.

"THE historian does not certainly give Charles the Seventh a very good name," began the teacher, "and yet he must have had some sense of his own shortcomings, because he named his oldest son, who he knew would follow him as king, after the good Saint Louis, who lived so many years before, hoping that he would follow his example. Can any one remember who Saint Louis was, and in what century he lived?"

"Well, I'm glad to see your hand raised, Jack; how did you happen to remember? I rather expected to see Edna's hand."

"Why, professor! you didn't think I could always remember everything, did you? 'cause if you did, you are quite wrong. I only wish I could," said Edna, blushing.

"O no, Edna; but you generally do pretty well. Now, Jack, you may tell me. Who was Saint Louis? and where did he live?"

"I wouldn't have known, teacher; only I just happened to be looking over my note book this morning, and I had made a note of it weeks ago, when we passed that point. My book says that he was the ninth of the Capetian kings and reigned in France about the middle of the thirteenth century; am I right, professor?"

"Quite right. I am glad to see you still interested in these studies. I am quite sure they will be profitable for you all.

"Louis the Eleventh, although named after so kind-hearted and conscientious a man, was not in the least affected for the better by this circumstance. He began his reign in 1461, reigning until 1483. The only religion he ever had was a base superstition. He used to have a habit of carrying many little metal images of saints around in his cap. Then when he wanted divine help he would quickly take from his cap the particular image of the saint who, as he imagined, would be more likely to hear his prayer than the others, and placing it hastily before him, he would pray fervently for success in his undertaking."

"I don't see much difference between that way of doing and the heathen's way," said Julia March.

"Really there is but little difference, though I suppose King Louis would have felt highly indignant had any one said as much to him. He was the first European monarch, so says Miss Kirkland's history of France, to whom the title 'your majesty' was applied."

Milly Brown always had a great desire to know how every famous character looked. So this at once aroused her curiosity, and she asked:—

"Was it because King Louis was a magnificent and majestic looking man? I suppose he was, for I cannot imagine a king looking any other way."

"But you know they often do, Milly, and Louis the Eleventh was less kingly in feature and form—yes, in manner also—than almost any of his predecessors. His face wore a look of low cunning, his manners were ungentle, and his dress hardly decent."

"I don't see what good it was to be a king at all, at that rate," said Milly, whose mental picture of kings and queens was one confused mass of gold and silver and scarlet and royal purple, covering majestic personages with flowing robes and massive crowns.

"I wouldn't care so very much what he wore," chimed in practical Jack Smith, "if he would only treat the people well and respect their rights."

"The trouble is, Jack, he did not. He acted much as if no other human being had any rights but himself. He was equally as intolerant toward the rich nobles as toward the poor,—all were serfs from his point of view, and he continually devoted himself to the task of compelling others to agree with him."

"I suppose the rich people objected to his tyranny," said Will Palmeter.

"Indeed they did. They were not as accustomed to being treated like dogs as were their poorer neighbors, and they protested most vigorously. The society called 'The League for the Public Good' was formed by them; but pure selfishness was at the bottom of it, and the king knew it as well as they did, so of course it did not prosper.

"To give you a little idea of this king's cruel and unforgiving nature, I will tell you of an instance to the point. There was a poor man whom Louis had raised to great prominence, for, on account of his good judgment and keen foresight, I suppose he thought he would be useful to him. This man's name was Balue. At the king's request, the pope made him a cardinal. At length Louis found out that this man's friendship was false, and he did the cruel deed of putting him in a little iron cage and keeping him there for years."

"Horrible!" exclaimed Julia March. "Did he never let him out? How did he get anything to eat?"

"He did not let him out for many years,—the king's heart knew no mercy. As for eating, that little item did not trouble Louis much, he had only to arrange with the keeper of the horrible little cage to shove in enough victuals through the iron grates to keep the wretched soul and body together. The iron door was never allowed to be opened."

"O what a horrible punishment! I should think he would have grown to look like the wild beasts, as King Nebuchadnezzar did," said Harry Ray.

"That is exactly what he did do," answered Professor Carman, for his nails grew like claws and his hair like eagles' feathers."

"Did King Louis ever see him in this awful condition," asked Maggie Palmeter, shuddering.

"O yes; he used to go on purpose to see him, to gloat his eyes on the awful sight. In our next study we will learn something about a great quarrel which Louis the Eleventh had with the Duke of Burgundy, Charles the Bold."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

"Thy Kingdom Come, Thy Will be Done on Earth."

"But what about the verse that says 'God's glory shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea'?" asked Charlie. "I'm thinking of the millennium," said Charlie, as Mrs. Ross looked up inquiringly.

"But that verse will be fulfilled after the millennium."

"How, mama? The last we studied about was the fire coming down from heaven and devouring Satan and his hosts. I want to ask you a lot of questions about that too."

"Let me answer your first question first. The fire that falls on the evil hosts will also consume from the earth itself, the curse that has caused it to wither and decay. Peter says, 'The elements shall melt with fervent heat.' Isaiah says, 'It is the day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion. And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch.'"

"Where will the city be during the terrible fire?"

"I believe it will be in the midst of the fire. The prophet asks, 'Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?' The answer is, 'He that walketh uprightly; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil.' The prophet tells what such people will see. He says, 'Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty; they shall behold the land of far distances. . . . thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down.'"

"Everlasting burnings? Will the city always remain in the midst of fire? Is the earth to be hell? I keep getting mixed up in my ideas, mama."

"No; the burnings will cease when all that will burn is consumed. Malachi says, 'Ye shall go forth, and tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under your feet.' When speaking of the burning of the earth, Peter says, 'Nevertheless we according to his promise look for new (or more properly, renewed) heavens and a new (or renewed) earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.' John saw just how it would appear in its renewed state, and says, 'I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away, and there was no more sea.' Isaiah says, 'The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose.'"

"How beautiful!" exclaimed Charlie. Will it really be the earth, the solid old earth?"

"It will be a solid earth then, my boy; but not an old earth. It will be the earth as it was when it first came from God's hand in its primeval glory."

"How long will we live in the earth then?"

"Always, Charlie. The earth was given to the children of men."

"Well, I always thought the earth was all right if the people in it were only well, beautiful, and good."

"They will be there. 'The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick, the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity.' As for the beautiful, John says, 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but when He shall appear, we shall be like him,' and you know he is 'altogether lovely.' And 'God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes;' and 'the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.'"

"There will be no oppression in the new earth, mama."

"No indeed. God's glory, and his glory is love, will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."

"They won't need any prisons. No one will be looking for heretics. Those who dwell there will have no check put on thought and love. They will follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, and there will be no Calvary in the path."

"Do you suppose we will live as we do here, mama?"

"Isaiah says we 'shall build houses and inhabit them, plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them.'"

"Why, mama, eternal life never looked more delightful to me. Will we do just as we please?"

"Yes, because we shall delight in the law of God."

"Will we keep the Sabbath there, mama?"

"Yes indeed. God's memorial is from generation to generation. The memorial of his creative power will stand forever. Isa. 66:22, 23, says, 'For as the new heavens and the new earth which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and name remain. And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord."

"Then the time will come when all on earth will keep the Sabbath."

"Yes, Charlie."

"What will the Sunday keepers think about it mama? for many will be saved who here always kept Sunday."

"Yes, through ignorance, believing it to be the Sabbath of the Lord. Oh, how glad they will be to go up before God on his blessed holy day. They will call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable."

"What glorious worship we shall be able to give to God then! How the beautiful city will ring with our praises! How good it will be to be there, when the glory of the Lord covers the earth as the waters cover the sea," said Charlie.

"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," said Mrs. Ross, reverently.

F. B.

Wait a Little.

GIVE the child a chance. Suppose he has not done exactly right. Perhaps he sees his error, and is sorry for it, but has not come to the point of expressing his repentance. Wait a little. Do not nip the tender bud of regret by the harsh breath of blame. Think how patient God is with you. Think how all the laws of his great household are made with a view to his children's development, their growth in all spiritual perfections.

"But," says the father, "the child's got to obey, and that's the long and short of it."

"Is that the way men talk about their corn and their potatoes, their wheat and their grass crops? No, indeed! Soils, methods, fertilizers, are studied anxiously, carefully; but alas, in what haphazard fashion is the precious human product cultivated.

Make the child happy when it is possible. See what plans God has made for his children's happiness. In the sunshine of joy the little human heart develops naturally, harmoniously. In grief, and anger, and sullenness, he is repressed, chilled, thwarted, distorted.

A child should be allowed to have "his own way" whenever that way is innocent. The child's natural, innocent ways are the Maker's ways. Do we not thwart God when we thwart the impulses that he has put into little children? If we would become children with them, we might enter into their heaven. Becoming one with them in love, our knowledge and experience would be available for their safe and tender guidance.—Selected.

THE rights of the smallest child are as big as those of the largest man.

NOTICE the advertisement of the Cyclone Washer on page 451. Most of the readers of the SENTINEL are familiar with the name of the machine, as it has been advertised in this paper for a long time. The Cyclone is a good strong machine and will be found a great help in doing the family washing. It will pay to invest in one.

OUR SPLENDID OFFER.

EVERYBODY can now see exactly what we are offering when we speak of our

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

(See pages 448-9.)

This Bible is bound in Tampico Morocco, Divinity Circuit, Leather Lined to Edge, Round Corners, Red under Gold Edges, Silk Headband, Silk Marker. It has large, clear type (see specimen, page 449), sixty-four illustrations, fifteen splendid Clear Maps, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of proper names and foreign words with their meaning, etc.

But the most unique and important feature of this Bible is the "COMBINATION." This consists in the blending of both old and new versions in one volume without increasing the size. As to the merits of the Bible we offer, it is enough to say that a few of which we print. For brevity's sake, we omit the name and address of writers, but their letters are all on file in our office.

We have received numerous unsolicited words of praise,

WHAT OUR PATRONS SAY OF IT.

I received the Bible in good condition. I am very well pleased with it in every way. It is a first class Bible; just the kind I have wanted.

The Bible is a beauty. Everything that could be wished.

The Bible came safely, and is highly appreciated by the friends for whom I bought it.

My Bible received. I am very much pleased with it.

I have received my Bible, and to say I am well pleased would not convey my appreciation. I think it the best bargain ever offered. It is just what I have long wanted.

I have used my Bible nearly three months, have compared it with other higher priced Bibles, and can truthfully say that all that you claim for it is true, and do heartily recommend it to all who need a good Bible.

It is the best Bible I ever saw for the price.

I received your premium Bible, and we were surprised to get such a good grade of book. Many of my friends have examined it and pronounce it excellent.

I wish to thank you at once for the beautiful Bible which I received yesterday. It is far better than I expected.

I am very much pleased with it and like it better than any Bible I have ever had.

We are all more than pleased with the Bible. The type is a great delight.

I am delighted with the Bible. Don't know how you sell it so cheap.

The Bible is far beyond my expectation. It is a real beauty and I am more than pleased with it.

I am greatly pleased with the book, it being better than I expected to get.

I received the Bible all right and am more than pleased with it. It is better than I expected. The print is very nice.

The Bible is just lovely. It is lots better than I thought it would be.

I have been using the Teachers' Combination Bible nearly two years. Am more pleased with it daily. The Revised Version feature is "just the thing," and if I were going to purchase a Bible tomorrow you may depend upon it, I would purchase the Teachers' Combination Bible.

Your kind favor accompanied by the Premium Bible was received a long time ago, and after having examined the Bible carefully, I must say that it is, with a minor exception, the finest thing I ever saw for the money. It is just the thing I have been looking after for years. I never could understand why it was necessary to have two Bibles to do the work of one. But in this you have both versions at a glance. I say it is worth twice what you ask for it.

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

 For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

The BIBLE alone is worth more than the price of it and the SENTINEL together.

How to Read THE "COMBINATION" BIBLE.

The King James Version is the basis, and this version is read straight along from the text, while the Revised Version is read from the text in combination with the foot-notes. These notes give all words and passages of the Revised Version where it differs from the King James Version. To show where these differences occur we make use of two reference letters:

RV just before a word or passage shows how the same word or passage is rendered in the Revised Version as seen in the corresponding foot-note.

RO before a word or passage in the text indicates that the words inclosed in parentheses in the foot-notes are omitted in the Revised Version.

The numbers of the verses in the foot-notes correspond to the numbers of the verses in which these changes occur. In every instance where the King James Version is changed, the change in the text, whether an addition or omission, is shown at the bottom of the page.

The different foot-notes are separated by dashes, which indicate a returning to the text, which is to be read until a new RV or RO indicates another change which will be found in the foot-notes.

Whenever any doubt arises as to where to continue in the text, connecting words (catch words) are used in the foot-notes, so that a foot-note often ends with one or two words common to both versions, which words accordingly are also found above in the text. By this arrangement the reading is made very simple and easy.

THE READING EXEMPLIFIED.

On this circular we print page 1129 of our Combination Bible, and the following paragraphs show how it is to be read. It is printed from an electro-type plate of this Bible, and shows the large clear type, size of page, etc.

The first RV in St. Luke appears in the first verse, before "set forth." In the King James Version the reading is, "set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us," By referring to verse 1 in the foot-notes, it will be seen that the Revised Version reads, "draw up a narrative concerning those matters which have been fulfilled among us,"

In the third verse the King James reads, "had perfect understanding of all things from the very first," By reference to the foot of page, it will be seen that the Revised Version reads, "traced the course of all things accurately from the first."

In the fourth verse there is an RV before the word "of." The King James Version reads, "of those things, wherein thou hast been instructed." By reference to figure 4 at foot of page it will be seen that the Revised Version reads, "concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed."

In the fifth verse there is an RO which denotes an omission. Refer to the foot-notes, and (the) will be found in parenthesis. Every omission is placed in a parenthesis in the foot-notes, and the Revised Version in this instance reads, "Herod, king of Judea," the word "the" not appearing before "king," as it does in the Old Version.

Thus it is seen that the Revised Version is easily read in connection with the King James Version. The system is so simple and so easily understood that no reader finds any difficulty in comparing the two versions.

We also publish a large type Self-Pronouncing edition containing the King James Version only.

This Bible can be furnished in three styles, but all in the same good binding, as follows: With complete teachers' helps,

BOOK : OF : GENESIS.

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 13—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall, and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David, is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

A Necessary Article

In the family is the Washing Machine, and like the Sewing Machine, it has come to be universally known as a wonderful labor saver. Once you use it you will never go back to the old way.

There are cheap washing machines on the market that do not give satisfaction and are dear at any price.

THE CYCLONE WASHER

does its work perfectly, does it with little exertion on the part of the operator, and it does it without wear or tear on the clothes thus saving its cost in a short time.

The following testimonials from those who are using the Cyclone Washer speak for themselves.

Battle Creek, Mich.

From the trial given the Cyclone Washer, I do not hesitate to say that it does its work in a most satisfactory way, and with the least labor and fatigue on the part of the operator, of any washing machine with which I am acquainted; and I would most heartily recommend it to any one who desires to lessen the labor and expedite the work incident to the family washing.

MRS. M. E. KELLOGG.

Union Mills, Ind.

GENTLEMEN: Having witnessed the operation of your Cyclone Washer on the family washing, I feel qualified to give it my hearty endorsement. To prepare for the line in one hour and twenty minutes, without rubbing or without manual effort, a washing which ordinarily required five hours of perspiring, backaching work, certainly entitles it to your claim of being a time-saving, labor-saving, and clothes-saving machine. I can heartily recommend it.

REV. S. E. SMITH.

Bellevue, Mich.

I am well pleased with the Cyclone Washer I bought of you, and the more I use it, the better I like it. It is beyond comparison.

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

(SECOND EDITION.)

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, if not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, JULY 21, 1898.

OUR first-page illustration designed for this week has been delayed, but will appear in the next issue.

THE President, by recent proclamation, directed that the nation's thanks to God should be mingled with their rejoicings in view of the great successes achieved by the national arms against the Spanish. In the nature of things this amounted to a request upon the church, to which of course they were willing enough to respond. It being a poor rule that will not work both ways, we may look for the churches to be making requests of the President one of these days.

ONE of the many pleasant things to be observed at the meetings of the late Christian Endeavor convention in Nashville, Tenn., was the abolition of the "color line" which is supposed to exist in every section of the South. Negroes and white people sat in the same seats, and no discrimination against the former was visible in any way. Two prominent speakers at the convention were negroes, and the finest music to which the audiences listened was furnished by the Fisk Jubilee singers, all colored. Jesus Christ died for all; hence there is no color line in Christianity and in Christian endeavor. And to deny to one of dark color equality with those of lighter hue in point of natural right, does not tend to the uplifting of the former in the scale of moral and social worth.

THE report of the committee of Congress appointed to investigate the character of the transaction by which the Methodist Book Concern at Nashville, Tenn., and its hired lobbyist, received $288,000 of the people's money, severely scores the agents of the Book Concern and the attorney who was given 35 per cent. of the collected claim. It absolves the M. E. Church, South, from blame.

The agents and the attorney claim that it was none of the business of Congress as to what use was made of the money after Congress had paid it over to the Methodist institution; and in this they are clearly right. The suit was for damages, and as such was no more subject, properly, to a restriction upon the use to which it might be put than would be any claim for damages paid in any other suit. If the claim was just at all, the money was the absolute property of the claimant, and Congress could have no more right to say what should be done with it than it would have to dictate in such a matter to any private citizen. The fact that the committee of Congress did assume the right to dictate upon this point shows that they recognized that the claimants had not a clear right to the money paid them.

The party most deserving of censure in this affair is the party by whose vote this church claim upon the people's money was recognized as valid and the principle of separation between church and state violated. That deception was practiced upon Congress in such a matter was only a natural incident in connection with a transaction thoroughly bad and thoroughly unamerican in principle.

ANOTHER Sunday-law decision is at hand, and it comes from the Supreme Court of the United States. The case is that of a New York City barber, Henry Havnor, who in 1895 refused to obey the barber Sunday law of this city, which prohibits barber work on Sundays after one o'clock P. M. The case was appealed to the State Supreme Court, then to the Court of Appeals, and now comes the decision of the Federal Supreme Court affirming the opinion given in these lower courts. Mr. Havnor's counsel contended that he was deprived of the equal protection of the laws by being forced to close his shop on Sundays, and that such interference in his business was an unwarrantable exercise of the police power. Upon these points therefore a contrary verdict has been given by the highest court.

THE report comes from "Camp Alger," one of the military camps of the volunteer army of the United States, of a proceeding under military authority which would disgrace any nation laying claim to civilization. It is quite proper, of course, to maintain camp discipline, even by rigid regulations; but in this case a private named Cooper, belonging to the 159th Indiana volunteers, was punished for being absent without leave, by being made to sit astride a sharp-edged "saw-horse," with hands and feet tied, for four hours underneath a burning sun, and subjected the while to the jeers and taunts of his companions. His sentence, which was by court-martial, called for eight hours of this torture; but upon being taken down at the end of four hours the victim was unable to stand, and was carried to his tent, where for several days he remained in a critical condition, the account stating that he would probably "pull through."

SUCH a mode of punishment is one that rivals the tortures of the Inquisition. It was once practiced in the British army, but was long since abolished as a relic of mediævalism unfitted to survive among the customs of an enlightened age.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted" upon any persons subject to the laws of this Government. But the tendency of militarism is to override all other power and authority. In its very nature it is essentially arbitrary and despotic.

And this is done in the army by whose agency the Government is conducting a "holy war." Verily the incident savors of the "holy wars" of former times. Let us talk less loudly about the cruelties of Spanish rule which the Government is waging war to displace with our own high civilization. And as for a "holy war," it need only be said that such a war can be conducted only by a holy agency; a holy war cannot be waged with carnal weapons, or by other than holy men.

AMERICAN SENTINEL

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, JULY 28, 1898.

NUMBER 29.

"THE wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God."

HUMAN nature has always believed in a political gospel.

THE devil is the inventor of the much-tried plan of driving people to do right.

HEAVEN is free to all, but you cannot get into the other place without paying for it.

THE "higher" the criticism of God's Word, the lower is the source from which it emanates.

POLICY is the sand upon which stand the houses that will be overthrown by the coming storm.

IF by God's perfect law the world is condemned, how then by man's crude law can it be saved?

WHEN men turn their backs on the Bible, they naturally think that the Bible is behind the times.

IN every transgression of the divine law, we bid an eternal farewell to all that we hold most dear.

THE lightest sin is heavy enough to sink the soul; the smallest is big enough to contain Calvary.

THE devil never pastes his true likeness upon the bill boards or gives his photograph to the public.

THE pathway of righteousness is too narrow and rough to be used by the "political machine." The broad way is the path for it.

THE armory of the Christian supplies no weapons for killing men.

THE power of God unto salvation cannot reach the soul through

A MISTAKEN CONCEPTION OF GOSPEL WORK.

The artist has depicted it in the effort of the clergyman to drive people out of the broad path of worldliness and carnality into the narrow way of righteousness, by bringing upon them the penalty of civil law. The attempt only drives them against a perpendicular wall which no human power can enable them to scale. No human power can place an individual in the pathway of obedience to God; all laws enacted for such a purpose are utterly futile. The individual must be lifted up from the broad and downward way into the high, narrow and upward way by the power of faith. Civil law is effective only in the field of natural rights.

TO DENY self until self is dead is the hardest battle a human being can fight, and the victor attains the loftiest heights of heroism.

God and Religious Freedom.

THE leading organ of "free thought" in this section, The Truth Seeker, notes with a tone of some surprise the answer in a late SENTINEL to one of its pet conundrums, "Why don't God kill the devil?" It says the question has not been answered, and in proof of this submits several questions, and hints at others equally unanswerable in reserve. We notice those bearing directly on the point at issue:—

"Why could not God kill the devil and save the sinners?"

"If God is able to deliver all persons from the devil, why does he not do it?"

"If there is no need to destroy the devil, then he must be powerless; and if he is powerless, what are the Christians afraid of?"

"If God can successfully contend with the devil, why do the vast majority of the race sin and go to hell—that is, if Christian theology be true?"

These questions can be answered because God believes in religious freedom. If he did not they could not be answered.

God could force all things to come to his terms; but he did not force his creatures in the past, and does not force them now, because he does not believe in a forced service.

God might have forced Lucifer to have remained obedient in his station in heaven. But what would have been the worth of such obedience? and what would Lucifer have been without a character?

Lucifer sinned and became the devil; and he led countless multitudes to rebel with him. But better was it that all this should be, than that God's creatures should have been deprived of their free will, to prevent their sinning. And what a testimony is this to the value of individual freedom in the sight of God!

Because all have this individual freedom, many—even the great majority—choose to go contrary to the will of God. They choose not to submit themselves to him. This is the only reason why he cannot save them.

God will—and does—deliver all persons from the devil who choose to be delivered. But it is in the power of every person not to let God deliver him. The Scripture says, "Submit yourselves therefore unto God; resist the devil and he will flee from you."

The devil is powerless with regard to any individual who chooses to let God keep him from the devil. The individual who chooses otherwise finds the devil very powerful indeed. The individual who chooses the devil's pathway instead of the Lord's, cannot reasonably expect that God will preserve him from harm. The individual who sins, chooses sin and its consequences; and God cannot, without being arbitrary, interfere with his choice.

The vast majority of the race sin and doom themselves to destruction because they choose to walk in that way rather than in the way of life. This constitutes no evidence that God cannot successfully contend with the devil. It proves only that God is not arbitrary in his dealings with them.

God allows the devil to live and work with all his power to destroy souls, and at the same time he saves from all the power of the devil and from the power of the world and the power of sin, every individual who comes to him through the avenue of salvation he has opened. And thus he gives to the universe a mightier testimony of his power to save than could be given were he to remove the devil by destroying him. That indeed would be a virtual confession that God could not save people while the devil lived. But that confession would be a stupendous lie.

Seemingly it is the mind of the Truth Seeker and of the class for whom it speaks, that God—admitting his existence—should have made man an automaton, having no will of his own, or without power to use it, and hence without character, capable only of acting by the choice of another's mind, and hence without any necessity of possessing any mind of his own. In that way God could have made it impossible for man to have disobeyed him. Then there would have been no sin, and what a delightful world we would have had, to be sure!

The Great Need.

THE great need of the cause of God to-day is not money; neither is it talent. The great need is of something the Lord himself cannot furnish, but which men can furnish. It is consecration.

God could rain gold down from heaven, as he once did manna. But that would not help the situation. There is as much gold in the world already as is needed, and any more would only be superfluous.

There is also talent enough; there is any amount of talent going to waste in channels that supply nothing for the real betterment of the race. Why should the Lord increase the supply of this? A wise father does not lavish money upon his son when he is squandering it.

When there is consecration enough, there will be money enough, and there will be talent enough. A call for means is really a call for consecration; and a lack of eloquence and power for the proclamation of the word, or of ability in any line of spiritual work, is also a lack of consecration.

Consecrated talent will grow, always. Growth is a law of heaven; and from the humblest beginning, where the grace of God has free course, there may be evolved the most surprising results. God made the most talented men that have ever lived by starting with nothing; he can then make talented men now out of those that are little more than nothing.

If you would see the cause advanced, "consecrate yourselves this day to the Lord." You furnish the consecration; then God will furnish the rest.

What Now?

HAWAII has been annexed to the United States, and is now United States territory. Thus a colonial career has been opened in fact, and no doubt will be extended to the Philippines, the Ladrones, Porto Rico, and Cuba. Next a colonial policy will have to be discovered and put into operation. And of what sort shall it be?

We have pointed out how the Roman republic passed over this course, and what resulted. We have seen that Rome started with precisely the same professions as those with which the United States has now started upon its new career.

And we have seen how, from whatever cause it may have been, the Roman republic with its high pretensions of love of liberty for others became the greatest, the most absolute, and most destructive, despotism that ever was on the earth. What will this second great republic now do, upon precisely the same professions, as she proceeds upon a course like that first great republic? These are live and interesting questions just now.

What will be done with Hawaii? How will she now be governed? What will be the basis of representation?

Will Hawaii be made a State, entitled to two senators upon an equality with the State of New York or Pennsylvania? And if so, will that State government and organization be a continuation of what has been in the so-called republic of Hawaii? For everybody knows that the "republic of Hawaii" never was in any true or proper sense a republic. It never was a government of the people by the people: it was a government of the people by a clique. It is well known that those who seized the kingdom of Hawaii and set themselves up there to rule, never dared to submit to the people of Hawaii the question as to what government they would have. This clique knew that they were so hopelessly in the minority, that to submit any question truly to the people would only overwhelmingly defeat themselves. Therefore they admitted to the franchise, only such as they themselves approved, and, being already in power, confirmed themselves in power by a "popular vote"!

That is the government of Hawaii, as it was when it became United States territory. Will that style of government, that sort of a republic, be perpetuated now that Hawaii is a part of the United States? It was contrary to every principle of the Declaration of Independence of the United States. Will it now, under that Declaration, be continued as it was? It was a despotism: will it be continued so? If so, then the pose is already set for spreading a like despotism over all the other island possessions. And if so, then a revolution has already been accomplished: and the United States will no longer be truly a government of the people by the people for the people; but a government of the people by a self-seeking few of the superior sort for this same self-seeking few of the superior sort. And it will be for these to decide who are, and who are not, "capable of self-government;" and of course all who are not, must be governed by this superior set.

Some words of Abraham Lincoln are worthy to be reprinted in this connection:—

"These arguments that are made, that the inferior race are to be treated with as much allowance as they are capable of enjoying; that as much is to be done for them as their condition will allow—what are these arguments?—They are the arguments that kings have made for enslaving the people in all ages of the world. You will find that all the arguments in favor of kingcraft were of this class; they also bestrode the necks of the people, not that they wanted to do it, but because the people were better off for being ridden."

Now, I ask in all soberness if all these things, if indulged in, if ratified, if confirmed and endorsed, if taught to our children, and repeated to them, do not tend to rub out the sentiment of liberty in the country, and to transform this government into a government of some other form?

Are we on the verge of the time when, are we crossing the line where, government of the people, by the people, for the people shall have perished entirely from the earth?

This is a time for most careful thinking.

A. T. J.

MUCH is being made in the secular press these days of the "heroism" of Roman Catholic priests, chaplains, etc., in occasions of emergency such as those furnished by the destruction of the "Maine" or the sinking of "La Burgogne." In connection with the latter a pen picture is drawn of a Catholic chaplain giving "absolution" to a company of the passengers on the deck of the fast-sinking ship. Bravery and devotion are high qualities, and we do not question what is said of Catholic chaplains in this respect; but there are times when the most religious duty, the highest heroism, takes the form of quick, energetic action for the saving of human life, and such a time was that when the "Burgogne" was settling, with its human freight, into the watery abyss. The energy to work is God-given as well as the faith to pray.

Which Power Shall We Employ?

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

Not all earth's legislative halls
 Can e'er regenerate one soul:
 Nor can the best religious laws
 Enact a statute to control
 The passions vile of fallen man:
 'Tis but God's power alone that can.

Learn well the lesson Jesus taught,
 That only He has power to draw
 The wandering ones, in sin's net caught,
 Unto Himself, no human law
 Can make the evil-doer good,
 Nought can avail but Jesus' blood.

How vain we strive this end to gain
 By seeking legislation's aid:
 We from such methods should abstain
 Since force hath ne'er true converts made.
 With cords of love, the Spirit's sword,
 Draw erring ones to Christ our Lord.

Read history's pages through and through;
 Doth it not cause thee constant pain
 To know the gibbet, stake, and screw,
 Were used religion to sustain?
 Thus covering Christ's holy name
 With baneful ignominy, shame.

Ah yes, religion's virgin dress
 Has e'er been stained by martyr's blood:
 Shall we continue to oppress
 Those of a different faith, and mood?
 Or shall we learn in Jesus' school,
 To practice well the Golden Rule?

Thus loving Jesus, thou shalt love
 Thy neighbor as thyself, alone
 Shalt thou use power from above
 Fallacious doctrines to dethrone.
 No force could'st thou through life employ,
 That would thy brother's rights destroy.

All men are equal, why should thou
 Then seek another to enchain?
 Dost thou claim freedom? then allow
 The same to others; ne'er sustain
 An act that would their rights curtail,
 Or their blest privileges assail.

Do unto others, true refrain,
 As thou would'st have them do to thee:
 Follow this rule through life's campaign
 If thou on earth true joy would'st see.
 Only as we make others glad,
 Can we reap joy we ne'er have had.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

THE last chapter was a connecting link between the preceding one and this, in which I wish to resume the story of our work for mothers, and through them for the children. We early became convinced that the work for mothers must be fundamental to every line of effective Christian endeavor, and I may seem to be giving more time and space in these articles to this line than any other; but as I believe the methods adopted to be the very best in securing practical results for father, mother, child, church, and society, I may be pardoned for dwelling upon them.

Another bit of incident will illustrate the methods and the practical result. I conducted an institute at the New York State Convention in '79 I think, giving a large share of the time to preventive methods and mother's circles.

When the National Convention was in New York in '80 or '81, a White Ribboner came to me saying that she had attended that institute, and had gone to her home in a New Jersey suburb of New York City to put the methods to the proof, with results of so gratifying a nature that she wished to show them to me. Accordingly I gladly accepted her invitation to visit her immediately after adjournment. I found her and her husband working together in the most unselfish manner to alleviate human suffering and ignorance. She had begun to apply what she had learned by calling to her help all whom she could interest in the principle of organizing everything that was good against everything that was bad. The city had been districted, and the workers had begun visiting, going into every home; into some for the purpose of getting help; in the others for the purpose of taking help.

The first aim was to reach the mothers of the neglected class. The plan was to organize a weekly mother's circle to meet in their own cottages. Three ladies were required for the work of the mothers' circle. All agreed between themselves beforehand as to what each should do in the work of the afternoon. The entire afternoon was required. The women brought their darning and patching. The three ladies upon whom the responsibility rested distributed the service among themselves in this fashion: one read aloud while the others plied the needle, from something carefully selected from the literature that had been produced by the W. C. T. U. for the purpose of meeting this very need; short, concise, scientific papers, easily comprehended by those who had any special interest in the subject. The ladies would decide beforehand what points should be emphasized in the conversation which accompanied the reading. One would act as a questioner, that she might lead the timid women, who, themselves unable to lead out even in questioning, would eagerly listen, and soon learn to formulate crude, and often pathetic inquiries for themselves, which would lead naturally on to the "whole gospel for the whole man."

The women were encouraged to bring their children, as many could not otherwise come. The third lady would take these children into another room, or, if there was not one to spare, would go with them wherever it seemed most suitable, to spend the time with them. A little kindergarten was the natural outcome of this part of the method. Once a month the meeting would be continued into the evening, the mothers of the circle and the W. C. T. U. women taking their tea together. Sometimes a general invitation was given to the men and women of the neighborhood, and the tea would be followed by a gospel meeting.

My hostess said to me the next day after my arrival: "I would like to have you remain in your room this afternoon, if you will; or at least, do not come into the drawing-room until I come for you."

I said: "Are you preparing a surprise for me?"

She said, "If it is to be a surprise, and I answered you, I am afraid I should spoil it."

"Do not speak for the world," I said. "I will remain in my room until you come for me, so as not to spoil anything."

A Lesson from Two Speeches.

How natural it is for false principles to skulk under the cant of formal piety! The traitor angel who was "The first

That practiced falsehood under saintly show,"

was by no means the last. From Eden down the worst evils that have afflicted the human race have appeared in a garb of deception, and to-day the mild appearance of the lamb is belied by the harsh tones of the dragon.

The new foreign policy of this country, which its supporters do not hesitate to call "the policy of imperialism," is properly receiving at this time considerable attention. It is to two speeches on this subject, delivered on June 21, that we wish to call attention. One was made by a man high in the councils of the party now in power, and who is known to be the spokesman for the administration. The other was by a man who has twice held the office of president at the head of the other great political party.

The first speech was an enthusiastic announcement and indorsement of the new policy as shown in the following sentence which was received with great favor: "I doubt very much whether you and I will live to see the day when by the order of a republican administration, and surely not by the order of McKinley's administration, the starry banner of your country's glory shall be pulled down from any flagstaff where conquest of arms has placed it." In striking contrast with the avowed object of the war, but not with the sentiment of this speech, is the obscurity that is thrown upon the nature of the future government of these islands that are being "set free for humanity's sake." Speaking first of Hawaii, the speaker said: "It will be the policy of the administration to plant the flag of the United States at Hawaii, to occupy it and fortify it and make it a part of the territory of the United States, and when the war is over we will then settle the question of what sort of a government we will have over there. . . . Let us wait. It is not important to settle the status of the Philippine Islands now. It is not important to settle the character of the government, the stable government, which we promise to Cuba." In connection with that note the following expressions: "The diplomacy of a great Christian nation could not rescue us from war when it was decided both upon moral and material grounds to drive the Spanish flag off the Western hemisphere." Where the flag is placed "we will take, hold, fortify, and eternally, with the blessing of God, defend." And, this will all be done "patriotically, wisely, and from the standpoint of American progress and in the career that God has marked for us in the world."

This speech is only an incident showing how religious sentiment is being connected with this new policy. The popular religious press and pulpit of the country is almost a unit in favor of "expansion." It is to warn against this kind of piety, whether proclaimed by orators or preachers, that is our purpose here.

The other speech was well headed by the newspapers, "A Note of Warning." Calmly and dispassionately it portrayed "the folly of a departure from national purposes and the crime of unnecessary and unjustifiable war." Here are some of the statements: "Never before in our history have we been beset with temptations so dangerous as those which now whisper in our ears alluring words of conquest and expansion, and point out to us fields bright with the glory of war. . . . Our government was formed for the express purpose of creating a new world, a new nation, the foundation of which should be man's self-government, whose safety and prosperity should be secured by its absolute freedom from old world complications, and in its renunciation of all schemes of foreign conquest. . . . If, then, the suggestion is made that the time has come for our nation to abandon its old landmarks and to follow the light of monarchical hazards, and that we should attempt to employ the simple machinery of our popular and domestic government to serve the schemes of imperialism, your challenge of the proposition is entirely in order. . . . Such perversions bring in their train a people's demoralization and a decay of popular contentment more surely destructive to the republic than armies with banners. . . . The people whose victories are those of peace and whose immunity from armed conflict is found in their freedom from the foreign relationships that give birth to war, will not improve the quality of their national character by a cheapening of their estimate of the value of peace, or by dwelling upon war and warlike preparations."

. . . Notwithstanding the bright dress and gay trappings which war puts on, in the light of true American citizenship it is a hateful thing, which we should shun and avoid as antagonistic to the objects of our national existence. If you believe this you should stand bravely for your belief, even though a shower of stupid catcalls may fill the air. . . . If you are tempted pleasantly to drift with the current of thoughtless popular sentiment, look carefully to see if the stream runs in a safe direction."

Altogether this second speech was the soundest and wisest utterance from a political standpoint that had been delivered on the subject up to that time, and there will be no question as to which of the two is more in accord with those words of Scripture, "Seek peace, and pursue it," and "As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." But nowhere does the speaker claim that he is urging that which has been the purpose of "a great Christian nation," nor does he claim that "the blessing of God" will attend an adherence to original principles, or that such adherence is "the career that God has marked for us in the world." He simply refers to "the rules and motives that have thus far governed our national life;" that experience has shown them to be correct, and that therefore they should not be abandoned. As if to make the contrast more striking these speeches were reported side by side in a prominent newspaper, and at the very point in the column where one declared that the new policy was "the career that God has marked for us in the world," the other, just across the column rule, declared that "the rules and motives that have thus far governed" our national life forbid such dangerous perversions."

We wish to impress the fact that truth, justice, and uprightness need no cant. It is infinitely better to declare what is just and upright and attribute it to no higher source than the "rules and motives that have thus far governed," than it is to mingle with false principles the most reverent and pious expressions. God has long ago proclaimed that it is an amending of the ways, an execution of judgment between a man and his neighbor, a withholding of the hand from oppression and blood, and not a trust in profitless and lying words that secures his blessing. Justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne, and wherever they are found, even if unaccompanied by formal declarations, he is there just so certainly as he is not with that piety that would serve as a cover for the baldness of injustice, pride, ambition, and conquest.

Such piety is indeed a drawing nigh with the lips, but in this instance the heart is evidently far away in Puerto Rico, Cuba, Hawaii, and the Philippines. This is the kind of piety that, mistaking words for godliness, would "acknowledge" God in the Constitution by excluding therefrom his principles of justice and liberty which are the guarantees of the dearest rights that he has conferred upon man. This is the kind of piety that is so anxious to obtain a formal "Sabbath" observance that it im-prisons upright and God-fearing men. It is the kind of piety that indeed sayeth, "Lord, Lord," but which is unknown in heaven, and which will finally hear the words, "Depart from me; I never knew you."

When Mr. Burke was remonstrating with the ministers of George III. against the folly and inconsistency of their course in taxing the American colonies, he exclaimed: "Do you mean to tax America, and to draw a productive revenue from thence? If you do, speak out: name, fix, ascertain, this revenue; settle its quantity, define its objects; provide for its collection; and then fight, when you have something to fight for. If you murder, rob; If you kill, take possession; and do not appear in the character of madmen as well as assassins." In like manner it may be said to those preachers and orators who to-day stimulate and attempt to sanctify the ambition for conquest: Do you mean to take and control foreign possessions, and to draw an increased power and revenue from thence? If so, take them, subdue them, and receive all the benefits that they give. Do you mean to pursue the policy of imperialism and aggrandizement in the face of all just principles? If so, pursue it; but do not appear in the character of Christians and benefactors as well as conquerors and dictators. Do not assume the garb of piety and philanthropy when reaching for the scepter of conquest and imperialism. Do not talk of holding and fortifying distant islands "with the blessing of God," or say that that is "the career God has marked for us in the world."

And where has God marked this? No one knows, and no one ever can know, for God has marked for us no such thing. He has indeed pointed out for us in prophecy that this would come to pass. But certain preachers and politicians are attending with the utmost expedition to the marking.

In this thing is another parallel to Roman history. In the days when republican Rome was expanding her territory "public men spoke conventionally of Providence, that they might throw on their opponents the odium of impiety. . . . The whole spiritual atmosphere was saturated with cant—cant moral, cant political, cant religious; an affectation of high principle which had ceased to touch the conduct, and flowed on in an increasing volume of insincere and unreal speech."

Those who were told that they would never live to see the day when "the starry banner of their country's glory shall be pulled down from any flagstaff where conquest of arms has placed it," will not need to live long in order to see that very thing done, and, in common with the majority of their countrymen, to rue the day,

"When pride and worse ambition threw them down."

"When his [Nebuchadnezzar's] heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him." Dan. 5:20. That text means to-day that when the hearts of the American people are lifted up, and their minds hardened in pride, then will they be deposed from their republican government, and their glory shall be taken from them.

What Is the Everlasting Gospel?—No. 6.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

As THE question of the relation of the Sabbath to the gospel of Jesus Christ is considered, it is hoped that those who have followed us thus far in these articles will remember that not only has it been shown that Sunday is the mark of the papacy—which is the power symbolized by the beast of Rev. 13:1,—but also, that the power symbolized by the two-horned beast of Rev. 13:11, which is to enforce this mark upon the consciences of the people, is the United States.

It must be remembered too that the burden of the gospel message of Rev. 14:6, 7, calling upon all to “fear God and give glory to him,” etc., and which is really a call to keep the commandments of God, is with direct reference to the mark of the beast—no matter for the moment what such mark might denote—which is thus to be enforced.

Remembering all this, it will be seen that the time will come when the power of this nation will be arrayed against the gospel of Jesus Christ. In addition to the proofs that have already been adduced that this country is the one symbolized by the two-horned beast, it will be our duty to show that public opinion is being so molded that it is now being seen(?) that the interests of this nation are identical with the mission of the gospel to the extent that anything said antagonistic to what will be regarded as the gospel will be regarded as antagonistic to this Government, and the subversion of the one be regarded as the subversion of the other. Indeed some evidence has already been set forth in these articles that this is so, but we purpose presenting more in subsequent articles.

For the present we wish to deal with the question of the Sabbath in its relation to the gospel, and thus further show that it is impossible that Sunday can be anything else than antagonistic to the gospel.

In our last article it was shown that those who are laboring so earnestly to have Sunday enforced by civil law, frankly confess that one's whole attitude to the gospel is determined by their attitude to the Sabbath (Sunday) thus setting forth that the Sabbath is the supreme test.

We do not for a moment think that such a conclusion has been reached in a haphazard way or that they are in any sense arbitrary; on the contrary we believe they are perfectly logical.

At first it was recognized by only the few who started this Sunday-enforced-by-law movement; but as others have been drawn into it they too have seen it, so that now multitudes seeing the logic of the thing accept it. And it is only a question of time when all will see it.

That being so, we do not for one moment wish to dodge the issue; we firmly believe as much as they, that the Sabbath is the test of one's loyalty to the gospel. The only question with us is, which day is the Sabbath which is thus a test? But whichever day it is, we are uncompromisingly opposed to its being enforced by law. That phase of the question will also be considered later on.

Some there are who profess to believe it does not matter which day is the Sabbath. To reason thus is puerile in the extreme, and is simply a begging of the question. But taking that position, they cannot possibly help being on the wrong side of the question.

There is a difference; and those who say there is none contradict themselves.

The writer is personally acquainted with an estimable gentleman—a Christian doubtless—who has repeatedly contended that there is no difference, and yet has just as strongly contended that no matter what one believes Sunday should be enforced by law. And further: while he freely acknowledges that there is not a particle of evidence for Sunday observance, and that the only Bible Sabbath is the seventh day, yet he believes there is a difference in that he observes the Sunday preferably to the seventh day, and as stated above, would have all men compelled to keep that day. Who cannot see that all such contradict themselves?

Now as the Sabbath is being set forth as the test or mark of one's loyalty to God and to the gospel, and as it is proposed to enforce Sunday as the Sabbath, it must be clear to all who will think, that upon the stand they take with reference to this matter they stake their all—upon it they stake their eternal destiny.

So much being involved in this question it becomes a matter of the highest importance that the Sabbath be studied earnestly and prayerfully.

Is Sunday the Sabbath? Then it ought to be kept. Whether there is a civil law for its observance or not will not have a feather's weight with the one who loves the Lord. But the consequences being so great, there should be the clearest evidence that it is God's will that Sunday should be kept.

It is not enough however to know that the day has been observed, and taught to others, by learned men. Even the greatest and best of them have been mistaken in some points of doctrine, and it is at least possible that they may be mistaken in this matter. No one will claim that error taught by even these thereby becomes the truth.

Nor will it do to keep the Sunday simply because it is the law of the nation. In doing that one would be receiving the day from a man or men as the case may be, for that is all the nation is comprised of. And to do this would be simply to put the nation—men, including himself, for he is a part of the nation—in the place of God. But he who does that, even allowing that Sunday is the right day, is lost.

Surely no one will risk their eternal destiny upon such evidence. Let him rather go to the Word of the Lord, and receiving it as the voice of the Almighty, and guided by the Holy Spirit, learn where lies the truth in this momentous question.

IN this world filled with finite minds, two forces claiming each to be the avenue of knowledge from beyond the finite limits, contend for the mastery. One is faith, the other is superstition.

PEOPLE who reject the Word of God say that faith and superstition are one and the same thing. But the truth is that they are opposites. Where the Word of God is least found, there superstition is most abundant. Any traveler in heathen or in papal lands can see this for himself.

FAITH stands upon the Word of God; superstition, upon the word of man. Superstition is merely the result of the effort of the finite mind to grasp things that are beyond its reach. That the human mind is finite, all intelligent persons know. The most learned of men have acknowledged that they had been able only to gather as it were a few pebbles of knowledge along the shore of the great sea of truth.

YET the finite mind desires to know the things that lie in the realms beyond, and unless it accepts the revelations made by an infinite mind, it will reach out itself after the unattainable like a child reaching for the moon; and, of course, will grasp nothing more substantial than a delusion. And this delusion it will fondly hold in place of the truth.

THE world to-day is full of superstition. The Word of God being but little known and still less believed, only this result could be expected. Whatever destroys faith in the Word of God—as for example, the “higher criticism”—builds up belief in superstition. The Catholic Church has become the home of superstition in civilized lands by its suppression of the divine Word, and substitution therefor of the word of man, in the form of decrees of councils and of popes, the dictum of the priest, and the church traditions in general. The more implicitly these traditions are accepted by an individual, the more ready is he to seek for superhuman aid to some “holy” bone or other relic, or to put faith in the stories circulated ever and anon of miraculous occurrences like that relating to the “sacred winding sheet” in Turin, Italy, now heralded by the Catholic press. Such superstition blinds the eyes of men to a vital truth.

THERE is salvation only in the Word of God. God’s Word is the truth, and those who love the truth will love that Word and will not turn from it to the word of man. And there is to be in the world in the last days, prophecy declares, two classes as regards the truth,—those who receive the love of the truth, and those who receive it not; and the latter class are to be overtaken by “strong delusion,” and believe a lie, “that they all might be damned.” This delusion will be upheld, of course, by the word of man, and if we have learned to put confidence in the word of man as concerning the things which pertain to salvation, we shall be unprepared to escape this “strong” deception. What is the training we are receiving now in this respect? Out of this question will come momentous results.

A MEMBER of the Volksraad, the legislative body of the Orange Free State, is reported as having recently declared to his fellow-members that if stringent Sunday regulations were enforced, “rinderpest and all other plagues would banish.” This was in the course of a debate on the propriety of new Sunday legislation. It illustrates how superstition connects itself with the cause of Sunday enforcement.

ROMAN CATHOLICS in this country have, not unnaturally, taken umbrage at the assertions from a Protestant source that “God has given into the hands of American Christians” the regions taken by the army and navy in Cuba. Previously to this these regions have been in the hands of American Catholics; hence the statement plainly implies that the Catholics are not Christians. Thus in one way and another the question is coming up for settlement, as to what class or classes of people constitute Christians, and what do not.

THE question of allowing church buildings upon the military reservation at West Point, has been settled, for the present, in favor of such buildings as the Secretary of War sees fit to allow to be erected. The matter is left to his “discretion.” This being so, we may expect that a Roman Catholic chapel will be forthcoming shortly.

THE exemption of church property from taxation, is an injustice which is particularly manifested when a war tax is put upon the common necessities of life.

A Vanquishing Dream.

AS THE Cuban war progresses, indications are pointing more and more clearly to the probability that the United States will, from necessity if from no other motive, take such action at the close of the war with reference to the future of Cuba as will belie, in the eyes of European peoples, the professions of disinterestedness with which she began the war.

The universal testimony of Americans who have come in personal contact with the Cubans, is anything but flattering to the latter. There is friction between the American troops and their Cuban allies, and already the Washington Government finds itself in serious perplexity over the situation. The halo of heroism which American eyes looking through the press reports saw encircling the heads of the Cubans, seems to have been dissipated completely; and with it has vanished in large part at least the idea of a Cuban republic flourishing under the hands of the natives now in arms against Spain.

There is every indication that at the close of the war it will be clearly seen by the authorities here that the power and authority of the United States are necessary to insure a stable and proper government in Cuba.

The trend of sentiment in this direction is well voiced in an article in The Independent, of July 21, by the governor of Colorado. In reference to the fulfillment of the purpose of giving liberty to the Cuban people, which the nation proclaimed to the world as her justification in taking up arms, he says:—

"I preach a new political gospel; a creed to which I am in part a recent convert. I have always believed that Cuba should be under the Stars and Stripes; to-day I believe that duty and destiny demand that the United States retain control of every island captured from Spain in the West Indies or in the Pacific. Our quixotic friend proclaims that we are engaged in a war of humanity, not of conquest—that we must give up every acre we gain at the cost of our treasure and the rich blood of our sons. How can we better meet the demands of humanity than to place our flag over lands that have been riven with revolution or debased by tyranny and misrule? Congress declared that we sought not Cuba, but its independence and freedom. How can Cuba be more free or independent than as a territory of the United States? The fourth Senate resolution, as were all declarations, was rendered null and void by the action of Spain in sending the American minister from Madrid before receiving the ultimatum from the United States.

"Are the natives of Cuba prepared for independence? Are they qualified to maintain a free State worthy of the sacrifice we are making in their behalf? If the history of similar people be a guide it would not be ten years before an independent Cuban republic would involve us in controversy and perhaps war with some first-class Power. For one hundred years it has been a menace to our peace—a fountain of contagion. Under our rule it would become a paradise, an ideal land of beauty and liberty, in strange contrast to its four centuries of blood and bondage."

Of course the United States will explain to the world that it is necessary to the welfare of the Cuban people that the island should be under the protectorate of the great American Republic; but who can suppose that the cynical-eyed powers thus addressed will be ready to accept this explanation? All things considered, the lofty ideal of the United States standing as the bestower of freedom and independence upon the oppressed peoples of the earth, might as well be regarded as a vanishing dream.

Sunday-law Prosecutions in Australia.

THE Melbourne Age, in its issue of May 23, last, makes the following note of several cases which have come before the courts there under the law against "Sabbath breaking":—

"Numerous complaints have been made to the authorities of the practice of Chinese and other market gardeners working in their gardens on Sundays in Brighton District, and it was recently decided that a raid should be made upon them by the police. Accordingly Constables Healy and Ward yesterday detected six Chinese thus Sabbath breaking, and one Englishman, who claims to be a Seventh-day Adventist, and who therefore observes Saturday as the Sabbath prescribed in the Scriptures. Summonses will be issued against the seven men under an act of Charles II., passed for the proper observance of the Sabbath. The penalty upon conviction is a fine of 5s., in default distress, or 24 hours in the stocks.

"As there are no stocks in use in this colony at present, in the event of the Chinese or the European defendant requiring them, the authorities will of course make stocks. In the case of the seventh-day Adventist, it is understood that the case will be fought by that body, and some interesting legal arguments may be expected.

"The Chinese aver that they do not want to work on Sundays, but being only the employes of rich countrymen in Melbourne, who own most of the gardens, are compelled to toil whether they like it or not. Their pay, as a rule, is 10s. per week, and their board and lodging. The cases will be heard at the Brighton Police Court on Friday next."

With reference to this the following appropriate observations were made in the June issue of the Melbourne Southern Sentinel:—

"Through 'numerous complaints' made against the poor Chinese market gardeners around Melbourne, the Sunday law of Charles II. has been set in motion again in Victoria, as appears from an article in another page. We have never heard of anyone, from the time of Constantine's Sunday law in 321 to the present day, ever having been converted to Christianity through the enforcement of Sunday laws. To fine men, and talk of putting them in the stocks for failure to observe a religious institution reminds us very forcibly of the days of religious intolerance and persecution. Mr. Wise spoke well when in the Federal Convention, in support of Clause 115, he said:—

"I wish I could share Mr. Barton's optimistic views as to the death of the spirit of religious persecution. But we have seen in our own time a recrudescence of that evil demon, which, I fear, is only scotched and not killed. At any rate, the period during which we have enjoyed religious liberty is not long enough for us to be able to say with confidence that there will be no swinging back of the pendulum to the spirit of the times from which we have only recently emerged.'

"To resurrect and put into operation the Sunday law of 1667 here in the year 1898, is certainly a swinging back of the pendulum to the spirit of the times when religious persecution was rife. Every government on earth ought to repudiate the principle of state censorship over men in religious things. Every civil constitution ought to have in it a clause similar to Clause 115 of the Federal Constitution. Then we would hear no more of stocks or Sunday laws. Every man would be left free to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, just as he should be."

A New Kind of Christianity.

At a recent convention of the Epworth League, held in Wheeling, W. Va., one of the prominent speakers made the following queer utterance: "I would like to give the Sultan of Turkey a dose of Christianity with a hundred-ton Krupp gun, red hot. And I would like to do the same for every Spaniard on the American continent."

This certainly is a fearful statement, and one that does not correctly represent Christianity. Christianity cannot be shot into people, however great may be their sins, with a hundred-ton Krupp gun, or guns of smaller caliber. The speaker could not have been actuated by the love of the Master who said, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for [not against] them which despitefully use you, and persecute you" (Matt. 5:44); but he certainly must have been fired with what passes for the spirit of patriotism. We do not wish to speak hard of the brother who made this expression, because we hardly believe he would really want to do as he said, but the idea of calling such a spirit Christianity, deserves severe censure.

Christ rebuked it whenever it appeared in his disciples. When they desired to call down fire from heaven to consume those who chanced to show enmity towards them, he turned and rebuked them, telling them they did not know what manner of spirit they were of. He further instructed them that he had not come all the way from the courts of glory to "destroy men's lives," but he had come to save them. His gospel is to the world, not to any particular class or nation. A Spaniard, who truly confesses his sins, and looks to Jesus Christ for pardon and mercy, stands just as good a chance to receive everlasting life as an American sinner, doing likewise.

Patriotism, however true and pure it may be, is not Christianity. Christianity is above patriotism. Patriotism takes in the love only of one's native country, primarily, while Christianity includes the proper love of every country, and above all this the love of every soul of whatever nationality it may be. He that has passed from death unto life, through the inexpressible love and goodness of God manifested through his precious Son, will be anxious that others shall enjoy the same blessed experience. He will not want to shoot down his fellow-man, but extend to him love and sympathy.

Think of the Lord using a gun to bring his subjects into subjection! Yet this is just what an under shepherd(?) recently did as reported in the New York World: "How Brave Chaplain Galloupe Shot and was Shot at Santiago," is the title of an article. In a hospital he was interviewed. The chaplain went on to tell his experience. He said: "I could not help taking part in the fight. I at first confined myself to the duties of my office, caring for the wounded as the battle progressed; but when our men began to reel under the concentrated Spanish fire, I felt the American rise in me, and tearing the red cross off my arm, I snatched up the gun and cartridge-belt of one of our men, and went to shoot just like the rest of them."

All such forget that Christ's kingdom is not of this world. This world is at enmity with God. He who gains the applause of this world, and its spirit, has not the applause of heaven. "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God." James 4: 4. All those who profess to be servants of Christ, and who use or thirst to use carnal weapons against their fellowmen, are not doing God service. They are not Christ's servants; for in John 18:36 he plainly says: "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, . . . but now is my kingdom not from hence [the world]." Therefore his servants will not fight.

Newburg, W. Va.

EQUALITY before the law is the birthright of man to-day.

It is said that fifteen thousand Jews have been led to Christ by reading Dr. Delitzsch's Hebrew translation of the New Testament.

A GREAT temperance convention is to be held at Guttenburg this summer, at which there will be delegates from Germany, Denmark, Norway, England, and America.

THE British papers assert with emphasis that the Christian Endeavor Convention held in Glasgow last month, was the largest religious body ever convened on that side of the Atlantic.

Stone Throwing from a Glass House.

It was Sunday afternoon, and Mrs. Peters had just finished washing at the usual pile of Sunday dinner dishes. Mr. Peters had been to church in the morning, and the children to Sunday-school. Mrs. Peters and Aunt Mae had stayed at home to prepare Sunday dinner. Aunt Mae had no conscientious scruples about working all morning, because she did not believe that Sunday was the Sabbath or the Lord's day, and Mrs. Peters hushed her conscience by saying it was the only day when the whole family could be together for dinner, and John always looked for something extra on Sunday. Mrs. Peters was tired out with the Sunday work, and now sat down to rest—and read and get into a worshipful frame of mind, when a crowd of boys and men swarmed into the vacant lot on the corner, and began to shout and run as they joined in their usual Sunday baseball game.

"O dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Peters, in an annoyed tone. "There are those ruffians, as usual. I suppose we are never to have another quiet Sunday again. Why don't they stay at home, or go to church? Whatever do they want to come over here every Sunday, and annoy respectable Christian people by their desecration of the Sabbath?"

Mr. Peters looked up from the Sunday paper, and said, "O, I suppose they have been housed up all week, hard at work, and want a little out-door air and recreation."

"Why, John Peters! you talk as though it was a holiday instead of a holy day."

"That's exactly what it is to them," said Mr. Peters. "They do not look upon Sunday in any puritanical way."

"Well, they ought to. Don't you suppose that God's law means anything? The commandment says, 'Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy.'"

"Mama," said little Ray Peters, "Aunt Mae says that God didn't mean Sunday when he said that."

"Hush!" said Mrs. Peters, "little boys should be seen and not heard. Those men and boys ought to know better than to play ball on Sunday; and if they don't know better, it is about time they were taught something."

"Well, mama, you seem to see their needs. Why don't you step over and teach them? Our text this morning was, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.' There's a very good chance," said Mr. Peters.

"You are too provoking. What do we have churches for? What do we pay the ministers for? Do you think I belong to the Salvation Army? The kind of gospel those men need is law administered by a man in a blue coat with a star on his breast."

"Why, mama, do you think that kind of preaching would be likely to make Christians of them?" asked Mr. Peters.

"It would make them act more like Christians, any way."

"You would have to carry things still further to have them act like Christians. Christians go to church."

"Well, I'd have them go to church. Do you suppose there would be less or more chance for them to be converted in or out of church?"

"You would have been a delight to John Endicott and Cotton Mather. Would you have a law to compel them to pray?"

"I'd have a law to stop this noise on the Sabbath day. It's disgraceful! It's so annoying to those who want to keep Sunday."

"Perhaps I don't care about keeping it, for it does not annoy me. I know the poor boys are really better off playing ball than doing nothing. Sunshine and exercise are good for the health. If we had a law prohibiting all sorts of Sunday recreation and work, we would be sure to suffer worse than we do now; for Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do."

"Well; but suppose they all went to church?"

"They wouldn't do it, except as hypocrites. Compulsory religion is the devil's own kind. Nothing makes worse knaves than cant and compulsion. It wouldn't be long before we should have the inquisition and the stake. The only safe method of making Christians is the way I have spoken of—preaching the gospel."

"Well, John Peters; if things go on as they are now, it will not be long before Sabbath-keeping will be a thing of the past."

"Aunt Mae keeps Sabbath on Saturday," said Ray.

"Yes," said Mrs. Peters. "There's no unity anywhere. On one hand the Sunday-keepers wink at desecration, and on the other hand a small minority ignore Sunday and keep Saturday."

"Well, and why shouldn't every soul do as he likes about Sabbath-keeping? Who does it belong to, anyhow?"

"It's God's day," lisped Mabel. "Teacher said so."

"Yes; and every man shall give an account of himself, not of somebody else, to God," said Mr. Peters.

"Well, it annoys me to have this noise going on when I want to be quiet," said Mrs. Peters.

"Did it annoy Aunt Mae yesterday when you were scrubbing and making a noise?"

"O no," laughed Aunt Mae. "People can afford to be very good-natured about what they can't help. Beside the commandment shuts me up to God and myself alone. For it says, 'In it thou shalt not do any work,' and does not give the right of dictating to any one outside my own household. But the real bottom of Mrs. Peter's trouble is weariness. Go upstairs and rest, and the noise will not worry you so."

"Yes," said Mr. Peters. "It was that big dinner that has made the trouble."

"Well, it's the only day we are all at home," sobbed Mrs. Peters. "And it seems a work of necessity and mercy to get the dinner."

"That's the way the ball players think about their Sunday game. I heard them talking it over one day," said Mr. Peters.

"Come, dear, go upstairs and take a nap, and let him that is without sin cast the first stone; for the greatest commandment is, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart;' and the second is, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'" F. B.

Studies in French History.—31.

EXAMINATION day, which meant so much to Rob and Charlie, had at last come and gone, and the two boys had passed very creditably. So it was fully decided that they should accompany their fathers on the long anticipated voyage. The party was to sail in a short time, and at least two very enthusiastic boys sat side by side the next Tuesday afternoon to listen to Professor Carman, so that they might get as much history as possible before their visit.

"Well, boys," said their teacher, smiling in the direction of Rob and Charlie, "I shall expect you to favor us with at least a letter or two while you are away, we shall all feel anxious to hear how you are enjoying your trip, and to see what you are learning."

"O yes, professor," cried both lads at once, "you may be sure we shall write to you."

"You remember," begins the teacher, "that the king was not willing to allow even his nobles any authority or power,—"

"What king, please?" interrupted Florence Ray.

"Louis the Eleventh," volunteered Edna Phillips.

"Right; and the result of this was a continual quarrel with them. But the duke proved himself equal to the king in diplomacy and cunning, as we shall see."

"O yes," said Ed Palmeter; "you were going to tell about a quarrel which Louis XI. had with one of his nobles,—I had almost forgotten."

"Well, they had a great many quarrels, but once King Louis took it into his head to go over to Peronne and see the duke,—I think I mentioned last week that his name was Charles the Bold. He was a very important personage at this time, for he was ambitious to become king of Burgundy. This province is in the east of France separated from Switzerland by the River Rhone and the Alps," continued Professor Carman, pointing to the map, "and had at one time been a kingdom. So Charles the Bold thought he would become king instead of duke. He was a very large and strong fellow, and I presume he thought he would be as fine a king at least as the ungraceful, untidy, and superstitious Louis XI."

"Well, but what did Charles do when Louis went to see him at Peronne?" questioned Milly Brown.

"He went to meet him and was very kind to him, and it almost seemed they were in a fair way to settle all their quarrels, when it happened that Charles heard that Louis was secretly plotting against him. Of course he was treacherous and blameworthy in this act, we must allow; but certain it is, Charles should not have flown into such a dreadful rage. He shut the king up in the very castle where he was being entertained as a guest, and spent all one night in walking his room in ungoverned rage, trying to think in what way he could best dispose of his enemy, most to humiliate him before his death,—for he fully intended to take his life for his duplicity and double dealing."

"Then the duke had him killed, did he?" questioned Milly Brown.

"No; he listened to his good advisers, who begged him not to violate his promise that the king should be treated well, for he had given him a safe conduct before his starting out on the visit."

"King Louis must have been a very reckless kind of man even to start out that way to visit an enemy," suggested Joe Palmeter.

"On the contrary, he was ordinarily a very cautious man, and it is quite strange why he did it. He always had such a horror of death that he would not allow it to be mentioned in his presence, and was quite a coward at heart; for cowardice and superstition almost always go together."

"Please tell us what you mean by a safe conduct," asked Florence Ray.

"It was a writing given by those in authority to insure the safety of travelers through the country over which they had rule. So the duke at last made up his mind to spare the king's life."

"Didn't he punish him in any way?" asked Max Smith.

"O yes, indeed; and a punishment which was to the angry king but little better than death itself. He forced him to go into the very town where he had planned the treason to the duke, and cry 'Hurrah for Burgundy!' at the top of his voice. Then Charles burned the town, and again compelled Louis to go with him to church and thank Heaven for the great victory over the duke's enemies, but his own friends. What a solemn mockery such a giving of thanks must have been! hatred in the heart and thanks upon the lips!"

"That is just what it seems to me all forced worship is," said Joe Palmeter, "solemn mockery."

"Exactly what it is, Joseph. This compelling men and using force to make them profess a sanctimoniousness which is not in the heart, is nothing but compelling men to be hypocrites."

"I'm thinking there is a good deal of that done today under the name of patriotism and Christianity," added Joe, "I'm pretty sure that when a person's truly pious, he won't need a whip at his heels to drive him to his prayers."

"Your idea is correct, Joseph. When men are forced to attend church they are apt to feel a great deal as King Louis did, full of rage and bitterness instead of piety."

"I wonder how the people of Paris felt when their king was sent back home," said Max Smith.

"They were not very much in fear of him, but quite inclined to laugh at him. In fact a number of the people had taught their parrots to scream 'Peronne!' at the top of their voices when the king passed by. This so enraged him that he ordered one of his servants to wring the poor bird's necks.

"At our next study we will learn something more of the history of Charles the Bold, because he was the duke of Burgundy; and as this is a part of French history, we shall not feel that we are wandering from the subject."

THE STORY OF PITCAIRN ISLAND.

(SECOND EDITION.)

BY ROSALIND AMELIA YOUNG,
A Native Daughter.

Pitcairn Island, one of the volcanic gems of the Pacific, has been heard of wherever the English language has been spoken. The story of the working out of the problem of human life on its limited territory reads stranger and more thrillingly in many respects than a romance. But most, if not all, of the tales told and books printed have either been too fragmentary or incorrect and misleading. It will be interesting to the friends of that miniature world to know that an authentic history has been written, and that by a native of the island, one to the manor born. Miss Rosa Young is one of the direct descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty. The book is a plain, unvarnished tale of Pitcairn and its inhabitants from its settlement to the year 1894. It is written with a charming simplicity of style which refreshes the reader and invites a continual perusal. Illustrated with 26 engravings by the half-tone process, and its 23 chapters have each a neatly engraved heading.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, JULY 28, 1898.

It is reported that the Powers of Europe, not including Great Britain, have decided not to allow annexation of the Philippine Islands to the United States.

In New Jersey indignant lovers of justice have combined to fight a decision recently given in a State court by which trolley companies would be allowed to kill children by their cars for one dollar apiece.

THE health of Pope Leo, says the New York Sun, is so precarious that the pontiff is preparing for an early demise, and conferences of cardinals are discussing the question of his successor. It is the wish of the pope that his body be buried by the side of Innocent III. The latter is a conspicuous figure in mediæval history, and was one of the worst popes that ever lived.

ONE great reason that is given for the decadence of Spain is expressed in the word "manana," which falls so naturally from the Spaniard's lips, and means "tomorrow." Its real significance may be expressed by reversing a well-known Anglo-Saxon motto,—Never do to day what you can put off till tomorrow. In addition, fully half the calendar year, it is said, is made up of saints' days and holidays, upon which no work is expected to be done. It would not be unnatural to suppose that the prevalence of saints' days and holidays is responsible for the use made of the term "manana." And it may be fittingly observed that when a nation begins to multiply "holy" days and holidays, it is exhibiting sure symptoms of decadence.

A RESIDENT of this city, Mr. Michael Powers, was recently fined $50 by Justice Bennett in one of the city courts for the crime of blasphemy. As reported, the justice in passing sentence said: "I find you guilty of the charge of swearing in the public streets contrary to the laws of the State of New York, and also of disturbing the quiet of your neighborhood. I, therefore, fine you $50, or fifty days in jail. You stand committed until the fine is paid."

It is quite proper, of course, to prohibit by law such conduct on the part of any person as properly constitutes a nuisance. But when the offense is one which derives its force from religious belief, as in the case of profanity, it is one beyond the province or the power of civil law to correct. "Blasphemy" is a term which, as defining an offense punishable by civil law, has a tendency to become very broad, and to include any word spoken derogatory to the prevailing religion. As such it has often been made the means of religious persecution; and to admit the propriety of legislating against it, is to throw down the barrier between church and state.

Profanity is a fault that may be eradicated by the grace of God, but not by the lash of the law. It is altogether likely that Mr. Powers' tendency to profanity was strengthened rather than diminished by the punishment imposed upon him by the court.

CERTAIN Roman Catholic journals are with all seriousness offering to the public an account of a wonderful "miracle" which occurred recently at Turin, Italy. It is described by the Rome correspondent of the Free-man's Journal, thus:—

"While the sacred winding sheet was exposed for public vision in Turin a couple of weeks ago, permission to photograph it was asked of King Humbert by Signor Secondo Pia, a member of the committee of sacred art of the Turin exposition. The first proof was a failure, but the second revealed a marvelous fact. As I explained a couple of weeks ago, the winding sheet bears a double impress of the figure of our Lord—but faintly, and showing only the outlines. It was naturally expected that the photographic negative would contain no more than was visible to the naked eye in the original. Instead, however, the photograph reveals a perfect design of the sacred face, hands, and limbs; so, after nearly nineteen centuries modern science manifests to us what manner of man our Lord was in his sufferings and death."

The "sacred winding sheet" has come to public notice through the mediumship of the Catholic church, and this miraculous occurrence of course attests the truthfulness of the church's claim to be the genuine and only medium through which the power of God is manifested for the salvation of human souls. That is what all these Catholic "miracles" are designed to teach to a credulous public.

But to discount the claim which is made for the church in this instance, it is not necessary to discount the story itself. Were the account true, it would be proof that God had nothing to do with the phenomenon. This may be known from the fact that God does not manifest his power in that way. The phenomenon—if such there was—indicates a power which appeals to the senses, one suited to a sensual religion. It is altogether appropriate that such things should be connected with a religion which appeals, as does the Catholic, to the eye and ear with form and ceremony calculated to dazzle and strike with awe rather than enlighten with truth.

God is working to-day not as a showman, doing wonders merely for people to behold, but to exalt his Word. Any "miracle" may be safely discounted which stands disconnected from that Word. His Word is mighty to convict of sin and save the soul, and it is always for this purpose that God manifests his power to-day. That is the work God is doing now. By and by this work will be finished, and then will be seen the manifestation of the power of God in a strange work upon material things. The all-important thing now is to know the power of God working in the heart by faith.

THERE is no red tape connected with the service of Christ.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 4, 1898.

NUMBER 30.

It is never right to deny rights.

THE human race cannot legislate itself above itself.

TO DENY the rights of one individual, is to deny the rights of all.

THE more fighting there is done in the world, the more of it there seems to remain to be done.

THE worst form of dependence—the farthest from true independence—is to be dependent on sin for your enjoyment.

LET government guard the interests of the individual, and the interests of the masses will take care of themselves.

THE trouble with legislation as a lifting force, is that it has to use the earth as a fulcrum; consequently it can elevate nothing on the earth.

THERE is no more need of human legislation to enforce the law of God than there was for Uzzah of old to put forth his hand to steady the ark of God, for which he was immediately struck dead.

THE "STATE CONSCIENCE" vs. THE INDIVIDUAL CONSCIENCE.

Must the individual conscience give way to the "State conscience," expressed by act of the legislature? A large religious element in this country boldly says that it must. At the hearing before Congress on the bill for a religious amendment to the Constitution, in 1896, Dr. David McAllister, its champion, said: "Here is the nation, which gives its decision according to its sense of right and wrong. That is the national conscience, and when the nation thus gives its decision, . . . the individual conscience must yield to the conscience of the whole people." This religious party are trying hard to become conscience for "the whole people," and to secure legislation which will recognize their views as the nation's "sense of right and wrong."

THE amazing unselfishness of God is revealed in the words spoken by him to sinful man—"Receive ye the Holy Ghost."

IN ancient times men used to worship gold when it was made into a molten or a graven image. To day they have so far degenerated that they worship it in the crude state in which it is taken from the earth.

THE conscience of but a single individual may have all the authority and power of Omnipotence behind it.

"THE state conscience" is one of many names by which despotism seeks to hide his identity from the public.

NO MAN was ever able to "kill time," but in trying to do so, a good many men have succeeded in killing themselves.

THE person who goes out of the pathway of God's law to gain time, is quite apt to lose eternity as the result.

The Powerful Law.

THE law of God is a law not only of prohibitions, but of power. It not only commands, Thou shalt not, but is an expression of the power of God for righteousness, to which power man has access through the gospel.

In this the law of God is as superior to the law of man as heaven is superior to earth.

To the Jews, speaking of the laying down of his life, Jesus said, "I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it up again. This commandment have I received of my Father." John 10:18. And all the commandments of God are expressions of his power.

It is a common idea that the commandments of God are the expression or measure of our power toward God—that by exerting our utmost endeavors we will be able to comply with the law, and therefore God requires it of us. But this is as far as possible from the truth. The commandments are the measure of God's power toward us, even in our sins. Hopeless indeed would the sinner's case be but for this.

The deeds of the law are infinitely beyond our human endeavors, but God has destined us for a station infinitely beyond that of fallen, erring humanity. Seen through the gospel, the law speaks to us of a power infinitely beyond our own, to lift us up from the plane of human frailty. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift!"

And this is why it is that "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul," and is seen in the motions of sun, moon, and stars, as described in the nineteenth Psalm; for in them all is the manifestation of his power.

This is why the believer is "not under the law." Having exercised faith in Jesus Christ, the law of God—the power of God—is within him. He is not under the law, nor is he above it; but it is within him as his life is within him; for it is the life of God that is the power of God. He is not under the law, but "under grace."

But not so of the law of man. That can only supply man with the knowledge of its requirements; but in the domain of morality, knowledge is not power.

And thus it is only the worst foolishness for the legislatures of earth to think of reenacting the law of God, or of attaching penalties to the commands of that law.

No law of man was ever perfect, or ever converted a soul. The law of man is effective only in giving men freedom in the exercise of their natural rights.

There Are Quiet Revolutions, As Well As Violent Ones.

UNDER the false impression that revolutions can be accomplished only by violence and visible upheaval, the American people are in great danger of passing through a revolution and of finding themselves in the clutches of a new and strange power before they realize that any such thing is going on at all.

It should not be forgotten by any member of the American Republic that the Roman Republic passed through the despotism of two triumvirates, the second far worse than the first, each ending in the despotism of one man; and then passed into the "furious and crushing despotism" of the Roman monarchy; all in the name of the Republic. All this occurred inside of forty years, before the eyes of all the people, while they were pleasing themselves with the fancy and the name that they were still a republic.

Even when Augustus had become emperor this fiction was played by him before the eyes of the people; and the people were pleased with it. For, as Gibbon most pointedly remarks, "Augustus was sensible that mankind is governed by names; nor was he deceived in his expectation that the Senate and people would submit to slavery, provided they were respectfully assured that they still enjoyed their ancient freedom." Upon this safe assumption he accordingly deceived "the people by an image of civil liberty, and the armies by an image of civil government." He was eminently successful, and both people and armies congratulated themselves upon the greatness, and the new and wonderful career, of the Roman Republic.

With these facts in mind the following extract from the speech of Ex-Attorney-General Harmon, to the Ohio Bar Association at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, July 12, are intensely suggestive to citizens of the American Republic:—

"Mere expansion is not growth. It is only swelling. We may push across the seas, but we cannot grow there. Elephantiasis is not an unknown form of national malady, and has always proved fatal. There are still chapters of English history to be written.

"We should have to change both the name and the nature of our nation to admit any State out of America, especially if it be populated by alien races. Few, if any, are now bold enough to advocate this. To get dominion over strange peoples for the mere purpose of governing them, not admitting them as equals in a family of States, stretching into permanency for that purpose a power meant to be temporary and occasional only and for that reason left unrestricted, is rightly called an imperial policy. It would belie and discredit the Declaration of Independence, and convict us of hypocrisy. We cannot under our system govern any people without letting them help govern us. The reaction would be swift and sure. We should see what Patrick Henry meant when he said in his famous resolutions of 1765, that such government of the colonies by Great Britain 'has a manifest tendency to destroy British as well as American freedom.'

"An imperial policy will as surely some day lead to an emperor. He may assume some softer name if our sensitiveness survive, as is often the case. But an imperial policy and a republic make a contradiction in terms. The policy must go or the emperor in some new form must come."

"But what are we to do with countries we take? If where our flag is carried in battle it must remain as the emblem of permanent authority, victory will become more perilous than defeat. There is no dishonor in bringing home our victorious banners, as we did from the walls of Mexico. There is dishonor, and danger, too, in pulling down the landmarks of the union. No obligation, legal or moral, prevents our leaving such countries as we find them, or giving their people control of their own affairs if we think best. Desire only, not duty, suggests the assumption of authority over them.

"If we must provide fuel for our ships, we want coal-bins, not provinces nor colonies. We can hold them as property. We need not broaden them into domain. If they must be fortified and guarded so we may fight our way to and from them, let us keep them as England does Gibraltar. She does not have to rule Spain. If we must have purely national property abroad, we can at least keep our politics at home where we can have a close eye on them.

"Congress was authorized merely 'to regulate commerce.' Our ancestors knew commerce can be captured and kept, only by better goods and lower prices. Yet it is more than hinted that it would be a proper exercise of this power to conquer foreign nations in order to make them trade with us. Conquest is even suggested as a means of spreading the gospel.

"But who is authorized to abandon the ocean ramparts with which God has surrounded us, because the inventions of men have made them somewhat less effectual. They will always be our chief defences while the earth revolves. Our country can be no further from danger than its nearest part. Where is the right found to expose our national honor, pride and welfare in dominions beyond the seas, when they may abide in safety forever in the home which the kindness of nature and the wisdom of our fathers have provided for them.

"It is not pleasant to play Cassandra. It is easier to join in the shouting and the dancing of those who seem to think the past is dead and the future assured. But one's duty to his countrymen is to give warning of evil when he believes he detects its approach."

The President's Call to Prayer.

"New York Times."

THERE is real weight in the criticism of those who charge the President with the sort of unwisdom and bad taste that always is involved in the giving of unasked and unnecessary advice, however good the advice may be. There are rumors that more than one clergyman has shown a trace of irritation over this earnest and public appeal for him and his class to do something which they were sure to do anyway, and the same feeling exists among religious laymen to an extent greater than they would care to reveal. It may be said that the President's proclamation had at least as much justification and was as inoffensive as those which he and state governors issue in November. The cases are slightly but materially different. Long custom has turned the Thanksgiving Day proclamation into a formality about which nobody thinks very much, and though the people who object even to an oblique hint of a connection between church and state sometimes find fault with it, they are not seriously troubled. In the present instance the gratuitousness of the exhortation to prayer is not mitigated by a knowledge that the action taken is merely a survival from the past.

A Suggestive Incident.

In the Boys' High School of Reading, Pa., about June 27, 1898, a lad named Deeter was the valedictorian of the graduating essay in which, says Harpers' Weekly, he "commented unfavorably on the practice very much in favor now in American schools of attempting to instil patriotic sentiments into school children by drilling them in singing patriotic songs, and by causing them to repeat, somewhat parrot-like, high sounding sentiments which few of them can be expected to understand."

This, the principal of the school, one "Dr. Shribner," decided to be "unpatriotic:" and for it, he punished the boy by refusing to sign his diploma. However the "Dr." (with the foreign name) would let the boy have his diploma if he would "take it unsigned."

That boy is highly honored by being so "punished" for such an "offense." A diploma without that man's name to it would be a far greater honor than with it. We hope the boy eagerly accepted the diploma without that name signed to it.

Harper's truly says, "The expediency of this feature of public school education seems fairly open to discussion: and attempts to choke off reasonable and decorous criticism of its methods are likely to have an effect the opposite of that desired. The sort of patriotism that is so boisterous about 'Old Glory' that it discountenances free speech should try to get its bearings, and make sure it is not off its course."

But the trouble is that these "Dr.'s," with foreign ideas as well as foreign names, have not yet got their bearings as to either free speech or patriotism. And they think they must enforce in American schools and upon American children, their foreign and despotic ideas and make them count and be accepted for patriotism. Such persons are not fit to be in any American school—except as pupils to be taught American ideas.

The other great trouble in this connection is that there are too many people who profess to be Americans and patriotic and loyal to American ideas, who will not only employ these fellows with foreign ideas and names, but will support them in their un-American and despotic conduct toward American boys who advocate sound American principles.

And thousands of other school teachers, principals, etc., who profess to be Americans and patriotic and loyal to American ideas, to free speech, etc., think themselves exceptionally patriotic in endorsing the foreign and despotic principles, and in aping the tyrannical conduct of these men of foreign ideas as well as foreign names.

The people of Reading, Pa., should without delay see to it that there is placed at the head of their boys' high school a man who knows the American principles of both patriotism and free speech; and who will not make himself a despot in the interests of "patriotism."

And there are just now many other places in the United States where the people should attend to the same thing.

A. T. J.

Alexander Campbell Vs. Societies to Promote Morality by Law.

I SHALL, for the sake of argument, suppose that the members of these societies are all Christians, and that they are associated for the express purpose of suppressing vice and immorality by civil pains. I shall further suppose that they are about to inflict civil pains on some men of the world, who are not convicted of the crimes of drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, and profane swearing. In this case, then, I say they are positively prohibited, both by the letter and spirit of Christianity, from exercising judgment and inflicting punishment upon them. The apostle, in the fifth chapter of his epistle to the Corinthians, when he forbids Christians to associate with or to retain immoral professors in the church (some of which he specifies as fornicators, drunkards, railers, etc.), in regard of such characters out of the church, he peremptorily, and by the strongest figure of speech, prohibits any interference, in the words (verses 12, 13), "What have I [as a Christian or an apostle] to do to judge them also that are without? do not ye judge them that are within? But them that are without God judgeth." No precept was ever more definite, more authoritative, or more perspicuous, than this.

It is, however, no more than following the example of the founder of Christianity, who, when solicited to divide an inheritance, or to use his authority between two brothers who acknowledged him a master in settling a quarrel about an inheritance, replied, "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?" He confessed before a Roman governor that his "kingdom is not of this world." Consequently his servants as such have no right to interfere with men of the world in anything pertaining to God and conscience. Let the men of the world alone; let them stand by their own master and judge.

"Follow peace with all men," and take heed to yourselves and those who profess to be under your guardian care, and then your mild, peaceable, upright example will do more to reform the world than fines and imprisonment; walk wisely toward them that are without. Such is the spirit and tendency of Christianity. What a contrast! Constables, fines, imprisonment, to make men wiser and better!

But I shall place the above supposition in another point of view. I shall suppose that a society of Christians assemble for the above purposes, and that they have before them a number of professed Christians convicted of the aforementioned crimes: what then is the course to be pursued in relation to them? Does Christianity allow or authorize them to call on the civil law or civil power to punish them?—"Yes," says the Romanist; but the Protestant says, "No." The Protestant asks, "What are the means commanded to be used toward offenders in the Christian Church?" The Catholic replies, "Excommunications, bulls, racks, gibbets, fire, and every species of cruelty." So they said in former times; perhaps they are wiser since the establishment of the cortes and constitution. But the Protestant replies, "Admonition and exclusion, or excommunication." The heretic and immoral professors are treated alike. Hear Paul: "A man that is an heretic after the first and second admonition reject." With respect to the immoral, his words are equally plain and conclusive: "Put away from among yourselves that wicked person." After the heretic and the immoral are excluded from the church, they are to Christians ecclesiastically dead. They have no power or jurisdiction over them. The words of their Master are, "If he neglect to hear the church, let him be to thee as an heathen man and a publican." "But," says the moralist, "let us fleece him after he is ecclesiastically dead; let us send after him and devour his substance! Let us raise him from the ecclesiastical grave, and plunder his sepulcher. Who knows but he may be brought to life again!" If their proceedings have any meaning, if they are not deliberate robbery, such is the meaning of them.

I hope, sir, there are many members of these associations who are led in unawares; but their leaders are crafty and designing men. No people more richly deserve the ordeal of criticism, the keenness of reproof, and the fulness of exposure, than these would-be heads of the inquisition.

Of these things which I have spoken, this is the substance:—

If the "moral societies" are heterogeneous, if they claim jurisdiction over all things civil, moral, and religious, they are antichristian.

If they are all Christians, they are prohibited from the exercise of any power over them that are not members of the churches, by the express law of Christ.

And, if they were even a Christian church, and the offenders professed Christians, it is antisciptural for them to punish them by any civil pains.

In a word, I affirm that the Bible will justify them equally in burning a man or stoning him to death, as it will in exacting money of him, for his sins. Yea, I will go further, and say that it is more scriptural to stone a man to death for sinning against God, than it is to take four dollars or four cents from him on the same account. The former has been done in Old Testament times; but the latter was never done in the days of the Bible. But in New Testament times we read of but one instance of stoning a man to death for the good of his soul; this was the martyr, Stephen. And in it we read of but one society of covenanters—this society bound itself by a solemn league and oath that they would neither eat nor drink until they had killed Paul. . . .

In the epistle of James, I read these words: "He that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not steal." The doctrine deduced from these words is, that as it is the same authority that prohibits all vices, all immoralities, he that is guilty of any one of them equally offends that authority as he who is guilty of another, or he who is guilty of all. "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." Now, sir, how I shall bring this to bear upon the subject, you will see when I have done.

The law of Pennsylvania, I understand, values the profanation of the Sabbath at four dollars, the profanation of the Divine name at less than one dollar, drunkenness at so much, etc. Now let me ask why is each sin valued at a different price, and why is any of them at a fixed price? Sins, like other commodities, if they are to be valued at a certain price, should bear a proportion to the state of currency; what was worth four dollars three years ago is worth but two now. From a parity of reason I would suppose that two dollars is the full value of the above, provided that four dollars was its full value three years ago. But why fix upon four dollars, if this was not supposed the full equivalent of the guilt contracted; why was it not one thousand dollars, or only six and one-fourth cents, if they did not think that four dollars was the precise price? If one thousand dollars was too much, and if six and one fourth cents was too little, four dollars must, in their judgment, be something equivalent.

Then why is the violaton of the third commandment fixed at about one fourth of the sum which pays for the violation of the fourth? Is the former a sin only against a demi-god, and the latter a sin against the mighty Jove? Or, is there but one fourth of the guilt in profaning the Lord's name that there is in profaning the Lord's day? He that said, Thou shalt sanctify the seventh day, said also, Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain. So much for my text.

But, sir, it is not because there is four times as much demerit in the sin of Sabbath-breaking as there is in that of profaning the Lord's name, that this difference in price is allowed. I will make you acquainted with the philosophy of the principle! When a man sins against his Maker, by profane swearing, he sins against heaven alone. But when he does not observe the seventh day, he sins against heaven and the clergy, in not honoring them with his presence to hear them preach. Now, sir, all sins being alike, as they affect the Creator, the one dollar pays for the sin in that sense as it pays for other sins; but the three dollars pays for the insult offered to the clergy.

What other grounds there are for this difference I can not see. Again, when a man is fined for any offense, the fine is proportioned to the damage he has done, and the fine is designed to cover the damage, so as to become an equivalent to the injury sustained. Thus, when a man is fined for slander, the fine is proportioned to the injury done the slandered, and the slandered receives it as a compensation for the loss sustained. Thus, when a man is fined for Sabbath-breaking, the fine is unquestionably, as in other cases, designed to atone for the damages. The informer is to receive a part for the damages he has sustained in giving the information, and the risk to which he has exposed himself in so doing. The injured party, in this case, if we are to suppose the crime to affect Heaven, cannot receive the fines; but it is bequeathed to his favorites on earth, to dispose of for their own ends. If they cannot show such a bequest, I do not know by what authority they take it. It comes naturally to this conclusion, from the above considerations, that it is as immoral to take that from a fellow creature to which we have no right, as it is for him to sin against the divine law. And he that pockets four dollars is as great a sinner as he who breaks the Sabbath.—Published in "The Reports," Washington, Pa., June, 1820.

The Late-Staying Caller.

HE ABSOLUTELY FORCES HOST AND HOSTESS INTO UTTERING FALSEHOODS.

FRIEND STAYLATE makes a call in the evening. Conversation blithe and joyous, and repeated requests for him to remain yet a little while, lead him, not at all unwillingly, to prolong his visit. He looks at his watch with a gasp of genuine dismay, and hurries away slowly at last with profuse apologies for keeping us up until such an unearthly hour. "Oh, indeed, no!" choruses the entire family. "This is early for us! We never think of going to our rooms until an hour later than this." Friend Staylate loiters a moment after he gets outside the gate. Slam goes the door; bang! wang! slam! go the shutters, calling harshly to each other, "Thought that fellow never would go!" Bang! "Why didn't he stay all night?" Slam! And the rattle of the chain cries, "Gone at last!" The darkness of the dungeon settles down on the house; the family has gone to bed, having relieved its mind by doors and shutters that are ready to tell the truth any time they are given a chance.—Robert J. Burdette, in August Ladies' Home Journal.

Can Christians Rightfully Go To War?

BY T. R. WILLIAMSON.

I SHOULD think not. And I think so even though it becomes necessary to differ in opinion from the greatest pulpiteers of the world.

What a good thing it is for a humble Christian that he need not take his conceptions of duty from great men, not even from great preachers.

Three millions of slaves, embruted by the lash, and hardened by severest labor, understood inspiration at first hand, from God's lips at Sinai, and from Moses' lips for forty years afterward. Fishermen understood Christ; and the "common people heard him gladly." Then of course common people can understand his words now, and all the words of Scripture, as well as can the great preachers, and with a prayer for the Holy Spirit for guidance, all may and will see Bible teaching alike, while preachers differ. Their learning has often too much "higher criticism" in it.

Bible words just as they stand are not final authority to many of the preachers.

And what do Bible words say on the war question? Why they say to those who love God, "All ye are brethren." "Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous." "We ought to lay down our lives for the brethren."

All who love God are related one to another, and these brethren of the Lord and of one another are scattered over the world, through all countries.

They are of all churches and all nationalities, and can they "love as brethren," "be pitiful, be courteous" as brethren, and yet meet in deadly battle and fire into one another's faces? Can a Christian say to a man, Brother, I love you, and at the same time plunge a bayonet into his brother's heart? Would it be possible to express a heart full of affection for a brother and at the same time blow the brother's brains out just because that brother lived on the other side of some national boundary that separated the two nations to which these men belonged?

Could a Christian yearn in care and kindness for a brother of another nation, and fire the other's home, drive away his family, and loot his household goods?

Would it be in accordance with these quoted words of the Lord and his apostles, for a ship manned with Christians to aim, some day during worship hours, a monster gun, at a town where Christians dwelt, and send a shell into a worshipping congregation, perhaps a Bible school of little scholars, and maim and slay a score or two?

When Christ was here he bore blows, hard words, shameful spitting on, and even a slave's dreadful death, with never a return blow, though an army of angels was at his call.

He lived as he would have his followers live. Can it be thought that if Christ were here now, he would lead the troops in some terrific charge, or command a fleet in furious battle? And if it be answered that such action by him is not, by any means credible to our minds, or conceivable, then where do we get any warrant whatever for thinking that his followers may take part in scenes of blood, willingly, and with desire to mangle, and maim, and slaughter?

No doubt the Heavenly Father wishes, and the great Elder Brother wishes you and me, Christian brother, to live just such lives as they would live if they lived just here in our places.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

ABOUT two o'clock Mrs. Scott came and conducted me to the drawing-room, where, indeed, a genuine surprise awaited me. A little platform with castors on the side had been rolled out of its closet into position; two chairs and a small table placed upon it. The two parlors were filled with camp chairs and seated with a company of decent, intelligent, working women. We took our seats together on the little platform, and Mrs. Scott explained:—

"These are my women; my mother's circle. Many of them have been picked up out of the gutter. The majority have been truly converted, and are making Christian homes out of what used to be the most disreputable places that could be called by that name."

As we were talking the door opened and a belated guest came in dressed in a well-patched, but exceedingly neat, and in spite of its patches, a becoming dress.

"That woman," said Mrs. Scott, "was one of the worst women who ever walked the street, her husband a drunkard, and herself everything that was bad. They had a family of children growing up to follow in their footsteps. She has been converted and is one of our best workers."

It is needless to say that my heart was full as I sat before this company of women, who were looking at me with expectation in every face. They had been told of the relation between them and me in the work by which they had been rescued, and the greeting which I received from their expressive faces struck deep.

At the close of the service Mrs. Scott and I held a little reception as they passed by, and I took the hand of each. This was on Thursday; Mrs. Scott said:—

"I will not attempt to surprise you any farther, but will tell you that to-morrow evening, Friday, you are to meet the men of these homes. We have read your "Pledge and Cross" in our gospel meetings. We women were none of us speakers, so we took "Pledge and Cross" with the Bible as the best way of reaching them. They will all come bringing others with them, perhaps some half-drunken man, expecting you to give them something fresh and very practical for their help."

I was told that many of these men had already been converted, and that they were always reaching out after some drunken comrade; they very seldom had a meeting that was not attended by some who were under the influence of liquor.

I will not take time to describe that Friday night meeting, only to say that it was an almost ideal gospel meeting in one of the most elegant parlors of the city; perfectly informal; every man feeling that he had a right to make the most of every moment, and get for himself all of Christ that he could out of any one who knew more about him than he did. We were honored by the presence of two men who were under the influence of liquor, who both signed the pledge, asked for prayers, and professed conversion before the meeting was over.

The next day we had a meeting for the children in the same double parlors. These little people had already come to appreciate the difference between a drunken and a sober father and mother; between starvation and plenty; between rags and comfortable clothing; between quarreling and peace and quietness in the home.

Mrs. Scott said: "At our last month's meeting these women gave us a surprise, the like of which I think, never was before enjoyed. The supper has always been furnished by the Union, and in this we have made an effort to teach how to set a table neatly, and all the little nice ways that could be transferred to their humble homes. We have endeavored to lead them to see how large a part neatness in the home plays in the temperance reform; that before a man can be expected to leave the saloon and bring his earnings home, he must have a home to which he can come, and in which to spend his evenings.

When the time arrived to arrange for our last monthly meeting some of these women came to us and said: "Let us serve the supper at the next meeting." At first we thought it would be a great risk; that it would make a drain upon the resources of those who could not afford it; but as they urged their wish in the matter, we consented, keeping out of the way until we were ushered in as guests of honor, and I doubt if it would have been possible to find a dry eye in our company. For myself, I was not ashamed of the tears that came to my eyes. It was a nice, daintily-prepared and neatly-served supper, which furnished by these women so recently rescued out of the slums, was a remarkable demonstration of what can be expected by patient, sympathetic effort, with the blessing of God upon it. There was no linen, but the cloths were very white and clean. They had the good taste, or rather the principle not to try to do better than they could. There were a few flowers tastefully arranged, and everything showed that there was not only a desire to please, but a genuine appreciation of the principles upon which beauty and order in the government of heaven depend. Their husbands came, all deeply interested to witness the success of their wives in this effort to entertain the Union.

From first to last the exhibit of results was so simple and practical, so after the divine order of "every seed bringing forth fruit after his kind," that we could but rejoice at what God had produced out of small human beginnings.

What Is the Everlasting Gospel?—No. 7.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE everlasting gospel is the Word of God. This will be seen by comparing verses 23 and 25 of Colossians 1st chapter, where in the one text the Apostle Paul says he was made a minister of the gospel, while in the other he says he was made a minister to "fully preach the word of God" (margin).

The word of God is the truth (John 17:17); therefore the gospel itself is the truth. Col. 1:9.

All truth must be consistent with itself.

It is impossible therefore for the gospel to call any one to that which is not the truth.

We have seen however that the everlasting gospel of Rev. 14:6, 7 calls upon all "them that dwell on the earth, . . . every nation, kindred, tongue, and people," to "fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters." This it has been shown is nothing less than a call to keep the commandments of God.

But as stated above, the gospel cannot call one to anything that is not the truth, and as it calls on all to keep the commandments, it follows that the commandments themselves are truth. And this we know is so, for we read, "Thou art near, O Lord; and all thy commandments are truth." Ps. 119:151.

It is not enough to say that the gospel is truth. It is that to be sure, but it is a great deal more than that; it is the truth. That is to say, the gospel is not simply a part of a great whole, but it is the whole thing itself; it is the sum of all truth. And this is because the gospel is simply Christ himself, and he is "the truth." John 14:6. There is no truth outside of Christ.

Nor is it enough to say that the commandments are simply truth, and a part of a great whole. As we have seen, God's law is truth. And it is more; it is "the truth." It is not a part, but the whole truth. Hence we read again: "Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness; and thy law is the truth." Ps. 119:142.

From this it will appear that there is practically no difference between the law and the gospel—they are both "the truth," and the truth is Jesus Christ.

What then is the real object of the preaching of the everlasting gospel of Rev. 14:6, 7 to earth's remotest bounds? As it reads it is that all men should "fear God and give glory to him . . . and worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea and the fountains of waters." This however is a call to keep the commandments of God—a matter of absolute necessity in the one who fears God.

But we have seen that the commandments are "the truth," and also that Jesus Christ is "the truth;" therefore the real object of the everlasting gospel is to call men to Jesus Christ and the fulness that is in him.

This of course is what the gospel has ever been; but it is here (Rev. 14:6, 7) emphasized in view of the fact that the mark of the beast (papacy) is to be enforced upon the consciences of the people; and which can only result, to them that yield, in their being drawn away from Jesus Christ. To save people from this it is necessary that they should know the relation of the commandments of God to Jesus Christ, that they may know that the rejection of the one is the rejection of the other.

Let us for a moment look a little further at the law of God. Speaking of this law the Psalmist says, "Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness, and thy law is the truth." Now that which is true of any thing as a whole, must be true of all its parts. It will therefore follow that the law as a whole, being the truth, it is equally true that all its parts are truth.

That law is set forth in the ten commandments. It must therefore be true that each one of the commandments spoken of separately is truth; and that any one of them is as much the truth as any one of the others; and all of them together are necessary to make up the whole.

All this is as certain as that two and two are four. Each of the commandments being truth, and all of them together being "the truth," it must be evident that any thing that is not in harmony with any one of them can not be truth, and is therefore to be rejected.

But the fourth precept of the law plainly states that the seventh day is the Sabbath. This is the truth. Any other day therefore claiming to be the Sabbath is in direct conflict with the fourth commandment, and with the law as a whole. And that being so, Sunday, which is the first day of the week, cannot be the Sabbath, is not the truth, and is therefore to be rejected.

Furthermore, the law is the truth, and the gospel is the truth. This being so it must be mathematically true that whatever is not in harmony with the one, can not possibly be in harmony with the other.

As therefore Sunday is not in harmony with the law, it likewise is not in harmony with the gospel; being no part of the law, it is also no part of the gospel, and has therefore no connection with Jesus Christ.

CERTAIN bishops in the Episcopal Church have admonished their clergy not to preach on topics connected with our war with Spain. Recently the Presbyterian Ministers' Association, of Richmond, Va., formerly declared their "conviction that, while ministers and people in public and private should pray God's blessing upon our rulers, upon the officers and men of the army and navy, and that peace with honor may soon be established, yet it is the duty of ministers to proclaim from their pulpits at all times nothing but the glorious gospel of the blessed God, according to our commission from the great Head of the church."

Logically, Is This "a Christian Nation?"

BY CHAS. L. MANNING.

THE men in power, commonly spoken of as the government, are not the government itself, but merely servants who are placed in positions of power as executives to enforce the government upon the people; they are not the power itself, but they possess and wield the power for a limited time.

Government is an intangible, impersonal force which is omnipresent within its prescribed boundaries. It is intangible, because if the executives be removed and their places remain vacated, the force itself is no longer brought to view and no man can place his hand on it and say, "Lo, it is here; or, lo, it is there." It is everywhere, but the presence of the officials makes its power felt more in their presence than elsewhere, or in such places or upon such persons as they may direct by law.

Being impersonal it has no soul, hence cannot be saved; and no individual need ever fear that they will meet this or any other government in heaven lording it over the saints. But every soul which is a true child of God, a true Christian, and none other,—not simply by profession, but in reality,—will be there, and should a million supreme courts impute Christianity to this Government, it would still be insufficient to give it enough Christian character to save it and admit it to the New Jerusalem.

Our form of government "derives its just powers from the consent of the governed," and if it be true that "this is a Christian nation," then Christianity must be one of its "just powers." And if that be true, then we have no further need of Jesus Christ as a Saviour, for the Government may then exercise its power and compel us to accept its "Christianity" and be saved according to the plan it may prescribe, even against our will. That would be tyranny; and it is impossible for a true Christian to be a tyrant.

But this is not "a Christian nation," for while it "derives its just powers from the consent of the governed," no man can impute righteousness, nor delegate his Christianity or any portion of it, to another or to the government. It then remains for those who contend that "this is a Christian nation," to explain from whence it derives this one of its "just powers," and how an intangible, impersonal force can accept that which is designed solely for the individual.

TRUTH and right are more illuminated by a single page of the divine Word, than by all the statute-books of the land.

PROBABLY there is no prouder woman in the United States to-day than Mrs. Sallie Hobson, mother of the young lieutenant from Alabama, who so distinguished himself in connection with the military operations before Santiago. What mother is there who could see her son so honorably recognized by the nation without feeling a pardonable pride stirring within her to the deepest depths.

THE fame which has cast so bright a luster upon the name of the young naval officer, serves to call attention to the mother as an example of the truly successful woman. We do not mean that success in this case consists in the military exploit which was so daringly performed in the harbor of Santiago. The success was achieved before that, in the training which resulted in the formation of a strong, virtuous, manly character. The tragic incident under the city's battlements only served to throw the light of publicity upon the character which stood back of it. It did nothing to make that character; the character was made long before by the mother's training.

* * *

WE mention this because there have come forward at the present time certain new ideals of womanhood and of patriotism which may well be challenged before being received into favor. We have to-day before us the "new woman." No definition or description of her need be furnished to any intelligent observer; examples of the new genus are too numerous to require that. The development of the "new woman" means that the former type was not, under any circumstances, a full success. Something more was needed before such success in the sphere of womanhood could be realized, and the "new woman" represents the reaching out for this further attainment. So it appears from the point of view of a certain class of the people.

* * *

MRS. HOBSON is not an example of the "new woman;" no doubt can exist on this point. Yet what higher type of woman has civilization developed? What higher type has been furnished by the "new" ideal of womanhood? What higher type, indeed, does the nation need? In this we take into account the fact that the highest training is that which trains the character for God; but in this training the foundation is laid in the inculcation of manly principles,—in the development of love for justice, mercy, and truth.

THE old ideal for woman is reached through motherhood. The new ideal is attained by a different way. While not professedly antagonistic to the old, its essential opposition to it is instinctively felt and recognized. The "new woman" and the woman whose chief claim to recognition is her well trained children are not expected to be one and the same person. The "new woman" is expected to make a name directly for herself, by her own achievements in fields hitherto undertrodden by her sex, rather than to become eminent by making a name for another. Measured by the principle of unselfishness, the difference between the two becomes strongly marked.

* * *

THE nation has special need of all women who can excel in the sphere of motherhood. The world has always needed such more than any or all others. And no names among women have more inherited the reverence of mankind than have those of the mothers of its eminent men. The mother of Moses, and the mother of Samuel, the mother of Wesley, and the mother of Washington,—these and many more that might be named survive in history to present before us the true ideal to be reached in the sphere of womanly endeavor. The "new woman," meanwhile, has yet to demonstrate that she is a necessity or even an advantage in any sphere of social and moral life.

* * *

AS THINGS are constituted in this world, it is not possible for woman to accomplish the work—to compass the achievements—that can be done by man. The superior strength of his sex carries him up the farthest heights of human attainment. But the preparation of the man for such achievements is confided to the hand of woman; and thus, as a mother, her position is one of the highest responsibility and of honor. "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world," but it rules the world only through the cradle.

* * *

IT is proper parental training that creates material for patriots. The true patriot is nothing more or less than the noble man. Patriotism is not shown by fighting; the worst men will fight as readily as any others, or more so. Patriotism of the true sort is shown by unselfishness in sacrificing for the good of others. True patriots are made in the home, not in the public school; and through the development of right principles of conduct rather than by being drilled in patriotic phrases. It is the life of the true patriot that counts, and not the death. It is living for country, rather than dying for it, that makes patriotism worth to any country what it is.

Catholic Civilization.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

THE Roman Catholic divines have long boasted, and still boast incessantly, of the divinity of their origin; which they say has been proved time and again by the way in which their "apostles" have "converted" and "regenerated" whole pagan nations, in a remarkably short space of time.

They ridicule the Protestant missionaries because they are unable to effect such "miracles" as they profess themselves able to perform; and hold up to scorn some frail efforts made on the part of some prominent Protestant missionaries. They relate with jubilation how "the zealous Wesley went on a mission to convert the savages of Georgia, but returned without making one proselyte." Also how "his companion Whitefield afterwards went to the same country, on the same errand, but returned without any greater success." Speaking of the missionaries who went out to the Friendly Islands in the "Duff," they with evident joy show how "seven of them had not in the course of six years, baptized a single Islander." Also, "in the Bengal government, extending over from thirty to forty millions of people (year 1802, A. D.), with all its influence and encouragement, not more than eighty converts have been made by the Protestant missionaries in seven years."—End of Religious Controversy, page 213.

We might greatly extend this list, but this will clearly demonstrate how the Catholic church regards with secret joy any apparent failure of Protestant missionaries in foreign lands. It is however our intention to reveal the fallacy of the papist claims, by showing the shallowness of the "miraculous" "conversions," brought about through the instrumentality of Roman Catholic missionaries.

The pope of Rome regards the republics of Hispano-America as model Christian countries, since the majority of the inhabitants of the same are literally slaves to the erroneous doctrines of the papacy. But what is the state of things in the republics of Bolivia, Peru, Guatemala, Ecuador, and Colombia? There the Catholic church has despotically and solely ruled, unmolested by any Protestant "intruders" for centuries. Now if these are the "model" Catholic nations of the world, one would naturally expect therein a "model" people; but alas, this hope proves to belong to the ignis fatuus class, which, though it appears so resplendent in the distance, upon approximating, vanishes away, and disappears from our view.

Have you ever traveled in the above-mentioned republics? No? Then you know but little of the results of the introduction of Catholic "Christianity." There the woman, although nominally free, is nothing less than the slave of vile degraded man. There you find at least ninety per cent. of the population who can neither read nor write, growing up, generation after generation, learning the mysteries of the papish education; viz: counting the rosary, etc. There you find at least sixty-five per cent. of the inhabitants are illegitimate offspring. There eighty per cent. of the men are known to keep concubines, independent of their own legitimate wives. There the Bible is prohibited, and interdicted, and woe to him who should purchase that Book of books, without first having obtained the sacerdotal sanction. There, no such thing as toleration is known, and all who essay to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, must do so at the risk of losing their lives. There murder is almost countenanced by the judicial authorities, since the murderer is only condemned to one of three sentences; viz: (1) To be imprisoned for two or three years; (2) to serve in the police force for five years; or (3) to join the army on the frontier to prevent Indian incursions.

The above are undeniable facts which cannot be refuted by impartial travelers who have visited any of these countries, The Argentine Republic, Brazil, Uruguay, Chile, and Mexico, were formerly in as bad a condition, but a few years back they began to throw off the papal yoke that so heavily oppressed them; and as a natural consequence they have—more especially the Argentinian, Chilian, and Uruguan republics—made rapid strides up the path of progress, and the generation is well equipped with educational advantages. But this step was not taken, even in these more advanced nations, until the pioneer Protestant missionaries had advocated the importance of a good education; and then, putting theory into practice, they inaugurated schools throughout the length and breadth of these realms. And about the same time, God in his mercy, raised up men of capacity, like Sarmiento, former Argentine minister to the United States and afterwards president of that republic, who seeking the welfare of their people, brought into existence the present excellent educational system, the ramifications of which are found throughout the above-named nations.

Now if the republics first named are counted "model" Catholic countries, we might with reason be permitted to ask, In what are they models? If the blind obedience of a people to corrupt priests constitute a model nation, from a papist standpoint, then Rome may well boast of the northern republics of the South American continent; but if, as we have been taught to believe from childhood up, virtue, morality, and justice is the garb of a model nation, then instead of boasting of her "miraculous conversions," she should bitterly weep, and repent, as she gazes upon the withering effects of the baneful religion she has everywhere introduced among them.

How has she held the power here so long? Simply by the liberal use of the only weapon she knows how to ably manipulate; viz: force, in the shape of religious laws, papal bulls, interdictions, maledictions, excommunications, intimidations, and persecutions. True Protestantism seeks to emancipate the fanatical classes, by declaring the sublime teaching of its divine Author, that "the truth" can make "free indeed;" and points the people from man to our Saviour and Creator. But Romanism strives to enslave the conscience, to deprive man of his individuality, and make him a mere automatic machine, with no right to think for himself; therefore it is no marvel that such a system depraves instead of uplifts; corrupts but never ennoble the person who books a passage in its ecclesiastical barque.

Let not the false statements of Rome put us off our guard, nor let the glittering gilt which she places upon her base metal, deceive us into thinking that the same is pure gold; but let us judge of what the papacy would be by what it was in the past. It is true as the refrain says that "history repeats itself;" and soon we may expect to be spectators of bloody scenes: Soon the curtain will be drawn back, and we shall behold the last act in this world's drama; soon the "mystery of iniquity" will appear denuded of her hypocritical disguise; soon, aye soon, within the last pages of earth's history will be inscribed in crimson letters, which can never be obliterated, crimes, atrocities, persecutions, and martyrdoms, such as ear hath never heard. Thus will Rome prove the veracity of her vaunted statement, that she never changes. In the meantime, let us be found watching and praying, so that we may stand firm at the post of duty when the hour of tribulation makes its appearance at our door.

Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Some American "Reconcentrados."

"New York Journal," July 23.

In the anthracite regions of Pennsylvania women and children are starving because sturdy, industrious men, mured to the hardships of mining and ready to brave its perils, can find no work. Gaunt misery is afoot in every mining town. The wolf is at every door. There life at its best offers to little children nothing but stunting toil in debasing associations, to women naught but squalid poverty and that aching fear of the future which makes motherhood a burden instead of a joy, and to men such a denial of opportunity for advancement that every high aspiration is stilled, and such a daily round of worry that the pleasures which brutalize and stupefy are the ones that most appeal to natures which may justly envy the brute.

Such is the situation in the anthracite regions. Such it long has been, and newspapers of every varying shade of political belief and social honesty have described it and denounced it. In the midst of a nation which went to war to relieve the sufferings of the reconcentrados, exists and long has existed a condition of destitution and wholesale starvation hardly outdone by Weyer. This is matter of common notoriety. . . .

This execrable and un-American situation is the outcome of corporate greed, and corporate greed is about to make it more unbearable still. Day before yesterday the presidents of the anthracite coal lines met in a New York office and agreed to raise the prices of coal to the consumer and lessen the amount of work for the miners. Hitherto the miners have had the fruits of two days' labor a week on which to support their families. Now they are to have but one day's work, on which to starve. Who profits by this remorseless economy at the pit's mouth? Not the consumer of coal, for the very men who cut down the miners' pay put up the price of the product.

How long shall the inhuman conditions which surround coal mining in Pennsylvania be permitted? How long shall a trust, fortified by its control of railroads, be allowed to rob consumers of hard coal and slowly murder its producers and those dependent upon them?

A GLIMPSE at the conditions prevailing in the provinces of Cuba outside of Santiago, which is now under American control, is furnished by the following appeal which has been addressed to Rear-Admiral Sampson by citizens of Cienfuegos:—

"Honorable Sir: The Cubans, old men, women, and children, resident in the town of Cienfuegos and this neighborhood, are all dying of hunger. The young men are all in the field with the Cuban troops and have not shoes, neither food. All the provisions in this town are in the hands of the Spaniards. Cubans cannot obtain a piece of bread, as it is necessary to send everything to the field. The Weyer's system is in his way. The situation is terrible.

"If you, honorable sir, do not come quick with your squadron in our help and take possession of this town, we shall be lost. We beg you to precipitate your operations. About five thousand old men, women, and children shall die of hunger in this poor town. Some of these old men have four or five sons fighting for his freedom. This is our horrible situation.

"If the great people of the United States do not come quick in our help we are lost.

"SOME CUBANS."

Thus far death has no doubt brought more relief to the starving people than have the forces of the Americans.

THE latest census of Hawaii gives the number and classes of the inhabitants as follows: "Of pure Hawaiians, there were 31,019; of part Hawaiian blood, 8,045; of Japanese, 24,407; of Chinese, 21,616; of Portuguese, 15,191; leaving 8,302 Americans and Europeans." The 8,300 Americans and Europeans, of course, are "the people," especially the Americans.

GRACE draws; law drives. Grace loves; law constrains. Grace inspires to the rendering of a willing service; law extorts an unwilling service. The only acceptable service a free moral agent can render to God is the service inspired by grace.—Religious Telescope.

Double Sight in a Chicken Yard.

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

WELL, Hanner, I've been in the chicken yard,
 A seein' some double sights.
 It's putty middlin kinder hard
 For the weak ones to get their rights.
 Old chanticleer of the blooded stock
 Showed nary a courteous feather.
 He scratched for himself, and not for the flock,
 And the strong ones huddled together.
 The weak and the old and the little blows
 Were kicked and pecked and scattered.
 If I hadn't a owned them all, I s'pose
 I wouldn't a thought it mattered.
 But suddenly I felt full of wrath,
 And I made it understood;
 Fur I cleared them big fellers out of the path,
 And gave all the other ones food.
 I took a rake from the top of the fence,
 And kept 'em all at a distance,
 And gave 'em a chance to have a sense
 Of a stronger one's resistance.
 I gave 'em a lecture on chickens' rights,
 And the danger in greed and rulin'
 And Hanner I saw some double sights
 That was most as good as a skewlin'.
 Fur it 'peared the world was a chicken yard,
 And the weak gave way to the stronger;
 But a Watcher saw how his plan was marred,
 And waited a little longer.
 And it 'peared I heard a whispered sound,
 And saw a double sight;
 Fur I heerd that the Owner of men all round,
 Will suddenly set things right.

Studies in French History.—32.

"WELL, what had I promised you to-day?" asked Professor Carman, taking his place at his desk.

"You were going to tell us something about Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, I believe," said Milly Brown.

"Yes; it seems that he must have been a very fiery-tempered, hot-headed fellow, or he never would have attempted to carry out so many warlike schemes."

"I presume he was a little vain of his good looks and fine proportion. Don't you think that helped to make him ambitious for a higher place of honor?" asked Julia March.

"Perhaps so; pride and ambition go hand in hand almost always. But at last he made up his mind to let Louis XI. alone; so he turned his quarrelsome eyes over to Switzerland."

"What! did he pick a quarrel with those honest Swiss people just for the fun of quarreling?" asked Will Pal-meter.

"No, not just for that, I suppose; but he was ambitious and he wanted fame as well as riches,—and he got it,—but not the fame of a proud victor. The Swiss fought for their honor and their country, and they were victorious. Charles was driven back at the famous battle of Granson, at which place he lost not only many men, but a vast amount of wealth."

"Why, I can't see what he wanted to take much wealth with him for, if he was going to fight. What good did he think that would do him?" asked practical Jack Smith.

"He wanted to impress the poor peasants with his grandeur; so he took large quantities of solid silver plate with him, besides a very valuable crown, which was completely covered with precious gems."

"O, the foolish man!" said Florence Ray. "Just imagine George Washington loading down his boat with gold and silver when he crossed the Delaware and took so many Hessian prisoners!"

"Or imagine Dewey attacking the Spaniards at the Philippines with his big ships full of gold and silver, and crowns and pretty things, instead of cannon!" exclaimed Rob Billings.

"Yes; and I have not yet told you of the most foolish, senseless part of his cargo;—just think of it! He took with him to the bloody fields of battle a great array of costly cloth,—pieces of luxurious velvets, and hundreds of yards of elegant silks, besides yards and yards of cloth of gold, which together formed an array of magnificence and luxury almost priceless."

"Why!" exclaimed Joe Palmeter. "It was in pretty nearly as bad taste as it was for those kings of France who went to fight the crusades to drag along with them a lot of feeble women and crying children."

"Surely; you are right. Who can give me the name of any French king who did that thing?" asked Professor Carman.

"I think Louis VI. is one of the first who allowed women to go to war," timidly suggested Milly Brown. "Father was speaking of it this morning."

"Yes; this was in the twelfth century.

"Charles the Bold was not very sensible, you see, or he would have known better than to trust such valuables so far away from home. Nowadays if a fine lady wears a quantity of diamonds to a grand party, she hires a detective to keep watch near her all the time, but although Charles was just as foolish he was not as wise

HELPS TO THE STUDY OF THE BOOK : OF : GENESIS.

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 13—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall, and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 4, 1898.

FAITH does not point us to a relic, but to a risen, living, all-powerful Saviour.

THERE is a recoil to every deed that we perform, which is of the same nature as the deed.

JUST as the SENTINEL is going to press we receive word that two arrests have been made in Tennessee for "Sabbath Desecration." Full particulars in our next issue.

THE United States forces seem now to have fairly met their real enemy in Cuba—yellow fever; and the outlook is not reassuring. To brave the deadly climate requires as much courage on the part of these devoted troops as to brave the Spanish bullets.

A CAPTAIN of a French trans Atlantic steamship recently took his vessel about one hundred miles north of his regular course, to gain time, with the result that he gained so much time for most of those on board that they reached the further end of their life journey at a single bound. There is never any time gained profitably by going out of the course of duty.

THE "Church of the Saviour" is to be "consecrated" in Jerusalem shortly, in the presence of Emperor William, of Germany, who will make a sort of pilgrimage there for the purpose. But while the eyes of earthly sovereigns are being more and more drawn to the earthly Jerusalem, those who are "pilgrims and strangers" here keep their faces turned toward the Jerusalem above.

THERE appears to be a movement on foot among the republics of South America, having in view their common defense against possible Anglo-

Saxon encroachment. It is evident that they look with suspicion upon the turn which the United States has taken in conducting her war with Spain, and this no doubt is not in any wise allayed by the rumors of an Anglo-Saxon alliance.

THE Haverhill Gazette (Haverhill, Mass.) of July 21, reports "a unique civil case" which was tried the previous day in the city court. The defendant conducted an eating saloon and fruit store, in which he was tenant, and the plaintiff sought to secure his ejection from the premises on the ground that he had been doing business on Sunday. Thus the Sunday laws continue to be invoked.

THERE is nothing that individuals part with more reluctantly than with a thing of such little worth as an opinion; their own opinion, of course. When Peter said to his Lord, "Lo, we have left all and followed thee," he was still holding fast, as events showed, to his own opinion about the kingdom of God; and the other disciples were doing the same. If men would hold as fast to the Word of God as they do to their opinions, their moral footing would be vastly more stable than it is.

WHAT to do with the Philippines, is now the question that is causing most perplexity to Uncle Sam. The natives having been led to believe they would secure independence, are ready to fight the United States forces if the latter seek to impose a different condition. Spain cannot hold them, and the earth-hungry Powers of Europe would only quarrel among themselves over the prize if left to them. Altogether, the situation is very interesting, and one need not be surprised at surprising developments.

THE religious papers have been calling attention to the prominence of the religious element in the navy of which all the country is so proud. Admiral Sampson, it is said, is a member of the Church of the Covenant, in Washington. Admiral Dewey is a member of the Episcopal Church. Commodore Watson is Elder Watson in St. John's Church, San Francisco. Captain Philip's denominational connection is not given, but from his speech made at the sinking of Cervera's ships, it is evident he is a devout communicant somewhere. Lieutenant Hobson was president of a Y. M. C. A. in his native State. And it may be remarked in passing that the able fighters who battle without firearms in this country are mostly members in good and regularly standing in the Roman Catholic communion. We fear there is much in all this to justify the saying made by the irreverent that it takes religion to make a good fighter.

ROME has refused to permit a parliament of religions in connection with the World's Fair at Paris in 1900. At Chicago, in 1893, she participated in the parliament of religions as actively as did any of the other bodies.

The difference is that in America Rome did not rule, being in the minority, and hence participated in the parliament as a guest; while in Catholic France the parliament would be under Catholic auspices. And this Rome will not permit; because in a parliament of religions all religions stand on an equal footing; and Rome will not for a moment recognize any other religious body in the world on terms of equality. She alone is the Christian church, and all other bodies are heretics. This is the plain meaning of her refusal to allow a religious parliament at Paris. Instead of this there will be, it is said, a "parliament of religious science."

ARE you doing all you can to get the SENTINEL into the hands of the public? How many subscriptions have you sent in this year? Are there not some in your vicinity that ought to be reading the SENTINEL? Won't you see to it that their names are placed on our list?

NUMBER 31.

HOW THE SUNDAY LAW AIMS TO GIVE LIBERTY TO THE WORKINGMAN.

It is a warm Sunday morning, and the workingman, with his family, are taking what comfort they can within the confines of their own premises. They would like to go outside to some place of recreation, but a strict Sunday-law régime has been put in force, which has suppressed all Sunday trains and prohibited all "worldly" amusements on the "Sabbath" day. Entrance to the public pleasure grounds is barred, and the policeman stands ready to resist any attempted violation of the law; while the clergyman stands by and suggests to the workingman that there is one pathway open to him—that leading to church. He has no business, says the clergyman, to want to go anywhere else on Sunday. But the workingman does not care to go to church, because, as he says, there is so much preaching of political and war issues, and so little of the gospel.

It may be said that worldly recreations are not yet prohibited on Sunday, but it is at this that the agitators for Sunday enforcement aim, for they no more approve of Sunday amusements than of Sunday work; and there is no logical stopping place for the law this side of it.

If God drew people towards himself by the chains of law instead of the "cords of love," everybody would be trying to get away from him.

THE more religion there is embodied in legislation, the more people will there be who despise religion; for no person wants religion forced upon him.

THERE is in the human heart a natural love of freedom, a natural aversion to arbitrary restraint.

A tired laborer, let us suppose, comes to his room and lies down upon his couch to rest. Leave him at liberty to lie there or get up as he chooses, and he will remain quiet in the enjoyment of refreshing rest; but strap him to the couch, and though he is in no pain he will do his utmost to get up from the couch at once.

The American Sentinel is published in the interests of religious liberty—Christian and Constitutional.

Any one receiving the American Sentinel without having ordered it may know that it is sent to him by some friend. Therefore those who have not ordered the Sentinel need have no fears that they will be asked to pay for it.

This illustrates the difference between real rest and that "rest" which is forced upon people by law. The law makes a man rest by refusing to let him work. It binds him so that he can do nothing else, just as the man strapped to his couch could do nothing else but lie on it. But is there any real rest in that? Experience answers, No. The uppermost feeling is not that of rest, but of restraint.

Let it be optional with an individual either to rest or work, and he will rest if he feels like doing so; but forbid him to work, merely to make him rest, and instinctively he will feel a desire to work. We are not supposing the case of an invalid, but of a man in ordinary health.

The Sabbath comes each week to bring man rest; but Sabbath rest does not mean a condition of enforced idleness. The Bible Sabbath is "the Sabbath [or rest] of the Lord," and is therefore spiritual; and being spiritual, it can be enjoyed only by the spiritual mind. So plainly is this true that it is recognized even by some zealous workers for Sunday enforcement. They have said, Take religion out of the Sabbath, and you take the rest out. And they still affirm this to be true.

The Sabbath rest, then, must be voluntary, both because religion must be voluntary, and because there is no rest in restraint. Hence all "Sabbath laws" upon human statute books are but sources of evil.

God Rules.

THE following words, sound, and good, and true, are an extract from a sermon by W. L. Pickard, Cleveland, Ohio, taken from the Baptist Reflector. May there be many thousands of such speakers:—

"I believe that the living God rules in the historic march of the ages. He was present to bless the 'Declaration of Independence.' I think he was guiding the intellect that thought out and framed the Constitution of these United States. But I hope that we, as a people, will never put God in the Constitution by congressional enactment. Why not? you ask. Because I believe in the everlasting separation of church and state. And whatever is put in the Constitution by legislative enactment may become the subject of further legislation. Then in the far-off years, or perhaps not so far off, some dominant influence in the name of religion might define the God who is in the Constitution and decree the form of worship to be rendered him. Then would come again the awful struggle between church and state—the struggle between conscience, freedom and legal tyranny. Putting God in the Constitution of the United States will not put him in the hearts and consciences of the people. Christians are not made by legislative enactments of parliaments and congresses, but by the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit."

"Poor Spain! Poor Filipinos!"

THE following "Pastoral" of "The Most Excellent and Most Illustrious Archbishop of Manila," was addressed to the people of the Philippines after Dewey had smashed things there on May Day. We copy it from a Hong-Kong paper of May 19, 1898:—

"My Dear Sons: The dark day broke when the North American squadron entered swiftly into our brilliant bay, and despite the heroism of our sailors destroyed our ships, and succeeded in hoisting up the flag of the enemy on the blessed soil of our country. Don't forget that in their anger they intend with all their pride and vanity to crush our rights under their feet. It is a stranger who tries to subject us to his hard yoke. He is a heretic who tries to bring down our religion and drag us from the holy family of our Catholic Church. He is an insatiable merchant who tries to make his fortune out of the ruin of Spain and of her possessions.

"Poor Spain, if these invaders succeed in their unholy intentions! Poor Filipinos, the day on which these North Americans establish their government on your soil! Poor Indians, subjected by a country which has not the Catholic faith of Spain, nor the maternal love, nor her high nobility, nor the community of interest and history which Spain has had with the Philippines during the last three centuries, nor the infusion of blood which a good many of you carry in your veins in this country, and which has been shed for the common defense in a good many great hazards. Tied with fraternal ties, sons of the metropolis and the colonies, very soon you will see an insuperable wall put between you and your haughty masters.

"For you there will be no more public offices, nor employment in particular in the government and administration of the country such as you had during the government of Spain. You will soon be formed into a sort of civil republic, at the low level of the pariahs, exploited like miserable colonists, reduced to the condition of slaves, even of beasts or machines, fed with a handful of rice or maize which they will throw in your faces as your daily rations in order that they may take advantage of the products of your labor. They will soon become the masters of the fruits and treasures of your estates, which are yours by right, and cannot belong to another. But that is not all, nor the worst! Your temples will soon be in ruins, your chapels will be converted into Protestant churches, where there will not be the throne of God, the God of the Eucharist, nor the holy image of the Virgin Mary, your sweetest Mother. The cross of your cemeteries will disappear, the crucifix of your schools will be soon gone, the dear ministers of God who have made you Christians and baptized you, and have absolved you so many times from your sins, and who have always tied you with the tie of holy matrimony, and who have administered consolation to you during your troubles and assisted you in your last moments and applied after death the suffrages of the Holy Church—these will soon disappear.

"You will, perhaps, with heroic faith and valor, retain in your heart the Catholic faith as before and be more firm. Who knows? But what will become of your children, your most delicate sons and daughters, more especially after their parents have gone, and their lot has been cast amongst a Protestant nation, strange legislation, the culture, education and customs of Protestants and in full view of the propaganda of all their vices and errors. Ah, who knows by the time this century has elapsed there won't be any of those religious practices in Christian faith in this country, nor will there be any men who will even know how to make the sign of the cross of salvation on their breasts.

"Poor Filipinos! unfortunate in this life and unfortunate in the life eternal. Fortunately, dear Philippine people, the roars of the cannon of the enemy and the cries of alarms which they have raised have awakened you to the sense of danger in which you are at present. As one man we know you are preparing yourselves to defend your country, and as carrying one harp raised to the heavens are your most urgent wishes for success. That is the only resource to salvation. You must all have recourse to arms and prayer at once. To arms, because the Spanish population, though extenuated and wounded in its patriotism, when defending its religion is capable of attempting the greatest hazards; to prayer, because victory is always given by God to those who have been tyrannized, but have justice on their side. But not only the prayer nor the fight; the military forces and the virtue of God joined together; God will send his angels and his saints with us, and he will fight with so much force on our side with us.

"But in order to make our prayer more in harmony and more efficacious we must have the prayer of the whole general public. To us the holy inspiration has come to dedicate the whole Philippine Archipelago to the Holy Heart of Jesus, and offer him when we see we are free from these tribulations some exceptional act of devotion which will be performed on the coming 17th of June if it is possible, and if it is not possible on that day at some other more opportune time. And besides this private consecration, on the first Friday of the previous month, in order to show the God by the Holy Mesa dedicated to the holy body of Jesus Christ we are not alone working in our name or in the name of the prelates of other dioceses, we will be assisted by the governor general, who is as firm a Christian as he is a prudent patriot and military chief, in order to offer to God triumph through the medium of Spain. And thus we shall interpret the wishes of the mass of the population of these islands, who are so devoted in their religious faith, and invoke the intercession of the patron saints of this country and principally the queen of all the virgins, the holy rosary in the sincerest hope of absolution from sin this consecration and offer to God, we give you our holy children our best benediction in the name of the Father, etc.

[Then follows the special prayer and instructions to parish priests.]

"For the salvation of the volunteers who have taken up arms against the Americans every battalion of volunteers shall be provided with a special chaplain, who will have full faculties of administration of the spiritual offices of the church. Full power will also be granted these chaplains to hold public services in military camps, and they are also to be authorized to grant absolution from sin."

Charles Dickens on Sunday Legislation.

From "Sunday Under Three Heads," by Chas. Dickens. Published by Peter Eckler Co., New York City.

[THE following from the pen of the great English author is part of a communication addressed to the Bishop of London, in June, 1836, upon the occasion of a Parliamentary bill providing for strict Sunday legislation, which was defeated in the House of Commons by only thirty-two votes. Dickens here depicts Sunday as it would be made by the operation of proposed "Sabbath" laws.]

The provisions of the bill introduced into the House of Commons by Sir Andrew Agnew, and thrown out by that house on the motion for the second reading, on the 18th of May in the present year, by a majority of 32, may very fairly be taken as a test of the length to which the fanatics, of which the honorable Baronet is the distinguished leader, are prepared to go. No test can be fairer; because while on the one hand this measure may be supposed to exhibit all that improvement which mature reflection and long deliberation may have suggested, so on the other it may very reasonably be inferred, that if it be quite as severe in its provisions, and to the full as partial in its operation, as those which have preceded it, and experienced a similar fate, the disease under which the honorable Baronet and his friends labor, is perfectly hopeless, and beyond the reach of cure.

The proposed enactments of the bill are briefly these: All work is prohibited on the Lord's day, under heavy penalties, increasing with every repetition of the offense. There are penalties for keeping shops open—penalties for drunkenness—penalties for keeping open houses of entertainment—penalties for being present at any public meeting or assembly—penalties for letting carriages, and penalties for hiring them—penalties for traveling in steamboats, and penalties for taking passengers—penalties on vessels commencing their voyage on Sunday—penalties on the owners of cattle who suffer them to be driven on the Lord's day—penalties on constables who refuse to act, and penalties for resisting them when they do. In addition to these trifles, the constables are invested with arbitrary, vexatious, and most extensive powers; and all this in a bill which sets out with a hypocritical and canting declaration that "nothing is more acceptable to God than the true and sincere worship of him according to his holy will, and that it is the bounden duty of Parliament to promote the observance of the Lord's day, by protecting every class of society against being required to sacrifice their comfort, health, religious privileges, and conscience, for the convenience, enjoyment, or supposed advantage of any other class on the Lord's day!" The idea of making a man truly moral through the ministry of constables, and sincerely religious under the influence of penalties, is worthy of the mind which could form such a mass of monstrous absurdity as this bill is composed of.

The House of Commons threw the measure out certainly, and by so doing retrieved the disgrace—so far as it could be retrieved—of placing among the printed papers of Parliament, such an egregious specimen of legislative folly; but there was a degree of delicacy and forbearance about the debate that took place, which I can not help thinking as unnecessary and uncalled for, as it is unusual in Parliamentary discussions. If it had been the first time of Sir Andrew Agnew's attempting to palm such a measure upon the country, we might well understand, and duly appreciate, the delicate and compassionate feeling due to the supposed weakness and imbecility of the man, which prevented his proposition being exposed in its true colors, and induced this Hon. Member to bear testimony to his excellent motives, and that Noble Lord to regret that he could not—although he had tried to do so—adopt any portion of the bill. But when these attempts have been repeated, again and again; when Sir Andrew Agnew has renewed them session after session, and when it has become palpably evident to the whole House that it really becomes high time to speak of him and his legislation, as they appear to deserve, without that gloss of politeness, which is all very well in an ordinary case, but rather out of place when the liberties and comforts of a whole people are at stake.

His impudence of proof in every trial,
Kens no polite, and heeds no plain denial—

In the first place, it is by no means the worst characteristic of this bill, that it is a bill of blunders: it is, from beginning to end, a piece of deliberate cruelty, and crafty injustice. If the rich composed the whole population of this country, not a single comfort of one single man would be affected by it. It is directed exclusively, and without the exception of a solitary instance, against the amusements and recreations of the poor. This was the bait held out by the Hon. Baronet to a body of men, who cannot be supposed to have any very strong sympathies in common with the poor, because they cannot understand their sufferings or their struggles. This is the bait, which will in time prevail, unless public attention is awakened, and public feeling exerted, to prevent it.

Take the very first clause, the provision that no man shall be allowed to work on Sunday—"That no person, upon the Lord's day, shall do, or hire, or employ any person to do any manner of labor, or any work of his or her ordinary calling." What class of persons does this affect? The rich man? No. Menial servants, both male and female, are specially exempted from the operation of the bill. "Menial servants" are among the poor people. The bill has no regard for them. The Baronet's dinner must be cooked on Sunday, the Bishop's horses must be groomed, and the Peer's carriage must be driven. So the menial servants are put utterly beyond the pale of grace;—unless, indeed, they are to go to heaven through the sanctity of their masters, and possibly they might think even that rather an uncertain passport.

There is a penalty for keeping open houses of entertainment. Now, suppose the bill had passed, and that half a dozen adventurous licensed victuallers relying upon the excitement of public feeling on the subject, and the consequent difficulty of conviction (this is by no means an improbable supposition), had determined to keep their houses and gardens open, through the whole Sunday afternoon, in defiance of the law. Every act of hiring or working, every act of buying or selling, or delivering, or causing anything to be bought or sold, is specifically made a separate offense—mark the effect. A party, a man and his wife and children, enter a tea-garden, and the informer stations himself in the next box, from whence he can see and hear everything that passes.

"Waiter?" says the father.

"Yes, sir."

"Pint of the best ale."

"Yes, sir."

Away runs the waiter to the bar, and gets the ale from the landlord. Out comes the informer's notebook—penalty on the father for hiring, on the waiter for delivering, and on the landlord for selling, on the Lord's day. But it does not stop here. The waiter delivers the ale, and darts off, little suspecting the penalties in store for him.

"Hallo!" cries the father. "Waiter!"

"Yes, sir."

"Just get this little boy a biscuit, will you?"

"Yes, sir."

Off runs the waiter again, and down goes another case of hiring, another case of delivering, and another case of selling; and so it would go on ad infinitum, the sum and substance of the matter being, that every time a man or woman cried "Waiter!" on Sunday, he or she would be fined not less than forty shillings, nor more than a hundred; and every time a waiter replied, "Yes, sir," he and his master would be fined in the same amount: with an addition of a new sort of window duty on the landlord, to wit, a tax of twenty shillings an hour for every hour beyond the first one, during which he should have his shutters down on the Sabbath.

With one exception, there are perhaps no clauses in the whole bill, so strongly illustrative of its partial operation, and the intention of its framer, as those which relate to traveling on Sunday. Penalties of ten, twenty, and thirty pounds are mercilessly imposed upon coach proprietors who shall run their coaches on the Sabbath; one, two, and ten pounds upon those who hire, or let to hire, horses and carriages upon the Lord's day, but not one syllable about those who have no necessity to hire, because they have carriages and horses of their own; not one word of a penalty on liveried coachmen and footmen. The whole of the saintly venom is directed against the hired cabriolet, the humble fly, or the rumbling hackney coach, which enables a man of the poorer class to escape for a few hours from the smoke and dirt, in the midst of which he has been confined throughout the week; while the escutcheoned carriage and the dashing cab may whirl their wealthy owners to Sunday feasts and private oratorios, setting constables, informers, and penalties at defiance.

Again, in the description of the places of public resort which it is rendered criminal to attend on Sunday, there are no words comprising a very fashionable promenade. Public discussions, public debates, public lectures and speeches, are cautiously guarded against; for it is by their means that the people become enlightened enough, to deride the last efforts of bigotry and superstition. There is a stringent provision for punishing the poor man who spends an hour in a news-room, but there is nothing to prevent the rich one from lounging away the day in the Zoological Gardens.

There is, in four words, a mock proviso, which affects to forbid traveling "with any animal" on the Lord's day. This, however, is revoked, as relates to the rich man, by a subsequent provision. We have then a penalty of not less than fifty, nor more than one hundred pounds, upon any person participating in the control, or having the command of any vessel which shall commence her voyage on the Lord's day, should the wind prove favorable. The next time this bill is brought forward (which will no doubt be at an early period of the next session of Parliament) perhaps it will be better to amend this clause by declaring, that from and after the passing of the act, it shall be deemed unlawful for the wind to blow at all upon the Sabbath. It would remove a great deal of temptation from the owners and captains of vessels.

Diphtheria in "Holy Water."

"Medical Record."

PROFESSOR VINCENZI, of the University of Sassari (in Italy), has investigated the holy water from "one of the most popular churches" of that city, with the following results: A single drop taken a few hours after the water was renewed and spread upon gelatin yielded in forty-eight hours about 2,350 bacterial colonies. This drop was taken on a Saturday evening, when the water had been little used. The next evening, after numerous and crowded services, each drop of the water tested yielded innumerable colonies. Four cases of diphtheria were notified at Sassari while these investigations were proceeding, and it being the custom there for persons to touch their lips as well as other parts with holy water, the possibility of infection is obvious. The bacillus coli, though possibly directly introduced, was, according to Professor Vincenzi, probably present in the church dust, which, he remarks, was copious.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

WORK for the children, as we have seen, led to the homes in which they lived, and this to many discoveries that aroused the hearts of our women, as women had never been aroused before.

It is perfectly safe to say that it was because of the ignorance of women concerning the conditions which had been at work in human affairs, that so many evils had been able to grow up and entrench themselves in law and custom, and from these strongholds command business, politics, and religion all over the world.

Among the new surprises that continually awaited us was the widespread evil of child labor, and its horrible abuse of everything sacred to the young, the innocent and helpless. No sooner was this condition discovered than we began to make efforts to abolish it. We had by experience learned that abolition was a slow process, and while we had to wait for that, we kept ourselves busy with efforts at amelioration.

It seemed to us that we could not afford to stop short of the destruction of the system; that while we were dallying with palliations, the race of boys and girls must become extinct, or only be preserved among the rich and well-to-do. The power of life as it was manifested in a frail child who had to earn the living for a whole family, was beyond all comprehension, and can find no solution outside of the fact that God is in it, and that "He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things," and yet so keeps his hand on it, that while "no man hath power over the Spirit to retain the Spirit," neither has he power to discharge any from this war of life. It was the grip of the Eternal God on the delicate machinery of the half starved body that kept it going long after every reasonable conclusion would be that it ought to stop and lie down in the grave to rest.

I have before me in Scribner's Magazine for this month an article by W. A. Wykoff, which I wish every Seventh-day Adventist, at least, might read; but feeling sure that but few of them will see it, and since it gives an up-to-date view of the conditions which bore so heavily upon our hearts, I beg leave to quote at length from it an account of a visit to a Chicago "sweatshop." I have many times attempted to picture these things in public addresses, and have been distressed to see how little many good people, who know so much about God and truth know about those who are in such terrible need of deliverance. I now quote this, however, because of the bearing which it has upon a certain department of the National W. C. T. U. about which more than ordinary interest clusters in these days.

Mr. Wykoff says: "As we neared the door there was the usual sound of the clattering rush of sewing-machines going at high speed—starting and stopping abruptly, at uneven intervals and giving you the impression, in the meantime, of racing furiously with one another.

"The open door revealed the customary sight of a room perhaps twenty feet square, with daylight entering faintly through two unwashed windows, which looked out upon the level of the street. The dampness showed itself in dew-like beads along the walls and on the ceiling which I could easily reach as I stood erect. In spite of it being winter, the dingy walls were dotted with black flies, which swarmed most about a cooking stove, over which, stirring a steaming pot, stood a ragged, disheveled woman, who looked as though she never could have known any but extreme old age. In the remaining floor space were crowded a dozen machines or more, over which, in the thick, unventilated atmosphere, were the bending figures of the workers. Oil lamps lit up the inner recesses of the room and seemed to lend consistency to the heavy air. From an eye here and there which caught his in a single movement, the Unionist received a look of recognition, but not a head was turned to see who had entered, and the whirr of feverish work went on unchecked for an instant by our coming.

"While the Unionist was talking to the sweater, I walked behind the close line of machines over a floor covered with deep accumulations of dirt and shreds of cloth and broken threads, to where, in a corner, a group of girls were sewing. The oldest among them may have been twelve and the youngest could have been a little over eight, and their wages averaged about 75 cents a week for hours that varied widely according to the stress of work.

"Near the corner was a passage and through it I could see into a small room which had no window nor any opening but the door; there, in perpetual darkness lit up by one oil lamp, was a man who, for twelve (and sometimes fifteen) hours a day, pressed the new-made clothing for a living. . . .

"We were on the point of leaving when a heavy foot fall sounded on the wooden steps and the door opened to the touch of an inspecting officer, whose glowing health and neat, warm uniform were as though a prosperous breeze were sweeping the stagnant room. The work, however, was as unaffected by his coming as it had been by ours. Not a sewer noticed him, and the stitching of machines went racing on with unabated swiftness. Only "the old man" watched nervously the movements of the officer as he walked about the shop making note of the bad air and the filth upon the floors and the group of little girls, and the dark, unventilated chamber beyond." . . .

"Look here," I could hear him say, "You've got to clean up here, and right away. The first thing you know you'll start a fever that will sweep the city before we can stop it."

"The young Hebrew had stopped his work and turned half round in his chair until he faced the officer. There were deep lines in his haggard, beardless face, and his wolfish eyes were ablaze with the sense of sharp injustice.

"You tell us we've got to clean up," he answered in broken English, lifting his voice to a shout above the clatter of the machines. "What time have we to keep clean when it's all we can do to get bread? Don't talk to us about disease; it's bread we're after, bread!" And there sounded in the voice of the boy the cry of the hungry for food, which no man who hears can ever forget.

"The officer passed, speechless, up the steps, and we followed into the clean, pure air, under the boundless blue of smiling skies."

What Is the Everlasting Gospel?—No. 8.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

IN our last article it was shown that the law of God, the gospel of Christ, and Christ himself, are each spoken of in the Scriptures as being "the truth;" and that consequently any thing that is opposed to any one of the three must be opposed to all. Of the law it was also pointed out that it could not be "the truth" only as each one of the commandments comprising that law was truth. Now to change this law in any way would certainly be to change the truth. But to change truth in any way would be to change it into a lie.

In further considering this question it might be well to enquire: In the plan of salvation which phase of "the truth"—the law, the gospel or Christ—has priority of claim? While they are essentially one, they are spoken of as being separate and distinct, and especially is it so regarding the law and the gospel. And it is only as they are thus presented in the Word that we would ask the question:—Which has priority of claim in the plan of salvation?

That which has made the gospel necessary is sin. The gospel is intended to save men from sin. But what is sin? The primary meaning of the word is "a missing the mark." What mark has one missed by sinning? We learn this from the general definition the Bible gives of the word "sin." Here is what is said of it: 1 John 3:4: "Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law; for sin is the transgression of the law." The same truth is expressed thus: "By the law is the knowledge of sin." "Where there is no law there is no transgression." "Sin is not imputed when there is no law." See Rom. 3:20;

4:15; 5:12. These scriptures (a few of the many that might be quoted) shew wherein man has missed the mark; he has come short of that which is set forth in the law.

Now as the gospel is the means ordained of God to save man from sin—from missing the mark—it must be manifest that it is only another way of saying that the gospel is the God-ordained means of lifting man up to the level of that law, so that he will be in harmony with all that the law requires. Now which is the truth—must the law conform to the gospel? or must the gospel conform to the law? The answer is obvious; the gospel must conform to the law, which is in effect to say that the law has priority of claim. But the law is “the truth.” Any gospel therefore that affects to make a change in the law of God, does not simply seek to make the law conform to it, but in the very nature of things is an enemy of the law, and cannot therefore be the truth. Such a gospel would in itself be sin, and the only effect it could have would be to confirm man in his sin, and if possible make him more than ever an enemy of God.

Again let it be repeated. The law is “the truth.” Now whence came this law? Jesus Christ is “the truth.” Every manifestation of truth therefore is from him; hence the law is from Jesus Christ. Of him it is said, “He cannot deny himself;” also that he is “the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.”

This is not simply spoken of Christ at the time he was here on the earth and subsequently, but previous to his advent in the flesh also. This being so, it must be that Christ's relation to the law, so far as he himself is concerned, while on the earth must be the same as before he came. But that is not all. As the Saviour of men, made in the likeness of sinful flesh (Rom. 8:3), and becoming our example (1 Peter 2:20), he must himself be subject to that law. Hence it is seen that in the plan of salvation the law is superior. It was therefore utterly impossible for Christ to teach anything contrary to the law. Had he done so he would not have been “the truth.”

In view of these things how is it possible for Sunday to be the Sabbath? It is no part of the law other than that it is included in the expression, “Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work;” which proves it to be a common working day.

For Sunday ever to be the Sabbath the seventh day must be displaced; but this could not be done but by annulling the Sabbath commandment. As we have seen that the truth contained in the fourth commandment is necessary for the law, as a whole, to be the truth, to annul this commandment would simply cause the law to cease to be “the truth.”

The fourth commandment states a fact concerning the creation. It tells that in six days God created the heaven and the earth, the sea and all that in them is. Having accomplished this, we are told, he rested the seventh day, wherefore he “blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it.”

From the commandment itself we find that the seventh day is inseparably connected with, and finds its source in, the creation. And because of this the seventh day could no more be destroyed than could creation itself.

God does nothing arbitrarily; there was no exception in the matter of the seventh day. God instituted it, because for the good of his creatures he saw it was necessary. Man's safety ever depended upon his remembering his Creator, and so long as man remembered “the Sabbath day to keep it holy”—from week to week, so long would it be impossible for him ever to forget the God who made him.

Furthermore, the Sabbath day is God's rest day. The only day that could possibly be his rest day is the day upon which he rested. But God never rested upon Sunday. To say that he did is to say that which is not true. Therefore it is utterly impossible for Sunday to be the Sabbath. To substitute the first day for the seventh day, is to change the law; and the law being “the truth” it would be changing the truth into a lie.

In the very nature of things then Sunday is in opposition to the law which is the truth; and that being so, it is in opposition to the gospel and to Jesus Christ.

This is all true; and as surely as this is true so surely is it true that this nation is to be so manipulated that its power is to be directed against the gospel, and therefore against Jesus Christ, by compelling the people to accept and keep Sunday in opposition to the fourth commandment.

AN ounce of prevention is not worth a pound of cure to the one who is sick; and the gospel is the only cure for sin sickness.

Strange “Supplies” for the Army.

Not long ago this statement appeared in the Cincinnati Evening Post: “The quartermaster of the commissary department on Third Street, Friday, gave Father Pustat's Catholic Supply House the contract for making 5,000 rosaries for the army.” Amazing as this statement is, it may well be credited in view of the strong tendency in this nation, attested by indisputable facts, toward union of church and state.

If, as is asserted upon high legal authority, “this is a Christian nation,” it is the proper business of the nation to observe all Christian practices; and if rosaries are necessary to any such observance, it is the duty of the nation to provide them. The Catholic Church says that they are necessary, and Roman Catholic “Christianity” has as good claim to be called the religion of the nation as has any other. Providing the army with rosaries is a proceeding that comes in naturally enough behind the “Christian nation” decision of the Supreme Court.

It is reported that the military authorities in Washington have determined to institute the unusual proceeding of forming a board of inquiry to find out who is really entitled to the credit of sinking the Spanish fleet at Santiago. Ordinarily, there is no occasion in naval combats for any question as to the rightful claimant of the glory; but it appears that in this instance there are a number of parties who are willing to take all the credit for the victory that the public can be persuaded to give them. In fact, each one of the ships engaged is reported as being, in the minds of the captain and crew, mainly responsible for sending Cervera's fleet to the bottom; while Rear-Admiral Sampson, who was not present at the engagement, reports that the victory was won by the "ships under my command," in pursuance of orders left in anticipation of such a move as was made by the Spanish fleet. The Board of Inquiry will sift the contending claims, and if possible ascertain which one of the candidates for superior honors is not making a bigger claim than is justified by the facts. These facts do not seem to reflect very favorably upon the reputed Christianity of the parties concerned.

CAPTAIN PHILIP, of the battleship "Texas," who said that the combatant who begins a fight on Sunday always gets defeated, is reported as defending his statement by the assertion that at Manila, the first shot was fired by the Spanish admiral, and not by Commodore Dewey. But what was the Spanish admiral, under such circumstances, to do? His ships were at anchor in the bay, as a good Sunday-observing fleet should have been, and the American fleet was bearing down upon him under full sail, and only waiting to get within range before sending a broadside against him from their loaded guns. Commodore Dewey had given word to Captain Gridley, of the "Olympia," "You may fire, Gridley, when you are ready." Was he waiting for the Spanish admiral to fire the first shot? These points only need be mentioned to demonstrate that the responsibility for that Sunday battle lay wholly with the victorious Dewey.

NOR does it appear that the captain of the "Texas" was himself under any necessity of fighting on the Sunday when the Spanish fleet came out of Santiago harbor; for the Spanish were only bent on escape, and the American ships might have allowed them to do so without themselves suffering any harm. That, to be sure, would have called for a court-martial by the military authorities; but if battles are to be fought with due regard to the supposed will of God for the observance of Sunday, that will and not the will of the naval board or other human authority, must, in case of conflict, be regarded. In this case the captain must assume that he was justified in fighting on Sunday merely to prevent the enemy's escape.

THE late "bread riots"—so-called—in Italy, had, it appears, a deep significance. They were, it is said, nothing less than an effort of the clerical party to produce a revolution, inaugurate a republic, and by it reestablish the temporal sovereignty of the pope. A German paper of Leipsic states that the Italian government holds the Catholic Church responsible for the disturbances, and that the relation between church and state will be even more strained than it has been for some years past. Thus the pretended vicar of the "Prince of Peace" appears in the character of a disturber of the peace, a promoter of discord and revolution; for the action of the clerical party stands for the action of the pope.

The Tennessee Arrests.

AS MENTIONED in our last issue, two recent arrests for Sunday desecration have been made in eastern Tennessee. In reply to a letter of inquiry, we have received a letter giving details of the affair, as follows:—

"In Briceville, Anderson County, is situated the Knoxville Iron Company's coal mine, where hundreds of men find employment. Here a number of men are at work every Sunday; and up to July 25, no case is on record of any person being molested for so doing. But when Messrs. Bates and Cash, young men, who about a year ago commenced the observance of the Sabbath of the Lord, went to work Sunday, July 24, the judge (who had on a number of instances openly violated the same law for which he issued a warrant for their arrest), saw Mr. Bates and Mr. Cash going into the coal mine, or going toward it rather, in their bank garb, and on the strength of that, and a little encouragement by the way of intimidation from a few of his Baptist(?) associates, he was led to issue a warrant for their arrest.

"In the complaint the judge swore without any qualification whatever, that those two men worked in his presence, when, in fact, if they worked at all, it was not less than two thousand feet back under the mountain; and his house is, at least, three hundred yards from the entry of the mine. Yet he swore the work was performed in his 'presence.' And the main witness—a Mr. Russell, who appeared for the prosecution, had, on that day, worked hard in full view of the 'squire's' house and in a direct line too toward where Bates and Cash were seen to enter the mine, or were supposed to have entered.

"The charge brought against them was that of 'breaking the Sabbath' contrary to the dignity of the State.

"A lawyer, Mr. Wood, kindly volunteered his service to defend the accused, although the judge had approached him previous to the trial asking him to prosecute the cases, which he politely declined, saying he did 'not want to be mixed up in a piece of dirty spite work.'

"The judge called the boys up and without trial or motion fined them three dollars and costs, to which Mr. Wood objected, stating that they had not been convicted yet of a misdemeanor, and waived the examination to the circuit court, to which the judge objected, refusing them the right of appeal. He also absolutely refused to accept a certified bond for their appearance at the next term of court.

"They refused to pay the fine and the judge issued a mittimus for their confinement, whereupon Mr. Wood notified his honor, that if that was his ultimatum, he, Mr. Wood, would prosecute him, the judge, for denying them that which the law accorded to any and all defendants. So after a few hours' consideration the judge permitted them to give bond, which they did at once, and now are free until the first Monday in September next.

"We hope to quash the thing at the Grand Jury sitting. We have friends but many times they are afraid to stand against a popular tide.

"The boys are of good courage and exercise good judgment in the matter.

"We might add that not less than thirty men were at work within a mile of the Judge's door that same day, and nothing was said to them.

"We will keep you posted as to the matter.

"GRANT ADKINS."

A "Military" Sunday.

"Signs of the Times," July 28.

THE Christian Work has the following suggestive note:—

"Still another special Sunday—a temperance Sunday—has been set aside by the General Assembly. With fifty-one special Sundays, we shall still have one Sunday left for the stated preaching of the Word. We hope it will be a clear, bright, radiant Sunday, where the blue of the sky and emerald of the grass greet each other in ecstatic joy."

Why not make that Sunday a special day for patriotic services? Do not our Sunday friends know that all the telling events of the war thus far have occurred on Sunday? May 1, Sunday, Commodore Dewey won his victory at Manila; July 3, Sunday, Commodore Schley won his victory at the mouth of Santiago harbor; July 10, Sunday, the joint bombardment of Santiago by army and navy began; on July 17, Sunday, Santiago surrendered to General Shafter; and on the same date, Sunday, the Cabinet met and laid their plans for the invasion and capture of Porto Rico. Surely, why not have in the "church calendar" a military Sunday? Providence does not seem to be against the Sunday fighting of Americans. Why should there not be a military Sunday set apart for a memorial of these victories? The idea is absurd, of course, but not more absurd than many other things in this military-religious-political régime which so many enthusiastic "reformers" are endeavoring to have the country adopt.

What the Chinese Think of Us.

KNOWING fairly well what the average "civilized" American thinks of the ways of the "heathen Chinese," it may be interesting to take the latter's standpoint for a moment, and see what he thinks of the ways of the "barbarian" American. In his own eyes, each one is the representative of civilization, and the other of barbarism; and the candid mind will probably be ready to admit that the views of the Chinaman are not without some force of common sense.

The remarks for our enlightenment on this point are the following furnished by a Chinaman living near Shanghai, and published in the Frankfurter Zeitung, Frankfurt, Germany:—

"We are always told that the countries of the foreign devils are grand and rich, but that cannot be true, else what do they all come here for? It is here they grow rich. But you cannot civilize them; they are beyond redemption. They will live weeks and months without touching a mouthful of rice, but they eat the flesh of bullocks and sheep in enormous quantities. That is why they smell so badly; they smell like sheep themselves. Every day they take a bath to rid themselves of their disagreeable odors but they do not succeed. Nor do they eat their meat cooked in small pieces. It is carried into the room in large chunks, often half raw, and then they cut and slash and tear it apart. They eat with knives and prongs; it makes a civilized being perfectly nervous. One fancies himself in the presence of sword swallows.

"The opium poison, which they have brought us, they do not use themselves. But they take enormous quantities of weskichu and shang ping-chu [whiskey and champagne]. The latter is very good. They know what is good, the rascals. It is because they eat and drink so much that they never rest. A sensible, civilized person does nothing without due consideration; but the barbarians hurry with everything. Their anger, however, is only a fire of straw; if you wait long enough they get tired of being angry. I worked for two of them. The one we used to call the 'Crazy Flea' because he was always jumping about; the other we named the 'Wooden Gun,' because he never went off, though he was always at full cock.

"They certainly do not know how to amuse themselves. You never see them enjoy themselves by sitting quietly upon their ancestor's grave. They jump around and kick balls as if they were paid to do it. Again, you will find them making long tramps into the country; but that is probably a religious duty, for when they tramp they wave sticks in the air, nobody knows why. They have no sense of dignity, for they may be found walking with women. They even sit down at the same table with women, and the latter are served first. Yet the women are to be pitied, too. On festive occasions they are compelled to appear almost naked before every man who likes to look at them, and then they are dragged around a room to the accompaniment of the most hellish music."

Observations.

BY CHAS. L. MANNING.

THE wretched temporal, mental and moral condition of the populace of Spain and her colonies, which have for centuries been united with the Roman Catholic Church, is incontrovertible proof that that religion does not elevate.

WHEN the pope said, "What the papacy has done for other countries, it will do for the United States," he unwittingly presented the best possible argument against the papacy and its supremacy in this country.

THE principles of the United States Constitution or those of common honesty are of no consideration and are brushed aside when they stand in the way of those who are devoted to the self-imposed work of "national holiness" by law.

IF the church had sufficient faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and should say unto the mountain of Infidelity, "Be thou removed," it would be removed.

THE Sunday "Sabbatarians" content themselves with asserting that "Jesus changed the Sabbath day," but offer no Scriptural proof to support the assertion. The Lord is unchangeable—"the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."

WITH religious fidelity the Sunday schools gather regularly on the first day of the week, and repeat in unison the commandment which says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God."

GOD says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord:" the church people claim the first day is the "Christian Sabbath." Jesus Christ, the founder of Christianity and "Lord of the Sabbath," kept the seventh day "according to the commandment," that the "law might be fulfilled." The Christianity that insists upon keeping holy a day not commanded by the "Lord of the Sabbath," must be a different brand of Christianity from that instituted by Christ, for it makes him a liar, by denying his teachings.

THE Roman Catholics deny that they worship idols but say that instead, they worship the object which the image symbolizes. They, however, fail to explain why it would not be just as easy to worship the object in the first place without the aid of the images as beads. A religious principle which requires that something be fashioned by the hands of man to keep him reminded of the object of his worship, certainly cannot have much power of spirituality inherent within itself.

"THIS is the condemnation, that light is come into the world," . . . "and the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehendeth it not."

"EQUAL rights to all"—there is no broader liberty under heaven than this.

"WAR is hell," and it is hard to comprehend why the churches have any part in the fray, outside of relieving the distress of the combatants.

A Word for Our Illustrations.

EDITOR SENTINEL: The cut on the front page of the SENTINEL for July 28, is very striking, and preaches a telling sermon.

One thing I notice is that the clergyman who is using the civil law whip to force people on to the narrow road is himself down in the broad road. Of course, seeking to drive them, he could not very well be anywhere else. In that case it appears to me that he is as bad off as those in whose midst he is. If they are in the wrong place—and undoubtedly they are—then so must he be.

No one—not even a clergyman—can be on both roads at one and the same time. Only those who are worldlings, whatever their profession may be, are ever on the broad road. And the fact that anyone is there, even though they are trying to drive others off, is proof that they are still of the world. If it is wrong for the others to be there, it is just as wrong for the clergyman, and if the means that he is using for their conversion(?) is necessary, why would not the same be necessary for himself? And in that case why does he not lash himself before he lashes the others?

The truth is, the place where the minister ought to be (and the minister of Jesus Christ will always be found there) is in the narrow way. There he would not be driving people; he just couldn't. All he could do would be to stand with outstretched arms, pleading with the worldling below to come up into the heavenly places, and show that the only means by which they could be transferred from the one place to the other is by faith, not law—not even by divine law.

Jesus says, "Follow me," "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come." Let all ministers do likewise, and not try to drive. It is to be hoped that all such ministers who are urging the civil law method of conversion will see themselves in the picture, and learn that they too are certainly in the wrong place.

Studies in French History.—33.

"EVEN though the Swiss warriors had been eminently successful in their battles with the duke, Charles of Burgundy, still he imagined there was fame and glory for him yet, on the field of battle," began Professor Carman, "and so he picked a senseless quarrel with his neighbor, the good Duke of Lorraine."

"I don't see any division of Lorraine on the map. Will you please point it out, professor?" asked Max Smith.

"You will find it in the northeastern part of France,—there it is,—having Germany for its nearest neighbor. In old geographies you will see that Alsace-Lorraine is a part of France, but since the late war between Germany and France, you will notice a change on the maps, and Lorraine is cut into two parts, apportioning one division to Germany, which division includes the important city of Strasburg.

"As I was saying, the quarrelsome Duke Charles met the army of the Duke of Lorraine at Nancy, a city which you will find near the center of the division of Lorraine, and a fierce battle ensued, in which the Duke of Burgundy was killed and his army badly beaten. The body of the unfortunate duke was found only after a long search, in a marsh, where he had fallen on his face and, as the weather was cold, the water had frozen all around his head; the features were terribly torn and mangled while cutting him from the ice."

"I don't see but he perished just like any ordinary man, in spite of his money," remarked Julia March.

"Money is not without value in life," answered the teacher, but how valueless it becomes at death.

"The generous Duke of Lorraine gave his enemy an honorable burial, having him clothed in black velvet, and even placing a crown upon his head."

"I should not think King Louis would have allowed that proceeding," said Rob Billings. He didn't think any too much of the bold Duke, if my memory serves me, and I can't see why he should allow a crown to be put upon his head, even if he were dead. I didn't suppose any one but kings and queens ever wore crowns."

"But you see, Robert," smiled the teacher, "this kind of crown was not like a king's; it was a ducal crown, such as dukes wore; so you can see why Louis allowed the honor to be done to his old enemy. Then, he was so glad to be well rid of him, I don't suppose he cared how much honor was paid to a dead hero."

"King Louis could rest in peace now, couldn't he, seeing the duke was dead?" said Joe Palmeter.

"O, no; he had more enemies than you could well count. The constable of France, Count of St. Poe, was another of them. Louis had often expressed a desire for the count's head—though he said he had no wish for his body,—and at last his desire was realized, and the luckless fellow fell a victim to the envy and caprice of his sovereign."

"I am wondering if the kings of France and England were upon friendly terms at this time," said Charlie White.

"No, Charlie; King Edward the Fourth and Louis the Eleventh were far from being chums, though finally they met and arranged as peaceable terms as they could, under the circumstances."

"Why, what were the circumstances?" asked Will Barnaby.

"Well, if two men, who wish to have a talk and become reconciled have not enough confidence in each other to meet face to face, without fear of treachery and murder, it doesn't speak very well for all the terms of peace which they agree upon, does it? These two great kings met upon a bridge, and they were so afraid of each other that Louis had caused to be built a solid wall of plank, between the two, and they finally met and talked through a tiny lattice window."

"I presume they remembered the fate of John the Fearless," said Edna Phillips. "You know he was treacherously killed while saluting the Dauphin Charles, afterward Charles VII, and as this happened upon a bridge, I suppose they meant to be safe."

"Yes; and it seems that Edward at least was not sincere; for he soon prepared to invade France, just as placidly as if he had not arranged terms of peace with Louis. But he was prevented from carrying out his ideas by the grim peace maker—death. And as though it were not to be that the poor superstitious king was to have any comfort of his life, his brain became weak, and he forthwith shut himself up in a dark, gloomy castle, imagining that someone, or rather everyone, was plotting to kill him."

"I don't wonder very much, seeing this had been his own business all his life," commented Julia March.

"No; you will remember there is a verse of scripture which, in speaking of the wicked, says, 'His violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate,' and such seemed to have been the case here, for although he finally died a natural death, yet he was in such a horror of fear for months before, that his life did him no good."

"Did his friends visit him in the gloomy castle?" asked Milly Brau.

"No, unless he sent for them,—not even his own children,—he was afraid of everybody. His sentinels were commanded to shoot anyone who came near the gloomy old castle. He had in fact only three friends,— and miserable friends were they,—whom he kept near him,—his barber, his doctor, and strangest of all, his hangman. This latter dignitary had his hands full most of the time, as the numerous gibbets about the grounds bore ghastly witness."

"I should think he could have had no comfort from any of the three unless from the doctor," said Harry Ray, with a shudder.

"He got not a whit of comfort from him, poor fellow, for he made the king believe that he would only survive him—the doctor—three days. This silly story which the scheming doctor had hired an astrologer to tell the superstitious king, was fully believed by him. So this of course insured a good time to the doctor, who was at all times free from danger of treachery from the king, besides extorting much money from him.

"Next week we will learn something of the sad circumstances of the death of Louis XI."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Satan's Lie About the Soul.

"MAMA," said Charlie, "we read that when Christ comes with his holy angels, he will raise the righteous dead, that those who are alive and remain will be caught up by the angels to live in heaven, and to reign with him a thousand years. Why is this necessary? I always thought that as soon as people die their souls go straight to heaven. Does Jesus bring their souls back at the resurrection to put them again into the body, or how is it?"

"I will ask you some questions," said Mrs. Ross. "What did God tell Adam and Eve about eating of the forbidden tree?"

"He said, 'In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die,'" said Charlie.

"The margin says, 'dying thou shalt die,'" added Mrs. Ross.

"Well, but mama, what does it mean, that the body dies? The soul, you know, cannot die."

"What does God say about that, Charlie? Please read Eze. 18:4."

"Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine; the soul that sinneth, it shall die.' Does the New Testament say that too, mama?"

"Yes. Jesus himself warns us to 'fear Him who hath power to destroy both soul and body in hell.' One of our hymns recognizes God's power to destroy as well as create; it says,—

'Before Jehovah's awful throne,
Ye nations bow with sacred joy;
Know that the Lord is God alone;
He can create, and he destroy.'

"Let us reason a little, Charlie, so that you may see how this links into the principles we have been studying. What is the result or wages of sin?"

"Death," said Charlie.

"How did sin originate?"

"By doubting that God was Love."

"In whom do we have life?"

"In God, in Christ. 'In him was life, and the life was the light of men,'" quoted Charlie.

"How could that life that was in him benefit his creatures?"

"By partaking of it."

"But if the wages of sin is death, mama, and Adam sinned, how is it that the human race has been perpetuated generation after generation?"

"Through the unmerited mercy of God. When Adam sinned, a plan was devised in heaven to give the human race a chance to return to allegiance to God. The brief span of life granted to every human soul has been purchased for him by the cross. 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' The days that we use so carelessly have been blood-bought, and furnish us with probation in which we may make sure our calling and election for eternal life. But how do we partake of eternal life?"

"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life," said Charlie. "It is by faith."

"Paul says, 'our life is hid with Christ in God,' and that 'when Christ who is our life shall appear then shall ye also appear with him in glory.'"

"Then if faith in God as a God of love secures for us eternal life, what is the result of doubt?"

"Death."

"That life comes to us by faith has many illustrations in the Word of God. The woman who touched the hem of Christ's garment received life, and Jesus perceived that virtue had gone out of him. He said to her, 'Daughter, be of good comfort, thy faith hath saved thee.'"

"And yet, mama, Christians die. Does the text we read about—'the soul that sinneth it shall die,' apply to those who have faith as well as to those who don't?"

"The death of the righteous is always pictured as a sleep. You know, Charlie, that when we sleep, we are unconscious; we do not note the passing of time. Paul says, 'Those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him,' and argues that if Christ had not been raised from the dead, then those who sleep in him would be perished. Solomon says, 'The dead know not anything.' David says, 'His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish.' 'He giveth his beloved sleep.'"

"But how is that having eternal life? It looks to me as if there was an interruption."

"You forget that Christ has the life laid up in him. The names of the candidates for that eternal life are written in the Lamb's Book of Life, and when he shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory."

"Then are there none of the human race in heaven to-day?"

"O yes. Elijah was translated to heaven without seeing death. Moses was resurrected. When Christ rose from the dead many of the saints rose too, and Paul tells us that when he ascended on high he led a multitude of captives with him. But the great mass of his children are sleeping in the grave, and when he comes he will wake them out of sleep. We which are alive and remain will be changed in a moment into immortal beings, while those who come up from the grave will be raised immortal, incorruptible."

"Well, that seems consistent. It always seemed as though there would be a great distance between those who had lived in heaven for centuries, and the latest comers. It seems to me Enoch, Elijah, Moses, and that multitude will be ahead of all the others. But, mama, how is it that we have thought that we did not die, but that our souls went to heaven?"

"Satan started the doctrine when he said, 'Thou shalt not surely die;' and out of it has grown the 'beast' and his 'image.'"

"How, mama?"

"Self-exaltation is the very foundation of all the inhumanity that has caused man to mourn. And it is out of the idea that man is immortal in himself that systems of pride and torture have originated. The Hindoos teach that the soul goes through millions of years of transmigration before it is fit for heaven. The car of Juggernaut, the throwing of babies in the Ganges, the Chinese worship of the dead, the fires of purgatory, the tortures of the Inquisition, and the seeking to compel men to be righteous by law, all have their logical starting point in the falsehood of Satan, 'Thou shalt not surely die.'"

"Why, mama, how is the Inquisition in the doctrine?"

"As a means of saving an undying soul from eternal torture, St. Augustine, one of the old Catholic fathers, said, 'That it was better to persuade men to become Christians that their souls might be saved; but if they would not be persuaded, it was better to compel them even by the employment of torture, so that if they lost this life in a brief torture, they might not spend eternity in the tortures of hell.'"

"But, mama, didn't he know that men were to be saved by faith in God's love, and that no amount of torture would make men believe?"

"I'm afraid he did not know God at all. His theory, rooted in Satan's falsehood, encouraged men in torturing the body, that by so doing they might save the soul. This is the outcome of righteousness by law instead of by faith, and all of this satanic scheme is wrapped up in the doctrine that man has an undying soul, that lives on independent of God's love and life."

TIME has detracted nothing from the power of God unto salvation, embodied in the gospel.

OUR SPLENDID OFFER.

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

This Bible is bound in Tampico Morocco, Divinity Circuit, Leather Lined to Edge, Round Corners, Red under Gold Edges, Silk Headband, Silk Marker. It has large, clear type (see specimen, page 449), sixty-four illustrations, fifteen splendid Clear Maps, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of proper names and foreign words with their meaning, etc.

But the most unique and important feature of this Bible is the "COMBINATION." This consists in the blending of both old and new versions in one volume without increasing the size. As to the merits of the Bible we offer, it is enough to say that a few of which we print. For brevity's sake, we omit the name and address of writers, but their letters are all on file in our office.

We have received numerous unsolicited words of praise,

WHAT OUR PATRONS SAY OF IT.

I received the Bible in good condition. I am very well pleased with it in every way. It is a first class Bible; just the kind I have wanted.

The Bible is a beauty. Everything that could be wished.

The Bible came safely, and is highly appreciated by the friends for whom I bought it.

My Bible received. I am very much pleased with it.

I have received my Bible, and to say I am well pleased would not convey my appreciation. I think it the best bargain ever offered. It is just what I have long wanted.

I have used my Bible nearly three months, have compared it with other higher priced Bibles, and can truthfully say that all that you claim for it is true, and do heartily recommend it to all who need a good Bible.

It is the best Bible I ever saw for the price.

I received your premium Bible, and we were surprised to get such a good grade of book. Many of my friends have examined it and pronounce it excellent.

I wish to thank you at once for the beautiful Bible which I received yesterday. It is far better than I expected.

I am very much pleased with it and like it better than any Bible I have ever had.

We are all more than pleased with the Bible. The type is a great delight.

I am delighted with the Bible. Don't know how you sell it so cheap.

The Bible is far beyond my expectation. It is a real beauty and I am more than pleased with it.

I am greatly pleased with the book, it being better than expected to get.

I received the Bible all right and am more than pleased with it. It is better than I expected. The print is very nice.

The Bible is just lovely. It is lots better than I thought it would be.

I have been using the Teachers' Combination Bible nearly two years. Am more pleased with it daily. The Revised Version feature is "just the thing," and if I were going to purchase a Bible tomorrow you may depend upon it, I would purchase the Teachers' Combination Bible.

Your kind favor accompanied by the Premium Bible was received a long time ago, and after having examined the Bible carefully, I must say that it is, with a minor exception, the finest thing I ever saw for the money. It is just the thing. I have been looking after for years. I never could understand why it was necessary to have two Bibles to do the work of one. But in this you have both versions at a glance. I say it is worth twice what you ask for it.

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 11, 1898.

CAN you not make good use of a few extra copies of this SENTINEL? Try it and see.

THE truly wise man will take no chances with the Lord. At the bar of eternal judgment those who have not taken God exactly at his word will feel ill at ease.

NOTHING that you see around you to-day is to last beyond a few years of time. The only enduring things are the "things invisible." They are the most truly substantial.

BISMARCK is dead, and one of the great figures of the century has passed into history. But the figures most worth noting are not those passing off the stage, but those that are silently but surely grasping the reins of power for the coming years. The world is too much given to looking backward.

DID you ever read what the great English author, Charles Dickens, said about Sunday laws? You will be interested in it, and so will your friends. Why not send them a few copies of this issue of the SENTINEL? We print a part of what Dickens said in this issue, and the remainder will follow next week.

READ the report on page 492 of the arrests for Sunday desecration in Tennessee; and as you read, ask yourself if real Christianity ever lends itself in support of a proceeding so unfair, and so full of personal vindictiveness. And it is the same story with one and all of such prosecutions, —they are prompted by another spirit than the spirit of Christ.

THE organ of the Prohibition League of Williamsport, Pa., heads the first article in its issue of July 15 with the words, "Don't swear! Fight!"

From a financial standpoint, this is good advice, at least for this locality; for profanity is punished by a fine, while fighting to kill is something that stamps one a hero. But from the Christian standpoint, it is to be observed that the same law which says, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," says also, "Thou shalt not kill."

WE note with pleasure a strong tendency on the part of Methodists, both north and south, to repudiate the action of the church representatives in the matter of the $288,000 claim collected from Congress by the Methodist Book Concern, of Nashville. We will be glad to give credit to any denomination for any move tending to repudiate the principle of union of church and state.

WHILE the war cloud is breaking over this hemisphere, it is looming up darkly over the Eastern world, where there is a serious clash between the rival interests of England and Russia. Should there be war between these great powers, the consequences would be vastly greater than those attending the conflict now happily concluded.

THE contact of two systems of government so opposite in character as those of the United States and Spain, is productive of curious incidents. One of these happened the other day in the island of Porto Rico, which is now coming under American rule. The Boston Herald, of August 2, makes this mention of it:—

"Chaplain Chidwick, of the 'Cincinnati,' formerly of the 'Maine,' introduced to General Wilson this morning two of the leading Jesuits of Ponce, representing a thousand churches and their dependents in this province. The priests wanted information regarding their support, and General Wilson said that under the Constitution of the United States it was not possible to apply any governmental money for church purposes. Father Chidwick said it would be all the better for the church if its own people learned to contribute to its support."

Perhaps General Wilson has not heard of the late $288,000 gift by Congress to the Methodist Church, or of other appropriations to the Catholic and other religious bodies in this country. But he stated the constitutional principle correctly.

THE religious demonstrations made on board the battleships before Santiago, in connection with the victory over the Spanish, having given rise to some invidious comparisons between the commanders, one of these, the captain of the "Iowa," has felt called upon to exonerate himself from the charge of an apparent lack of piety. He gives the following reason for not summoning his crew to a religious service of prayer and praise at the conclusion of the sanguinary engagement which destroyed the Spanish fleet:—

"I found my ship surrounded by boats carrying dying and wounded prisoners and others of the crew of the 'Vizcaya' to the number of 250. To leave these men to suffer for want of food and clothing while I called my men aft to offer prayers was not my idea of either Christianity or religion. I preferred to clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and succor the sick, and I am strongly of the opinion that God has not put a black mark against me on account of it."

Beyond question the captain of the "Iowa" is fully qualified religiously to command his ship.

UNDER the new law of Pennsylvania which makes it a felony to insult or degrade the American flag, the first violation, says the Philadelphia Inquirer, of August 3, was committed by the "faith healer," Francis Schlat-ter, who tore down and destroyed a flag at the Keystone Hotel, in that city; for which crime he narrowly escaped being mobbed. There is a great deal of healing being done these days that is associated with a spirit of hostility to American principles of free government, for which "old glory" stands. The true religion will never prompt an insult to the flag.

THE UNITED STATES AS A "CHRISTIAN NATION."

THE United States has been at war with Spain, and the American eagle has thoroughly demolished the Spanish flag. And strange as it may seem, this warlike bird claims to be a dove! The symbol of the United States Government claims to be the symbol of Christianity; in other words, the United States claims to be a Christian nation. It has been pronounced to be such by the Supreme Court, and the claim is maintained by statesmen and by the clergy; but can it be true? Manifestly not. The eagle is still an eagle, a warlike bird of prey, however often or loudly he may scream, "I am a dove."

CHRISTIAN character is not proved by profession, but by fruits.

CARNAL warfare is by nature unchristian. There can be no Christian method of conducting it.

THE devil is never so much a devil as when he appears the most unlike one.

WHEN the eagle can become a dove, then can the United States become a Christian nation.

IN every instance of religious legislation the devil argues to the world that God is a tyrant.

WHEN the State wraps about itself the mantle of religion, it becomes a wolf in sheep's clothing.

The United States and the "Monroe Doctrine."

THE effect which the victorious war with Spain, and the acquirement of colonial territory outside the western hemisphere, will have upon the long-established "Monroe doctrine," is one of the questions which now demands consideration by the people of this country, and of the world. The United States having set foot upon the confines of the Old World, with the intention of staying there, shall the powers of the Old World still be prohibited from setting foot upon the territory of the New? Or has the United States, by the conquest of foreign territory, abandoned the position it has maintained respecting the conquest of American territory by foreign powers?

It is not difficult to understand what view of the question will be taken by the powers of Europe. The United States has been saying to Europe, You keep on your side of the world, and I'll keep on mine. If not explicitly stated, the promise of the United States to refrain from any aggression upon Old World territory is so plainly implied in this doctrine, and so plainly necessary to give it a reasonable meaning, that there can be no question that it is an essential part of the doctrine, in the eyes of European powers at least.

Now, the United States has deliberately stepped over the line which it established by this doctrine, and notice has been served upon the powers of the Old World that the flag of this country is to remain flying where the fortunes of war have placed it. If Europe is given the like privilege of stepping over the line, the powers might be willing to accept the situation as offering a fair field to all parties. But—strange as it may seem—it is proposed here that Europe shall be denied the privilege which this country claims and has now exercised in acquiring foreign territory; it is proposed that the Monroe Doctrine shall be maintained against Europe just as strongly as ever. This is the sentiment of a portion at least—and it is to be feared a large portion—of the American people. It is boldly expressed in one of the most popular dailies of this city, thus:—

"The Monroe Doctrine stands more firmly to day than ever before.

"Why?

"Because we are better able to uphold it than ever before."

To this language, of course, there can be but one meaning, and that is that this nation will do as it pleases simply because it has the power to do so.

By this sentiment the Monroe Doctrine becomes reduced to a mere boast of power. The question of right is eliminated from it, and the one element of might remains. It becomes another repetition of the old assertion that "might makes right."

That Europe will acquiesce in any such arrangement is, of course, an unthinkable supposition. The powers will not be slow to insist upon their rights; and if this country, in the flush of victory and the dream of empire, shall advance to the bold position outlined in the above quotation, there will be plenty of need ere long for the great army and navy which is being called for as a proper outlay of the national resources. But peace and prosperity for the common people do not wait upon imperial ambition.

If the legislatures of earth could pronounce against sin with all the force of the thunders of Sinai, it would but drive the people, as those thunders did, further from the Lord.

An Unobscurable Fact.

It is a fact which Roman Catholic apologists would gladly have hidden from the light, that the pitiable condition of Spain to-day, as revealed in her impotent struggles to maintain her place in the family of nations, is due more than to anything else to the Roman Catholic religion.

For centuries the government of Spain has been in the closest alliance with the papacy. The papal religion has been the religion of all the Spanish people. No person not a Catholic could secure any office under the government, or hold any position of influence among the people. The State is Catholic, the army and navy are Catholic, the people of all classes are Catholic, and all this has been so for centuries. The papal religion has had a free field; it has been without one rival. These are facts which not even the most ardent Catholic can deny.

What, then, has the papal religion done for Spain? Has it done anything for them? Has it had no effect upon the people and upon the State through all the years of their faithful adherence to it?

If not, what force has it, and of what use has it been to its adherents? But no intelligent person can seriously assert that it has not had an effect, and a most powerful effect, upon the people who have so faithfully practiced it. In the very nature of things, such an assertion could not be true. It is impossible that a person should make any principles a part of his daily practice and experience, and the basis of his daily thought and hopes and aspirations, as is done in the practice of religion, without being profoundly affected by them. It cannot be otherwise than that these principles should be absorbed into his very being until they become a part of it, and mold his character into conformity with them. This is a law of nature, as immutable as the law of gravitation.

The Word of God declares, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." This declaration is true if God himself is true; and as certainly as it is true, and as certainly as it must be that the character is molded to the principles embodied in the thoughts and practices of the life, so certainly must it be that the principles of the papal religion, faithfully practiced through centuries by the Spanish people, have affected them, have molded their character, and have more than anything else made the Spanish nation what it is to-day.

This is the plain truth. It is asserted by the laws of nature and by observation; by reason and by revelation. And papal spokesmen cannot deny nor evade it.

And therefore the decadence and fall of Spain constitute incontestible proof of the worse than worthlessness of the papal religion. No papal apologist will ever be able to say, because it cannot be said, why that religion, if it is worth anything, has brought the Spanish nation where it is to-day.

A religion which will not mold the character is worthless, and therefore it must be admitted that the papal religion, if not impotent, does mold the character, and has molded the character of the Spanish people. They have been faithful to that religion, both in the church and the state; and therefore it has done all it can do for them, and what that is may be seen in the utter humiliation of Spain to-day.

The same story is told, only less fully, by the other faithful Catholic nations. Austria is to day a decaying and crumbling empire; and France—what prosperous nation envies her? Crushed to the ground with paralyzing swiftness in 1870, she has ever since showed signs of weakness rather than of strength. And the republics of Spanish America are emerging into the light of civil and intellectual freedom only as they are shaking off the long nightmare of priestly domination.

Who that is not wilfully blind can fail to recognize these facts? And why will people be blind to truths so palpable, and fail to be admonished by them to be vigilantly on their guard against the encroachments of Rome?

PROPER legislation restrains man only in that which is criminal.

THE best way to honor the flag is to live out the principles for which it stands.

The True and the False Principle of Government.

BY E. J. WAGGONER.

AFTER the death of King Solomon and the accession of Rehoboam, the people came to the new king and said: "Thy father made our yoke grievous: now therefore make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee." The king "consulted with the old men" and they gave wise counsel, saying, "If thou wilt be a servant unto this people this day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants for ever." Then the king "consulted with the young men that were grown up with him" and they recommended this reply: "My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins." The new king followed the counsel of the young men and threatened the people with heavier burdens than his father had imposed upon them.

The two replies well represent the difference between the principles of the kingdom of light and the kingdom of darkness. "If thou wilt be a servant unto this people," said the old men, and this was the principle upon which God in Jesus Christ deals with the rebellious world. "Behold my Servant whom I uphold." "I am among you as he that serveth." "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." Thus does he who is King of kings and Lord of lords relate himself to those whom he would win as his loyal subjects. In marked contrast with this is that arbitrary spirit which would seek to crush under an iron heel every one who should raise a voice against oppression. The one would win by self-sacrifice, the other would drive by an increase of arbitrary power.

But instead of being terrified into submission by the threats uttered, the people were driven into open revolt: "What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: to your tents, O Israel: now see to thine own house, David." When the tax-gatherer came among them, "all Israel stoned him with stones, that he died." "So Israel rebelled against the house of David unto this day." Thus by disunion and division was the way being prepared for the downfall of the nation and their captivity.

He who considers the situation among the nations of the earth to-day cannot fail to see the working of the same influences which brought disaster to Solomon's kingdom. There are nations where the people are groaning under the burden of debt and taxation, and yet their protests, not always wisely made (as in the recent riots in Italy), are met with a display of military power, and no hope is held out that the condition of affairs will be improved. The ruling powers have in many cases so far repudiated the principles of truth and righteousness that there is no sure foundation upon which to build any hope of future reform. The time is near when "all these things shall be dissolved," and the only hope of individuals will be that each one has built for himself upon the sure foundation, and "other foundation can no man lay that than is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

PROSPERITY and immunity from harm are not the only evidences of God's goodness to his creatures.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

A WORK so far reaching as that of the W. C. T. U. could not be carried on without touching many other organizations, and without more or less of affiliation with many that might or might not both help and hinder. As a Christian body we were necessarily allied to every church organization in the land. In fact it is expected that every cluster of religious denominations in the midst of which a local union is found, will have among its vice-presidents one woman from each, the especial duty of whom it shall be to look after the temperance work in that church. As a temperance organization, we of course, touch every temperance society in the world, and have affiliations more or less with them all, and are largely concerned in all the methods by which they are seeking to carry forward any temperance project, and every department is as a sort of hook by which we lay hold of some body of specialists in some philanthropic line, or which is appropriated by some such body, to hang something on, in which they think we ought to become interested and keep in mind.

The Sabbath department was soon seized upon as such a hook or peg. I do not use this expression in any way that can be considered offensive. I do not charge any with the effort to make use of the W. C. T. U. as a tool; but there were questions involved in this department that, as in some others, led into the legal world from which women were excluded. We could not crystalize our convictions into law, even when law was right, and when our convictions were needed in legislation; and naturally appealed to those who, as we honestly thought, could carry the work along to the point of successful issue by the power of the ballot.

In our evangelistic work by the use of the Word of God we endeavored to bring those who had the law-making-power to right convictions, and then left them to vote those convictions at the next election, the one right thing to do; but, to do which, requires an understanding of what the Word of God really teaches, for it is a serious thing to handle the Word of God to such an end without knowing just what one is doing.

Our women had seen the principle of prohibition all right, and always used it as opposed to license; that is, we denied the right of any body of legislators to make a law that would give any man the legal right to commit any wrong against his fellow-man; and as a rule those women, and men as well, who believe in the enforcement of Sunday laws, do so upon the supposition that every man absolutely needs one day in seven as a rest day, and that anything that infringes on that is a legitimate subject for the civil law. It is not for the protection of the Sabbath of the Lord, nor the "Lord's Day," but man's rest day, that the W. C. T. U. have asked the aid of the voting power of the nation.

And I am glad to say that with all my heart I believe that the men who have organized to secure these ends are honest in their efforts, believing just as I once did that Sunday is the Sabbath, and that every man has need of one day of rest in the seven, and also a right to a quiet rest day; these brethren are only working out their earnest convictions in trying to rescue Sunday from just as much of noise and unrest as is possible. Their activities, as well as those of the W. C. T. U. along this line are the result of a heroic faith that God will stand by the truth. Their mistake is in a failure to see the truth concerning the binding nature of the commandment to keep the especial day that God has named as well as hallowed; an error which can never be corrected by any argument of any description, but only by the illumination of the Holy Spirit of God; and those who hope to be used as a medium of illumination must at least be willing to recognize honesty and candor in the convictions of others.

The point upon which the W. C. T. U. especially needs to be enlightened is the inconsistency of their position as a professedly unsectarian body with a great department given wholly to the work of promulgating and enforcing a dogmatic section of a man made creed, in defiance of the protest of many of those who have been in the organization from the beginning, and have just as great an interest in its legitimate temperance, educational and rescue work, as any advocates of the Sabbath Observance Department can possibly have, and just as good a right to have their convictions regarded, as though they were not in the minority; for it is not supposed that among Christians a case involving principle is ever to be decided by a majority vote, but by that which is clearly right.

It is clearly right that the W. C. T. U. should be consistent with itself; and that it should either so change the Sabbath Observance Department as to entirely remove its sectarian features, or else change the policy of the organization so as to make it an avowedly Sunday-keeping body with Sunday-keeping as a test of membership as total abstinence now is. I do not believe this would ever be possible, and I do so firmly believe in the honesty of purpose, which is the inspiration of all the efforts put forth by both the men of the National Reform Association and my White Ribbon Sisters, that I must believe that sooner or later by the light of the Holy Spirit they will yet see these truths, and wonder as I now do, with reference to myself, how they could ever have been so blind.

Charles Dickens on Sunday Legislation.

From "Sunday Under Three Heads," by Chas. Dickens. Published by Peter Eckler Co., New York City.

(Concluded.)

THE reader is now in possession of the principal enacting clauses of Sir Andrew Agnew's bill, with the exception of one, for preventing the killing or taking of "fish or other wild animals," and the ordinary provisions which are inserted for form's sake in all acts of Parliament. I now beg his attention to the clauses of exemption.

They are two in number. The first exempts menial servants from any rest, and all poor men from any recreation; outlaws a milkman after nine o'clock in the morning, and makes eating-houses lawful for only two hours in the afternoon; permits a medical man to use his carriage on Sunday, and declares that a clergyman may either use his own, or hire one.

The second is artful, cunning, and designing; shielding the rich man from the possibility of being entrapped, and affecting at the same time, to have a tender and scrupulous regard for the interests of the whole community. It declares, "that nothing in this act contained, shall extend to works of piety, charity, or necessity."

What is meant by the word "necessity" in this clause? Simply this—that the rich man shall be at liberty to make use of all the splendid luxuries he has collected around him, on any day in the week, because habit and custom have rendered them "necessary" to his easy existence; but that the poor man who saves his money to provide some little pleasure for himself and family at lengthened intervals, shall not be permitted to enjoy it. It is not "necessary" to him—Heaven knows, he very often goes long enough without it. This is the plain English of the clause. The carriage and pair of horses, the coachman, the footman, the helper, and the groom, are "necessary" on Sundays, as on other days, to the bishop and the nobleman; but the hackney-coach, the hired gig, or the taxed cart, cannot possibly be "necessary" to the working-man on Sunday, for he has it not at other times. The sumptuous dinner and the rich wines, are "necessaries" to a great man in his own mansion; but the pint of beer and the plate of meat degrade the national character in an eating-house.

Such is the bill for promoting the true and sincere worship of God according to his holy will, and for protecting every class of society against being required to sacrifice their health and comfort on the Sabbath. Instances in which its operation would be as unjust, as it would be absurd, might be multiplied to an endless amount; but it is sufficient to place its leading provisions before the reader. In doing so, I have purposely abstained from drawing upon the imagination for possible cases; the provisions to which I have referred, stand in so many words upon the bill as printed by order of the House of Commons; and they can neither be disowned, nor explained away.

Let us suppose such a bill as this to have actually passed both branches of the legislature; to have received the royal assent; and to have come into operation. Imagine its effect in a great city like London.

Sunday comes and brings with it a day of general gloom and austerity. The man who has been toiling hard all the week, has been looking towards the Sabbath, not as to a day of rest from labor and healthy recreation, but as one of grievous tyranny and grinding oppression. The day which his Maker intended as a blessing, man has converted into a curse. Instead of being hailed by him as his period of relaxation, he finds it remarkable only as depriving him of every comfort and enjoyment. He has many children about him, all sent into the world at an early age, to struggle for a livelihood; one is kept in a warehouse all day, with an interval of rest too short to enable him to reach home, another walks four or five miles to his employment at the docks, a third earns a few shillings weekly, as an errand boy or office messenger; and the employment of the man himself detains him at some distance from his home from morning till night. Sunday is the only day on which they could all meet together and enjoy a home y meal in social comfort; and now they sit down to a cold and cheerless dinner: the pious guardians of the man's salvation having, in their regard for the welfare of his precious soul, shut up the bakers' shops. The fire blazes high in the kitchen chimney of these well-fed hypocrites, and the rich steams of the savory dinner scent the air. What care they to be told that this class of men have neither a place to cook in—nor means to bear the expense, if they had?

Look into your churches—diminished congregations and scanty attendance. People have grown sullen and obstinate, and are becoming disgusted with the faith which condemns them to such a day as this, once in every seven. And as you cannot make people religious by act of Parliament, or force them to church by constables, they display their feeling by staying away.

Turn into the streets, and mark the rigid gloom that reigns over everything around. The roads are empty, the fields are deserted, the houses of entertainment are closed. Groups of filthy and discontented looking men are idling about at the street corners, or sleeping in the sun; but there are no decently-dressed people of the poorer class passing to and fro. Where should they walk to? It would take them an hour, at least, to get into the fields, and when they reached them they could procure neither bit nor sup, without the informer and the penalty. Now and then a carriage rolls smoothly on, or a well-mounted horseman, followed by a liveried attendant, canters by; but with these exceptions, all is as melancholy and quiet, as if a pestilence had fallen on the city.

Bend your steps through the narrow and thickly-inhabited streets, and observe the sallow faces of the men and women who are lounging at the doors or lolling from the windows. Regard well the closeness of these crowded rooms and the noisome exhalations that rise from the drains and kennels; and then laud the triumph of religion and morality, which condemns people to drag their lives out in such stews as these, and makes it criminal for them to eat or drink in the fresh air or under the clear sky. Here and there, from some half-opened window, the loud shout of drunken revelry strikes upon the ear, and the noise of oaths and quarreling—the effect of the close and heated atmosphere—is heard on all sides. See how the men all rush to join the crowd that are making their way down the street, and how loud the execrations of the mob become as they draw nearer. They have assembled round a little knot of constables, who have seized the stock-in-trade, heinously exposed on Sunday, of some miserable walking stick seller, who follows, clamoring for his property. The dispute grows warmer and fiercer, until at last some of the more furious among the crowd, rush forward to restore the goods to their owner. A general conflict takes place; the sticks of the constables are exercised in all directions; fresh assistance is procured; and half a dozen of the assailants are conveyed to the station-house, struggling, bleeding, and cursing. The case is taken to the police-office on the following morning; and, after a frightful amount of perjury on both sides, the men are sent to prison for resisting the officers, their families to the workhouse to keep them from starving; and there they both remain for a month afterwards, glorious trophies of the sanctified enforcement of the Christian Sabbath. Add to such scenes as these, the profligacy, idleness, drunkenness, and vice, that will be committed to an extent which no man can foresee, on Monday, as an atonement for the restraint of the preceding day, and you have a very faint and imperfect picture of the religious effects of this Sunday legislation, supposing it could ever be forced upon the people.

But let those who advocate the cause of fanaticism, reflect well upon the probable issue of their endeavors. They may, by perseverance, succeed with Parliament. Let them ponder on the probability of succeeding with the people. You may deny the concession of a political question for a time, and a nation will bear it patiently. Strike home to the comforts of every man's fireside—tamper with every man's freedom and liberty—and one month, one week, may rouse a feeling abroad which a king would gladly yield his crown to quell, and a peer would resign his coronet to allay.

It is the custom to affect a deference for the motives of those who advocate these measures, and a respect for the feelings by which they are actuated. They do not deserve it. If they legislate in ignorance, they are criminal and dishonest; if they do so with their eyes open, they commit wilful injustice; in either case, they bring religion into contempt. But they do not legislate in ignorance. Public prints, and public men, have pointed out to them again and again the consequences of their proceedings. If they persist in thrusting themselves forward, let those consequences rest upon their own heads, and let them be content to stand upon their own merits.

It may be asked, what motives can actuate a man who has so little regard for the comfort of his fellow-beings, so little respect for their wants and necessities, and so distorted a notion of the beneficence of his Creator.

I reply, an envious, heartless, ill-conditioned dislike, to seeing those whom fortune has placed below him, cheerful and happy—an intolerant confidence in his own high worthiness before God, and a lofty impression of the demerits of others—pride, selfish pride, as inconsistent with the spirit of Christianity itself, as it is opposed to the example of its Founder upon earth.

To these may be added another class of men—the stern and gloomy enthusiasts, who would make earth a hell, and religion a torment: men who, having wasted the earlier part of their lives in dissipation and depravity, find themselves, when scarcely past its meridian, steeped to the neck in vice, and shunned like a loathsome disease. Abandoned by the world, having nothing to fall back upon, nothing to remember but time misspent, and energies misdirected, they turn their eyes and not their thoughts to Heaven, and delude themselves into the impious belief, that in denouncing the lightness of heart of which they cannot partake, and the rational pleasures from which they never derived enjoyment, they are more than remedying the sins of their old career, and—like the founders of monasteries and builders of churches, in ruder days—establishing a good set claim upon their Maker.

LOVE is never awakened by the lash.

Some Fruits of Papal Arbitration.

New York "Christian Advocate."

THE American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions comes forward to say that it does not meddle in public matters, and that at the present time it takes no part in discussions relating to territorial acquisitions by the United States in any part of the world. It proceeds, however, to state that for thirty-five years it prosecuted mission work in the Caroline Islands without the missionaries' seeing the slightest sign of any government except that of native chieftains. They were doing well, when in 1887 the Spaniards sent an armed force to Ponape, from Manila, with a governor to claim sovereignty, under the decision of the pope, as arbitrator, which confirmed Spain's claim to the Carolines. The Spanish governor brought fifty soldiers, twenty-five convicts, and six Roman Catholic priests. The board says that its missionaries were driven off, and the churches of the natives in most instances demolished; that the Bible had not been permitted to be landed, nor the missionary vessel, the "Morning Star," to stop there; and says that in view of the forcible intervention of Spain and the putting a stop to the work of these missionaries "the board deems it right to ask that whenever the status of these islands is determined, ample guarantee shall be required of whatever power shall hold sovereignty, that perfect religious toleration shall be enjoyed by the islanders. As to what nation shall hold that sovereignty we have nothing whatever to say." Many things besides this go to show that in this conflict the pope can never impartially fill the position of arbitrator between Spain and the United States.

What Is the Everlasting Gospel?—No. 9.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

A POINT to be noticed in the study of the everlasting gospel from Rev. 14:6, 7, is that all people are called upon to "worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters."

The full force of this gospel requirement will not be grasped unless it is remembered that this special gospel message, as given in the text, is to be proclaimed at the time when it is sought to enforce, by civil enactments, the worship of the beast and his image.

Another thing to be learned in this connection, and ever afterwards to be borne in mind, is that there is something else involved in the matter of worshipping the beast and his image.

It is true that "all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him [the beast, see context] whose names are not written in the Book of Life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Rev. 13:8. But it is equally true that in that thing there is somebody else who will be worshiped—inevitably too. This will be seen by reading verse 4 of the same chapter: "And they worshiped the dragon which gave power unto the beast; and they worshiped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?"

The dragon here mentioned is fully brought to view in the twelfth chapter of Revelation. Verse 3 reads, "And there appeared another wonder in heaven, and, behold, a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads."

Without going into an elaborate exposition of the dragon as brought to view in this chapter to identify the power thus symbolized, it will suffice for the purposes of this article to notice what is said of the dragon in chap. 13:2 (last clause), "And the dragon gave him [the beast] his power, and seat, and great authority."

It has been abundantly shown in these articles that the beast is a symbol of the papacy. All that need be asked therefore is, What power (symbolized by the dragon) was it that gave to the papacy its seat (of government) power and great authority?

The answer is easy. We know that the city of Rome is the seat of the papacy. But who controlled it before it became the seat of the papacy? For hundreds of years it was held by the Roman power. But Rome before the time of the papacy, and as distinguished from it, was pagan. And we know that after Constantine moved the seat of empire from Rome to Constantinople, that city finally became the seat of the papacy. Hence the dragon is used to symbolize pagan Rome.

But it is not to be understood thus in its fullest sense; only in a secondary sense does the dragon symbolize pagan Rome. Primarily it symbolizes Satan. Of this we may be sure from the reading of Rev. 12:9: "And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent called the devil and Satan, who deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him."

We may consider the dragon in both its primary and secondary senses, and it is still true that when the beast is worshiped, the dragon is worshiped also. Now it is by the enforcing of the mark of the beast that the beast itself is worshiped. Therefore as the dragon (or paganism) is worshiped together with the beast (papacy) it follows that in the mark itself must be found, while professedly a Christian institution, that which is essentially pagan.

But the dominant worship in pagan Rome, as it was also of the world long before the days of Rome, was sun-worship. And the day devoted to the worship of the sun, and especially observed in its honor, was the first day of the week, and from which worship it derives its name—Sunday—confessedly the "wild solar holiday of all pagan times."

Now note: of all the pagan institutions ever devised Sunday is the only one claimed by professed Christians of this country and by them called a "mark."

Thus it is seen that Sunday is the mark of both the papacy and paganism, and the only institution that can possibly answer to the "mark" of the prophecy.

Now a few questions: Can righteousness have fellowship with unrighteousness? Can there be any communion between light and darkness? Can there be any agreement between the temple of God and that of idols? See 2 Cor. 6:14-16. "Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter? Can a fig tree, my brethren, bear olive berries? either a vine, figs?" James 3:11, 12.

When all these questions can be answered in the affirmative, then it can be truthfully said that Christianity and paganism can unite and be represented by one common mark—Sunday. And when Christianity and paganism unite, then will it be true that Sunday is a part of the gospel.

No; Sunday is a part of paganism, and belongs to the founder of paganism. But whoever he might be, of one thing we are absolutely certain,—it is not Jesus Christ; and therefore he is not the author of Sunday.

PASSING events continue to make it more clear that the question of the disposition of the Philippines is not one that will be lightly settled. Now that American and Spanish troops have met in battle at Manila, and American blood has been shed and American lives lost in establishing American supremacy, the sentiment for retaining the islands as American territory is no doubt tremendously strengthened, and in all probability will be too strong to be denied. And when this Government announces definitely its intention to establish itself in power on the borders of the seat of the contentions of the Old World powers, it will not be strange if those powers take more decisive action in the matter than they have done hitherto.

THE Scripture says that man at his best estate is altogether vanity, and man himself is continually demonstrating the truth of the statement. One way in which he does this is by presuming to exercise powers which are altogether beyond his capacity to possess. For instance, men are continually claiming the ability to apprehend, to a greater or less degree, events which are yet behind the veil of the future. There is the weather prophet, who predicts what the weather will be for a month or more in advance. There are also the astrologers, and fortune tellers, who claim the ability to foretell the chief events of an individual's life, and who are credited by most people with having some degree of power in this direction. And aside from all these, the vast majority of people have more or less confidence in their own ability to predict what is going to happen, when they have some slight basis of known facts from which to shape their conclusions. They are always ready when opportunity offers to speak the self-justifying words, "I told you so."

THE events of the war with Spain, which are fresh in the minds of all, afford an illustration upon this point. Before the war began, but when it had become a visible prospect, a certain writer drew considerable attention to himself by writing a history of "our late war with Spain." Few people believed at that time that war would come, but with the possibility of it in mind, the probable result of a clash between two powers provided with modern implements of war was a question of general interest. The writer set forth such events as, to his mind, were to be expected in the conflict. From what was known of the resources of the two nations, and of the nature of the weapons that would be brought into use, he thought to make a fairly accurate prediction of what would happen when these two nations pitted their armies and navies against each other. And his descriptions were received by the public with almost the interest that would be given to credible prophecy.

* * *

BUT his predictions could hardly have fallen more wide of the truth. The great battle between the Spanish and American fleets, as he portrayed it, was a doubtful contest, in which the opposing ships were obscured by clouds of smoke, under cover of which one of the fast auxiliary cruisers sailed close to one of the Spanish battleships and silenced it completely by a single broadside from more than a hundred small quick-firing guns; and at the close of the combat not one of the victorious American ships was in condition to continue the fight. As a matter of fact, when the opposing fleets came together off Santiago, the auxiliary cruisers played no part at all in the contest, the result was never doubtful, and the American fleet was not at all disabled by the fire of the enemy. So far from proving, as predicted by a number of assumed authorities, only an even match for the Spanish navy, the American fleets have sent the Spanish fleets to the bottom of the sea without suffering the loss or serious injury of a single ship.

* * *

IT is a strange thing, but yet true, that men have always been inclined to pay more attention to the predictions of their finite fellow mortals than to those of the Word of God. And though the predictions of inspiration have never yet failed, while those from a human source have scarcely been anything but failures, people are to-day as ready as ever to allow their minds to be diverted from the truth by things that are false and of no value. It is the purpose of the author of what is false and counterfeit, to obscure what is genuine and true; and the world to day is flooded with counterfeits of the things provided by the grace of Omnipotence for man's salvation. But "nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure," having this infallible test: "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

THE war with Spain having practically ended, it may be presumed that Spain's "honor" is satisfied; for this "honor" was the one thing that Spain most strenuously insisted on preserving. But what real honor has Spain preserved? From whom does Spain now receive honor as the outcome of her conduct of the war? Evidently her fancied preservation of honor is but a gigantic hallucination. Only feelings of pity and contempt have been awakened throughout the civilized world by the display of weakness and barbarity which marked the struggle on the Spanish side.

It would have been honorable in Spain to have granted relief to the oppressed Cubans before they were driven to the point of open rebellion. It would have been honorable to her if she had entered into any arrangement with the United States for the maintenance of a proper government on the island, under which the people might have lived in security and prosperity. But in her own view, all this had nothing to do with honor. The essential point of "honor" with Spain was to display the utmost possible tenacity in maintaining an unjust, unreasonable and utterly hopeless attitude toward her colonies and the Government of the United States. Her "honor" consisted in not giving up anything until she was compelled by force to do so. This is "national honor" with Spain, and it is not altogether unlike "national honor" elsewhere. But true honor is revealed not through politics, but through Christianity.

A CONGRESSMAN from New Hampshire, Mr. Cyrus Suloway, is reported as having said in reply to the question whether the United States ought to hold the Philippines: "Hold them? Of course we should hold them! It would be cowardly to desert them now simply to satisfy a few weak-pulsed Americans who say we cannot handle them. We Anglos can fight with a Bible in one hand and a rifle in the other. Where he cannot convert, he shoots."

* * *

Of course, the only idea in carrying "a Bible in one hand and a rifle in the other" would be to shoot wherever it was found not possible to convert. That is the principle of procedure that must be followed by a "Christian nation"—force joined with religion. Force with religion means compulsion wherever there cannot be persuasion. And this is a very old principle—one that has been often tried with the object of benefitting mankind. One can see that if this principle should be fully carried out, the whole world would ere long be "converted," because all the people who had refused to be converted would be dead. When Spain first came to the Western World, several centuries ago, she carried the symbol of religion in one hand and the sword in the other; and the unfortunate natives had their choice between "conversion" and death. And now, when Spain is being driven out, the victorious party who congratulate themselves on being rid of a barbarous neighbor propose to put in practice the barbarous principle which has done most to make Spain what she is.

"THE Bible in one hand and a sword in the other" does not make an effective fighting outfit. The Bible is the Word of God, and the Word of God is the "sword of the Spirit." The two swords cannot work in partnership. If the sword of steel is to be carried, the "sword of the Spirit" might as well be dropped. The sword alone is more effective against the enemy than the sword and the Bible combined.

THE real antagonism between these two weapons may be seen from the fact that the purpose of the sword is to kill, while the purpose of the Bible is to save. Being thus opposite in purpose, when joined together the one only antagonizes and neutralizes the other. The sword has, of course, its legitimate field in the divine economy for this world, being the conservator of civil peace, and borne by the civil ruler "not in vain." But this is altogether outside the sphere of religion.

"What a Way to Spend Sunday!"

THE reason why the Spanish Admiral Cervera was defeated off Santiago in the engagement with the American fleet, according to The Observer (New York), is given in the following quotation from that journal:—

"The fact that Admiral Cervera deliberately selected the hour when the crews of the American ships were at religious service for his dash out of Santiago harbor on that now historic Sabbath morning may in the providence of God have had more to do with his overthrow than most people have yet imagined. The morning was calm and peaceful, bringing its tender reminiscent reflections to hundreds of worshipful American hearts on the fleet at anchor off shore, when suddenly, as though to disturb the Almighty at his own devotions, the impious Spaniards, fired while also fuddled with wine, rushed forth, as it proved, horribly to die or finally to be captured. What a way to spend Sunday! And when the sun set that Sabbath its last reproachful beams slanted across the smoking hulks of the fleet of the proud Spaniard who deliberately broke up religious meetings in the hope of gaining a strategic success. But the stars in their courses fought against Cervera. God is not mocked, nor can his commandments and sacred sanctions ever be impugned with safety."

According to this evangelical authority, then, it is all right to fight on Sunday, provided you do not strike the first blow. You may even compel the fighting, by forcing your adversary into a corner, and still be guiltless. Nor is it necessary that your Sunday fighting be in self-defense; it may be only to prevent your enemy from escaping, and still be right. God will excuse you from religious devotions any time if it is for the purpose of fighting, only you must not fire the first shot. Is this an exalted, or a low, conception of Christian principles?

Let us alter the statement a little. The "impious Spaniards" rushed forth to disturb the sanctity of the day of rest, and the American sailors at once rushed to their guns, prepared to make the disturbance as complete as possible, and then occupied themselves with all their energies in destroying the property and lives of their enemies, killing and maiming hundreds of their fellow-beings made in the image of the One whom they were assembled to worship. "What a way to spend Sunday!" Was it really a better way than that chosen by the Spaniards?

"A Blasphemous Failure."

RY A. R. HYATT.

THE Oil City Blizzard, of Oil City, Pa., under date of Friday, June 24, contains an editorial on Robert G. Ingersoll, the noted infidel, and his work.

Now we do not believe in Ingersollism, and think we are as truly opposed to infidelity in all its forms as is the editor of the Blizzard. But the editor is on the wrong track. Listen to what he says: "For Robert G. Ingersoll, the lawyer, the orator, the open-hearted, public-spirited man, we must entertain respect; for Robert Ingersoll, the infidel, the blasphemous expounder of a poisonous belief, contradictory to the doctrine of the Bible, inconsistent with the creed of the Christian nations, we can hold nothing but feelings of abhorrence.

"This man, whose eloquence is so powerful as to corrupt minds too weak to hold their own convictions, is a follower of Thomas Paine, the hideous scoffer against revealed religion, and, like Paine, we find him stepping aside from his religious controversies long enough to put in masterly diction a plea for pure morality, honesty and truth. With all his unrighteous tirade against the existence of an almighty God, he is a man with a keen appreciation of all that is good and fine in life, and it is astonishing to find him so. His family ties are the sweetest; his ability as a lawyer has won the confidence of his clients; his standing as one of the most able orators in the country cannot be questioned; his estimate of women, made apparent in so many of his lectures, and his love for little children, show him to be a man of culture and good principles.

"But all these attributes are clouded in darkness by the realization of his religious differences. He denies the existence of God; he would tear to pieces every thread of truth on which we base our comforting faith; he is a rank iconoclast, seeking to shatter the doctrinal idols of a Christian people and giving them nothing better in their place.

"He can harm no one with a mind strong enough to resist his powerful persuasions, but to the ignorant mass of men his unreligious utterances framed in language of marvelous strength and beauty, must come like the inspiring and impressible tones of harmonious music and inflict their contamination.

"In this country, where free thought is allowed unbridled liberty, he can give voice to his false sentiments and meet no stronger opposition than the arguments of the American pulpit; but it is a woful mistake, and toleration of speech should be a dead law when it comes to a ranting exposition of unreligious sentiment.

"Ingersoll on Shakespeare, Ingersoll on Napoleon, Lincoln, or any of the historical characters of the world, is a literary treat; but Ingersoll on the 'Holy Bible' is from beginning to end a sacrilegious, blasphemous failure."

A "failure,"—"from beginning to end a sacrilegious, blasphemous failure,"—and yet it is desired to hinder a man from showing his efforts to be such in speaking against the "Holy Bible." If it is a failure, good; let him fail. When men feel a desire to forcibly prevent their fellows from expressing their views on religion, they give evidence of a low appreciation of the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

This editor has judged Christianity from the standpoint of popular pulpit teaching as shown by the expression: "In this country where free thought is allowed unbridled liberty, he can give voice to his false sentiments and meet no stronger opposition than the American pulpit." Let the pulpit present the plain truth as revealed in the Bible, and it will stand against the bombastic ebullitions of all the infidels in the country, and there will be no need of unjust laws that trample upon the God-given rights of the individual.

THE Dayton Republican (Dayton, Tenn.) of August 5, reports the following interesting bit of conversation occurring recently in that town, in which is displayed the spirit of the demand for Sunday laws:—

"A Graysville lady who is also an Adventist was canvassing in Dayton recently for an Adventist paper, when she encountered an unexpected snag.

"I don't want your Advent litatooor," said the lady of the house she called at. 'You Advents ought to be in jail anyway. You was there once and you ought to have stayed. If you would obey the laws of your country you would not get in trouble. George Washington fixed the Sabbath, and you have no business in disobeying him.'

"During this diatribe the visitor stood aghast. Finally she managed to interpose: 'But Jesus Christ is greater than George Washington.'

"Not in this Sunday business he ain't," snapped the irate lady of the house, and this ended the unique discussion.

"Clearly there is a field for missionaries other than in China and Africa."

WRITING of the thirteen inch gun used in the navy, a writer in The Engineering Magazine says: "It is difficult to appreciate the power and, at the same time, the delicacy of these great fighting-machines. At the muzzle the immense projectile has been forced through twenty-seven inches of Harveyized steel. At two thousand yards the penetration is twenty-two and one-half inches. The extreme range is thirteen miles. The projectile leaves the gun with a velocity of 2,100 feet per second, or 1,400 miles per hour. A shot can be fired every one and one half minutes for a period of several hours. The force imparted to the projectile, if properly applied, would lift a battleship bodily three feet, and yet this great machine, weighing 145,000 pounds, is as accurate as a high-grade watch."

THE most powerful weapons are spiritual.

Be Careful How You Speak.

BY T. R. WILLIAMSON.

CHILDREN and fools, they say, will tell the truth,
Heedless of what befalls of wrong or ruth.
And many folks there be in every street
Ready to talk small truth to all they meet.
Live and let live are words that rule the wise.
Endeavor so that truth, or e'en surmise,
Shall neither seem to flow from off your tongue
Mingled with spite 'gainst any, old or young.
I say that even truth had better be Left tongueless oft than told in gossip free.
Tell what is simply, what is fairly, true.
Owe all men friendliness and pay it too.
Ne'er think it wise to utter all you know.
When folks do that they soon to lying go.
A fool's tongue, and a child's, are unrestrained.
If we of older growth have no more gained
Than to take them for models, surely then,
Earth needs a nobler, manlier, race of men.

"Ye Shall Be as Gods."

"MAMA, Satan not only told Eve that she should not surely die, but that 'ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.' Of course, if we were to be as gods, we would not die."

"No. In heaven Lucifer would not acknowledge that God was more than he himself was; he flattered himself that he himself was divine power, and that all he needed was opportunity to develop it, and be as the Most High. In telling man he should be as God, he breathed into him the ambition that had caused his own expulsion from heaven. Ever since then man has thought there was something divine in him independent of God, and that something divine could therefore be originated by him. This idea led him to become a worshiper of himself, to make his own religion, and give to the machinery of civil power, the authority to enforce the theories of the majority, or the stronger, on the weaker. As God is love, and can only be worshiped through the faith that works by love, of course the man-made worship, thrust on souls by force, could only be against God, and disastrous to men. How disastrous, we shall never know till the books are opened."

"Mama, the boys who think lots of themselves, who have what we call the 'big head,' always want the other fellows to do just as they say."

"That's it, Charlie, self-exaltation leads to the stamping out of individuality, and to monopoly. Even on the play ground, the principle finds illustration. Your selfish boy generally wants and gets supremacy. The outcome of it in the world is a one-man power—the papacy. In the universe it would be the overthrow of God's throne, and the supremacy of Satan."

"What makes the boys on the play ground give up to the selfish boy?"

"Some of them are afraid of getting into trouble, if they don't. If you are not as strong as he is, you'd better skip out, or come to terms."

"Then it's a government of fear. That's what it was in the dark ages, and men lost their manhood. They had to sneak and quail and cringe. In order to keep in favor with the strong, they had to spy and report and hunt and torture those who were out of sympathy with the principle. Men who in heart hated the management, through fear, pretended to be in favor of it. No one dared to speak a new thought or manifest any unusual ability; for a government founded in fear is sustained and enforced through jealousy. So the ages became black, and even God's word was said to 'prophecy in sackcloth,' because its advocates were in danger of losing their lives, if suspected; superstition ran rife, and the good, the simple-hearted, the talented, were looked upon with suspicion, and many of them were burned as witches. This is the degradation to which man comes who believes he is as God, and seeks for God-like supremacy in enforcing his ideas and plans on others."

"But away down deep in his heart, mama, can any man believe he is divine?"

"No, Charlie, not unless he is wholly given up to the devil. Many of these very men who became so lifted up, submitted to, or originated, the cruelest sort of punishment for sin in themselves and others. They sought to make atonement for themselves. Refusing to be justified by faith in the Redeemer of the world, they tried to justify themselves. But the wearing of hair shirts, walking on peas doing penance, lacerating the flesh with iron points, walking up Pilate's stairs on their knees, fasting, praying, all seemed to fall short of the penalty deserved. However, this fostered spiritual pride. People looked with wonder and admiration on those who endured most suffering from themselves, and gave them the title of saint. Then it angered them to hear that all this suffering was vain, and aroused their enmity against those who trusted in the merits of Jesus, and rested in the love of God, who were justified by faith. They were determined to make the followers of Christ suffer as they had suffered themselves. Their self-inflicted sufferings made them cruel."

"But, mama, were they satisfied?"

"O, no, Charlie; self-justification never satisfies. The Catholics all expect to spend some time in purgatory.

The pagans had this doctrine long ago. You will read it in Virgil's Aeneas. All nations have the thought of punishment after death."

"Well, mama, so have Christians. We believe that the wicked will be punished."

"What is the punishment, Charlie?"

"The wages of sin is death," said Charlie. "But mama, what is death?"

"Look it up in the dictionary."

"Cessation of life," read Charlie. "Yes, but I can't understand. The Bible says, 'These shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal.'"

"Well, that only tells how long the punishment is to last. The death is everlasting. There will be no end to it."

"But mama, it says 'the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever, and they have no rest day nor night.'"

"Yes, I know, Charlie. But the words 'forever and ever' are used in a limited sense. Dr. Adam Clark, the commentator, says: you cannot make that expression mean unending torture. The same word is used in Exodus 6th chapter, where a man has his ear bored through with an awl to signify that he is a slave, and it says, speaking of his master, 'He shall serve him forever.' This means simply as long as he lives. Now other passages teach plainly that the wicked are to become extinct. 'The day that cometh shall burn them up . . . and it shall leave them neither root nor branch. And ye shall tread down the wicked, for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet.'"

"Then mama, what does the Bible mean by hell?"

"In some places it means the grave; in some places the place of the punishment of the wicked. But the Psalmist says that the righteous are to be 'rewarded in the earth, much more the wicked and the sinner.' With 'thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked.' When the thousand years are finished, the wicked will be raised from their graves to acknowledge that God is love, and to die the second death."

"But mama, why does God have them resurrected at all?"

"It is necessary to the plan of the full vindication of his character, and to the stability of his eternal government. Every tongue is to confess that Christ is Lord to the glory of the Father."

"Lucifer would not acknowledge Christ as Lord; but claimed that he was himself superior to Christ. He led his angels and the hosts of the wicked to affirm this falsehood. The vindication of truth demands that the instigator and the repeaters of this falsehood make a public confession of its fallacy and an acknowledgment of the truth. This the truth itself will compel them to do, not through force, but through the compelling conviction of the intrinsic worth of truth. In that day the utter weakness of forcing men to acknowledge truth or error, will be made apparent. As Satan and his hosts surround the beloved city, and the glory of love is made manifest, the great confederacy of fallen angels and wicked men, will crumble into dust and ashes. The blaze of God's glory will be a consuming fire to all evil. He who said, 'Ye shall be as gods,' will be brought 'to ashes on the earth' in the sight of saints and angels. Death and hell are to be cast into the lake of fire. Out of the last conflagration will come the renewed earth, the home of the redeemed."

"But, mama, we will be like God after all, at last."

"Yes, indeed, 'We shall be like him.' Not merely in external form, but in spirit and in truth. We shall be in the image of his glory, which is love."

Studies in French History.—34.

"WHILE all these things were going on in France during the fifteenth century, there was a humble man born in Genoa, Italy, in 1435, who from study, observation, and deep reasoning, formed the opinion that our earth, instead of being a flat body of land floating in a sea of waters, was a round body; and that by sailing westward he might if he only went far enough, sail to India by a new route. His name was—"

"Christopher Columbus!" exclaimed all the children in concert.

"Yes," said Professor Carman, "but as this does not directly affect French history, we will drop the subject, interesting as it is, and finish our study of Louis XI."

"The king was still shut up in his dismal castle," said Harry Ray, "when our last lesson closed."

"Yes, and he never left this castle until he died. He grew more and more superstitious, and was continually adding a relic of some dead saint to the string of charms which he constantly wore, hoping thereby to postpone the hour of death, which he so much dreaded and for which he was so little prepared."

"Relics! What kind of relics, for instance?" asked Florence Ray, who was a great hand to particularize.

"Well, he would get a piece of something which he was told was the finger or toe of some saint, or may be the bone of an animal, which some deceiving priest would gravely assure him was a part of the once living form of St. Peter or St. Paul, and he would string these around his neck in the vain hope that they would cure his bodily maladies."

"I should suppose he would want to be cured of his spiritual diseases before he died," observed Julia March.

"O he cared far more to be made well in body than to be healed in spirit; and when his attendants would pray for his soul as well as his body, Louis often remonstrated with them, and begged them not to ask for too many favors at once, but to ask only that he might have his health again. He would not allow any of his attendants to mention the word 'death' in his presence; yet, after all, he was obliged to yield to the grim messenger at last.

"He is called 'the worst husband, the worst father, and the most brutal son in the world,'—a sad name indeed to follow a man through the ages."

"Did he do anything at all worth remembering?" asked Charlie White.

"Yes, indeed; it is very seldom that one cannot mention some good deeds in every life, and Louis's is no exception. He made some very sensible laws, and the middle classes were certainly in a better condition when he died than when he first ascended the throne."

"Did King Louis have any one to take his place?" asked Rob Billings, "if he did I hope for the sake of the poor people that he made a more kind-hearted ruler than his father."

"O yes; but his little son Charles the Eighth, called The Courteous, was too young to govern his father's kingdom, being then only thirteen years old: so his sister Anne was made regent. The poor boy never seemed to be well. He was badly misshapen and dwarfish in appearance, but he had a kind heart, and although his was comparatively a short reign, he endeared himself to his people. His father's government had been so severe that the poor people were glad enough for a change."

"Did the regent, Anne, manage things pretty well?" asked Milly Brown.

"Very well, indeed, considering the difficulties there were in the way. She is said to have been an intelligent woman and one who possessed great tact. But affairs were in a very sad condition. The country had been overrun for about four years by her father's troops, and the poor peasants were in a state bordering upon actual starvation."

"It does not seem as if we ever had such a very poor class of people in this country, or ever could have," said Max Smith.

"We may not have so many poor people nowadays, but don't you think, professor, that the number is getting pretty large?" answered practical Jack.

"Yes, and it is growing larger. I was in Chicago at the time of one of the great strikes only quite recently, and I saw more actual want and suffering among the poor than I supposed it possible to exist in this favored country."

"Isn't it true that history repeats itself?" asked Julia March.

"Yes; it was never truer than now.

"At last King Charles married a daughter of Maximilian, of Austria, afterward Emperor of Germany.

"The young king was quite ignorant, but he learned to read after he was married, and then he wasted much time in reading foolish stories,—for he was quite romantically inclined,—and it had then precisely the effect it has now; it filled his head with much nonsense, and turned a naturally kind-hearted man into a foolish fortune hunter."

"What! did he go gold hunting?"

"O no; but he did just as foolish a thing as that. He had not learned the lesson that it hardly pays to conquer territory far away from home, and so he started out to conquer Italy."

"I imagine the pope had something to say about that," said Joe Palmeter.

"He certainly did. True to the papal idea of the righteousness of uniting church and state, Pope Alexander the Sixth, whom history calls the most thoroughly wicked man who ever sat in the chair of St. Peter, gave the young king the kingdom of Naples as coolly as though it were his to give."

Now as the time was up, Professor Carman dismissed his class, bade a kind good-by to Charlie White and Rob Billings, who intended to sail for Paris the next day, and asked them to write often, which they promised to do.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

"Highly Pleased With It."

A LADY who lately purchased a "Cyclone" washer writes:—

Washington, N. H., Aug. 1, 1898.

A. MALLETT, New York,

Dear Sir: After having examined several kinds of washing machines, I concluded to try the "Cyclone" Washer, and having tried it for three weeks am highly pleased with it. I shall recommend it to my friends as the very best in my opinion. MRS. H. I. FARNSWORTH.

OUR SPLENDID OFFER.

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

This Bible is bound in Tampico Morocco, Divinity Circuit, Leather Lined to Edge, Round Corners, Red under Gold Edges, Silk Headband, Silk Marker. It has large, clear type (see specimen, page 449), sixty-four illustrations, fifteen splendid Clear Maps, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of proper names and foreign words with their meaning, etc.

But the most unique and important feature of this Bible is the "COMBINATION." This consists in the blending of both old and new versions in one volume without increasing the size. As to the merits of the Bible we offer, it is enough to say that a few of which we print. For brevity's sake, we omit the name and address of writers, but their letters are all on file in our office.

We have received numerous unsolicited words of praise,

WHAT OUR PATRONS SAY OF IT.

I received the Bible in good condition. I am very well pleased with it in every way. It is a first class Bible; just the kind I have wanted.

The Bible is a beauty. Everything that could be wished.

The Bible came safely, and is highly appreciated by the friends for whom I bought it.

My Bible received. I am very much pleased with it.

I have received my Bible, and to say I am well pleased would not convey my appreciation. I think it the best bargain ever offered. It is just what I have long wanted.

I have used my Bible nearly three months, have compared it with other higher priced Bibles, and can truthfully say that all that you claim for it is true, and do heartily recommend it to all who need a good Bible.

It is the best Bible I ever saw for the price.

I received your premium Bible, and we were surprised to get such a good grade of book. Many of my friends have examined it and pronounce it excellent.

I wish to thank you at once for the beautiful Bible which I received yesterday. It is far better than I expected.

I am very much pleased with it and like it better than any Bible I have ever had.

We are all more than pleased with the Bible. The type is a great delight.

I am delighted with the Bible. Don't know how you sell it so cheap.

The Bible is far beyond my expectation. It is a real beauty and I am more than pleased with it.

I am greatly pleased with the book, it being better than expected to get.

I received the Bible all right and am more than pleased with it. It is better than I expected. The print is very nice.

The Bible is just lovely. It is lots better than I thought it would be.

I have been using the Teachers' Combination Bible nearly two years. Am more pleased with it daily. The Revised Version feature is "just the thing," and if I were going to purchase a Bible tomorrow you may depend upon it, I would purchase the Teachers' Combination Bible.

Your kind favor accompanied by the Premium Bible was received a long time ago, and after having examined the Bible carefully, I must say that it is, with a minor exception, the finest thing I ever saw for the money. It is just the thing I have been looking after for years. I never could understand why it was necessary to have two Bibles to do the work of one. But in this you have both versions at a glance. I say it is worth twice what you ask for it.

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 18, 1898.

WHEREVER mercy and justice appear, there is written the name of God.

NO HUMAN law was ever enacted to enforce the observance of the true Sabbath.

SIN and slavery came into the universe together, and have gone hand in hand ever since.

THE United States and Spain are now again at peace, and there is satisfaction—on one side. Only the peace of God brings perfect satisfaction to all who have it.

IS THE Roman Catholic religion impotent? or is it a deadly incubus? The condition of the Spanish people and nation to-day affirms that it must be one or the other.

"PEACE I leave with you," said Jesus to his disciples; "My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you." John 14:27. And his disciples to-day may be thankful that Jesus does not give peace as the world gives it.

FROM the scenes which mark the reestablishment of peace in tropical America, the eye of the spectator, turning away, rests upon the prospect of war between Russia and Great Britain. Apparently the most fragile thing in the world is the world's peace.

How is the question of the control of the Philippines to be settled? That is the overshadowing question of the whole settlement of the relations between Spain and the United States. That is the one question in which others of the world's powers are particularly concerned. Public sentiment in this country is universally against the thought of giving the islands up again to the domination of Spain; and political sentiment in Europe—outside of England—is universally against their being kept by the United States. And to give them to any one of the Powers of Europe would provoke an immediate storm among all the other Powers. Nor will it give satisfaction anywhere to let the people of the islands try to govern themselves. That would not develop the resources of the islands as the great trade-loving powers want to see them developed. It is a marvelous thing, and a thing characteristic of these days of earth's history, that the United States should have thus become involved in the intricacies of Old World political contentions, out of which most momentous and startling developments may be expected.

NOW THAT there is peace, the press is proclaiming that there will be business prosperity throughout the country. We hope there will; but if business prosperity could be secured as easily as terms of peace can be arranged between belligerents, hard times would be much more infrequent than they are. Peace between capital and labor is the peace that is most needed by the business world.

THE author of the "Items of W. C. T. U. History," which have for some months been a feature of the SENTINEL, writes from the standpoint of a thorough knowledge of and sympathy with the purposes and motives of the W. C. T. U., gained by long years of identification with that body as national evangelist. The SENTINEL is glad to present through its columns this series of historical sketches relating to the character and work of the W. C. T. U., by one so well qualified to speak on this subject, and trusts they may be the means of a better understanding between those who, as workers together for one Master, have yet stood opposed to each other in the matter of Sabbath legislation. To this end we must recognize the sincerity and honesty of the promoters of this idea of reform, both in the W. C. T. U. and elsewhere. To impugn the motives of our opponents is a common but altogether unchristian proceeding, and one in which we have doubtless erred much. In this let us take heed to ourselves for the future. The promoters of Sabbath legislation have of course yet to see the difference between a misdirected zeal and true faith; that any legislation for the observance of a weekly rest day must be religious; and that all religious legislation cannot but be contrary to God. For this we will hope and labor.

It is reported that the French court of inquiry appointed to investigate the "Bourgogne" disaster, in which nearly all the crew were saved and nearly all the passengers drowned, have actually exonerated the officers and crew from all blame, and not only that, but have found that the crew behaved so gallantly, many of them, that they are entitled to be decorated with medals of honor! Verily French justice, as illustrated by this and the Dreyfus affair, is a picturesque thing. Such proceedings remind one of the wisdom of the ostrich.

THE "peace protocol" between this country and Spain provides among other things, "that the United States will occupy and hold the city, bay, and harbor of Manila pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace, which shall determine the control, disposition, and government of the Philippines." All appearances indicate that this will give the United States possession of the bay and city of Manila for a long time to come.

Will some of our good friends who say they can't understand the SENTINEL, please point out to us some of these obscurities which they run across.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 25, 1898.

NUMBER 33.

"SAY ye not, A confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy."—Isa. 8:12.

CHRISTIAN warfare aims to slay sin, but to save sinners; but carnal warfare aims to kill the sinner in his sin.

ALL men want to get to heaven, but the trouble is with the great majority that they want to get there in their own way.

THE Tower of Babel

approached as near to heaven as heathenism approaches the righteousness of God.

GOD'S WAY OF REACHING HEAVEN VS. MAN'S WAY.

God's way is by the Ladder of Jacob's dream; man's way is by the Tower of Babel. The structure reared in the plains of Shinar was symbolical of heathenism in all ages, which seeks to gain heaven by works. Multitudes to-day are striving to mount upwards by a tower of babel. Some rest upon their respectability, as did the Pharisees. Others think to approach God through penance. Millions are calling for legislation to make righteousness easy and sin hard; and all over the world is sounded the call for federation, to unite the good people of the earth in religious and political leagues, which shall sweep away earth's wrongs and usher in the millennium. But there is only one true way of mounting to the throne of God, and that is by the divine Ladder upon which Jacob saw the angels ascending and descending,—that Ladder which is the Lord Jesus Christ.

THE Tower of Babel came through human pride; the Ladder of Jacob's dream through divine humility.

KEEP your conscience not on a gold basis, but a truth basis.

If man could ascend to heaven by his own works, he would but convert heaven into an earth by going there.

THE worst fall a man ever gets is from the pinnacle of his pride; and the loftier men carry their tower of babel, the worse will be the ruin in which it will finally involve them.

Faith and the Cure of Disease.

In a little village on Long Island, a young girl lies dangerously ill of typhoid fever. When she was prostrated by the disease, her parents, who were firm believers in what is called "faith cure," refused to call a physician, saying that the proper means for the curing of the sick were prayer and the laying on of hands. The child grew steadily worse until finally, by order of the chairman of the village Board of Health, a doctor took the case in his charge and administered remedies which appear to have resulted in staying the further progress of the disease.

The parents submitted to the authority under which the doctor proceeded with the case, but regarded his efforts in combating the disease as being altogether uncalled-for, useless, and contrary to faith in God as the healer of disease.

The case has attracted some notice, and it will no doubt be thought of by many as representing a contest between two methods of healing, which differ from each other on the point of faith in the power of God, and that healing through faith has been shown to be a delusion. As a matter of fact there is nothing of this kind in it.

The trouble is with those inclined to this view, and indeed with people generally, that they are so blind to spiritual truth that they are not able to see God in the many "common" things in which he has revealed himself to them. They think of the power of God as something that must be manifested in some supernatural way, and unless they can see a miracle of some kind they will not think they have seen any manifestation of God at all.

Real faith in God sees vastly more than this. Real faith sees God in the things that he has made. The remedies that are used by the physician to combat disease in the regular practice of his profession are from the hand of God. The Creator has placed many such things in the earth at the disposal of man, and has given him the ability to discover many ways in which disease can be checked by operations based upon the principles of "natural law," which is the law of God. All this is from the Lord as truly as is the power that heals in a "miraculous" manner, and faith in God views it as such. It sees the miraculous power of God, testifying to God's love for the human family, in the "common" things of every-day experience. It sees God not far off from every one of us, and that "in him we live, and move, and have our being."

Is it to be expected that God will always pass over the common remedies which he has provided against disease, known and used by the ordinary physician, to make use of some extraordinary way of restoring the sick to health? That he sometimes does this there can be no doubt. But having placed many remedies in the hands of man for such emergencies, it is only reasonable that man should use them, and should thus coöperate with God in the work for physical salvation. Coöperation is a principle of prime importance in the economy of God.

And when man does thus use the natural remedies God has provided against disease, let him not fail to recognize the power of God in it the same as if God had seen fit to interpose in his behalf by some miraculous manifestation.

CHRISTIAN enthusiasm cannot be preserved on ice, even in hot weather.

Unlimited Power.

We know from the Word of inspiration that power "belongeth unto God;" that indeed, "there is no power but of God." Ps. 62:11; Rom. 13:1.

God upholds all things by "the word of his power." Heb. 1:3. "He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things," and "in him we live, and move, and have our being." Acts 17:25, 28.

Earthly power is the power of God, perverted by sin. The Creator so respects man's free will, that he gives him power to do that which is contrary to the divine will. This power however is limited; but God gives man unlimited power to do that which is according to his will.

The unlimited power of God is manifested through the Holy Spirit. And therefore it is written of the work of God, "not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

The Holy Spirit is the embodiment of unlimited power, and unlimited power is the natural heritage of beings created in the image of God. But unlimited power can safely be entrusted only to one whose will is in perfect harmony with the will of God. An unsanctified will joined with unlimited power would be a worse combination than is represented by the prince of evil.

But God, having unlimited power himself, does not selfishly withhold that power from all others, or from all save a favored few, but wills that all shall receive this power. Whether it is received or not, is a matter determined wholly by the will of the individual. And therefore there is no reason why the life of every person should not be full of the manifestation of unlimited power, save that the individual wills not to receive it, by willing not to walk in the way of righteousness and life. There is no reason why any individual should not possess unlimited power, by seeking to the right Source for it, upon the right conditions. And especially is there no reason why the church, set in the world expressly to accomplish the purposes of God, should seek to legislatures and political bodies for the power of which it feels in need.

So desirous is God that his creatures of the human family should be endued with this power, that he has poured out his Spirit upon all flesh; for thus was it prophesied of the last days. Joel 2:28,29; Acts 2:17. It is poured out, and is waiting only to be received by such as will receive it. And only such can receive it in its refreshing fullness as are fully sanctified to the will of God. For to bestow unlimited power upon one not thus sanctified, would be to set the seal of God—his full approval—upon something that is unlike him, and cause him to deny himself. It is because the Holy Spirit is the embodiment of unlimited power that it sets the seal of God upon him who receives it.

God bids his church to be filled with power; not from the legislatures of earth, not from any political source, but "from on high," from his own throne. "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." "The heavens declare the glory of God," and all the works of God proclaim his power, which is the same power that is "unto salvation" to them that believe, which is unlimited power—the Holy Spirit. All the handiwork of God joins in the invitation to man, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." Without this no man can fight the battle that is not with flesh and blood, but with "spiritual wickedness." And in these "last days," in the climax of the long conflict between good and evil, crises are to be met in which only unlimited power can suffice to guard the soul from destruction.

Then let the church, and every individual for himself, remember now "the promise of the Father," and seek for power from on high. "Receive ye the Holy Ghost."

THE following paragraph, which reflects the popular sentiment as represented by the daily press, is from the New York Tribune:—

"The philosophers who believe that 'imperialism' will be fatal to the 'great experiment' had their forerunners in the people who feared that liberty would perish from the earth with the 'imperialism' of the Federal Union, and Josiah Quincy, who saw the downfall of the republic in the acquisition of Louisiana, and the race has never since run out."

To which the Christian Advocate (New York) makes this fitting reply:—

"Anything can be paralleled from human history. The hotheads who believe that 'imperialism' is 'manifest destiny' had their forerunners in the people who hurried on Rome to its overthrow, who drove France into its revolution and later into its war with Germany, and who ruined all the extinct republics, and the race has never since run out. Nor has there ever been a foolish, a wicked, or a suicidal thing done by a nation that there was not a minority that pointed out the inevitable results."

"Science" on the Immortality of the Soul.

It is quite well known that for years certain bodies of scientific men have been investigating the phenomena of modern spiritualism, with the object of subjecting to the test of science the claim made and apparently substantiated by spiritualism, that the dead are conscious and capable of communicating with the living.

The first reports from these scientific commissions were adverse to this claim of consciousness after death, the various phenomena shown in proof of it being ascribed to trickery. It was stated that science afforded no proof in support of the popular belief in the immortality of the soul. But the belief still remained, and spiritualism continued to claim as its due that its phenomena be recognized as of genuine character. And now, this long-sought confirmation from "science" seems about to be gained. While no positive confirmation has yet come from a scientific source, the question is asked, and in a way which implies an affirmative answer, "Has the immortality of the soul received a scientific demonstration?"

In the Literary Digest, of August 13, this question forms the basis of a lengthy discussion, in which is quoted the testimony of two men of high scientific attainments, one a professor in Harvard University, and the other a prominent member of the London Society of Psychical Research. Introductory to the statement of their testimony the Digest says:—

"The reading public has heard more or less of 'The Strange Case of Mrs. Piper,' a Boston Spiritualistic medium and mind-reader. This woman, under the tests of such able psychologists as Professor James, of Harvard University, and Dr. Hodgson, of the London Society of Psychical Research, has furnished psychic phenomena which, so far as they are accepted as genuine, tend to demonstrate scientifically the immortality of the soul.

"The Society of Psychic Research was established for the purpose of examining, without bias, the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism. Among the mass of evidence it has collected in its sixteen years of life it has found nothing, up to this latest examination of Mrs. Piper, that was deemed to have established the future existence of the soul, although in the tenth report (1894) of the society the statement is made that 'between deaths and apparitions of the dying persons a connection exists which is not due to chance alone.'"

Of the experiments conducted through the mediumship of this woman, it is not necessary to speak at length. The impressive feature of them was the apparent proof that an unseen intelligence existed who spoke through the medium and revealed facts which could not have been known to the public nor by any possibility have come to the knowledge of the medium through what is known as "mind-reading." The conclusion was, naturally, that an invisible intelligence did exist which was the disembodied soul of the dead person from whom the communication purported to come. The London Society for Psychical Research challenges any one to show that there was in these manifestations any possible room for fraud.

Such statements coming from a source of recognized authority in the scientific world, warrant the conclusion that the time is not far distant when the voice of "science" will speak distinctly in confirmation of the claim that the soul of man is immortal. "Science" will join with theology in proclaiming this dogma as the truth. Then whoever does not accept it as such will be under the ban not only of theology, but of "science" itself. He will be set down as an ignorant and unreasonable person.

The point especially to be noted in all this is that "science" is incapable of correctly solving the problem presented by spiritual manifestations. Such problems do not lie beyond the range of true science, but true science extends far beyond the range of the powers of the human mind. Science, as defined by the human mind, and by that only, confirms the theological dogma of the immortality of the soul; but as defined by a higher Mind it teaches exactly the contrary. When science, as known to man apart from the Word of God, has fully investigated the phenomena which Spiritualism presents, when it has proceeded as far as it can go, it is obliged to pronounce the claims of Spiritualism to be true. And in this it leads man into a most positive and dangerous untruth; for the claim of natural immortality is an untruth, and is plainly pointed out as such in the Text Book of the highest science of which man can have any knowledge. And that is a science which deals with spiritual problems and with interests the highest that can pertain to man's existence.

That Text Book plainly states that "The dead know not anything;" that "The dead praise not the Lord;" that the thoughts of man perish at his death. Eccl. 9:5; Ps. 146:4, etc. It declares that God only "hath immortality."

The highest science is the science of salvation, set forth in the Word of Omniscience. That which is opposed to the science of salvation is "science falsely so called;" and such is the "science" which would teach the dogma of soul immortality. It is high time that people everywhere should recognize that salvation is science; that the statements of the Word of God are true science, and that true science has spoken unequivocally against the widespread but pagan doctrine of the soul's consciousness after death.

RESTRAINT is not rest.

"Christian Science" in Its Home.

THERE is a good deal in a name, in spite of Shakespeare's question, especially when it is used to designate a thing with which we are not familiar. An assumed name is usually deemed a necessary part of a criminal's disguise. "Christian science" would no doubt have less attraction for minds in this country were it known as Hindu philosophy, which according to the well-known lecturer and authority on Hinduism, Pundita Ramabai, it really is. In a recent lecture she spoke of "Christian science" and of its fruits as she knew them in India, and what she said of it ought to be read and pondered by every person who is at all inclined to be drawn away in the line of its teachings. It is this:—

"I can tell you I have sounded the depths of that philosophy, and what did I find? I will give you an idea in my own language. It means just this:—

"You are to take the whole universe as nothing but falsehood. You are to think that it does not exist. You do not exist. I do not exist. When you realize that, that is philosophy. Can you realize it? There was once upon a time a great being called Brahma, and that person was no person at all, but something like air, full of joy and knowledge. Can you think of air as being full of joy and knowledge? I cannot understand it, but philosophy tells you that you have to believe that this being, full of joy and knowledge, without any personality, existed once upon a time. That being had no mind. It did not want to say anything or have anything near it, and therefore, of course, it did not understand anything. Then there came another being just like himself, and that being was nothing but darkness. It was all falsehood. Now this air united with that darkness and assumed personality. It became male and female, and as that person has formed all things, the logical inference is that everything is falsehood. The birds and beasts that you see do not exist. You do not exist. When you realize that you have no personality whatever, you have no life, no knowledge, nothing, then you have attained the highest perfection of what is called 'yoga,' and that gives you liberation and you are liberated from your body, and you become like him, without any personality. You draw on the blackboard zero, plus zero, minus zero, multiplied by zero, divided by zero, and it equals zero. It is just that and nothing more.

"And what has that philosophy done for the people of India? A tree is judged by its fruits. An apple tree cannot bring forth a pear, but it will bring forth its own kind. The grandeur and beauty of that philosophy must be judged by its fruit. You are a people of some feeling. Everything is real. You feel that when other people are starving, you ought to give them something to eat, but out in India they do not feel that. Men do not feel any sympathy for others. They do not feel for people who are starving or being killed in war. In our late famine our philosophers felt no compassion for sufferers and did not help the needy. For why should they help when they claimed the suffering was not real, neither were the dying children real. The first result then of the philosophy is the basest cruelty and selfishness; no compassion for sufferers, and supreme egoism.

"To study Hindu philosophy it is best to visit India and experience it. Plenty of opportunities are afforded even if you go only to Bombay. That city is very large and it is very hot there; but that will make no difference to philosophers who never experience heat at all. The people of India and the philosophers who have studied with the learned men ought to feel alike toward all people and all beings; but they never show a particle of kindness to the women, and their lives are made so unbearable that they want to kill themselves. These philosophers have shown mercy toward all lower animals. They have established hospitals for animals, but they have never established hospitals for women. The preachers who have come over here to preach Buddhism to the American people have established a hospital for animals in Bombay. In that hospital there is a ward devoted to bugs, and a man is hired to feed those bugs on his blood every night. They never take any thought of the women who are dying under the weight of this philosophy, but they just show their charity toward the bugs. I recommend that hospital for the edification of American students of Buddhism. Let them stay one night in that bug ward. That will pay them for all their labors in studying that philosophy."

The Peace of God.

BY E. H. HUNTLEY.

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." Isa. 26:3.

Peace is a word very hard to define because there is such a depth of meaning in it. It is used to express a perfect rest, perfect quietness, perfect trust. At such times one will forget all troubles, all the ups and downs of life, and rest quietly—in perfect peace.

We speak of a time of peace, and a time of war. War is opposed to peace. Peace is the condition existing at the close of war, when all war has ceased and all is quiet. Peace is desirable above everything else. No one can be perfectly happy without it; but oh! how few there are to-day who have it. How very, very few who really know what real peace is. They long for peace, but do not find it. Why not? Simply because they do not fulfill the conditions.

What are the conditions? "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee." It is plain, therefore, that in order to have perfect peace, one must take his mind off from earthly things, which are only temporal, and look unto Jesus, who is our peace; for we read that "He is our peace." Eph. 2:14. He will come into our hearts if we will let him. Paul says, "And let the peace of God rule in your hearts." Col. 2:15. Jesus says, "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock, if any man . . . open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." Rev. 3:20.

Therefore, as Jesus is our peace, and is standing at the door knocking, waiting to gain admittance, all we need to do is to "let the king come in," and we may have peace in our hearts—the blessed peace that God alone can give. No matter what the world may say or do; no matter whether we are at home by the fireside, or behind the prison bars for conscience' sake; still we are kept in perfect peace. In all things we can only praise God. Again, the apostle says, "Be careful (full of care, anxiety, worry) for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God, and the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." Phil. 4:6, 7.

When we have Christ in us we will do his will. There is peace in doing as the Lord says, and knowing that we are doing his will. In Isa. 48:18 we read, "Oh that thou hadst hearkened unto my commandments! then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea."

Dear reader! are you enjoying the peace of God? Are you resting in the arms of the Holy One of Israel? If you are not, it is your privilege to do so.

War on Christian Principles.

Anonymous.

ONE of the conditions of the treaty of Mexico with the United States, it is said, is that any future war which may break out between the two countries shall be conducted on Christian principles. Now we know this is an age of progress, and that in all sorts of matters; but war on Christian principles is certainly the latest, and if carried out, we think it will prove the greatest of them all.

Just imagine it; we think we can see two armies drawn up in battle array. A fair field is before them; the positions are taken, the great guns unlimbered. The United States general is just about to give the order to fire, when the aid de-camp comes up and respectfully reminds him that war is to be conducted on Christian principles, and that it will not do to fire. "Very true, very true," says the chief; "but what are they? I have read Vauban, and Scheiter, and Turenne, and Coehoorn. I have read the lives of the old conquerors, and I have studied the campaigns of the greatest soldiers, but I never happened to come across these principles in any work on military art. Do you know anything about it, colonel?"

"No," says the colonel.

"Nor you, major?"

"Nor I, either."

"I really don't know how to begin; I suppose it would not do to shoot. Suppose we send for the chaplain."

The chaplain arrives.

"Do you know anything about this fighting on Christian principles?"

"Oh yes, it is the easiest thing in the world!"

"Where are the books which teach the art of this warfare?"

"Here," and the chaplain takes out the Bible.

"Really," says the general, "we ought to have thought of this before. It is a bad time to commence the study of tactics when the enemy is right before us; but I suppose we are bound by the treaty. What is the first thing, Mr. Chaplain?"

"Thou shalt not kill." "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

"But these are not my neighbors. They are Mexicans."

"The same Book tells us, a little further on, that the opportunity to do good to a man makes him our neighbor."

"Will you go on, Mr. Chaplain?"

"Love your enemies." "Do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you." If a man "smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also."

"But while we are praying for the Mexicans, they will be firing into us."

"No; they are bound by the treaty also. It works both ways."

"Then I don't see as there is anything for us to do here."

"Nothing, unless you send over and ask the Mexican general if he needs anything in the way of medicines, provisions, or clothing; I rather think the treaty requires this of us."

"But how do you ever know which party conquers in the fighting on Christian principles?"

"That is the great beauty of it. Both sides conquer, and there are never any killed and wounded."

The Subtle Fiend of Intoxication.

"Scientific American," August 13.

THE startling, increased, and general consumption of substitutes for alcoholic beverages, and the vast market found for cheap and drugged spirits, raises again the pertinent question whether the restriction placed upon the sale of absolutely pure products does not work harm rather than good; whether the enforcement of laws insuring purity will not better serve the cause of temperance. Possibly acts that will combine the two measures will produce the best results. It is known that, since the embargo of home-brewed ales has been in force, the consumption of spirits has greatly increased in Great Britain, and far beyond any ratio of increase of population; that more public houses are in existence; cologne drinking, chloral and cocaine taking, ether tipping, and the consumption of narcotic drugs generally, are in common vogue and daily, almost hourly, assuming enlarged proportions. Here is one of the greatest problems of our sociology, one that is, apparently, as far from solution as it was a century ago. The outward appearance as regards consumption is more seemly, but the surreptitious consumption of narcotics is in no way mitigated, but rather the contrary. The thanks and honors of the world await the individual who can formulate a scheme of reform that will be alike practicable and effective.

What Is the Everlasting Gospel?—No. 10.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

HOW SHALL we worship God? This question is asked in view of the fact that in the everlasting gospel of Rev. 14:6, 7, every nation, kindred, tongue, and people are expressly enjoined to "worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters."

It must be plain to every mind that unless one worships God aright it is not true worship. There is such a thing as worshiping God ignorantly. Paul preaching to the Athenians said, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you."

From this it will be seen that to render acceptable worship unto God one must know him. This does not mean to know something about God, but an actual knowledge of him, just as he is.

To the woman of Samaria Jesus said, "Ye worship ye know not what." John 4:22. And so it is that thousands to-day believe that they are worshiping God when it might be truly said of them, "Ye worship ye know not what."

But the instruction that Jesus gave to the woman of Samaria is good for us now, and will help us in our sincere efforts to render acceptable worship.

In a sense as never before comprehended perhaps, the "hour cometh—yes, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father "in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him." John 4:23. And the reason of this is that "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Verse 24.

Our conceptions of God must be right conceptions. To worship in spirit and in truth we must know the truth concerning God. But how shall we know it? "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know?" Job. 11:7, 8.

The surest way to find out God is to believe what he says of himself in his Word. He is the "God of truth" (Jer. 10:10, mar.); therefore what he says of himself is absolutely true. If we discount any statement that God makes concerning himself, to what extent we say such statement is not true to that extent we fail to have a right conception of God. And while what he says of himself is perfectly true, and in it he reveals what he is, our unbelief of that statement will eternally prevent us from knowing God as he is. And not believing what he says renders us unfit to "worship him in spirit and in truth."

The everlasting gospel calls upon all to worship God "who made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters." That being so, it must be clear that no one can render acceptable worship to God who does not worship him as the Creator.

Nor is this all. To worship God as the Creator one must believe what he says as to the manner of his creating. But the views that largely obtain in religious thought are completely at variance with what God says as to the origin of all things.

Remembering what has been said in previous articles with reference to the chronology of the gospel message of Rev. 14:6, 7, when it says "worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters," the implication is that in some respects the Lord has not hitherto been worshipped as the Creator.

No one familiar with the wording of the fourth commandment will fail to notice the similarity between this gospel call and the statements found in the fourth commandment. In the commandment itself it says, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." But it also brings to view the additional fact that the Lord also rested the seventh day, and because of this he "blessed the seventh day and hallowed it."

From this it will be seen that there is a direct connection between the creation itself and the seventh day. That day God expressly says is the Sabbath, and the Sabbath finds its source in, and is inseparably connected with, creation. It is God's signature, as it were, written upon all that he has created, so that the recognition of the seventh day is the recognition of his ownership over all things.

The purpose of the Sabbath is that we might know that God is the Lord—Jehovah—that it is he who sanctifies his people, for the power by which he sanctifies is the power by which he created.

As before pointed out, to believe that God created all things is to believe what he says as to the manner of creating them.

Is it a mere coincidence then that from the pulpits of our land, and of other lands for that matter, are being breathed out views, which, while having no particular agreement each with the other, are all antagonistic to what the Word of God says with reference to the manner of the creation.

There is no coincidence about it. It is a subtle plan on the part of the great arch deceiver, through such views to so befog the minds of the people that, losing sight of the object and purpose of the Sabbath, which if observed would lead to the proper worship of the Creator, they will the more easily fall in with the plan, well and skillfully laid, to bring the people to worship the beast and his image. That he is succeeding cannot be questioned if we may judge from the multitudes who are wielding such an influence for the enforcing of what is confessedly the mark of the papacy—the Sunday, the great antagonist of the Sabbath of Jehovah, the seventh day.

To render to God then the worship that is demanded in the everlasting gospel—to "worship him that made heaven and earth, the sea, and the fountains of waters," one must return to the keeping of the seventh day, which is the sign of his creative power. Ex. 31:13-17.

Nor is it a coincidence that the very people who are calling attention to this everlasting gospel from the standpoint of the prophecy of Rev. 14:6, 7, preach as an essential part of the gospel the observance of the seventh day.

The Church Truant Under English Law.

ACCORDING to the London Daily Mail (London, Eng.) absence from church on Sunday is still punishable under English law. The fact was called out by a case which came recently before a London court, of which the Mail makes the following mention. And it is fitting to remember in this connection that these Sunday laws handed down from former centuries show us unmistakably what is the real tendency of Sunday legislation. The Mail says:—

"Very few members of the Church of England are aware that the bishops have still the power to oblige them to present themselves at church on every Sunday in the year, as well as on no less than twenty-eight saints' days.

"Moreover, they could oblige them to fast at least a dozen times a year, if they felt so inclined.

"The act under which this power is held by the bishops is one passed when people apparently were given to cock-fighting and other profane amusements on the Sabbath, in the reign of Edward, A. D. 1551. Many years later another and more stringent law was enacted, but that has been repealed, while curiously enough, the older law is still in the statute book. The latter says:—

"Forasmuche as, at all tymes, men be not so mynde-full to lawde and praise God, so readie to resorte and heare Godde's hollie worde, as their bounden dewtie doth require; therefore, to call men to remembrance of their dewtie, it hath been provyded that there shoulde be certayne days appointed wherein Christians shoulde cease from all other kynde of labour and applie themselves onely unto the aforesaide hollie workes."

"And if people should not obey willingly, then it is—

"Lawfull to all archebushoppes and busshoppes to enquire of every persone that shall offend in the premisses, and to punishe each offender, and to enjoyne him such penance as shall be thought mete."

"It might be thought that this law is quite obsolete, but it is not so. Corresponding with the power of the bishops to enforce attendance, there is a duty to provide accommodation for every parishioner. Quite recently a reformatory boy was refused admission to church by one of the churchwardens, and an action was brought against the latter. The judge decided in favor of the boy, and in giving judgment, he said that though the courts can no longer fine a man for not going to church on Sundays, the bishops can 'admonish' him if he refuses to go, and he would then be compelled to pay the whole costs of the proceeding."

LIFE with most people is a struggle to get to the top. But not all people have the same top in view. There are various tops towards which the multitudes are struggling, and various kinds of effort are required in the endeavor to reach them. Some are to be reached by selfish effort,—effort which tends rather to the injury than the benefit of the human race.

A VAST number, sad to say, are struggling up the sides of the hill of mammon. That is the top they have in view, and they are striving to reach it by climbing up over the heads of their fellows. They are satisfied to pull others down, if by so doing they can pull themselves up. That is the natural method of getting to the top of this eminence. This is the kind of effort that has been put forth by the vast majority, though not all, who have been elevated by mammon above their fellows.

* * *

HUMAN nature turns naturally toward this elevation as the one that will best reward the effort put forth upon it,—the one that will confer the greatest happiness and satisfaction in life. But what is there in reality at the top of it? Imagination sees everything there that is to be desired; but occasionally we get a very somber and prosaic glimpse of the reality. We do not naturally pay as much attention to the truth disclosed by these glimpses as to the pictures outlined by fancy; but we ought to heed them a good deal more.

OCCASIONALLY “society” gives the rest of the world a glimpse of this kind. The other day some of the aristocracy of wealth in this city got together to devise something for their amusement. These people have to be amused, as do others, to keep life from becoming a burden; but they have to seek further for their amusement, since it has to be something uncommon. The result in this instance was that the common people were startled by reports in the next day’s papers of how “high” society has held a dance in which the participants wore wings and halos. Not long after this the same “society” were found seeking their entertainment by copying some of the wild and vulgar amusements characteristic of life on the outskirts of civilization. These glimpses of life on the top of the hill of mammon are very instructive, and they tell the exact truth.

It is perfectly plain from these and many other evidences that the true top to be sought in life is not that of wealth. Wealth adds many burdens, but gives no one a greater capacity for enjoyment. It confers many new cares upon its possessor, but no new faculties. It brings no new development to the higher faculties. From all it can confer, men turn again to the frivolous amusements which are characteristic of life upon its lowest plane.

* * *

JESUS CHRIST said, “He that will be great among you shall be your servant;” and in this is pointed out the path to real preëminence. The true top to be sought is the top of the mount of service. Whoever can most largely serve his fellow-beings, approaches nearest to God who is the great Servant—the one who gives to all living things every good gift, and sustains them in life to enjoy it. There is no unrest and unsatisfied longing constantly seeking to the frivolities of worldliness in the life that is devoted to Christian service.

* * *

THE proposed city ordinance against profane swearing, which has been the topic of much discussion here for some time past, was voted down at a recent meeting of the board of aldermen. The author of the measure, however, is not discouraged, and says that he will continue the crusade against profanity by similar means. Meanwhile the spirit of the crusade seems to have spread to other places, and from as far west as Colorado, we hear of an agitation to suppress this form of immorality by law.

THE suppression of public indecency is certainly a proper exercise of the civil power. When, however, “indecency” means only something which offends the religious sentiment of a class of the people, legal measures are out of place. Unfortunately, religious sentiment is prone to be very easily offended, and to stir up individuals to deeds which reflect anything but a Christian spirit. Christianity—love—“is not easily provoked;” but much that passes for Christianity is always quick to resent a fancied insult, and to take advantage of the law to gain some advantage over opposing religions. The superiority of the power of love as a force against evil is seen in that it stirs up no animosity and promotes no religious controversy. And love is a mighty power; it is the greatest power in the world; for love is God, and God is all powerful. Let the church have enough of God, and she will seek no further for power to combat with evil.

A COMMISSION composed of an equal number of representatives of the United States and of Spain is soon to begin a session to determine what disposition shall be made of the Philippines. A German paper says that the foreign firms in Manila met recently and agreed to urge upon the commission that the Franciscan, Dominican, and Augustinian monks be expelled from the islands, and that there be a stipulation for the freedom of religion.

It is altogether improbable that the United States will interfere with the monks and Jesuits in the Philippines. The Government does not interfere with them here at home, and it has sent a Roman Catholic prelate from this country to the Philippines in connection with the military expedition under General Merritt, for the special purpose of explaining to the monks and other Catholics on the islands that the United States is on friendly terms with the papacy. And so far as the influence of the papacy can be used in the settlement of the question, the principles of government that have been in force on the islands will remain undisturbed.

* * *

PROBABLY no other island territory could have been selected which would make the untried problem of colonization so difficult for the American Government as it will be upon the islands so long ruled by Spain. It will be interesting to watch the result of the experiment.

A "Christian Nation" Defined.

THE Independent (New York) quotes President Washburne as saying of the present course to be taken by the United States: "We shall do what we believe to be for our interest; or, if we can rise so high, what we see to be our duty to the world."

"Why," then queries the Independent, "should we not rise so high? Is the Christian obligation of beneficence a solely personal one, and does it have nothing to do with nations? Is it the first duty of a nation to be selfish? Must it consider first and only what will be for its own interests, with no regard to what are the interests of other nations?" This question, it says, is a very serious one, and a practical one as well.

It is admitted that "It has been the habit of nations to act on the theory that they are not their brothers' keepers. Let other nations look out for themselves, has been their thought, and we will look out for ourselves. Of course," says the Independent, "this is not Christian; but it has been supposed that a nation has no soul, and that it was a mere misnomer to speak of a Christian nation, when we meant a nation in which the people professed more or less generally the Christian faith."

The Independent then proceeds to state some things that "would be involved in a nation being really Christian and loving its neighbor as itself":—

"One thing is that it would feel some obligation to protect other peoples than its own against injury or oppression. A truly Christian nation would not allow the Turkish massacres to be repeated or the oppression of the Armenians to continue. It would suppress a robber State as soon as a pirate ship. A truly Christian nation would put a stop to the Spanish oppressions next to it in Cuba, even at a considerable loss in blood and treasure. Bismarck's famous remark about a Pomeranian grenadier was hideously unchristian; our intervention for Cuba was simply Christian.

"When a war breaks out between two nations, a really Christian nation will enter upon it without vindictiveness, and will desire that its enemy may be as little humiliated as is possible consistently with the object of the war. It will remember the command, obligatory on nations as well as individuals, 'Love your enemies.' It will make the conditions of peace as little onerous or disagreeable as possible, and it will treat prisoners with courtesy and kindness; and when war is over it will be ready to do everything it can for the rehabilitation and comfort of its late foes."

"Love your enemies;" yes, that is Christianity, and in connection with these words the author of Christianity said also, "Bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." And this also is Christianity, and nothing less than this is demanded by it.

Does this convey any hint of opposing one's enemies by sword and bullet? Can it be reconciled with war? Can Christianity be manifested through such weapons? If so, what need of spiritual weapons? Or is it a fact that Christian purposes can be promoted by carnal weapons of war? The plain teaching of Scripture is, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal."

Why this is so, why this must be so, is not difficult to see. Carnal weapons of warfare are for the purpose of killing men. A weapon that would not kill a man would never receive a moment's consideration from the military authorities of any nation. But spiritual weapons of warfare are for the purpose of killing sin, and saving men. The two must necessarily work at cross purposes.

With every government on the earth, self comes first. Christ was unselfish. He laid down his life for his enemies; but in war every government makes its enemies lay down their lives for it. By their very nature civil governments cannot be Christian, and any pretended enforcement of Christianity by civil or military power is a fraud.

"I AM tired and sick of moral essays. It would take about a ton of them to convert a child five years old. A man was talking of a certain church once, and said he liked it because the preacher never touched on politics and religion, just read nice little essays. Give the people the word of God. Some men only use the Bible as a textbook. They go up in a balloon and talk about astronomy, and then go down and give you a little geology, and next Sunday they go on in the same way, and then they wonder why it is the people do not read their Bibles.—D. L. Moody.

Characteristic of the Age.

THE lust of gold which is so characteristic of the present age, and the lengths to which people are led by it in the pathways of delusion, have been curiously illustrated of late by an "enterprise," the incidents and developments of which have furnished material for sensational reports in the daily press. We refer to the project set on foot in a seaside town of Maine, based upon the claim that fortunes in gold could be extracted from the sea. The idea was a natural successor to the delusion of the ancient alchemists, that gold could be produced by chemical process from some cheap metal like lead or tin. The cheapest thing about the whole undertaking was the idea upon which it was based.

Doubtless there was never a time before when the rainbow of sudden and easy fortune was chased by eager multitudes as it is to day. In itself this is a convincing proof of the mental and moral degeneracy of the age.

We copy from the Scientific American the following account of the gold-making enterprise referred to:—

"We have now to relate the most extraordinary story connected with the production of gold, which should be a warning to all who do not see in such affairs the specious combination of science and the wily swindler. We refer to the Electrolytic Marine Salts Company, which has recently attempted to extract gold from the sea, though the resulting gold in reality came from the pockets of the shareholders. The sensational debacle of the principal promoters of the company has produced considerable comment.

"In 1872 Sonstadt discovered the minute presence of gold in sea water, and this was confirmed by Professor Liversidge, of the University of Sydney, who found that in the sea water of New South Wales there was from one half to one grain of gold to one ton of sea water, or 130 to 260 tons per cubic mile. Professor Liversidge estimated the bulk of the oceans of the world as 308,710,679 cubic miles, and if each ton of sea water produced one grain of gold the aggregate amount would be $48,000,000,000,000, being 23.22 grains fine to the dollar. After this discovery, it is, of course, natural that scientists should have made attempts to secure the precious metal, by treating the sea water chemically and electrically, but it was soon discovered that such processes would be wholly impracticable, owing to the great expense attending the extraction of the gold from the enormous bulk of liquid. The matter should have ended here, but it got to be pretty well understood by the public that sea water contained gold. This fact afforded an ideal chance for the alleged inventor to devise a process for extracting the gold.

"A few months ago the Electrolytic Marine Salts Company was formed, and the good people of New England were asked to become shareholders, and soon nearly $1,000,000 of the $10,000,000 capital stock was subscribed. The enterprise belongs to the class which depends for success upon a secret process, which is in itself often a suspicious circumstance. Moreover, the man who devised the scheme for the extraction of the gold did not belong to the class from whom we are wont to expect great things in processes which require scientific attainments. Experiments were conducted near Providence, and a New York daily paper has been enabled to give a full outline of the ingenious trick. The capitalists were allowed to see the workings of the alleged invention. They were taken to a shed built on an old dock, and they were allowed to bring their own mercury and put it into the submarine tank, which was brought up to the surface by a winch. After the tank was properly arranged, it was lowered to the bottom and the current was turned on, and the investors sat around to await results. A diver, who has now fled the country, walked on the bottom of the sea at this point and substituted mercury specially prepared with gold for the mercury which the gentlemen had furnished. When the tank was brought up to the surface, the mercury was given to an assayer and $4.50 worth of gold was found, which was considered a very good sum for a single 'accumulator.'

"Capital now came easy after this; so that a large plant was erected at North Lubec, Maine, so as to get 'fresh' sea water. One plant had 240 accumulators at work. They are so located that the tide water passes through them and it is treated with chemicals and electricity, that never-failing aid to bolster up secret processes. It was claimed that gold and silver, one part of the former to two of the latter, were extracted from the water and that these metals were removed from time to time about once a week. It was held as a theory that a ton of sea water contained four cents worth of gold. It was claimed as a practice by the company that four mills' worth was taken from each ton of water and that each accumulator earns on an average $1 net a day. Each accumulator separated and used about twenty tons of sea water an hour for sixteen hours out of every twenty-four. It was claimed that the consumption of chemicals was very small. The machines appeared to do their work miraculously well, and each week a gold brick worth nearly $2,000 was sent to the city. The weekly gold brick was about the same weight and value, which showed that the machinery was working remarkably well and that the amount of gold in the water was a constant quantity, and the sixteen consignments netted $23,000.

"Finally the vice-president and general manager's financial operations in New York aroused the suspicions of the banks, which led to his flight and the discovery of the swindle, and both he and his diver sailed for Europe; and the deluded members of the company, who believed that the scheme was feasible and went into the business in good faith, are now going to work the plant themselves before they decide to admit that they have been deceived by perhaps the most astonishing and picturesque swindle of modern times. The moral to be drawn from this is that persons should not invest in any electrical or chemical process which they do not understand, until they have asked the opinion of some expert and for whose opinion they can well afford to pay."

THE Catholic Review reports that "by a recent order of Secretary of War Alger, Catholic priests who have permission from their bishops may celebrate mass, hear confessions, and visit the soldiers of any of our camps. No pay, however, will be given by the Government for such service."

Studies in French History.—35.

"I WOULD like to join your class in the study of French History," said Fred Green, bowing respectfully to Professor Carman, "and this is my friend, Bert Mathews,—he wants to come, too, if you don't mind."

"Indeed I shall be very glad to welcome you. Now that Charlie and Robert have gone away for a time, I shall be pleased for you to take their places, and then you see our class will not suffer in membership."

"Well, you see, professor, the boys left us their vacant chairs, or I'm afraid we wouldn't have dared to ask to join you, after so long, but we knew the studies must be quite interesting, or they would not be kept right up during vacation."

"History is something, my boys, which we must take as we find it, whether interesting or otherwise; but to me, at least, French history has a peculiar interest, from the fact that I think I can trace a likeness in it to our own past history and probable future. I am glad to say the interest in our class has never seemed better than at present."

The next Tuesday afternoon the two boys, Fred and Bert, were on hand, joining the other members of the class in the cheerful room where they usually assembled.

"Who can tell me what century we have now reached in our studies?" asked Professor Carman.

"The fourteenth!" exclaimed Florence Ray.

"Is this correct? I notice Harry's hand is raised. Do you object to this date, Harry?"

"We must have reached about the middle of the fifteenth century, or a little beyond; for last week you mentioned the birth and something of the life of Columbus."

"You are in the right of it, Harry; we have reached about to the year 1495. That very wicked pope, Alexander VI., anointed King Charles VIII. with holy oil, to ensure him a prosperous war, though I much doubt if this was the least particle of help to him; for indeed the king and the pope could not agree with each other hardly long enough for the anointing to take place."

"When the king and his army arrived in Naples, they found that the king of Naples, who was a vilely bad man, was as great a coward as he was a villain. He did not wait to meet the French king and defend his country,—he simply ran."

"I wonder if the Italians were not almost glad to welcome King Charles,—he surely was not so bad a ruler as their own," remarked Will Palmeter.

"You have judged very correctly, Will; in fact they made great demonstrations of joy at his arrival. Of course this pleased the foolish, romantic young king, who wrote letters back home, stating that an earthly paradise had been found, and that he was the lucky Frenchman who had found it."

"O professor! do tell us if he succeeded in holding his conquered possessions. It seems as if it was too good luck for him to be very lasting," exclaimed Milly Brown, with sparkling eyes. "Just think of it! the silly king to run away without a word, and leave his kingdom to Charles!"

"Lasting?—O no. His enemies set traps for him into which he readily fell, and at last he was obliged to fight his way back home to France as best he could."

"Then I suppose the king of Naples came back, didn't he?" asked Fred Green, who was already becoming deeply interested.

"O no, he died; but his son and successor, who was more worthy of the name of king than he, came back to Naples, and with the help of a great captain, drove the French invaders out of their country in short order."

"Well," said Joe Palmeter, "I imagine Charles must have thought by this time that the pope's blessing didn't amount to much."

"I have no doubt he did not overestimate it then, if he did before; but he was yet young and vain; so he decided he would now try a life of revelry and foolish pleasures, which thing he did. But at last, however, he decided to reform and try to imitate the example of his illustrious namesake, Saint Louis. So he found a tree for himself,—in strict imitation of him,—and there he administered justice to the people. But he did not live long after this; he met with an accident, hitting his head against a low door through which he was passing, and this is supposed to have caused his death."

"It must have been a very low door," said Edna Phillips; "for I remember you said last week that King Charles VIII. was almost a dwarf."

"You would surely catch me, Edna," smiled Professor Carman, "with that good memory of yours, if I were not very careful to tell the exact truth. Yes, it was a very low door opening from a gallery through which he was passing. But foolish as he had been until just before his death, he was sincerely mourned by many."

"It seems to me," sagely remarked Florence Ray, "that it would have been a pretty poor king who couldn't have made friends with those loyal people,—seems as if they were just anxious to find a ruler whom they could love."

"A true observation," answered Professor Carman.

"Nearly the whole of the fifteenth century had now passed, and a remarkable century it had been. We look back to it from this distance, and it appears to us like the first hours of the morning, just before the sun appears in dazzling brightness above the horizon. With the sixteenth century came the invention of printing,—for books were all simply written before this,—which in itself was sufficient to create a great upheaval in the world. Then, too, the Old World was rubbing her eyes in astonishment, as it were, at the discovery of the New.

"In fact, from now on," added Professor Carman, "we may consider that we are fairly launched upon the sea of modern history."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

A Snake in the Grass.

"My country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
I love thy rocks and rills,
Thy woods and templed hills,
My heart with rapture thrills,
Like that above."

TOM BROWN was singing "America" at the top of his voice, as he hoed away in the garden, and was thinking a great deal more about his country than of the potatoes. He paused after he finished the last verse not only to wipe the sweat off his brow, but something from his eyes. He looked around Rose Farm, then away off to the Alleghany Mountains. He could hear the splash of the river amid the rustle of trees and the pipe of the robin. The blue sky floated a white ship of cloud here and there, and peeping through the trees he could see the old farm house.

"Hurrah for America," shouted Tom. "Hurrah for Rose Wood Farm," and "snakes," yelled the boy as he gave a jump, and brought his hoe down on a long snake that was trailing through the field. "Whew," said Tom, excitedly, "There are some things that have got to be killed, even in the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Tom walked slowly to the house, thinking. "'Spose its the saloons and the things that are crawling around in the dark and under foot as it were, to poison the folks and to take away liberty like they used to in the Dark Ages. Grandpa says there's a going to be a time like there was long ago. I wonder——" Tom stopped to listen.

It was grandpa humming some old Methodist hymn. Tom caught the words,

"I'm but a stranger here, heaven is my home.
Earth is but dark and drear, heaven is my home."

"Grandpa," said Tom, "what makes you sing, earth is but dark and drear. It doesn't seem dark and drear to me. And as for heaven, who wants anything better than to-day? Hurrah for 'my country 'tis of thee.'"

Grandpa took out his spectacles to look at Tom. He laughed as Tom threw the hoe on the ground and turned three or four hands springs to work off his superfluous energy.

"Well, my boy," said grandpa, slowly wiping his spectacles to clear them of two kinds of tears. "I bless the Lord for the earth. It belongs to him, though as the poet says, 'the trail of the serpent is over us all.' But it's only the preparatory school after all. Like old Abraham, I'm a looking for a better country, for a city that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God. But la, child, I can remember that I once felt jest as you do. I think when folks are young and full of health and spirits, that they sorter mix a good deal of heaven into the earth anyway. They feel as if they was going to live forever or as long as Methuselah did anyhow, and that life holds only good. They don't know anything yet of the cold treacherous world; but the time 'll come, my lad, when earth won't seem so bright, and when you'll long for something better."

"Now tell me about it," said Tom. "You say you used to feel as I do, and then you found out your good feelings were all a delusion. What made you, grandpa?"

"Well, Tom. What was it you used to be singing so much last winter about things not bein' always what they seemed?"

"I know," said Tom, beginning to sing,

"Things are seldom what they seem,
Skim milk masquerades as cream,
Highlows pass for patent leathers,
Jackdaws strut in peacock's feathers."

"That's it, Tom. It's the insincerity of things that sicken the heart, and take the colors of beauty from the earth, and make one sing, 'earth is but dark and drear, heaven is my home.' The world as a world is good enough, provided one has health, hope, and love within. There are good people in it, too. But Oh, Tom, there are snakes. The trail of the serpent is over us all. But there is a world from which the serpent was cast out forever, and He who is to bruise the serpent, has told us to look up, where He is preparing mansions for us, and that presently He'll come and take us to Himself."

"And does this world just seem to you like a stopping place, grandpa?"

"Yes, Tom; my citizenship is yonder. You know Tom, when an ambassador is sent here from a foreign country to stay a few years in the interest of his country, he don't build him a fine mansion, take out citizen papers here, and forget that his business is simply the business of a representative of another country. That's the way it is with the Christian. He's here to represent the divine government for a season; but he expects to be called home."

"But grandpa, they are going to kill out all the snakes. I heard them talking it all over at the Christian Citizenship League the other evening. When we young folks grow up, we are going to vote down all the saloons, all the evils, all the oppression, and really make America over. We are going to make folks do right, and then this world will be almost as good as heaven. Mr. Allen said that then we might expect that Christ would reign on the earth, and that the will of God would be done on earth as it is in heaven."

"O Tom, Tom, how true it is that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. What has the good Lord himself said about his kingdom? He said, 'My kingdom is not of this world.' He said, if it was, then would my servants fight. Don't you think there would have to be some force employed to make people do right? Do you think you can compel the world to do the will of God? Do you think that law will make the world a kingdom of the God of love? The law of God is spiritual, and reaches to the intents and purposes of the heart."

"I don't know, grandpa. It seemed that it could be done when I was listening to the leaguers, and that God really expected the good people to make the bad ones come to terms."

"That scheme has been tried in the past; but it resulted in the persecution of the truly good, who were spiritually minded, and who really kept the commandments of God; and in turning the bad into the worst of hypocrites and knaves."

"Why, how, grandpa?"

"Well, first, they were going to have only Christian men in office."

"Yes, that's what they want now, and I think that's a fine thing."

"Tom, men will be anything to get into office, especially if there is a good salary behind it, or a way of obtaining money or power. Who is going to be the judge as to who is Christian?"

"Oh, I see; then you think people would pretend to be Christians to get into positions? Hum. I didn't think of that before."

"Yes; I'm sure that we should presently have officials of the type of Laud and Bonner. 'But except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.'"

"Well, grandpa, how would it affect good laws to have bad executioners?"

"Oh, we have often had that kind of government. But would the kind of laws the league wants to enforce be good laws for civil government?"

"Why, they'd be the laws of God. Where would you find better laws?"

"The law of God deals with the heart, Tom, and what would men have to enforce such laws?"

"Power to read the heart," said Tom, slowly.

"Yes, and in the Dark Ages just this kind of legislation instigated the Inquisition, in order to wrest from men the secrets of the heart by torture."

"O well, grandpa, they do not think of carrying things to such an extent as that, but to make men act good on the outside."

"That would be proper to the extent of controlling those who would do violence to men's lives, virtue, property, or liberty; but beyond the line of civility, it would be to make men hypocrites and knaves, and to endanger and even strangle the sweet liberty we now enjoy."

"Hum," said Tom, picking his teeth thoughtfully.

"But I can't see how it would do the good people any harm?"

"Well, I can," said grandpa. "In the first place, if I live to see such a thing in a way to succeed, I would raise my voice against it as a Christian. I would protest vigorously, and the leaguers would look upon me as an enemy, and would think me a traitor to good order and an enemy to good government and to the interests of humanity, and if the law was on their side, you would have the privilege of visiting grandpa in jail, unless you would be afraid to come."

"Not much," said Tom.

"Besides, I would probably have ideas of what was right to do, that the leaguers would think were heretical, or if I did not, some one else undoubtedly would, and then men would be persecuted for their opinion, and the innocent suffer as malefactors. That's what happened when the Puritans tried this very scheme. Roger Williams was banished, Quakers were whipped, witches drowned, and doves stoned for cooing on the Sabbath."

"O grandpa, you are too ridiculous."

"No, indeed, I'm in dead earnest."

"Well, well, well! The leaguers talked a great deal about Sabbath desecration, and about enforcing the old Blue Laws."

"That's it," said grandpa. "It's the old scheme up again."

"There's a snake in the grass!" shouted Tom, rushing for his hoe. "This kind of mild weather brings them out."

"Jes so," said grandpa. "And this kind of milk and water gospel is thawing out the old dragon. Give it to him, Tom."

As Tom came back to the house, he heard two sweet quavering voices singing together—

"In the Christian's home in glory,
There remains a land of rest;
For my Saviour's gone before me,
To fulfill my soul's request.
There is rest for the weary."

"Grandpa," said Tom, "if the kingdom's come, and the will of God done on earth anywhere, I think it's in hearts like yours and grandma's."

"Yes. The kingdom of God is within you; and some day, Tom, when Jesus comes to weed out and burn up the tares, he will gather the wheat into his garner. Then he'll renew the earth, and repeople it with the righteous, and the kingdoms of this world will belong to our Jesus, and he shall rule. For 'unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion.' But it will never be made the kingdom of Christ through the enforcement of law. We are to persuade, beseech, entreat, as God's ambassadors. He'll see to the execution of judgment. By and by, Tom, the earth will blossom as a rose, and there won't be any snakes to look out for."

"Hurrah!" shouted Tom. "Then it will be 'my country 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty.'"

"Highly Pleased With It."

A LADY who lately purchased a "Cyclone" washer writes:—

Washington, N. H., Aug. 1, 1898.

A. MALLETT, New York,

Dear Sir: After having examined several kinds of washing machines, I concluded to try the "Cyclone" Washer, and having tried it for three weeks am highly pleased with it. I shall recommend it to my friends as the very best in my opinion. MRS. H. I. FARNSWORTH.

Send for descriptive circular and list of testimonials. If you want a washing machine buy the best, which is the Cyclone. Now is your chance to get one at a reduced price. Address A. MALLETT, 39 Bond St., New York.

Invaluable to Bible and History Students

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 25, 1898.

NO COUNTERFEIT righteousness will ever get into circulation in heaven.

JESUS CHRIST is the ladder that reaches from the lowest plane of humanity to the throne of God.

It is impossible for man in his finite wisdom to prescribe the manner of Sabbath observance without lowering the standard of Sabbath observance from the requirements of the divine law.

It is the fate of the SENTINEL, as, we suppose, of most other journals, to be the subject of occasional criticism. This is proper—the SENTINEL doesn't hold itself above criticism—only we notice that the majority of these come from people who don't read it. We want to profit by these criticisms, but we hardly know how to profit by criticisms of the SENTINEL from people who don't read it.

THERE are people who say that the SENTINEL is hard on the Catholics. We deny this charge; certainly we do not mean to be severe on the Catholics, or on any others. But we are hard on Roman Catholic principles—we confess that. And the reason for this is that Roman Catholic principles are hard on those who adhere to them. Those principles are chains which are bound about the adherents of the Catholic belief. And when we strike the chain, with the purpose of freeing the captive, it may appear that we are striking the man instead; but this is a mistake which a little discrimination will discover. This is the trouble with many people in their attitude towards God. They do not discern that his judgments are not against the sinner, but against sin. God hates sin; but he so loved the sinner that he gave his only-begotten Son for his salvation. It is always important to discriminate between the principle and the person who holds it.

THE question of Pope Leo's successor is strongly agitating the college of cardinals at Rome, owing to the apparent nearness of the pope's decease. The probabilities, it is said, point to the election of one of the Italian cardinals. Taking a look historically at the "chair of Peter," it is to be observed that it has been filled more frequently by Italians than by all persons of other nationality combined. And from this the only conclusion to be drawn, from a papal standpoint, is that the Italian nation is far superior to any other nation on earth in the sight of God. Why it should be so is a mystery for Catholics to explain.

AS IF to still further complicate the situation respecting the Philippines, Admiral Dewey and General Merritt assaulted and took the city of Manila, Saturday, the 13th, and received from the Spanish commander, it is said, the surrender of the whole Philippine group. So now it is claimed by the American press that there is no Philippine question, the whole group of islands being the property of the United States by right of conquest. But this happened after the signing of the peace protocol; the American commanders in the Pacific not having learned of the advent of peace. So that it would appear that the United States is bound not to make any claim based upon the latest victory of the American arms.

THE saloon is a natural enemy of society; therefore we have always advocated that it be dealt with by the law of the land as such. There is not one right of mankind which the saloon respects; not one upon which it has not ruthlessly trampled. Strong drink hurls reason from its throne, and puts in its place only the instincts and intelligence of a beast. Why, then, should the saloon merit protection from those to whom it is a deadly foe? Why should a viper complain because some one does not warm it in his bosom? How many murders has the saloon committed?—think of it! In what other case does civilization throw the protection of law around a murderer with such a record? We say this is wrong; and we believe that in saying it we are right. The "moderate" drinker cuts no figure in this question. The saloon must be judged not by the moderate drinkers, but by its finished products, the drunkards.

"AND it shall come to pass in the last days," speaks the prophetic Word, "that I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh." How then will the Spirit be manifested by those who receive it? Jesus Christ said, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound;" and as the Spirit was manifested in him, so will it be in his followers. The Spirit has been poured out, and when it is received—when the church is ready to receive it—the world will resound with the proclamation of religious liberty in Christ.

AMONG the warnings that have been sounded in the nation's ears against imperialism, a forcible one is the following from ex-Secretary John Sherman, whose long experience in the business of republican government well qualifies him to know whereof he speaks:—

"I regret to notice a disposition in Congress to reach out for outside territory. This ambition for the occupation of territory has been the ruin of Greece, Rome, and the great nations of Asia in ancient times, and of Spain, Austria, and Italy in modern times. And now the United States is in more danger from similar causes than all others combined.

"The greed of territory and the attempt to rule it lost Great Britain the great body of what is now the United States of America. If we can be content with our vast continental possessions we can dispense with the islands of the sea. There is no room for them in our system of States. Their people do not speak our language. Friendly trade relations can be easily arranged, but American domination, if attempted, will lead to interminable evils."

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 1, 1898.

NUMBER 34.

CHRISTIANITY is the only true optimism.

CHRISTIANITY means the power of love; politics means the love of power.

THE Golden Rule cannot be run into the mold of legislation.

THE earth is run by politics, but Christianity is the motive power of heaven.

POLITICS is a struggle for the mastery; Christianity seeks not to rule, but to serve.

PEOPLE who claim to be saints and to own the earth may well be viewed with suspicion.

THE theory that the civil ruler is bound to execute the will of God on earth, can become effective only by making the church the power behind the throne.

God never patches up a piece of his handiwork that has become marred by sin; he does it over, regenerates it, makes a new creation.

THE "GATEWAY OF POLITICS."

In this day very much is expected from politics by would-be reformers of society. Indeed, from one of the leading reform movements of the age the statement has come that "the kingdom of God is to enter the realm of law through the gateway of politics;" and this states the principle upon which reform work in general is now being conducted. Through politics, men expect to usher in the millennium. But can the kingdom of God pass through such a gateway as this? Will that kingdom pass by the evil and corruption which find in politics their readiest field of action, and are as inseparable from it as they are from human nature? Assuredly not. Rather will it sweep away all these things, leaving neither politics nor political governments. A reform which is in harmony with that kingdom must be separate from politics.

THE use of force by Christ's servants is an argument that his kingdom is of this world. But as the argument itself is false, so those who advance it are false servants.

JESUS CHRIST never held or will hold a political office.

THE purest politics can draw no soul heavenward.

POLITICS has its source in human nature; Christianity flows from the divine nature.

It would be just as easy to preserve Christianity by law as to preserve the Sabbath by law.

WHEN men try to set up the kingdom of God, they always reserve positions of honor in it for themselves.

If the pathway of politics tended upward, the pathways of nations would not tend, as all have done, toward decay.

Sunday Enforcement and Good Government.

In the city of Nashville, Tenn., public sentiment has been agitated of late over the question of the removal from office of the chief of police. It appeared certain that the removal would be made, and it was charged by a class of the citizens standing for certain ideas of "moral" government, that it was the work of the gamblers and Sunday tipplers. We do not mention it to discuss the conflict of the good and bad elements in the city government, but to notice a common idea of good government which came to the surface in connection with this agitation, and appeared in the Nashville Banner. In a communication to that journal, a citizen says:—

"In my opinion the time has come when the good people of this city, without severing their party ties, shall say to these law-breakers, 'The party is bigger than the gamblers' association and the Sunday tipplers' association, and if they don't like the party there is plenty of room to quit it.'

"These associations have so manipulated parties as to have an undue weight in public affairs. They must be told that they have no exclusive rights; that seeking the protection of the law in their just rights, they must obey it; that the merchant, the mechanic, the manufacturer, are not allowed to keep open shop on Sunday, and they do not in defiance of law undertake to do it; that the farmer, though his crop—his young corn and cotton—may be choked with weeds, dare not go into the field with his plow on Sunday; that even the Seventh-day Adventist, who is impelled by the strongest religious convictions to give Saturday to his devotions, is not allowed to plow his corn on Sunday, and that the saloon man is not better than they; that the gambler's occupation is certainly not a favored calling; that betting has its penalties, which may be paid and the law satisfied, but keeping gambling houses in a city with its awful consequences on society cannot and will not be tolerated; and that this community will not quietly submit to the removal of a public officer because he develops a capacity to enforce the law."

The idea which appears all through this quotation is that good government is to be attained by suppressing gambling and liquor selling on Sunday. The manufacturer, farmer, and seventh-day observer must observe Sunday, and the gambler and saloonist are not better than they. Hence they must be made to do likewise; and the good people of the city should see the chief of police is retained who will carry this into effect.

Instead of recognizing that gambling and liquor selling are wrong and demoralizing on all days, by their very nature, this idea of good government passes over the inherent evil of these things, and lays its stress upon the desecration of Sunday. But good government can not be promoted anywhere by losing sight of the inherent evil of vicious practices. And this is certainly one tendency, and a strong one, of the agitation for the compulsory observance of Sunday. The more the attention becomes fixed upon the assumed sanctity of Sunday, the more tendency is there to see in the desecration of the day a greater offense than in the vicious practice by which it is desecrated; until at length the main evil of gambling and liquor selling seems to lie not so much in the demoralizing nature of such practices as is the fact that they are conducted on Sunday.

In this way the Sunday laws tend really to strengthen the hold these evils have acquired upon public tolerance. The effort that should be directed toward their entire suppression on all days is largely expended in making them conform to the requirements of the Sunday law; and having conformed to its requirements, they by that very thing acquire a degree of respectability in the public view which otherwise would not be possible. Cannot those who desire good city government see the danger which lies in this diversion of the force of public sentiment from the evil thing itself, to its desecration of Sunday? If they cannot, it is not because the danger is not real and conspicuous.

To suppress liquor selling on Sunday only, is to tacitly assent to the traffic on other days of the week. To prohibit it by law on Sunday only, is to justify it by law on other days; and behind such a law the evil traffic can take refuge, and hold up its monster head without fear as a law-abiding institution. But do lovers of good government want such a condition of things to exist?

Let all such arouse to the danger of the movement which would oppose these evils by suppressing them on Sunday. Friends, you cannot advance in the direction of good government by way of Sunday laws. They are a deception and a snare. To secure good government an evil must be opposed because it is such in its nature, and not because it is connected with what may or may not be wrong, according to the truth or falsity of theological tenets. With such conditions civil government can have nothing to do. Whether Sunday desecration is right or wrong, is a question with which the chief of police of any city, or any other civil officer, as such, has no concern whatever. It is a question to be settled by Scripture, and the truth of Scripture can be settled for an individual only by the teaching of the Holy Spirit.

The Moral Law and the Civil Ruler.

IN the August Christian Statesman, Rev. R. C. Allen treats of the "fundamental principles of civil government, specifically considered." Among these principles, as he enumerates them, are the following:—

"9. The only right a man has is to do right.

"10. But man is a sinner and God is invisible. How will moral law be enforced for the time being?

"11. Moral force is sufficient to control moral beings; but physical force must compel immoral beings.

"12. God has instituted civil government for this end, and has clothed the civil ruler with authority to execute his moral law.

"13. God has ordained civil government to enforce his moral law among men that they shall enjoy their rights."

This last assertion is italicized and set forth as being the "principal proposition."

This is the true national reform theory, set forth without any attempt at disguise. Its fundamental proposition is "God . . . has clothed the civil ruler with authority to execute his moral law."

Let us suppose that this proposition is true; what follows?

If the civil ruler is true to the requirements of his office, being clothed with this authority, he will proceed to execute God's moral law upon transgressors as they are brought before him. What then?

The transgression of the law is sin (1 John 3:4); and "the soul that sinneth it shall die." Eze. 18:4, 20.

That the penalty of sin, of every kind or degree, is death, is by the testimony of Scripture too plain a fact to require argument. Adam, in the Garden of Eden, was told by his Creator that in the day that he disobeyed the command given him concerning the tree of knowledge of good and evil, he would surely die. He did disobey, and from that moment he became mortal, and started on his journey to the grave. But mightier than this—a stupendous and unimpeachable testimony to the truth that the penalty of sin is death—is the fact of the death of the Son of God on the cross. This was because Adam had transgressed the moral law, and if there had been any escape from the death penalty, this infinite sacrifice could have been avoided. But there was no escape from death, and only through the death of Christ was there escape for Adam and his sinful posterity.

No sinner can enter heaven; this is a fact universally admitted. But he who is shut out of heaven will, it is declared, be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, which is the "second death."

It being unquestionably true, then, that the penalty of sin is death, when transgressors of the moral law are brought before the civil ruler, he being commissioned of God to execute the moral law, it would simply remain for him to execute the death penalty upon every individual who should be found guilty. And as all people upon the earth are sinners, how long would it be before every man, woman and child in the land would be put to death, supposing the civil rulers to be faithful in doing their "duty"? And all this, in order that men "shall enjoy their rights!" Imagine the people of a land enjoying their rights under such a régime as this!

And being sinners themselves, it would remain finally for the civil rulers, after having put all others to death, to execute the death penalty upon themselves; and then this theory of the authority of the civil power would have been fully carried into effect! And as the result of it, there would remain not a single living soul on the earth!

Is this what the people want? Is it what those want who advocate a union of the civil power with religion? There can be no such union which would leave out the moral law of God, certainly; and being joined with the moral law, the only possible result would be the execution of the death penalty upon the people, as before stated. This is what union of the State with religion means; and that it does mean just this is as plain as A B C.

But to prevent this, to give the transgressor probation and an opportunity still to obtain the eternal life for which he was created, God at an infinite sacrifice provided the plan of salvation. He sends to man the gospel—the "glad tidings"—expressly to prevent the execution of his moral law upon him. He made an infinite sacrifice, giving his only begotten Son to die, expressly to save man from being visited with the execution of his moral law. By and by, in the great Judgment day, he will execute his moral law upon all who shall then be found transgressors, and the result to all such will be eternal death.

It is perfectly clear, then, that this doctrine which declares the civil ruler to be authorized to execute the moral law of God, is squarely opposed to the gospel. It is as squarely against God and against Christ, as is Satan himself. It is the doctrine of antichrist. It means death, and not life,—death to the state, death to the church, death to everything. Let it be recognized for what it is, and carefully shunned by the American people.

Peace Negotiations.

BY E. J. WAGGONER.

"PEACE I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you." John 14:27.

How does the world give peace? A striking answer is furnished by the nations of the world. Take for instance the recent struggle between Spain and the United States. After much blood and treasure had been spent, Spain began to negotiate for peace. The United States, of course, responded, but let it be distinctly understood that while the matter was under consideration the war would be vigorously prosecuted. And so war and “peace” measures were considered at the same time between the same parties. Out of the same fountain both sweet water and bitter are supposed to be sent forth.

Take the nations of Europe. Peace is now supposed to prevail. There is no actual fighting anywhere. But what is the attitude of every power? Armed to the teeth, and industriously increasing their armaments. They stand with weapons in hand, waiting only a threatening movement on the part of another, to let fly. The “peace” of which there is so much boast, is exactly the same “peace” that prevails between two pugilists, who stands with clenched fists, and who have not yet come to blows because each wishes to let the other begin, so that he may learn his antagonist’s plan of attack.

“But that is not peace at all,” you say. Just so; for the world does not give any real peace. “There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked.” The world cannot give what it has not. An “armed peace” is not peace; yet the only way the world has of preserving peace is by maintaining armies so strong that others will not dare attack them. But those very armies are a preparation for war, and a constant menace to peace. So the peace which the world gives is in reality war.

Not so the Lord. He speaks peace, because he is peace. God is “the very God of peace;” the gospel is “the gospel of peace;” Jesus Christ is “the Prince of peace.” God’s rule is a reign of peace. To the helpless, tempest tossed sinner the Lord says: “Let him take hold of my strength, that he may make peace with me.” Isa. 27:5. But he does not throw the burden of peace negotiations upon the rebels. No; “God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself.” He takes the initiative, and makes peace with rebellious man, “not imputing their trespasses unto them.” He takes the responsibility of the sin all upon himself.

God does not stand upon his dignity. He does not demand that everything shall be done to satisfy his wounded feelings. No; the mind of God in Christ showed itself in that he “made himself of no reputation.” The One who is sinned against takes the blame upon himself, and makes the way very easy for the offending one to lay down his weapons. He has no enmity against the sinner, nay, he does not fight the sinner; he is only love and perfect peace, and his sole effort is to induce the rebel to accept his peace.

Let the people learn God’s character before they talk about conducting war on Christian principles. War on Christian principles is just such war as Christ wages. He has no hatred in his heart, and he does not kill his enemies. On the contrary, he is filled with infinite love and pity for them, and he gives his life for them. “The Son of man is not come to destroy men’s lives, but to save them.” Instead of taking life, he gives life, even his own life of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

“Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.” Not simply are we at peace with him, but we have his peace dwelling in our hearts, and sanctifying us. Then “let the peace of God rule in your hearts,” and “the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus.”

Why Shouldn't They?

BY F. B.

TOM:

They’re going to fence the common in,
They say we’re getting tough,
Because we play on Sunday
When week days are enough;
But we must work all through the week,
And never see the sky;
But they’re going to fence the common in
And can you tell me why?

I’ll loiter round the alley, Joe,
Or mope round in the room,
Or with some fellers find a way
To some back-door saloon.
For Sunday folks who go to church
Don’t have the whole to say;
Why will they fence the common in
And spoil our little play?

I know we shout—and run around;
It does us good I’m sure;
The game is harmless, we have found
The air is good and pure.
We hear the singing from the church,
It doesn’t bother us;
But oh, the church folks fume and sigh,
And make a fearful fuss.

JOE:

They’re going to fence the common in,
But that is not the whole;
They’re going to fence the human in
And quite corral his soul.
They’re going to have a Sunday law
That will not brook pretense;
You’ll have to stand in solemn awe
Inside the Sunday fence.

You’ll see a day, dear comrade, Tom,
That’ll take you off your perch,
For a “cop” will see, if you don’t come
That you are brought to church.
No alley foul, or gloomy room
Will give a place to stay,
And nary will there be saloon
To open on that day.

The folks must do their drinking up
Inside of Saturday night,
For on a Sunday everywhere
The law will keep ’em right.
Pious as priests, you’ll all go in Beneath a rein and bit;
And if you are not pure from sin
You’ll be a hypocrite.

Tom:

But, Joe, we're not the only ones
 This will not suit a bit;
 Will Robert Ingersoll go in
 And be a hypocrite?
 Then, there are Jews who keep their day
 And Baptist seventh dayers;
 Will they have Saturday laws as well
 To keep down all ball-players?
 What's fair for one is fair for all;
 Let the Sunday folks be pious;
 Why should they take the shears of law
 To cut love on the bias?
 Let them have if they must a Sunday law
 That'll keep them on their knees;
 But let Infidels and Israelites
 And other folks do as they please.
Why shouldn't they?

Alexander Campbell on the Office of the Civil Magistrate.

Written to the Washington, Pa., "Reporter," April, 1822.

MR. EDITOR—

Sir: I proceed to offer a few remarks on the office of the civil magistrate. This is an office of great antiquity and of great importance to the prosperity of society. All those persons in every State, who are appointed to execute the laws of the State are, in our language, called civil magistrates. Emperors, kings, presidents, and governors have been called the chief magistrate of the States over which they severally presided; justices of the peace and judges of courts have also received the name of magistrate. In all countries they are, or should be, men of excellent character, and fathers of the people. In a word they are, or should be, men selected and authorized by the people, to execute the laws under which they wish to be governed. The preservation of public tranquility, of life, liberty, reputation, and property, are the great purposes which originated this office. The civil magistrate is a State officer, and as such obliged to take into consideration the interests of the State, as far as this can be promoted by the most faithful execution of the laws committed to him.

In every State the powers of the magistrate should be, and commonly are, prescribed and limited in the commission which he receives, or the laws which institute the office. The corruption of men renders the existence of this office necessary, and consequently should define the duties of it.

Civil government and the church are institutions intended for the good of mankind; the one to promote his temporal, the other his eternal, good. The one to minister to his fleshly comforts, the other to advance his spiritual interests. They both emanate from the same fountain of authority (Rom. 13:1), and were dictated from the same principles of philanthropy. They are, however, as distinct as soul and body, and should be considered as distinct in their nature, properties, and operations. The office of the civil magistrate has existed in all countries, with and without an established religion. Savage nations, Mohammedans, pagans, and Christians have their civil magistrates, and, among all such, the office is a divine ordinance. Where there is, and where there is not, a church, the ordinance is the same. In Rome the constituted governor and magistracy, though heathen, and persecuting Christianity, was called, in Paul's time, even when a Nero and a Domitian sat on the throne, an ordinance of God, by that Spirit that can denominate nothing wrong. Yes, in the New Testament the heathen magistrates are called God's ministers, and he that resisteth them is said not to resist man but God.

Yes, the civil magistrate in all the nations upon the earth is appointed by God, "to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil" to his neighbor, and to be a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well. For this purpose he bears the sword of power, and is invested with authority. He is, in the same record which denominates him a minister of God to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil, prohibited from using his authority, which is always compulsory, in anything pertaining to spiritual concerns. For this purpose the sword of power is never to be unsheathed. It was once wielded for this purpose even in the presence of the Founder of Christianity; but it was returned to its scabbard, with these memorable and effective words: "All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword"—that is, not to defend the State, but to support the church. He who is the Author of Christian faith, also said that if His kingdom were of a worldly nature, His servants would use violence in support of His cause. But such was not its nature.

My creed on this subject is the following, viz.: That, as the civil magistracy is in all nations alike the appointment or ordinance of God, whether they are pagans' Mohammedans, or Christians, it is never to be employed in support of any religion whatsoever; nor are civil rulers on any account whatsoever to use any of that authority which they have received for and from the State, in support of Christianity; nor ever directly or indirectly to use compulsion in anything pertaining to religion; but they are to use all their authority in keeping good order in society, or in preserving the public peace, the life, liberty, reputation, and property of the citizens of the State.

Those who differ from me on this topic, I request to consider three things:—

1. That if the magistrate in the United States, for instance, proceed officially to support or defend the religion of this country, the Turkish, Japanese, Spanish, Chinese, or any other magistrate has the same power and right (being equally a divine institution there as here to accomplish the moral government of the world) to defend and support the religion of their respective countries.

2. That swords, cannons, guns, powder, lead, prisons, gold, silver, or bank-notes, cannot make the conscience bend, renew the soul, spiritually illumine the human mind, nor give a new moral sense. That rack, gibbets, wheels, whips, or even the mild punishment of four dollars' fine, cannot promote piety or benevolence.

3. That all such efforts on the part of the magistrate are prohibited in the institutes of Christianity.

I am aware that not a few model both the church and the state after the "commonwealth of Israel," and would have something like the Jew in civil and ecclesiastical concerns. I have yet said nothing respecting the civil magistracy of the Jews, which seems to be the copy after which the "moral associations" would, if they dared, model their little Sanhedrims and their young St. Giles.

With regard to the Jews I will say, there was no office purely civil. Their government was a pure theocracy, and all their officers were under the immediate appointment of their king, who was none else than their God. Hence, when they sought a king like other nations, the Lord charged them with having rejected himself as their king. Civil and religious offices were reposed in the same hands; hence Moses performed offices civil and religious. The seventy elders, selected to assist him in judging and awarding, took under their cognizance things civil and religious. The Jews cannot become a model to any nation in the world, either in their civil government or in their ecclesiastical; for this plain reason, that no nation ever stood in the same relation to God, nor received their political institutions in the same manner. I would remind those who are so eager to imitate them that the punishment the Jewish rulers inflicted on those who transgressed the letter of the first table of the law, was only death. The Sabbath-breaker and the blasphemer were only stoned to death. There was no commutation of the crime; for, if the sins against God are to be punished as such, there is no temporal privation that can be considered as such. Let those who are zealous of punishing Sabbath-breakers and of executing what they call the law of God, be consistent with themselves and their precedents, and stone to death the Sabbath-breaker and the blasphemer.

Since the Jewish religion became obsolete, there never was a tribunal on earth appointed of God to take cognizance of, or to punish, sins against God. This power God has committed to none on earth; he has no representative on earth.

In regard to the Sabbath day and the institutes of religion, I except them entirely from the jurisdiction or cognizance of the civil magistrates, in any sense whatever.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 1.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE Holy Spirit is the divinely-appointed representative of Christ upon earth.

A part of the ministry of the Holy Spirit is to lead the follower of Christ "into all the truth." John 16:13. (R. V.)

He who has the Holy Spirit dwelling in him fully,—he who has completely surrendered himself—body, soul, and spirit—to the guidance of the Holy Spirit,—need not fear being taught anything but the truth. The Holy Spirit is the "Spirit of truth," and could teach nothing contrary to the truth.

But the Holy Spirit is not the only spirit that is in the world, and there is danger of one's surrendering himself up to a spirit claiming to be the Holy Spirit, but which is in reality a lying spirit. In that case the soul would inevitably be led into error, and at the same time believe it to be the truth.

Of this danger God has warned the children of men, even as he warned our first parents in the Garden of Eden of the enemy who would attempt to beguile them away from God. Hence we read: "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world." 1 John 4:1.

This being so, it is our imperative duty to challenge every spirit that comes to us, even the Holy Spirit. In the Scripture quoted above, we have divine authority for challenging every doctrine that is taught us by any of these spirits. We must try them all.

But to do this we must have some standard of truth, and to that standard even the Holy Spirit must conform. This is not because the Spirit of God could in any way lead us astray, but it is to safeguard us against false spirits and false teachers whom they might use.

But whatever that standard is it must be the truth; and it must be so plain that the dullest mind can understand it. If this were not so, those only of the keenest intellects would be safe.

What this standard is, is told us by the Prophet Isaiah, chap. 8:20: "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them."

In previous articles we have shown that in the plan of redemption the law of God is above Christ and the gospel. They are both subject to it in the sense that whatever they teach cannot be right unless it is witnessed to by the law. Rom. 3:21. Just so it is with the Holy Spirit.

Concerning this law the Psalmist says, "Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness; and thy law is the truth." Psa. 119:142.

Any spirit therefore, which, claiming to be the Holy Spirit, shall teach anything contrary to that law, is not to be received as the Holy Spirit.

The Holy Spirit is of the light, and there is no darkness in him, but God says any one who speaks contrary to the word of the law does it because there is no light in him.

It must be plain that even the word or the letter of that law must be truth; for if such were not the case then the wording of the law would be false and misleading. Therefore whatever true knowledge one might have of the law, it can never be contrary to the wording of the law. Therefore we may know that any spirit that would teach contrary to what the law says is not the Holy Spirit. From this it is not hard to see what spirit it is that teaches that Sunday is the Sabbath day.

The fourth commandment, the only one that has anything to say with reference to the matter of the Sabbath, says in the plainest way, so plainly that the dullest mind can comprehend it, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." That is the truth; therefore whatever the Holy Spirit would teach us concerning the nature of the Sabbath, he could never teach anything contrary to that statement—"the seventh day is the Sabbath." If he did he would not be the "Spirit of Truth."

But everybody knows that Sunday is not the seventh day. All know that it is the first day of the week.

What then becomes of the claim of the Catholic Church that it changed the Sabbath from the seventh day to the first day of the week under the direction of the Holy Spirit. It is a false claim in every particular, and proves conclusively that the spirit by which it sought to effect the change was not the Holy Spirit. Clearly then, not being the work of the Holy Spirit, it must have been the work of the spirit of antichrist.

But ascribing the work of the spirit of antichrist as being that of the Holy Spirit is nothing short of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (see Matt. 12:22-32), and therefore stamps the papacy as the "man of sin." 2 Thess. 2:3, 4.

Stopping Ritualism By Act of Parliament.

"Present Truth" (London, Eng.)

THE Bishop of Liverpool, in reply to an appeal to him to stop the Romish practices in one of the Liverpool churches, said:—

"You cannot dislike ritualism more than I do; but you are mistaken in supposing that I have power to put a stop to it. Parliament has much power to stop it, but a bishop has very little."

Upon this the Christian makes the following comment:—

"The assertion of popular right to a hand in the government of the church would be but a return to apostolic usage and custom. For many centuries, as there are clear proofs, laymen exercised a determining voice in the ecclesiastical councils of their day. It was only very gradually, and for reasons that are easily noted, that the priest grew paramount. When his authority was finally established the day of decline began in the church, which did not wake to its sad condition till, at the Reformation, the voice of the people once more began to make itself heard. In every age and land since then the church has been healthy and progressive in proportion as it has been governed openly by the 'assembly of the saints.' If at the present crisis the members of the Church of England make an effective protest against Romanizing doctrine and practice, the knell of these things will be speedily sounded—but not till then."

Without any disparagement whatever to Parliament, we must say that it sounds decidedly amusing to hear that body referred to as an "assembly of the saints." It is composed of men of every shade of religious belief, and of men who repudiate religion of any kind; yet it is the body that has control of the Church of England! Worst of all, the bishops of the church seem not to feel the humiliation of the thing in the least. When will they learn that Christ alone has control of his own body, and that to say that any body of lawmakers has power to control a church, is to say that it is not the church of Christ? This is not to say, however, that many of the members of such a State-controlled church may not be members of the church of Christ. His body is not shaped by lines and compasses in the hands of men, and takes no note of the limits of ecclesiastical organizations.

Suppose that Parliament should "put a stop" to ritualism in the Church of England? What of it? The evil would still remain untouched. You cannot cure a miser's covetousness by stealing his money from him, neither can you cure a woman's pride by pulling the feathers from her bonnet, or the rings from her fingers. No more can a bad tree be made good by plucking off its fruit. All these efforts to "reform" the church by force, whether made by zealous individuals on their own account, or by Parliament, exhibit a most deplorable lack of knowledge of what constitutes real godliness. If the tree be corrupt, the fruit cannot possibly be good. The Word of God abiding in the heart is the only thing that effects a reformation. "Preach the Word!" That is the only remedy for evils of every kind. "But they won't all accept the truth of the gospel," will be said. No, they will not, and when they do not, nothing can be gained by trying to force them to act as though they did. When the idea that men can be converted by wholesale is given up, and men are content with the results that come from preaching the Word, and from dealing with men as individuals, and not as societies, leaving each man to stand or fall to his own Master, then will there be a return to apostolic usage and custom—and not till then.

"A WRONG is not right because it is gray-headed, nor clean because it has been baptized."

THE war is ended; but the slaughter of the troops continues. There are some things that seems to be even more fatal to the troops than the guns of the enemy.

ALL accounts of army movements are full of tales of sickness and death from disease, exposure, and improper food, and the general impression is that there has been gross if not criminal incompetence displayed in the management of affairs relating to the health of the soldiers. Where the blame properly rests is of course a disputed question. No one has yet been found who is willing to shoulder the blame which, like Noah's dove, is seeking a resting place.

* * *

THE situation, however, has become too serious, and public indignation too strongly aroused, to be passed over in silence. The highest commanding officer, General Miles, is understood to have made serious charges against the Secretary of War and his assistants, and an investigation by court martial is expected to result. This is a phase of the war that does not seem to have been anticipated at the start.

* * *

THAT scores and perhaps hundreds of lives should have been sacrificed to official incompetence and military red tape is certainly a fact which reflects seriously upon the men in charge of the campaign. It has been affirmed that the United States was waging a Christian warfare; but the spirit of Christian helpfulness which was to be manifested toward the Cubans seems to have been quite absent in the treatment accorded the American troops themselves by the military authorities. And this only goes to show, with many other things, the hollowness of the claim that Christianity was exemplified in this carnal warfare.

ANOTHER thing about which much has been said, and which has a bearing in this direction, is the army "canteen." This word stands for a system by which intoxicating drinks is served to the soldiers in camp, who both drink the liquor and are obliged to furnish bar tenders. Imagine a Christian young man forced to serve as bar tender in one of these drinking places, or be disciplined for insubordination. It is a very plain truth that a Christian who would go to war must either make a god of his superior officers, or expect to be subjected to military discipline. The military code provides no place for conscience in the life of the soldier.

* * *

How MUCH of the disease that is making greater ravages among the troops than was made on the battle field, is due to this army "canteen"? The close relation between spirituous drink and bodily disease is well enough established to warrant the conclusion that the canteen is by no means guiltless as regards this dreadful loss of life. And as the canteen system is permitted by the Government, we have the strange spectacle of the Government joining hands with the enemies of its own troops, to destroy their lives. We believe it is no stretch of the truth to say that strong drink is the greatest and most dangerous foe of the American Government. It is the deadly enemy of all government. It is anarchy in liquid form.

THE papacy has, it is said, asked and obtained of the President the assurance that there will be no interference with the Catholic religion in the Spanish territories which have been surrendered to the United States. And now the papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Rampolla, sends word to Archbishop Ireland instructing him to call on the President and thank him for this declaration. In view of which a leading daily of this city observes, quite truthfully, that this "is doubtless gratifying to the President, but unnecessary. The President can do nothing to call for thanks. He can simply do his duty under the Constitution, which is to give every religion a fair show. If he did more he would be usurping authority; if he did less he would be guilty of neglect of duty. When he observes the principles of the Constitution he is entitled to recognition as a faithful servant, but not to thanks."

* * *

THERE is something a little singular however—suspiciously so—about this asking for a "fair show" for the Catholic religion and this show of thanks for the President's assurance. Why should it be thought necessary to ask merely for a fair show? The Catholic Church has that here, and has always had it; she has boasted of her freedom and opportunities under the American Government. Why then should it be feared that she will not enjoy that freedom—why necessary to ask that it be assured—under American rule elsewhere? Why, unless it is something a little more than a "fair show" for which the Catholic Church is really asking? But anything more than this will be in violation of fundamental American law.

* * *

ANOTHER way in which the papacy is reported to be bidding for recognition from the American Government is through a proposal to the latter to join with it in appointing a new hierarchy in the captured islands. This is the announcement made in a dispatch from Rome to a Vienna journal, the Politische Correspondenz. The Government, of course, can have no concern whatever with the appointment of hierarchies anywhere, papal or otherwise.

* * *

THIS is a time when momentous changes follow rapidly upon each other in the march of passing events. It is a time of great national activity, and there is a meaning in this both for the statesman and the private individual. It is not enough to make note of these events from the standpoint of a mere looker-on. That is not the true or safe role for any individual to play now. Activity is demanded of him also. He is to get ready for the crisis which these things portend, and to make haste. "The end of all things is at hand."

Invoking the Sunday Law in Maryland.

AN effort was made at the May term of the Queen Anne County (Md.) Court by some Sunday law zealots to indict a Seventh-day Adventist of Ford's Store for keeping open his store on Sunday.

The witnesses against the Adventist were Sunday observers, and they verily thought and hoped for the grand jury to do something with the "pestilent" and "disturbing" Sabbath keeper. But they were doomed to disappointment, for the foreman of the grand jury on the day set for inquiry upon the matter propounded several questions which revealed the animus pervading the whole thing.

These were the questions in substance addressed to witnesses:—

Foreman—"How long has Mr. Neal been in the habit of keeping his store open on Sundays?"

Witness—"For several years."

Foreman—"Have you or other Sunday observers visited his store and made purchases on Sunday?"

Witness—"Yes, sir."

With a few mild words of remonstrance the inquiry was closed and no further notice given the matter.

There is something about the Sunday institution which causes its devotees "unrest," and leads them to disregard the rights of others. In this frame of mind they are ready to cast their fellow creatures into jail, or if need be, snuff out their lives in behalf of their darling idol, in place of trying to lead by the law of love and liberty those who may differ from them.

Be it said, however, to the credit of those like the foreman of this Maryland grand jury, there are some who are having their eyes opened to the possible iniquities furnished by the Sunday law, and who are having the courage to refuse their aid in the Satanic scheme of religious persecution. The SENTINEL in large measure is responsible for the many adherents of religious liberty in this day and time. Its sterling worth and candor constantly improves as a weapon of and for good. Keep on with the good work.

Sunday Enforcement at Ocean Grove.

PRESS reports state that at Ocean Grove, a summer resort on the New Jersey coast, a new commandment has gone into effect, namely, "Thou shalt not bathe on Sunday."

The Ocean City Association is the power behind this regulation. Its members have decided that bathing on Sunday is wrong, and have served injunctions on the proprietors of bathing establishments, restraining them from renting any bathing suits for Sunday use.

By what authority, higher than their own opinions, they justified such a course of action, it is not stated. In truth, there is no higher authority which could be cited in support of it. The Sunday enforcement movement can proceed just as far as bigotry and fanaticism are pleased to carry it, since it rests on nothing but the will of its supporters. The authority to take the last step in the enforcement of Sunday observance is exactly the same as that which was behind the first step. The heaviest penalty has the same justification as has the lightest.

This prohibition of Sunday bathing illustrates the real spirit of the whole movement. It is not for the "benefit of the poor workingman," but for the exaltation of a religious institution which depends upon human power for its support.

Church and State in the Philippines.

THE New York Sun, which may be considered good authority on matters relating to papal policy, says that "the separation of church and state in the Philippines, which, it is said, will be insisted upon by the Americans, will present grave difficulties with the Vatican."

This must be so, since, as is well known, the Vatican steadfastly maintains the principle of church and state union. This is a cardinal principle in the papal system, and is put in practice wherever the papal church holds sway. In the colonies of Spain it was, of course, firmly established.

Being contrary, however, to the whole system of American government, it could not without a flagrant violation of the principles of this system, be maintained under American rule. But violations of these principles—even flagrant ones—have not been unknown under American rule at home, and will be less surprising under that rule abroad. The papacy well understands this, and is prepared to strongly contest the introduction of such a change in the Philippines. Indeed, the papacy sees in the situation a favorable chance for recognition of herself and her institutions by the United States Government. She will make it appear that any interference with the church in the Philippines would be religious persecution, and will invoke the principles of religious freedom, which utterly forbid union of church and state, in her support. It is said that she has already secured from the Government a promise that the religious orders—the monks, etc.—in the islands shall not be disturbed.

The Government will have not only to settle with Spain, but with the Vatican. And if American principles are to be maintained in the settlement, the Vatican will present the chief obstacle to be overcome.

Religious Liberty in Austria.

UNTIL recently, the people in Austria were required by law to belong to one of the several churches recognized by the State; but this requirement has been removed, and the people may now belong to any church or no church, as they see fit. Under this condition of things there has been there a rapid development of a sect which dissents from the Orthodox State Church. Because of this dissent they are termed by their enemies religious anarchists, though it is admitted that in their lives they are quiet, industrious, and peaceable. The following character sketch of this noteworthy religious movement is given in The Independent, of this city:—

“The indications are increasing that the ‘Rascol,’ or religious dissent movement, which in Russia has estranged millions from the Orthodox State Church, is proving contagious in neighboring lands also. Recently the movements of the Nazarenes, a peculiar sect in Hungary, have attracted widespread attention, their official confession having been published in a number of leading church papers on the Continent, notably in Germany. It is stated that their organization is the outgrowth of a destructive anti-State Church propaganda, and that they are pronounced religious Nihilists, characterized by non-confessionalism. They are found chiefly in Western Hungary, the agitation being particularly successful among the working classes. In Southern Hungary it has spread among the peasants, especially in those districts where the gospel of Agrarian Socialism has found such a ready acceptance.

“The recruits to this new sect are secured mainly from the Greek Oriental Servians and the Calvinistic Reformed Magyars. The motives for severing their connection with the State Church are not always of a religious kind and origin. This step is frequently taken in order to escape heavy taxation for church and cultus purposes. Sometimes it is the result of disagreement with the priests and the clergy.

“The growth of the sect has been advanced materially by the law of religious freedom that was promulgated in Hungary in 1895. Before that time the law required every citizen to belong to one of the churches recognized by the State; but now the status of ‘non-confessionalism’ or non-membership in any religious communion is acceptable to the State. When the adoption of this law was under consideration, it was urged that it would result in great harm to the historical and established churches and give rise to ecclesiastical anarchism and radicalism. The rapid spread of the Nazarenes shows that these fears were fully justified. In the case of the Agrarian Socialists there non-confessionalism was developed into a full-fledged atheism.

“The Nazarenes, too, are very radical. They entertain principles antagonistic to the existing social order of things; they refuse under any circumstances to take an oath; refuse also to enter the army and prefer to subject themselves to the severest punishments rather than take weapons of war into their hands. The military authorities of Austria have had as much trouble with the Nazarenes as those of Russia have had with the Menonites.

“The Nazarenes have no priests; their ‘elders’ perform marriage ceremonies, conduct services, and the like. In this respect as in others, e. g., their exemplary moral life and industry, they closely resemble the Russian Stundists. Their conduct is marked by its peacefulness, willingness to help each other and their neighbors, and by a religious zeal for the spread of their peculiar teachings and tenets that borders on fanaticism. The church authorities, high and low, are considerably perplexed at the phenomenal growth of this religious dissenting movement, in which they recognize a great danger to church and state.”

A Moderate Ambition.

“Youth’s Companion.”

A PROSPEROUS florist in New Orleans used to tell to his friends the following incident of personal experience, which may contain a suggestion for other fathers and sons:—

“My father,” he said, “was a shrewd Swiss; a mechanic. He died when my brother and I were lads. Finding that his health was such as to give promise only of a few months of life, he said to us one evening, ‘I have but little money to give you, only enough to educate you and start you in business in a humble way. Let me advise you to become florists, or vegetable or bee-growers. For this reason: I foresee that there will be a great competition in most kinds of business in this country, and because of this competition, men working for wages will be forced to accept low returns for their work. In the occupations I have mentioned you will not need to employ many men, and you need not necessarily be employed by anyone. You can, if you are wise and not eager to get rich, be comparatively free and unshackled.

“‘Another reason is, that if you do your work mainly yourselves there are few temptations in these employments. You are not likely to squabble with pears, or strawberries, or potatoes, and if your principal companions and friends are bees and roses they will not tempt you to drink or to gamble.’

“I have never regretted,” said the man, “that I followed his counsel and chose a quiet, obscure career in which there are small profits and a reasonable degree of independence.”

Earnest Endeavor.

BY T. R. WILLIAMSON.

THERE'S nought too great or noble for an earnest boy to do.
 Just try as if you meant it and you'll push your project through.
 However hard your task may be in this one truth confide,
 Only try as if you meant it and you'll join the winning side.
 Out of your youth you'll grow full soon to manhood's riper years;
 Hold fast this trusty saying then, no odds what foe appears.
 Make every effort count toward some pure and lofty aim,
 Nor think true honor ever comes from any deed of shame.
 A boy that tries with all his might to do good honest deeds
 Shall keep his life and conscience white and God will fill his needs.

Eating to Help the Poor.

"JESUS, lover of my soul,
 Let me to thy bosom fly,"

Came softly stealing through the quivering foliage as Nina approached the quaint old veranda whence came the music. "Why, Marion, what has come over you to be singing such a funeral hymn as that?"

"O, I was just unconsciously giving vent to my feelings, I guess," said Marion.

"Well," said Nina, "you must be especially doleful in your sentiments this lovely afternoon. But, by the way, Marion, I presume you are to occupy your accustomed position as hub of the wheel at our coming church social for the benefit of the poor?"

"No, I hardly think so this time," said Marion, thoughtfully.

"Well, I declare, Marion," said Nina; "I believe there is something wrong with you. Why, the whole thing will be almost a failure if you pull off in this unceremonious way. What is the trouble—has some one hurt your feelings?"

"O. by no means, Nina. The festival itself is what hurts my feelings."

"Why, don't you believe in helping the poor?"

"Yes, I believe we do not live up to our privileges in this direction. We surely have a duty to do toward the poor, but I believe there is a more effectual way of performing it than is to be found in the church festival; in fact, I do not believe in church festivals of this character any more. I believe the whole principle is wrong."

"Well, Marion, your piety surpasses that of the pastor and the church deacons. Where did you receive this new impression, anyway?"

"I received it in rather an unexpected way, Nina. I was asking a dear old lady to contribute to the coming festival in order that means might be raised for the poor, and she looked me square in the face with such a gentle expression in her soft blue eyes, and said, 'Miss Marion, I believe when Christ drove the money-changers from his temple he meant to teach us also the lesson, "Let not my Father's house be made a house of merchandise." Then, too, Miss Marion, I believe it is a sin against ourselves to eat such unwholesome food at such unseemly hours.' But, I said, Grandma, we almost have to do as the church does, for the pastor is supposed to know what is for the best interests of the flock. 'Ah, no,' said the dear old lady; 'we can have no perfect criterion but Jesus himself; and it is our blessed privilege, as well as our religious duty, to follow him in all things, even though our dearest friends may differ with us in opinion. I believe if we would each one deny self a little, and thus contribute to the wants of the poor without gormandizing, the result would be much more satisfactory.' And as she slipped a dollar in my hand to put into the poor fund, instead of contributing cakes, pickles, etc., she closed her remarks by saying, 'We are told in the good Book, "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.'" Now, Nina, these words have been ringing in my ears ever since, and I have come to fear that people at church socials do not eat and drink to the glory of God. They do not eat from a sense of physical need, but from the selfish standpoint of gratifying perverted appetites; and besides, much of the food provided for such occasions should never enter the stomach."

"Yes, but, Marion, surely the cause is a laudable one, since the proceeds go to help the poor; and that surely changes the aspect of the whole affair."

"Well, Nina, Jesus tells us that the way to help the poor is to divide what we have with them. 'He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none.' And he also says, Bring the poor that are cast out, to thy house, and thus care for them. The story of the Good Samaritan is another example given by our Saviour as to how we should befriend the poor and unfortunate. Jesus teaches personal work and sacrifice for the poor, and he says, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.'"

"Well, Marion, if you have so much new light on this subject, why don't you inform the church in regard to their condition of darkness?"

"I think they will receive the information in due time, Nina; for I am entertaining the thought that you and a few more of my friends will inform them of the cause of my absence. And perhaps this is the best way possible for me to show them what I believe to be the truth on this question. I feel that I could not go with the hope of taking Jesus with me; and I dare not go alone."

"But how about my case, Marion? Don't you think it is wrong for me to go, too?"

"You will have to decide that matter for yourself. No one can possibly be conscience for another in religious matters, or anything else."

"Marion, I am going over to talk with the minister on this question, and you need not be surprised if you receive a pastoral call and get your conscience straightened out in time yet for the festival for the poor."

"You may do as you like, Nina, but I shall take pleasure in meeting his remarks with the simple Word of God; and I am sure there are many texts in the Bible to corroborate what I have already stated."

As Nina bade Marion a pleasant good-bye, and again expressed her regrets that she would not be at the festival, she passed down the grey stone walk with feelings very different from any she had ever felt before; and she inwardly wished that conscience would be more quiet and not keep repeating to her with such emphasis the words to which she had just been listening.

Studies in French History.—36.

"We will begin to-day where we left off last week, if some one can tell us where that was," smiled Professor Carman.

"The dwarfish king, Charles VIII., had just died, from bumping his head, I believe," promptly responded Edna Phillips.

"Yes; this was in the year 1498. Now a new king ascends the throne, under the name of Louis the Twelfth."

"I suppose he was Charles' son, wasn't he?" questioned Bert Mathews, opening a neat note book and preparing to write.

"Oh no; the poor king died quite young and left no children; so it was to his cousin Louis, duke of Orleans, that the crown fell."

"Then I presume he had never had any idea that he was going to be king of France some day," said Milly Brown; "just think what a surprise it must have been to him! imagine my waking up some fine morning and finding myself queen of France or some other country!"

"Well, I sincerely hope you would take the change as sensibly as he did; you know it was quite unusual for a French king to take a sensible view of anything. But you can judge something of the affection of his subjects for him, when I tell you he was called 'The father of his people.'"

"It seems very restful, doesn't it, professor, to tell about a good, kind king, once in a while," smiled Julia March, with a sigh of relief.

"Just so, Julia; and if restful to us who merely learn a few facts concerning him, how must it have seemed to the poor people who were used to being treated as if they were little above the brutes! You see Louis the Twelfth was not a bit in character or disposition like Louis the Eleventh. He had known what it was to have a hard lot in life. His marriage was a forced one, and consequently a most unhappy one. Louis XI. had compelled him to marry his daughter Jeanne; and then, when Louis XI. died, and his daughter Anne was regent of France until Charles VIII. was old enough to take his father's throne, Anne had put the unfortunate fellow in prison."

"What!" exclaimed practical Jack. "Put her own sister's husband in prison! What had he been doing?"

"Anne thought he had been plotting against the government. But now he has the very power that his stern sister-in-law had only a few years before, and so everybody expected him of course to wreak his vengeance upon her and all those concerned in the affair."

"I'm so glad he was made of better material than that," said Fred Green.

"Yes; and the people were glad and respected him all the more. In fact, it is said that he had not a single enemy in all France at this time."

"Were there any who tried to get him to revenge himself, I wonder," said Maggie Palmeter.

"O yes; there always are some people, you know, who enjoy a quarrel much better than they do peace. But Louis said that he did not think it would be becoming in him—king of France—to avenge the wrongs of the duke of Orleans, which you remember was his own position at that time. So he nobly forgave his relatives, which was far better. Then, also, he was extremely careful in spending the people's money. He was very prudent and saving."

"I imagine that the nobles and courtiers would not like that sort of thing so well as the common people," commented Edward Barnaby.

"O no, they did not; so they accused him of being mean and stingy, but he said he would much prefer that charge; in fact, he would rather the rich would laugh at him for not spending more money, than for the poor to weep over his spending so much.

"However, the king had his faults, and he determined now that he would no longer be bound by the hateful ties which years before had made him the husband of the daughter of Louis XI."

"I don't see how he could honorably free himself, though," said Joe Palmeter.

"Well, you see, he applied to one who did not know the meaning of the word 'honor,'—that 'infamous pope,' as he is called in history, Alexander VI.,—granted him a divorce without a protest; leaving him free to marry whom he chose. He at once selected the widow of his predecessor, Anne of Brittany."

"You haven't told us anything of her at all, I think; did she make a good queen?" asked Harry Ray.

"I am sorry if I neglected to mention something of her kindness of heart and real beauty of character; for it gives me much pleasure to do so. On account of the good sense of Queen Anne, the French court which was almost always noted for its gayety and dissipation, became, as history says, 'a model of propriety.' The happy people began to think that prosperity had at last come to stay. The king was kind and paid his own debts, lowered, instead of increasing the taxes, and all things seemed to indicate a long reign of prosperity."

"O I hope there didn't anything dreadful happen to spoil it all," sighed Julia March.

"Ah, but there did, Julia, there did! King Louis was proof against the wicked suggestion to revenge himself on his enemies, and he nobly bore the temptation to squander the people's money as other kings had done, but against the whispers of the 'demon of ambition,' he was powerless. So, even as his foolish predecessor had done, he too, went over to Italy with an army, only to return after a while as badly beaten as Charles had been. King Ferdinand, of Spain, under whom Columbus made his wonderful discoveries, joined with Louis in a shameful raid against Naples. The pope was on hand to 'give' the country away, as usual, which of course he had no right to do. But though the king of Naples was driven out of the city, the pope treacherously formed a 'Holy League' against France, though he had only a short time before befriended her king, and so of course the humiliated Louis was glad to seek peace. Another pope, however, had ascended the papal chair, Julius the Second, and it was he who did this."

"'The League' must have been more 'holy' in name than in fact," remarked Joe Palmeto, as his teacher dismissed the class.

General Greeley's 278 Days of Death.

THE true story of those 278 days of suffering by Greeley's heroic little band of explorers in the Arctic region has been told by General Greeley himself, for the first time, for the October Ladies Home Journal. For years General Greeley has kept an unbroken silence about his fearful experience and that of his companions, as they dropped dead one by one at his side, and it was only after the greatest persuasion that the famous explorer was induced to write the story.

The Prospectus for "The Desire of Ages" is Now Ready.

"THE Desire of Ages" is the title of a forthcoming volume by Mrs. E. G. White. It is intensely interesting and beautifully illustrated, and is devoted to the consideration of the great truth that in Christ the love of the Father is revealed—that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

Although the complete book will not be ready until about October 15th, the Prospectus has been issued thus early to enable our agents to make a Fall delivery.

Our Tract Societies will handle this book in their respective States, therefore all orders for Prospectuses, price of which is $1.25 postpaid, and correspondence concerning terms and territory, should be addressed to them.

OUR SPLENDID OFFER.

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

This Bible is bound in Tampico Morocco, Divinity Circuit, Leather Lined to Edge, Round Corners, Red under Gold Edges, Silk Headband, Silk Marker. It has large, clear type (see specimen, page 449), sixty-four illustrations, fifteen splendid Clear Maps, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of proper names and foreign words with their meaning, etc.

But the most unique and important feature of this Bible is the "COMBINATION." This consists in the blending of both old and new versions in one volume without increasing the size. As to the merits of the Bible we offer, it is enough to say that a few of which we print. For brevity's sake, we omit the name and address of writers, but their letters are all on file in our office.

We have received numerous unsolicited words of praise,

WHAT OUR PATRONS SAY OF IT.

I received the Bible in good condition. I am very well pleased with it in every way. It is a first class Bible; just the kind I have wanted.

The Bible is a beauty. Everything that could be wished.

The Bible came safely, and is highly appreciated by the friends for whom I bought it.

My Bible received. I am very much pleased with it.

I have received my Bible, and to say I am well pleased would not convey my appreciation. I think it the best bargain ever offered. It is just what I have long wanted.

I have used my Bible nearly three months, have compared it with other higher priced Bibles, and can truthfully say that all that you claim for it is true, and do heartily recommend it to all who need a good Bible.

It is the best Bible I ever saw for the price.

I received your premium Bible, and we were surprised to get such a good grade of book. Many of my friends have examined it and pronounce it excellent.

I wish to thank you at once for the beautiful Bible which I received yesterday. It is far better than I expected.

I am very much pleased with it and like it better than any Bible I have ever had.

We are all more than pleased with the Bible. The type is a great delight.

I am delighted with the Bible. Don't know how you sell it so cheap.

The Bible is far beyond my expectation. It is a real beauty and I am more than pleased with it.

I am greatly pleased with the book, it being better than expected to get.

I received the Bible all right and am more than pleased with it. It is better than I expected. The print is very nice.

The Bible is just lovely. It is lots better than I thought it would be.

I have been using the Teachers' Combination Bible nearly two years. Am more pleased with it daily. The Revised Version feature is "just the thing," and if I were going to purchase a Bible tomorrow you may depend upon it, I would purchase the Teachers' Combination Bible.

Your kind favor accompanied by the Premium Bible was received a long time ago, and after having examined the Bible carefully, I must say that it is, with a minor exception, the finest thing I ever saw for the money. It is just the thing I have been looking after for years. I never could understand why it was necessary to have two Bibles to do the work of one. But in this you have both versions at a glance. I say it is worth twice what you ask for it.

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

He who is harsh in governing others, shows that he has not yet learned to govern himself.

WHEN Jesus Christ reproved his disciples for disputing as to which of them should be the greatest, he rebuked politics in his church.

FROM statistics relative to the mortality caused by the Civil War, as well as that due to the war just ended, it appears that disease is a far more formidable enemy to the soldier than the bullets and shells of his adversaries. Thus, in the Civil War, while about 95,000 deaths were caused by gun fire, 186,000 were caused by the fevers and other diseases incident to the hardships and unsanitary conditions of camp life. Evidently the solution of the problem of removing the causes of this dreadful mortality, is a thing that needs to be earnestly and thoroughly considered by the Government before it is again confronted with war.

AN Institute of International Law was held recently at The Hague, Holland, which was attended by most of the eminent authorities in Europe. One of the most noteworthy speeches was that made by the president, in which he dwelt upon the prospects for international amity. We quote from the N. Y. Sun's report:—

"It could not be denied, he said, that the desire shown by almost all States to render themselves independent of their neighbors and insure monopolies to domestic industries and agriculture by as far as possible excluding foreign products, did not tally with those sentiments of solidarity which make agreement among peoples on different points possible. But what was still more serious and affected the objects of such bodies as the institute more materially was the feverish development among all civilized nations of their armaments. . . . We were told that they were a pledge of peace, but, in any case, these means of defense developed to such a degree of perfection, denoted a feeling of mutual distrust and showed that the fear of violent solutions intensely occupied men's minds."

Such is the latest pronouncement from eminent authorities of the world upon the world's outlook for peace. Out of the carnal nature, out of the covetousness for territory and the lust for power, out of the arming for war, there cometh not peace. The world cannot know true peace because it knoweth not Him who is the Prince of Peace. But the Christian knows Him, and is at peace.

IN a paper read at the Cambridge Congress of Zoology, England, Professor Haeckel said that science has now established the "absolute certainty" that man has descended through various stages of evolution from the lowest form of animal life, during a period estimated at a thousand million of years.

This is what "science" says. And in saying this, this "science" says something more.

If man "descended" from the lowest forms of animal life, it was, according to the evolutionary theory, by a change so gradual as to be imperceptible at any point of its progress. The "evolution" must be still going on, the same as in the past, but nobody can see it taking place. Nobody can point to any distinct evolution in animal life that has taken place in his own lifetime, or even in the space of time that is covered by reliable history. The species of the animal world remain to-day just what they were at the time of the earliest human observations. The ape is no nearer to the human now than he was thousands of years ago.

This evolutionary process, then, being so extremely gradual, must have filled the world with forms intermediate between the lowest forms and the highest form, which is man. There ought to be a gradation from the lowest to the highest form, so perfect that it would be imperceptible at any particular point. This is what this "science" demands, and therefore what it says.

But instead of this, what is actually seen is that the animal world is divided into entirely distinct groups or species, an enormous gap lying between any two of them, for which gaps the evolutionary theory utterly fails to account. As regards man, the highest animal, this gap has been recognized by the use of the familiar phrase, "the missing link," for which there has been so much search. As a matter of fact the "missing link" is not missing between man and the ape alone, but between the ape and lower animals, and between all the different species of animals that exist; and it is not one link merely that is missing, but an endless number of them, enough to account for the slow change from one species to another upon the evolutionary theory.

When "science" asks us to accept a theory as sound which is full of such enormous holes, we must respectfully decline. We have no use for any "absolute certainties" of this kind. We have no use for such "science." The science we believe in says that man was created in the image of God.

If any real evidence could be had in support of the Darwinian theory, we believe it would be found by making man the starting-point of the evolution; for while there is no evidence that the ape is developing into something higher, there is a manifest tendency on the part of many men to sink to the level of the ape.

THE trouble is with the system of imperialism which the country has inaugurated, not that the Government does not mean to govern fairly and well the new trans-marine territory, but that the temptations to corruption in government which a remote province presents, are too great to be long withstood by those who will get the appointment to the office of governor. The words "There's money in it," tell the story of political intrigue and corruption for any matter to which they apply.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 8, 1898.

NUMBER 35.

THE influence of an upright life is patriotism's best gift to the nation.

THE only argument which Cæsar knows how to employ is the argument of the sword.

THE purpose of the civil power is not to enforce what is right, but to enforce rights.

WHEN Cæsar turns his attention to the Lord's business, he at once begins to neglect his own.

"RENDER TO CÆSAR THE THINGS THAT ARE CÆSAR'S, AND TO GOD THE THINGS THAT ARE GOD'S."—Jesus Christ Announcing the Principle of Separation of Church and State.

THE Pharisees, thinking to entangle Christ in his talk, came to him and asked whether it were lawful to give tribute to Cæsar. "But Jesus perceived their wickedness, and said, Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Show me the tribute money. And they brought unto him a penny. And he said unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." Matt. 22:15-22.

SEPARATION of church and state does not mean a wicked government or a powerless church.

THE power of the church is the power of the gospel, which is the power of love, which is the power of God.

CAESAR is ever prone to consider himself a god and to demand for himself those things that should be rendered to God.

BEFORE Peter was converted he drew the sword of temporal power in behalf of his Lord; afterwards, he drew the "sword of the Spirit."

"RECEIVE ye the Holy Ghost." In these words, addressed to sinful flesh, God appeals to his people on the earth, to his church, to be filled with unlimited power; for such is the power of the Spirit.

But while God is thus beseeching men, the very ones who profess to be his followers here are beseeching the legislatures of earth for the power needed to advance the cause of righteousness.

Was there ever a stranger or sadder spectacle before heaven and earth—God beseeching the church to receive unlimited power from on high, which he is ready to bestow, and the church, all unmindful of his words, beseeching the world for the power that belongs to earthly things!

The church could not be guilty of greater folly.

A Religious Delusion.

IN the columns of the daily press of this city recently space was given to a description of "the impressive ceremony of the taking of the black veil" by sixteen young women, in the chapel of the convent of the "Sisters of St. Dominic," Archbishop Corrigan officiating. By undergoing this "impressive ceremony" these young women are understood to have formally "renounced the world" and taken upon themselves the vows of a life of "charity." This is but one of many similar occasions which are reported from time to time in all parts of the land.

Let us look a moment at this idea of consecration and the religious life.

These young women have withdrawn themselves from all social intercourse with their fellow-beings in the world. They have really renounced their fellow-mortals. Is this renouncing the world?

Certainly not. The world cannot be renounced in that way. Worldliness is in the heart—in the principles of the life. The principles of the world, not the people, are to be renounced.

A person may separate himself from all his sinful fellow-mortals, as did the old hermits, and yet carry with him into his seclusion, as they did, the very worldliness which they think thus to escape. For worldliness, full and complete, is in every heart that is carnal, unrenewed by the power of divine grace.

To "renounce the world" by going off into the seclusion of the convent or monastery, is like a person trying to escape from his own shadow. The one is exactly as wise a proceeding as the other.

And this separation from human society is not only powerless to promote consecration; it is altogether contrary to the will and purpose of the Creator.

God put people in this world to be together. He knew the nature of the beings whom he created, and knew that society was necessary to their welfare. He brings people into this world for their happiness, to enjoy themselves together, not to be miserable somewhere in seclusion. But aside from the enjoyment to be derived from human companionship, he puts people together for their spiritual good. His own work in the earth, the proclamation of the gospel truth, so far from demanding the exclusion of its adherents, demands the exact opposite. God's servants are the "salt of the earth;" and to be this they must be in the world, mingling freely with all classes of society, and with world-loving people especially. God sends his servants to sinners, not away from them.

A ship is built to go in the water. There is danger that the water may get into the ship, and if it does, in sufficient quantities, the ship sinks and is lost. The ship at sea is in the very element, all surrounded by it, which under certain circumstances will prove its sure destruction. There may be a collision, or the ship may run on a reef, or be shattered by a storm, and in any of these ways become filled with water and sent to the bottom of the sea. Ships are being lost by such casualties all the time. The sea is the one great agent of their destruction.

What then shall be done to preserve the ship? Oh, we will pull it up out of the sea upon the dry land; we will put it where the water cannot get to it! Or, we will seclude it in some quiet undisturbed creek or inlet along the shore, where the perils of the sea can never reach it! That would save the ship from the sea, and also render it useless; but even the seclusion of the convent cannot save a soul from the world.

The idea that consecration, that holiness of life, requires the renunciation of society, a life of celibacy, and the somber garb of the convent, is as contrary to the truth as anything could possibly be. It is a travesty upon divine truth, and designed as such by the opponent of truth who invented it. Robert Ingersoll has uttered many falsehoods concerning religion; but he spoke the truth, the gospel truth, in saying that the mother with her babe presented a far nobler and holier picture than the nun with her cross and beads.

Jesus said, in his prayer for his disciples, "I pray not that Thou wouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou wouldest keep them from the evil." The grace of God keeps his children from evil in the midst of the world. As the channels of divine light and truth to the world, the world is their proper place. When God wants them removed from the society of sinners he is coming himself to take them away. But now, while probation for the world continues, he wants them in the world and amongst world lovers as his witnesses, witnessing by their words and lives to his power to save people from sin, simply by a change of heart—by a new birth, a new creation in Christ.

The "sisterhoods" and "brotherhoods" which are gotten up in this world in the name of religion, with their vows and regulations which set at defiance the laws of nature in order to save the soul, are a sham and a delusion. They represent the worldly and heathen idea of consecration. They are contrary to God and to nature, to revelation and to reason. They lead only to wretchedness and ruin. True happiness, true religion, true charity and holiness, and true success in life, can be found only in the order of life which God has established.

Spain and Her Methods.—No. 1.

BY MRS. FLORENCE A. BARNES, M. D.

WHILE living in Spanish American countries of South America, my attention was drawn to the condition of the Indian and mixed population of the country.

I found in cities of many thousands, that only a few were able to gain a livelihood by other means than by manual labor. That the services of the Indian were held almost as a right, by many, and that consequently, their wages were little more than would suffice to keep body and soul together.

In the outskirts of the best of the cities, many live with only a thatched roof to keep off the rain, having neither siding to their houses, nor a rag of clothing to cover the nakedness of all the younger members of the family.

In the interior, the women carry burdens over the mountains for a real a day (3 cents) and on the coffee plantations men and women labor for about the same rate.

I noticed also, that although the Catholic Church has existed there for the four hundred years that the Spanish have inhabited the country, only a few had been taught the first rudiments of an education, by which they could have hoped to better their condition.

The native woman will give herself body and soul to the white man who seeks her, and having been taught no better, is proud of her shame. Vice and shame go hand in hand with the church, openly and unrebuked.

The poor die without help. They may lie sick, without medical assistance, for months, and finally die, no one outside the family the wiser, until the priest is called to bury them in the "holy ground."

Looking for a cause, it was not hard to trace backward to the time when the South American Indian was held as a slave by the Spanish invaders, and remembering the mode of warfare adopted by Spain in conquering unbelievers nearer home, I soon found that in the history of the Catholic Church in Spain, cruelty took the place of mercy, and that to convert, with them, meant to conquer and enslave.

In proof of this, before looking at the work of the church in South America, let me go back to Spanish warfare nearer home. For under Ferdinand and Isabella, the same cruelties were practiced, in the name of religion, as were practiced under Charles the Fifth a few years later in South America.

METHODS OF CHRISTIAN(?) WARFARE BETWEEN 1482 AND 1492.

From history we learn that in 1482, all of Spain was under the control of the church with one exception. The territory of Grenada was still under the dominion of the Moors. It was well situated for protection, being washed on one side by the Mediterranean Sea, and traversed by chains of lofty mountains, naked, rocky and precipitous, rendering it almost impregnable, but locking in deep rich valleys of great fertility.

Alhama was one of the Moorish towns near to the capital of Grenada, and has been called the key to the capital. The marquis of Cadiz conceived the idea of taking this town. Having sent out a spy, who on returning assured him of the practicability of taking it by surprise, the marquis called together several commanders with their troops, and set out promptly, with three thousand light cavalry, and four thousand infantry. None but the leaders knew the object of the enterprize. The march was accomplished by night, while they remained hidden in secluded places during the day. They chose routes rarely traveled. No one was allowed to speak. No fires were built, lest the smoke should betray them. On reaching a small deep valley only half a league from Alhama, they made a halt. Not till then was the object of the expedition made known to the army. After explaining their purposes, the leaders now endeavored to rouse them to brave action by telling them it was for the glory of the most holy faith, and for vengeance; and "that there was great spoil in the town."

They then pressed on, arriving close to the place two hours before daybreak. There the army remained in ambush while three hundred men were sent to scale the walls and get possession of the castle. Silently they climbed the height and reached the shadow of its tower, undiscovered. Not a light or sound was in the village. The whole place was in deep repose. Fixing their ladders, they mounted the battlements. Moving stealthily along the parapet, toward the citadel, they came upon the sentinel by surprise. Seizing him by the throat he was ordered to point the way to the guard room. The man obeyed, and was instantly dispatched. There a scene of massacre, rather than of combat, occurred.

Some were killed while sleeping, others were cut down before they could resist; all were killed.

But the alarm had spread. The garrison awoke to find the enemy master of the towers. Meanwhile the army in ambush, knowing by the uproar that the fray had begun, now rushed from their place of concealment, with sound of kettledrums and trumpets, to increase the confusion. A violent conflict ensued. At length the postern was thrown open, and the Marquis of Cadiz, with his hosts, took possession of the castle. But the town below was in arms. The inhabitants were chiefly merchants and trades-people, but possessed some knowledge of arms. They fought well and long. But the marquis, seeing that the city gate was in command of the city's artillery, ordered a breach to be made in the wall, rousing their courage by telling them that the place should be given up to plunder and its people made captives. Though the Moors fought valiantly, in the streets, from the windows, and from the tops of the houses, they were not equal to the Christians(?) in strength, being for the most part peaceable men of industrious callings.

They fought at their thresholds and their hearths, with the shrieks of their wives and children ringing in their ears. They paid no attention to their wounds nor the death of their companions, but continued fighting until they fell. When they could no longer fight, they would block the thresholds of their once happy homes with their mangled bodies.

They fought for their homes, their wives, and their helpless children, while the so-called Christians fought for glory, for revenge, for the "faith," and for the spoil of the wealthy people.

From morning till night the contest raged, when the Moors began to yield. They retreated to a mosque, but the Christians set fire to it. When the smoke and flames rolled in they gave themselves up for lost. Many made a last desperate rush on the enemy, but were slain; the rest surrendered. Male and female became slaves to their captors. The town was given up to plunder. Gold, silver, jewels, silks, and costly stuffs, of all kinds, together with horses, beeves, grain, oil, honey, and all the fruits of a rich country, was appropriated by the Christians. What they could not carry off was wantonly destroyed. A Spaniard who had helped the Moors was hanged on the highest part of the battlements. And all this was done under the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, in the name of the "Christian religion"!

Not satisfied with victories of war, Ferdinand availed himself of the times when Grenada was troubled by internal factions, making inroads into the very heart of the kingdom, sacking and destroying towns and castles. The poor peasantry were never safe from the attacks of these pious(?) warriors, not even in their watch towers and fortified hamlets. They were stormed with fire and sword.

In speaking of those conquests one of the pious(?) fathers of the church said: "It was a pleasing and refreshing sight to behold this pious knight and his followers returning from one of his crusades, leaving the rich land of the unbeliever in smoking desolation behind them; to behold the long line of mules and asses, laden with the plunder of the gentiles, the hosts of captives,—men, women, and children,—droves of sturdy beeves, lowing kine, and bleating sheep, all winding up the steep acclivity to the gates of Alhama, pricked on by the Catholic soldiery."

A large portion of the spoil was always dedicated to the church, and the good friars were ever ready at the gates to hail and receive their allotted share.

Speaking of the city of Ronda, which was taken by them in a horrible warfare, in which they threw balls of tow, steeped in pitch and oil and gunpowder, which, once on fire, could not be extinguished, and which set the houses in flames, this "father" says: "Thus was this nest of warfare and infidelity converted to the true faith, by the thunder of our artillery."

To convert by force or superior might, to the "Christian faith" as then represented in the Catholic Church, was the way approved by the church.

After the taking of Malaga, the great mass of its people implored that they might not be scattered; or sold into captivity, but might be permitted to ransom themselves by paying a certain amount within a given time. King Ferdinand took the advice of his counselors, who said: "If you hold out a prospect of hopeless captivity, the infidels will throw all their gold and jewels into wells and pits, and you will lose the greater part of the spoil; but if you fix a general rate of ransom, and receive the money and jewels as part payment, nothing will be destroyed."

So it was arranged that all should be ransomed, at the average rate of thirty doblas in gold, for each, male or female, large or small. That all their gold, jewels, and other valuables should be given immediately, in part payment of the whole amount, and the remainder be paid within eight months; that if any died in the meanwhile the ransom should be paid just the same, and if the whole amount were not paid in eight months, they should all be held as slaves.

The poor unfortunate people caught at this straw. They were numbered by houses and families, and their names taken down. Their most precious possessions were made into parcels and sealed with their names. Then they were driven like cattle to large corrals or enclosures, and there confined until they could be distributed among the Spaniards. They were scattered far and wide, each family taking one or two to keep as servants, until the term fixed for the payment of the remainder of the ransom expired. A few were allowed to beg for aid, to purchase their liberty, amongst the adjoining Moorish towns. But these places were too much impoverished by the late wars, and engrossed with their own distresses, to lend a listening ear or helping hand.

So the time passed with the ransom unpaid, and fifteen thousand people became slaves to the cruel conquerors. "Never," says the "father" of the church,

"never has there been recorded a more adroit and sagacious arrangement, than this made by the Catholic monarch, by which he not only secured all the property and half the ransom of the infidels, but finally got possession of their persons in the bargain."

Catholic holiness is this! Of course such a continued warfare was not without losses to the Spaniards. Thus after the siege of Baza, which lasted six months and twenty days, their loss amounted to twenty thousand men, of whom seventeen thousand died of disease, and not a few of cold. "A kind of death peculiarly uncomfortable," says the historian; but the pious "father" adds: "As these latter were chiefly of ignoble rank, baggage carriers, and such like, the loss was not of great importance."

This was the mode of warfare then, which immedi-ment worth fighting for, and, if need be, dying for. How many of our comrades of those days paid the latter price for our preserved Union! Let their heroism and sacrifices be ever green in our memory. Let not the results of their sacrifices be destroyed. The Union and the free institutions for which they fell should be held more dear for their sacrifices. We will not deny to any who fought against us any privileges under the Government which we claim for ourselves. On the contrary, we welcome all such who come forward in good faith to help build up the waste places and to perpetuate our institutions against all enemies, as brothers in full interest with us in a common heritage. But we are not prepared to apologize for the part we took in the war. It is to be hoped that like trials will never again befall our country. In this sentiment no class of people can more heartily join than the soldier who submitted to the dangers, trials, and hardships of the camp and battle-field, on whichever side he fought. No class of people are more interested in guarding against a recurrence of those days. Let us, then, begin by guarding against every enemy threatening the perpetuity of free republican institutions.

I do not bring into this assemblage politics—certainly not partisan politics,—but it is a fair subject for soldiers in their deliberations to consider what may be necessary to secure the prize for which they battle. In a republic like ours, where the citizen is the sovereign and the official the servant, where no power is exercised ex-

General Grant on the Preservation of the Union.

Address to the Army of the Tennessee.

COMRADES: It always affords me much gratification to meet my old comrades in arms ten to fourteen years ago, and to live over again in memory the trials and hardships of those days,—hardships imposed for the preservation and perpetuation of our free institutions. We believed then and believe now that we had a Government by the will of the people, it is important that the sovereign—the people—should possess intelligence. The free school is the promoter of that intelligence which is to preserve us a free nation. If we are to have another contest in the near future of our national existence, I predict that the dividing line will not be Mason and Dixon's, but between patriotism and intelligence on the one side and superstition, ambition, and ignorance on the other. Now, in this centennial year of our national existence, I believe it is a good time to begin the work of strengthening the foundation of the house commenced by our patriotic forefathers one hundred years ago at Concord and Lexington. Let us all labor to add all needful guarantees for the more perfect security of free thought, free speech, and free press; pure morals, unfettered religious sentiments, and of equal rights and privileges to all men, irrespective of nationality, color, or religion. Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar of money appropriated to their support, no matter how raised, shall be appropriated to the support of any sectarian school. Resolve that neither the State nor nation, nor both combined, shall support institutions of learning other than those sufficient to afford to every child growing up in the land the opportunity of a good common school education, unmixed with sectarian, pagan, or atheistical tenets. Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school, supported entirely by private contribution. Keep the church and state forever separate. With these safeguards I believe the battles which created the Army of the Tennessee will not have been fought in vain.

Separation of Church and State.

"KEEP the church and state forever separate," said General Grant, in his address to the Army of the Tennessee. "Very well," says some reader; "suppose he did say it; why refer to it now? I believe in the separation of church and state, and so does everyone in this country; and there is no danger that church and state will be united. It would be contrary to the principles of the Government."

Yes, we reply, it is a fact that the people here do not believe in a union of church and state, in a certain sense; that is, they do not believe the state should be joined with the Methodist, Baptist, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Catholic, or other denominational body, making that the state church and leaving all others out of consideration. That would be discriminately against the other churches, and would be contrary to the Constitution and would meet general opposition from the people.

All this is true enough; but there is more than this to be considered. The principle of church and state union finds another way of expression, in which it is all the more dangerous because it is not generally recognized by the people. And this is in the union of the state with religion.

Are you in favor of the separation of religion and the state?

It is impossible to keep church and state separate if religion and the state are united.

If the state is religious, if it is Christian, it ought to belong to a church. That is plain. The Christian Church ought to include everything that is Christian. It is not true to its purpose unless it does.

When the state therefore professes religion, when it proclaims itself to be Christian, union with the church is demanded by the plain logic of the situation. And the question, What is the Christian Church? will surely be raised by the state's profession of religion.

And this question will be conducive to anything but peace between the various religious bodies each of which claims to be the church of Christ. We have but to refer to the history of the church in the early centuries to find the matter illustrated in full.

If the state, moreover, is to be Christian, it must enforce religion upon the people, for the state does nothing but by force. And as Christianity is inseparable from the law of God, the "Christian" state must proceed to enforce that law, and execute its penalty, which is death. But true Christianity means life for the transgressor, not death.

Then, "Keep the church and state forever separate." Keep religion and the state separate. Keep religion separate from force; let its power be always the power of love. All this is included in the admonition uttered by General Grant.

Items of W. C. T. U. History.

BY MRS. S. M. I. HENRY.

THE process by which a legal department became incorporated into the plan of W. C. T. U. work will be readily apprehended from what has already appeared in these items. But this department deserves more than a passing notice.

From the very beginning of our acquaintance with the saloon we were compelled to recognize it as a creature of the law, a product of corrupt appetites, which met together, with only the bar of the saloon between them, the lust of gold and power on one side, and of sensual indulgence on the other.

At every turn we were confronted with the apparition of greed, serving sensualism and doing so under the protection of and for the advantage of the same law-making power to which the weak and the ill-treated must look for protection against oppression. The saloon for revenue was the monstrosity of American legislation.

Furthermore, we could but see that this law was in itself but a criminal product of some power that had openly defied the law of God. We believed in the eternal integrity of that law, and that no body of men could in anywise legally legislate that, which would either teach or enforce anything contrary to it. We read in the Bible that the law was a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ; and believed that, in a peculiar sense, the law of the land should be that schoolmaster; or, if not quite that, that it should never be an incorrigible truant authorized to run at large, and beguile and capture the weak and unwary, and prevent them from finding the great Teacher from whom they must learn all truth.

We boldly charged the law which licensed the saloon as a criminal, judged and condemned by the pure law of the Golden Rule, and treated it accordingly. We, however, from the knowledge which we then had, were compelled to believe that those who had brought forth this criminal were yet innocent of actual moral transgression, for certainly they were good men! They must, we thought, be ignorant of the standard by which all legislation must be measured. "My people perish for lack of knowledge," said the Lord, and we concluded that for the same reason the Lord's people often produced conditions which were as destructive as Satan could wish, in which their fellow-creatures became so entangled that there was no way of escape.

Then there came upon us a sense of obligation. Woman had through all the generations been shut in with the Bible by a peculiar environment which had contributed to make her more or less a student of the Word, or at least to cause her to be a willing listener to those who taught its precepts; and the teaching had been of a nature to make her come to detect this legal traitor which stood on the statute books of the nation in direct antagonism to the divine law. And the world had now to take the consequences both of having left woman so long shut in with this Word of truth, and of afterward thrusting her so suddenly out into the wide open places where the Civil War left her stranded.

The light that had filled the home with the sweet and hallowed radiance of the gospel, and which the most worldly man loved to remember, and which he coveted for his son, suddenly, brought forth in three hundred thousand womanly hands, even if the tapers were small, burst upon the questions of the day with startling power, and every eye was offended at the hideousness which was revealed. The saloon keeper said, "It is a mean business that I am engaged in, and I would get out of it quick if all I had was not locked up in it." The lawyer who defended the saloonist, of course did not hesitate to say that he despised his client, but he was in court for a living, and must do the best he could to serve the man who paid him the best.

Then we realized how the power of the Holy Spirit must be brought to bear upon all these men who were "under the law" before they could be delivered from this bondage of "time serving."

I do not believe that any one class of worldly men ever have been more earnestly prayed for and labored with than the politicians of this nation. They certainly have had the gospel message taken to them through our legal department as patiently and persistently as it has ever been carried by any missionary in any portion of the field of the world. Men who had never been in the habit of church-going, who had no use for temperance, were compelled to sit and listen while some earnest, motherly woman, whom they could but reverence, whom they could but choose to hear, poured out of a burning heart the most sublime truths of the gospel, as she made some appeal for purity of life and law in the name of, and for the sake of, the home, the growing boy and his mother. As they have many times confessed since those days, men's hearts failed them before these appeals, and it was not a strange sight to see them bow their heads and drop tears upon their beards.

We had yet, however, much to learn about political trickery, ambition, and strife. We had yet to learn that the ability to weep like a father, and to vote like a politician—things as far removed from each other as the east from the west—were often found in the bosom of the same man.

It will be seen from these statements that the legal work of the W. C. T. U. has always been quite as much evangelistic as anything else. The mission of the department was that of a teacher of righteousness to those who had the responsibility of government in our nation. The "legal women" were personally gospel workers to a remarkable degree. The difference between them and their sister evangelists being more in the class of people to whom they went than in the truth which they taught, with perhaps this exception,—that they made a special point of the most practical applications of the gospel that it was possible to make to ordinary affairs. Equality between man and man, fair dealing, purity in living and in legislation, were the special points upon which they hinged gospel truth.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 2.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

JESUS CHRIST is "the truth;" the gospel of Christ is the truth; the law of God "is the truth;" and the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of Truth. Each is the sum of all truth. There is not more truth in one than there is in any one of the others, or all of the others combined.

Truth being always consistent and harmonious with itself there can possibly be no conflict between Christ, the gospel, the law and the Holy Spirit.

As therefore the law is "the truth," and that law says the seventh day is the Sabbath, it is absolutely impossible that either Christ, the gospel, or the Holy Spirit can teach that any other day is the Sabbath.

Of course this has been set forth in previous articles, and in various ways emphasized. But it will do us no harm to have it repeated again; especially as by the invincible force of logic, the last great battle for truth is to center around this question of the Sabbath.

Religious factions, which have been bitterly opposed to each other in the past over what is now regarded as minor points of doctrines, will be willing to bury their differences in a general rally around the Sabbath, which here must be understood to refer to Sunday. In other words it will make no difference what is taught, provided only they are orthodox upon this one question.

In their eagerness to maintain the cause of Sunday the Protestants have shown themselves to be perfectly willing to join hands with the Roman Catholic Church, notwithstanding the bitter hatred in which she has been held by them in the past.

From Luther's time down to within a recent period

Protestants have regarded the papacy as antichrist. But now a different spirit is being cherished toward her.

Instead of being the "woman arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold, and precious stones and pearls [and], having a golden cup in her hand" full of all kinds of abominations (Rev. 17:4) and "sitting upon a scarlet colored beast" (verse 4) she is now spoken of by Protestants as "our beautiful mother," thereby confessing themselves to be her daughters. And claiming to be Christian churches themselves, and being the daughters of this "beautiful mother," thus being of one blood, it could not be otherwise than that she be recognized by them as a Christian church. Hence they can bless now what they once cursed; as a Methodist minister in Ohio once said, "God bless the Roman Catholic Church of to-day."

But as surely as Protestant churches, or individuals in these churches, shall so speak of the Catholic Church, so certainly do they, in that thing renounce the principles of Protestantism, notwithstanding they may still bear the name of Protestants. And what does a name amount to anyway if the principles represented by that name are renounced?

It is idle for one to contend that the papacy is different now from what it was three hundred years ago. Surely Cardinal Gibbons, the highest prelate of the Catholic Church in this country is entitled to speak upon this point.

In exhorting Protestants to return to the fold of the Roman Catholic Church he says, "In coming to the church you are not entering a strange place, but you are returning to your Father's home. The house and furniture may look odd to you. But it is just the same as your forefathers left it three hundred years ago."—"Faith of Our Fathers." Introduction, page 17.

Yes, indeed! the Catholic church is exactly the same as it was three hundred years ago; and the claim that she makes, preposterous though it be, of infallibility; that the church in faith and morals never erred, nor ever can err, utterly precludes the possibility of the Catholic Church being any different now from what it has always been.

Notwithstanding all this at this time when this Sabbath question, regarded by all who are intelligent upon the question, as being the test of all religion, so that it is claimed, and justly too, that "he who does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God, and he who does not worship God is lost," the logic therefore being that he who does not keep the Sabbath is lost—at this time it is perfectly natural that Protestants should be willing to join hands with the papacy regarding the Sunday.

And why not? Is not Sunday the child of the papacy? As a professedly Christian institution does not Sunday find its origin in the Catholic Church? Does not the Catholic Church set forth Sunday as the sign or mark of her power to do all that she claims to be able to do? Let any one read any of the Catholic Catechisms, and see for themselves.

The advocates of Sunday observance for a long time have been hard pressed for divine proof that Sunday is the Sabbath. But they must have it. It is essential for the support of their tottering institution.

True there are many people who would be satisfied to keep the day on the strength of its being enjoined by the State; but there are thousands who would insist upon having stronger proof.

In vain will the Scriptures be appealed to. The only day that can be found enjoined there as the Sabbath is the seventh day. And Sunday advocates long since found that out, and have, in spite of themselves, been compelled to acknowledge the complete silence of Scripture with reference to Sunday as the Sabbath.

But the difficulty would be surmounted when the Catholic Church shall be acknowledged as a divine institution and clothed with authority from Jesus Christ, and guided by the Holy Spirit, to make the change.

Will Protestants do this? They will as surely as they continue to seek to have Sunday enforced.

Already concessions have been made by Protestants. Here is a statement by Rev. Sylvester Scovell—a National Reformer, and an ardent Sunday law advocate, in 1881, "This common interest [of all religious people in the Sabbath—Sunday] ought both to strengthen our determination to work and our readiness to coöperate in every way with our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens. We may be subjected to many rebuffs in our first proffers, and the time has not yet come when the Roman Church will consent to strike hands with other churches—as such; but the time has come to make repeated advances, and gladly to accept coöperation in any form in which they may be willing to exhibit it. It is one of the necessities of the situation."

Yes, and for the complete success of their work it will be found to be one of the necessities of the situation to acknowledge the divine authority of the Catholic Church.

For this the Catholic Church has long waited, and soon will come her triumph.

THE Wesleyan Grove Association, which has charge of the Northport camp-meeting grounds on Penobscot Bay, Maine, at a recent meeting decided to permit no people on the grounds who came on Sunday excursions; so says the Bangor Daily Commercial. Of course the association has a right to do this; but it is strange Christian doctrine which shuts sinners out at any time from the camp of Christ. And the sinners who are thus shut out will not have much confidence in the religious pretensions that are made within.

THE proper pathway of the church being widely different from that to be followed by the civil power, it is evident that if church and state are united each must drag the other out of its proper path, and that each must be an incubus upon the other.

SPAIN sent her soldiers to Cuba and kept them there for years, and at the end they were in condition to make a good fight against the troops of the United States; but the latter return from Cuba after a campaign of only a few weeks almost completely shattered by disease and privation. There is something about this that calls for explanation.

THE American people have manifested much surprise and indignation over the revelations that have been made of the neglect and abuse of the troops. There is no doubt just cause for the feeling which has been aroused. While hardships and privations were naturally to be expected in the prosecution of the campaign, only base principles of conduct can account for the fact that delicacies sent to the troops were not distributed among them, and that sick and wounded soldiers were transported long distances without any adequate provision for their comfort during the journey. The provision made for the care of the Spanish prisoners in this country seems actually to have been better than that made for the care of those who were fighting for the nation and not against it.

* * *

It is plain enough that this state of affairs is due in the main to selfishness and red tape. The question of blame is one to be settled by the national authorities, though it may be observed in passing that the responsibility naturally rests with those who have direct oversight of affairs where the evils exist. These should if necessary cut red tape in order to provide a prompt and efficient remedy. It is plain also that the blame cannot be all laid upon one or two individuals. No one or two individuals should have it in their power in this country to inflict suffering and death upon innocent persons.

THERE is a lesson in this which may well be heeded by the American people; and that is that a government, whatever its form, and whatever its constitution, cannot be any better than the persons by whom it is administered. If people in this country become corrupt, selfish, regardless of the rights of others, the fact that this is a "free government," republican in form and with a grand Constitution, will not save the people from the evil consequences. The rights of people will be denied here as grossly and arbitrarily as under an absolute monarchy.

THAT individual rights are denied here in almost numberless instances through official selfishness and red tape—two things which go well together—is a fact. No one can doubt it who takes account of the incidents that are noted in the news columns of the daily press. And in that which the soldiers have experienced there has only been manifested on a large scale the selfishness and red tape which inflict unmerited suffering upon the private individual. In the latter case little or nothing is thought about it because it involves only one individual, or but few individuals at the most. But it is a symptom nevertheless,—an indication of serious disease in the body politic; and a people intent upon the preservation of their rights would do well to heed it.

THE government does not make the people, but the people make the government. Where each person desires to respect the rights of his neighbor—to apply the principle of the Golden Rule—bad government would be impossible, whether it were called a republic or a monarchy. And when men are corrupt and selfish, seeking always to advance their own interests whether at the expense of their fellows or not, good government is impossible, though it may have all the forms of free government, and the strongest constitutional guaranties of individual rights.

* * *

REPUBLICAN government—"government of the people, by the people, and for the people"—is right. The Constitution of the American Republic, the Declaration of Independence, are right. But all these are but the forms, the proper instruments, of good government. The good government itself depends upon the character of the people. It must come from the people themselves. And if the people are corrupt, if they put corrupt men in office, these instruments become of no avail, and might as well be exchanged for the proper forms of despotism.

TO HAVE better government, we must have better people. What then will make the people better? Can it be done by law, or by vote? What is needed is that which will feed the nobler impulses and cultivate the spirit of the Golden Rule, and this can be supplied only from a source that is superior to man himself. That source is the grace of God. The gospel alone supplies the conditions under which bad government will be impossible.

* * *

It was the power of the gospel in the great Reformation that made possible the free Government which was set up in America, a beacon light to the world, at the beginning of the nineteenth century. But there can be no perfect government while there remains any opposition to gospel principles in those who participate in it. Perfect government is the government of the kingdom of God.

The Italian Court to Leave Rome.

A NEW YORK CITY daily makes the remarkable statement that King Humbert, of Italy, is about to remove his court from Rome to Turin. This move, surprising in itself, becomes more noteworthy in view of the alleged reason, which is that he is driven to this step by the opposition of the Vatican.

Pope Leo has known how to make his opposition to the Italian government effective. He has been strengthening his influence with and his hold upon the royalty and nobility of Europe; and these, fearing to incur his displeasure by paying their respects to the Italian court, or wishing to avoid the embarrassment of trying to be friendly at once with two opposing powers in the same city, have in many instances refrained from visiting the king when in Rome and paid honor only to the pope (for of course they must do that); so that King Humbert and the Italian court have been ostracised by the crowned heads of Europe to a very humiliating degree. Seeing no prospect of relief for this awkward situation, the king it is said, has decided to move his court to Turin, where he will encounter little or no opposition, and where other sovereign will not embarrass themselves by paying him their respects. Of course the pope will be recognized as the supreme power in Rome after the seat of civil government has been removed, and this will be a fact of no small significance.

The journal which is authority for these statements says:—

"Although this news is calculated to create a great sensation abroad, yet it will astonish no one who is acquainted with the peculiar circumstances of the Italian court. In the first place, the Quirinal itself is under the ban of the church, with the exception of a small portion of the Palace, which has been added by the Italian government since the pope was deprived of the possession thereof in 1870. This interdict of the church is not only a source of deep distress to Queen Marguerite, who is a fervent Catholic, but has even led King Humbert's own sister, the saintly Princess Clothilde, when she came to Rome to attend the deathbed of her husband, to decline to cross the threshold of the Quirinal, although she was perfectly willing and delighted to receive visits of the king and queen at the hotel where she had taken up her abode.

"Nor is Princess Clothilde the only lady of the Italian royal family who manifests so great an aversion to the Quirinal. For even the young duchess of Aosta, who is married to the king's eldest nephew and eventual heir, who therefore will one day be queen of Italy, refused for more than a year after her marriage to visit Rome or to stay at the Quirinal for fear of offending the pope.

"It is this same apprehension which has led to the court of King Humbert being ostracised by foreign sovereigns and royalties to an extent of which few people can form an idea. Even Protestant monarchs hesitate to visit this city owing to the annoyances and difficulties entailed by the presence of two rival courts within its walls. Emperor William, King Oscar, and Prince Ferdinand, of Bulgaria, are, in fact, the only sovereigns who have consented to face all these difficulties.

"Emperor Francis Joseph, on the other hand, has found himself unable until now to return the visit paid to the Court of Vienna sixteen years ago by King Humbert and Queen Marguerite, the pope having threatened to close the doors of the Vatican to him and to withdraw his Nuncio from Vienna in the case of his accepting the hospitality of King Humbert at the formerly papal palace of the Quirinal.

"King Humbert's own nephew, the king of Portugal, was similarly prevented from paying a visit to his uncle at Rome, the pope having menaced him with a withdrawal of the veto which prevents the Portuguese clergy from taking part in the Legitimist movement against King Carlos. In fact, King Humbert and Queen Marguerite have been left entirely in the cold at the Quirinal by foreign royalties, whose visits have been few and far between.

"When, in addition to this, the fact is taken into consideration that more than half of the population here, and especially the old aristocracy, contemptuously decline to take any notice whatsoever of their majesties when they drive through the streets, it will be understood readily that the king and queen feel themselves among strangers, and among surroundings that are not congenial.

"At Turin the condition of affairs is entirely different. There the king and queen are among their own people, who are most loyally attached to them. The palace, which is the old home of their ancestors, possesses both a grandeur and a comfort which contrast strongly with the Quirinal, and finally, at Turin the Italian court will no longer be ostracised by the other reigning houses of Europe.

"It is not proposed for the present to transfer either the legislature or the principal government departments to Turin. But the very fact of King Humbert establishing his future home at Turin will go further than anything else toward the settlement of that troublesome Roman question, which, according to the admission of Italy's principal statesman, is one of the chief sources of danger to the kingdom."

THE Sabbath being God's, it cannot be rendered to Cæsar without putting him in the place of God.

THAT is a suspicious kind of patriotism which shouts loudly for country but shuts its eyes to the doctrine of equal rights.

A THOUSAND hard-won victories over the armed foes of home and country, are made useless when the nation departs from the principles of free government.

Studies in French History.—37.

"KING LOUIS XII. was certainly the best ruler France had seen in a long, long time, and I have no doubt," said Professor Carman, "that the kind-hearted and amiable Queen Anne had a great part to act in keeping the kingdom in so prosperous and well-governed a condition, as it was, in comparison with what it had been under most of the former kings.

"But death is an impartial visitor, and after a while he called upon Anne of Brittany, and the good queen died."

"I suppose I am quite a dunce, professor," said Bert Mathews, but I wish you would tell us something about Brittany."

"I ought to have done so before, Bert. It is that part of France which you might term 'the great north-western peninsular.' It is quite extensive, as you will see by the map, and covers over 13,000 square miles. The original name was Armorica, but British colonists came here in great numbers, and so changed the name to Brittany, some time in the fifth century.

"You will remember that some time ago we learned that Charles VIII. conquered this duchy and married the young Duchess Anne, whom Louis XII. also married. Now that she was dead, the king now past middle life, and certainly old enough to know better, took to himself a young bride only twenty years old. This was the sister of the king of England, Henry the Eighth."

"Why, I thought King Henry and Louis were not very warm friends," said Harry Ray.

"They had not been; but they both decided that it would be for their mutual interest to take this step, and so, although the poor young princess had given her heart to the duke of Suffolk, she was not consulted, and the two great kings had their way."

"Did she make a good queen, I wonder," chimed in Milly Brown.

"She hardly had a fair trial, for King Louis died in about three months. This sad event was without doubt hastened by his sudden change of habits. The young queen liked to keep late hours, and Louis was not used to this,—strange as it may seem to us now, he was used to going to bed at six o'clock. Of course, he liked to please his young wife, so he began to attend all sorts of festivities, and to sit up until midnight. He also changed his custom of dining, taking his dinner at noon, instead of much earlier, as this was getting to be the fashion.

"It seems that Louis could not have been very rugged at that time, for these changes were more than he could bear. He died in 1515, at the age of fifty-three years, more sincerely mourned by his people than any king of France since good St. Louis."

"I suppose his son didn't make so good a king as his father," remarked Will Barnaby.

"He did not leave any son at all, Will; so his son-in-law, Francis the First, being a descendant of the first duke of Orleans, took the vacant throne at the age of twenty."

"I imagine King Louis feared for his country,—to leave it in the hands of a young fellow who knew nothing of a king's duties," said Julia March.

"He did have fears; indeed he called the prospective king a 'big boy,' and said he was afraid he would spoil all that he had done to better the condition of France."

Milly Brown never felt satisfied until she had some description of the personal appearance of the kings, and so it was she who asked:—

"Was King Francis a kingly looking man, professor?"

"I suppose," was the reply, "that he was the most magnificent looking man who had ascended the French throne in centuries. He is described as being a perfect specimen of physical beauty. This is well enough as far as it goes, and in this case it was united with great personal courage."

"I daresay the people felt sure he would be as good as he looked, and admired him just as the ancient Israelites admired King Saul. I hope they were not disappointed in him," said Julia.

"I fear they were, Julia; the Lord does not see as man does; he looks upon the heart, and he estimated the young king by his character at once. And after a few years the people began to do so, too; for Francis was an extravagant fellow, who spent money as freely as water, and didn't care so very much whose money it was, either. He soon taught the people that his will, and his alone, was the only thing to be considered for a moment."

"It is a great mystery to me," said Joe Palmeter, "why the people endured so much oppression for so many centuries."

"Well, all these abuses of the rights of the people are what finally led to the troubles which culminated in the horrible revolution of 1789.

"About the first thing Francis did," continued the teacher, "was to start out with a large army against Italy. To cut a long story short, the French were successful. The king made a treaty of peace with the Swiss, who had been helping the Italians, and another treaty with the pope. The French people didn't like this popish interference at all—"

"Neither should I suppose they would," interrupted Joe Palmeter. "It's so queer the popes must all have a hand in every governmental pie."

"Well, the people understood, too well, that in this treaty the crafty pope was attacking their liberties, and they were accordingly indignant."

"I am beginning to think that Rome is the mother of that unjust principle,—a union of church and state," said Joe.

"You are right, Joseph, and you are correct in calling it an unjust principle. It is as far removed from righteousness as the east is from the west, or the heavens from the earth," said the teacher, earnestly, as he bade his class good night.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

The Unseen Banners.

"THERE are flags flying everywhere, mama," said Charlie Ross. "There is going to be a great celebration, because the people are so glad that victory has attended the American arms."

"Yes, I have noticed the flags. It seems as if the atmosphere was fairly aquiver with stars and stripes. The flag stands for a great deal, and it is not strange that we honor it. But, Charlie, I have often thought as I looked on the flying banners, that if our eyes were only truly open, we should see the real banners that stand for the principles of the unseen warfare."

"What do you mean, mama?"

"I mean we should see the banner of the prince of darkness, the god of this world, who has usurped the throne of Christ, and the banner, the blood-stained banner of Prince Immanuel."

"Why, mama, how literal you make it! Do you think we would see the armies of right and wrong, and look on the combat of two opposing armies?"

"Why not, Charlie? We do see a part of the armies. But with the children of men go vast hosts of unseen warriors, and every human soul is enlisted on one side or on the other side of the controversy. Each one stands either under the black banner of the prince of darkness or under the blood-stained standard of Prince Immanuel."

"But the unseen hosts, mama, who are they?"

"They are the angels, good and evil. You remember that when Lucifer fell from heaven, legions of angels fell with him, and it is their part to entice, persuade, and even to seek to force men to join them in their warfare against Christ and his angels. Indeed it is due to their power that torture has been employed to cause men to turn from their allegiance to Prince Jesus."

"So the evil angels influence men, do they?"

"Yes, Charlie. If we incline to our own way, and reject the counsel of God, we are left to the counsel of God's enemies. The power behind the thrones of men is determined by the attitude of kings and rulers to the counsel of God."

"Mama, are there more evil angels than good angels?"

"No, Charlie. When the Syrians came against the Israelites, urged on by evil angels, Elisha prayed that God would open his frightened servants' eyes to see the horses and chariots of God's unseen host about him, and he said, 'Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be against us.'"

"Then, mama, why is it that there are so many more wicked people in the world than good?"

"The Bible says it is because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved, and so are given over to strong delusion that they might believe a lie. God does not use any questionable methods to bring men into his service; for his service can only be a service of love for truth's sake. Satan and his hosts are unscrupulous, using deceit, making promises they cannot fulfill, and because men receive not the love of the truth when God sends it to them to be received if they choose—for God uses no compulsion—they give themselves over to deception."

"There are more evil men now than ever, are there not, mama?"

"Yes, Charlie. And the reason is that Satan knows he has but a short time. The very last battle in which there is the least prospect of victory is right at hand. While God is sending to earth his armies, and pouring out the reserves of heaven, Satan is moving earth and hell to oppose God, to marshal all earth's inhabitants under his black banner, and leave not one soul to welcome the true king of all the earth. And he is marshaling his hosts by every conceivable method, even putting on the guise of an angel of light, and winning men to his service in the name of Christ."

"How terrible, mama! But is there not some way of rescuing some of these deceived souls?"

"Yes, Charlie. By the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, they may be set free. It is our part to go into the thick of the fight, and coöperate with the good angels in bringing into Immanuel's army all who will receive the love of the truth. Every day the conflict wages hotter, and soon we shall prove the enmity of Satan against those who oppose his supremacy on earth. The Word says, 'The dragon was wroth with the woman [the true church], and went to make war with the remnant of her seed which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.' Satan himself will materialize before men. Through Spiritualism, men are being prepared to bow down before the prince of rebels, believing him to be the Son of God, though he opposes the commandments of God, and antagonizes the true faith of Jesus. Those who will not be led away by the evidences of their senses, but will hold firmly to the Word of God, will be counted as enemies to earth's rightful sovereign, and the decree of death will be pronounced upon them."

"But, mama, you know Christ is coming before the decree is carried into effect."

"Yes, Charlie. The shining banner of Jesus will be revealed above unnumbered hosts of glorious angels

The firmament will be as bright as lightning from east to west. King Jesus will come to claim his own, to rout the usurper, and to scatter his armies. The black banner will go down. Satan will be cast into prison with his angels, while all the servants of Christ, held now in the dungeons of death, will come forth to shout an everlasting triumph. Glorious and immortal, saints and martyrs will ascend with angels to the courts of God, to judge the wicked prisoners of earth, and decide their doom.

"When they are brought forth at the end of the thousand years, it will be to meet the Face of love from which they fain would hide. In sight of the heavenly city, they will sink into nothingness before God, and sin and sinners be no more. O, Charlie, the celebration of a nation over an earthly victory, cannot be compared to the celebration that will be held in God's universe over the fall of evil and the everlasting triumph of love. So, dear, let us gird on the armor of light, and go forth to fight for yet a little while under the banner of Prince Immanuel."

The Prospectus for "The Desire of Ages" is Now Ready.

"THE Desire of Ages" is the title of a forthcoming volume by Mrs. E. G. White. It is intensely interesting and beautifully illustrated, and is devoted to the consideration of the great truth that in Christ the love of the Father is revealed—that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

Although the complete book will not be ready until about October 15th, the Prospectus has been issued thus early to enable our agents to make a Fall delivery.

Our Tract Societies will handle this book in their respective States, therefore all orders for Prospectuses, price of which is $1.25 postpaid, and correspondence concerning terms and territory, should be addressed to them.

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

OUR SPLENDID OFFER.

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

This Bible is bound in Tampico Morocco, Divinity Circuit, Leather Lined to Edge, Round Corners, Red under Gold Edges, Silk Headband, Silk Marker. It has large, clear type (see specimen, page 449), sixty-four illustrations, fifteen splendid Clear Maps, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of proper names and foreign words with their meaning, etc.

But the most unique and important feature of this Bible is the "COMBINATION." This consists in the blending of both old and new versions in one volume without increasing the size. As to the merits of the Bible we offer, it is enough to say that

We have received numerous unsolicited words of praise,
a few of which we print. For brevity's sake, we omit the name and address of writers, but their letters are all on file in our office.

WHAT OUR PATRONS SAY OF IT.

I received the Bible in good condition. I am very well pleased with it in every way. It is a first class Bible; just the kind I have wanted.

The Bible is a beauty. Everything that could be wished.

The Bible came safely, and is highly appreciated by the friends for whom I bought it.

My Bible received. I am very much pleased with it.

I have received my Bible, and to say I am well pleased would not convey my appreciation. I think it the best bargain ever offered. It is just what I have long wanted.

I have used my Bible nearly three months, have compared it with other higher priced Bibles, and can truthfully say that all that you claim for it is true, and do heartily recommend it to all who need a good Bible.

It is the best Bible I ever saw for the price.

I received your premium Bible, and we were surprised to get such a good grade of book. Many of my friends have examined it and pronounce it excellent.

I wish to thank you at once for the beautiful Bible which I received yesterday. It is far better than I expected.

I am very much pleased with it and like it better than any Bible I have ever had.

We are all more than pleased with the Bible. The type is a great delight.

I am delighted with the Bible. Don't know how you sell it so cheap.

The Bible is far beyond my expectation. It is a real beauty and I am more than pleased with it.

I am greatly pleased with the book, it being better than expected to get.

I received the Bible all right and am more than pleased with it. It is better than I expected. The print is very nice.

The Bible is just lovely. It is lots better than I thought it would be.

I have been using the Teachers' Combination Bible nearly two years. Am more pleased with it daily. The Revised Version feature is "just the thing," and if I were going to purchase a Bible tomorrow you may depend upon it, I would purchase the Teachers' Combination Bible.

Your kind favor accompanied by the Premium Bible was received a long time ago, and after having examined the Bible carefully, I must say that it is, with a minor exception, the finest thing I ever saw for the money. It is just the thing I have been looking after for years. I never could understand why it was necessary to have two Bibles to do the work of one. But in this you have both versions at a glance. I say it is worth twice what you ask for it.

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

THE "Items of W. C. T. U. History" are resumed in this issue, after a brief interval of omission due to a pressure of other work upon the author.

A CABLE dispatch from Manila reports that the religious orders there are selling their property to a syndicate in Hong Kong. Good! Let no word or deed on the part of the new possessors encourage them to discontinue their preparations to go out of business.

THERE is much talk over the prospective successor of Leo XIII., and among the names that are mentioned is that of Archbishop Ireland, of this country. American friends and adherents of the Catholic Church are pointing out that it is time a pope should be chosen from the Western world, and that the transfer of millions of Spanish Catholics to the control of the American Government makes the present time especially fitting. Whether such an argument will weigh with the college of cardinals or not remains to be seen. Judging from what the Catholic mind has been on the subject for centuries past, it would seem that only an Italian is endowed with the mental and spiritual powers necessary to properly qualify one to be the "vicar of Christ."

THE Dreyfus case has again forced its way to the surface of French affairs. The head of the army intelligence bureau has confessed to the forgery of a letter which was of great weight in securing the conviction of Captain Dreyfus, and while under arrest committed suicide, some say by the orders or at least with the connivance of other high officials. The French people are said to be in a terrible state of excitement over this revelation of dishonor in the highest circles of the army.

The army was the last place where they believed dishonor could exist, and now that it has been found there, and amongst the highest officials, a feeling of dismay is mingled with their surprise and indignation.

It seems to be one result of militarism that the army comes to be in the eyes of the people the one high repository of personal honor. What an individual says "on his honor as a soldier" is considered as safeguarded by every possible guarantee of truthfulness. It is the end of all controversy, the limit of all appeal to personal integrity.

But what should there be about the business of learning to kill people that is calculated to develop high personal qualities? To us, there appears nothing very strange in this forgery by a high army official directed against a fellow-officer. It is not strange from the standpoint of Christianity. For the same law which says, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," says also, "Thou shalt not kill;" and he who does the one need not depart out of the pathway he is in to do the other. It is the same pathway of disobedience to the moral law.

The incident strips away the disguise from the false idea of honor which men have set up apart from the precepts of God. The only honor that can be depended on is that that aims always at fulfilling the law of righteousness.

THE political world in both hemispheres has been profoundly stirred by the surprising manifesto from the czar advocating national disarmament with a view to establishing conditions of universal peace. The true significance of this remarkable proposition is a question upon which political authorities are divided. Come believe the czar has spoken in sincerity, and others see in it only a political stroke to help along Russian schemes in Asia. We think the czar spoke from a sincere desire for peace; but is peace by national disarmament practicable? Many who have commented on the czar's proposal deny that it is, and there is no lack of argument to support their view.

Disarmament does not get to the bottom of the difficulty. No nation keeps an armament for the mere sake of having soldiers and a fleet. The nations are covetuous; they want all the territory they can get, and will take each other's territory if they can. That is the real trouble. The real question is, whether Russia is willing to stop extending her empire in China, France willing to give up Alsace-Lorraine, and England, France, Germany, and other powers willing to stop their encroachments in Asia and Africa. Are they willing to practice the Golden Rule toward each other? If not, then the conditions will remain by which the armaments of the powers were created, and effective disarmament will remain an impracticable project.

Real and lasting peace in this world comes only from a change of heart. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

But one point of significance must not be overlooked. From such a document strong support will be drawn for the idea which many advocate, that we are nearing a millennium of peace. It goes far to suggest the cry of "peace and safety." But "when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." We are witnessing the thrilling events of the last days.

It is reported, says the Kansas City Star, that Archbishop Crespo of Santiago and the other Catholic clergy of the city, presented their bills for salary to the American military governor, and that he has forwarded them to Washington to get the opinion of the Government as regards the advisability of their payment. That is carrying an absurd matter a long way. An American military governor ought to be sufficiently acquainted with fundamental American principles, and sufficiently in harmony with them, to have dealt with the question effectually at first sight. The Star appropriately remarks that the decision to be given at Washington "involves the character of the government established at Santiago, whether it is an American government, or whether we are continuing to the best of our ability the old Spanish government."

TRUTH

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 15, 1898.

NUMBER 36.

THE side of truth is the side of the true majority.

IF you are a follower of God, you will be a leader of men.

A SINGLE word from the throne of God outweighs the earth.

RELIGIOUS truth never requires the support of civil statutes.

LACK of Scriptural support for an institution cannot be made up by any amount of support from other sources.

PEOPLE make a great mistake when they pass over the question of what is right, to consider what is custom and precedent. Right is always the true precedent.

To say that the Sabbath needs the support of human enactments, is to say that the law of God needs such support; and that is to say that the law of God is very weak.

NO SUNDAY law was ever based upon the argument that the first day of the week is the seventh day, or that one day of the week will do as well for the Sabbath as another.

WHEN men set about enforcing the law of God, they argue that God is God's law is the law of giving; man's law the law of requiring.

IN the sphere of moral duties and privileges, ignorance is not bliss.

IT is better to walk alone in the path of right than to follow a multitude to do evil.

ALL religious legislation is an effort to substitute law for conscience in those upon whom it takes effect.

PIOUS motives and sincerity of purpose are not good substitutes for a knowledge of the truth.

NO INDIVIDUAL can ever find real Sabbath rest save by accepting the divine invitation given to all them "that labor and are heavy laden."

THE ARGUMENT FOR SUNDAY—Tradition, Legislative Enactment, and Popular Custom.

either too impotent to enforce his own enactments, or not wise enough to know when or how they should be enforced.

THE platform of religious truth is never overcrowded with church members.

NO REASON for Sabbath observance has ever been or can be devised which will be an improvement upon that specified by the Author of the Sabbath in the fourth commandment.

THE God of Christianity has been in the national Constitution from the first, his name being inscribed there in the principles of justice and liberty which it embodies. But the National Reform party—the party which confounds Christianity with politics—wants to put into the Constitution a god which would crowd these principles out. They want the Constitution to distinguish between religious classes, giving to the larger the authority to coerce the smaller, contrary to the American and Christian principle of equality before the law in matters of conscience.

The god which could not be put into the Constitution without crowding justice out of it, is not the true God.

Futile, But Not New.

THE experiment of making an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God in the fundamental law of a commonwealth, which a large party in this country is so anxious to try, is not a new one. Not to mention the attempts of former times, made by the nations of the old world, to administer the laws of God by the machinery of the State, we have an example in the constitution of the Southern Confederacy, set up in our own time. It affords a fair illustration of the practical utility of the scheme proposed. The preamble of that constitution said:—

“We, the People of the Confederate States, each State acting in its sovereign and independent character, in order to form a permanent Federal Government, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity—invoking the favor and guidance of Almighty God—do ordain and establish this Constitution for the Confederate States of America.”

This is not so full a recognition of God's sovereignty as political religionists want put into the national Constitution to-day, but it was not void of practical effect. It declared that “we, the people,” included in the Government set up upon the Constitution, invoked “the favor and guidance of Almighty God;” hence only those were included who were willing to make this religious acknowledgment, which was in itself a confession of faith in the sovereignty and providence of God. The atheist and agnostic were not recognized at all, and could properly have no share in the government, nor claim protection under it.

The preamble of the United States Constitution makes no allusion to God; and as between the two, upon the theory that such an acknowledgment is binding upon the nation, and that to omit it is a sin calling for divine retribution, providence should certainly have favored the Confederate government in its contest for separation from the Union.

But what was the result? Every person knows. The constitutional acknowledgment of God availed nothing. The Almighty did not recognize it. And such an acknowledgment is of no more value to-day than it was in the time of the war.

If God had desired a government to be set up which recognized his sovereignty in its fundamental law, he could have perpetuated the Confederate government. And that he let it go down, is plain evidence that he did not wish it perpetuated. But religious hobby-riders refuse to learn anything from experience.

IN an article contributed to The Independent, on Russia's Peace Proposition, Prof. Benjamin Ide Wheeler recognizes the momentous nature of the present hour, in these words:—

“We are surely living in great times. Events are all on the grand scale. It seems almost as if history were conscious of the division of time by centuries, and were hastening to make out a balance sheet.”

The thoughtful observer, whether a believer in prophecy or not, sees that we have reached a time which answers to the description which prophecy gives for the last days.

A Hindu's View of “National Christianity.”

THE difference between the so-called Christianity of the national type—that which gives rise to the term “Christian nation”—and real Christianity, is illustrated in the experience of a convert from Hinduism, as related by Professor Max Muller in the August Cosmopolist. “I was sitting in my room at Oxford copying Sanscrit,” says the professor, when “a gentleman was shown in, dressed in a long, black coat, looking different from my usual visitors, and addressing me in language of which I did not understand a single word.” It was a learned Hindu who had come to see Mr. Muller and was addressing him in Sanscrit. Upon being given some manuscript of the Veda to peruse, he said he did not believe in the Veda any longer, but had become a Christian. An earnest conversation ensued, of which the professor says:—

"It was not long before I discovered a sad and perplexed tone in his conversation, and, though he assured me that nothing but a deep conviction of the truth of Christ's teaching had induced him to change his religion, he told me he was in great anxiety and did not know what to do for the future. What he had seen of England, more particularly of London, was not what he had imagined a Christian country to be. His patron, Dhulip Singh, had placed him at some kind of missionary seminary in London, where he found himself, together with a number of what he considered half-educated and narrow-minded young men, candidates for ordination, and missionary work. They showed him no sympathy and love, but found fault with everything he did and said.

"He had been, as I soon found out, a careful student of Hindu philosophy, and his mind had passed through a strict philosophical discipline. Hindu philosophy is in many respects as good a discipline as Plato or Aristotle, and, Christian though he was, he was familiar with the boldest conceptions of the world as found in the six systems of Hindu philosophy, and he could argue with great subtlety and accuracy on any of the old problems of the human mind. The fact was, he stood too high for his companions, and they were evidently unable to understand and appreciate his thoughts. He did not use words at random, and was always ready to give a definition of them, whenever they seemed ambiguous. And yet this man was treated as a kind of nigger by those who ought to have been not only kind, but respectful to him. He was told that smoking was a sin, and that he never could be a true Christian if he abstained from eating meat, especially beef. He told me that with a great effort he had brought himself once to swallow a sandwich containing a slice of meat, but it was to him what eating human flesh would be to us. He could not do it again.

"When he thus found himself in this thoroughly uncongenial society, and saw nothing in London of what he had supposed a Christian city to be, he ran away, and came to Oxford to find me, having heard of my interest in India, in its religion and its ancient literature. He had evidently dreamt of a Christian country where everybody loved his neighbor as himself; where everybody, if struck on the right cheek, would turn the other also; where everybody, when robbed of his coat, would give up his cloak also. All this, as we know, is no longer the fashion in the streets of London, and what he actually saw in those streets was so different from his ideals that he said to me: 'If what I have seen in London is Christianity, I want to go back to India; if that is Christianity, I am not a Christian.'"

The Hindu convert had made the mistake of supposing that since Christianity was the professed religion in London, the city was a Christian city, just as it is taken for granted by many not of Hindu blood and education, that a nation where Christianity is the professed religion of the people, must be a Christian nation. His mind had not grasped the fact that profession, as regards Christianity, might be no evidence at all of possession; and that the many possessed but a counterfeit of Christianity, no more like the genuine than is a corpse like a living person. It was perhaps not strange that he should have entertained this false conception, having been educated in the formal systems of heathenism, where profession has always its face value; but such a mistake is without excuse in those who have grown up amidst Christian privileges.

The result was fatal to the new life that had been awakened in his soul, and the professor records that after holding his profession for a time in much perplexity and almost in despair, he sought refuge at last in the old religion which he had renounced. It is a sad illustration of a false conception of Christianity and its effect upon the mind by which it is entertained.

THE most poisonous thing in the world, is sin; the most poisonous serpent is that by which Adam and Eve were bitten, in Eden.

"Christian" Warfare in the Soudan.

"New York Journal."

ACCORDING to London dispatches, "there were no wounded Mahdists left after the battle of Omdurman. Cruel and bloodthirsty as it may seem, the wounded, almost without exception, were massacred by the British and Egyptian soldiers." Since Gordon's death, it is stated, "this has been the custom."

Thus is Christian civilization introduced and commended to the benighted heathen of the Soudan.

Naturally, the massacring being done by Englishmen, it is done from wise and benevolent motives. But when the Japanese soldiers, infuriated by seeing the mutilated corpses of tortured comrades, fell upon their Chinese prisoners at Port Arthur and wreaked vengeance, the whole Christian world, including England, held up its white hands in horror and cried that these Orientals, in spite of their veneer of Western manners, were still ruthless barbarians.

And when the Journal made it known that the Cubans had put to death four Spanish guerillas—the practice of such guerillas being to fire on the wounded as the latter were being borne to the hospitals—the chorus of denunciation of the Cubans as sanguinary savages rose to the international skies.

In the case of the Soudanese, however, it is explained that "a wounded fanatic is more dangerous almost than a well one." Therefore it is expedient to put wounded fanatics out of the way. And we do not need to be told at this late day that whatever Englishmen find it expedient to do in war or peace becomes, by the fact, pleasing in the sight of heaven.

The English are singularly like ourselves, and other people.

THE law of the land cannot be the educator of conscience. That is the office of the Spirit and Word of God.

Upward to Liberty.

BY T. R. WILLIAMSON.

COLUMBUS found a new world in the West,
Waiting to be the place of Freedom's rest.
Here then the humble freeman built his hearth,
Or tilled the bosom of the fruitful earth.
And while his tasseled corn waved o'er the sod,
Reared up a place of prayer to Freedom's God.

Rains fell and sunbeams warmed his smiling fields,
Kindly the earth her bounty to him yields.
Love blessed him with the clasp of childish hands;
Employment gave him health and broader lands.
Each night sweet sleep her pinions o'er him waved,
Renewed his strength that dangers might be braved.

So grew Columbia to a nation grand.
How bright the picture, O that we might see
Ever a growth toward true liberty;
No tyrant influence usurping right,
Restraining human steps from Freedom's height!
Yearning, we pray, "Our Father, keep us free."

Keep heart, keep heart, our work, if bravely done,
Shall count for God, and though all lands should run
E'en unto measures tyrannous and strong,
Oppressing Truth, uplifting all that's wrong.
Still for a future free and glorious state,
Look, labor, pray, and with all patience wait.

Long has earth suffered for a righteous reign;
Day soon will dawn and Christ will come again.
Around the world and on the sky we see
Inscribed the signals of His jubilee.
Kingly and noble, from his brow of light
Eternal sunshine banishes the night.
Established truth shall rule o'er land and sea;
Redeemed and blessed, God's saints shall then be free.

Seeing Life.

BY E. J. WAGGONER.

Most young men are filled with an ambition to "see life." This is a most laudable ambition, but, unhappily, their idea of what constitutes life is so far from the reality that few ever see life indeed.

Christianity is by them considered dull and "pokey." The one who becomes a follower of Jesus is thought to have thrown his life away. To "see life" it is supposed that one must indulge in dissipation, and must visit places of amusement where, to say the least, he would not feel comfortable with his mother as company.

In fact the stage is quite generally regarded as affording the best opportunity to see life. But here, let it not be forgotten, the idea of "realism," real life, is always associated with the representation of what is most corrupt and vicious, thus indicating that the popular idea of life is wickedness. What a sad revelation this is as to what constitutes the "life" of the majority of mankind.

But what are the facts in the case? Is it real life, is it life at all, that people see on the stage, or in the most popular places of resort, or as a general thing on the public highways?—Far from it. The Word of God makes the real facts very plain, and every one can for himself prove the truthfulness of what it says.

"This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life;" "and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." 1 John 5:11, 12; John 3:36. "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the word of life (for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us); that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you." 1 John 1:1-3.

"There is a way that seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death." Prov. 16:25. How sad it is to think of men rushing to death, while they think that they are enjoying the very fullness of life. They go the way of her who says, "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant;" "but he knoweth not that the dead are there; and that her guests are in the depths of hell." Prov. 9:15, 16.

This way which seems right to a man, but which ends in death, is one's own way. We have all turned, every one to his own way (Isa. 53:6); and this way we would fain persuade ourselves is life. Reproofs of instruction, which are "the way of life" (Prov. 6:23), come to us, but we do not relish them; and the result to all who persist in rejecting the way of the Lord is that they shall "eat of the fruit of their own way," which is death; "for the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them." Prov. 1:31, 32.

Wisdom, which is the fear of the Lord, and departure from evil (Job 28:28), call to us all, saying, "Whoso findeth me findeth life;" "but he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me love death." Prov. 8:35, 36. What! is it possible that anybody should love death? Yes, it is; and, strange to say, those who talk the most about "seeing life" in this world are the very ones who are most in love with death. All those who love that which leads to death, love death itself. Death entered into the world by sin (Rom. 5:12); all sin contains the poison of death concealed in it. To love sin, then, which is the transgression of God's law, is to love death. How horrible the thought that one will clasp a skeleton, or what is worse, a putrid corpse, to his bosom, imagining that it is the embodiment of life.

It would not matter how beautifully a body of death were decked out, no one would feel any attraction for it if he could perceive that it was but a decaying carcase. If then people would but stop to consider the difference between life and death, they would not make the terrible mistake that they do, of pursuing death instead of life.

This difference is so very plain that none need have any difficulty in discerning it.

The difference, in short, is this: Life is eternal existence, while death is eternal destruction. Whatever endures has real life in it. Now all know that those things which the world calls pleasures and "real life" cannot exist long, and that is the reason why men are so fierce in pursuit of them. One says, "Life cannot last long, and I mean to enjoy it while I can." He means that the things that he calls life cannot last long. But that very fact shows that they are not life, but death; for life, real life, is eternal. That which is not eternal is not life.

Life is strength, it is freshness, and fullness of joy. One does not grow weary of life; for the characteristic of eternal life, which is the only life, is that it is continually new. One can no more grow tired of it than he can of the morning dew drop or the clear light of the rising sun. But men who are wholly devoted to what the world calls the pleasures of life, soon grow weary and disgusted, and often show by committing suicide that death is what they have been after. A Christian cannot commit suicide; he loves life too well. The more he has of it, the better he likes it.

"What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good? Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile. Depart from evil, and do good; seek peace, and pursue it." Ps. 34:12-14. "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live; that thou mayest love the Lord thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, that thou mayest cleave unto him, for he is thy life, and the length of thy days."

The Genesis of Sunday.

[THIS article is one of several which appeared in The Commercial Advertiser at the time when the New York Legislature had under discussion a bill prohibiting Sunday fishing. It was called out by a statement by Senator O'Connor that Sunday fishing is in harmony with Scripture.]

If the position taken by Senator O'Connor be correct, that fishing on Sunday is justified by Scripture, and the arguments therefor be sound, the question naturally arises, How can Sunday be such a day as is claimed in our times by believers in the Bible when those very Scriptures show that in the apostle's age it was put to secular uses?

The arguments taken from Scripture to show that Sunday was a secular day and the instances of its secularization could be multiplied, if need be, but it better serves the purpose of this article to pass at once from the biblical to the historical consideration of the subject, since Sunday was never made sacred by any biblical writer nor by any writer for several centuries after the apostolical period.

The present status of Sunday is the result of civil law and custom. There is no historical proof in controversy. On the 7th of March, 321, Constantine issued his famous Sunday edict, commanding that there be no labor, except in the fields, on the "venerable day of the sun." This edict contained no allusion to any Christian sentiment. With the pagans comprising the largest portion of the empire, Sunday was already the chief day of the week. It was the day they had consecrated to the worship of the sun. Being already in the habit of abstaining from labor on that day, they were obliged to abstain from secular pursuits on their conversion to Christianity on the Sabbath or sacred day, which the newly adopted religion brought with it.

As the pagan converts became more numerous than the Jewish, and the abstinence from labor on two days—the Sabbath of the Bible and Sunday of Pagandom—was found to be irksome, the two coalesced, and thus Sunday became the sacred day.

Again, to blend as far as possible into one harmonious whole the discordant systems of paganism and Christianity, was the height of Constantine's ambition. As a result, it is charged by Protestants that Christianity was corrupted, and all history and candid scholarship sustain the charge. In order to unite the young and rising faith with the old and waning one compromises were effected, but our theologians are loath to face the fact, and often, being in possession of it, are loath to make it known, that one of these compromises resulted in the overthrow of the Sabbath of the Bible in favor of the Sunday of Pagandom.

Years afterward, when in a controversy, the Puritans of England charged inconsistency on the part of the Episcopalians because they, claiming to be anti-papists, yet observed without scriptural warrant the holidays of the Roman Church, the Puritans were met with the countercharge of similar inconsistency because they observed Sunday, since it, too, was clearly an ecclesiastical institution of papal-pagan origin, with as little foundation in Scripture as the various saints' days and holy days of the papacy. To extricate themselves from these straits; scriptural reasons had to be given for their practice.

Nicolaus Bound, a preacher of that time, formulated and promulgated the theory that Sunday had rightly taken the place of the Sabbath, since on that day Christ arose from the dead. In the process of time additional arguments were added to this, and among those arguments is the one that Jesus met his disciples after the resurrection on the first day of the week in honor of that event, and hence thereafter that day became the day of Christian assembly and worship. The disciples, however, did not themselves all this time believe that the resurrection had taken place.

This brings me back to the basis for Senator O'Connor's statement that it is scripturally correct to fish on Sunday, for one of the meetings between Jesus and the disciples took place after they had fished all night and caught nothing, the night being the first part of the day, according to the Biblical division of time. See Gen. 1. Jesus that morning himself commanded them to cast their nets into the sea again, which, according to the story, they raised so full of fish that with difficulty could they lift them.

This is the history of Sunday sacredness, and shows what a shallow institution it is in behalf of which so much legislation is sought, which laws are contrary to our national Constitution and subversive of the principles Jesus of Nazareth taught, even if they were in favor of the Sabbath he observed. His teachings, until the time of the pagan butcher Constantine's "conversion," had no help from civil powers, yea, rather the powers of this world opposed the Nazarene. By what principle of Americanism or of Christianity is one man to be forced to observe any particular day according to the notions of another, so long as he does not interfere with another man's rights?

The State's province is in things civil; let the church look after the conduct of its own members in things religious.

The moral natures of both the friends and the opponents of Sunday laws are injured by their existence, the former because they must invent all sorts of hypocritical pretenses for their enforcement and continuance; and the latter because they are also constantly planning devices by which to evade them. When the falsity of the claims for Sunday is shown, and that "holy" day is shown to be a fraud, then its friends begin to talk about the poor laborer, on whose behalf they want the laws enforced. It is true that the laborer needs more rest. He ought to have more than he receives. But who is to determine when he is in need of rest—the minister or the laborer himself?

In justice, I have as much right to demand that one man shall work on Sunday as he has to demand that I shall rest on that particular day. But why should the efforts of Sunday law advocates be confined to rest on Sunday only? Is Sunday rest the only rest the laborer needs?

It is to be hoped that soon the day will come when we shall have a separation of church and state, when each will attend to his own business, and when every citizen will enjoy his own rights without interfering with another. This is American and Christian.

THE czar's peace proposition has not been received everywhere with enthusiasm, even among leading men in the church. By some it is regarded as insincere, and by more as impracticable. If it is impracticable with Russia as its source of authority and power, it cannot be made practicable by any other power; that is certain.

Spain and Her Methods.—No. 2.

BY MRS. FLORENCE A. BARNES, M. D.

THE SPANISH INVASION OF PERU.

If I describe the invasion of Peru by the Spanish, with its cruelties of warfare, you will not only realize what the invasion of that territory was, but the general methods of procedure pursued by them in all parts of South America which they conquered.

Peru was, perhaps, the portion of country most interesting to them, from its great abundance of minerals. It was therefore early the seat of the most persistent efforts at invasion by these avaricious people. But first let me give you a short description of this empire and its people.

The territory of Peru stretched along the Pacific from about the second degree of north latitude to the thirty-first degree south. The present divisions of Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and Chili, cover the same limits.

The lofty and magnificent Andes mark with sublimity the coast line, mountain rising above mountain, until the highest, covered with eternal snow, crowns the whole with a sparkling diadem. Such a country would seem to be very unfavorable to agriculture, or to internal communication. The sandy strip along the coast is fed by only a few mountain streams. Rain rarely falls there. The rocky steeps of the Sierras, with its dazzling heights of snow or volcanic fires, seem equally unyielding to the labors of the agriculturist. While the precipices, torrents, and gaping chasms, seem to preclude communication between the different parts of this immense territory.

Yet the genius of the South American Indian had overcome all these difficulties. Canals and subterranean aqueducts refreshed the coast, and clothed it with fertility and beauty. The steep sides of the mountains were terraced, and as the different elevations had the effect of difference in climate, they exhibited every variety of vegetable growth, from tropical to temperate productions. And on the snow covered crests, the Peruvian sheep with their shepherds wandered. On the lofty plateau an industrious people had settled, and towns and hamlets, with orchards and gardens, seemed to the mariner on the coast to be suspended in mid air; while great roads traversed the mountain passes, and opened communication between the Capital and remoter parts.

The source of this civilization was found in the valley of Cuzco, the central region of Peru. According to tradition, the time was when the ancient races of this country were in deep barbarism. They worshipped any object in nature, made war a pastime, and feasted on the flesh of victims. But (according to the legend) the sun, the great parent of mankind, in pity, sent two of his children to gather the natives into communities and teach them the arts of a civilized life. This pair, brother and sister, husband and wife, bore with them a golden wedge and were told to reside on the spot where this sacred emblem should, without effort, sink into the ground. This is supposed to be where the foundations of the city of Cuzco were laid. For here it disappeared forever; and from this point the two entered on their work of civilization,—he teaching the men the arts of agriculture and she teaching her sex to weave and spin.

The simple people listened to these messengers from heaven, and the community gradually extended itself along the broad table land, and on the surrounding parts. This was four hundred years previous to its invasion by the Spanish. Cuzco was the holy city. Here was the great temple of the sun, the most magnificent structure in the new world. It surpassed in the costliness of its decorations any in the old world. It was defended by a single wall of great thickness, twelve hundred feet long, on one side. On its north rose a strong fortress. On another side, were two semicircular walls of the same length as the first. The fortress, the walls and the galleries were built of stone. No cement was used, but they were adjusted so nicely that it was impossible to put the blade of a knife between them. Many were of vast size, some measuring thirty-eight feet in length, eighteen feet in breadth, and six feet in height.

This people of the sun were called Incas. The line descended from father to son through their whole dynasty. But the queen was chosen from among the sisters of the Inca; thus preserving the purity of the heaven-born race.

The sovereign was immeasurably above his subjects. He was also the head of the priesthood, and presided at all the important religious feasts. He imposed taxes, made laws, appointed judges, raised armies, etc. He was the source from which all flowed. His dress was made of finest wool, richly dyed, and ornamented with gold and precious stones. He wore on his head a many-colored turban with tasseled fringe and feathers. Although far above the highest of his people, he took great pains to inspect the condition of the humbler classes. At stated intervals he traveled throughout the country, stopping from time to time to listen to the grievances of his people, or to settle disputes which had been referred to his decision by the regular judges. As his court made its way along the mountain roads, every place was thronged with his people, eager to catch a glimpse of their ruler, and when he raised the curtain, the hills resounded with blessings on his head.

The historian's description of the Inca and his work in the barbarous countries of South America cannot be improved on. From this work let me give a few more facts concerning the people and their ways. The houses were built round a court, the walls of stone and the roofs of rushes. The interior presented a picture of wealth and beauty. The sides of the walls were studded with gold and silver ornaments. Niches in the walls were filled with plants and animals, wrought of silver or gold. Even the domestic furniture and many utensils were of the same rich material. Baths for the Incas were of basins of solid gold, with silver aqueducts. Gardens were filled with tropical flowers, while by their side were skillful imitations in gold and silver. This magnificent display was only that which each amassed for himself. He owed nothing to inheritance.

On the death of an Inca, his palaces were abandoned, with all his possessions, except such as were buried with him. They were closed forever. The new sovereign must provide himself with everything new. The reason for this was the belief that the soul would after a time reanimate the body on earth, and everything must be found just as he had left it. The body of the deceased Inca was embalmed and taken to the temple of the sun. There, placed on chairs of gold, they sat with their heads inclined downward, and their hands crossed over their bosoms.

The nobility was divided into two orders. The Incas of common descent with their sovereign were alone permitted to be priests, and they also filled every station of high trust. The other order was the Curacas or the governors of conquered nations or their descendants. They were usually allowed to continue in their former places, though required to visit the Capital occasionally, and allow their sons to be educated there. Their authority was local only. The Incas always retained their own individuality.

The empire was divided into four great provinces, each under a governor, who resided for a portion of the year at the Capital. The people at large were divided into bodies of ten. Every tenth man had a supervision of the rest, being required to see that they enjoyed the rights to which they were entitled, to solicit aid from the government when necessary, and also administer justice or punishment. These were still farther divided or set apart into bodies of fifties, of hundreds, five hundreds, and thousands, each with an officer having general supervision of those beneath. Lastly, the whole empire was distributed into sections of ten thousand, with a governor over each from the nobility of Incas. There were also tribunals of justice, and magistrates.

Besides the legendary tale of the origin of the Incas, there have been some who have believed them to have been wanderers from ancient tribes mentioned in Bible history. However this may be, we find the mode of government adopted corresponded almost exactly with that which Moses established over the children of Israel in their forty years wanderings. Ex. 18:21, 22, 25, 26. "Moreover, thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, . . . and place such over them to be rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, and rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens; and let them judge the people at all seasons," etc.

In their systems of laws and industries, which will be next described, the Peruvians were far in advance of their position under Spanish civilization.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 3.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE Christian people who are laboring so earnestly to have Sunday enforced by law and regarded as the Sabbath day claim that Sunday is a divine institution, appointed by Jesus Christ, and so taught by the Holy Spirit.

There are many others who are opposed to human laws for the enforcement of Sunday, who believe the same thing.

Not only is this day said to be commanded by Jesus Christ, and so taught by the Holy Spirit, but it is now regarded as being the pivot upon which depends the genuineness of one's experience in Christianity.

It is contended that Sunday is the "test of all religion;" that he who "does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God;" and that he "who does not worship God is lost."

While for many years the Sabbath has been regarded as an integral part of Christianity, it is only in recent years that it has been regarded as the test of Christianity.

Leaving out for the time being the question as to whether Sunday is or is not the Sabbath day, it cannot be denied that the Sabbath day is the test of the Christian religion, and it must be acknowledged that he who does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God, and he who does not worship God is lost.

While this has always been true concerning the Sabbath day, the knowledge that this is so has not been prevalent until quite recently; for a long time this important truth was lost sight of.

Now that the time has come when this principle is being recognized, and everything now is centered in the Sabbath, it being the sign or mark of the genuine worship, it is of paramount importance that the truth concerning the day of the Sabbath should be made known.

Especially is this so when the Holy Ghost himself is held responsible for the doctrine that Sunday is the Sabbath.

As we have already seen, there must be perfect accord between Christ, "the Truth" (John 14:6); the Word of God, or Gospel, "the truth" (John 17:17), the law of God, "the truth" (Ps. 119:142) and the Holy Spirit, the "Spirit of Truth" (John 16:13); and the searcher after truth will find that they are in perfect accord.

So patent is this truth that the leaders in the Sunday-law movement, when pressed for one single text in which the change of the Sabbath is recognized, have been compelled to confess there is no such text.

But just now we will consider the work of the Holy Spirit as regards the change of the Sabbath.

The promise of Christ was that when the Spirit of truth should come he would guide the believer into all the truth.

This promised gift of the Holy Spirit was fulfilled on the day of Pentecost. From that time all that is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, so far as the apostles themselves are concerned, with but one or two exceptions, is the record of what the Holy Spirit accomplished in and through them.

The Sabbath was as much then the sign of the true religion as it is now. When therefore so much depended upon it, why is it that the Holy Spirit did not lead the apostles to teach that such an important event as the change of the Sabbath had taken place? When it is claimed, and justly too, that the Sabbath is the test of all religion, so that he who does not worship God is lost, why was the failure to announce the change of the Sabbath permitted? The answer is not hard to find. It is because no such change had nor could have taken place. The testimony of the Spirit of truth must be on the side of the law of truth, and that law declares that the seventh day is the Sabbath.

We are aware that some claim that it was impossible for it to be done then, as circumstances were such in the apostles' times that it would have been impossible to keep the new day. Those who claim this, also claim that the time when Christianity(?) had conquered the world, which was in Constantine's day, and the conditions had become quite favorable to the change, was the time that the change was promulgated.

This is an admission fatal to the claims of our Sunday friends that the Holy Spirit taught the change of the Sabbath. For he who has the least knowledge of church history knows that the apostasy of which the apostles spoke had taken place even before Constantine's time. And any change, even though such a thing were possible, would be too late then.

Can the Holy Spirit bear witness to the Sunday law crusade? Can the Spirit of truth bear witness to that which is contrary to the law of truth? In other words, can the Spirit of truth bear witness to that which is an untruth?—Never. On the contrary, the Holy Spirit is bringing home to the consciences of men and women the fact that the seventh day is the Sabbath. From the word of God, from which no discordant voice can possibly come, the Holy Spirit is convincing men and women that no other day than the seventh can possibly be the Sabbath.

Finding no help—no authority from the Word of God,—the friends of Sunday are turning towards Rome. To their "beautiful mother" from whom they have been so long estranged, these Protestant daughters are returning. And again we repeat: for this the Roman Catholic Church has long waited; no one knows better than does she, that her triumph is near at hand.

What this means for Protestants will be considered next.

THE purpose of Christianity is not realized in the death of any human being.

A CORRESPONDENT who professes a strict adherence to the principles of the Christian religion, writes us that he has no use for the SENTINEL because it teaches that Christians cannot consistently participate in civil government. He says he is taught, and fully indorses the idea that it is his duty to "use every lawful and honorable means to prevent religious legislation by the civil government;" but "when I go to the ballot box and exercise the right of a citizen of a civil government, I am told that I am mixing in politics and bringing a reproach upon my profession as a Christian. In fact, I am told by the SENTINEL that if I am a Christian I am not a citizen of any earthly or civil government, but simply a citizen of the kingdom of heaven."

YES; that it what the SENTINEL teaches; and it teaches it because it teaches the separation of church and state. And in teaching this separation it wants to be consistent, and not teach separation of church and state in one place, and union of church and state in another place. Let us briefly consider the matter.

WE say that church and state should be kept separate, because they belong in different spheres of action. The church is set in the world to be the channel of the love of God, flowing down to the sinner, offering him mercy, and bidding him escape the penalty of his transgression of the law. The state, on the other hand, is established to lay the hand of force upon the transgressor and without mercy proceed to deter him and all evil-minded persons from the commission of crime, by inflicting the penalty prescribed by the law he has transgressed. Unite the two, and force would interfere with love, and love with force; mercy with justice, and justice with mercy. Each would nullify the other, and the good purposes of both God and man would fall to the ground. There would be no gospel to win souls to righteousness, and no guarantee of protection to men in the enjoyment of their rights.

THE state is a political institution. It is of the world; for politics cannot be separated from the world. It opens its doors to all classes. To shut any class of the people out of politics—to deprive them of political privileges—would be a flagrant injustice. And it would be an unheard-of thing even to suggest that political rights should be denied to the worldly-minded. No separation of politics from the world can be thought of. Worldliness must be in politics; it has a right there; and as a matter of fact it is there and always has been. And we may look in vain to find a more complete embodiment of every principle of worldliness than politics affords.

POLITICS means force. Every ballot that is cast means force. There is no mercy in it, no persuasion, no love. Its word is inexorable,—carried out, if need be, by bullet and bayonet. It represents government by force, and that alone.

CHRISTIANITY, on the other hand, is not of this world. It contains not one element of worldliness. Were one such element mixed with it, it would no longer be Christianity. The Christian must therefore be separate from the world. He is not of the world, but has been chosen out from the world. It is Christ himself who has done this. And those who have thus been called out from the world constitute the ecclesia, the church of Christ.

CAN the Christian, then, maintain his separation from the world, and at the same time take part in that which is of the world? Can he represent both a government of love and a government of force? Can he practice both politics and Christianity? Can he be both a part of the state and a part of the church? And can he do all this without uniting, in his own self, church and state?

CAN he be a part of the state and at the same time be separate from the state? or a part of the church and at the same time separate from the church? Since he cannot, as is obvious, can church and state both be joined to him without being joined to each other? Obviously, he himself is, in such a case, the joining element in their union.

OUR correspondent does not believe in a union of church and state. He would not have the legislature enact religious laws; he is as much opposed to that as anyone. He would not have the legislature or any state body act in a religious capacity. But he says it is all right, and even a duty, for an individual representing the state to do this very thing. The individual voter is no less truly a part of the state than is the body of individuals known as the legislature; the state is represented as truly by the one as by the other. In each case the same principle is involved—that of state participation in religion.

THIS is not a mere theory. It is what the people are doing in practice; it is what they are exhorted to do by the men who believe the state ought to be religious. It is just the way in which they propose to make the state religious; that is, by the votes of the people. All they want is to get a preponderance of religious votes; and they are continually exhorting the church members to put their religion into their votes. This is what they mean by a "Christian vote." And certainly, if a Christian is to vote, he ought to vote as a Christian. "Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus," is the rule of Christianity. The Christian cannot lay aside this rule when he comes to the ballot box.

THERE being a "Christian vote," there must of course be "Christian politics;" and of "Christian politics" we are hearing on all sides. And when the "Christian politicians" can command in behalf of their schemes sufficient "Christian votes" to put the mold of such politics upon the state, we shall then have a "Christian state." And then, by extending the "Christian state" to the various lands of the earth, by "Christian" and "humanitarian" wars, etc., they will have all the world made Christian and then will come the millennium! And all this starts with the "Christian vote;" all of it grows out of the idea that the Christian ought to take part in politics.

* * *

ALL this, we are told, will not be a union of church and state. Oh no; the people who want this are as much opposed to union of church and state, they assure us, as anyone can be! And they are just as consistent as the person who says it is a Christian's duty to vote, but does not believe in a religious state. The "Christian vote" is simply the first step in the development of church and state union in full. Union of church and state in the individual is the starting point of union of church and state in the legislature, and in the nation. Let professors of religion go into politics, and union of church and state will inevitably follow. Let them keep out of politics, and no union of church and state would ever be possible.

AND because the SENTINEL will not be so inconsistent as to approve of church and state union in the individual, while denouncing it in the nation at large, our correspondent says he has no use for the SENTINEL. Very well; it may be there are many more who hold to the same view. But if they had all the use in the world for the SENTINEL, that would be of little value to the cause for which it stands; for that cause cannot be helped on by inconsistency. Sooner or later, when the controversy shall have waxed too warm for inconsistency to hide itself, such individuals will be obliged to take their stand squarely on one side or the other of this great question. But far better is it to go to the root of the matter now, stand squarely on the foundation principle of separation between church and state, and not be obliged to shift from one position to another in the crisis of the battle that is coming.

The Gist of the Whole Matter.

THE strictest interpretation of any one of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, as applied to any particular case, is the only one admissible: for if we, for policy's sake, or to suit some strong element, or a new sentiment, are to relax by degrees and gradually waive the benefits of its protection in the effort to give a broad or so-called "liberal" interpretation, it would be better to commit the act openly and at one blow, for its complete destruction would be but a question of time by the other process. If done openly, no man need be deceived by plausible sophistries into lending his influence towards the destruction of this guardian of our liberties, but could intelligently decide what course to pursue.

The most indifferent man believes it would be wrong to annihilate it at one blow, and the most crafty and designing knows it could not be done. Since it is admittedly wrong to destroy it at one blow, it would also be equally wrong to take the first step in the direction that might end thus by degrees, even though the act was done in innocence or ignorance. The act must be measured by the results that may be produced, and not by what it appears to be.

Notwithstanding these self-evident truths, there are a number of people who seem to be well-meaning who are striving to have the name of God inserted in the Constitution, and to give it an undeniable religious phase; the next step will be to embody in it a religious test for citizenship, for by their own public admission, they do not propose to relax their efforts nor be content until the full measure of their desires become an accomplished fact. If they were pressed to give a definite and satisfactory reason for their course, or required to tell what results are likely to be produced, we believe it would be impossible for them to do so.

Now, concerning religious liberty recognized and guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States as the natural and inalienable right of every man: According to a strict interpretation of this provision, we deny the right of any court in the land to try any man on a charge of so-called "Sabbath desecration," viz.: because the highest legislative body in the land is enjoined by the Constitution to preserve inviolate every man's right to "worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience," and not according to the "consciences" of some religious zealots, as crystallized into so-called "religious" laws. The only proviso (a reasonable one) being that no man shall interfere with another in the exercise of his rights. The same supreme legislative body is prohibited, in addition, from legislating on any religious question.

Where there is no power to create a law, there can be no law; there can be no violation, nor trial for any so-called "violation," of any "law" passed by such legislative body in usurpation of powers denied to them. Such powers as are denied to the highest legislative body, in the creation of proscribed laws, cannot be passed upon nor interpreted by the Supreme Court, and cannot by right or logic be found in the function of any lesser legislative body or court, for they cannot enact nor enforce anything in contravention to the Constitution of the United States.

Since the civil power, therefore, has no right to create religious laws, there can be no civil judgment of religious matters. Hence, there exists only one view of such matters, viz.: their religious aspect.

For instance, the Sabbath being purely a religious institution, it can be considered only as a matter of religion, and the civil power having no right to deal with religious questions, cannot create a "civil" Sabbath, such as we frequently hear so much about; consequently, from the very nature of the case, there is not, and indeed cannot be such a thing.

Further, the prosecution of anyone for a "violation" of a civil "law" designating any particular day as the "Sabbath," is a violation of that man's sacred and inalienable constitutional rights, regardless of whether he be religious or irreligious. Such an action is a blow at religious liberty, one of the great pillars of our free American Republic, without which the other great pillar of political freedom would not be worth a straw, and the ultimate of such action is to knock these two props from under our beloved country, when the whole fabric of government would fall into a religious despotism or open anarchy.

The man who would deny either of these rights to another ought to be prepared to sacrifice the same for himself. He who deliberately persists in such a course of action is, therefore, to all intents and purposes, a traitor and an anarchist, especially if religious motives impel him, although he may not realize it or mean to be so, even remotely. This sounds harsh, but truth cannot be modified to compromise with error, and there is no other just or logical conclusion in the matter. Truth is the property of no man, but belongs to God, for it is written, "Thy Word is truth," and "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God;" and those who, in the blindness of their error, array themselves against the light of palpable truth, are denying the Word of God. For such the only remedy lies in the convicting power of the Holy Spirit.

THE absorption of the old Nestorian Church into the Greek Church of Russia, is expected to follow from missionary work now being done upon lines peculiar to the Russian Church. The Nestorians will receive the protection of the Russian government against the Khurds and the Shah of Persia.

The Unfolding of Two Principles.—I.

OUTWARD AND INWARD SUBMISSION.

THERE is no youth past the age of twelve who has not had an experience by which he may be enabled to comprehend the difference between the two principles that underlie two kinds of government. The government that is simply outward, that compels an action that is dissented from in the heart, is one with which we have all had more or less to do,—one in which we ourselves have acted a part of governor or officer as well as subject.

For illustration, a child is found playing at some innocent game, and an irritable father, who fails to consider his own rights or the rights of his child, uses his power to compel the child to cease his play. Burning with rebellion within, the child yields an outward submission, but the seeds of tyranny sown in his rebellion bear fruit in his action toward others; for he in turn compels his younger brothers, or weaker playmates, to submit to his wishes.

This kind of control or government is simply the control or government of selfishness, backed by power to compel an outward submission. But there is a more powerful government, and the principle upon which it is based is the principle of love. This is illustrated by the dealings of a loving father with his beloved son. Such a father does not ask his child to cease from that which is innocent, and is invading no right of others. Full of gentle tenderness, full of desire for his son's happiness and highest success, he asks him (for instance) to give up the cigarette habit, reasoning with him of its hurtfulness, persuading him by his own example, until won in heart, he yields obedience to his father whose government is based on love.

DESIGNED FOR ALL CREATURES.

This is the manner of government designed of God for all creatures. In it is a liberty to do good wide as creation, kind as sunshine. The principle of love is the basis of true government, and indeed is proved to be the only substantial basis for government. It is by the principle of love that all things consist or hold together. Once let this principle die, and speedy disintegration follows. Where love is lacking the family separates, the government declines: for love is the basis of trust, and without trust no commercial or political relation can be sustained, much less social. Let love die out and the whole fabric of society would crumble, the whole relation of worlds would be disestablished.

BASIS OF UNIVERSE.

God is love. Were he not love, there could be no universe. Were his characteristics developed in all his creatures, a government would exist upon earth as in heaven, and his will would be done upon earth as it is done in heaven. The law of God would be in each heart, and as his law is the expression of his character, every one would be like God, and would thereby be enabled to love his neighbor as himself. But this glorious government of love has been sadly marred on earth. Not only in the government of the family is it distorted, and force is employed to compel outward submission to unjust commands, in which the heart has no part; but even the governments of states and kingdoms wield the sword to enforce unjust enactments in the name of law, supposed to be for the preservation of society. But behind all human enactments in the home or the state still works the power of love, which is indeed the only power after all to keep humanity together.

How can we account for this foreign element that has entered into government? How is it that God being love, and by virtue of this character existing as universal sovereign, there exists another manner of government, based on a principle antagonistic to the principle of love.

THE BEGINNING.

This question takes us back to the beginning. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made."

This beginning, back of which no one can penetrate, presents to us God and the Word, or the expression of God revealed and made visible. Of him it is written again, "God who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son [or the Word] whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds; who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high." Heb. 1:1-3. Again it is written, "Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature: for by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist [or hold together]." Col. 1:15, 16, 17. The Son of God reveals to the universe that God who dwells in light unapproachable, who is immortal, invisible, before whom the highest intelligences of heaven veil their faces.

THE OBJECT OF CREATION.

Christ manifested the character of omnipotent Love in the creation: for every work reflects the character of its author. Angels, man, the beasts of the fields, the fowls of the heaven, the wonders of the sea, the splendors of space, all tell one story—the love of God. All were created for one purpose,—to proclaim and exemplify the government of love. "For the invisible things of him [his qualities of character] from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead." Rom. 1:20.

Studies in French History.—38.

"ABOUT this time," began Professor Carman, "there was to be an emperor elected for Germany, and, true to his ambitious nature, King Francis I., joins in the mad race with Henry, of England, and Charles, of Spain. The King of Spain, though at this time only nineteen, was a very cunning fellow, having as much foresight and diplomacy as an old man, so he was able to outwit the others, and was finally crowned Emperor of Germany, Charles V."

"I can pretty easily imagine that King Francis wouldn't like that one bit," remarked Milly Brown, "for I remember that he was a very self-willed fellow."

"Yes, Milly, he was fond of having his own way, and he was quite used to having it, too; and so now he could hardly endure the thought that another should be preferred before himself. You know he was called 'The King of the Gentlemen.'"

"I dare say he thought his rival was not a gentleman, to take away the honor from him," said Max Smith.

"Yes, he hated the Spanish king most fiercely, and as long as he lived, he tried to injure him in every way possible. He tried to gain the sympathy and friendship of the English king, but in this also the young Spaniard outstripped him in the race, for Henry was quite won over to his cause before the tardy Francis could ingratiate himself into Henry's good graces."

"I wouldn't give very much for that kind of friendship," said Julia March.

"No; such friendship is worth but little to anybody. When Francis found that King Charles had secured the royal friendship of England as well as the crown of Germany, his disgust and anger knew no bounds; so the foolish fellow at once declared war against him."

"Maybe he thought he could whip him as easily as he did the Milan folks," said Fred Green.

"But the trouble was," said the professor, "his success in Italy was turning into a defeat; for he had hired some Swiss soldiers to help hold the territory for him, and now they suddenly left the French army and ran off home."

"I had understood, someway, that the Swiss helped the Italians," said Edna.

"Many of them did, but these men had been hired to help France, and now they claimed they could get no pay for their services, so they ran away, and Milan reverted again to Italy."

"I can't understand why the French king was not more sensible. Didn't he know that soldiers want their pay—and especially foreign soldiers?" asked practical Jack.

"O, he did not forget to send them their wages, my boy; he was too cunning and, let us hope, too just to forget that. But it was afterwards proved that the king's mother had kept the money her son sent for the soldiers, and spent it all for herself."

"The selfish creature!" exclaimed Florence Ray. "What was her name?"

"Louisa, of Savoy," replied Professor Carman.

"I think I remember reading her name in history," said Edna Phillips, "in connection with the Duke of Burgundy."

"I presume you are thinking of Duke Charles, of Bourbon—not Burgundy—this scheming woman tried to win the affections of this man, who was at that time Constable of France, and one of the greatest men in the country. Because she could not do this, she became his bitterest enemy, and coaxed her son the king to so torment and persecute him, that at last the foolish fellow turned traitor to his country and joined the Emperor of Germany—King of Spain—against France."

"I dare say the Spaniards made a great deal of him after he left the French and joined them," suggested Jenin Jacobs.

"You are quite mistaken, Jenin; for instead of that they despised him.

"Nobody likes a traitor,—he's not to be trusted," said Joe Palmeter.

"No; for you will remember that even the English had no respect for Benedict Arnold.

"France now had three powerful enemies," continued the teacher, "the King of England, the King of Spain, and the traitor duke,—all were plotting her ruin."

"Poor Francis!" exclaimed Milly Brown; "he must have had his hands full."

"He did, and yet he was insane enough in the midst of all his troubles again to rush over into Italy to try to recover his lost territory."

"O dear!" again exclaimed Milly. "How foolish of him! do tell us what became of him."

"Why, he was taken prisoner and carried over to Madrid, where he was kept in close confinement a long time. But at last he made a most humiliating treaty with the King of Spain, in which he promised to give up a considerable portion of his country to him, besides other considerations."

"I don't see how the Spanish king could be at all sure that Francis would do as he agreed if he let him have his liberty," said practical Jack.

"I presume he was afraid of treachery," said the teacher, "at any rate, he sent and brought the two little sons of Francis and kept them as a surety, before he would let their father go. But even then he did not keep the first particle of his agreement, and as soon as his feet touched his native soil, he exclaimed fiercely: 'Now I am again a king.'"

"Don't you think he ought to have kept his promise," asked Julia March, "even if it was humiliating for him?"

"He certainly ought to have kept his word, but he did not, nor did he accept the invitation which the King of Spain sent him, to return to Spain at once as his prisoner. But as the pope had by this time become angry with the Spanish king, Francis found in him a ready ally. So he at once entered into another 'Holy League' with the crafty pope, and hostilities continued."

"I should think if the league had been very 'holy' at this would have put an end to the fighting," smiled Joe Palmeter.

OUR SPLENDID OFFER.

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

This Bible is bound in Tampico Morocco, Divinity Circuit, Leather Lined to Edge, Round Corners, Red under Gold Edges, Silk Headband, Silk Marker. It has large, clear type (see specimen, page 449), sixty-four illustrations, fifteen splendid Clear Maps, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of proper names and foreign words with their meaning, etc.

But the most unique and important feature of this Bible is the "COMBINATION." This consists in the blending of both old and new versions in one volume without increasing the size. As to the merits of the Bible we offer, it is enough to say that

We have received numerous unsolicited words of praise,
a few of which we print. For brevity's sake, we omit the name and address of writers, but their letters are all on file in our office.

WHAT OUR PATRONS SAY OF IT.

I received the Bible in good condition. I am very well pleased with it in every way. It is a first class Bible; just the kind I have wanted.

The Bible is a beauty. Everything that could be wished.

The Bible came safely, and is highly appreciated by the friends for whom I bought it.

My Bible received. I am very much pleased with it.

I have received my Bible, and to say I am well pleased would not convey my appreciation. I think it the best bargain ever offered. It is just what I have long wanted.

I have used my Bible nearly three months, have compared it with other higher priced Bibles, and can truthfully say that all that you claim for it is true, and do heartily recommend it to all who need a good Bible.

It is the best Bible I ever saw for the price.

I received your premium Bible, and we were surprised to get such a good grade of book. Many of my friends have examined it and pronounce it excellent.

I wish to thank you at once for the beautiful Bible which I received yesterday. It is far better than I expected.

I am very much pleased with it and like it better than any Bible I have ever had.

We are all more than pleased with the Bible. The type is a great delight.

I am delighted with the Bible. Don't know how you sell it so cheap.

The Bible is far beyond my expectation. It is a real beauty and I am more than pleased with it.

I am greatly pleased with the book, it being better than expected to get.

I received the Bible all right and am more than pleased with it. It is better than I expected. The print is very nice.

The Bible is just lovely. It is lots better than I thought it would be.

I have been using the Teachers' Combination Bible nearly two years. Am more pleased with it daily. The Revised Version feature is "just the thing," and if I were going to purchase a Bible tomorrow you may depend upon it, I would purchase the Teachers' Combination Bible.

Your kind favor accompanied by the Premium Bible was received a long time ago, and after having examined the Bible carefully, I must say that it is, with a minor exception, the finest thing I ever saw for the money. It is just the thing I have been looking after for years. I never could understand why it was necessary to have two Bibles to do the work of one. But in this you have both versions at a glance. I say it is worth twice what you ask for it.

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 15, 1898.

IN the Christian warfare there is never any trouble from bad rations, or from neglect of the One in command.

THERE are never any "dull times" in the vineyard of the Lord. The world was never overstocked with Christians.

IN David's time the faith of a stripping was more powerful than the sword of a giant. And God has not changed.

THE articles we are now printing on "Spain and Her Methods," by a late missionary to Brazil, will give the reader a fair idea of the nature and value of the civilization brought by Spain to the western world.

THE assassination of the empress of Austria was as senseless a crime as it was diabolical; and as such it was a deed characteristic of the times. But while having its origin in the vagaries of a brainless fanatic, its consequences may weigh heavy upon the world. To the aged emperor Francis Joseph, it comes as the crowning calamity of a life already made conspicuous by misfortune.

HOWEVER the czar's peace proposal may be received in various lands by the people, events are already mocking at the plan by precipitating a war crisis more serious than has arisen before in years. The dissolution of the Austrian throne—and with that of the empire—which may follow the assassination of the empress Elizabeth, is regarded as a source of much danger to the peace of Europe, but more serious than this is the news that a French force has established itself directly in the path of British conquest in the Soudan. British ambition has as one of its brightest dreams a railway running all the way in British territory from Cairo to Cape Town; and no rival power may think to shatter that dream with impunity. An imperial ruler may propose peace, but imperial ambition never dreams of it.

THE Hawaiian Islands, it is said, will be given the status of a Territory of the United States, being governed as such Territories are upon the American Continent. In time, they may be admitted as a State of the Union. Porto Rico will probably be put upon the same footing. Previous to this United States territory has been acquired by purchase or treaty; but the natural method of imperialism is by conquest.

THERE is, says the Open Court, a great revival of Buddhism taking place in India. Buddhistic schools and journals are being established in Colombo, Calcutta, and other places, and one prominent Buddhist journal is sounding a loud call to all Buddhists to unite in one grand crusade to recover India. It is not strange that it should be so. These are days when nothing that is positive for evil or for good remains inactive, but is, on the contrary, being infused with new life and intensity. And this is but a token of the approaching climax of the long contest between good and evil, and after that comes the end! Are you watching these things, reader, and are you ready for the end?

THE papacy has it in mind to observe the close of the century with a grand celebration which will mark in a fitting manner the exit of the nineteenth century and the advent of the twentieth. This celebration of course will do honor to the papacy. It will be of a nature to convey the impression that the papal church is the vanguard of the procession that moves in the direction of progress and modern enlightenment. The committee having the matter in charge have published an extensive program, which includes pilgrimages to various "holy" places in France, Italy, and Spain. "In particular," it is said, "there is to be a dedication of the Catholic world anew to the divine Heart of Jesus." Certainly the Catholic world is in need of something—Spain especially—but it would seem that if former dedications had been of value, a turn of fortune would not be so sadly needed now.

THAT church and state ought to be kept separate, is a Christian truth as well as a principle of American government. Jesus Christ himself stated it, and we as Christians have a right to state it now. We are not doing anything inconsistent with a profession of Christianity when we state it. Yet the SENTINEL has been sharply criticised on the ground that, since it professed to be Christian and maintained that Christianity could not mix in the affairs of civil government, it had no business to be telling the people how the Government ought to be run. Such critics should remember that Christ himself is the author and first exponent of this governmental principle, and that to criticise its enunciation is to criticise him. In setting forth this principle the SENTINEL is taking no part in the affairs of civil government. Let the civil government be kept separate from religion; then let it be run as the fortune of politics may decide.

THE forces of the Mahdi in the Soudan have been crushingly defeated by the British and Egyptian forces that have been penetrating southward into the heart of the dark continent under the command of General Kitchener. For the first time since rapid-firing guns were invented, an opportunity was afforded at this battle to test the effectiveness of these weapons against a large army of courageous fighters; and the resulting slaughter seems to have fully justified the expectations of their inventors. The Arabs were mowed down like grass, and more than 10,000 of them lay dead upon the plains when the firing ceased,—as great a number as were killed on both sides at the battle of Gettysburg. Though the Mahdi's army was treble the size of the British and Egyptian force, and fought with the most reckless courage, the whole loss of the latter was less than three hundred men.

AMERICAN SENTINEL

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 22, 1898.

NUMBER 37.

ALL religious legislation puts a barrier between man and God.

NO LAW of man was ever powerful enough to drag a soul to Christ.

THE true evangelist points the weary and burdened soul to Christ, not to the law.

IF the Sabbath is not the seventh day of the week, it is not the seventh day of anything.

SINCE all men must come to Christ to find rest, the rest which the Sabbath law enjoins must be religious.

NO MAN can come to God save through Jesus Christ, and no man can come to Christ save through the freedom of his own will.

INSTITUTIONS which rest upon a basis of truth, are much more stable than those which rest merely upon a legal basis.

THE law of the Sabbath, which commemorates creation, is no more uncertain or imperfect in any way than the laws by which creation is governed.

SOCIETY needs not the restriction of new laws, but liberation from the old laws inwrought in human nature, which hold men in the ruts of sin and error.

THE SUNDAY LAWS A BARRIER BETWEEN GOD AND HUMANITY.

JESUS CHRIST says, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Those only who accept this invitation will find rest. It must be an act of their own free will. But the Sunday laws are for the purpose of compelling the "heavy laden," and all people, to rest. And to be compelled to rest is not accepting an invitation to rest; free will and forced will are exactly opposite conditions. And therefore those who yield to the Sunday laws—those who are compelled by them—by that very thing, shut themselves away from receiving the rest which Christ offers, and which they need. They are shut away from the blessing of God.

It is religion, and that alone, which keeps the Sabbath rest from becoming a period of aimless inactivity positively demoralizing to mind and body.

PEOPLE who think they ought to legislate upon religious matters should remember that a good motive did not protect Uzzah when he put forth his human hand to steady the ark of God.

CONSCIENCE should be the only compelling power in all religious observances.

IF men would be careful to give to God as much as they exact from their fellow-men, there would be far less hypocrisy practiced in the name of religion.

IF God had not meant to make his Sabbath law plain to human comprehension, he would not have used in expressing it so many words of one syllable.

THE working-man needs the support of a moral strengthening within, rather than the proping up of religious laws from without.

Rest Not Secured by Law.

It was the Lord of the Sabbath who said, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." It is He who gives this same invitation to every weary soul to-day.

The Sabbath was made for rest, and the Sabbath law commands rest; but He who made the Sabbath and gave the law, bids all men find rest by accepting his invitation, "Come unto me."

And by this He testifies that rest can be found by men in no other way. They cannot find rest except they come to Him. They cannot therefore find it through the compulsion of law or in the formal observance of the law.

The purpose of the Sabbath and the Sabbath law can be realized only in Christ. He who remains separated from Christ can find no benefit—no rest—in the Sabbath.

And as no Sunday law can bring any soul to Christ, it is certain that no Sunday law can in any way promote Sabbath observance.

Jesus Christ is "the end of the law for righteousness." There can be no observance of the law of righteousness outside of him.

The Church's "Mightiest Helper."

A PAPER which is devoted to the propagation of the doctrine that religion and politics ought to be united, says:—

"Were the powers of the state used to protect the Sabbath and maintain its sacredness, to purify the family and prevent vice, it would be the church's mightiest helper."

Think of it: the state becoming the church's mightiest helper! What church, what religion, could hold to such a view? Not Christianity; for that affirms that the church's helper in her contest with evil here is none other than the almighty One above.

No; this is the religion which seeks the help of the state and the pathway of politics. That the state can become the church's mightiest helper is exactly what that religion teaches. It is what every one must accept as truth who holds to the idea of religion in politics. It is the old principle of church and state union. The very essence of that union is the idea that the state can—and therefore ought to—help the church.

But it is not the truth, and brands as false the religion which maintains it. When the church looks for the state to become her "mightiest helper," she turns her back upon Him who said to His people, and for them in all ages, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth;" and "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

Religion in Politics.

It is said that politics and religion ought to be united; and this, by individuals who profess total dissent from any union of church and state.

But can politics be separated from the state? and can religion be separated from the church? The Christian religion, certainly, is bound up in the Christian Church.

Since then politics cannot be separated from the state, nor religion from the church, how can politics and religion be united without making by that very act a union of church and state? And through what other means did church and state ever become united?

JUSTICE alone does not represent Christianity; justice alone is not the aim of Christianity. To deal with the sinner as he justly deserves, is directly contrary to Christianity. And therefore any power instituted for the purpose of securing justice alone, cannot join with Christianity. Christianity does not call into use anything which aims at securing justice only. This is why Peter, when he drew the sword to resist the attack upon Jesus, was told to put it up again into its sheath.

Civil Government Upholding Religion.

SUNDAY, the 11th, two newsboys were arrested in this city for shouting the name of a newspaper "extra," to attract the attention of prospective buyers. The magistrate before whom they were taken told them they had made themselves a nuisance; and fined them three dollars each.

But what makes the shouts of the newsboys a nuisance on Sunday when it is all right on other days of the week? Oh, it is religion,—that religion which holds Sunday as a sacred day, during which everybody ought to keep quiet. There is no other explanation that can be offered.

The civil government of the city of New York lent itself on that occasion to the maintenance of a religion. This is an undeniable fact.

A Great Triple Alliance.

BY A. G. DANIELLS.

THREE GREAT APOSTASIES.

DURING this present world, or from the time since the flood to the end, there are to be three great apostasies or departures from God. Two have already occurred, and the third is now in progress.

The descendants of Noah knew God. They had the truth. But when, after knowing God, they turned from the truth and went into idolatry, the first great apostasy occurred. These apostates are commonly spoken of as the heathen. The false system of religion into which they went is known as paganism.

When the great reformation came at the time of Christ, and the gospel was preached in all the then known world, thousands were called out from heathenism, and became true worshipers of God. These were known as Christians, and constituted the Christian Church. But when worldliness and false doctrines came into the church, when it imbibed so many of the errors of paganism that it resembled, imitated, and even excelled the latter in its corruptions and cruelties, another and second great apostasy occurred in the world. The false system of religion into which the church then went is known as the papacy.

During the great reformation of the sixteenth century, the truth was again set forth in clearness and with power, and thousands were called out from the errors of the papacy into the light and purity of the gospel of Christ. As a body these are known as Protestants. But like the descendants of Noah, and like the early Christian Church, protestantism, as a whole, is becoming worldly, and is cherishing and embracing doctrines which will as surely lead it away from God as did the errors of paganism and the heresies of the papacy the people in former times. And this departure, when it is complete, will constitute the third and last great apostasy in the world,—apostate protestantism.

THREE GREAT ERRORS.

And the reason for all this is plain when once understood. It has been Satan's studied plan to corrupt every true church, or rather to corrupt the true church in every age. And his line of attack is much the same in all ages. The great errors over which these great apostasies have been or will be accomplished are three, and are practically identical. Note the following:—

1. Paganism became such through the worship of "deified dead men," based upon a belief in the false doctrine of the immortality of the soul. And this is founded on the first great lie told by Satan in Eden, "Ye shall not surely die."

The church which ultimately developed into the papacy was led into image and saint worship through the teaching of, and belief in, this same unscriptural and false doctrine.

And protestantism holds to this same doctrine, and is stealthily being led into spiritualism, the worst of all idolatries, through it.

2. The pagan church was united to the state, and thus had the power to, and did, persecute the people of God, as in Egypt, Babylon, and Rome.

The papal church in its apostasy likewise united itself to the state, and, as all know, became a most bitter persecutor of those who remained true and loyal to God.

The Protestant Church is seeking to unite itself to the state, and when it succeeds in this, it will likewise persecute those who "keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus."

3. Paganism cast aside the Sabbath of the Lord and made Sunday, the first day of the week, its chief day, in honor of the chief god which it worshiped, the sun. More than this, its devotees persecuted the people of God when they attempted to keep the Sabbath in their midst. See Ex. 5.

The papacy likewise trampled the Sabbath of the Lord out of sight, persecuted those who kept it, as witness the 29th Canon of the Council of Ladocea, A. D. 364, and the persecution of the early Waldenses, many of whom were Sabbath-keepers, and placed Sunday, the first day of the week, in its stead.

Protestantism is doing the same thing to-day. It refuses to accept the heaven-sent message of reform on the Sabbath question; it is almost universally demanding laws for the enforcement of the observance of the Sunday-Sabbath; and already through these is persecuting those who keep the Sabbath of the Lord.

The reader certainly cannot fail to see a very striking similarity here throughout. 1. Idolatry brought about through a belief of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. 2. The persecution of God's people through the unholy union of church and state. 3. The tearing down of the Sabbath, God's great memorial of his creative and sanctifying power, and the elevation of the first day of the week, a day upon which God never rested, which he never sanctified, nor commanded to be kept holy, in its place.

THE ONE COMMON AND UNIFYING DOCTRINE.

But the belief in the immortality of the soul is the great unifying element in all. Through this Satan has direct access to all. Through this he will unite the three great apostasies in his last effort to obliterate from the earth all true knowledge and worship of God. Through this he will work his last great and over-mastering deceptions, by which he will deceive men—the very elect if it were possible—into believing a lie, and in warring against those who keep the commandments of God. 2 Thess. 2: 8-12. Right here will that text be fulfilled which says: "And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus." Rev. 12:17. Satan will seek to obliterate the Sabbath altogether by means of a universal death decree against those who keep the Sabbath and refuse to honor the Sunday by yielding obedience to man made laws for its observance, for he knows that as long as men keep holy the Sabbath there will be true worshippers of God in the earth.

The whole religious world will be concerned in this diabolical work. Spiritualism, which is but paganism revived, will lend its hand and testimony to the movement. The papacy, which from long experience knows so well how to deal with those it pronounces heretics, will act a leading part. And apostate protestantism will join hands with both in this last great conflict between truth and error, between light and darkness, between Christ and Satan.

THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

This, dear reader, is the triple alliance to which we refer at the beginning of this article. Satan will unite and employ all the great apostasies in the final conflict. Like the gathering of the Roman army about Jerusalem before its destruction, this triple alliance, and the death decree which will come out of it, will be the signal for God's people to flee from the cities and villages before his final judgments are poured out upon the wicked inhabitants of the world in the seven last plagues.

This is what is coming, and it is already shaping itself. We are living in a day of "triple alliances;" but Satan has in store the greatest triple alliance of all,—one which will take in the whole world.

These three great apostasies which will compose this alliance, are the three powers referred to under the sixth plague, in the following language: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come up out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of the great day of God Almighty." Rev. 16: 13, 14.

Reader, have nothing to do with this confederating of the three great religions of the world. It is of the devil. "Say ye not, A confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy; neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid. Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself; and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread." Isa. 8:12, 13. Then you will be just as safe from all harm as were the Christians who fled from Jerusalem and Judea in A. D. 70. "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day." Matt. 24:20.

THE Secretary of War has sent orders to General Lawton, in command at Santiago, directing that no money be paid by him in settlement of the claims presented by Roman Catholic bishops of that city for the salaries hitherto paid them by Spain.

Spain and Her Methods.—No. 3.

BY MRS. FLORENCE A. BARNES, M. D.

The tribunals of the Incas were conducted in such a way that the judges and lawyers could not get rich over disputes. They were obliged, says the historian, to determine a suit in five days from the time it was brought before them. Yet there were provisions for the security of justice. A committee investigated the character of the magistrate at intervals, and any neglect of duty was punished in a most efficient manner. The lower courts making monthly returns to the higher ones, and these in like manner to the viceroys, the monarch could from these reports, look over and know his most distant people.

Laws were few but severe. They related to criminal matters. Theft, adultery, and murder were capital crimes. Blasphemy against the sun, and the Inca, was also punished with death. Removing landmarks or turning water away from a neighbor's land to one's own, burning a house,—all these were severely punished. To burn a bridge was death. The laws were simple and the application plain. With an honest judge cases were liable to be determined correctly. The inspection of a board of visitors, and the monthly returns of the tribunals afforded a strong guarantee of their integrity. Thus the evil of a long protracted suit was avoided, in which the man who wins is often financially ruined when he pays his lawyer's fees.

The property laws were the most remarkable of the Peruvian polity. Here the historian is very accurate. The territory was divided in three parts, one for the sun, another for the Inca, and the last for the people. The lands devoted to the sun furnished the support of the temple and costly ceremonies. Those given to the Inca supported the royal state and supplied the various needs of the government. The remainder was divided in equal shares amongst the people. The law made it necessary that every Peruvian should marry at a certain age, at which event the district in which he lived provided him with a house and a piece of land large enough for the support of himself and wife. An additional amount was granted for every child. This division was renewed every year and the possession of the tenant was increased or diminished according to the number in the family. The whole territory was cultivated by the people. The land belonging to the sun was first attended to; then the land of the old and sick, the widow and the orphan, and of the soldiers actually in service. The people cultivated their own ground each for himself, but under a general obligation to assist his neighbor if it seemed necessary.

Lastly they cultivated the land of the Inca. This was done with great ceremony by the whole people in a body. A similar arrangement was carried out in the manufactories and in the weaving of their fabrics. Occupation was found for all, from the child of five to the aged matron not too old to hold a distaff. Idleness was a crime severely punished.

The different parts of the country furnished those who were peculiarly suited to the different employments. One district supplied skillful miners, another workers in metals or wood. But no one was required to give more than a given portion of his time to public service. So no one was over-burdened, and each had time to provide for his own. A certain part of the agricultural products and of the manufactures were sent to Cuzco, for the Inca and his court; but far the greater part was stored in magazines, established throughout the provinces. Any deficiency in the contribution to the Inca was supplied from the granaries of the sun. A part of the royal stores was removed to a third class of magazines to supply the people in years of drouth or flood, to furnish relief for the sick, thus justifying the historian's testimony that a large share of the revenues of the Inca found its way back again into the hands of the people.

These storehouses were found by the Spaniards stored with maize, coca, quinia, woolen and cotton of the finest kinds, vases, and utensils of gold, silver, and copper,—in short, every article of luxury or use. No one could be rich, no one could be poor, in Peru; but all enjoyed a competence.

The most remarkable part of that great tract are the broken parts of the great roads which connected the most distant points with the great center. Over rocky Sierras, through leagues of heavy stone, suspension bridges, stairways scaling precipices hewn in the rock, ravines filled with solid masonry,—fifteen thousand miles of such a road as this existed. It was built of free stone covered with a cement harder than the stone itself. The art of making this cement is lost. Another kind of road on sandy land, was made beautiful by trees on either side, shading the traveler from the burning sun, and filling the air with rich perfume. By means of posts stationed five miles apart along these roads, dispatches were carried to and from all parts of the territory, at the rate of one hundred and fifty miles a day, by runners.

But these sun worshipers offered no alternative to those whom they conquered. They must bow to the sun or yield to war. But they tried gentle means of conversion first, trying to soften the hearts of the tribes around them by acts of kindness. They allowed time for their example to have an effect, and even tried the effect of negotiation, by making presents, by all subtle arts at their command. When these failed, then only they prepared for war. But in every stage of war, they were open to propositions of peace. Having conquered them, their next act was to introduce the worship of the sun.

Then a census was taken, a division of the land taken was also made according to the plans already stated. The conquered people were consulted as to preference of climate and occupation.

The historian has given us some idea of their system of education. Arithmetical computations were made, registries were kept, history and poetry had their place, geography was studied, as also astronomy; and they divided the years into twelve lunar months, and the months into weeks.

Architecture amongst them marked their high degree of civilization. This was superb. Some of their methods of work, perhaps, may now be classed among the lost arts.

Such were the people and the country which the Spaniards found,—a gentle race, and a people amongst whom true Christianity ought to have found deep root. It was in the year 1502 that Columbus first discovered the South American coast not far from the bay of Santa Marta. He heard of the wealth of the interior and spent a little time searching for the rich country. Reports reached Spain and new adventurers were sent out. In the year 1525 Santa Marta was taken by the Spaniards and a fort built. Then came that greatest of wild adventurers, Pizarro. With nothing behind him but death and imprisonment, he could well afford to risk all rather than return to Spain unsuccessful. His first voyages along the coast were successful enough to give great hope to the crown of what he could yet do, and so once more he returned to conquer that happy people, in the name of Spain and the cross.

Having won the simple-hearted people by gifts and kindness on his first voyage, they were totally unprepared for his treachery a few years later. He had explained to some of the natives he met on that first voyage that he represented a greater power than the Inca, and a religion better than theirs. This report together with a description of the fair men had reached the ears of the Inca, who made the prediction that the nation would ere many years be conquered by a strange people, and died believing this. Before dying he made the greatest mistake an Inca could have made. He broke for the first time the law of inheritance among the Incas, and divided the kingdom into two parts, one to the legitimate heir and the other to a favorite son by a favorite wife. The Inca himself could have a plurality of wives. Five years afterward, the two brothers were at war with one another, and the downfall of the Incas was insured.

Of all the hardships suffered by Pizarro and his followers, of the time employed in gaining court favor, his gifts of gold and silver and other products of South America, I must leave the reader to learn from the historian. It is my purpose only to show the methods of warfare pursued by these Christian(?) representatives of a Christian(?) religion, in conquering this peace loving, harmless people. From the historian I have drawn largely, in describing their happy, peace loving life, that the reader may realize more fully the comparison between that people and the present Indian population of the same countries.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 4.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

PROTESTANTS claim that the Sabbath was changed from the seventh day to the first by command of Jesus Christ, and that it was so taught by the Holy Spirit.

The Roman Catholic Church claims the same thing. In this Protestants and Catholics are agreed.

Because of the alleged source of the change Protestants claim that Sunday is, as indeed it would be in that case, a divine institution. Upon this point also the Catholics are in perfect accord with the Protestants.

Protestants further claim that the Bible, and the Bible alone, is the rule of faith and practice, so that in all Protestant Church Catechisms it is taught that whatsoever is not contained in Holy Scripture, nor can be proved thereby, is not necessary to salvation, and is therefore not to be received.

But, as pointed out in former articles, notwithstanding this latter confession, when pressed for the Scripture setting forth the change of the Sabbath and authorizing the observance of the first day of the week in the place of the seventh, Protestants are bound, as they have done repeatedly, to confess the complete silence of Scripture upon this point.

Now a person of even less than ordinary intelligence, if he will stop to think for a moment, will see that Protestants must acknowledge either their claim that the Bible alone is the rule of faith is a false claim, or that Sunday as a Sabbath day exists without any divine warrant.

That they will not admit the latter is already a foregone conclusion, for they are more zealous in behalf of Sunday at this present time than they ever were before.

But it leaves them in a terrible predicament, for they confess there is no Scriptural authority for the day, and there is nowhere they can go except it be to the Roman Catholic Church.

Assuming for the moment that they will not accept the latter alternative, this very situation proves conclusively that their claim that the change of the day was taught by the Holy Spirit is utterly false; for the Holy Spirit would not leave them thus to flounder along.

What does this mean for Protestantism—that is, the kind that is represented by Sunday?

Let us see. They say, "The Sabbath [Sunday] is the test of all religion." They say further, that "he who does not keep the Sabbath [Sunday] does not worship God," and that "he who does not worship God is lost."

Allowing this claim to be true (and it is true when spoken of the true Sabbath), when they confess there is no Scripture command for keeping Sunday, by that same confession they also confess their inability to prove that those who do not keep Sunday do not worship God, and they thereby fail to prove that those who do not keep Sunday are lost.

Yet further: As Sunday is claimed by them to be the test of one's worship of God, etc., and they confess the silence of Scripture in regard to the day, in the absence of divine proof elsewhere, they thereby lack divine credentials for their own existence as Protestants, or strictly speaking, as Christian churches. And this is a charge which Roman Catholics have long brought against the Protestant churches.

But how is it with the Catholic Church in this matter of Sunday?

As before stated, they make the same claim for Sunday that Protestants make; viz., that the day was instituted by Christ and so taught by the Holy Spirit. And this claim they made long before Protestantism, in name, existed.

But they go further than the Protestants, in that they are able to point out the agency through whom the change was made,—namely, themselves; and proudly point to that fact as the evidence of the divine authority of the Roman Catholic Church. And, laying the Bible aside, as the Protestants do in this matter, and allowing the Sunday to be a divine institution, there is not a soul on earth that can prove the claim of the Roman Catholics to be wrong. In other words, as there is no scriptural authority for keeping Sunday, he who believes that Sunday is a divine institution must believe that the Catholic Church is, what it claims to be, the Church of God, and divinely ordained. From this there is no possibility of escape.

But he who believes this is not a Protestant, and his claim to be one is false.

While the Catholic Church can and does make good her claim that she changed the Sabbath from the seventh day to the first, yet her claim that she was guided in the work by the Holy Spirit, is absolutely false.

We have seen already that it is utterly impossible for the Spirit of Truth to do or teach anything contrary to the truth; and we have also seen that God's law is the truth. Ps. 119:142. When that law says the seventh day is the Sabbath it simply tells the truth; it is therefore the truth that the seventh day is the Sabbath. And the Spirit of Truth can teach nothing different. It is useless to argue what the Spirit would have become had he taught differently; he simply could not teach differently.

While we deny, upon the basis of unimpeachable proof, that the Holy Spirit guided the Catholic Church in the change of the Sabbath, we fully believe that another spirit did; and as certainly as the Word of God is true, so certainly was that spirit the "spirit of antichrist."

Now when Protestants, claiming that Sunday is the test of all religion, to the extent that he who does not keep the day is lost, frankly confess that it is "one of the necessities of the situation" that they receive help from the papacy in their cherished scheme of Sunday enforcement, although it is perfectly logical and consistent that they do so, they thereby turn their backs upon the Holy Spirit to receive help from the spirit of antichrist.

This is a terrible truth, and none can deny it.

Slowly yet surely the chasm separating Protestantism from Catholicism is being bridged over; soon they will have joined hands; soon they will in heart have become one with the papacy, with the papacy the one.

Already the messenger of Rev. 18:1 has descended to lighten the earth with his glory; the time is at hand for the cry to go forth with mighty power: "Babylon the great is fallen," etc., and with it the cry "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Rev. 18:2, 4.

Good Lutheran Testimony.

A LATE issue of the Lutheran Witness contains the following as voicing the Lutheran sentiment in this country on the subject of the fad of patriotic(?) religious exercises in the public schools:—

"We heartily agree with Fr. M. in Lehre und Wehre, who, speaking of the unconstitutional religious exercises still perpetrated in our public schools, utters this Christian and patriotic warning: 'Would that we on our part, each in his respective environment, would not neglect to keep ourselves informed, whether all religious exercises are really barred out from the state school. The law is entirely on our side. Let no one act according to the principle: What is not my business, I shall not meddle with. No, here the maxim applies: 'Obsta principiis!' (Resist an evil in the beginning!) By the way, the Lutheran Witness is in position to show authentic evidence that the movement against the religious state school is not at all confined to the 'foreign element' in the Lutheran and Roman churches of this country. In one of our next issues we shall submit material on this matter, which will fully bear out this claim. Meanwhile, let us resist, earnestly and persistently, the encroachments of American church people upon the religious liberty of the country. For it is mostly our native born and bred American Christians who cause the present disturbance of the non-religious status of our public schools. Moreover, English Lutherans will find that this question of admitting religious exercises into the public school concerns them more vitally than their German or Scandinavian brethren."

THOS. H. MOORE, of Onawa, Iowa, in renewing his subscription, says, "I soldiered for three years, so I know the value of a good sentinel."

"Not wishing to be without the paper, I herewith remit $1 as payment for the coming year. The SENTINEL is valued by me more highly than any other paper I know of, being as I believe what its name indicates,—a true SENTINEL."

Yours truly,

Dismemberment of the Spanish Empire.

From "Patria," New York organ of the Cuban Revolutionists.

WHEN Philip II. began to reign, Spain was the most powerful nation in the world. So vast were her possessions in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, that "the sun never set on her dominions;" but with the beginning of the decadence, before his death and in the first years of the reign of his immediate successor, nearly all her possessions in North Africa, Burgundy, Naples, Sicily, and Milan were lost.

In modern times her losses have been as follows:—

1628, Malacca, Ceylon, Java.

1640, Portugal.

1648, Officially renounced her rights over Holland.

1649, A number of strong fortresses in the Netherlands.

1659, Roussillon and Sardinia.

1648-1713, Flanders.

1697, Island of Hayti, except Santo Domingo.

1704, Gibraltar.

1795, Santo Domingo.

1797, Trinidad.

1800, Louisiana.

1819, Florida.

1820-21, Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, San Salvador, etc.

1898, Cuba, Porto Rico, Philippines, Marianas or Ladrone Islands.

What will remain for her to lose in the twentieth century? Perhaps the home country.

The Cigarette Menace to Youth.

"New York Journal."

LITTLE Jacob Strauss, of Paterson, might share with other American boys a chance for that success in the world which hard work and good habits will win. Instead he lies in a hospital, broken in nervous and physical health, wrecked at fourteen years of age by the use of cigarettes.

The State guards minors in many ways. They may not mortgage their future by incurring debts. Designing men cannot take advantage of their youth and inexperience to lure them into contracts which may be harmful to them. Liquor cannot be sold to them lawfully. But the insidious and poisonous cigarette can be put in the hands of a child as often as a conscienceless man finds it to his profit to do it.

The State should guard the children against this evil. It should supplement the tender care of parents. It should make criminal the selling of cigarettes to minors, and enforce the law.

A CORRESPONDENT calls our attention again to the subject of faith as a cure for disease. A few weeks since, we mentioned the case of a young girl sick with typhoid fever in one of the villages on Long Island, whose parents refused to call a physician because they believed it wrong to employ any other means than prayer for healing the sick. We said that the remedies employed by those having a knowledge of physiological laws, in combatting disease, were from the Lord, and should be recognized and employed as such. To this our correspondent takes exception.

THIS subject of "faith cure" is one that needs to be carefully considered. It is a subject that is coming more and more prominently before the people, and one upon which very many will be deceived. When there are so many people in the world who do not know what faith itself is, what else is to be expected but that many should hold wrong ideas on the subject of faith cure? How can a person know what faith cure is who does not know what faith is? And it is a fact that few people in this world to-day know what faith is. The word is almost universally confounded with belief. But while there are hundreds of religious beliefs in the world, there is, and can be, only one faith.

FAITH is belief of the Word of God; it is that which says "Amen" to that Word. "Without faith," we read, "it is impossible to please him [God]; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." We do not see God, but faith assures us that he is, and that he is even where we do not see him. It is "the evidence of things not seen."

THE Word of God says that God "is not far from every one of us;" and that "in him we live and move and have our being." It says that all power is of God, and that by his power all things consist, or hold together. All life is maintained by the power of God. Faith reveals all this, and he who has faith keeps all this in view. He sees God in all things, and feels that he is indeed not far from him. This is giving to God only the credit and glory that is his due.

AND the faith that is in faith cure is this faith; for nothing else is faith. Faith recognizes the power of God in the healing of disease. But faith does not limit the working of the power of God. It does not refuse to recognize the power of God unless it is shown in some unusual way. Faith does not prescribe the manner in which God's power shall be manifested.

WHAT is commonly known as "faith cure" discards physicians and all forms of treatment. It repudiates all "remedies" of every kind. And why? Oh, because it says that God ought to have the glory. And this is to say that there is no God in it unless the recovery from disease is by prayer and the laying on of hands. When a person recovers by taking treatment, God is not in that; that is something altogether different from a manifestation of the healing power of God,—so different, indeed, that to employ treatment is counted as an actual denial of the faith!

BUT how do these people think any individual can recover from sickness in any other way than by the healing power of God? Who heals an individual when he is sick? The doctor? No; every doctor entitled to his diploma knows better than that. Neither is there any power in the medicine, or the treatment, to effect a cure. People often suppose that there is some mysterious power in drugs or herbs or something else, to impart vitality and health to the human body; but the idea is sheer nonsense. No; neither the doctor, nor the treatment, nor the individual, does the healing. Perhaps the doctor himself would say, It is nature that does it. And this would recognize the truth that the system builds itself up, repairs the waste caused by disease, in accordance with certain established physical laws. All the doctor with his treatment can do is to provide conditions under which the operation of these laws can be effective. The power which does the work of recovery is in the human organism itself.

AND what power is this? Men call it nature; but what is nature? Is there any other power than the power of God? The Scripture says there is not: "There is no power but of God." God created all things, and from whence did created things derive their power? Did they get it somewhere else than from the Creator? Reason repudiates the idea; reason and revelation together point to the Creator as the one and only source of power. Anything that existed by its own power, would be independent of God; but nothing is independent of him, for he is the Creator of all. And the power that men call "nature," the power that works in the human organism to rebuild it when impaired by disease, to recreate the wasted parts, in every case of recovery from sickness, whether of one who recognizes God or not, is the power of God. And faith recognizes this fact. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits: who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases." Don't forget, when you recover from any illness, that it is a benefit of God, and that he is entitled to the praise.

* * *

NOW WHAT right have these people who repudiate all treatment of disease as being contrary to the faith—what right have any people, to prescribe to the Lord in what way he shall work to restore an individual to health? What right have they to say that he shall not work through the operation of "natural laws"? Certainly, to presume to dictate to God in anything is the very height of impropriety. The aim of prayer, for the recovery of the sick as for any other thing, should be the glory of God. But he himself must be the judge as to what manifestation will best glorify his name.

* * *

AND since God is the healer of all disease, since God is in the recovery from sickness in an ordinary case as well as in the most extraordinary—for with God no such distinction exists—why should not any person be perfectly satisfied with it? When God is doing the work, working as he himself sees fit to work under the circumstances of the case, what more can anyone possibly ask?

* * *

FAITH cure by prayer and the laying on of hands is Scriptural, certainly. Not a shadow of doubt would we try to cast upon that, nor in any way would we detract from its importance as a part of the gospel of God. We do not ask our "faith cure" friends to close their eyes to that truth, but only to open them wider and take in the truth that God is the one great and only healer of disease, to whom all the credit is due in every case. We ask them not to refuse to recognize God in the operation of "natural" laws for the recovery of health. We ask them only to see God in every place where he is; for this is to the glory of God, and the great spiritual advantage of every believer.

* * *

THIS subject of faith cure is one that concerns not alone the individual; it touches the interests of society and the state. The state concerns itself, as it is bound to do, with the protection of the lives of its citizens. It views wilful neglect to save life as a crime akin to taking life. And in faith cure, as commonly practiced, the state sees that there is wilful neglect, so far as any treatment of disease is concerned. It cannot judge of the efficacy of prayer to save the sick, while at the same time it feels bound to protect the life of the individual. It therefore feels bound, in case of death or the prospect of it, to hold those in charge of the stricken person responsible for the use of such remedies as have been found to be of value in combatting the disease. If all remedies are discarded and death ensues, it feels bound to regard the responsible parties as criminals. Of what Providence may interpose to do in any case it cannot know. It cannot in any case feel relieved of its own responsibility.

* * *

TO IGNORE the state's position in this matter is not an act calculated to be productive of any good. We think, on the contrary, it is calculated to do harm to the very cause it is meant to serve. Incidents are continually occurring which illustrate this point. Some one sent us recently a copy of a "faith cure" journal, the Gospel Trumpet, published in Michigan, which mentioned the case of a woman in Marion, Ind., who was treated by "faith cure" for a disease attending child birth; stating that "three of the saints" were, after the woman's death, "unjustly cast into prison." Cases of this kind are not calculated to impress people with the idea that faith cure rests upon a divine foundation. The impression given is rather the opposite. The death of the young girl in the Long Island village, in the case we have mentioned, doubtless did much to give faith cure a backset in that vicinity. This was an injury to the truth; for faith cure is a doctrine of Scripture, and a truth which is designed to glorify God. But like other Scriptural truths, it has in the practice of some become perverted.

* * *

God's power is seen and known where man's power fails. Often at such times God manifests his power for the comfort of believers and the instruction of others. Recovery from some slight illness, or even in many cases from serious illness, does not testify to the world of the great Physician; for though accompanied with the offering of prayer, and professedly in answer to it, the world would say, O, that is a common thing; people don't always die when they are sick, even when they have no physician. But where human power is of no avail, the testimony to the power of God in the recovery is clear even to the world. If human power had done what it could to save life in the cases we have mentioned, the state could have found no fault, and no one would have been prejudiced against the truth. Many cases might be mentioned where the great Physician has given the healing touch to the victim of disease under such circumstances, by which He has proclaimed His name and His power among the people, by a testimony which none could gainsay.

* * *

ALL healing of disease is divine healing; it is the work of God. Faith recognizes it as such. God alone knows in what way to work in each case for the advancement of his truth. Civil government is instituted to preserve rights, "among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." It cannot be a judge of any religious question. It cannot lay aside its responsibility; it cannot, in the name of Christianity, be asked to do so. And to ignore the state in the pursuit of its appointed work is not in the interests of the true faith.

Militarism Breeding Anarchy.

THE tragic death of the Austrian empress very forcibly calls attention to the menace which great standing armies offer toward the very persons and institutions they are supposed to be maintained to protect. It appears that the assassin who enacted the tragedy which has shocked all Europe and made more uneasy every head that wears a crown, was trained in the principles of anarchy by the hard experience which militarism imposes upon many thousands of citizens in every nation of Europe. A New York daily presents some important facts relating to this subject, as follows:—

"The coward who stabbed the old Austrian empress joined the anarchists after his discharge from the Italian army."

"The attention of Americans is again called to the interesting fact that the great standing armies of Europe, maintained in the foolish hope of preserving monarchical systems of government, are really the most dangerous menace to such systems.

"In the Italian army, as in the German and other European armies, scores of thousands of young men are forced against their will to enlist every year. They are treated more like beasts than human beings. Their petty officers abuse them, curse them, and strike them. They are worked mercilessly, fed but little, paid two or three cents a day, and filled with hatred of official power and with hatred of the national uniform.

"In old days the peaceful peasant on his farm looked upon the king as a fighting leader, who hired soldiers for life to fight for the country and defend the farm. The peasant lived and died in sight of the house where he was born, and he never thought at all save thoughts such as come from the association with cows and pigs and other peasants of the same hamlet. He was content.

"The peasant to-day, when he reaches manhood, is dragged from home and forced to enlist. He is separated for three years from his young wife or sweetheart, treated like an animal, and often made one. He is taken to the big cities, associates with old men eager to fill his young mind with ideas of revolt. He is forced to see, feel, understand, and resent social and financial inequality.

"At home, in the village, he was as unfortunate as those about him. He dug in the fields and walked long miles each day. His fellows did the same.

"But he goes to Berlin or to Paris, to be splashed by the mud of fine carriages and filled with envious longings for what he can never have.

"The abuse of officers completes the work."

That is the way it is under the system of militarism in Europe; and there can be no doubt that militarism would create essentially the same conditions here. Idleness, hard times, discontent, anarchy,—these are the fruits of militarism, in their logical order. And we have enough of them in the country as it is. Militarism is not a protection, but a menace, to the nation.

THE Italian government has refused to take part in the proposed peace conference if the pope is allowed to participate.

The Unfolding of Two Principles.—2.

THE UNACCOUNTABLE ELEMENT.

FOR a time harmony prevailed throughout creation, all things proclaiming and exemplifying the character and government of love. But sin, the transgression of love's law, the discord in love's harmony, the foreign, unaccountable element, intruded itself into God's government, and brought in the jangle, the sorrow, the discord, the disorder, that now prevails to so large an extent on earth. This disorder, permitted to grow and disseminate, would hurl the whole creation into chaos, and if possible jeopardize the throne of eternal omnipotent Love.

WHEN IT ORIGINATED.

Sin originated in one who filled up the sum of all created intelligences. Christ or the Word was the only begotten of the Father. But Lucifer was the highest of all created beings, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty. Eze. 28:12. The very beginning of that first sin, originated in a doubt of the love of infinite Love, a doubt of the existence of that very character by which a sovereign of all things may exist and may reign: for only one who could deserve, and because of this, command the trust of all creatures, could exist as universal sovereign, as it is not in the nature of anything else but love to command trust by which all things may consist.

The first doubt of infinite Love questioned its existence, the next led to the deception that it dwelt in the heart of the doubter alone. The first doubt of infinite Love underrated God, miscomprehended him, and the second overestimated the source of doubt; for Lucifer, son of the morning, or light-bearer, turned to his own glory, given him of infinite Love, and because of the beauty he found, corrupted himself. The record says, "Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty; thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness." Eze. 28:17.

WHERE IT LED.

Doubt of infinite Love perverted the mind of the great angel, until the very blessings of God, given him to proclaim and exemplify the character and government of love,—the highest possible mission—he turned to such a use as wrought his degradation. He sought by them to depose the God of love, and exalt himself to a place in the universe that could only be held by God. Had it been possible for Lucifer to have dethroned omnipotent Love, that moment of his success would have been the moment of universal overthrow and disaster, and he would have perished in the ruin he wrought. Yet so deceived was he that he said, "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God. . . . I will be like the Most High." Isa. 14:12, 13, 14.

INWARD LIKENESS THE OBJECT AND DESIRE OF GOD.

Infinite Love desires that every creature shall be like the Most High. Had Lucifer truly desired to be like the Most High in his intrinsic nature, no rebellion would have marred the peace of heaven. To be like the Most High is to be love, and love turns the attention to others, forgetting self. It is the very nature of love to pour out blessing on others, blest in so doing. He who is like the Most High in deed and in truth is an almoner—a love-giver, a bestower of comfort, a fount of consolation; for the Most High is the "Father of mercies, the God of all comfort."

GIVEN UP TO A VILE AFFECTION.

This, Lucifer had once known, but he chose that which led to self, which led to the conception of doubt of God's infinite meekness and kindness. When he knew infinite Love, he glorified him not as infinite Love, neither was thankful, but became vain in his imagination, and his foolish heart was darkened and given up to a vile affection. Rom. 1:21. This vile affection (the foundation of all others) was the love of self. Self-love originated in that first turning away from infinite Love. The next step was self-pity. Doubt of infinite Love brings this disposition in and charges God with injustice. When Peter tried to induce the Saviour to turn from Calvary by bidding him pity himself, Jesus said that which is intrinsically true, "Thou savorest not the things that be of God."

No self-pity can enter into the heart of infinite Love, nor into the heart of him who implicitly trusts in infinite Love. Pity of self led to a desire for the pity of others, and to the opening up of his supposed grievances, and many angels, though having no reason for so doing, followed the great angel's course, and were led to take the same steps as he had, until they were alienated in heart from God, and there was division in heaven.

THE END KNOWN ONLY TO INFINITE LOVE.

Infinite Love forbade the extinction of these self-deceived creatures; for heaven wavered and waited, not knowing what malignity, cruelty, horror, and death, was wrapped up in the principle that had wrought already the first sorrow in the heart of the Omniscient. God alone knew the outcome. Cast out of heaven by their own self-wrought destiny, they bound themselves in chains of darkness. They were not hindered from assailing the hosts of the universe with their misconceptions; for full liberty of speech was theirs. The law of love, while forbidding the action as against themselves and the universe, in another sense did not forbid their liberty to try the hearts of all. To love, nothing is worthy save that which will stand the test. God could not but afford to wait. Clouds of doubt as it were, rolled through the fair creation, but those who looked for light had light, and stood loyal to God, reassured of his love, and sharers of his rest of spirit. Those who doubted were filled with unrest and bitterness.

Though the first working of the self-principle was manifested at first in persuasion rather than force, yet it used in that persuasion false reasoning and misstatements, and laid the foundation for that which afterward followed,—the use of force to coerce opinion and action. There was war in heaven, the beginning of all the long years of bloodshed and horror that have cursed the creation, proving that in the self-principle is wrapped up lust, war, cruelty, and death; and in infinite Love, the irresistible force that conquers through meekness and long-suffering.

Studies in French History.—39.

"So it would, Joseph," answered Professor Carman, "but you see the league was not so 'holy' in character as in name."

"I wonder what became of those poor little boys over in Madrid; were they there yet?" asked Milly Brown.

"O yes; and there they had to remain for four miserable years, until their father and King Charles had enough of war, and finally made peace through the mediation—not of the pope—but of Francis' mother, and Charles' aunt. This agreement went by the name of the 'Ladies' Peace,' and lasted long enough for the little princes to be returned safe and sound, and for Francis to give up Italy entirely; on the other hand, the king of Spain was to give his sister in marriage to the French king."

"I suppose the poor lady's wishes did not count for anything—whether she was willing or not," said Julia March.

"O no; that was a small consideration. When two kings decided upon any such question, everything went as they wished. Though such shameless barter in human beings seems almost equal to the dark days in this land, before the Proclamation of Emancipation gave sweet freedom to the poor slaves.

"This peace, however, lasted only a few short years, for the fickle and ambitious Francis again sets out with an army to recover Milan—which it seems so hard for him to give up—regardless utterly of his treaty."

"Well, I imagine that this must have made King Charles furious, for he didn't have any too lamblike a temper, himself," said Joe Palmeter.

"O yes, he was very angry, and vowed he would make Francis repent it. So he enters France at once with his army, and devastation and famine follow in his steps."

"My sympathy is almost always with the French," said Max Smith, "though I know they scarcely deserved it, sometimes."

"The poor country people always deserve sympathy in times of war, for they are quite often the innocent victims of barbarous cruelties; and in this instance it was particularly true. They were not in the least to be blamed, because their king did not keep his word; but on his account their beautiful country is desolated, and the peaceful inhabitants are driven into the mountains to die of hunger. O, war is always a cruel, horrible thing; the misery and distress which it brings can never be overestimated."

"How long did this war last?" asked practical Jack.

"Not long. The pope, now, for a change in the program, undertook to fill the position of peacemaker between the two angry kings. He succeeded, and King Charles went to make his old enemy and new-made friend a visit."

"I am real glad of that," smiled Julia March, with a sigh of relief. "I presume that was a good thing for both countries,—for of course it meant peace. I'm glad the pope did that much good."

"The trouble is, Julia," replied their teacher, "there was anything but peace in the heart of one of them, at least, all the time. King Francis was treacherous and wicked enough to regret his own action in letting King Charles return home in peace. You see, there is no depending upon the human heart, unless ruled by God's Spirit. It is altogether bad. So it proved now. King Francis determined again to invade Italy at all hazards. He did a thing which it is hard to believe that any descendant of the good St. Louis could ever do,—he joined with the cruel Turks in making war with his own people."

"O, impossible! did they succeed?" asked Fred Green.

"They succeeded so well that a cruel pirate named Barbarossa, sailed back to Constantinople with 1,400 Christian slaves—Christian dogs—as they were called."

"I don't suppose that the word 'Christian' meant then quite what we understand it to mean to-day, did it, professor?" asked Joe Palmeter.

"O no; they were called Christian, because they were not Mahometans; but to us the word has or should have a deeper meaning."

"Francis was now getting along in years, and as if it were not disgraceful enough to join hands with the Turks, he disgraces himself still more by cruelly persecuting the poor Protestants. He was not one of those people who 'grow old gracefully,' for age seemed to make his disposition more sour and ill-tempered. If he had been a truly good man, this need not have been. But history gives a sad account of his excesses and dissipations, and at last he became so hard hearted that he cared no more for human life than for the life of a worm that crawled at his feet."

"O, I am afraid I shall not have any feelings of respect left for him," said Milly Brown, "but I will confess I did rather admire him at first."

"Milly always admires handsome people," smiled practical Jack; "so I suppose she could hardly help admiring the 'King of the Gentlemen.'"

"Well, we will not laugh at Milly, Jack, for really King Francis had some very good traits of character," said Professor Carman.

"Mention them, please, will you?" smiled Joe Palmeter. "I presume it will not take you long."

"Why, he was fond of art and education, and did all he could to encourage it. He did very much to beautify and enlarge many splendid palaces, and best of all, he founded the Royal College, where anyone who wished to be educated could study without any expense to themselves. This was certainly a good work, and people have given him the name of the 'Father of Letters and the Arts.'"

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Learn to Forgive.

LEARN now to forgive. Do not carry an unforgiving spirit with you through your life; it will hurt you more than anything else. It will destroy the happiness of many around you; yet its chief feeding-ground will be found in your own heart.

You hate your neighbor. Yonder is his dwelling, one hundred and fifty yards away. Suppose you pass by a wood fire, and, as you pass, you pluck a half-consumed brand from it, flaming and gleaming, and thrusting it under your garment to hide it, you start for your neighbor's dwelling to burn it. Who gets the worst of it? You will find your garments on fire and yourself burned before you can harm your neighbor. So is he who carries an unforgiving spirit in his bosom. It stings the soul like an adder shut up there.

I know of some who call themselves Christians who are miserable because of their own revengefulness. Forgive your enemies and get down on your knees and pray for them, and salvation will come into your soul like a flood. "Father, forgive them." Sweet prayer and blessed example!—Selected.

The Prospectus for "The Desire of Ages" is Now Ready.

"THE Desire of Ages" is the title of a forthcoming volume by Mrs. E. G. White. It is intensely interesting and beautifully illustrated, and is devoted to the consideration of the great truth that in Christ the love of the Father is revealed—that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

Although the complete book will not be ready until about October 15th, the Prospectus has been issued thus early to enable our agents to make a Fall delivery.

Our Tract Societies will handle this book in their respective States, therefore all orders for Prospectuses, price of which is $1.25 postpaid, and correspondence concerning terms and territory, should be addressed to them.

BOOK : OF : GENESIS.

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 13—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall, and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

Rome AND THE United States

The study of years and elaboration of many volumes, are presented in a concise and pleasing manner. In reviewing the history of the Roman Republic, the rocks upon which she stranded have been clearly pointed out. It contrasts the principles underlying enforced religious observances, with the true principles of which are guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. The "Two Republics" comprises 896 octavo pages, and is printed from clear, new electrotypes, on fine, tinted paper, beautifully and substantially bound, and is illustrated with 67 full-page engravings. The work is furnished in the following styles of binding:—

THE anarchist who assassinated the Austrian empress said that such deeds were necessary to call attention to the anarchist's unhappy lot. In this he defined anarchy as being the exact opposite of Christianity, since the true Christian is continually calling the attention of men to the happiness of his lot. Christians, of all people on the earth, are least open to the charge of being anarchists.

IN what is said in this issue on the subject of "faith cure," we would not be understood as saying that prayer should always be the last resort for the restoration of the sick. What we do say is that the "faith cure" idea that no treatment should ever be used in any case of sickness, is wrong, and contrary to faith itself. The pathways of faith and fanaticism are sometimes not far apart.

AMONG the demands which will be made by the American peace commission upon Spain respecting the Philippines, it is said, is that of entire separation of church and state in that portion of the islands which it is proposed to leave under Spain's control. This would be asking Spain to maintain a colonial government radically different from the government at home, or to renounce the union of church and state to which she has strictly adhered for centuries. In any case it would be a demand at which Spain would stand aghast. The Spanish people must be brought to see and abhor the evil of such union before they can be expected to embody the principle in their government.

MR. GEORGE GOULD, millionaire, just returned from England, predicts for the country an era of great business prosperity. We hope he may prove a true prophet, but sometimes rich men see prosperity where there is nothing for the poor, and the increase of their wealth tends only to increase the poor man's stock of envy and discontent. But there is one way in which any and every person may secure prosperity, and that is by laying hold of the wonderful opportunities brought to him by Christianity. The cost at which those opportunities were secured for him, and the wisdom of Him by whom they were secured, is sufficient guaranty that they mean prosperity of the highest degree to him. They bring him riches—riches real and literal—and safer and more enduring than the gold in the Bank of England. There is prosperity for every man in this world, any time and all the time, if he is willing to accept it in Jesus Christ.

AN unwonted spectacle was enjoyed by the official head of the Roman Catholic Church in this country, Cardinal Gibbons, on the 17th inst., in the city of Washington. It was that of the President and his cabinet in attendance at a mass conducted by the cardinal in St. Matthew's Catholic church. The Supreme Court was also represented in the person of Justice Harlan.

The mass was in commemoration of the murdered empress of Austria, and was under the auspices of the Austrian Minister to this Government. It was thus an official act of the Austrian government, but it was no less truly a religious ceremony of the Roman Church.

It is entirely proper, of course, for the President to express sympathy to the afflicted persons and the people upon whom this tragedy has cast its shadow. It is entirely proper for him and for any official of the Government to be present in official capacity at a ceremony for the purpose of showing proper courtesy to a foreign government. But it is not proper for him or any official, in official capacity, to do honor to an institution of the Catholic Church, or of any other church. On the contrary, it is highly improper.

The Austrian government represents a union of church and state. A mass performed by a Catholic prelate is deemed therefore by representatives of that government, a perfectly proper occasion for their presence in official capacity. But the President of the United States is the chief representative of a Government fundamentally opposed to union of church and state. For him to do honor to the principle of church and state union represented in the Austrian official mass performed by Cardinal Gibbons, was to dishonor the principle which is fundamental in his own government; and to honor it in his official capacity was to dishonor this American principle in the name of the American people.

THE SENTINEL emphatically dissents from any act done in honor of a foreign government, at the expense of the honor due the Government established upon the foundation of religious freedom. It is entirely too much to ask of this Government that it shall honor another government by dishonoring itself.

Rome sees all this with rejoicing and will know how to make use of it at the proper time.

THE New York Times, in discussing the subject of "the Roman Church in our new possessions," says that that church "must be maintained in full efficiency in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines." No view of the subject could be more short-sighted than this. Deliverance from papal domination and a knowledge of the gospel of salvation through faith is the one great object which Providence has had in view for these poor people through all the changes that have led up to their present state. God has had a hand in all these, and with him all things are secondary and made subservient to the proclamation of his truth. We are in the closing days of time, and the proclamation of the "gospel of the kingdom" is going to every tribe and people. It is going to the benighted dwellers in the far-off isles,—to the Philippines, and to every other quarter of heathendom; and nothing can stop it. All the wars, the revolutions, the changes of government which these tracts of earth have experienced hitherto, or will experience, are but side issues compared with that.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13:

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 29, 1898.

NUMBER 38.

THE LOVE OF POWER AND THE POWER OF LOVE.

THESE are opposite principles, which are constantly exemplified in the controversy between righteousness and sin. The one is Christian, the other is antichristian. The one brought the Prince of glory from his throne in heaven down to hang upon the cross as a malefactor; the other exalted a man from among his fellows to a position of supreme authority over them, so that he receives their worship as a god. The love of power in the Christian Church led the disciples to dispute as to which should be the greatest, which dispute led finally to the exaltation of the bishop of Rome to the supreme place, as pope. This was the result of politics in the Christian Church. But the true power of the church, which alone she may rightfully employ, is not political power or any worldly power, but the power of the cross of Christ.

THE surrender of conscience can be properly made only to the Word of God.

WHEN the church seeks for worldly honor and support, she has forgotten that "the servant is not greater than his Lord."

POLITICS—worldly government—represents strife. Christianity represents peace. An individual attains success in the one by self-exaltation, in the other by self-sacrifice.

THE greatest height to which a man can be exalted by men, does not bring him any nearer to God than he was before.

The Power of Love.

THE power of love is the greatest power in the universe. It is the power of God; for "God is love." And being the greatest power in the universe, it is the power bequeathed to the Christian Church for the accomplishment of her mission in the world.

It is the power of love that is represented by the cross of Calvary. "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son." And the Son of God so loved the lost human family that he voluntarily descended from his throne of glory to hang as a malefactor upon the instrument of torture and death.

The channel of this power—the channel of love—is self-sacrifice. By self-sacrifice, therefore, the Christian Church is to accomplish her appointed work for mankind. In nothing is self to be exalted or ministered unto. There can be no seeking after earthly power, no grasping for worldly honor or position. The Head of the Church renounced the power, the honor and glory that he had in heaven, and sought none of these upon the earth; and so long as she is directed by her Head, the church will manifest only His spirit and character to the world.

The power of love is the opposite of the love of power. This reversal of the divine principle came about in the early history of the church, and there was a strife in the church as to which should be the greatest. And after many years of this strife, the bishop of Rome—the pope—was elevated to the seat of supreme authority and power,—the power not of love and self-sacrifice, but of authority over men, and of worldly honor. The pope became—what he has ever since continued to be—a mighty factor in politics. And when the church engages now in political strife, she is moved by the same spirit which led the church into politics in the early centuries.

As much of political power as was possessed by the dying Son of God upon the cross, as much of worldly honor and preëminence as was then his, so much and only that may properly be held and exercised by the Christian Church to-day.

How Religion Must Be Taught.

THAT religious teaching is wholly out of place in institutions maintained by the state, is evident to the candid thinker when he considers what is absolutely necessary to make religious teaching successful. An exchange quotes the testimony of a Catholic archbishop on this point, and comments thus:—

"In his annual lenten pastoral letter to the Roman Catholic clergy and laity of the archdiocese of Melbourne, last February, Archbishop Carr, speaking of the attempt to introduce religious instruction into the state schools in Victoria, said:—

"If religious instruction is to be given in any way that can be regarded as efficient, it must be given in practically denominational schools. It must be given, not as if it were a deadly poison, in the smallest possible doses, nor as the residuum of all the heresies, which is known as common Christianity; but it must be given in full and flowing measure, as being the water of a fountain springing up to life eternal."

"This is true. And the very fact that those who demand that religious instruction shall be given in the state schools find it necessary to guard the proposal with "conscience clauses" and "double roll calls," and limit it to so small a range as they do, in the hopes of suiting everybody and offending nobody, is itself proof not only of the inefficiency of the proposed scheme, but that it is altogether out of place in a state system of education, and incompatible with the genius of civil government."

THE prayers which are addressed to the legislatures are not apt to be answered by the Lord.

They Simply "Put Up With" It.

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND, speaking in the Catholic Review of August 24, says:—

"It is the policy of the Catholic Church—a policy almost as old as the church itself—to support the existing government."

In view, however, of the fact that Italy, while undoubtedly an "existing government," not only receives no support from the Catholic Church, but is made to feel her active hostility, an exchange suggests that certain omissions should be supplied in the archbishop's words to express the full truth, thus: "It is the policy of the Catholic Church, . . . to support [herself at] the [expense of the] existing government." And in case any government will not support the Catholic Church, then her policy is as laid down in a late papal encyclical, which says that while Catholics will "put up with" such a government, "they will never be able, without violating the most sacred duties, to uphold it by their adhesion or support."

The Government of the United States has refused to support the Catholic Church in Porto Rico and the Philippines, and good Catholics are simply "putting up with" it as it is to-day.

Reform By Politics.

THE practical working of the theory of moral reform by politics is well set out in the following verses printed recently in the L. A. W. Bulletin. It is what must ever be the practical working of this theory so long as human nature remains what it is,—that is, until it is supplanted by the divine nature; and then no politics will be needed to secure good government. But the earth will not be peopled with individuals possessing the divine nature until the wicked have been removed from it by the final judgment. The author of the poem is Mr. Joe Lincoln:—

They're holding meetings everywhere,
Said the "Heeler" to the "Boss;"
"In every alley, lane and square
That one may come across;
They say they're going to 'clean us out'—
They're going to 'smash the ring,'—
And now they swarm to shout 'reform!'
And all that sort of thing."
The "Boss" winked at the "Heeler,"
And the "Heeler" chuckled sweet;
And the "Boss" said "Yes? Well, then, I guess, We'll have to let 'em meet."

"They've got the good folks on their list,"
Said the "Heeler" to the "Boss;"
"The great and kind philanthropist
Who speaks of gold as 'dross,'
The clergymen, the orators,
The pure of every walk,
And all the time they rail at crime,
And talk, and talk, and talk."
The "Boss" winked at the "Heeler,"
And the "Heeler" smiled a smile;
And the "Boss" said, "Stuff! Talk's well enough,
But work is more our style."

"They have a big procession out,"
Said the "Heeler" to the "Boss;"
"And music rings and children shout,
And banners wave and toss;
And in each crowded church and hall
Good speakers cheer their souls,
As oft they tell how quick and well
They'll thrash us at the polls."
The "Boss" winked at the "Heeler,"
And the "Heeler" grinned a grin;
And the "Boss" said, "So? But do they know
Just where to spend their 'tin'?"

"The last returns have just been read,"
Said the "Heeler" to the "Boss;"
"And we're some 'fifteen thou' ahead,
And their's will be the loss.
The 'moral party' spent its breath
We spent the 'long green notes';
They talked and shirked, we simply worked,
And now we've got the votes."
The "Boss" winked at the "Heeler,"
And the "Heeler" roared a roar;
"It seems to me," said the "Boss," that we Have done this thing before."

A Significant Court Decision.

JUDGE EDWARDS, of Scranton, Pa., has given a decision which affirms that religious exercises in the public schools are proper under the laws of that State. In support of this affirmation, among other things he says:—

"It must be considered that Christianity, which is the religion of the Bible, and the Bible itself, occupy a unique position in the early and subsequent history of Pennsylvania. In the year 1700 it was enacted that 'Whoever shall speak loosely thereof and profanely of Almighty God, Christ Jesus, the Holy Spirit, or Scriptures of Truth, and is thereof legally convicted, shall forfeit and pay five pounds and be imprisoned for five days in the house of correction.' This law in substance is in force to-day."

And this law being in force in Pennsylvania, this judge is not ashamed to call attention to the fact and to cite it in support of a practice which plainly cannot be justified by any other principle than that of church and state union. The attention of people everywhere in this country needs to be called to the fact that decisions of the courts, from the Supreme Court down, do not indicate that the Government is progressing toward more complete separation of church and state, but rather the contrary.

Is It Fair to Roman Catholics?

ROMAN CATHOLICS, in common with other people, are taxed for the support of the state schools. They educate their children in their own parochial schools, and claim that for this educational work they should be given a portion of the fund raised by taxation. Under the American system of government no part of this fund goes for the maintenance of any sectarian school. The question whether this is fair to people who educate their children in such schools is well answered in the following dialogue between Dr. Clifford, of Australia, and a Roman Catholic, during the agitation for state support of religious schools in that country:—

Romanist.—"What we want is no more than justice. We ought to have our share of the public funds devoted to education. We do the work; why cannot we be paid for it?"

Dr. C.—"Simply because you will do the work in your own way, and not in the way the state finds to be the only way that is fair and just to all the citizens."

R.—"Yes; but we have to contribute to the support of the state schools, and maintain our own at the same time."

C.—"Certainly; what else can you expect? I have educated my own children in England, and yet I have had to contribute to the support of the state schools; but I need not have paid a penny towards the cost of the education over and above what I paid in the rates. The state schools were open to me, but I preferred to send them to University College School, and I paid for my preference. On your principle you could contract yourself out of all duties of citizenship. Suppose you have half a dozen poor relatives, and out of love for them you provide an institution for their support out of your own pocket, instead of sending them to one of your asylums. Will you therefore ask that you should not pay a poor rate, or be taxed for the maintenance of the state's poor? Again, you want your letters to go without risk, and so you send them by hand. Do you object to pay taxes for the Post Office Department?"

This is a fair presentation of the case, and makes plain that to apply the full amount raised by taxation to the unsectarian schools, is entirely fair to all religious bodies.

The Surrender of Conscience.

A PROMINENT figure in the proceedings relating to the Dreyfus case, Count Esterhazy, has, it is said, made confession to several persons that he is guilty of having manufactured much of the evidence by which Dreyfus was convicted of treason and sent to his terrible punishment. The Suz, of this city, in making note of the infamy of such a character, says:—

"Esterhazy's justification for all that he has done in the Dreyfus case is interesting to moralists. It is embraced in his maxim: 'A soldier should place his conscience as well as his sword at the disposal of his superior officers.'"

This French army officer placed his conscience at the disposal of his superior officers, and under their orders, according to his confession, forged evidence upon which was based the military verdict which is now shaking the fabric of the French government to its foundations. He placed his conscience at the disposal of his superior officers for the honor of France, and the deed is now testifying to her shame. He did all this especially to guard the reputation of the army, and by it brought a cloud of popular distrust upon the army. In it he has done incalculable injury to France, and has illustrated the nature of the benefits that man is prepared to confer on his country who is willing to part with his conscience.

Nothing could better illustrate the fact that the man who surrenders his conscience becomes thereby one of the most dangerous men by which the welfare of a country can be threatened. This is one lesson of the Dreyfus case which should not be lost upon liberty-loving people.

However interesting the plea that an individual ought sometimes to part with his conscience may be to moralists, it is not interesting as a curiosity. It is a plea that is not confined to France or Frenchmen. It is made in every country that commits the folly of religious legislation. It is made in these United States, where the Sunday laws are carried into effect. Such laws compel the surrender of conscience to the State, upon the point of Sabbath observance. They are made and enforced in the interests of the State, so it is said, and they force conscience to be delivered into the keeping of the State; and now the example of Count Esterhazy comes forward to illustrate before the world how much to the advantage of a country this surrender of the individual conscience is. And it is just as valuable a thing in one country as in another.

The man who will surrender his conscience upon one point, will surrender it upon any point. He cannot logically do otherwise. The man who will surrender his conscience upon the point of Sabbath observance, will surrender it upon the point of bearing false witness against his neighbor, as Esterhazy did, or upon the point of theft, or of murder, as surely as theft, murder, and Sabbath-breaking are matters of the same moral law.

Count Esterhazy's maxim constitutes an indictment of militarism which ought to condemn it utterly in the minds of thinking people. That maxim is no more than militarism demands. That is the principle by which it has been found necessary to guard the "honor" of the army in France, and the same principle is brought into exercise in all lands where militarism has become an established feature of the government. The honor of the army is put above everything else. The army gets to be the biggest thing in the nation, because it is the most powerful; and the rules of army discipline and military government overshadow the laws of the government instituted to preserve the rights of the people. Army government is a despotism pure and simple; by no other system could an army be held together and made efficient for military work. And that despotism requires that the individual soldier yield his own will implicitly to that of his military superiors, who of course are only men like himself. And from this surrender of the individual will, which army discipline everywhere requires, the step to the surrender of conscience is natural if not inevitable. The will and the conscience cannot be separated from each other.

There can be no safety for human rights where a man is taught to surrender his conscience into the keeping of some other man in superior civil or military station. This is the evil principle that has made jesuitism what it has been and is to-day. It is the essence of jesuitism,—that from which nearly every civilized country in the world has felt obliged to defend itself by the most stringent measures. Every law therefore which tends to compel the conscience, is not only an invasion of individual rights, but a direct menace to the national prosperity.

Individual rights and individual honor lie at the foundation of everything. The invasion or surrender of these can no more be for the advantage of the State than can the disintegration of the foundation be for the advantage of the structure reared upon it.

THE Pittsburg Catholic announces that "Cardinal Steinhuber, Prefect of the Congregation of the Index, has undertaken to revive the condemnation of books decreed in the last three hundred years."

Cæsar and Christ.

TUNE.—"Suwannee River."

O BROTHERS, have you heard the story
Of long ago,
How Christ, the blessed King of Glory
Men sought to overthrow?
How Scribes and Pharisees in envy
Asked him one day,
"Pray, tell us, Master, unto Cæsar Shall we our tribute pay?"

1st and 2nd Chorus:

"Is it lawful unto Cæsar
To pay tribute due?
O Christ, thou mighty Son of David,
Answer and tell us true.
"We know thou teachest man in wisdom,— Teach us, we pray;
O shall we cease to render tribute?
Or shall we tribute pay?
Come, tell us, that the world may hear it—
Gentile and Jew—
While Scribes and Pharisees are waiting,
Answer and tell us true."
And then the blessed Master answered:
"Why tempt ye me?
Haste ye and bring me forth a penny,
That I may quickly see.
Whose image and whose superscription?"
"Cæsar's," say they;
"Then unto Cæsar, now and ever,
Thou shalt his tribute pay."

3rd Chorus:

Render that which unto Cæsar
Doth belong alone;
Give unto earthly kings their tribute,
And unto God his own.
Strange, strange that men forget this lesson,
So just and right;
Why seek to join Christ's hand with Cæsar's?
Why Church and State unite?
Why seek to form a hateful union
'Tween Church and State?
Let's build a mighty wall and keep them
Forever separate.

4th Chorus:

Still adown the weary ages,
Hear the answer true:
"Render thy tribute unto Cæsar,
And unto God his due."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

way it was back in the days of the Roman emperor Constantine. But his religious devotions did not consecrate his slaughter of his enemies; and it is equally impossible to make the slaughter and ruin of war any more Christianlike by similar means to-day.

Spain and Her Methods.—No. 4.

BY MRS. FLORENCE A. BARNES, M. D.

It was Pizarro's intention on his second voyage to steer for Timbez, where he had found such treasures at the first, but head winds baffled him so that he made his first landing at St. Matthew's bay. He then traveled along the coast to the Indian village in the province of Coaque, falling on the natives sword in hand. They fled in terror, and rushing into their deserted homes, the Spanish appropriated everything,—food, gold and silver ornaments, precious stones, all.

Of everything found, the fifth part was preserved for the crown, and the remainder distributed in due proportions among the officers and privates of the company. They pursued such a course wherever practicable; but often they resorted to diplomacy. At last he turned toward the interior, having heard of the war between the two brothers, and probably hoping to be the gainer thereby. The rightful heir to the throne was at that time confined in prison by the brother at Atahualpa. Atahualpa, with all his army, was encamped in the valley of Caxamalca, among the heights of the Corderillas.

Toward the valley Pizarro marched, feeding his troops from the magazines of the one he intended to subdue. This was really through the natural courtesy of Atahualpa; for he was aware of the whole march of Pizarro, and yet made no attempt to withhold provision or store from him. Pizarro sent him a message, saying he was coming as a friend from a brother king as great as he, thus deceiving him.

At last the valley was reached. Looking down from a mountain height, they viewed the encampment of the Incas, covering miles of the valley. So large an army would have wrought dismay to any heart but Pizarro's. With less than two hundred men to meet that host he was undaunted. He formed his men in three parts, and advanced down the slope to an Indian village, which he found deserted. Entering, they proceeded to make themselves at home. He sent an embassy at once to the Inca. With great show and parade they obtained an audience, in which they informed him they had come hither to offer their services to him, of whose great victories they had heard, and to impart to him the doctrines of a true faith, and asked that he would visit them in their present quarters. Obtaining his promise to do so, they returned; but first giving a display of horsemanship, which, as the natives had no horses, doubtless had an effect.

When night was come, Pizarro summoned a council

"It is said that Admiral Dewey spent part of the night before the battle of Manila in prayer and Bible reading," says the Christian Endeavor World. The idea seems to be growing that prayer and other religious exercises are a fitting preparation on the part of a military commander for a coming battle. That is the of officers, to propose a great plan. This was to lay an ambuscade for the Inca, and take him prisoner in the face of the whole army. Says the historian, "The arrangement of the halls of the city seemed to be contrived on purpose for such a plan." "The plaza was defended on its three sides by ranges of buildings, with spacious halls and wide doors opening into the square. In this hall he stationed his cavalry in two divisions, the infantry in another, and reserving twenty men to act with himself as occasion might demand, he waited the arrival of the Inca." At a given signal they were to utter their war cries, and rush out, putting the Peruvians to flight, and bear off the Inca.

Having made their plans, mass was performed by the priests who accompanied them in the interests of the church. His final piously treacherous act was to send another message to the Inca, saying he had made preparations to entertain him. The Inca certainly entered the place in great confidence. Though on foot, and dispensing with a great part of his armed soldiery, there were thousands behind him, and hundreds passed before him to clear the way for his coming.

As the leading file entered the plaza, not a Spaniard could be seen. When some five or six thousand had entered the place, they halted, and Atahualpa demanded, "Where are the strangers?" "At this moment," says Prescott, "a Dominican friar came forward with his breviary in one hand and a crucifix in the other, and approaching him, told him he came by order of his commander, to expound to him the doctrines of the true faith. He then entered into the mysterious doctrine of the trinity, and beginning with the creation of man, passed to his fall, redemption, the crucifixion, and the ascension, when the Saviour left the apostle Peter as vice regent on earth. This power transmitted to successors, or popes, one of the last of these had commissioned the Spanish monarch to conquer and convert the natives in this western land." The friar concluded "by asking him to renounce his own faith, embrace that they offered, and acknowledge himself tributary to the emperor, Charles the Fifth."

The eyes of the Inca flashed fire as he replied, "I will be no man's tributary. I am greater than any prince on earth. As for the pope, he must be crazy to talk of giving away countries which do not belong to him. My faith I will not change. Your god was put to death, but (pointing to the sun) my god lives in the heavens, and looks down on his children." On asking for the friar's authority, he was shown the Bible. He took it, looked at it a moment, then as the insult he had received flashed on him, he threw it down, and exclaimed, "Tell your comrades they shall give an account of their doings in my land. I will not go from here till they have made me full satisfaction for all the wrongs they have committed."

Pizarro saw that the hour had come, the signal was given, and with the Spanish war-cry they sprung to the fray. Every Spaniard rushed from the halls, horse and foot, and threw themselves into the midst of the Indians. They, taken by surprise, stunned by the report of guns, blinded by the smoke, were panic-stricken. Nobles and common people were all trampled by the cavalry, who dealt fierce blows in every direction. Every avenue of escape was closed. The entrance to the square was soon filled with dead bodies, while round the Inca the massacre was hot. The Indians without weapons offered their bare bosoms to protect their king; they held onto the horses with dying grasp, in vain endeavor to protect him. Not till ten thousand had fallen, was the Inca taken. He was then closely imprisoned, while the Spanish sought for wealth and studied how they might make new acquisitions.

The king discovered, amidst all the show of religious zeal, their appetite for gold. He therefore made an effort to buy his freedom. Pizarro was astonished at the immensity of his offer, but a bargain was made in which it was agreed that the Inca should be free, when he had filled a room twenty-two feet long by seventeen feet broad and nine feet high with gold, and an adjoining room of smaller size with silver. As the gold must be brought from all parts of the territory the time involved in this arrangement was long. In the meanwhile his imprisoned brother was killed by Indians who were loyal to Alahualpa. Pizarro pretended to believe the king accountable for this. Impatient of the long delay in receiving the gold, and fearful of rival adventurers, he determined not to wait for the total fulfillment of the contract, but to melt what they already had, and make a division of the sum. This work took one month working day and night. The weight was found to be about fifteen millions and a half of dollars in gold, and fifty-one thousand six hundred and ten marks in silver. After taking out one fifth for the crown of Spain, the rest was divided according to previous arrangements.

Having finished this, the next question was what to do with this Inca. For they had no intention of freeing him. A form of a trial was at last given him, the charges being that he had usurped the crown, caused his brother's death, squandered the public revenue since the arrival of the Spaniards, that he was guilty of idolatry, and had a plurality of wives, and that he had attempted an insurrection against the Spaniards.

With such charges as these his doom was sealed. He was sentenced to be burned alive. Overcome with emotion he plead piteously for his life. But when he found Pizarro unyielding he submitted to his fate with Indian fortitude. The priest made a last appeal to him, promising that if he would be baptized he need not be burned at the stake, but would be strangled only. He consented to baptism, thus adding one more to the names of converted(?) heathen to the Catholic faith.

His conduct from the first had been most friendly to the Spanish. They repaid it with imprisonment, robbery and death. The contrast between the methods the so-called Christian nation pursued in conquering the barbarians of South America, and the course those same Incas adopted, when conquering the savage tribes around them, is greatly in favor of the barbarians.

A Plea For Peace.

"Present Truth (London, Eng.), Sept. 8.

THE one absorbing topic of interest during the past week has been the Czar's manifesto to the nations of Europe, inviting them to meet in a conference and consider the question of reducing their armaments.

The document points out that such a step would be in conformity "with the most essential interests and legitimate views of all powers;" and credits all the governments with making peace the object of their international policy.

"It is in its name that great States have concluded between themselves powerful alliances; it is the better to guarantee peace that they have developed in proportions hitherto unprecedented their military forces, and still continue to increase them without shrinking from any sacrifice. All these efforts nevertheless have not yet been able to bring about the beneficent results of the desired pacification."

The message goes on to point out the disastrous results of the increasing armaments. "They strike at the public prosperity at its very source." Intellectual and physical strength are unproductively consumed. "Hundreds of millions are devoted to acquiring terrible engines of destruction." "National culture, economic progress, and the production of wealth are either paralyzed or checked in their development."

Nor do these sacrifices give any hope of averting the calamities of war as so many claim. The Czar should know, if any can, whether it be true that the best way of ensuring peace is readiness to fight, and he says:—

"In proportion as the armaments of each power increase, so do they less and less fulfill the object which the governments have set before themselves.

"The economic crises, due in great part to the system of armaments à outrance and the continual danger which lies in this massing of war material, are transforming the armed peace of our days into a crushing burden which the peoples have more and more difficulty in bearing. It appears evident, then, that if this state of things were prolonged it would inevitably lead to the very cataclysm which it is desired to avert, and the horrors of which make every thinking being shudder in advance."

When the Czar of Russia speaks on this wise all men listen. It is thought probable that the conference will be held, for no country would care to take the odious initiative of declaring that it did not desire to see the chances of war lessened. But it is not expected that the matter will go beyond a conference.

It seems strange, but the first results of the Czar's message have been to increase the sense of irritation among the nations. France has been reckoning on Russian assistance to recover her lost provinces, and does not want to talk of peace until this has been done. Almost everywhere the message is regarded with suspicion, and while the idea of increasing the prospects of peace is applauded, and each nation hopes that others will begin soon to disarm, it is felt necessary to make sure that they themselves are not placed at any disadvantage. Some point out that it would be well for Russia to set an example, but no one believes she will do this. A significant fact is that the stock markets have been unfavorably affected in the four principal financial capitals of Europe.

There is but one hope of peace on earth and good will to men, and that is that the peace of God should keep men's hearts and minds. Christ came to bring peace. It is not a natural product of the human heart, for among the works of the flesh are hatred, variance, wrath, strife, murders. The fruit of the Spirit is love and peace. Christ is our peace, and the life that is not yielded to Christ and controlled by him cannot know peace. "The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

It is true that the Bible foretells a movement among men in the last days, which will promise peace to the world, and some of the statements which the prophets say will be made at that time have been much in evidence during the last few days. "Many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, . . . and he shall judge among the nations . . . and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Isa. 2. The rest of the chapter shows that in that very time the judgments of God are about to fall upon the world, because men have altogether forsaken him.

"Their land also is full of horses, neither is there any end of their chariots," in spite of their talk of disarmament, and not learning war any more. "For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." 1 Thess. 5:3.

The Czar's manifesto is in itself a most ominous sign of the times. Coming whence it does, it shows that the strain on the nations is unendurable, and that things cannot go on as at present. God would save men from the coming destruction, and he has made use of the Czar to set before all clearly the situation and the prospect.

Let no one be deceived by a false hope of peace and security, looking for it at the hands of men who are strangers to it. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee." Isa. 36:3.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE Reformation. Whence was it?

When Martin Luther was led out to denounce the iniquitous practices which he saw prevalent in the Catholic Church; when he was constrained to proclaim at the risk of his life, that the Catholic method of justification was wrong and a fraud, and with it preached the true doctrine of justification by faith—something that the Catholic Church up to that time had never heard of, which was “not to be found in any of the creeds, or in the canons of any General Council” (Catholic Belief, page 359); when Luther seceded from the pope and the Catholic Church, and when at Wittenburg, in the College Hall, he stood before the students, and solemnly declared: “If you do not combat with your whole heart the pope’s impious government, you cannot be saved. Whosoever shall please himself with the religion and the worship of popedom will be lost forever in the life to come;” when certain of the princes, believing the principles taught by Luther, united their interest with his, and finally at the Diet of Spire, 1529, read the celebrated protest against the government of the pope, the reading of which won for them the name of Protestants, and from which in part at least, the founders of our government, adopted the idea of a “government of the people, by the people, and for the people;” when all this was being accomplished,—when, to sum it all up in a word, the Reformation against popery was begun, and carried on throughout the whole of Europe,—what was the power that entered into the lives of Luther and his co workers, and which enabled them to accomplish so much? What was the spirit that guided them in their arduous task? Promptly the Catholic will say, the devil; but, in the past at least, Protestants said, God.

Yes, nothing less than the Spirit of God was the ruling influence in that mighty work. And, thank God, there are still Protestants who dare stand upon the same foundation and say the same thing now; and by God’s grace they will continue to say it until the day that Christ comes and puts an end to “that wicked” by the brightness of his coming.

Mightily was the “sword of the Spirit”—the Word of God—wielded through Luther. By the straight testimony of God’s Word was Catholicism confounded. Vainly with impotent rage, did the champions of the Catholic faith, from the pope down to the priest and friar, try to stop the work. Vain effort! for the inspired testimony is that “the Word of God is not bound.” Recognizing no other authority than the Word of God, Protestantism for the time being triumphed.

Inasmuch as it was by the Word of God that Luther prevailed, as any one can see in studying the history of the Reformation, the conclusion is inevitable that the Holy Spirit—as already stated—was the real leader in that work, the Catholic Church to the contrary notwithstanding.

Through the power of the Spirit, Luther with a holy boldness denounced the papacy as antichrist.

Was the Catholic Church this or not? If it was not, then the Spirit of God was arrayed against the Church of God. And “every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation; and every city divided against itself shall not stand.” Thus said the Saviour on one occasion. Those words were true then; they are true now; they were true in Luther’s time.

But it is impossible that the kingdom of God can be divided against itself; it is impossible that the Holy Spirit can be arrayed against himself.

If the work, of which Luther was the human instrument, was the work of the Holy Spirit, then that against which it labored was verily antichrist. If the papacy was not antichrist, then beyond the shadow of a doubt the Spirit of the Reformation was not the Holy Spirit.

If, however, it was the Holy Spirit, and it was, then so long as the papacy shall exist, so long must the people of God keep on protesting; there can be no compromise. Antichrist then must be and is antichrist now. That party therefore which acknowledges the papacy as “our beautiful mother” not only acknowledges itself to be an own daughter of the papacy, but in the very nature of things acknowledges itself to be antichrist also.

As the Holy Spirit led the people of God to protest against the papacy in the sixteenth century, so will he lead his people to protest against it now.

While we say this we do not say, we do not even think it, that those who are avowedly papists are worse than other people. We really believe that in heart naturally they are as good as other people. But the papacy is the representative—the embodiment—of a principle which is against the government of God, and is destructive of good government on earth. It was this that led God’s people in the sixteenth century to protest against it then; it is this which will lead the people of God to protest against it now.

And when others who call themselves Protestants, ally themselves to the papacy, whether intentionally or otherwise, it becomes necessary to protest against them. In other words, when that which makes the papacy is embraced by Protestants, then the very likeness of the papacy is produced; and it becomes the bounden duty of God’s people to protest against the image of the papacy, as well as against the papacy itself.

On the 29th of the present month, a ballot will be taken throughout Canada to determine the will of the people on the question of prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating drinks. The vote will have no political significance so far as political parties are concerned. The text of the ballots is this: “Are you in favor of the passing of an act prohibiting the importation, manufacture, or sale of spirits, wine, ale, beer, cider, and all other alcoholic liquors for use as beverages?”

A CORRESPONDENT who notes what was said recently in the SENTINEL on the subject of Christians mixing in politics, writes us that while he still has use for the SENTINEL, he thinks we are "away off on the voting question." To show us that we are "off" on this point, he asks what would become of the country if all the Christians in it should abstain from voting. Then he answers the question by saying that "our beloved United States would be run by his Satanic majesty's subjects," while "we" (Christians) would "stand by and look on," etc.

WHAT would happen if all Christians in the country should abstain from voting, and exert all their influence as Christians for the uplifting of the standard of morality and truth among those about them? What would become of the country then? That is the real question. If Christians are to be Christians only in name, they might as well vote and identify themselves with politics in every way. If their Christianity is only of a negative kind—that of abstaining from politics—it will be of no benefit to the country, of course.

BUT Christianity is a positive thing, and every true Christian is a positive force for good in the neighborhood where he resides. He is a positive force in the direction of public peace, honesty, good will toward one another, industry, regard for one another's rights, and all those conditions which make a community happy and prosperous. This is the way in which Christianity benefits the country. And if all the people in the country who believe in Christianity—all who profess it and claim to be Christian—would in word and deed practice the virtues of Christianity,—if they would let their light shine before men in good works, as they are Scripturally enjoined to do—the question, Where is the country going to? would never be raised on account of their abstaining from politics. Wherever the country might be going to, it would be toward a brighter goal than would be possible were they to adopt the maxims and principles of the world and vote for the very best candidate that could possibly be put up.

CHRISTIANS are the "salt of the earth." So the Scripture declares. But how? By their votes? No; but "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Some people seem to think that the value of Christians as regards the welfare of the state is measured by their vote. By their vote Christians make themselves valuable to the politicians; but it is yet to be proved that their votes do any more for the good of the state than do those of publicans and sinners.

WITHOUT these votes, he says, the country would be "run by his Satanic majesty's subjects." Well, how is it run with these votes? Is the Government of this country run by Christians? At the present time the Republican party is in power in the Government. Is the Republican political party a Christian party? Are all the principles which that party maintains—the principle of "high license" for instance—Christian principles? If this be a Christian party, what need have Christians of any other party, and why do not all Christians vote for it? Not all Christians do vote for it; that is plain. Many good church members denounce it, say that it is very corrupt, and that we need a new party, which will put down the unrighteous traffic in drink, and correct other national evils which are crying for reform. So these people have put other parties in the field; and the number of political parties, sent forth on missions of reform, because the two leading parties are too corrupt to promote reforms, is continually increasing.

A FEW years ago the Democratic party was in power. Is this also a Christian party, and were Christians running the Government then? Are there two antagonistic Christian parties in the nation? The Government back at that time was very much as it is to-day, so far as Christian principles are concerned. It was as much a Christian Government then as it is now. Yet we think no one will seriously ask us to believe that either of these parties are truly Christian, either in their principles or in the people which compose them. The "gateway of politics" is open as well to atheists and agnostics and all classes of world-lovers as to Christians, and must be so long as this remains a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

THEN, since the country is not run by Christians now and has not been, by whom is it run? And since it is run by non-Christians, how much difference would there be in the running of it if the Christians should abstain from politics? Evidently, there would be no difference at all. But God's hand would still be in the affairs of men, controlling and shaping them for the good of his people and the glory of his name, as it has ever been since nations arose upon the earth.

THE Russian Minister of Education has issued an edict permitting the children of Stundists to remain in national schools only on condition of their attending religious instruction regularly and taking part in the religious exercises prescribed for the orthodox scholars.

WISCONSIN REPUBLICANS have put into their State platform the following:—

“We believe in perfect liberty of conscience, non-sectarianism in public affairs, separation of church and state, in free schools, and the utmost independence of individual thought, speech, and action consistent with law and the rights of others.”

According to this, Republican government in Wisconsin will be very nearly the perfection of human government, provided the party belief is carried into effect. But it is a mistake to think that human liberty should be limited by law in addition to “the rights of others.” Any restrictions upon liberty which are not demanded by regard for human rights, are neither necessary nor just.

“War’s Over: Good Times Now, If.”

NOTWITHSTANDING the sensationalism of the New York Journal—“An American paper for American people”—it has some admirable traits.

To help bring about good times it is doing its best to bring employers and laborers together. One method it is following is to advertise, without charge, “Helps and Situations Wanted.”

This is commendable. It is certainly right that one should do all in his power to make things better. “Live and let live” should be the motto of all. But for all that, are the good times of which the Journal speaks so glowingly and confidently, before us? Granting that “war is over,” there is a big little word which the Journal is compelled to use. That word is “If.”

Doubtless the Journal knows a great deal; but unquestionably Providence knows a great deal more.

Instead of the good times which the Journal anticipates over and beyond its big “If” at the heading of its columns, the “sure word” of God has shown otherwise. If that Word is any criterion, instead of employers and laborers coming together, the breach between them will widen more and more. For thus “saith the Lord:” “Go to now ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and your silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days. Behold the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them which have reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth. Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter.” James 5:1-5.

We are not pessimistic from choice in this matter, and would not appear to throw cold water on the Journal’s efforts to better the condition of things. But over and beyond its big “If,” the Journal, from its general tone in the past as well as the present, expects a future for the United States more glorious than anything they have ever experienced. And herein lies the danger.

And because of this we write. The Journal may not believe it, but it is true nevertheless, that the present financial situation—the great “gulf”—as impassable as that which separated Dives and Lazarus—between the capitalist and the laborer will not, cannot, be crossed.

And the only good times for which one can consistently look, are those which are to be ushered in at the coming of the Lord. He who looks for anything else will be grievously, irretrievably disappointed.

Diet as a Cause of Suicide.

“Literary Digest.”

WHILE the moralists have been discussing the question whether a man has a right to commit suicide, the scientists have been considering the question, Why do men commit suicide? A Dr. Haig, who has been looking into the subject, and telling a Scotch audience his conclusions, finds the cause of suicide to be uric acid in the blood, and the reason for this is found in a bad diet, and especially meats, beer, tea, and tobacco. The Hospital speaks as follows of Dr. Haig’s researches:—

“Dr. Haig is of opinion that suicide may be traced to error in diet, the error being the eating of meat, the drinking of beer and of tea, and the smoking of tobacco. His facts all fall comfortably into their places in support of his hypothesis. Are there not more suicides among men than among women, and do not men consume more meat, more beer, and more tobacco than the women? Again, suicide is more common in England than in Scotland, not apparently because the Scotch are a more canny race, but because the English eat more meat and drink more beer, while the Scotch eat less meat and drink whiskey instead of beer. After maintaining that suicide was less common among the Scotch, it was perhaps hardly polite, when addressing a Scotch audience, to go on to say that suicide increased with civilization. But the fact was explained on the ground of the more injurious diet, that of civilized man being more productive of uric acid and thus of suicide, than that which prevails where civilization is less advanced. Uric acid is, in fact, at the bottom of all this, and, according to Dr. Haig, the incidence of suicide tallies with the daily, annual, and life fluctuations of uric acid in the blood, being commonest when uric acid is most abundant, namely, in the mornings, in spring and summer, and in childhood and the full prime of life.

“We have no doubt that errors of diet are responsible for much, and, among other things, for a certain number of suicides; nay, we would go farther and admit that unsuitable diet, derangement of the proper relation between nutrition and waste, and the consequent loading of the tissues and the blood with abnormal products of metabolism, have much to do with that ill-temper and discontent which leads men to lay their hands violently often upon their neighbors, and sometimes on themselves."

The War of Principle.—No. 1.

"PEOPLE say that there is nothing new under the sun," said Aleck Morrow to his friend Cecil Hart; "but it seems to me that there is always something new in the development of the forces that move men. Think what revolutions have been wrought by the announcement of gospel liberty."

"But who wants everlasting revolution? Revolution means the disturbing of one's peace, the overturning of things cherished, the uprooting of revered traditions. All I want is to be let alone. This everlasting revolution seems unnatural, like the running of a pin into a person who is comfortably drowsy," said Cecil.

"But Cecil, the revolutions caused by the gospel were revolutions that saved the world from stagnation and destruction."

"I'm not so sure of that," replied Cecil. "At the birth of Christ the temple of Janus was closed for the third time. War had ceased, and the world had settled down to have a good time. Now if Christ had come to keep the peace then existing, the benefits would have been unquestioned. All men would have accepted him as king. He could have ruled the world on a temporal throne, and given the earth a double millennium; but by refusing the opportunity, he brought death on himself, and endless revolutions on men," responded Cecil.

"What!" exclaimed Aleck, "Do you not believe in the war for distinctive principles? Why, it is this war that has shown men's metal, and, by inspiring souls with the glory of right, it has given to us heroes and martyrs, and made for us the very romance of history."

"The only way that Christ could have kept the peace then existing would have been by acknowledging the supremacy of him who showed him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time, saying, 'If thou wilt worship me, all shall be thine.'"

"Well, supposing he had, what harm would it have done?"

"Cecil Hart, is it possible that you do not know that the earth and every soul thereon is the subject of a controversy between Christ and Satan? Christ would have yielded the whole earth and all souls to his enemy, if he had bowed down at this temptation. In fact there is no telling what would have been the end of the matter. Christ would have had to yield the heavenly principle of government, and in establishing a temporal throne, would have had to employ force. The very beginning of the feud between Christ and Satan originated in the accusation that God's laws could not be obeyed, and that he would set up on earth a government superior to Heaven's. How glad he would have been to have secured the Son of God as his vicegerent on earth. But Christ struck the true key-note of every relation, when he said, 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.'"

"But, Aleck, what would have hindered men from serving God, from finding a common basis for religion, and from forming all mankind into a common brotherhood, if Christ had taken the throne of the world. It seems to me, it would have been easily accomplished."

"If Christ had taken a temporal throne, the arch fiend would have been his god, and the only religion possible would have been that of the synagogue of Satan, the only brotherhood, the brotherhood of devils; for we change into the image of our gods. The government he would have established would have been a false theocracy—a supposed government of God with a demon for its head. The devil is forever seeking to bring the world under such a government."

"And practically, Aleck, what would be its results, should he succeed?"

"We have already had examples, or more properly, samples of it, in the Inquisition and the horrors of the Dark Ages; but the thing full-fledged would be a world wholly given over to demonology."

"Well, Aleck, you have studied this matter more than I have. But it seems a pity that the gates of war, closed at the birth of Christ, should ever have had to be reopened. Peace prevailed then, and it seems it might have continued."

"No, Cecil; it was not peace. It was war under a mask. It was not the peace of principle but of compulsion. It was a deception. The warring passions of men were under rein for a time. Even this outside peace was doubtless the overruling of Divine Providence; for though Satan is the god of this world, God 'hath his way in the storm.'"

"Aleck, why did not Divine Providence have his way always? Why is there a controversy, anyhow? Isn't God strong enough to master his enemy?"

"Certainly, Cecil. But his method is the method of love. He is testing souls nowadays. It is probationary time, and he holds the forces of evil in check sufficiently to give every one a chance to choose who shall be his king. When every soul has made his choice, the strength of right will be found to be Almighty, and the unequal contest will end for ever."

"How I wish it had ended at the time the gates of Janus were closed."

"There'll come a day, Cecil, when they will be closed for ever. Then we shall have the peace you crave, and find love's brotherhood in deed and in truth."

Studies in French History.—40.

THE next Tuesday afternoon when Professor Carman called his little troop of young historians together, it did not take them long to see that there was a light in his eyes, which told them as plainly as words could have done, that he had some unusual treat for them.

"Well, girls and boys," he began, "what do you imagine I have for you to-day?"

"I just believe you have a letter from Charlie and Rob," cried Maggie Palmeter, excitedly.

"I had begun to think they were forgetting their promise," smiled Max Smith, "but I guess I'd better change my opinion."

"Yes, you are right; I have a letter to read you, but first I want to say that the period of time which was covered in the last lessons, comprising the history of about fifty years, was called the Renaissance, or the new birth of cultivation, and during the most of this period up to 1547, Francis I., King of the Gentlemen, reigned in France. Francis then died, and his son Henry II. succeeded him.

"Now we will hear the letter. I received it this afternoon just in time to bring it into the class:—

"PARIS, AUGUST 30, 18—

"Our Dear Teacher: Here we are, at last, in this big city; and we are two as busy fellows as you ever saw—busy just seeing the sights. We are so glad we learned a little about France before we came, and we wish we had learned more.

"We had a pretty middling quiet voyage 'over the deep,' as Milly Brown would say, but once we had a storm that made our teeth chatter some, and our stomachs forgot to attend to business for a few days, which gave us no end of trouble.

"Charlie gets me to write this, for he says I'm better at it than he; though he sits by and tells me what to say next.

"Mr. White and father were in a hurry to get their business done up, and get home before the bad weather in the fall, and so we came almost direct to Paris.

"We are trying to pick up a few French phrases, and I wouldn't wonder if we astonished the natives when we come home. Mr. White found an old French fellow when we first arrived, to show us boys around, but he makes a funny mess of the English language. He laughs at our French, and we shake our sides till they ache over his 'Yankee talk,' as he calls it, though we manage to understand each other pretty well.

"I must tell you a little about the Tuileries. There is a fine garden, or park, which our guide tells us contains fifty acres, here. It is lovely. We boys don't wonder that Francis II. bought the place and gave it to his mother; we wish we could buy it for our mothers. The funny old Frenchman says the palace was spoiled by the Commune, in 1871.

"It seems strange to think that this fine city was ever a little village, and that it was called 'Mudtown.' I guess I would have forgotten that, only I brought my note book with me.

"Charlie and I love to walk down a lovely avenue, which they call Champs Elysées; it is a perfect bower of beauty. At the foot of it, there is a kind of open space—beside the palace—called the Place de la Concorde. Of course you know, professor, that a good many important things have happened hereabout.

"Please tell Practical Jack the reason why the place was named the Tuileries is because there used to be several tile works near by,—but then it was not included in the city.

"I don't think King Clovis ever dreamed what a great city he had really chosen as his capital. Wouldn't he be 'took back' as Grandma Palmeter says, if he could visit Paris now after these thirteen centuries and more?

"I wouldn't wonder if Edna Phillips will remember how much Philip Augustus II. did for Paris in the twelfth century. He was quite ambitious to be like Charlemagne; and Charlie and I thought, when we visited the magnificent palace of Louvre, which Philip fixed up and enlarged, that his ambition ought to be quite satisfied, even if that was all he did. This building is quite filled with magnificent pictures, sculptures, etc., which it almost makes our eyes ache to see, because there is so much of it.

"This old man,—who tells us to call him Miguel,—is going to take us to-morrow to the Cathedral of Notre Dame, which we must also thank Philip Augustus for, because he finished building it. It is built on an island in the river. Miguel says it is one of the finest buildings in the world.

"We have seen much that is very grand, but I can tell you there are some poor people, very poor, too, in this magnificent city. We both think we would enjoy it better to see fewer palaces, and know that more money was given to help the poor. But Miguel says he can remember when there were a great many more nice buildings than there are now; but since the war with Germany and since those awful Commune fellows have burned and spoiled so many nice buildings, he says he don't believe Paris will ever be quite what it was before. You see we have got quite used to him, so we can understand his queer English pretty fairly.

"Now I must quit writing, for my arm aches, and my fingers feel like cramping. I guess I'll make Charlie write next time.

"Don't forget us, and don't let the girls and boys, either, will you? Of course you'll all write to us.

"Your affectionate boys,
"ROB, and CHARLIE."

"That's a pretty entertaining letter for as busy boys as they to write, don't you think so?" asked Professor Carman.

"Yes; and what a nice time they are having! I only wish I could be with them," sighed Max Smith.

"We can't go to Paris, of course," said practical Jack, "but there's one thing we can do,—we can stay at home and be contented, and learn French history, and write the boys letters."

"I hope you will do so. Next week we will begin our study with the year 1547."

HELPS TO THE STUDY OF THE BOOK : OF : GENESIS.

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 13—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall, and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

The work is entitled "Political Debates and Speeches of Lincoln and Douglas," and contains a complete report of their speeches and debates. The burning words of these great orators are of absorbing interest both to those who have lived through the exciting scenes pictured out, and those who know them merely as history. There can be nothing better placed in the hands of the rising generation than a book presenting, in an attractive way, the principles on which this government is founded. Efforts are now being made to overthrow those principles, hence it is important that we become intelligent regarding them. The work is a great assistance to that end.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 29, 1898.

THE glorification of war tends to make the people of the country love war; and the more people there are who love war, the less prospect is there in that country for the continuance of peace.

OUT of the turmoil of affairs in France, there has developed a well-defined struggle for supremacy between the civil and the military authorities. Shall the civil power in the nation be overthrown, or shall it continue? No graver question could confront the people. There is a Vesuvius rumbling under the French republic.

THE seventeenth day of this month was the beginning of the Jewish New Year. Quite a difference this from our calendar; but the week is precisely the same with the Jews as with other people. Yet there are some people seemingly intelligent on other matters who think that because the calendar was changed by Julius Cæsar and Pope Gregory, there must have been a change of the week which made people lose track of the seventh-day Sabbath.

A PRIZE-FIGHT which was advertised to take place near Buffalo, recently, was stopped by the opposition of clergymen, who are everywhere agreed that prize-fighting is a thing that ought not to be tolerated in this country. But why glorify fighting with guns, as even clergymen do, and denounce fighting with fists? Both are examples of carnal warfare, and clergymen ought to be opposed to carnal warfare in every form.

A SPECIAL force of seven hundred election deputies, disconnected wholly from the established forces of the city government, vested with almost autocratic powers and armed with clubs and self-acting revolvers, are to be in charge at the polls on election day in this city, November 8. The regular police force of the city being adequate to prevent all disturbances—if it is not it should be made so—it is evident that this high-handed proceeding is a political measure devised by the party in power to intimidate people of the opposing parties. If there is not trouble and bloodshed at the polls on that day, it will be no fault of the arrangements that have been made. And this is politics, in the latest and most advanced stage of its development.

A RECENT balloon ascent made near London, Eng., demonstrated that an altitude of 25,000 feet above sea level marks the limit of atmospheric conditions which allow of breathing by a human being. The aeronauts reached a height of 27,500 feet, sustaining themselves at this altitude by breathing from reservoirs of compressed oxygen. Instruments for obtaining accurate measurements and records of scientific interest were employed, and very valuable results were obtained. At the highest altitude, which was still 1,500 feet below the summit of Mount Everest, in the Himalayas, the temperature was 29° below zero. The setting sun was intensely bright, and the sky intensely blue. The temperature at the surface of the earth was 90° above zero in the shade.

THE London Observer published in a recent issue a confession made by Count Esterhazy, the notorious French army officer, to a correspondent of that paper, in which the officer admits being the author of the "bordereau" upon the testimony of which Dreyfus was convicted of treason. He is quoted as justifying his course by saying:—

"I knew I was committing a forgery, but I also knew that all intelligence departments in all countries in the world were run on precisely the same lines as our own, and that it was impossible to achieve practical results in any other way.

"In the Von Tausch case which made so great a sensation a while ago in Germany, Von Tausch confessed, as Henry did, to having committed forgeries, but added that his crime was nothing compared to the infamies which the Berlin general staff had forced him to commit in connection with other matters, and therefore the court attempted to silence him. He ultimately received the minimum punishment and has since been released, long before his time was up.

"It is nearly always necessary to to manufacture material evidence against spies, because otherwise they would never be punished. They never or very rarely leave written evidence of their nefarious work."

Such statements as these which are no doubt entirely truthful, help one to form some conception of the danger to free government which militarism, with its despotic regulations and maxims justifying them, embodies.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 6, 1898.

NUMBER 39.

WHEN Cæsar enters the domain of religion, he does not lay aside his sword.

THE "things that are God's" are not to be rendered to him through Cæsar.

TO DECK Cæsar in the garments of religion, only dishonors those garments and makes Cæsar ridiculous.

STATE religion can be no more than a garment worn on the outside. The sword of compulsion lurks beneath the garb of piety, and the "dogs of war" lose nothing of their character by appearing in the guise of sheep.

IT amounts to the same thing in the end whether the church becomes political or the state religious.

"GOVERNMENT of the people, by the people, and for the people," can become Christian only when the people become Christians.

THE church will look a long time into the turbid pool of politics before she beholds a reflection of divinity.

SOUL and God. In politics, the party and the boss come between the individual and his vote. Religion in politics is therefore religion controlled by man.

WHEN the early church was about to be endued with marvelous power, she repaired not to Cæsar's throne, but to an "upper room" and the throne of God.

STATE RELIGION: CÆSAR—THE STATE—IN THE GARB OF PIETY.

CÆSAR, robed in the vestments of religion, makes an incongruous picture. Such garments were never designed to cover the embodiment of civil authority and power. The sword by which his word is always enforced belies the pretense of the love which draws and persuades men; the fangs of the wolf belie the appearance of the harmless sheep. The hypocrisy of the display is evident. Yet in this country of professed separation of church and state, the state has not wholly laid aside the garb of religion but maintains the appearance of piety in its laws for Sunday observance, its appointment of days of thanksgiving and prayer, its maintenance of chaplains and sectarian institutions, and its gifts of public money and state property to the churches.

WHEN Christianity ascends the throne of earthly power, she invariably lays aside her robe of pure white and puts on one of scarlet.

THE strife in the church as to which should be the greatest, which began in the days of the apostles, was settled only by sinking the church to the lowest level of degradation.

IN religion, nothing can rightfully come between the worship that is offered to God through Cæsar, will need purifying to make it presentable at the throne.

Bishop Potter on Imperialism.

A WARNING voice against the peril of imperialism was raised by Bishop Potter, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, at the annual convention of the diocese of New York, held in this city September 28. His words may be profitably read and pondered by thinking Americans:—

“The nation has had too much during the past few months to blind and intoxicate it. It has won an easy victory over an effete and decrepit adversary, in which no splendors of individual heroism nor triumphs of naval skill—and in these we may indulge a just pride—ought to blind our eyes to the fact that we have had a very easy task against a very feeble foe. And now, with unexpected fruits of victory in our hands, what, men are asking, are we going to do with them?”

“Nay, rather, the solemn question is, What are they going to do with us? Upon what wild course of so-called imperialism are they going to launch a people, many of whom are dizzy already with the dream of colonial gains and who expect to repeat in distant islands some such history as our conquered enemy wrote long ago in blood and plunder in her colonies here and in South America. We have, indeed, our Congress to direct this race for empire, and our gaunt and physically wrecked sons and brothers by tens of thousands at home to show us how they will do it!”

“At such a time, as never before, the Church of God is called upon, in the pulpit and by every agency at her command, to speak the words of truth and soberness and to reason of righteousness, temperance and a judgment to come—a judgment for nations as well as individuals, till impetuosity is sobered and chastened, and until a people in peril of being wrecked upon an untried sea can be made to pause and think. The things that this community and this nation alike supremely need are not more territory, more avenues of trade, more places for place hunters, more pensions for idlers, more subject races to prey upon, but a dawning consciousness of what, in individual and in national life, are a people’s indispensable moral foundations, those great spiritual forces on which alone men or nations are built!”

“Most opportune is it, I think, that in the ear of a nation already dizzy with the dream of what it may achieve by conquests through the force of arms, there should sound that strong, temperate, and most cogently reasoned message which rings through the ukase of the Emperor of Russia. It is an unanswerable indictment of the enormous folly and essential madness of the international race for increased armaments—ships and forts and men, piled up in ever greating proportions, until at last, the utmost limit of a nation’s resources in men and money has been reached, the last man has been dragged from his family, the last shekel has been borrowed from reluctant creditors and the empire, or the republic, makes its wild plunge, at length, into irredeemable bankruptcy.

“And this is called ‘statesmanship’ and the ‘wisdom of diplomacy,’ as against the visionary dreams of an imaginative sentimentalism. For myself, it is better described in those very recent words of a singularly clear, hard-headed and acute English statesman, whom nobody will accuse of being visionary or a dreamer. I mean Sir William Vernon Harcourt, who pronounced the present rivalry of the great powers of the world in the matter of ships and men as simply ‘insensate folly!’”

WE should regard liberty, not as a right of which to boast, but as an opportunity of receiving and doing the greatest good.—Rev. Richard E. Sykes, Universalist, Denver.

The Christian’s Duty to the State.

Rev. Alex. Sutherland, Toronto, Ont.

IN the days of primitive Christianity the rule was to render to Cæsar all honor and obedience that did not conflict with fidelity to Christ and his law, but now the rule seems to be to render to Christ all honor and obedience that does not interfere with loyalty to party, and this is justified under the plea of patriotism, and by some is even called Christian patriotism.

The term is a misnomer. Christian patriotism seeks first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; mere patriotism seeks first the kingdom of this world and its advancement.

We teach our children to love their country and hate all others. Christ taught his followers to love the whole world and to hate no one. We teach the political brotherhood of a common nationality. Christ taught the true brotherhood of man.

The Christian’s duty to the state is to uphold the authority of rulers in all lawful and just things; to obey every law that can be obeyed with a good conscience toward God, but to oppose steadily and resolutely whatever conflicts with the principle of the kingdom of God, and to this end he must keep himself free from party domination and from all entangling alliances.

That the kingdom of God, as such, should form no alliance with the kingdoms of the world is an affirmation having all the force of an axiom. The sphere and positions of the two kingdoms are so entirely distinct that they cannot be merged or even allied without irreparable damage to the heavenly kingdom.

Union of Church and State Condemned by the Parental Relation.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

[MUCH is made by the advocates of union of the state with religion, of an assumed analogy between the position and duties of the state and those of a parent. This argument is well disposed of in the following, which was written by an English clergyman in review of one of Mr. Gladstone's early works defending the establishment of religion in England. The principles of state support of religion apply of course as well in this country as in England.]

MR. GLADSTONE, as well as other advocates of the union, has much insisted on the analogy between the nation and the family—between the functions of the state and those of the parent. Hence, he adds, "I argue that the state when rightly constituted is eminently competent, by intrinsic as well as extrinsic attributes, to lead and to solicit the mind of the people, to exercise the function, modified indeed, but yet real, of an instructor, and even of a parent." Bishop Wilson adds, "Though an Establishment is not essential to Christianity itself, it is essential to every Christian government which desires to discharge its highest obligations toward the people committed to its care. A connection between Christianity and the rulers of a Christian country is imperiously required to fulfil the duty of the Parent of the State to his vast family." The doctrine grounded on this analogy is that, as a parent must provide Christian instruction for his family, so the state must provide Christian instruction for the nation. Both the analogy and the doctrine founded upon it are false.

The state being composed of queen, lords, and commons, among which three estates the House of Commons having now so much influence that its decided and permanent judgment determines ultimately every public question, we must consider that House as being especially the depository of the state's parental authority. But if the House of Commons is the parent of the nation, the difference between the father of the nation and the father of the family is so considerable as to make their respective duties exceedingly distinct.

1. Children being placed under the authority of their parents through their weakness and ignorance, without any choice of their own, the control of them by their father is natural and unavoidable; but the House of Commons is chosen by the electors of the empire, and is therefore, an elective father, an adopted parent, raised to that dignity by his adopting children, to whom alone he owes his position and his power.

2. The father of a family has a permanent, and, within certain limits, an irresponsible control, so that he can determine the education of his children from infancy to manhood. But the national father is elected by his children, on certain terms and for certain ends, can claim no more power than they are pleased to concede, is responsible to them for the execution of his office, is forced by them to resign it at the end of seven years, because they are afraid that he would assume too much authority, and all his decisions may be revoked by the next elected national father, whose views may be totally opposed to his own.

Since, then, the circumstances of the parent are so different from those of the state, it is obviously unsafe to argue from the duties of the one to the functions of the other; but just so far as there is an analogy between them, that analogy condemns the control of the church by the state as absurd; for when the children of any family grow to manhood, they are invariably emancipated from parental control in matters of religion. What parent would think of dictating to his son at the age of thirty, the creed which he should profess, or the minister whom he should attend? What son at that age would submit to such dictation? At that epoch the authority of the father in religious matters has expired, since every man is responsible to God for his religious conduct, and can permit no one to interpose between his Maker and him. The son is then become religiously independent; and all attempts to impose on him a creed or a religious teacher would be usurpation. The obligation of the parent to teach the children arising solely from their need of divine truth, from their incapacity to judge for themselves, the reason of this dictation ceases as soon as their faculties are mature, and from that time it would be criminal in them to permit its exercise. Not less imbecile and culpable is it in a nation to allow the state to dictate its creed: for the nation is fullgrown. There have been times when a government might with some plausibility assume toward a nation the tone of a parent to a child; but why should this nation be treated as a child now? Myriads of men in this country can think for themselves on religion as well as the six hundred and fifty-eight members of the House of Commons can think for them. In every free nation the press and the platform are coördinate powers with the legislature itself: and in this country every day makes it more manifest, that the members of the House of Commons are not pedagogues, but representatives of men; among whom are many who are as able as themselves to investigate every question both of politics and morals: and if the nation is composed of men, parliament should cease to treat them as children. Indeed, in no other question are they treated as children. The state does not determine for us our lawyer, physician or tradesman; why should it appoint our pastor? Why select for its dictation precisely the matter in which it is the least competent to dictate, and in which its blunders are the most injurious? When the parent chooses the pastor for his children, he chooses also their physician and their tradesman; if the state will play the parent with men, let it nominate our physicians and our tradesmen no less than our ministers. Either treat us wholly as children, or wholly as men.

When a parent relinquishes all control over the religion of his children, because they have attained to manhood, he may yet be wiser than they, and is certainly more experienced. But what religious wisdom and experience has this elected national father, who retains the control over the churches of Christ? Here, in truth, the analogy between the relation of the state to the churches and the relation of the parent to his children is wholly reversed. In the churches of Christ is collected all the religious wisdom of the country: in the House of Commons there is little religious wisdom. If in political knowledge Parliament may resemble the parent and the nation be like the child, in spiritual knowledge Parliament is like the child while the churches have the wisdom of the parent: and to intrust parliament with the creed, laws, and discipline of the churches, is to intrust the control of the parent to the child.

But this is not the whole of the absurdity involved in the state episcopate. As no one can teach what he does not know, or will inculcate what he does not believe, an ungodly father cannot educate his children in religion. On the contrary, some ungodly parents have been known so systematically to vitiate the minds of their children, that the Court of Chancery has on this ground taken from them the custody of their own sons. The state is under the same incapacity. If the House of Commons be the national father, it is a father so irreligious, that the children should be withdrawn from his control. Six hundred members of parliament, with no more religion than six hundred men taken at hazard from any city or town of Great Britain, whose theological opinions, including Romanism, High-Churchism, Socinianism, and a thousand other varieties, make up a perfect chaos of irreconcilable contradictions, are not entitled to control the creed and discipline of twelve thousand Christian churches.

To complete this view of the absurdity of the union, we must add that, while the father of a family controls the education of his children, because he pays for it, the members of the two houses of parliament, instead of paying themselves for the spiritual instruction of the nation, force the nation to pay for it, distraining on the property of all who refuse to pay: just as if an ignorant and ungodly parent should force his children, when grown up to manhood, to receive a bad tutor from him, and should beat and force them if they would not build a lecture-room, and pay the tutor's salaries themselves.

Lord McCaulay an Advocate of Religious Liberty.

For my part I long ago espoused the cause of religious liberty, not because that cause was popular, but because it was just; and I am not disposed to abandon the principles to which I have been true through my whole life in deference to a passing clamor. The day may come, and may come soon, when those who are now loudest in raising that clamor may again be, as they have formerly been, suppliants for justice. When that day arrives, I will try to prevent others from oppressing them, as I now try to prevent them from oppressing others. In the meantime I shall contend against their intolerance with the same spirit with which I may hereafter have to contend for their rights.

What the Churches Teach Officially, Regarding the Observance of Sunday.—1.

BY CHARLES E. BUELL.

THERE are two distinct classes of religionists that seek for the distinction of being considered the exponents of the teachings of Jesus, the Messiah. These will be spoken of as State churches,—those which are joined to civil governments; and Evangelical churches,—those which are not united to the civil power.

The State churches comprise the Roman Catholic Church, the Imperial Russian Orthodox Church, the Church of England, the State Church of Prussia, the Greek Orthodox Church, and the Government churches of Switzerland.

The teaching of the Roman Catholic Church regarding the observance of Sunday instead of the Sabbath day, is given in the recently published catechism, entitled "A Catechism of Christian Doctrine, prepared and enjoined by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore," 1890. On page 62 it is stated:—

"Q. Why does the church command us to keep holy the Sunday instead of the Sabbath?

"A. The church commands us to keep holy the Sunday instead of the Sabbath, because on Sunday Christ rose from the dead, and on Sunday he sent the Holy Ghost upon the apostles."

The Catechism of the Church of England, as used by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, reads very similar to that of the Roman Catholic Church:—

"Q. Why was Sunday made the great day for Christian rest and worship?

"A. Because the resurrection of Christ took place on the first day of the week."

Then follows the reference to the day of Pentecost.

The Pentecost was regarded as a supplement to the Passover, and followed the Paschal Sabbath in seven weeks and one day thereafter. In the opinion of leading scholars among the Protestants the Roman Catholic catechism is at fault in its statement that "on the Sunday Christ sent the Holy Ghost upon the apostles."

The late Horatio B. Hackett, D. D., Professor of Biblical literature at Newton Theological Institute, etc., a scholar that was well and favorably known, remarks: "It is generally supposed that this Pentecost, signalized by the outpouring of the Spirit, fell on the Jewish Sabbath, our Saturday."—Commentary on the original Text of Acts, pp. 50, 51.

In the work by Hobbs, entitled "The Day of Pentecost," it is stated: "Saturday the 27th of May, A. D. 30, was the fiftieth day after the Paschal Sabbath."

This means that the resurrection and the Pentecost cannot have both occurred on Sunday.

The Roman Catholic Church makes no attempt to justify the change to Sunday upon anything that is taught in the Scriptures, the brief teaching in this catechism to the contrary notwithstanding.

In a publication entitled, "A Doctrinal Catechism," by Stephen Kenan, approved by the late Cardinal McClosky, New York, 1875, p. 174, he says:—

"Had she [the church] not such power she could not have done that in which all modern religionists agree with her, she could not have substituted the observance of Sunday, the first day of the week, for the observance of Saturday, the seventh day of the week, a change for which there is no Scriptural authority."

Cardinal Gibbons, in his work, "The faith of Our Fathers," p. 111, says:—

"You may read the Bible from Genesis to Revelation, and you will not find a single line authorizing the sanctification of Sunday."

In the first place, if it is true that the Roman Catholic Church originated the observance of Sunday, as claimed, then it was not the custom to observe the day prior to the organization of that church. And, if it is true, as stated by these eminent prelates, that there is no Scriptural authority for observing this day, then its observance does not revert to the resurrection of Jesus, or to anything Scriptural.

In the Catholic Mirror, the organ of Cardinal Gibbons, there appeared a series of articles beginning Sept. 2, 1893, in which Sunday is given the title of "The Christian Sabbath," and there follows in heavy lines, "The Genuine Offspring of the Union of the Holy Ghost and the Catholic Church, His Spouse."

In this interesting series of articles this paper jeers the Protestant pulpits which ring with loud and impassioned invectives against violating Sunday sacredness, and declares that "the claims of Protestants to any part in the Christian Sabbath are proved to be groundless, self-contradictory, and suicidal."

If there was a sacredness clinging to Sunday that was due to Scriptural teaching, there would be no ground for insisting that the Protestant world have no claim to a part therein; but if however, the institution of Sunday observance is a man-made one, there might be a foundation for the assertion that the claims of the Protestants to a part therein are groundless.

The fact also that the decrees of monarchs, centuries ago, commanding the observance of the first day of the week instead of the Sabbath designated in the fourth commandment of the Decalogue, did not make any mention of the resurrection, or refer to the Christian belief, and that these decrees were met by petitions from the members of the early Christian congregations asking exemptions from the decrees and the restoring to them of the Bible Sabbath, refutes the idea that the observance of Sunday is on a Scriptural foundation.

God's Wages Vs. Man's Penalties.

BY ALBERT WRIGHT.

"THE wages of sin is death." That is the only penalty that the all-wise and merciful Ruler of the heaven and earth knows how to meet sin with. And if any government legislates against sin, its use of any less penalty than death is sheer folly.

But all the individuals of which any human government is composed are sinners. And sins being worthy of death, the only thing that can logically come of an attempt of human government to cope with sin, is self-destruction.

The only legitimate province of human law is protection from crime—not recompense for sin. "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." And any human power whatsoever, that undertakes this work, is but a manifestation of "that man of sin, . . . who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." 2 Thess. 2:3, 4.

God's vengeance is as different from man's as love is from hatred. When one has earned wages he usually receives them willingly. And the hardened sinner, who has rendered himself incapable of repentance, will welcome destruction to escape the presence of that glorious character against whom his mind is enmity and his life rebellion. The quietude of oblivion will be as much better for him than an eternity of his own devices, as the happy estate of the righteous is better than their perilous yet peaceful pilgrimage of earth.

But why should Satan deceive us, that we should walk the hard way of the transgressor to his dreadful goal, when the price has been paid to make us sons of God? Why not accept now the peaceful life of Christ, which even amid the fiercest persecutions is as much better than our own, as eternal life is better than destruction.

If religion cannot support its own agencies and teach its own doctrines without the aid of the state, let it be cut down, for it alone cumbereth the ground. Faith without works is a stinking carcass; let it, for God's sake and man's, be buried.

It is because I value the Holy Scriptures so highly, because I regard religious instruction as such an important and sacred duty, it is because I love the state, and Christianity more, that I plead that the church make herself responsible for all religious ministration, and that the state mind its own business, which is certainly not that of universal provider of religion for the community. Rev. J. W. Roberts (Presbyterian, Australia).

Spain and Her Methods.—No. 6.

BY MRS. FLORENCE A. BARNES, M. D.

Pizarro now continued his course toward Cuzco, burning at the stake any whom his vindictive spirit might deem sufficiently culpable. The amount of gold he and his followers obtained was so great that on division each horseman received 6,000 pesas. Gold was the incentive and the reward. His courage was attended by cruelty from avarice and religious fanaticism. Religion covered a multitude of sins; the burning of an infidel made a sacrifice acceptable to heaven. A strange spirit this, to spring from a religion, whose first precepts were "peace on earth, good will to men!"

With the Spanish invaders were always a goodly number of priests, some to be sure too much like the Bishop of Cuzco, with hearts so seared as to be closed against sympathy for the poor Indian; all avaricious, I am afraid. After entering Cuzco, Pizarro thought to delude the people by installing a new king of the Inca succession. He chose a younger brother, Manco by name, and with much show crowned him Inca of the Incas. But this was only a pretense of kingship, for he was subject to Pizarro. He next selected a new site for a capital, where the present city of Lima now is.

But the Peruvians were not forgetful of their wrongs. They had seen one king butchered, another placed on a vacant throne, their temple sacked, their country appropriated by the Spaniards, its people slaves to the conquerors while their homes were seized by violent hands. Religious houses turned into stables, and thousands of women who had been living in chaste seclusion as virgins of the Sun, were become the prey to the licentious soldiery. A favorite wife of the young Inca was debauched by the Spanish officers, and the young Inca himself, finding himself only a tool in the hands of the invaders, brooded over his wrongs, and laid plans for vengeance.

Quarrels among the Spaniards themselves soon gave the opportunity. It was in one of these efforts for the regaining of his kingdom that Juan Pizarro received an injury from which he died. But the Peruvians with their poor methods of warfare, were only driven to desperate deeds. The Inca himself, wrapping his war cloak around him, sprang from the battlements and fell to the bottom of the steep precipice, preferring death to dishonor.

Hernando Pizarro now took his brother's place, and made some very successful raids through the country. One of the most ardent of Pizarro's helpers was a man named Almagro; without him Pizarro could never have been so successful.

On one of his crusades into the interior, the wretched Indians were forced to accompany them to heights, where from the cold and their scanty clothing, they perished by the way. Often the quiet hamlets were burned, while the people were taken to act as beasts of burden. They were chained together in gangs of ten or twelve and compelled to march till they dropped dead in their chains. But all these chief conquerors came to a tragic end. Almagro was sentenced to death by strangulation by Pizarro himself. And Almagro's son avenged his father by assassinating Pizarro.

The ruling motive of all, so far as human judgment can discern, was avarice and ambition. The lust for gold was the incentive to toil and the price of perfidy. The object of every act was gold or revenge.

The contrast between the ferocity of the Spaniards and the mild inoffensiveness of the South American Indian awaken sympathy for the latter.

The Spaniards were in the country and the church claimed the people. But this took time. However, by the middle of the sixteenth century, the power of the church was established.

The poor Indian was kept in complete subjection to the monarchy of Spain. This was not without repeated efforts to throw off the yoke; but in all these they were unsuccessful. Numerous were the victims at the stake, or the strangled martyrs to the cause of liberty and love of home, as the centuries rolled by; until at last, in 1819, Bolivar arose to liberate his country.

Since then, these countries have been free from the dominance of Spain. Yet the years are few since that freedom came; and the country is yet under the ban of the licentiousness and ignorance which existed so many centuries under the rule of Spain and the church. Still that power, the church, holds the rein over the people in their ignorance, while her priests revel in all the licentiousness of the earlier centuries, and keeping the masses in dumb ignorance lead them on in lives of shame and misery. All this is permitted, aye, encouraged, in the name of the Christian religion. Is it not time that some one arise to protest against this iniquity of iniquities?

Can we not send our true Christians to undo, if may be, the work of this false teacher in South America?

For what is true of the countries which once comprised the great Peru, is true of all the countries of South America, where the priest has held rule so many years.

Let Christian people awake to the iniquity that now exists. The same spirit is there which predominated under Pizarro's adventurous career. It only waits time and opportunity to spring up again in overt acts. The same persecutions await the true Christian that were visited on the poor Inca and his people. The same licentiousness still spreads itself over the fair land, making loathsome its beauty and natural strength.

Come to the rescue, Christian; Come.

FREEDOM is worth what its attainment has cost and is costing, chiefly as it affords advantages of a larger life, which we industriously improve. We should seek it as an invigorating atmosphere in which to grow rather than a balmy air in which to sleep. We should seek freedom of thought in order that our minds, unfettered, may think great and worthy thoughts and hold unmolested the conclusions of honest investigation; that in its search for truth the mind may not be terrified by threats, weakened by flattery, or narrowed by bigotry.—Rev. Richard E. Sykes.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 6.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

IN our last article we raised the question, "The Reformation: Whence was it?"

The reformers were afterwards called Protestants; so that Protestantism and the Reformation meant, and still mean, one and the same thing.

The question repeated above might therefore have been just as appropriately, "Protestantism: whence was it?"

Last week we found that the power which wrought in the Reformation, through the reformers, was the power of God—that the Spirit which led in that mighty work was the Holy Spirit.

As "the power of God manifested through the Holy Spirit" is the answer to the question, "The Reformation; whence was it?" so we say "the power of God through the Holy Spirit" is the answer to the question, "Protestantism: whence was it?"

But the Protestantism of that time, by the power of God through the Spirit, was a protest against the papacy. And Protestantism, by the power of God through the Holy Spirit, is a protest against the papacy, and everything like it, now.

What shall be said, therefore, of that Protestantism which not only ceases to protest against the papacy, but actually courts its aid. Who cannot see that such a course is a repudiation of the Reformation, and, therefore, of true Protestantism.

Nor is this all. It amounts to a sweeping denial that such a work was the work of the Holy Spirit.

But the work of the Reformation in Luther's time was only a beginning. Luther himself did not understand the full import of the work which the Holy Spirit led him to undertake. That work which had such a small beginning must not, cannot stop until every error, as well as all corruption, shall have been uprooted, and the truth of God take its place.

Unfortunately for the Reformation and Protestantism, a position was taken which could not fail to be disastrous to Protestantism—which was, in fact, the very millstone, as it were, by which it was to be drowned, leaving nothing but its name. The position in question was that Sunday was solely an appointment of "the [Catholic] church."

This was done in the memorable confession of faith which was read at the Council of Augsburg in 1530.

How thoroughly the Reformers stultified themselves may be gathered from their protest the year before at the Diet of Spire, and the part that Sunday had in the great Catholic Council of Trent.

In the protest at Spire, among other things, the Protestants said: "Now seeing . . . there is no sure doctrine but such as is conformable to the Word of God; that the Lord forbids the teaching of any other doctrine; that each text of the Holy Scriptures ought to be explained by other and clearer texts; that this holy Book is, in all things necessary for the Christian, easy of understanding, and calculated to scatter the darkness; we are resolved, with the grace of God, to maintain the pure and exclusive preaching of the only Word, such as it is contained in the biblical books of the Old and New Testament, without adding anything thereto, that may be contrary to it. This Word is the only truth; it is the sure rule of all doctrine and of all life and can never fail or deceive us. He who builds on this foundation shall stand against all the powers of hell, whilst all the human vanities that are set up against it shall fall before the face of God." (Italics mine.)

Notwithstanding this, in less than a year they accepted an institution as part of their necessary faith which they frankly acknowledged as solely an appointment of "the church."

The force of this will be more fully appreciated by observing what part Sunday played in the great Council of Trent (1545-1563).

The council began in December, 1545, with the great question as to whether it should begin "with the reform of the papacy," or with definitions of dogma.

What was meant by the "reform of the papacy" was whether or not the church should abandon tradition and adopt the Scriptures as the only standard of authority in faith and morals.

This was a serious question, and one that meant much to the Catholic Church. Should they abandon tradition and adopt the Scriptures as the standard of faith and morals, they would thereby condemn the previous teachings of the church, and at the same time admit the very principle contended for by the Protestants.

This, indeed, would have been a triumph for the latter.

As between tradition on the one hand, and the Scriptures on the other, what was the turning-point—the pivot upon which all hinged? The answer is, Sunday.

It came about in this way. The vexed question referred to above began in December, 1545; it was not until January, 1562, that it was settled. At that time the archbishop of Rheggio, in a speech, openly declared that tradition stood higher than the Bible; that the authority of the church could not be bound to the authority of the Scriptures. And why? "Because the former had changed the Sabbath into Sunday—not by the command of Christ, but solely by her own authority."—Canon and Tradition, p. 263.

From this the reader can see not only how completely the reformers stultified themselves, but that the very continuance of the papacy as such, depended upon the Sunday institution.

SOMEONE has made an estimate of the religious vote in the United States, based on the election returns for 1896. It gives these figures:—

Protestant vote, 2,877,816; Roman Catholic vote, 1,245,892; leaving a secular vote of 12,816,703. This—which is at least approximately correct—shows that the United States is preëminently a secular nation; yet there are some people who think that terrible differences would appear—that, in short, the country would go to rack and ruin—if it were not for the Christian vote!

* * *

THE Dominican Order in the Philippine Islands is getting a taste of the irony of fate. It is obliged to look for protection to the United States Government. If the people of the islands, who are Catholics, are left in possession of the country, they will confiscate every peso of Dominican property, and hence this Catholic order is obliged to look for protection to a nation predominantly Protestant. That speaks well for Protestantism, but ill for Catholicism.

SPEAKING of the custom of “christening” ships of war,” which is to be observed at the launching of a new United States battleship, the Independent says:—

“We think the ceremony with either [wine or water] to be a blasphemous travesty on a holy sacrament. Baptism is for human beings. As well baptize a penknife or an inkstand or a bell or a shop or a church as a ship, and last of all a ship of war.”

And this is very true; but there is as much sense in the idea that a ship of war ought to be baptized as in the idea that such a ship is an instrument of Christianity. When a ship of war has been duly baptized, if she was not launched on Sunday or in any part constructed on that day, she is by many regarded as a sort of Christian institution, whose work of death and destruction is not in violation of the moral code.

THE Republican candidate for governor of the State of New York, Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, is a man distinguished among men for a sturdy independence of character, and seemingly was as likely an individual as could be found to administer the duties of political office without being subservient to the “machine” or any political boss. It was predicted that he would be a genuine “rough rider” for the machine, which was what the good people of the State desired to see; but it is found that the Republican boss of the State puts up Mr. Roosevelt as his candidate, controlling the political machinery of the State the same as he has done in times past. The “machine” runs as smoothly with Mr. Roosevelt on it as it ever did. Mr. Crocker, on the other hand, has the Democratic machine as thoroughly under his control, and set up his candidate with only a nominal show of opposition. And this is politics as it is to-day—simply a huge circus in which two leading bosses run their respective machines against each other for political supremacy, with a few side-shows accompanying in the shape of “independent” tickets.

UNQUESTIONABLY much of the sickness in the camps of the soldiers, which has caused such a controversy in government circles, was due to lax discipline which allowed the soldiers to indulge their appetites freely for both food and drink, in the cities and towns near which the camps were located. The greater part of the sickness in this world is caused by violation of natural laws in eating and drinking.

THE Turkish authorities do not look favorably upon the “Zionist” movement, which aims at peopling the land of Palestine with a sufficient number of Jews to convert the country into a Jewish state. The Sultan does not believe in having a Jewish state established in his dominions. Jewish authorities in the United States are nearly unanimous in opposition to the scheme.

IF the nations of Europe and the United States should accept the czar’s proposition for disarmament, and retain only one soldier for each 1,000 citizens, which is the proportion advised by General Miles, the armies of the respective countries would be: Russia, 125,000 men; Germany, 50,000; France and Austria, each, 40,000; and the United States, 70,000.

RECENTLY a Polish priest of Chicago, Father Kozlowski, was excommunicated by the Archbishop of Chicago, the excommunication being no mild affair, but one which consigned the “father” to eternal damnation and forbade “the faithful under grave penalty,” “to have any intercourse or communion with him.” This of course established a boycott against the victim of papal wrath, and thus it became a matter within the jurisdiction of the civil courts. Father Kozlowski accordingly has brought a suit for damages against the archbishop, and has precedent established in a similar case in Massachusetts for expecting a verdict in his favor. As the Independent says, “A penalty which forbids a man to be spoken to, or any business done with him, and whose purpose is to make him an outlaw and starve him, is in tolerable in this generation."

Hearsay Evidence.

A LOWELL, Mass., journal of recent date, mentions the arrest of four citizens of that place for playing cards "on the Lord's day." The complaint drawn up against them specified as follows:—

"That on the Lord's day you did severally take part in a certain game, to wit, a game of cards, the name of said game being to your complainant unknown, then and there played on the said Lord's day, the same not being then and there a concert of sacred music or an entertainment given by a religious or charitable society, the proceeds of which, if any, are to be devoted exclusively to a charitable or religious purpose."

Does the court in this case know that the day on which the offense was committed—Sunday—is the Lord's day? Is it a judge itself of religious questions? No; it does not claim to be, but on this point it takes the word of the church. But what right has it to take the word of the church? By its own rules of evidence, it is bound to investigate the alleged fact itself, and take cognizance of it as a fact, if it exists; and not take the word of some other party for it. That is only "hearsay evidence." The court might just as well take the statement of some person that the accused parties are guilty, as being a fact, without investigating the charge itself, as to accept as a fact the church's assertion that a certain day is the "Lord's day," without which the case against the accused persons would have fallen to the ground.

We would not defend card-playing; but prosecutions for gambling should rest upon some other ground than that of "profaning the Lord's day."

An Ominous Proposition.

THE doctrine of American imperialism does not need a season's growth to begin bearing fruit. The idea is now suggested that as we will have need for a large army of trained soldiers, the public schools should be utilized to give military instruction and drill to the young boys of the land, which would fit them to become trained soldiers in a short time when a large army might be needed. On this point a New York daily prints the following, under the heading, "Schools as Nurseries of Soldiers":—

"Our experience in the late war has shown the need for military training in this country in time of peace—not for a vast standing army on the European scale, but for such instruction as shall create a foundation on which, in case of need, an effective force may be built.

"What better agency can we find for this work than the public schools? The millions of pupils now under instruction there are already subject to discipline. They are at an impressionable age. It would be a simple matter to give them a military training that would enable the Government, in case of need, to call upon any number of effective soldiers, as useful on their first day of active service as raw volunteers would be after three months' licking into shape.

"Those pupils who displayed a special aptitude for military life could enter West Point, which could be made a great university for the higher instruction of the martial elite of the nation. It would furnish all the skilled officers we should need in time of war, while at other times those graduates not needed in the peace establishment would be well fitted to succeed in civil life.

"The military training now given in a number of colleges and universities is a good beginning, but we need something more. Let us rest our system of defense on the hard foundation of the public schools."

When the nation starts out on the road which has been traveled by the nations of Europe, it can only be expected that it will ere long experience the conditions under which those nations are sinking to day.

"Interpreting" Scripture.

A READER of the Outlook, edited by Dr. Lyman Abbott, having applied to the latter for an explanation of the statement in Num. 22:28, that Balaam's ass spoke certain words to Balaam, received this answer:—

"The story on its face relates the strange experience of a heathen soothsayer, and may be wholly legendary. Or it may have a basis of fact, since dumb animals often speak to us in their dumb way, and we understand them as well as if they had uttered human speech. If the ass spoke at all, she certainly spoke ass fashion. St. Peter's authority used to be invoked for the belief that she used human speech (2 Pet. 2:16). But scholars generally agree that that epistle is an anonymous work of the post-apostolic age."

This is "interpreting" Scripture; that is, it is making the Scripture mean something different from what it says. It is only upon the theory that the Scripture does not mean what it says that the idea rests that it needs to be interpreted. And this idea having been handed down by tradition to the religious world of to-day, the people think it necessary to seek to some one in a position of "authority" to find out what the Scripture means. This is one of the greatest and most dangerous delusions of the times.

The Scripture is the Word of God to man. And whoever will allow that God had the ability to say what he meant to say, and the honesty to mean what he said, and then will observe the common-sense rule of going to the author of a statement to inquire its meaning if any doubt exists, instead of to some one else, will have no trouble about an understanding of the Word of God.

It is almost needless to add that such treatment of the Word of God as is given it in this instance, by one who claims to be a Christian teacher, only strengthens the hands of those who rail at Christianity and make sport of its adherents. Any person who believes that the Bible is a compilation of legends, or of "anonymous works," or in any other way is not what it claims to be, or that it does not mean what it says, can be consistent and honest only by openly joining the ranks of those who repudiate it altogether. There is no middle ground between faith and unbelief.

Vitality of Superstition.

It is a fact of which there is abundant proof that the "light of the nineteenth century" has had little or no effect in destroying the germ—so to speak—of popular superstitions. Superstition in its various forms flourishes to-day to a greater extent, probably, than at any time since the Dark Ages. In an article by Daniel G. Brinton, in the September Century, on "Popular Superstitions in Europe," the author says:—

"From some strange reason, there has been a wonderful revival within the last decade of nearly every medieval superstition, under various guises, in the most enlightened centers of the world. Palmistry, astrology, sympathetic magic, the doctrine of signatures, hydrotherapeutics, and all the farrago of fifteenth-century thaumaturgy, flourish to day in Boston and New York, in Paris and Chicago, to a degree surpassing anything known three centuries ago."

But the reason for this revival is not so strange as the writer assumes. For superstition is essentially a religious manifestation, and wanes only where religious light increases. And religious light is not increasing, because Christian truth is shunned by the carnal mind.

A CATHOLIC priest of Buffalo recently distinguished himself creditably by writing a book attacking the practice of some Dominican monks in Pennsylvania who were running a brewery in connection with their monastery; the book being entitled, "Monks and Their Decline." Now the papal authorities have placed his work upon the "Index" of prescribed books.

THE president of the newly-elected Japanese Diet is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and other representatives of Christianity are now in high political positions in that country.

THE casualties of the war with Spain, from the official records of the War Department, as far as completed, were 264 killed in battle. Of these 33 were officers and 231 enlisted men. The figures apply to the losses in the Philippines, Cuba, and Porto Rico. The percentage of officers killed is said to be unprecedented in the battles of the world.

CHRISTIANITY repairs, but war only tears down. Christianity tears nothing down without erecting something better in its place.

The War of Principle.—No. 2.

"If I mistake not," said Aleck, "the god of this world is Mars. His name and his nature is war. The children of disobedience are his children, and unless they are regenerated they are the children of the devil, and the lusts of their father they will do. He was a murderer from the beginning, said Christ. This proves the god of this world a god of war. Christ came to make men peace-makers by imparting to them the peace nature."

"Then how is it, Aleck," said Cecil, "that he says, 'I came not to send peace on the earth but a sword.' Does he not then make himself responsible for war?"

"His sword is his Word. The weapons of our warfare are not carnal. His Word brings on the war, not because there is war in his Word, but because it carries with it the divine nature, and those who are born of this incorruptible seed are the objects of Satan's hate and of the world's. The war comes not from the peace-making side. It is as if a lamb suddenly fell into a den of wolves. You know where the attack comes from?"

"No, no, Aleck; Christianity did not simply walk about as a blameless lamb in the midst of wolves; but it was aggressive. History gives us proof of a positive character. Not speaking of the crusades, remember how the early disciples entered homes, and broke up the unity of the family, went into communities, and disturbed the social equilibrium. Why did not the Christians let the wolves alone in their happy dens?"

"Happy! Do you call the world happy at the time when the gates of Janus were closed? Slavery, poverty, crime, infamy, misery, and ignorance were everywhere. It was pity for man's lost condition that led Christ and his followers to the aggression you deplore. They went not with carnal weapons. Their armory was love. Wherever they went blessing and light followed. The despairing began to hope, the faithless rejoiced, and though they were cast out, persecuted, and ostracized, they counted their afflictions light."

"After all I can't see why this aggression had to be brought in when the temple of Janus was closed. If your reformers had given the world time, given them education, and such arts as come with peace, this separation among men need not have been."

"Ah, Cecil, these men were not reformers. They came offering a new life to men, a new lineage, a new country. Paul was once of your opinion, and consented to the death of Stephen. He went everywhere haling men and women to prison. He was enraged at the aggression of the Christians, whose doctrines did break up families and disturb society; but when he himself saw the heavenly vision, when he looked on the Lamb of God, he became more aggressive than any of them. He no longer held the traditions of the fathers in such reverence; but counted everything loss save Jesus Christ.

"Athens was then in the enjoyment of peace. The culture, the arts, the polity that this world gives in its most favorable times, was there. Surely if there was a spot on earth to be left in quietness it was Athens. But underneath all the quiet, æsthetic exterior, throbbed the unsatisfied heart of humanity. Paul felt it. Looking round the Pantheon crowded with the images of their gods, he sees their dumb anguish. Vainly they have striven to portray the true God. Suddenly he comes to an altar reared to 'The unknown God.' Here was a challenge. Could he go away filled with their longing, having a knowledge of that unknown God, and be just—to himself, to them, or his God? O, no, Cecil, you can see that this called for an avowal of the truth, and he said to them, 'Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.'

"Had you left the world to its Janus-closed gates, you would have left it to a mere mask of peace, while beneath, the heart of humanity would have groaned for God. It is this pathetic pleading of the heart that so moves all the resources of infinite love. There are thousands to-day who are ignorantly worshiping the unknown God. Shall those who know him refuse to declare him, because it will make a division in some family whose Janus-gates seem closed? Ah, Cecil, the peace that exists there is as superficial as it was at Rome."

"At any rate it is smothered and covered. But when persons are converted, they seem all out of joint with other folks."

"Yes. 'Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world,' said Christ. Certainly they join themselves to a spiritual kingdom, and are no longer citizens of this world."

"That is just what I object to," said Cecil. "Whenever you begin to preach what you call 'distinctive principles,' you break into the peace of society, and I can not help looking upon you as disturbers. I sympathize with the men who said, 'These men who turn the world upside down are come hither also.'"

"Well, Cecil, I hope you may also realize that these men who have turned the world upside down, seeming out of joint with its ways, have also been the salt of the earth, the preservers of society, the salvation of the faithful."

"Very well, Aleck, I hope I shall see the truth."

Studies in French History.—41.

THE study of the history of any country is apt to consist quite largely of the study of the lives of its leading men. This is especially true of French history, for the people having been so long ruled by a king, the principles of loyalty were a part of their very nature, so that as the lives of the people were so closely blended with that of their king, the life story of the latter would be almost the history of the former.

"Of what king were we speaking last?" asked Professor Carman, adjusting his glasses with a kindly smile, and glancing over his little group to see that there were none absent.

"Of Henry II., said Max Smith, promptly, "I remembered, 'cause I have an uncle Henry."

"What was his father's name?"

"Francis I., King of the Gentlemen," said Julia March, with a hasty glance at her note book.

"Yes; and Henry would have done much better if he had heeded his dying father's advice. He begged his young son to do all in his power to make it easier for the poor people by lessening the taxes. Then there was a man in banishment, named Montmorenci, and the king being fearful of his influence in the kingdom asked his son that he be not recalled to the country. He also regarded the family of Guise as a continual menace to the kingdom, and he advised Henry to look out for him."

"I should really think he would pay a little attention to his dying father's requests," said Milly Brown.

"Well, but he did not; as soon as he became king, he hastened to do the very things which his father begged him not to do. At this time, the heavy tax on salt, the gabelle tax—Philip of Valois first imposed this—was so severe a burden to the poor that they rebelled against it. So the banished Montmorenci was recalled to France, and given the task of quelling the uprising, which he at once proceeded to do in a cruel manner. Then, also, the Guise family, already claiming too much power, were encouraged and favored in every way."

"Was the Duke of Guise a good man?" asked Julia March.

"I think he was quite too fond of power, Julia, to have been a good man, but he was certainly at this time a very popular man in France. Directly after he was made lieutenant-general, he took the strongly fortified city of Calais, which had been in English possession for two centuries, in only eight days."

"This must have provoked the English a trifle," commented practical Jack.

"It did; and the English Queen Mary felt so badly at the French victory that she said that the word 'Calais' would be found written on her heart when she died."

"Of course the duke must have been a great favorite after such a victory," said Max Smith.

"Certainly; and then his niece, Mary, Queen of Scots, married King Henry's son—the young dauphin, about the same time, which added still more to the duke's fame.

THE selfish child is the father of a tyrant.

"By this time, Charles V., Emperor of Germany and King of Spain, was dead, and his son Philip II., took his place. Philip's wife was the Queen of England, and as the English were so sore over the loss of Calais, he knew that he would get no help from them against his old enemy, the King of France; so, like silly children, quarrelling one minute and kissing the next, the two kings of France and Spain decided to cement a compact of peace which they had entered into, by a wedding. By this time Philip's English queen-wife had died, and he proposed to marry Henry's daughter, Elizabeth."

"Well, I declare!" exclaimed Milly Brown. "His old enemy is his new father-in-law! I hope they had peace in the family after that."

"The fact is, Milly, the father-in-law didn't live long enough to quarrel with his son-in-law after the wedding. He was killed by a splinter entering his eye as he was riding in a grand tournament."

"Poor fellow! I wonder how many true mourners he had," said Julia March.

"Not many, Julia, not many," sighed her teacher. He had added his name to the obnoxious list of French kings whose chief object seems to have been to increase the misery of this poor people by unjust taxes and cruel oppression. He died in the year 1559.

"At the time of his death there were two great parties in France—the Protestant Reformers, who now began to be called Huguenots, and the Catholics. The leader of the former was the King of Navarre, named Antony de Bourbon, and of the latter, the Duke of Guise. We have not mentioned much lately about the progress of the Reformation, but you see it was not dying out, although persecutions and horrors had continually blocked its onward march. The most dreadful tortures were in vogue in the reign of Henry's father, and things were in no better shape now. The poor Protestants were suspended in the air and slow fires built under them, and they were left to slowly roast to death. You see when Spain and France made their treaty of peace, an article was added—the work of two cardinals—which was kept a secret from the people, to the effect that France and Spain were to work unitedly in the work of exterminating the hated Protestants. These poor hunted people at last rose in their anger and became a political as well as a religious people. Of course this led to a horrible civil war."

"I don't think the country could have been in a very nice condition when the next king took the throne," commented Harry Ray.

"No, indeed; when poor Francis II., son of Henry II., took the reins, he was indeed to be pitied. It must not be expected that a feeble youth of sixteen would do better than his predecessors. He was simply king in name; for he did exactly what his advisers asked him to do—persecute the Huguenots to their death."

"Do you think it exactly right for the Protestants to have added politics to their religion, and to have gone to war?" asked practical Jack.

"What do you think about it, Joseph?" asked his teacher. Joe Palmeter's eyes grew very bright, and his cheek flushed, as he answered earnestly:—

"Christ said, 'I say unto you that ye resist not evil.'"

"But I tell you, Joe Palmeter," said Bert Mathews, "it isn't so easy to be tortured and burned and hunted—and everything—I guess you'd want to pay them back; I would."

"But," replied the teacher, "the Master says, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay.'"

"At last," continued Professor Carman, "the weak king passed a law that the churches belonging to the opposite faith should be destroyed. Then they formed a committee whose special business it was to condemn heretics to be burned, and the place where they met was called 'The burning chamber.'"

"It hardly seems possible that this took place only a little more than 300 years ago," said Julia March, shuddering.

"True, Julia, but it was only the same spirit which in our own day rejoices in the imprisonment of honest men, simply on account of religious differences,—and it is the spirit of the enemy of all righteousness," replied the teacher.

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

God's Care for his Children.

[The following incident which is narrated in the Youth's Companion, ought to be very instructive to people who think that Christian missionaries are dependent for protection upon the power of the state.]

THE incident of St. Paul and the viper, and the stories of Zinzendorf and Brainerd and their serpent visitors, are read by every one with a thrill of interest always felt where a human life is at stake. We can imagine the effect upon those who were eyewitnesses of the facts, and saw these men escape without a wound.

Near the middle of the last century David Brainerd left his mission among the Indians at Stockbridge, Mass., and travelled southward to the "forks of the Delaware." He had heard of a savage tribe in the heart of the New Jersey forests, and yearned to bring them under Christian influences.

With his pocket-Bible, his tent cloth and a few simple utensils for preparing his food strapped in a bundle on his back, he pushed on through the wilderness till he found himself in the neighborhood of the Indian village. He was tired, and mounting his shelter-tent on sticks, he camped under the trees to rest and fortify himself for the new undertaking that lay before him. What peril was near him from savage hands he could not know, and like his Master in "a solitary place apart," he talked with Heaven until he felt refreshed and strong.

When he finally reached their wigwams, he was an astonished man. His faith and hope had made him bold, but he little expected when he faced the enemies of his race that a "whole village" would come out to meet him as if he had been a long-looked-for friend. Led by their chief, the Indians welcomed him as their guest, and seemed almost to reverence him as a prophet. He stayed among them and preached, winning the hearts and the faith of the untutored natives, until he gathered a church of between seventy and eighty Christian Indians.

Brainerd never knew, until they told him, the secret of his welcome. The savages had discovered the white stranger in the woods, and a party of them had waited to steal upon him and kill him as soon as he entered his tent. Peering between the folds of the canvas, they saw him on his knees, praying.

Ignorant wonder held them back, and their wonder turned to awe when they saw a rattlesnake crawl over the stranger's feet and pause beside him, with its head raised as if to strike; but it only gazed at him a moment, flickered its red tongue, and glided out of the tent on the opposite side. The Indians hurried back and reported that the white man was under the protection of the Great Spirit.

However much the superstition of these "children of nature" influenced their thought, they told a Christian truth in pagan version. It is certain that "Man is immortal till his work is done," and God had work for Brainerd to do.

A POLITICAL HISTORY

Of the great questions culminating in the CIVIL WAR in the words of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and STEPHEN A. DOUGLASS.

555 Pages.

Cloth $1.75.

The work is entitled "Political Debates and Speeches of Lincoln and Douglas," and contains a complete report of their speeches and debates. The burning words of these great orators are of absorbing interest both to those who have lived through the exciting scenes pictured out, and those who know them merely as history. There can be nothing better placed in the hands of the rising generation than a book presenting, in an attractive way, the principles on which this government is founded. Efforts are now being made to overthrow those principles, hence it is important that we become intelligent regarding them. The work is a great assistance to that end.

BOOK : OF : GENESIS.

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 13—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall, and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 6, 1898.

AN effort is being made to secure Sunday closing of all business places in Ashtabula, Ohio. Two arrests have been made, the victims being the proprietor of a candy store and the owner of a news stand. It is expected that the cases will be carried higher than the local courts.

ARMOR is of no advantage to an individual when it is so heavy that he cannot move beneath it; and this is the situation that is fast being reached by the nations of Europe. Their heavy armaments are simply crushing the life out of them, yet they feel bound to go on adding to their weight.

IN Georgia, recently, says the Pittsburg Catholic, a lower court decided that marriages contracted on Sunday were illegal and void, Sunday being in that State a dies non. The case was appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed the verdict, on the ground that Sunday laws regulate only "ordinary employment," and hence did not apply to a marriage ceremony.

TAKING advantage of the permission given to erect church buildings on the Government grounds at West Point, the Roman Catholics have applied for and received their permit from the Secretary of War, and will begin work at once toward the erection of a substantial church; and now the Campbellite and Methodist churches are preparing to follow suit. In time, if the Secretary of War is as fair with one denomination as with another, the traveler coming in sight of this military reservation may think he is coming into a collection of churches.

IN Philadelphia preparations are being made to celebrate this month a "Peace Jubilee," in commemoration of the cessation of hostilities with Spain. President McKinley has promised to be present. We trust the expectations which underlie this celebration will not be disappointed. It would be well if the people would realize, however, that internal peace—peace between the classes of society—means far more to the country than international peace. The conflict at Pana, Ill., is of more serious import to this country than was any battle of the war with Spain.

DR. PARKHURST, the reformer, is much disappointed in Colonel Roosevelt, because the latter has gone over to "boss" Platt. Mr. Platt's career, he says, has been one of deliberate treason to the best interests of this city, of the State, and of the country; and now that his trusted friend in reform has joined with the "boss," he will not support him for governor and has no more use for him. Dr. Parkhurst's dream about purifying politics is rudely dissipated; but what else had he a right to expect? The sooner Dr. Parkhurst and the other preacher politicians find out that they are not "in it" with the "boss" and the political machine, and cease to try to promote morality by manipulating politics, the fewer disappointments they will meet and the better it will be for society.

THERE is not much prospect, it seems, of a speedy understanding between the Spanish and American commissioners who have met in Paris to arrange terms of peace. Spain wants the United States to retain only a coaling station in the Philippines, allowing Spain to dispose of the islands as she sees fit, and to assent that Cuba shall bear the Cuban debt. These propositions are regarded in this country as being preposterous, and it is asserted that the United States will insist on retaining the island of Luzon, in the Philippines, and will forbid the sale of other islands of the group to any European power. Also that this Government will refuse to be responsible in any way for a single penny of the Cuban debt, or to allow the debt to be put upon the Cubans.

THERE is a momentary lull in the great national scandal of France, but fresh disclosures are promised shortly. The Sun, of this city, says:—

"The next exposures will be such as might tempt any ambitious foreign power to take advantage of the weakness and infamy of those upon whom France relies for her defense. But, fortunately, there is little reason to fear an attack from the quarter whence the French themselves believe it is most likely to come.

"The story, when told, will be an appalling object lesson on the moral effect upon those most concerned of the modern system of keeping great nations constantly on a war footing. I put it in this form because it is impossible to believe that the men who control and direct the national defense are natural scoundrels, conspirators, and criminals. Evidence is not wanting, in fact, that similar perversions of moral sense are not absent from other military cabinets on the continent."

And it is to be hoped that this "appalling object lesson" will be heeded by the United States, before this nation proceeds so far upon the road of militarism as to fall a victim to similar evils.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 13, 1898.

NUMBER 40.

THE State can proclaim no gospel but the "gospel of force."

the United States, have lost sight of God in the constitution of all creation.

THE mere opinions of some people, in their own view, outweigh other people's rights.

A RELIGION which seeks to erect a despotism among men, is not the religion of Jesus Christ.

THERE can no more be such a thing as Christian civil government, than there can be an American Frenchman.

THE "Christian statesman" of the present day is a person who is too intolerant to be a Christian, and too ignorant to be a statesman.

THE "God" which religious zealots will put into the Constitution, if their plans succeed, will be a god of their own make.

THE zealots who are striving to enact religious legislation in this land, want to blot out the Declaration of Independence, and declare the dependence of the rest of the people upon themselves.

THERE will be no harm in the schemes of the moral reform-by-law party if they will wait for the Lord to make known his will in the matter through some other channel than themselves.

MANY people who claim to be the spiritual descendants of Abraham, seem to have quite forgotten that the father of the faithful was only a stranger and pilgrim on this earth.

THE people who want God put in the Constitution of

THERE can be no reform by denying justice.

MAKING ROOM IN THE CONSTITUTION TO "PUT GOD INTO IT."

THE scheme to "put God in the Constitution," which is being urged upon Congress and the American people at every opportunity, means that the Constitution shall declare the will of God to be the fundamental law of the land. This would throw the question of what the will of God is, into the courts, and human interpretations of the law of God would become binding upon all citizens. And this would disfranchise and outlaw all disbelievers in the religious doctrines which might thus become established, and the persecution of religious dissenters would be revived. Congress would be no longer bound to "make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," but would be bound to do quite the contrary. Equality of citizens before the law would no longer exist, and justice would no longer be secured by the Constitution to the people.

Imperial America and Imperial Rome.

ROME became imperial when the fabric of the Roman republic fell to pieces. Imperialism came not upon Rome by chance; it came never by chance upon any country. Imperial Rome came because the Roman republic fell to pieces; and the republic fell to pieces because the capacity for self-government had become lost in the Roman people.

Whenever the capacity for self-government is lost by any people, republican government is with them no longer possible, and imperialism no longer avoidable.

The last days of the Roman republic were marked by the division of society into two opposing classes,—the rich, and the poor. It was marked by the elimination of the middle class—that bodyguard of republican government, holding the balance of power between the social extremes. This class of the people being eliminated, there was nothing to check the struggle between poverty and wealth, which went on continuously. The rich obtained their riches by the most unscrupulous use of power, and the poor were held in poverty by the unscrupulous exercise of the power of wealth. And the poor became possessed of the idea that the state owed them a living, and preferred to depend for a living upon the state, rather than to make vigorous efforts to help themselves.

The political atmosphere was full of the questions to which the struggle between wealth and poverty gives rise. There was the land question; the land was passing from the hands of the people into the control of monopolists, who tilled it by gangs of slaves. Monopoly enabled the man of wealth to shut out competition, just as it does to-day; and the poor land-holder, not being able to compete with the slave owner, became discontented and preferred the life of the city. The people flocked to the cities, and the transfer of their lands to the monopolists, and of themselves to the centres of wealth and political power, only made more unstable the trembling equilibrium of the government.

There was urgent need of purification in politics. The word had become the synonym of corruption. Political power meant the money to buy votes, and the voter was as ready to sell his vote as the politician was to buy it. Public offices were bought and public officials of all ranks were open to bribery. Everywhere gold outweighed justice and a feather outweighed crime.

Industry had dwindled in its meaning until it signified only the pursuit of money. This was the all-absorbing craze among all classes. The poor man sold his vote for money, and the rich man bought it in order that he might use its power to get wealth. There was a general eagerness to get rich, and to get rich without hard work. Immense fortunes were acquired at a bound by the unscrupulous use of the power of political office. The man who had bribed his way to the position of governor of a province, although he went to his new field heavily in debt came back in two or three years with a fortune which excited the envy and dazzled the judgment of his humbler fellows. The successful adventurer, no matter what his maxims and methods, became an example to be copied if possible.

Another feature that marked the decay of the republic was the development of the innate tendency of human nature to want to get something for nothing. This was a marked feature of life in the large cities. People who were without money wanted to be supported by the state. The conception of the state as a paternal entity endowed with unlimited capacity to support the people had become widespread. From the public granaries, grain was supplied to the indigent populace at a nominal price, while they were entertained at shows provided at state expense. This was the regime which the people preferred to self-support and self-government. They put their dependence upon that which, apart from the people, was nothing but a name; and of course, the fancied support soon failed. The republic was all the time sinking lower into the sea of anarchy and despotism.

Yet at this time Rome as a political division of the earth was rising to the zenith of her power. Her legions, under the leadership of renowned warriors, were sweeping all before them to the extreme limits of the known world. The prowess exhibited abroad gave no hint of the weakness that was a reality at home. But the power of the army was not the power of the republic; it was in reality the power of despotism. This the Romans finally perceived; this, in her own case, the French republic is perceiving to-day; and this the United States will perceive when this republic shall have become the great military power which it now aspires and is planning to be.

Such was Rome in the last days of the republic. And all this was because the people themselves, individually, had lost the capacity for self-government. The principle had become corrupted within them, and this individual corruption was the disease which manifested itself in upheavals in the affairs of state. And the remedies proposed and tried were only to cure the symptoms and not the disease itself; and when at last the would-be liberators of their country performed the desperate deed which removed from the Roman stage the imperial figure of Julius Cæsar, the imperialism within the republic went on unchecked. New and worse symptoms of the disease speedily appeared in the place of those that had been eliminated; new Cæsars far more despotic and cruel succeeded to the throne of the first.

And who that has thoughtfully and candidly observed the trend of affairs in the American Republic to-day can fail to discern the same waning of the power of self-government, the same symptoms developing, if yet less advanced, which marked the last days of the republic of Rome? Knowing these, we may be assured what in the natural course of events, will be the end.

The Power of Christianity.

THE Church of Christ was not designed to be a powerless thing in the midst of the powers of earth. Of Christians it is said by the divine Word that one shall "chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight." All Christians, at least, recognize that this statement is truth.

This is the power which God has designed for his followers here. Through them he would make his power known to the world, and to do this—to reveal himself as the Supreme One to whom all the world should look for salvation—he would endue his children with a power vastly greater than any that is known to the world. For in all the world was there never known such a thing as that one person, with any power supplied by the world, turned back a thousand of his adversaries, or that two put ten thousand to flight. But the great conflict between truth and righteousness on the one hand, and error and iniquity on the other, reveals many a scene where one man, standing in the strength of God, has discomfited a host of his enemies. Often in that conflict has the truth appeared that one individual, on the side of God, is in the majority.

And yet, notwithstanding this which God has plainly revealed to the church, and which Christians profess to believe, the church wants to express her power through politics! In politics, where at best she can only measure vote for vote with the world, and where she is hopelessly outnumbered by the world, the church would convince the world of the power of the kingdom of God! Think of it, and think how hopeless and complete must be her failure!

"Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord." This is the way God himself has chosen to make his power known in the world by his church. And politics is the way the church has chosen! Where at the polls did one vote ever offset a thousand, or two Christian voters put ten thousand of the worldly to flight?

What the church needs to-day is not politics, but purification. Not the purification of politics, but the purification of the church, is the thing that will supply the church with power. And that purification will come, as surely as there is a God in heaven who has undertaken to save men by his power. That power must be made known among men, and it will be. And then will the church of the living God arise and the world will behold her—though but a Gideon's band, it may be—"fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

Sophistry and Its Fruit.

CHURCH participation in politics has this defense from the late Cardinal Manning:—

"Why should the Holy Father touch any matter in politics at all? For the plain reason, because politics are a part of morals. Politics are morals on the widest scale."

That is the plea by which every church and every individual professor of religion justify their participation in politics. The plea is equally good for one and all.

And this plea seems all right in itself; but its fruit is bad, and the tree is known by its fruit, and not by its appearance. The early church went into politics, and the result was, the establishment of the papacy. Had the church kept aloof from politics, no such thing as the papacy could ever have been.

And wherever the church—the papal or any other—has participated in politics, and has had the power to mold the political situation to her liking, there has been persecution and oppression to her religious opponents. There has been a likeness of the papacy, if not the thing itself. The papal church does not stand alone in history as a persecutor and oppressor of the people. That church is the mother of persection; but she has had numerous daughters.

It is not true that "politics are morals on the widest scale." Morals are presented on the widest scale in the law of God,—the commandments which are described by the psalmist as "exceeding broad." Politics are the science of civil government—that government which is suited to selfish people. But the law of God is the rule of divine government—the only government in which selfishness does not appear. Where no selfishness is, no other government but the divine one can be possible. And no other than this can harmonize with Christianity.

Human Authority.

By Bishop Hoadly.

It is the greatest and most irreconcilable enemy to truth and argument that this world ever furnished. All the sophistry, all the color of plausibility, all the artifice and cunning of the subtlest disputer in the world may be laid open and turned to the advantage of that very truth which they are designed to hide; but against authority there is no defense. It was authority which crushed the noble sentiments of Socrates and others; by authority the Jews and heathen combatted the truth of the gospel; and when Christians increased into a majority and came to think the same method to be the only proper one for the advantage of their cause, which had been their enemy and destroyer of it, then it was the authority of Christians which, by degrees, not only laid waste the honor of Christianity, but well nigh extinguished it among men. It was authority which would have prevented all reformation where it is, and which has put a barrier against it wherever it is not.

What the Churches Teach Officially, Regarding the Observance of Sunday.—2.

BY CHARLES E. BUELL.

THE confession of the Swiss government churches declares in the most simple terms that which is held by all government churches:—

"The observance of the 'Lord's day' is founded not on any command of God, but on the authority of the church; and the church may alter the day at pleasure."—Cox's Sabbath Laws, p. 287.

This was the thought expressed by Tyndale in his reply to Sir Thomas Moore. He says:—

"And as for the Sabbath, a great matter, we be lords over the Sabbath, and may yet change it into Monday, or any other day if needs be, or may make every tenth day holy day, or we may make two every week if it were expedient . . . neither was there any cause to change it from the Saturday other than to put a difference between us and the Jews; nor need we any holy day at all, if the people might be taught without it."—Lewis, Hist. of Sunday Legislation, p. 274.

The State Church of Prussia, which is a union of Lutheran and Reformed elements, holds to the Augsburg Confession for its rule of practice in Sunday observance.

Among the evangelical churches, probably the largest of the denominational families throughout the world, is the Lutheran. Their system of faith and practice is founded on the Augsburg Confession, and this says concerning the observance of Sunday, that it is not necessary nor need any one feel that they commit sin if they violate the regulation concerning it; and it states in italics:—

"Those who suppose that the ordinance concerning Sunday instead of the Sabbath is enacted as necessary are greatly mistaken."—Augsburg Confession p. 40 (Lutheran Pub. Society, Philadelphia).

There ought to be some explanation for publishing an ordinance and then clearly and emphatically stating that it is not necessary.

There is another statement of vast import, made in connection with the preceding. It is: "Neither the Sabbath nor any other day is necessary."

The Augsburg Confession was formulated by a convention at Augsburg, Germany, during the reign of the Roman Catholic monarch, Charles the Fifth. This document was signed by John, Elector of Saxony; George, Earl of Brandenburg, and five other princes, and by the Senates of Nuremburg, and of Reutlingen, as appears in the printed copy.

The adherence of the princes and civil rulers to the Lutherans may have accounted for the stringent measures which the Roman Catholic monarch enacted, evidently to check the growth of the seemingly rival church.

In the Quaker publication, "An Apology, etc.," by Robert Barclay (Friend's Publishing House, Phila., p. 375), it is stated that while the convention which formulated the Confession, was in session at Augsburg, Charles the Fifth commanded that John, Elector of Saxony, should be present at mass, and carry the sword before the monarch, as was his office to do. "Which, when he scrupled to perform, his preachers, taking more care for their prince's honor than for his conscience, persuaded him that it was lawful to do it against his conscience, which was both a very bad example and a great scandal to the reformation, as the author of the history of the Council of Trent, in his first book well observes."

It is evident that the Lutheran clergy were timid in the face of the conflict which would have arisen if the Elector of Saxony had disobeyed the command of the monarch; and there is the secret of the publishing of the ordinance for the observing of Sunday, and with it the statement that it is not necessary to observe it—the timidity of the clergy—who, shrinking from a persecution, smothered the very conscience, rejected the Sabbath sanctified by Jehovah, and bowing to the armies of Romish rulers, went through the formalities of observing the pagan day. The same spirit which prompted the statement, "Neither the Sabbath nor any other day is necessary," has so far prevented a return to "the old paths," a return which would have proved a blessing to the millions of Lutherans throughout the world.

The Society of Friends—Quakers—early discarded the designated Sabbath of the fourth commandment of the Decalogue, and while having no reverence for Sunday, for convenience, and to avoid the persecution which confronted those who openly neglected Sunday observance, in the early days of their organization, kept the pagan day to the extent of resting and conducting worship thereon.

In "The Doctrine of Friends," by Elisha Bates, pp. 249–250, quoting from Barclay's "Apology, etc.," prop. 11, the views of the Quakers are set forth:—

"The Society of Friends believe that 'the holy days,' 'new moons,' and 'Sabbath days,' observed under the law, were shadows of things to come, and ceased with the shadowy dispensation. . . . An improper veneration of days, and other shadows of the legal dispensation appears to have been a snare, into which professing Christians were early betrayed. . . . Thus, as a Jewish rite, its obligation ceased, and its observance became dangerous. . . . As a society we have never objected to a day of rest. . . . A day of rest when by common consent the business of the world is suspended, is peculiarly favorable to the important object of social worship, without which religious society would lack one of those connecting bonds which hold it together.

"For these and other reasons which might be assigned, we freely concur in setting apart the first day of the week as a day of rest, to be devoted to public worship. . . . Nor do we think proper to call it the Lord's day. Every day is alike his. . . . We, not seeing any ground in Scripture for it, cannot be so superstitious as to believe that either the Jewish Sabbath now continues, or that the first day of the week is the antitype thereof, or the true Christian Sabbath; which with Calvin we believe to have a more spiritual sense; and therefore we know no moral obligation by the fourth commandment, or elsewhere, to keep the first day of the week more than any other, or any inherent holiness in it."

The Vermont Sabbath Law.

BY GEO. B. WHEELER.

IN the Declaration of Rights, in the constitution of Vermont, article 3, it is declared, "All men have a natural an inalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences and understandings, as in their opinion shall be regulated by the Word of God." . . . "No authority can, or ought to be vested in, or assumed by, any power whatever, that shall in any case interfere with, or in any manner control the rights of conscience, in the free exercise of religious worship."

It is plainly stated here, that every man's right to regulate his worship of God, in accordance with his opinion of the requirements of the Word of God, is a natural and inalienable one. That is, a right that no power is justified in taking away from him. And this is further emphasized by denying that any authority or power whatever has any right to interfere with or control it.

Yet, notwithstanding this clear statement of the Declaration of Rights of the State of Vermont, there is on the statute books of the State a Sabbath law, which, under the head of "An Act in Relation to Sabbath-breaking," prohibits all citizens of the State from engaging in any business or employment, excepting works of necessity or charity, or engaging in any game, sport, play, or amusement upon Sunday, the first day of the week.

This decides a controverted point as to which day is the Sabbath, and denies to the people of the State a right that is declared by its constitution to be "a natural and inalienable" one,—to follow the dictates of their own consciences, and their own opinion of what the Word of God teaches as to which day is the Sabbath.

While the constitution declares that "every sect or denomination of Christians ought to observe the Sabbath or Lord's day," it does not designate which day is the Sabbath or Lord's day, nor does it lay the obligation upon any but Christians.

It is true that a large majority of the Christian people of the State regard the first day of the week as the Sabbath or the Lord's day. It is also true that it was through their influence that the Sabbath laws of the State were made, and it is through their influence that they are at the present time supported. This action on their part recognizes it as just and right, for that part of the religious community that has the greatest influence in the State, to put their interpretation upon one of God's commandments, and then go to the legislature and get power to compel all others regardless of belief, wishes, or interests to conform to it. All persecuting governments in the past have done nothing more than to carry out this principle, and if it is correct, they are justified in their persecutions.

There are in the State of Vermont nearly six hundred Christian people, who have the reputation of being earnest and consistent, who read the Word of God that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God" instead of the first. They also believe that the Word of God teaches that it is wrong to give to any other day than the Sabbath, the sacred character of the Sabbath, by abstaining from both labor and amusements. They also believe that it is wrong to pay fines for exercising their right of opinion, instead of conforming to the opinions of others as to which day is the Sabbath or Lord's day.

The Sabbath laws of Vermont if enforced would place every one of these six hundred Christian people in prison as criminals, for doing what the Declaration of Rights in the constitution of the State declares they have "a natural and inalienable right" to do, in regulating their worship of God in accordance with their own opinion of his requirements.

The Declaration of Rights and the Sabbath law of Vermont directly antagonize each other. If the position of one is true the other is absolutely false, and consistency would demand that either one or the other be abolished.

An examination of the civil reasons that are used to justify Sunday laws will show their fallacy. It is declared that it is for the individual's physical, moral, and social good to rest upon Sunday. Many arguments are used to prove this.

To compel an individual to rest Sunday for his own good, is to take away his right of private judgment in a matter that pertains to his own good, which right lies at the very basis of civil liberty. If it is right to invade that right in one instance, it is right to invade it in others, and so on, until absolutely nothing is left to the individual's own judgment, and all of his rights are taken away.

Ordinary labor and harmless amusements are certainly not criminal in themselves therefore every citizen has the right in accordance with the great principle of liberty upon which this nation was founded, to engage in them whenever it may in his judgment contribute most to his own happiness.

Another reason given for Sunday laws, which compel a cessation from both labor and amusement, is, the claim of those who regard Sunday as a sacred day, to what they term their "right to an undisturbed use of the day for worship."

The fact that on the day these people believe to be sacred other people are engaged in labor or amusements, is not a disturbance of their worship, unless they are disturbed when engaged in the act of worshipping; and as all worshipping congregations are protected by law from disturbance upon all days of the week, it follows that their disturbance is only a mental one that comes from seeing others refusing to conform to their views of the sacred character of the day. This reason is not a valid one unless it is recognized that the Government has the right to protect individuals from a religious mental disturbance, which comes from seeing others refusing to conform to their religious belief. Conformity to religious belief was all that was ever asked for by persecuting governments.

Chief Justice Ruffin, of the Supreme Court of North Carolina (State vs. Williams, Iredell, 403), officially acknowledges this, thereby proving the truth of this statement. He says: "The truth is, that it [Sunday labor or amusements] offends us not so much because it disturbs us in practising for ourselves the religious duties, or enjoying the salutary repose or recreation, of that day, as that it is in itself a breach of God's law, and a violation of the party's own religious duty."—American State Papers, p. 61.

Moreover, in accordance with the great principle of equal rights, the majority, however large, have no right to claim rights and privileges which they would refuse to the minority; and the fact that they do not recognize that the minority, who keep another day than Sunday as sacred, have any such right as to demand that all the people in the entire State be compelled to cease from both labor and amusements, so that they may not be disturbed in their worship upon the day that they believe to be sacred, shows that it is something that they have no right to demand for themselves.

Another reason that is given largely for the compulsory cessation of both labor and amusements on Sunday is "the right of the workingman to his day of rest." There must be laws "to prevent Sunday slavery by preventing employers from compelling unwilling employes to labor on Sunday against their will."

The fact is, Sunday laws furnish more than the "right of the workingmen to his day of rest," they take away his civil rights by compelling him to rest whether he wants to or not. If the object was simply to furnish a weekly day of rest for the workingman, and to prevent him from being forced to labor every day in the week for fear of losing his job if he refuses, a simple law would be advocated compelling all employers to give their employes simply a release (not an enforced cessation) from labor, on every seventh day following six days of consecutive labor. This would accomplish the purpose far more effectually than the present Sunday laws, as it would give a day of rest to that great army of employes who are obliged to labor seven days in the week at works of necessity.

Laws that go beyond furnishing the citizen an opportunity to rest, and that make cessation from labor compulsory, are tyrannical in their character, and are a violation of the great American principle of liberty.

The true ground upon which all Sunday legislation rests is not civil, but religious. This is evident to any who will look over the literature upon the subject. The burden of the argument of Sunday law advocates is, that the day is sacred, and therefore ought not to be desecrated. It will be seen from this that the spirit that supports Sunday legislation is the spirit of intolerance; because its advocates cannot tolerate a course of action in others that is not in conformity with their own idea of how a particular day of the week, which they believe to be sacred, ought to be kept.

If it is true, as many claim, that the welfare of the nation depends upon the keeping of Sunday as a sacred day, secured by the power of the state, then the welfare of the nation depends upon an act of intolerance, and the only logic of it is, that other acts of intolerance will be urged upon the nation to further strengthen it; which, indeed, is already being done, and soon we shall be back to the intolerance of the Dark Ages.

The true object of the state so far as religion is concerned, is to protect all persons in all of their religious observances so far as they do not infringe upon the equal rights of their neighbors, and never to uphold the observance of a religious institution, nor the acknowledgment of any religious doctrine.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 7.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE doctrine of the Catholic Church is that tradition is of higher authority than the written Word of God. This was the position taken, as seen last week, in the Council of Trent, 1545–63.

In studying this question it is important to know the exact position of the Council of Trent in relation to the Catholic Church, and this question of Sunday.

The Council of Trent was one of the general or ecumenical councils of the Catholic Church, of which there have been, from A. D. 325 to this time, but nineteen.

From the decision of a general council there can be no appeal. No general council can set aside any doctrine which has been defined by any previous general council.

The reason of this is that, as claimed by the Catholic Church, "A general council, headed by the pope, by reason of its representing the whole church, has the privilege of doctrinal infallibility and supreme authority."—Catholic Belief, chap. 28, p. 123.

"By a general or ecumenical council is understood a council to which the bishops of the world are lawfully summoned for the settling of some important matter, though it is not necessary for the validity of the council that all should attend."—Ibid. "But a council to be ecumenical must be convoked by the pope, or at least with his consent, and be presided over by him, or by his legates. The decisions of such a council must also have his approval."

Being invested with "doctrinal infallibility and supreme authority," it will readily be seen that it is out of the question for one council to change the decrees of any preceding council. In such a case infallibility would render itself fallible; in other words, "infallibility" would show that it is not infallible.

Now why was the general council of Trent convoked? It was for the express purpose of meeting the "errors" of the first Protestants, Luther, Calvin, and others, which were then spreading.

One of the doctrines taught by Luther was that the written Word was the supreme standard of truth. Up to the time of Luther it had never been defined by any general council, whether the Bible alone, or the Bible and tradition, was the standard. This is not saying that the doctrine of the Bible and tradition, as the supreme standard, had not been taught. It is one thing in the Catholic Church to have a thing taught, and quite another thing to have it "defined" by a general council. At the time of the Council of Trent, the Catholic Church could have defined that the Bible alone was the only rule of faith and morals, and the question of her inerrancy before that time would not have been involved.

As a matter of fact at this council, there were quite a number of bishops who were in favor of declaring that the written Word was the only supreme authority; and, as stated last week, it was some time before the matter could be decided; but when the decision came, it was that the Bible and tradition, with tradition the higher authority, was the rule in faith and morals.

When, therefore, the Council of Trent, having the privilege(?) of "doctrinal infallibility and supreme authority," settled this question for the Catholic Church, it was settled for all time. On this question the Catholic Church, so long as it shall exist, cannot change without acknowledging her fallibility.

Now we ask the question, as we asked it last week: What was the ground upon which the question of "the Bible only" or "the Bible and tradition" was "infallibly" settled? There is only one answer possible, and that is—Sunday.

Nor is this all. When the council declared in favor of tradition, it thereby declared that the Catholic Church could not be bound by the authority of the written Word of God; and this being proven(?) by the fact that the church, by its own authority, had changed the Sabbath into Sunday, it is plainly to be seen that the very cornerstone of tradition and the Catholic Church is Sunday.

Just here we quote the words of the archbishop who made the argument: "The Sabbath, the most glorious day of the law, has been merged into the Lord's day. . . . This day and similar institutions have not ceased in consequence of the preaching of Christ (for he says he did not come to destroy the law, but to fulfill it); but yet they have been changed, and that solely by the authority of the church. Now if this authority should be done away with (which would please the heretics very much) who would there be to testify for the truth and to confound the obstinacy of the heretics?"—Canon and Tradition, p. 263.

Now we wish to ask, What does the Catholic Church mean by "tradition"? Upon this point, we quote from "Catholic Belief," p. 15: "By tradition we do not mean a mere report, a hearsay, wanting sufficient evidence to deserve belief; or a local tradition started by man, and therefore merely human, as were those traditions of the Pharisees condemned by our Lord; but we mean a tradition first coming from God, continually taught, recorded, and in all desirable ways kept alive by a body of trustworthy men, successively chosen in a divine, or divinely appointed manner, and well instructed, and who are, moreover, protected by God, as a body, from teaching what is wrong, or handing down unfaithfully to others the doctrine committed to them."

From this it will be seen that tradition, to the Catholic mind, is simply "continuing inspiration." This is made more clear by reading this further statement in the "Catholic Belief:" "Holy Scripture and tradition just described are both the Word of God: the first, inspired by God to some chosen one, who wrote it out; the other, taught by his own divine lips on earth, or inspired by the Holy Spirit in the mind of one man, or body of men, to be continually handed down and perpetuated successively under His divine protection to their legitimate successors; neither, therefore, of these divine words can be rejected without the guilt of unbelief."

From all this we see that right at the beginning of the Reformation, although Protestants contended that the Bible alone was the only rule of faith, they retained the very cornerstone of tradition.

It is plain to be seen, therefore, that at some time in the history of Protestantism its adherents must be brought to the point where they must either give up Sunday, or inevitably sanction the Catholic principle of tradition or continuing inspiration, with all that is involved in it.

There is yet still more to this.

CHRISTIANITY sets before men the ideal of perfect liberty in the path of perfect safety.

THE czar's scheme for a peace congress is reported to be making some headway, insomuch that all the leading nations of Europe are understood to have expressed a willingness to be represented at the gathering. The real difficulties of the undertaking will be met after the congress shall have assembled.

AN Associated Press dispatch mentions an interview had by Mr. W. T. Stead, the English journalist, with a prominent statesman of Belgium, a Catholic, who had just returned from Rome, where he had been in consultation with the pope and the papal secretary of state, Cardinal Rampolla. To the question whether the pope favored religious liberty for the Philippines, the statesman made the honest reply that the pope could not so express himself "without repudiating doctrines affirmed by his predecessors." To declare himself in favor of such liberty now would also raise the query why he did not favor it before the islands passed from the control of Spain.

SENSATIONALISM in religious work is never wise, either from a religious or a business point of view. A London (Eng.) paper relates an incident of Salvation Army work in Neustadt, Germany, which illustrates the point. The Army had advertised an approaching meeting at which, it was stated, they would expose "the greatest liar in Neustadt." The Army referred to the devil; but the police of Neustadt, not fathoming the intended meaning of the words, decided that the language might be aimed at some of the citizens, or that at least some of the citizens might feel that it was, and accordingly the editor of the paper and the captain of the Army were each fined twenty marks—or in default ten days' imprisonment—on the charge of doing what was calculated to create a disturbance.

* * *

THE following item from the Catholic Times, of London, Eng., sets forth the attitude of the papacy towards the Bible, which is seen to be quite the same as it was in the Dark Ages. Speaking of the slaughter of the Khalifa's troops by the English in the Soudan, the Times says:—

"How was it, we may ask, that these sons of the desert, who must have seen that they were fighting for a hopeless cause, threw away their lives so prodigally and seemed positively to court death? Well, many men have been known to prefer death to a fate that was even worse. And there was a worse fate than death in store for the Dervish warriors. The Rev. R. H. Weakley, so we learn from one of our contemporaries, had in store for the 2,000 prisoners of war, after the battle of Atbara, a consignment of Scripture in the vernacular. Luckily, when he came to look for the recipients of his Scriptures, he found that no Baggara had been taken prisoners. They had neither given nor taken quarter."

AN appeal for relief has been made by Cuban soldiers, who are in a condition similar to that of the reconcentrados when the war began. Being bound by the terms of peace not to take food from the Spanish towns by force, and the Spanish authorities refusing either to sell food to them or barter with them, they have become reduced to the last extremity, and without relief must soon perish from starvation.

The Church on Imperialism.

WHILE a few voices within the church are raised in warning against the policy which would launch the nation upon the sea of imperialism, it is evident that, in general, the church will give that policy her vigorous support. For in it the church sees—or believes that she sees—the opportunity for a rapid and easy extension of her own conquests, which, being those of Christianity, must be for the welfare of all people, and justify the means by which they are introduced.

The tendency of the church is more and more to ally herself with the state in political affairs; to see in political questions the moral questions which belong to her divinely-appointed sphere; to see, in short, as Cardinal Manning expressed it, that "politics are morals on the widest scale." And this the church discerns all the more readily when, as in the present instance, a certain policy on the part of the state contains the promise of an important advantage for herself.

Some impressive words in support of an imperial policy by the Government were spoken on an impressive occasion on the 5th inst. in Washington, D. C. That occasion was the triennial council of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States. The conference included in its participants the House of Bishops, which is the chief governing body within the church, and among its lay delegates such men as Chief Justice Fuller, of the Supreme Court, J. Pierpont Morgan, the financier, and Captain A. T. Mahan, author of the famous book on the influence of naval power; numbering about five hundred persons in all.

Bishop Tuttle delivered a discourse from the text "Lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes," declaring that "in everyday experience, to hold what is got is quite as valuable a quality of well-balanced human nature as to get more to hold." Touching the theme of national expansion, the bishop said:—

"Wide, aye—wide, the work of the church should be. Extension is in the air for us Americans now. If we fall into line at its bugle blast some may claim to our risk and harm that it is an unwonted call, an out-of-the-way call, an unfit call to such as we are. Be that as it may, the logical course of events is a force not to be counted out, and it may make the sounding of bugle calls and the rolling forward of the chariot wheels of destiny things that we cannot stop if we would.

"We who think are startled and subdued and awed at the responsibilities devolved upon the Union now.

"Now, if the things which we are looking at as citizens are wide and far and deep, how shall we bear it if the church cowers and draws back and lies down? We ought to be, we want to be, the hammer and the arm driving it, to strike hard Hawaii, Porto Rico—go forward to possess the land. The Philippines—if the flag we honor and love is to float sovereign there—go ye in there also. And if the forceful logic of events that we wot of lift the flag into prominence over other regions yet—go ye there, too, to bide and work and help and save.

"We may find China likely to be our neighbor, even in the ordinary sense of mundane locality. In the literal sense and in the catechism's sense she has been our neighbor for years.

"Then for our own countrymen shall this church be content with any narrower aim than to be in zeal and duty and sympathy the American Church.

"We need not the fact that we are gathered in the nation's capital to remind us how thick and fast are growing the nation's responsibilities, which are centering here.

"The Anglo-Saxon race seems harnessed to the twofold work of giving to the world the sweets of personal liberty and the restraints of order without which liberty cannot be preserved."

But is not the church right in supporting the policy of national expansion, that she may go to new fields under the protection of the national flag? The answer is that the power of the Church of Christ is not national power, but that of the Holy Spirit, with which the disciples were baptized at Pentecost, and by which the early church proclaimed the gospel with a power and success that have never been equaled since. The divine hand, that is over all the affairs of men, may bring opportunities for the gospel out of war and political strife, even as he has the power to compel the wrath of man to praise him. But it is not for his church to join in the strife or to depend upon any one of the contending powers. Her motto must always be "Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord."

THE value of formal prayer—of the letter without the spirit—is illustrated in the lives of the inhabitants of Thibet. "The Tibetans," says The Missionary Alliance, are the most preëminent praying people on the face of the earth. They have praying-stones, praying-pyramids, praying-flags flying over every house, praying-wheels, praying mills, and the universal prayer, 'Om mani pad me haun,' is never out of their mouths. A German writer on Lamaism says of this sentence, which literally means, 'Oh, God! the jewel in the lotus,' that these six syllables are, of all the prayers on earth, the one which is most frequently repeated, written, printed, and conveniently offered up by mechanical means. They constitute the only power which the common Mongols and Tibetans know; they are the first words which the stammering children learn, and are the last sighs of the dying."

Preserving the Peace in Allegheny City.

THE good people of Allegheny City, Pa., entertain peculiar views on the question of what is necessary to preserve the public peace. In the view of a number of the city clergymen, the peace of the city is being disturbed by the preaching of religious doctrines contrary to the generally-accepted beliefs, on the part of two men who are conducting meetings in a tent. One of the latter writes concerning these clergymen that they "are counseling together (Protestants and Catholics in union), and have informed us that they are circulating a petition to compel us to leave the city, because we molested the peace of the different churches."

And while this is going on, it is announced that "Police Superintendent Muth, of Allegheny, says that Corbett and McCoy can spar here during the week of the Knights Templars conclave"—though not to a finish—and that "the city will be open to all kinds of legitimate sport for the entertainment of the visitors." It is a very peculiar kind of peace which is not disturbed by the presence of the class which always gathers at the ringside of a meeting between noted pugilists, but cannot tolerate two men who are conducting peaceful gospel services in a tent. However, we do not expect the petition of the clergymen to succeed.

The Farce of Army Chaplains.

"The Independent," New York.

THE Regular Army has been increased about two and a half times. The staff corps have had large additions. For example, the medical corps, which embraced nearly two hundred surgeons before the war began, has been largely increased, and the same is true as to all other branches of the regulars, save the chaplains. Everything has been done, or at least attempted, to add to the facilities of all these departments of the army.

But the chaplains, only thirty-four in number—a number very small even in the light of conditions existing through all the past years—have not had a single addition to their number. If we can judge from the service papers there does not seem to have been a suggestion made by the War Department or Congress looking to such increase, or recognizing any special need of chaplains with the troops. Except the four regimental chaplains of the colored regiments, who would, of course, accompany their regiments the same as any other regimental officer, only about five or six of the remaining thirty have been ordered to accompany troops to the front. And these were sent only on their urgent request, and, with one exception, a month or so after the troops were ordered toward Cuba. And these have been furnished no forage allowance to enable them to keep a horse, although all the other staff corps and even the volunteer chaplains have been paid and provided for as mounted officers; nor have they been provided with any special facilities in any way for their work. The rest of the thirty—some twenty-four of them—have been left at posts where nearly all of the troops have been ordered away, with possibly one or two exceptions. One of them, at a nearly abandoned post, has been commissary officer, another quartermaster, etc. No one in authority seemed to think they were needed to do any religious work with troops in the field.

All this corroborates the statement of General Sherman, based upon their fewness of numbers compared with the number of army posts, along with his general knowledge of the entire situation, that the Regular Army chaplaincy "is a farce," and was "intended to be such from the beginning." In addition to this, it is apparent that the main part of the efficient religious work done for troops in the field, and especially for the regulars, has been by the workers of the Army and Navy Christian Commission. It is true a few of the regular chaplains have shown a heroic spirit with troops in the field, and helped them all they could. It is also true that more of the volunteer chaplains, fresh from the home churches, and with men in part fresh from the home churches and the homes of the people, and with the moral and religious spirit and enthusiasm of both chaplains and men not as yet browbeaten and largely crushed by the spirit that dominates Regular Army life, have accomplished a good work. But it is a certainty that little would have been heard of any considerable positive and distinct evangelizing or other religious work being done had it not been for what has been accomplished by General Howard, Mr. Moody and their co-workers. And this seems to support the contention of some shrewd observers that the army chaplaincy as an evangelizing agency is a failure, and that it had better be laid aside, and the work to be done left to the voluntary effort of the churches.

TAKING a look at the prospects for war or peace, the candid observer is compelled to admit that the prospects for general war the whole world over are greater than those for the hoped-for universal peace. The unstable condition of the peace of Europe and Asia is well known; and it is apparent that there may be a resumption of hostilities between America and Spain. And upon investigation it appears that an outbreak of war between

Chile and Argentina, which is expected, is likely to be as fatal to the peace of the South American states as would war between two nations of Europe be to the peace on that continent. The peace equilibrium of South America is as unstable as that of Europe. On this subject a leading New York weekly says:—

"In case there should be war growing out of the boundary dispute between Chile and Argentina, what would be the probable result in South America? In the first place, the two natural enemies of Argentina, which is now the most prosperous state in that continent, are Chile and Brazil. Both are naturally jealous of Argentina's prosperity; Chile on account of the boundary dispute, and Brazil because of the hereditary political enmity between the Portuguese and Spaniards, and her attitude toward the commercial development of the River Plate. Little Uruguay is also a thorn in Brazil's side. In her territory many of the insurrections in Brazil are hatched, and Brazil is prevented only by Argentina from crushing these in the nest.

"Paraguay's position is neutral, but Peru and Bolivia will be in sympathy with Argentina, for the reason that they both were defeated by Chile in the war of 1881. It has been the dream of Peru ever since to get back the conquered provinces of Tacna and Arica, whose nitrate mines have since yielded Chile $300,000,000; while Bolivia, with equal zeal, has striven to regain the outlet to the ocean which was taken away from her. Uruguay would have to take part, willing or unwilling, in any general war, on account of the strategic situation of Montevideo. Nowhere else nearer than Rio del Janeiro could the combined fleets of Chile and Brazil refit, and it is the only base from which could be maintained a blockade of the River Plate.

"As Argentina would doubtless seize Montevideo first, we might see a coalition of Argentina, Uruguay, Peru, and Bolivia, while every effort would be made, possibly with success, to bring Brazil to the side of Chile. Such an alliance would undoubtedly win, because of the superiority of their fleets and the fact that they could throw their armies upon Argentina from both east and west. Of course the probabilities are that there will be no such universal conflagration; and yet, now that the ball of war has been set rolling in the Western Hemisphere, nobody knows what it will hit.

"It should be added that Venezuela, Colombia, and Ecuador have no special preferences toward either side. Their interests are bound up rather with the Central American States."

HOWEVER forgetful men may be of law and judgment, neither law nor judgment will be forgetful of them. If these are not taken into account by men, men will be taken into account by them. Law is over them, and about them on all sides, and at all times, and judgment follows after, so keen-scented that it never loses track of those it seeks. One can no more get away from them than he can get away from his shadow in the sunshine. The demands of law are continual, and no deafness or disregard will suppress them. They are eternal, and will never lose their grip.—The Examiner.

The War of Principle.—No. 3.

"WELL, to come back to our discussion, Aleck, it seems to me I have found a very good example of the disunion caused by the proclamation of Christian principles. You remember the experience of the apostles with the Ephesians?"

"Yes, certainly, Cecil. But I cannot see that their experience gives you any reason for prohibiting the principles."

"Well, you remember they worshiped Diana, a very harmless goddess. In fact, it says that not only all Asia worshiped her; but the whole world. Because of this worship the silversmiths had a good trade in images. Everything was running on in harmony, when Paul, Gaius, and Aristarchus began to preach the doctrines of Christianity. Now what happens?—In the first place a great stir; in the second place a convention of workingmen, fearful of losing their trade, and thereby their living; then a whole city thrown into confusion. Then the disturbers of the peace rushed before magistrates. And there for hours they gave vent to their reverence for the goddess. Now it seems to me that is a sample of what follows the preaching of distinctive principles."

"But, Cecil, that was not the end of the matter. When you drop yeast into the flour, of course, there is a stir, and every particle is converted; but the end of the leavening process is not merely fermentation, but bread. In the first place, the disciples had not decried Diana."

"Not directly, of course; but in principle they had. As soon as they taught men of one true God, the Creator of all; they did virtually decry Diana. And it's the same thing in all ages. Those who teach men to confess to God alone, decry the confessional of the Catholic Church. Those who teach that the seventh day is the Sabbath, decry Sunday observance. Diana stood for the religion of the Ephesians, and when Paul preached the religion of Christ, he did undermine Diana."

"Well, certainly, looking at it in that way; but in doing this Paul said he declared to them 'the whole counsel of God.'"

"It seems a pity that the counsel of God seems to strike across the very things we have been taught to revere from our babyhood. Now I really pity the Ephesians, and do not wonder that they shouted themselves hoarse over Diana. Human nature, you know, is conservative, and when our cherished customs and traditions are attacked, it rouses all there is in us."

"And yet, my friend, there were many of the Ephesians, who felt that they had come out of gross darkness into marvelous light. There were those who had been dissatisfied with Diana, and longed for God, and their cherished customs went for naught. They had a vision of the divine and eternal, and set their affection on things above."

"There it is again, Aleck. The religion of the so-called heathen people, does not separate them from the world. But Christianity seems irrational and unreasonable. Why should you set aside the world, and begin straightway to live as if it were doomed to destruction. Should we follow the Christian religion, what would become of literature, art, invention, and progress? The very bottom principle of it sends us back to the most primitive simplicity. Besides, it has cut the brotherhood of man into sects and scisms."

"I do not agree with your conclusions, Cecil. While it is true that Christianity centers one's thoughts above, it does not unfit us for the very highest sphere of usefulness here. It was in ages when the light of Christianity died out that men retrograded toward barbarism, while the greatest revival of letters, art, and invention has followed the light of the Reformation. The liberty of the gospel gives to every man the right of private judgment, and this is at the very basis of progress. Your principle of letting all things remain as they are, is at the basis of retrogression. It is a human principle; for everywhere one finds stakes set to limit thought, faith, and action. Every creed is a man-made stake. But in spite of yourself and your principle, you are an Athenian."

"No, sir. I do not desire some new thing. Our age is too busy as it is. What we need now is every Janus-gate closed. We have our educational system, we have our military, we have our state policy, we have our religions. We are beginning to develop toward union and brotherhood. A disturbance in religious thought is a disturbance of everything, so I'll cry down any new theory or doctrine that promises irritation."

"How far would you carry out your 'cry'?" asked Aleck.

"Just as far as I had power. I sympathize heartily with the emperors of Rome. When they found their institutions attacked by the aggressive sect, who did not come to join on to what had already been attained, they brought upon them the force of existing laws. Why did they not conform, and wherever they went, become good citizens?"

"They did conform to every just and reasonable law. They were good citizens in the best sense of the word; for they carried out the principle of love to God and man. Christianity, as a writer says, 'Is not a creed, but a life;' not a body of doctrines, formulated by men; but the expression of a divine character. This is the difference between the faith of Christ and the creeds of men. Rome had a creed enforced by law. Christians could not recognize the creed, or respect the law. Both were outside the functions of state."

"I know Christians claim that they were persecuted," said Cecil, "but if I read history right, they suffered for non-conformity to law."

"So they did," said Aleck, "and they were right in claiming they were persecuted. Human law is not the ultimatum. The Christians had a God to whom they owed allegiance, and any human law that contravened that obligation was rightfully disregarded by them. God demands this kind of loyalty."

Studies in French History.—42.

"O, PROFESSOR CARMAN!" exclaimed Julia March, "Maggie Palmeter has an essay to read to-day,—I know, for she told me so. I was so afraid she wouldn't tell you, that I just had to speak, 'cause I want to hear it so much!"

"That's good! I'm very glad to hear that my children are so interested. Will you kindly read your essay at once, Maggie?" asked her teacher.

"I just have a few thoughts and facts jotted down that happened while Francis Second was king, and directly after. That seemed to be right in line with the studies, and grandma helped me find a few facts from history, but I have told it in my own words."

"That's right, Maggie; I like originality everywhere, and best of all in an essay."

"I learned one thing which surprised me very much," began Maggie, "that people disliked to pay their debts a few hundred years ago, as badly as nowadays."

"When Francis II. was king, the nobles and rich people were so bound to cheat the poor tradesmen out of their honest due, that the rich cardinal of Lorraine made a big, high gallows and declared in the name of the king that any one that dared to ask for the money which was owing them should be hanged if he didn't get right away out of sight and hearing."

"I think it was just dreadful!"

"At last the people could endure it no longer, and so they got their heads together and declared they would overthrow such a miserable government. This was called the 'Conspiracy of Amboise,' but some way or another the nobles and king found it out, and then, I tell you, they made those poor wretches suffer. They took a whole month for it, and there was nothing much going on but killing,—and the worst of it was, the women went and sat in high seats with the cruel men, where they could get a good view of the suffering men, whose only crime was to ask for the money which they had earned."

"Finally young King Francis died, and his mother, whose name is a disgrace, I think, to the pages of history,—Catherine de' Medici,—was made ruler, till her next boy, Charles the Ninth, grew older. This was in 1560."

"At first, Catherine seemed to be real good to the Protestants and declared that they should not be persecuted on account of their religion. But this made the Catholics angry, and they called her a traitor. Then, just as quick as the Protestants saw that they had their liberty once more, what did they do, but go to work and tear down the images of their Catholic neighbors and make a great muss of things generally. Grandma says that she does not think that it is right for any religious denomination to have the power given to it to persecute, for she says that the human heart is apt to be selfish, and that the Church of Christ has no business to ask for civil power."

"Well, you see, all this trouble led to the Massacre of Vassy, where more than 250 Protestants were killed or wounded. Then they didn't have any peace for about thirty years. At last the King of Navarre—head of the Protestants—was coaxed over to the Catholic side. He was killed in battle, while the Duke of Guise, the leader of the Catholic party, was killed by unknown men. The Prince of Condi, who was a great help to the Protestant cause, was murdered after a battle in which he had surrendered. I think this was a real mean, cowardly act. Now all the leaders on both sides were dead, so the war was carried on by their sons,—and, isn't it queer? their names were all just the same—Henry."

"After a while the awful massacre of St. Bartholomew took place; but I didn't have time to learn anything about that, only the date when it took place—which my cyclopedia says was Aug. 24, 1572."

"Surely you have done quite well, Maggie. Perhaps it would be well to give you all, in connection with this composition of Maggie's, a few more facts concerning the bloody massacre which took place under the reign of Charles the Ninth. This sovereign was very unstable in character, and for a while seemed to favor the cause of the Huguenots. But his cruel mother,—a woman so cruel and bloodthirsty that after all these years it is hard to believe that she could have been a woman,—instigated and planned this wholesale murder, as coolly and persistently as though she were planning the slaughter of so many sheep. King Charles, anxious to favor the Protestants, decided that it would be a good thing for his sister Marguerite to marry their great leader, Henry, of Navarre. Accordingly, much against the wishes of either Catholics or Protestants, the ceremony was performed."

"Wasn't even the bride willing?" asked Milly Brown.

"No; and she was so unwilling that she refused to speak when the important question was asked during the ceremony."

"I don't see how they could have been married then," commented practical Jack.

"Well, you see, the king, her royal and determined brother reached over, and giving the head of the unwilling bride a quick push, she was made to bow assent. All this was done by King Charles, under the vain hope that he could thus make peace between the two religious

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 14—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall, and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

The TWO Of Great Importance to Every American Citizen. REPUBLICS.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

A COMPARATIVE HISTORY OF THE TWO GREATEST REPUBLICS,

Rome AND THE United States

The study of years and elaboration of many volumes, are presented in a concise and pleasing manner. In reviewing the history of the Roman Republic, the rocks upon which she stranded have been clearly pointed out. It contrasts the principles underlying enforced religious observances, with the true principles of which are guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. The "Two Republics" comprises 896 octavo pages, and is printed from clear, new electrotypes, on fine, tinted paper, beautifully and substantially bound, and is illustrated with 67 full-page engravings. The work is furnished in the following styles of binding:—

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM FOR EVERY MAN,

A POLITICAL HISTORY

Of the great questions culminating in the CIVIL WAR in the words of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and STEPHEN A. DOUGLASS.

555 Pages.

Cloth $1.75.

The work is entitled, "Political Debates and Speeches of Lincoln and Douglas," and contains a complete report of their speeches and debates. The burning words of these great orators are of absorbing interest both to those who have lived through the exciting scenes pictured out, and those who know them merely as history. There can be nothing better placed in the hands of the rising generation than a book presenting, in an attractive way, the principles on which this government is founded. Efforts are now being made to overthrow those principles, hence it is important that we become intelligent regarding them. The work is a great assistance to that end.

THE party who are seeking to establish religion in the Constitution must tear out of it the guarantees of religious liberty and equality before the law, to make room to put their conception of God into it.

NOTICE what is said on another page about the crushing spirit which dominates army life, and which affects even the army chaplain as it does the men. That is the spirit of militarism, and it dominates the religion as it does everything else connected with the military organization.

AN understanding of what the churches teach officially regarding the obligation of Sunday observance is essential to a proper appreciation of the consistency of the churches' attitude in the matter of Sunday legislation. It is with this point in view that we are publishing the compilation of church teachings on this subject.

THE pope has sprung a surprise upon the promoters of the czar's universal peace congress. Two Italian journals published in Rome, speaking for the Vatican, have pronounced as follows:—

"Disarmament implies peace; but how can continued peace in Europe be guaranteed so long as the question of the pope's temporal power is left open?"

Sure enough! How could it be expected that the pope would consent to continue a "prisoner" in the Vatican just for the sake of universal peace? Statesmen should have thought of this before. The pope must be restored to temporal power or there will be no peace.

The light in which the pope by this act has placed himself is indicated by the Tribuna, in calling attention to the "dreadful fact," that "while all the powers of Europe are dreaming of universal peace, the chief of the Catholic Church, who claims to represent Christ on earth, alone preaches war."

THE ends of justice can hardly be secured by conducting an investigation to determine the responsibility for the suffering and deaths in the army camps, as is now being done, behind closed doors. If the people are the rulers in this country, it is their right and their business to know what is being done in their name by their servants in political office.

THE State of Mississippi has appealed to the Federal Government for help to cope with yellow fever, which is spreading in a number of cities and towns. Strict quarantine regulations which are enforced against the infected district have caused much distress within the state, and thousands are threatened with starvation. This is one of the latest fruits of the war.

LIFE means progress, and progress means the frequent shocking of old ideas and traditions by new doctrines. Such intellectual commotions should be welcomed, and not sought to be suppressed, as is so frequently done. China furnishes the world to-day an illustration of the effect of long continuance in the old ruts of thought and custom. There has been no disturbance of the intellectual repose of China for hundreds of years, and as a consequence, there has been no progress, and the great empire finds itself at last without strength, and an easy prey to the aggressive nations around it.

A SERIOUS Indian uprising in the Northwest has been suppressed by the troops after considerable bloodshed and loss of life. The trouble, it is stated, is due to the scant courtesy with which the Indians are treated by the authorities of the Government. In the present case they feared that they would be removed from their lands without compensation for their labor in building homes and adding other improvements on their farms; and this fear appears to have been well grounded. As a daily of this city observes, "Such an injustice would not have been the first wrong of the kind inflicted upon Indian tribes by our authorities. More than one bloody war has sprung from this very cause." "To pick them up and move them on whenever white speculators covet their lands is a wrong like those that have brought retribution upon Spain."

WE are promised a resumption of the contributions which were wont to appear in our columns from Mr. A. T. Jones, and Mrs. S. M. I. Henry.

A SECT which calls itself the "Church of America," and seems to be of rather recent origin, presents a striking illustration of the tendency of the times to combine religion with politics and with whatever stands for respectability in worldliness. The "primate and first bishop" of the church, whose portrait appears in the Fraternal Monitor, "is a member of the Independent Order of Mechanics, Improved Order of Red Men, Ancient Order of Druids, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons;" and also "deputy grand representative," of "the Royal Masonic Rite in the thirty-third and ninety-fifth degrees, grand representative of A. and P. Rite of Memphis," and "a member of three Masonic bodies in Brooklyn in the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite," etc. The Monitor mentions that "the first mission church will be opened for public worship"—whereabouts not stated—"about October 30;" that President McKinley has been invited to attend the opening service. "A young lady will sprinkle holy water around the church building, which will be called St. Paul Mission." Its bishop is certainly well qualified as a ceremonialist.

PRAYERS that are mixed with selfish desires are too heavily weighted to rise high.

THE religious state means always religion enforced by the power of the state.

SIN reigns in this world wherever grace does not reign; and the reign of sin will be just as bad as sin is bad, and sin is as bad as anything can possibly be. Grace, and not legislation, is the effective antidote for sin.

THE state always casts a dark shadow when it gets between God and human souls.

THE state conscience is guided not by the Word of God, but by the popular vote.

WHEN the state professes religion, it cannot consistently remain out of the church; and when the state applies for admission to the church, it logically places itself in subjection to the church.

"THE noonday of the papacy was the world's midnight."

THE first Sunday edict was issued in 321 A. D. by a pagan emperor; and the first shadows of the coming Dark Ages appeared in legislation for the observance of Sunday.

SINCE Christianity means love and persuasion, while the state always secures its ends by compulsion, the state cannot profess to be Christian without making itself a hypocrite.

THE union of church and state extinguished the sunlight of the gospel and lighted the fires of the Inquisition.

TO STAND on the highest earthly eminence, the Christian Church must descend from the heavenly eminence where God has placed her.

FOR the state to become religious, and yet refuse to join the church, would be for it to discredit either the church or its own religion.

THE cloak of piety is always in demand by the representatives of intolerance and the enemies of popular rights.

THE DARK AGES COMING UPON THE WORLD FROM CHURCH AND STATE UNION.

THE Christian Church went forth to the world from the baptism of Pentecost proclaiming with power the pure gospel, and the light of it penetrated to all countries. But a change came over her attitude of separation from the world, and in the fourth century she clothed herself in the robes of civil authority and ascended the throne of the Caesars. In A. D. 321, the Roman emperor, Constantine, made an edict commanding the people in the cities and towns to abstain from work on "the venerable day of the sun," which marked the beginning of that legislation which the church has clamored for and defended down to the present. Church and state joined hands, and as the union progressed, the sunlight of the gospel of love became more and more obscured, until the long night of the Dark Ages settled down upon the world. Only this could be the result of uniting religion with the civil power.

Sunday-Law Prosecutions Again.

AN outbreak of Sunday-law intolerance is reported from Ford's Store, Md. One of those upon whom this intolerance has fallen gives us the following facts:—

"About the middle of September Mr. John Curlett and myself were arrested for working on Sunday, cutting the tops off of corn. We had our trial before a magistrate. He fined us, but we took an appeal to the higher court, which will be heard on November 7.

"Yesterday, October 9, Mr. John Plevenger was arrested for Sunday work, but he appeared before a magistrate and secured a postponement of his trial until Thursday, the 20th. He was working in the employ of a man not an observer of the seventh day, but the employer was not arrested. He was cutting off corn tops in a secluded field, not near to any house, and those who procured his arrest had to spy upon him to get their information.

"Each of those arrested is a member of the Ford's Store Church of Seventh-day Adventists.

"J. H. RHODES."

The religious intolerance of such proceedings is too plain to need pointing out to any candid observer. The spirit of it is not the spirit of Christianity; and that such an inquisitorial spirit of spite finds its desired opportunity in the Sunday law, is a fact which speaks volumes in condemnation of the law.

Argument vs. Experience.

IN The Defender, a New England organ which advocates compulsory Sunday observance, appears this defense of the popular disregard of the seventh day:—

"The consecutive 'seventh day' has not come to us, because the Creator has established the length of our solar year to be 365 days and less than six hours. If this problem is put on a slate, it will be seen at once that the last day of the first year of 365 days will have to be the same day of the week as the first day of that year. Hence the first day of the second creation year will be the second day of the week, i. e., Monday, and that would throw the seventh day forward to Sunday.

"By this jump it will take seven years before a year will begin on the same day of the week as the first creation year. Thus the consecutive 'seventh day' was lost the first creation year, and so for every year since, making it lost 6,000 times—very much lost."

"Truth is stranger than fiction." We would not have believed it true, without having the fact thrust before our eyes, that any person of average intelligence would seriously argue that there could not be a consecutive series of seventh-day Sabbaths.

As a matter of fact the seventh-day Sabbaths could not possibly occur in any other way than consecutively.

Here is an individual who has all his life been observing one seventh-day Sabbath following another in consecutive order, yet who seriously tries to argue himself and others into the belief that what he has been all this time observing cannot possibly exist in fact! There is only one thing that will explain it, and that is that it is done in support of Sunday and compulsory Sunday observance.

Because there cannot be a consecutive seventh day, all people should turn from the observance of the seventh day to that of the first day! There can be a consecutive first day, as you will soon discover if you do not observe it consecutively, wherever there is a Sunday law in force!

Presumably the author of this argument—Mr. T. M. Merriman, by name—presents it as the best to be had in support of a compulsory Sunday Sabbath. And really, it is as good as any other that we have seen.

"Ecclesiastical Shop."

THE following sensible words on the subject of the ecclesiastical assumptions made by clergymen and others in connection with the military operations of so-called Christian nations, are from Mr. J. S. Nisbet, of London, Eng., to a London journal:—

"Is the manner in which the name of God is associated with Sir Herbert Kitchener's victory in the Soudan quite seemly? I mean on the part of our ecclesiastical authorities. I am not particularly squeamish, I trust, but I confess to being shocked by a phrase which occurs in a sermon preached on this subject by the Bishop of Carlisle. Said the bishop: 'While they praised the general, they must remember that God was behind in the shadow—they must not forget the controlling hand and the armor of the Lord.' This, if I may venture to say so, is the merest ecclesiastical 'shop.'

"Everybody knows—no one better than the bishop—that had not Sir Herbert Kitchener adequately provided himself with men and guns, the victory would have been a defeat. Where was the 'controlling hand' when Gordon, a good and pious man, animated with the best intentions, perished miserably at Khartoum? What became of the armor of the Lord on that occasion? The divine government of the universe is a fact before which the proudest head must bow; but this assumed familiarity with the plans of the divine Ruler, the partizanship assigned to him in human affairs, is not in the best of taste, surely. In fact, in my ears it sounds dangerously like profanity. Let us not forget that the poor Dervishes (who did not happen to be adequately equipped) rushed into battle shouting the name of Allah.

"Perhaps the climax of absurdity or profanity in this direction is reached when two Christian nations cross swords, both claiming the support and direction of the Most High in their military operations. The Kaiser, as is well known, has enlisted God on the side of the Fatherland, constantly alluding to the Deity as an august ally of his own; but, needless to say, this did not prevent us, on the occasion of the famous Kruger telegram, from hastily equipping a flying squadron by way of counter-move, thereby showing practically what we thought of the young emperor's alleged supernatural alliances.

"The fact is that this sort of appeal by Christian nations to the Lord of Hosts is a survival of the old Pagan notion of a tutelary divinity, i. e., a tribal deity watching over the interests of its tribe. With the Christian ideal, according to which all war is sinful, it is wholly inconsistent, and, as it tends to fortify the scoffer, it had better, I think, be dropped. Military and naval operations have no more claim upon the divine favor than a war of tariffs, or the triumph of party principles at a general election, in favor of which no bishop ever prays."

Union of Church and State Condemned by History.—No. 1.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

No truth is more prominent in the New Testament than that we are saved by faith in our Redeemer. But faith, according to the doctrine of the same book, is not genuine, unless it leads to an open confession of Christ in the world; and, therefore, Christ required from all his disciples that they should openly confess him by baptism; which, becoming the test of a true faith, was therefore connected with the remission of sins. Thus, as the Lord Jesus Christ came into the world to bear witness to the truth, though it cost him his life, so his disciples must bear witness to it.

Since his doctrine has been preached men can no longer receive the creed of their fathers or of their country without investigation; but each one is bound to search after truth, to receive it, to maintain it, and to promulgate it in the world, in opposition to all error, however venerable and popular. Our Lord predicted that this novel exercise of conscience in matters of religion, this independent inquiry and resolute profession, would disturb society everywhere to its very foundations. "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law: and a man's foes shall be those of his own household. And ye shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake."

The Christian principle of individual inquiry, belief, and profession, was exactly the opposite of the pagan principle of unexamining conformity. The gospel made conscience everything, declaring, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. . . . Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Heathenism made it nothing. According to the gospel, everyone was bound to reject the religion of his country if false. According to heathenism, everyone was to conform to the religion of his country in all things. Christianity invited men to form a voluntary society, upon conviction as men; heathenism herded them, by law, as animals, within the inclosure of a national ritual.

The Greek legislators, wishing to secure for the republic the greatest military force by means of the most complete social unity, forbade dissent from the popular superstition. A man who disbelieved the power of fictitious and corrupt deities was thought to be a bad citizen, and was as such condemned. Draco punished dissent with death; Plato would have it denounced to the magistrates as a crime; Aristotle allowed but one established worship; and Socrates was sentenced to death as a non-conformist. In the Greek republics the union between the state and the religion was so complete, that the rights of conscience were wholly disregarded. Men did not inquire what was true, but what was politic. The republic must be a great unity for attack or defense, and the religious independence which would break that unity must be exterminated.

Heathen princes had yet more powerful motives than republican magistrates to unite themselves strictly with the priesthood. Despotism has ever sought to extort from their subjects all possible advantages for themselves, and for this end to retain them in the most complete servitude. They have chiefly depended on their armies; but the fear and the hopes excited by superstition have been too obvious a support not to be largely employed. Well-paid soldiers have been their first instrument of power; their second has been a well-paid priesthood. Priests have lent to despots, in aid of their selfish designs, the portents and the predictions of superstition; and despots have in return invested the superstition with splendor, and punished non-conformity with death.

Heathenism presented no obstacle to this union. The superstition being a corrupt invention, offered nothing which was disagreeable to corrupt rulers; and the vices of rulers were not uncongenial to an equally corrupt priesthood. Nebuchadnezzar exalted himself when he compelled his subjects of every creed to bow down to his golden idol; Belshazzar, amid his revels, felt no objection to "praise the gods of gold and silver;" and it seemed to Darius excellent policy to establish a royal statute that no prayers should be offered to any god but himself for thirty days. The famous Tarquin could, without any inconvenient restraint upon his passions, build temples to Jupiter; Caligula and Nero felt no remorse at their wickedness, excited by the fulfillment of their functions of supreme pontiffs; and, on the other hand, the Brahmins of India found nothing in their Vedas and Purannas which made them blush at the vices and the tyranny of the rajahs by whom they were enriched. By the aid of the superstition the despot fortified his tyranny, and by the aid of the despotism the priest gave currency to his falsehoods. Thus the union of the state and the priesthood was an alliance of force and fraud. Neither party was strong enough to rule alone. But when the priest preached for the despot, and the despot governed for the priest, both the more easily kept their feet upon the necks of the people; and made the universal degradation subservient to their greatness.

The Sabbath not Jewish nor Puritan.

ADVOCATES of a Puritan Sunday are wont to refer in very disparaging terms to the "Jewish Sabbath," not stopping to consider that it is a fact that the Puritan Sunday and the real Jewish Sabbath are in their natures almost identical. Both are man-made institutions claiming to be based upon the Sabbath commandment of the Decalogue, and the same narrowness of conception appears in each. The following words from J. L. Hurlburt, D.D., in the Classmate, state some essential truths upon this subject:—

"The Jew was very strict in the observance of the Sabbath. He would not leave a grain of corn on the ground after feeding the hens; it might take root, and that would be planting. He must not bruise the grass with his feet; that would be threshing. He had a solemn law prohibiting him from catching a flea, for that would be hunting. He could not wear heavy nails in his shoes, for that would be carrying a burden; nor wear false teeth for the same reason. The Puritans thought it a sin for a boy to whistle on the Sabbath. One minister in those days would not allow his wife to wash dishes on Sunday. Another whipped his wife for borrowing eggs on that day.

"Such an irksome, restrictive Sabbath Jesus did not advocate. One Sabbath, Christ and his disciples were walking along the path that frequently ran through the fields of growing grain. They were hungry; and, as they often do in that country still, some of them pulled off the tops of the wheat, rubbed it in their hands, and ate the grain. This was against Jewish law. Plucking it was reaping; rubbing it together was threshing. The Jews immediately charged the disciples with breaking the law. Jesus replied that he was Lord of the Sabbath. That it was a day set aside for blessing, not for hampering, men. He gave man, not the Jewish nor the Puritan Sabbath, but a day of freedom, rest and cheer. He wants it kept a holy, but not a gloomy, day. Of all the days of the week he intended the Sabbath to be the brightest, the most cheerful, the most restful, and the most profitable. He bids those who are his to keep the day, not according to the Jewish rigid rule, but according to the rule of love to him. How can I spend the day so that I will please him whom I love?

"What work shall be done on the Sabbath? Jesus went into the synagogue to worship. There was a man present whose arm was all withered up. Now, by the law of the Jews a man must not take a dose of medicine on the Sabbath, nor have a broken bone set. Jesus believed in helping others on any day, so he said to the man, 'Stretch forth thy hand.' The man did so, and in the act found his arm made just as well as the other one. Before this miracle Jesus had asked the Jews if there was one present who would not pull a sheep out of a pit into which it had fallen. Of course they would. How much better then is a man than a sheep? They could say nothing against this. God made the Sabbath for you to enjoy. Do all the good you can and it will become the day of all the week the best."

Christianity recognizes neither the Puritan nor the Jewish Sabbath, but only "the Sabbath of the Lord"—a day of spiritual refreshment. And "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God."

Religious Liberty Under King Asa.

"Present Truth" (London, Eng.)

AFTER Asa's accession to the throne of Judah, there was a period of ten years of unbroken peace. The time was spent in clearing out of the kingdom of Judah the idolatrous relics of King Solomon's apostasy. The altars of the strange gods were taken away, and the images of the sun were destroyed out of all the cities of Judah. A royal proclamation was sent throughout the country, commanding the people to seek the Lord and obey his commandments.

There are many nowadays who think that because such proclamations as these are recorded in the Scriptures, it was right to issue them, and that it is still right to enforce matters of religion by the law of the land. But, although Asa was a reformer, he showed by this edict that he did not fully appreciate the character of the worship which God requires of his people. God's law is a law of love. By his loving kindness he draws men to himself, and his commandments are given, not as rigid, autocratic requirements, but as a word of life, promising to all who hear and live the righteousness they set forth.

Christ was the law of God in life and action, for love is the fulfilling of the law, and Christ was perfect love. Whoever would get correct ideas of the law of God will find them in the life of Jesus of Nazareth, who said, "Thy law is within my heart." He came not to condemn but to save. "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law." Gal. 3:21. But "what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son . . . condemned sin in the flesh: that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us." Rom. 8:3, 4.

God's Word is strong enough in itself to accomplish the thing whereto he sends it, and if the Word prove weak through the flesh, the flesh does not improve matters by promulgating a supplementary law of its own. The only effect of this is to hide from view the efficiency of the divine Word, and thereby diminish faith in it.

The Interdict.

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

BLACK FLAGS hung from the windows, ominously,
A gloom swept thickly through the sunbeams' mesh
As though the wings of hell's battalions waved
Across God's benediction. Black cowed priests
Frowned from beneath their tosiars. Children clung
With piteous fear upon their mothers' skirts,
And men looked stern and stony with despair.
Maidens as pale as ashes grasped their beads,
Involuntarily muttering rosaries. In vain
The crowds wailed wildly at the iron-barred doors
That shut the great cathedral to their feet.
The shrines were vacant, and no pitying priest
Delayed to hear a soul's confession out.
No absolution waited for men's prayer,
No blessing for love's marriage, and no font
Whose holy water made baptismal rite.
Men looked in one another's eyes in fear,
And women wailed and shrieked, and children sobbed.
Black death and plague, war, famine, feud and blood
Was nothing to the soul's damnation sure,
And heaven shut away and locked from men
By him who held the keys in Peter's place,
Vicegerent of the Son of God on earth.

Horror took hold where superstition reigned.
Men lost their manhood, and lay prone in dust
Before a man. Women were faint with fear,
Not for themselves so much as for their babes
Denied adoption to the home above.
Then devils raged, exultant in their glee,
Delighted at the torture of the soul;
Their Inquisition chamber crowded full
Of souls on racks, thumb-screwed and in the stocks,
'Neath iron pinchers, in the iron boot,
And clasped and spiked within the cruel breast
Of the unfeeling virgin. Men wizened
And grew old, and shrieked the more
When from a door a corpse was carried out,
And laid as Judas in a Potter's Field,
Lost, lost—forever lost!

Then such a wail rose from the stricken town
That nought but demons could withstand, and he Who sat in Peter's chair received again
The humble suppliants that kissed his toe,
And put their necks beneath his jeweled foot,
And heaven again was opened, bells were rung,
Cathedrals crowded, and the holy font
Sprinkled its drops upon the innocent.
Marriage was blest, the dead were laid away
In consecrated burial ground once more,
Nor was the mass denied the soul in pain.
Men smiled and women kissed their babes, and said
The heaven is not brass to us to-day,
For lo, the pope has rolled our guilt away.

We in the light of better days look back,
And smile and weep and wonder at old Prague
Under the interdict. Yet stay
Are we so far from such a scene to-day?
What means the clamor for the arm of state
To give the church a power to wield such sway?
What means the clamor for a Sunday law

To hold the weak in thrall, the bad in awe?
And add to sin hypocrisy, that so
Our nation may the curse of heaven know?
What! Can human law make righteous? Can Compulsion change the heart of any man?
Hath God left souls to utter derelict
And given us over to man's interdict?
Who shuts up heaven, but each man for himself?
Salvation is not won by power or wealth.
No arm of law that bids men wail, can bring
The soul to Christ, and make him the soul's king.
Away with laws religious on our books!
Keep to the Pattern. See how mild He looks.
Render to Cæsar Cæsar's, and to God
That which is his, and bring on men no rod
Man made, else will man be the fool of man,
And hell exult to spoil high heaven's plan.
Shall we go back a thousand years to-night
In face of history's torch and heaven's light?
Nay. By all means watch, work, sleep not, lest quick
Hell steal a march on us in interdict.

O sorrow! Helpless falls the pen away.
'Twill come. 'Tis coming at no distant day.
The world shall mourn, and devils shall deride,
Their wings the glorious light of heaven shall hide
Save from the wise who will look up, and be Bound by all earth, but by all heaven set free.
And from that interdict, no pope shall free;
The King of kings himself shall bid it flee;
And when hell falls beneath his high advance,
And evil falters at his lightning glance,
Then interdict shall ne'er fill men with pain
And nought but love be known to souls again.

What the Churches Teach Officially, Regarding the Observance of Sunday.—3.

BY CHARLES E. BUELL.

THE Disciples of Christ are rather more extreme than the Society of Friends. A representative writer of this denomination says:—

"The assumption that the Sabbath was changed from the seventh day of the week to the first day of the week, is without a particle of proof; indeed it is false in fact, for everywhere that the word Sabbath is used in the New Testament it manifestly refers to the seventh day of the week."—Pardee Butler, "The Ten Commands," p. 1.

Another of this denomination writes:—

"From the ratification of the New Covenant, the first day of the week has been observed by Christians as a day of worship; but not as a Sabbath."—B. A. Howard, "Sacred Time, The Lord's Day," p. 17.

A. M. Weston, A. M., who was president of Eureka College, Illinois, a school of this denomination, says:—

"You may call Sunday by its secular name 'Sunday;' by its number, 'the first day of the week;' or by its religious title, 'The Lord's Day,' but never, unless you would misrepresent it, call it the Sabbath."—"The Evolution of a Shadow," p. 279.

This writer, representing the denomination, gives the fact as to the manner in which many of the churches reached the conclusion that Sunday was the preferred day to be observed:—

"Had the name "Christian Sabbath," or even "Sabbath," been found in the New Testament, according to modern usage, it would have sanctioned that usage and made it imperative. Being wanting, we are left to reason the matter out in the light of unquestioned principles."—p. 173.

The "Westminster Confession" forms the basis of doctrines of the Baptists, Presbyterians, and Congregational denominations. This states:—

"From the beginning of the world to the resurrection of Christ the Sabbath was kept holy on the last day of the week; and from the resurrection of Christ was changed into the first day of the week, which in Scripture is called Lord's day, and is to be continued to the end of the world as the Christian Sabbath."

John Calvin laid the foundation of denominational creeds, and his writings are interesting in that they disclose his views on the unsanctified Sunday. He condemned the epistles of those of the "Fathers," so called, who are sometimes quoted to make out a case for Sunday observance in the early churches. In his sermon 34, he says:—

"In respect to men's rawness and by reason of their slothfulness, it is necessary to have one special day dedicated to think upon God. It is true we be not bound to the seventh day, neither do we keep the same day that was appointed to the Jews, for that was Saturday. But to the intent to show the liberty of Christians, the day was changed because Jesus Christ in his resurrection did set us free from the bondage of the law and cancelled the obligation thereof. That was the cause why the day was shifted."

This builder of creeds varies the teaching about the change of the Sabbath to the first day of the week because of the resurrection, in that he does not regard the time of the resurrection as on Sunday; but because of the resurrection of Jesus, regardless of the day on which it occurred, men were made free from the operation of God's commandments, and could select whatever day they wished for a rest day.

The Roman Catholic Church teaches that Christ rose on the first day of the week; but it also teaches as regards the change from the keeping holy the Sabbath day, which all admit is the seventh day, that the Roman Catholic Church, without Scriptural authority, caused the day to be shifted to Sunday, and that it is the "Genuine Offspring of the Union of the Holy Ghost and the Catholic Church, His Spouse." It goes further and states that Protestants have no part in the newly selected day, showing that it is not considered by Catholics to be a mere substitution of Sunday for Saturday just because it commemorates the event of the resurrection, which would be rightful for any creed or sect to observe. They make it to be specially a "church day," appropriate only to the Roman Catholic ceremonies.

The "Westminster Confession" bases its reverence for the day on the simple fact which is alleged, that on the first day of the week Jesus rose from the dead. But if Jesus had stepped forth from the tomb at midday on the first day of the week in the presence of his disciples, and a multitude of those who were friendly to him, this would not stand as an excuse for discarding the Sabbath of the Lord, unless there had been a direct command to make the change.

The Swiss churches, in their "Confession," like the statements of Tyndale and Calvin, set forth that the selected day is by authority of "the church," and that it would be proper to select any other day. This eliminates the element of sanctity for the day due to the commemoration of any event, or for anything that is taught in the Scriptures, Old or New.

Calvin and John Knox, viewed the change of the day to be observed as "a proper instance of Christian liberty" and discussed as to whether the Reformed Protestants would not more completely estrange themselves from the Roman Catholics by adopting Thursday as the rest day.

There have been published statements in religious papers to the effect that there has been a consideration of this same thought by the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the feasibility and desirability of making Thursday their rest day to the discarding of both the seventh and the first days of the week.

The Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, like other Methodists, holds to "The Articles of Religion," which contains no reference to the Sunday question (Schaff, Creeds.—Lewis, 414). Among its publications several tracts indicate that the Methodists view Sunday as do their neighbors, the Baptists, and Presbyterians, favoring the observance of the day on the general basis of the "Westminster Confession."

The various religious bodies, as the Unitarians, Universalists, the religious communities, Ethical societies, Mormons, etc., are without strong views on Sunday observance, while the Reformed Presbyterians are the most exacting.

The remark of Professor Weston, of the Disciples of Christ, is significant; he aptly sets forth the true fact when he says: "The scriptural authority being wanting, we are left to reason."

Human reason is just what has placed Sunday above the commanded Sabbath of the Lord. That is just what the claim made by the Roman Catholic Church, and all the churches, means, when carefully analyzed.

There is certainly confusion among the great church organizations regarding the reasons for substituting Sunday for the true Sabbath.

"God is not the author of confusion," and everything said by him upon the subject of Sabbath observance teaches a strict keeping of the seventh day in honor of the Lord thy God.

THE Sabbath is God's, though made for man.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 8.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

WE gave last week, from standard Roman Catholic works, the Catholic idea of tradition, and set forth that it is claimed by the papacy that tradition is as much the Word of God as the Holy Scriptures; and further, it is claimed, as was also pointed out last week, not only that the Bible and tradition are both the Word of God, but that that which is handed down through tradition is of higher authority than the Scriptures—that it is safer to go by tradition, and that tradition is more useful to us than the written Word.

That this is the true Catholic doctrine may be seen from "Catholic Belief," p. 21: "Like two sacred rivers flowing from Paradise, the Holy Bible and Divine Tradition, both contain the Word of God, both are full of the precious jewels of revealed truth. Though these two divine streams are in themselves, on account of their divine origin, of equal sacredness, and are both full of revealed truths, still of the two, tradition is to us more clear and safe."

All this was defined by the General Council of Trent, when it assembled to meet the "errors" of Protestants. And it was clearly proven(?), too, at least, to their satisfaction, by the fact that through this means the Sabbath was merged into the Lord's day—meaning Sunday—"and that too solely by the authority of the church."

Now with reference to this matter of the authority of the church, which authority is demonstrated by the act of changing the Sabbath into Sunday, and which act the Protestants themselves conceded as valid in their confession at the Council of Augsburg, 1530, the question was asked at the Council of Trent: "Now if this authority [of the church] should be done away with (which would please the heretics very much) who would there be to testify for the truth and to confound the obstinacy of the heretics?"

This, indeed, was an important question; and it can be clearly seen, through the Council of Trent, that the authority of the church and the church's claims with regard to tradition and the Sunday, stood or fell together.

With the doing away, therefore, of Sunday, there would go with it the church, with all its claims to authority and the matter of tradition. And as it was claimed that the church is the custodian of the truth of God, if its authority was done away with, who indeed would there be to testify for the truth(?) and to confound the "heretics?"

As the Protestants had already conceded the authority of the church with regard to Sunday, and so stultified themselves, in such concession they furnished the Catholics with the very means by which they (the Protestants) could always be confounded. And from that time to this the Catholics have never been slow to use it; and sad to say, it has been a handy means with which Protestants have confounded each other when they found themselves unable to defend themselves by the Word of God.

So far as the Catholic Church is concerned, Cardinal Gibbons, in his book, "Faith of our Fathers," page 111, clearly sets forth the issue. In the chapter from which the following quotation is taken, he undertakes to prove that the Bible is not a "competent religious guide." He says: "A rule of faith or a competent guide to heaven, must be able to instruct in all the truths necessary for salvation."

This proposition, of course, no one will for one moment deny. But the cardinal continues: "Now the Scriptures alone do not contain all the truths which a Christian is bound to believe, nor do they explicitly enjoin upon all the duties which he is obliged to practice."

Here the consistent Protestant will take issue with the cardinal. But ruthlessly the cardinal lays the axe to the root of the Protestant tree, and fells it to the ground. And this is the axe: "Not to mention other examples, is not every Christian obliged to sanctify Sunday, and to abstain on that day from unnecessary servile work? Is not the observance of this law among the most prominent of our sacred duties? But you may read the Bible from Genesis to Revelation, and you will not find a single line authorizing the sanctification of Sunday. The Scriptures enforce the religious observance of Saturday, a day which we never sanctify."

In this quotation from Cardinal Gibbons, why does he not specify one of the other examples, to which he alludes—for there are others—instead of citing Sunday as proof that the Bible alone is not a competent guide? Because their validity, in turn, hinges upon Sunday, and the cardinal simply goes to the tap root of the whole matter.

Protestants, likewise, when they find themselves without any Scripture in support of a doctrine, use the Sunday argument to excuse themselves. As an instance it might be said that not a great while ago a Baptist organ, referring to the question of baptism, asked a Methodist contemporary for the Scripture authority for sprinkling. The Methodist paper acknowledged the lack of Bible proof for the practice, but instead of confessing the wrong, attempted to justify itself by saying that sprinkling was practised on the same ground that Sunday was kept; and then it asked its Baptist friend to kindly show the scripture for keeping Sunday. This of course the Baptist was not able to do, but the argument of the Methodist was sufficient; for the Baptist had nothing further to say directly to its contemporary upon the subject of baptism.

Of what use is it for Protestants to insist upon Bible doctrines which are clearly taught when they stultify themselves upon this question of Sunday? For nothing is clearer in the Bible, as Cardinal Gibbons truly says, than that "there is not from Genesis to Revelation a single scripture authorizing the sanctification of Sunday;" while, on the other hand, the Bible is as explicit as it can be that "the seventh day is the Sabbath."

If one Bible truth can be set aside, and something else ordained of man, take its place, why may not all other Bible truths be similarly treated? There is no reason under the sun why they should not be.

And why, as illustrated above, is it that Protestants take shelter behind the Sunday, when they are unable to prove by Scripture any other practice they may be following, when there are other errors behind which they could dodge? It is simply because the foundation—the very cornerstone—the tap root of the whole system of errors—is the Sunday; and therefore they say that "Sunday is the test of all religion."

Patriotism's Best Gifts.

BY EDGAR KELSEY.

"THE influence of an upright life is patriotism's best gift to the nation."

If we heartily indorse the foregoing quotation from the AMERICAN SENTINEL, we cannot expect to find the greatest patriots among those whose names have become household words because of their valor with carnal weapons; for the bravest heroes and most worthy patriots of a country, who are often among its very humble inhabitants, will not wield these implements of destruction. The SENTINEL's statement being correct, the conduct of every-day life is evidently the best test of loyalty in the privileges and duties of patriotism. Uprightness, however, in its broadest, fullest sense, comprehends more than a man can possess unaided by divine grace.

There is but one way to secure the attainment of an upright life, and that is through Christ. Surrounded as we are in this world with the increasing perils of wickedness, a spotless character is not a prize that can be gained without a struggle; so the quest for purity affords abundant opportunity for valor. If we suffer with Christ, we shall also be "glorified together" with him. The patriot who is truly loyal to every principle of right scorns the use of carnal weapons. Clad in "the whole armor of God," with the "Sword of the Spirit" as his effective weapon, the Christian soldier, who battles against sin while he seeks to save the sinner, will make far greater conquests for his country's good than could ever be possible in the brutal strife of carnal warfare.

True patriotism would forever stop the awful waste of war, and insure continual peace to every nation. It does not need the cannon's blast to arouse it to activity. And as to its sincerity, faithfulness in the little things of common experience is sufficient proof of its real devotion to God, and home, and native land. Under its vigilance and fostering care the moral, social, and political problems which now cause so much discord and unhappiness among men would find easy solution; for the benevolent impulses of generous citizenship would remove the countless difficulties which selfish propensities impose, and equity would be the sure remedy for all of the sorrow caused by unjust divisions of the pleasures and bounties which were intended to be equally shared as heaven's beneficence to all mankind. From an ordinary point of view, patriotism does not mean so much as this. Its significance has been lowered to accommodate it to the conception we have formed from the standpoint of human imperfection.

Hence, under human rule, there is no reliable safeguard to national peace and prosperity; and there can be no national salvation, for there is no Christian nation. The distress and perplexity of nations presents a sad picture of the general departure from the fundamental principles of perfect government; this departure will eventually bring the downfall of all earthly powers. Nothing less than perfect government can meet the ideal of true patriotism. The true patriot must therefore be a Christian, as already intimated, for it is only as he cherishes the Christian's hope that he can ever expect to see a fulfillment of his ideal. Purity of heart and character, our uniform as soldiers of Christ, should be carefully preserved with all of its spotless lustre, so that, as "the salt of the earth," our personal influence, as well as our skill with the "Sword of the Spirit," will be a saving power among men as long as the wrath of God is withheld from earthly governments.

Allegiance to the King of kings is always the voluntary service of enlightened patriotism. Loyalty, in the light of all that it really embraces, calls for a universal recognition of this truth, yet this kind of patriotism is not as popular as it should be. We can render every tribute to the rulers of this world that is in harmony with our obligations to God, but worldly standards are so fallible that a true conception of patriotism makes it impossible for one to acknowledge unconditional allegiance to any temporal form of government. Christian citizenship, therefore, not as a political power, as many choose to make it, but as a spiritual power exercised wholly within its legitimate sphere, is the only qualification that will enable one to offer the influence of an upright life as a patriot's best gift to the nation. As far as an active, consistent purpose to exert the best influence for the general welfare of our fellow men constitutes good citizenship, full submission to the King of kings and Lord of lords will necessarily make us good citizens and true patriots of any country. With such patriotism every home would be a realm of peace, and every land a land of liberty. What a wonderful transformation it will be, and what joy it will be to the redeemed, the victorious patriots of God, when earthly powers really give place to the theocracy of heaven, a "Christian nation" in deed and in truth!

By creation, all men have equal rights.

EX-SECRETARY of the Treasury Carlisle, in giving expression to his views on the policy of imperialism, says that the gravest question now before the American people is the question "whether they shall allow a war prosecuted ostensibly for the independence of a foreign people be made the pretext or occasion for changing the very essence of our national character and for converting their own Government into a great war making, tax-consuming, land-grabbing, and office-distributing machine."

* * *

AND referring to the fundamental American principle of government by the consent of the governed, set forth in the Declaration of Independence, Mr. Carlisle said further:—

"So far as the example and influence of our republican institutions have educated the minds and encouraged the aspirations of mankind, a repudiation of the United States of the principle that all just governments must be founded upon the consent of the governed would set the world back more than a century, and all the arguments that have been presented, all the battles that have been fought and all the progress that has been made in the long struggle to emancipate the people from the domination of self-constituted and hereditary rulers will be lost by a single false step taken in the delirium of triumph over a prostrate and dying monarchy. Better a thousand times that monarchical Spain should continue to rule a people against their will than that the United States should usurp her place and hold them in subjection in the name of liberty and humanity."

"EVERY Young Men's Christian Association secretary I have met for eight months," says the Rev. W. F. Crafts, "agrees that more of his active members are Sabbath breaking on pleasant Sabbath afternoons than are at the Men's Meeting. The church and associations will have to unite to save the Sabbath, if only to save themselves."

* * *

But if the Sabbath cannot save itself, what power is there in it to save anything else? and how can those who are not saved themselves save something else that needs saving by taking it along with them? That is the trouble with the Sabbath (Sunday) of which Mr. Crafts speaks: a lot of unsaved people have it in charge and are trying to bolster it up by legislation and other worldly props, when they themselves have no foundation beneath their own feet. They cannot furnish a foundation for the Sabbath, when they have no foundation for themselves. As well might two persons in the water who cannot swim, try to save themselves by grappling each other. If the Sunday were divine, it would not need saving. The seventh-day Sabbath is divine, and will prove a sure support to those who lay hold upon it.

A SUNDAY-CLOSING ordinance which shuts up all business places except saloons, drug stores, and confectionery shops on Sundays, is in force at Lewiston, Idaho, according to the statement of the Lewiston Tribune. Usually the Sunday laws close the saloons, but leave tobacco shops open, on the ground that the people must be supplied with the necessities(!) of life. But at this Idaho town it appears that the opening of the saloons is also deemed a necessity. The simple truth is, of course, that the sentiment necessary to enforce the Sunday laws must be largely secured from people who are addicted to tobacco and other forms of selfish indulgence, and who are not willing that the law shall cut these off. The "Lord's day" has to be enforced by the sentiment of people who do not care how other folks are affected so long as their own indulgences are not curtailed.

THE late Ambassador Hay, who is now Secretary of State, is reported as having expressed a determination to settle finally the long-pending issue between this country and Turkey, growing out of the claims for damages suffered by Christian missionaries during the Armenian troubles. The precedent on this point, recently set up in international usage by Germany, when two German missionaries were murdered by the Chinese, would allow the United States to demand a substantial indemnity and also a slice of Turkish territory, or a coaling station at the very least. But whether Turkey is brought to terms by this Government or not, is a question that will not in the least affect the progress of Christianity; unless, indeed, the effect is to prejudice the Mohammedans more bitterly against it.

THE Spanish nation has undertaken the gigantic task of restoring its annihilated navy. At a public meeting held in Madrid the plan was adopted setting each province and the leading cities and town to the task of providing one or more ships of the first, second, or third class of naval vessels, or some of each. The project provides for the construction or purchase of eighteen first class battleships, twenty-one of the second class, and forty-six of the third class,—eighty-five in all. If Spain has the energy, patriotism, and perseverance to accomplish all this, she will become a naval power not to be overlooked among the leading military powers of the earth. But the money spent in this way must be taken from the channels of peaceful industry and advancement in civil pursuits, leaving the nation stranded upon the shoals of financial distress. What Spain wants—what every nation wants—is not a larger navy, but more of the principles of just government in the hearts of rulers and of the people.

Leo XIII., Statesman.

THE eyes of all Europe are turned towards this country, anxious to know what the Americans will do with the Philippines.

Not the least interested are the Catholics of the Old World on account of the vast interests of the Catholic Church in those islands, for the United States has demanded that there should be a separation there of church and state.

One thing is evident: the Catholics expect to be the gainers in the end, by such a step, though they may lose somewhat, even to the confiscation of their churchly possessions.

There is something however, which the Catholic Church regards more than these. What it is will appear from the following, in a letter by W. T. Stead, in the Sunday World, of October 2.

Mr. Stead reports a conversation had with a Catholic official of high rank in the Belgian government, but of pronounced liberal views, even to the extent that he thought it would be a good thing for church and state in the Philippines to be separated.

Having recently come from the Vatican whither he had been called for counsel by the pope and the cardinal Secretary of State, he was asked if the pope shared his view with reference to the religious liberty question in the Philippines.

Note the reply: "You cannot expect the pope to make any declaration in that sense. He could not do so without repudiating doctrines affirmed by his predecessors. But he is a statesman: he is a practical man, and Rome is swarming with American clerics who have considerable influence at the Vatican. . . . Of course as a matter of principle no pope can declare in favor of any refusal to enforce religious uniformity. But if you ask me what I really believe I must tell you that if the Americans establish religious liberty in the Philippines, the pope will find his compensation in the increased liberty which he will enjoy in dealing with the clergy without the intermeddling of the civil power."

Of course it goes without saying that the Catholic Church is intolerant—it is eternally opposed to religious liberty; and the pope, from principle, could not declare himself in favor of any such thing as religious liberty. To do so would indeed be to deny his church of which he is the head.

But, and mark the word, "the pope is a statesman and a practical man." Of course he is, and there is none better: and therefore Leo XIII. can be relied upon to exhibit his statesmanship by hoodwinking other statesmen (and Americans at that) into the belief that he is not opposed to religious liberty. Any loss to the papacy in the Philippines will, it is expected, be compensated for by the increased liberty the pope "will enjoy in dealing with the clergy without the intermeddling of the civil power." And this compensation Leo XIII., pope and statesman, can be relied upon to get.

That is so. For years the popes have been restive because of the restraints imposed upon them by the "intermeddling civil powers." In his encyclical of Jan. 6, 1892, to the hierarchy in America, the pope says of the Catholic Church: "She would bring forth more abundant fruits, if, in addition to liberty, she enjoyed the favor of the laws and the patronage of the public authority."

This is what she is after; this is the compensation looked for, and to get it, Leo XIII., pope and statesman, would be willing to lose a good deal in the Philippines. And furthermore, there is no question but what he will get it.

Puritan Religion.

A DESCRIPTION of the old New England Sunday is calculated to make restless children of the present day, and possibly some of their elders, thankful they were not born two centuries ago.

Sunday morning a horn was loudly blown to announce the hour of worship; service began at nine o'clock and lasted for eight hours, with an intermission of one hour for dinner and conversation. In the earliest days the congregation sat on rude benches, their seats being assigned them at town-meeting. The service consisted of several parts, which are chronicled in an ancient diary as follows:—

"Preliminary prayer or invocation; chapter of Bible read and expounded; Psalm in metre, read out line by line by Deacon S.; long prayer on various matters, one hour and a half; sermon of one hundred to one hundred and fifty pages. At close of service, baptism; sinners put on trial, confessed before congregation. Minister C. bowed right and left, no person stirring till he had passed down and out of the meeting-house."

An attempt is to be made on a certain day not yet selected in the year 1900 to take an exact census of the population of the earth, the reports to be sent in to a central establishment at Berne, Switzerland. The distribution of those who take the census will be made upon the estimates of population made by John Bartholomew, F. R. G. S., of Edinburgh. These are that, in round numbers, the population of the world is 1,525,500,000, divided as follows: Indo-Germanic, or Aryan, 545,500,000; Mongolian, or Turanian, 630,000,000; Negro and Bantu, 150,000,000; Hottentot and Bush, 150,000,000; Malay and Polynesian, 35,000,000; and American Indian, 15,000,000.

The War of Principle.—No. 4.

"THE persecution of Christians," said Cecil, "might all have been allayed, if the Christians had been willing to lay aside certain prejudices to which they clung with stubborn tenacity. They knew it was a part of Roman law not to permit the introduction of new deities. (It would seem they had enough gods and goddesses.) Yet the Christians went into Rome to preach a religion that could not in any way harmonize with theirs; but rather would work its destruction. It was not strange that they were cast into prison, and given to torture and death. But the most unaccountable part of it is, that when they were offered freedom by the doing of some trivial act of outward compliance, such as casting incense to the gods, they stubbornly refused, and preferred death to life and liberty."

"Certainly," said Aleck. "I understand that. Had they cast incense to the gods they would have denied the God of heaven, and given up the controversy. A similar act of outward compliance to law was demanded of the three Hebrews who went into the fiery furnace. Daniel, too, might have saved himself from the lions' den by praying silently as he walked the streets. And even later the martyrs, burned at the stake, might have bowed to the crucifix as a sign of recantation. The fact is, Cecil, government has no right at all to intermeddle with religion, or to prescribe its outward forms. Had the world heeded the principle announced by the founder of Christianity, and rendered to God what was God's, and to Caesar what was Caesar's, no persecution would have been permissible."

"But, Aleck, Christianity came too late with this announcement. Church and state government was the government of Rome, and it ruled the world when Christ came. The announcement of his principle would mean only revolution from the start."

"True, Cecil. The god of this world had everything arranged in such a way as to hinder God's work in the earth. But the mission of Christians in the world was to proclaim liberty. They were all in the world to point out the legitimate orbits in which state and church should move. The state was out of its orbit in seeking to control faith and enforce religion. The church was out of her place in accepting the aid of the state in any way. Christians declared that Rome had no business to dictate what men should believe or how they should worship. Rome never had a right to make such a law as you have quoted about bringing in new gods; for it took away a man's right of private judgment. A man is not a child, nor is a government a father. Governmental paternalism is unendurable. God has made us free and equal, and to man we only owe those duties that pertain to civility.

"You have said that the persecution of Christians was simply the just reward of non-conformity to law. I would like to ask you, what good followed the enforcement of these laws? What purpose did the laws serve? You have already acknowledged that Christians would die rather than obey them. But the Christians were the best citizens and most upright characters. Then these laws served one purpose only—they rid the government of its best society."

"Why didn't they get the laws repealed then?" asked Cecil.

"Why are we not afflicted with these very laws to-day?"

"Oh, I suppose it is because circumstances have altered, or because our customs have changed."

"No, my friend; it is because the blood, torture, horror of those dark days have made us alive to the danger of such laws. We have some of them still on our statute books. They are dead just now; but they are like snakes that lie torpid. At any time malignity, sufficiently reinforced, may call them into activity. You here advocated principles which, should they be set in operation, would not only shut off advancement, but would also bring back those dark days upon us. Suppose you yourself should be found out of harmony with some viper-like law, would you suffer until it was repealed, or like some cowardly soul, weakly compromise, so that if it ever were repealed, it would needs be through some more heroic sufferer?"

"Aleck, I would try to do what was right."

"Of course, you would, my friend. If you did not, you would betray your own manhood, as well as fasten the shackles on others. I know you honor those who were willing to face death rather than perjure themselves or act hypocritically. Those who lit up Nero's gardens, here also illuminated the dim vistas of history."

"And yet, Aleck, there are many things that look puzzling. The Christians certainly gave men an opportunity to think them fanatical and even dangerous. They vowed they would have nothing to do with the gods of Rome and of the world. They rejected with contempt the superstitions of the Roman family, city, and province, and it was far harder to understand the Christian than it is to-day."

"The real Christian is always an enigma to the world, Cecil."

"Well, yes, I suppose so. But he need not be a menace to civil institutions."

"No, indeed. But Aleck, some things are called civil that are not civil. There is no such a thing as a civil Sabbath, or a civil baptism, or a civil Lord's supper, or a civil conversion. It is the confusion of the civil and religious that makes men appear enemies to good government; but when good men are placed in such a position, something is wrong with the government. We find cases like this to-day. In fact, Cecil, many of the problems of the past are coming to the front, and a study of the war of principle will be profitable and practical to us to-day. We are on the eve of struggles similar to those of the early years of Christianity. Then the Dark Ages confronted them. To-day the Ages of light begin to break upon us; for while gross moral darkness covers the earth, the light of eternal day will break, and before Christ comes, crowned King of kings, and Lord of lords, in face of the law of God, the trial of principles will be over. The truth will appear, the false go into everlasting night. Good night; when we meet again, we'll have more to talk over."

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW.

"I THINK," exclaimed Joe Palmeter, indignantly, that I would have held the reins of my own government, if I were king."

"Well, poor Charles was only a weakling—too weak to resist the appeals for the annihilation of the despised Protestants, which came raining in upon him—every appeal seconded and urged by his own mother. At last, desperate and nearly crazed, he signed the fatal document, and cried, 'Kill them all! let not one live to reproach me!' The horrible work was begun at a little past midnight."

"I wonder they didn't get confused and kill each other," said Julia March.

"Undoubtedly they would have, Julia," replied the professor, "had it not been for the white badges they wore,—a white scarf and cross."

"The ideal!" exclaimed Maggie Palmeter. "White is the emblem of purity."

"But on this terrible night it was the emblem or badge of violence and murder. The dreadful work was not confined to any class,—high and low, young and old, the grey-haired man and the innocent babe,—all were alike forced to submit to the baptism of blood."

"Didn't King Charles begin to repent when he saw what he had done?" asked Milly Brown.

"No; on the contrary, the sight of the bloody corpses seemed to enrage him, and he brutally shot the poor fugitives who passed the palace window."

"I wonder what became of the King of Navarre?" asked Bert Mathews.

"Well, Bert, he professed Catholicism to save his life. All this was done in the name of religion—in the name of Him who said, 'Put up thy sword into its place.' After he had escaped from danger, he became a Protestant again. Perhaps you would all better write in your books: Massacre of St. Bartholomew, Aug. 24, 1572, when about 25,000 to 30,000 Protestants perished."

"Wasn't England a Protestant country?" asked Joe Palmeter, "and if so, how could she help showing displeasure?"

"England, as well as other countries, was highly displeased. Queen Elizabeth expressed her indignation in no mild terms, and Germany lifted her hands in horror."

"I suppose all this pleased the pope very well," suggested Fred Green.

"He appeared pleased, and even gave thanks in public over the horrible victory, but in private it is said that he wept, as well he might. This was Pope Gregory XIII., and by the way, he is the one who gave us our present method of reckoning time."

"I think that all the kings could not have been displeased with the massacre," said Edna Phillips, for Uncle Jack said this morning when we were speaking about the Spaniards that the Spanish king was real glad over it, and declared it a great victory."

"Your uncle is right, Edna; but Spain was the only country under the sun that did rejoice. Even King Charles was wretched and unhappy afterward, and imagined that he was haunted by bloody apparitions. There was blood often found in the bed where he slept, which of course added to his horror. But as he was subject to weak lungs and hemorrhages, this was probably the reason of it. Finally, King Charles the Ninth, whose name will go down to history as the king who sanctioned the most horrible wholesale murder on record, died at the age of only twenty-four,—young in years, but old in crime."

"What a different record he might have made for himself!" said Julia March, "it seems to me that kings have a great chance to do good if they will. I hope his son who came after him had more principle than he."

"He had no son," answered Professor Carman, "and was succeeded by his youngest brother Henry, who at this time was over in Poland, having been made king of that country, but now he hurried home to enjoy the greater distinction of being king of France. The people were anxious to welcome him, but he did not appear in public in France after his brother's death, for a number of months, and when he did, his people were much disappointed in him, because he seemed to care more for the basket of puppies which he carried with him everywhere than he did for his people or their needs."

"What did the people of Poland do when their king left them?" asked Maggie Palmeter.

"O, they hurried around and found some one else, and I do not think their choice could have fallen on a more foolish fellow than King Henry proved to be. He associated with the vilest characters in his kingdom, and then, by way of cancelling his sins, he would take these wicked companions, whom he foolishly called 'darlings,' and repairing to the church, they would thrash each other; this must have been very painful, for they wore sackcloth at the time, which in itself must have been torture."

"I suppose when they had punished themselves enough, they were ready for more wickedness," suggested Joe Palmeter.

"Certainly; and all this folly comes from the mistaken idea that man can atone for his own sins. But we who have God's Word to read, learn that it is only the blood of Jesus Christ which cleanses the soul from sin," said Professor Carman.

"I believe I understand that the Protestant leader, Henry of Navarre, escaped from Paris, did he not, after the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew?" asked Max Smith, "did anyone ever hear from him after that?"

"O yes, Max; when he found himself safe from his persecutors, he rallied a large number of Huguenots, and prepared to fight for their principles to the bitter end. But alas, the weapons of their warfare were carnal, and nothing but trouble could result. There was a very powerful party called the League which opposed them bitterly, and were determined they should have no religious rights at all. Yet these same people knew well that if their present king Henry III. died without a son, that this Henry of Navarre would be the rightful monarch. At last the king joined the League against the Huguenots, but Henry of Navarre was a brave soldier and a good commander. He gained a great victory at Contras."

"I wonder if King Henry III. left playing with his puppies in the midst of these troubles," smiled Fred Green.

"O no, and that is about all he did do. But he was insanely jealous of the Duke of Guise, and the influence which he exerted over the people; so, to make a long story short, he sent for the duke, and as he was entering his room, some assassins fell upon him and stabbed him to death. Then the king declared he felt better, for he could be king of his own country without fearing the popularity of Guise."

"I suppose then that the son of the duke took up the quarrel, likely, didn't he?" asked Florence Ray.

"No; but his brothers did, and as the duke had been much beloved by the Catholic element, he was sincerely mourned, and in fact the pope was so stirred up about it that he excommunicated the cruel king. And yet it was the Duke of Guise who assisted in the murder of the innocent old Admiral Coligny. So it seems that his violent dealings came down upon his own pate, in the words of the Psalmist.

"Next week we will learn about the death of Henry III. and something of his successor, Henry of Navarre, who reigned until the year 1610."

—An Ideal Book of Travel.—

BY LAND AND SEA

A JOURNEY THROUGH FIVE CONTINENTS.

STARTING from the interior of the United States, the reader quickly finds himself transported, as it were, to the scenes of the journey, the several stopping places being California, Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, India, Egypt, Palestine, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Denmark, England, and Holland. The aim of the narrative, which has been written almost wholly from original notes and observations, has been especially directed to the object of presenting the life and nature of those regions, apart from the mental instruction and its inherent features of intellectual entertainment. The author has happily found, in the object lessons of life under its various phases and conditions, illustrations of moral truths, which are portrayed in a manner at once instructive and attractive. The book contains 392 pages, embellished with over 100 original, full-page engravings designed especially for this work, and numerous part-page illustrations, and is furnished in the following bindings:—

Fine silk-finished cloth, embossed in gold and colored ink, marbled edges	$2.25

A Holiday Subscription Book. A POLITICAL HISTORY

Of the great questions culminating in the CIVIL WAR in the words of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and STEPHEN A. DOUGLASS.

555 Pages.

Cloth $1.75.

The work is entitled, "Political Debates and Speeches of Lincoln and Douglas," and contains a complete report of their speeches and debates. The burning words of these great orators are of absorbing interest both to those who have lived through the exciting scenes pictured out, and those who know them merely as history. There can be nothing better placed in the hands of the rising generation than a book presenting, in an attractive way, the principles on which this government is founded. Efforts are now being made to overthrow those principles, hence it is important that we become intelligent regarding them. The work is a great assistance to that end.

The Prospectus for "The Desire of Ages" is Now Ready.

"THE Desire of Ages" is the title of a forthcoming volume by Mrs. E. G. White. It is intensely interesting and beautifully illustrated, and is devoted to the consideration of the great truth that in Christ the love of the Father is revealed—that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

Although the complete book will not be ready until about October 15th, the Prospectus has been issued thus early to enable our agents to make a Fall delivery.

Our Tract Societies will handle this book in their respective States, therefore all orders for Prospectuses, price of which is $1.25 postpaid, and correspondence concerning terms and territory, should be addressed to them.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 20, 1898.

THE newly formed "League for Social Service," of which Dr. Josiah Strong is president, includes in its program of work all that is aimed at by Rev. W. F. Craft's Reform Bureau at Washington, and more. This statement comes to us upon unquestionable authority.

THE czar has made an appeal to the pope that the latter will not insist on raising the "Roman question" at the peace congress of European powers which the czar has set on foot. If the powers represented are each to insist upon having the things it covets, there can of course be no peace; and there could be nothing more unfortunate than for the pope to set the example in this respect.

AT Ford's Store, Maryland, where three men have been prosecuted for working instead of loafing on Sunday, as noticed on another page of this issue, the court demanded that the men pay the costs of the trial, and in one case at least, the fine imposed, before taking an appeal to the higher court. By such outrageous proceedings, in defiance alike of justice and of the established rules of law, is the virtue of the Sunday law proclaimed by its friends.

THE Rev. Dr. De Costa, a well-known clergyman of this city, asserts that fifty millions of the American people are either hostile or indifferent to religion. If this is so it constitutes a fearful indictment against the professedly Christian churches in this land; and proclaims the truth that it is high time the church should cease trying to reform men by legislation and address her petitions for more power to the throne of heaven.

THE annual convention of the Sunday Rest Association of Wisconsin will be held at Steven's Point, that state, November 9, 10. Rev. W. F. Crafts and other advocates of Sunday legislation, including leading representatives of the international W. C. T. U., will be present, and a strong impetus will no doubt be given to the Sunday movement in that State.

PRECISELY what is the significance of Emperor William's ostentatious journey to Jerusalem, is a question of some perplexity and a cause of considerable anxiety to other potentates of Europe. There is a well-defined susoicion in their minds that the Kaiser's pilgrimage is not altogether a religious affair. There is evidently an understanding between William II. and the Sultan, the scope of which is not understood at other European courts, and which may give the German emperor the opportunity to reap a substantial advantage in that important part of the Orient; and a new importance and interest may be attached to the historic city and country of the Jews.

THE Chronicle, of London, Eng., makes this comment upon the czar's call for international peace, in its relation to civilization:—

"The one point to be noted by every man is that if the idea embodied in the czar's receipt cannot be carried out, the basic ideas of our civilization are lost. We may as well throw up the sponge—we may as well cease to prate about civilization and progress—for our talk will be as the idle wind."

Of course it will, and it always has been such, so far as it assumes an identity of "our civilization and progress" with Christianity. Civilization has done much for the world, but it is permeated with selfishness, nevertheless. There is not a national or an international policy in existence that is not based upon selfish principles. And selfishness and Christianity are opposites.

The czar's undertaking is really that of eliminating selfishness from the international politics of Europe; for so long as each nation pursues its present selfish policy, their so called interests will be constantly coming in conflict, and it is out of such friction that the resort to arms finally springs. We wish the czar all possible success, but we have no faith in the power of anything short of divine grace to eradicate selfishness.

GENERAL MERRITT, military governor of the Philippines, says that the United States ought to take and hold the entire group; and the general trend of American sentiment is in support of this view.

THE Christian Ministers' Alliance of Nashville, Tenn., have under consideration a proposition to petition the City Council for an ordinance which will close the doors of all business places in the city on Sundays, except drug stores; and these, it is provided, shall be closed but not locked. This proposition is made in view of "the gradual and increasing encroachments upon the sanctity and quiet of the Sabbath day," which is viewed with "apprehension and alarm" by the Methodist preachers. Why it is that the preachers and others who wish to enjoy "the sanctity of the day," cannot do so without making everybody else keep still, is not explained.

POLITICS may be defined as the science of making servants of the people for personal gain, without making them aware that they are servants instead of rulers. This is not a theoretical definition, but it is a practical one.

SINCE God himself rested from his creative work on the seventh day, the Sabbath is God's rest; and since God's rest could not have been from weariness, it is evident that true Sabbath rest is for spiritual, rather than physical, purposes.

WHEN the church ruled the state, dissenters were put to death for being "heretics;" and when there is only an alliance with the state, they will be put to death for being "anarchists."

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 27, 1898.

NUMBER 42.

CHRISTIAN truth will outweigh secular errors and worldly follies; but the ballot is no heavier in the scale of the church than in that of the world.

others of the same class have to be employed to do the turning.

THE true purpose of government is the good of the individual, and not its own good at the expense of the individual.

THE church can never conquer the world with the world's weapons.

It is a very near-sighted Christian who mistakes the hall of legislation for the temple of God.

THE cause of righteousness was never promoted in the earth by a compromise with evil.

THE legislature which sets out to purge the state or city of sin, has forgotten that evil must be overcome with good, as darkness with light.

It is not strange that it takes so long to "turn the rascals out" of political office, considering that so many

MANY an individual is willing to work earnestly to correct the "public morals" in order to divert his mind from an unpleasant sense of deficiency in the state of his own morals.

THE Christian has become very unbalanced when it desires to hold the balance of power in civil government.

RELIGIOUS bigotry makes a man so tired on Sunday that he cannot rest unless everybody else in the neighborhood is resting too.

THE "Christian vote" of this country can never be made available for practical results upon any line of action to which the world does not consent.

THE church is the light of the world only while she remains above the level of the world.

WILL THE CHURCH VOTE OUTWEIGH THE SECULAR VOTE?

CAN the church reform society and eliminate the unrighteous features from the Government, through politics? How can she expect to do this, when her political strength is less than one third that of the unrighteous world? Why, in the face of this plain truth, does the church continually seek to set up righteousness in the Government and in society by law? Evidently, the only thing the church can do in this situation is to effect a compromise with the world, as is always done in politics by the weaker party. The world will be willing enough to do this, and to set up an image of righteousness by incorporating certain religious observances into the law; but like every compromise with the world, it will be a religious delusion. The cause of righteousness cannot be advanced by any compromise of truth with error, or of light with darkness.

Liberty.

We want no flag—no flaunting rag—
In Liberty's cause to fight;
We want no blaze of murderous guns
To struggle for the right;
Our spears and swords are printed words—
The mind's our battle-plain;
We've won our victories thus before,
And so we shall again.

We love no triumphs gained by force—
They stain the brightest cause;
'Tis not in blood that Liberty
Inscribes her sacred laws;
She writes them on the people's hearts,
In language clear and plain;
True thoughts have moved the world before,
And so they shall again.

We want no aid of barricade
To show a front to wrong;
We have a fortress in the Truth
More durable and strong.
Calm words, great thoughts, unflinching faith
Have never striven in vain;
They've won our victories many a time,
And so they shall again.

Peace, progress, knowledge, brotherhood,
The ignorant may sneer—
The bad deny; but we rely
To see their triumph near
No widow's groans shall mar our cause,
No blood of brethren slain:
Kindness and Love have won before,
And so they shall again.

Fourth Century and Nineteenth Century Parallels.

THE early Christian Church, when it went forth to fulfill the divine commission to "preach the gospel to every creature," met with severe persecution at the hands of Rome. Rome was then pagan, and the measures employed against the Christians were taken in the name of paganism, in the name of the pagan principle which compelled worship of the gods of Rome.

But in spite of persecution, Christianity spread throughout the empire, carrying with it the divine principle of brotherly love and regard for the rights of beings created in the image of God; teaching men to render to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's, and to God the things that were God's. Toleration came in the place of persecution, and a final acknowledgment of the right of the Christians, and of all men, to worship only the God of their own choice.

But ere long, a professor of the Christian religion sat on the throne of the empire, and the church which held the name and practiced the forms of Christianity became the dominant power in the land. Church and state were united, and the state did the bidding of the church. And then persecution was again waged, more severely than ever, against those who maintained allegiance to the principles of the divine government. The realm of conscience was invaded, religious freedom was swept away, individual rights were denied, on a wider scale than had been done before. But this time it was done in the name of Christianity. In the name of that which had before proclaimed the right of every man to think for himself and to worship as his own conscience might dictate,—in the very name of that which had demanded this for all men, all this was denied to men. And that produced the worst persecution, the worst state of things in politics and society, that the world ever knew. The very light that was in men became darkness, and how great was that darkness was made known by the long night of the Dark Ages.

And now, in this country, is to be seen a parallel to this retrograde movement which brought darkness and ruin upon the world then, and which can only have a similar result to-day. The United States Government arose to proclaim to the world the principles of civil freedom, the right of men to self-government. Its separation from the monarchy of Great Britain was justified by the Declaration of Independence, which proclaimed all men to be created equal and possessed of inalienable rights, to preserve which is the only legitimate object of civil government. Situated in a territory which had become a refuge for the oppressed of other lands, the principles of civil and religious freedom found in this Government the soil for vigorous growth, and the opportunity for a world-wide influence upon man. The right of men to self-government was asserted not only for the citizens of this Government, but for those of all governments on the earth.

But now, the United States Government itself is departing from the principles for which it has hitherto stood. When it arose as a power among the nations, it protested against despotism in the name of the inalienable right of all men to civil and religious freedom. Its policy was that of "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." But a new policy is coming to the front; territory is now held under the authority of the United States in which the majority of the people have no voice in the Government. This is the case in Hawaii, which is now under military rule, than which a more despotic form of government does not exist. Porto Rico is another district under the like rule, and Cuba and the Philippines are almost certain to be incorporated into the national domain on a similar footing. The dream of American statesmen is of empire, rather than of "Liberty enlightening the World" with the glory of free government.

And all this is done in the name of liberty,—in the name of the Constitution which is the great charter of free government and of the Declaration of Independence by which the national policy professes to be guided. In the name of liberty a government is set up over a people which holds them in unwilling subjection to a foreign power. Under such a policy the light of free republican government, founded upon the recognition of inalienable rights, must be turned into darkness, and only despotism worse than that against which our forefathers protested can be the final result.

And this is a real and a terrible menace to America to-day and to the world; for the effect of it will be world-wide. As Ex-Secretary Carlisle has said, "Better a thousand times that monarchical Spain should continue to rule a people against their will than that the United States should usurp her place and hold them in subjection in the name of liberty and humanity."

Reform by Law in the Roman Republic.

TO REFORM society by law has always been a pleasing vision in the minds of people who have not learned the truth that every true reform in society must begin in the heart of the individual member of it, by the exercise of his own will. This being so, the experiment is one that has been often tried, and the lesson of the results is plainly written in the pages of history.

The last days of the Roman republic furnish this lesson among many others of value to those concerned in the experiment of republican government to-day. In the last days of the Roman republic society had fallen into moral ruin. The individual no longer held himself in moral restraint; he no longer exercised the power of self-government. And this was what brought the last days of the republic, as it is what must always bring the last days of government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." Yet there was left in the public mind a consciousness of the fact that the crimes from which they no longer held themselves back were worthy of punishment; nor was there lacking a zeal to enact laws against them. The experiment of reform by law was afforded a fair and thorough test. Of this history sets before us the following facts:—

"Cæsar acted directly with the assembly of the people, and passed such laws as he pleased. Yet it must be said that he passed none that were not good enough in themselves, but they were laws which in fact meant nothing. There was no public character to sustain them, and consequently they were made only to be broken. There was a law for the punishment of adultery, when not only Cæsar, but nine tenths of the people were ready to commit adultery, at the first opportunity. There were laws for the protection of citizens against violence, when every citizen was ready to commit violence at a moment's notice. There were laws to punish judges who allowed themselves to be bribed, when almost every man in Rome was ready both to offer and to receive bribes. There were laws against defrauding the revenue, when almost every person only desired an opportunity to do that very thing. There were laws against bribery at elections when every soul in Rome from Cæsar to the lowest one of the rabble that shouted in the Forum, was ready to bribe or to be bribed. 'Morality and family life were treated as antiquated things among all ranks of society. To be poor was not merely the sorest disgrace and the worst crime, but the only disgrace and the only crime; for money the statesman sold the state, and the burgess sold his freedom; the post of the officer and the vote of the jurymen were to be had for money; for money the lady of quality surrendered her person, as well as the common courtesan; falsifying of documents, and perjuries had become so common that in a popular poet of this age an oath is called "the plaster for debts." Men had forgotten what honesty was; a person who refused a bribe was regarded not as an upright man, but as a personal foe. The criminal statistics of all times and countries will hardly furnish a parallel to the dreadful picture of crimes—so varied, so horrible, and so unnatural.'—Mommsen. In this condition of affairs such laws were nothing more nor less than a legal farce."

And it cannot be denied that similar conditions furnish many a legal farce in the American republic to-day. Good laws may be looked for as the outcome of moral reform, but it is useless to look for moral reform as the outcome of the laws, however good they may be in themselves.

Behind the Times.

THE Defender, a New England organ devoted to Sunday and its compulsory observance, devotes several columns to the publication of queries, complaints, etc., from correspondents. One of these expresses his concern over the Sunday situation in his neighborhood as follows:—

"I wish you would tell me where I can get a copy of the laws in regard to the observance of the Sabbath, that is, something that defines what is in violation of the Sabbath according to the laws of the commonwealth. There has been some work on the Sabbath in this neighborhood lately, and I know it was absolutely unnecessary, but I do not know as I could prove it before the court where the case would be tried, if they were prosecuted. I went to the chief of police, to see if I could find out what steps were necessary to stop such work, and he said that 'I would be unable to sustain any case, as the man would say it was necessary work.' It makes me sad to think that in good old New England one has got to sit down and let evil reign supreme. There is something wrong somewhere. Either the laws are not what they should be, or else those in positions to execute them are in league with those that break them."

This is the view of things to which one is educated by the teaching that Sabbath observance must be preserved by law. Unless the laws against Sunday observance can be enforced, "one has got to sit down and let evil reign supreme"! No hope in the efficacy of gospel preaching to overcome evil, no hope in the power of God to regenerate the heart, or in the softening influence of the message of divine love upon even the hardened sinner—no confidence in any power to overcome evil except that of human statutes executed by the sheriff and the courts! How far from Christianity is such a view!

Yes; "there is something wrong somewhere," and not only in that neighborhood, but in every neighborhood the world over. Men are bad, thoroughly bad. The great majority of them are controlled by the carnal mind, and the heart that "is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." And the great majority of the race have been in this condition almost since time began. Adam, the head and beginning of the race, fell from his perfection and became carnal, in the Garden of Eden. That is the something that is wrong somewhere and everywhere; but the Defender's correspondent seems to be nearly six thousand years behind the times in getting at the fact.

There is no use trying to reform society by law. Only that which can transform can properly reform the descendants of Adam. Laws are useless without sentiment to support them, and the sentiment cannot be manufactured by the law. The sentiment is the proper source of the law, and not law the source of sentiment. The transforming power that is available in this world is that of divine grace; and that is as powerful to-day as ever. Relying upon that, no one need ever feel that he must sit down in despair.

Rome's Advice to the United States Regarding the Philippines.

THE Roman Catholic view of the proper solution of the religious problems raised by the coming of the Philippine Islands under the authority of the United States is presented in a late issue of the Catholic World, by "Father" Doyle. This papal spokesman wants Protestant missionaries to keep out of the Philippines, and plainly hints at his regret that he has not the power to give his wishes in the matter the force of a command. He says moreover that the passing away of the old Spanish system is a fortunate thing, because with that out of the way the Philipinos will become more attached to the priests—as if it were not a fact that the Spanish government and the Catholic Church are in close alliance, each one giving its sanction to the principles and deeds of the other. We quote the following:—

"The coming of the American system at this time is very providential to the native Filipinos. The loves and the religious associations of their childhood, now that they are stripped of all tyrannous exactions from the civil order, will revive, and the devotion they have always had for the padres will assert itself. If in the next few years the administration of affairs is conducted with wisdom, we may hope to win the entire native population to our side. We must learn a lesson from our 'century of dishonor' with the American Indians. If we send among the Tagals 'swaddlers' and politicians to sow corruption and degradation, we shall reap the whirlwind in dissension and revolution. The possession of the Philippines will become a very costly experiment, and what is worse than mere loss of money, our influence, which has been given to us to uplift and free, will be perverted to debauch and enslave. Were I in authority I would persuade every Protestant minister to stay away from Manila. [Italics ours.] I would select the most thorough Americans among the Catholic priests of the country, and establish an entente cordiale between them and the civil authorities. I would appoint as governor-general a broad-minded military man—one who understands the inner workings of the Catholic religion. He need not be a Catholic, but he should have no antipathies against the church, and should strive to gain the sympathetic adherence of the ecclesiastical authorities. He should proceed in the establishment of courts and tribunals on the American plan, he should look out for the sanitation of the cities, suppression of rampant vice, and, as he is in duty bound, leave religion to its own devices. Proceeding on these lines, we shall not conquer the Philippines so much as we shall win them to our way and methods, and not many years will have passed before we shall have planted among the Orientals the seeds of the freest and best government on the face of the earth."

But the "freest and best government on the face of the earth" would not be where all other religions are excluded except the Roman Catholic. Where such exclusion has been maintained, the governments have been at the very opposite extreme of the freest and best, as witness some of the governments in South America. The purposes of Rome are evidently not changing upon this point.

The statement by "Father" Doyle that a whirlwind of "dissension and revolution" will follow in the Philippines unless care is taken to leave the people under Catholic influence and control, hardly accords with the claim that five-sixths of the people have been converted to Christianity, as is claimed by Catholic authorities. It does not speak very favorably for the Roman Catholic idea of conversion. True Christians are not thus led into raising whirlwinds of violence and crime.

"It is an excellent paper. Its politics are according to the gospel," is what a Methodist minister from Wisconsin writes in reference to the SENTINEL; at the same remitting $1 for a year's subscription.

Don't Cut God Out of the Constitution.*

BY FANNIE BOLTON.

WHAT would you do with the Constitution?

That you're here with your knives and scissors,
Cutting out this and that good conclusion,
And littering the floor with slivers.

What's this you've cut? "equal rights?" of all things!
Congress makes no religion!

"Inalienable rights," that you say are small things;
But you're letting in devils legion.

"Making room for God in the Constitution?"

Say, stop it! you're off the track.
Don't dare to make such a substitution,
The god you'll get in is black.
For where "equal rights" are found for man,
And "inalienable rights" protected,
The eyes of those who have power to scan,
See the God that you've ne'er detected.

God is found in the Constitution
With love and equality,
Keeping the State from a mad intrusion
On conscience and liberty.
To cull these out of the Constitution,
O never have we a doubt,
But behind it all is a resolution
To cut our adored God out.

To cut out "inalienable rights" indeed,
"Equality with the law,"
To leave the State to enforce a creed,
And to make men bow with awe,
To say all men are not free and equal,
That God may be in. O shame!
Can we not read in the past the sequel
Of God and his creature's blame?

God is always in love and freedom,
God is always in right.
Take down the tomes of the past, and read them,
And learn what is dark and light.
You've put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter,
Of righteousness made a sin.
I see from the things you've cut out in your litter
That you're letting the devil in.

Union of Church and State Condemned by History.—No. 2.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

WHEN the churches began to be corrupted by the increasing wealth of their ministers, this pagan union of the state with the priesthood was extended to them; and emperors with the Christian name sought the aid of a corrupt Christian priesthood, as heathen emperors had sought the aid of augurs and of heathen priests. Constantine, who first openly protected the Christian churches, can scarcely be supposed to have done so from religious feeling. The progress of Christianity had been very considerable. If, before this reign, the Christians did not amount to more than one-twentieth part of the population, as asserted by Gibbon, still this number of avowed Christians, at a time when the profession of faith in Christ exposed them to martyrdom, indicates that a larger number were secretly convinced of its truth. Licinius, the rival of Constantine, could not, by his heathen zeal, raise any popular enthusiasm in his support; and if we had no other proof of the numerical extension of professed believers, we may infer it with certainty from the recorded habits of the clergy. "During the third century," says Mosheim, "the bishops assumed in many places a princely authority; they appropriated to their evangelical function the splendid ensigns of imperial majesty. A throne surrounded with ministers exalted above his equals the servant of the meek and humble Jesus; and sumptuous garments dazzled the eyes and the minds of the multitude into an ignorant veneration for their arrogated authority. The example of the bishops was ambitiously imitated by the presbyters, who, neglecting the sacred duties of their station, advanced themselves to the indolence and delicacy of an effeminate and luxurious life. The deacons, beholding the presbyters deserting thus their functions, boldly usurped their rights; and the effects of a corrupt ambition were spread through every rank of the sacred order."

The splendor and ambition of the clergy manifest clearly that the Christians were become a powerful body, whom Constantine would desire to attach to his cause, and their number renders it very probable that policy was the earliest ground of his Christian profession. "His conduct to the Christians was strictly in accordance with his interests; and it is very probable that the protection with which he distinguished them may, in the first instance, have originated in his policy."—Waddington.

But if it began in policy, political considerations would still more powerfully urge him to continue it. He had learned, no doubt, from the disturbances continually excited by Licinius, that neither himself nor the empire could enjoy a fixed state of tranquility as long as the ancient superstitions subsisted; and, therefore, from this period, he openly opposed the sacred rites of paganism as a religion detrimental to the interests of the state.

On the other hand, it is too plain that he was an irreligious man. It was in the year 313 that he published the edict of Milan, by which he proclaimed universal toleration, and secured to the Christians their civil and religious rights. But, in the year 325, he ordered his rival, Licinius, to be strangled; and the same year in which he convened the Council of Nice was polluted by the execution, or rather murder, of his eldest son. "It is not disputed that his career was marked by the usual excesses of intemperate and worldly ambition; and the general propriety of his moral conduct cannot with any justice be maintained."—Waddington. After his conversion to Christianity he still continued, as supreme pontiff, to be the head of the religion of heathen Rome, and thus continued to be invested with more absolute authority over the religion he had deserted than over that which he professed. But, as he had been the head of the heathen priesthood, it seemed to him right that he should make himself equally the head of the Christian priesthood. He, therefore, assumed a supreme jurisdiction over the clergy.

One of the earliest objects of his policy was to diminish the independence of the church; for which purpose he received it into strict alliance with the state; and combined in his own person the highest ecclesiastical with the highest civil authority. The entire control of the external administration of the church he assumed to himself. He regulated everything respecting its outward discipline; the final decision of religious controversies was subjected to the discretion of judges appointed by him; and no general council could be called except by his authority. Though he permitted the church to remain a body politic distinct from that of the state, yet he assumed to himself the supreme power over this sacred body, and the right of modeling and of governing it in such a manner as should be most conducive to the public good. Thus he exercised at once a supremacy over the heathen and the Christian priesthoods. He was the chief pontiff of heathenism, and the chief bishop of the Christian church. And this state episcopate he exercised many years before he was baptized; and long before he was a member of the church he was its summus episcopus; and only a few days before his death received from Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, the ceremony of baptism.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 9.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

PROTESTANTISM can never die. It is essentially a protest against the papacy and its arrogant, its blasphemous, claims. Being a protest against the papacy, it must be that so long as that power shall exist, so long must Protestantism continue, and eventually gloriously triumph.

The principle for which Protestantism stands is the Bible as the only standard of faith and morals; whereas the principle for which Catholicism stands, is the Bible and tradition—with tradition the more clear and safe.

It is no argument against the Protestant idea, as set forth above, to say that from its beginning in the sixteenth century it has not always been consistent with its profession, inasmuch as it has taught much that is not to be found in Scripture; while, on the other hand, it has failed to teach much that is revealed in the divine Word.

Beginning with the principle that the Bible alone is the standard of faith and morals, Protestantism—consistent Protestantism—simply holds itself ready to renounce error on the one hand, and to teach the truth as contained in the Word of God on the other.

It in no wise militates against Protestants for the true Protestant to acknowledge that while contending for the Protestant principle, there were some things held to which were not consistent with the principle itself. He does not claim that he knows all that the Bible teaches. He simply knows that that Word is spirit and life (John 6:63); that the "Word of God is not bound" (2 Tim. 2:9); that the opening of the Word giveth light (Ps. 119:30). And, therefore, as that Word continues to open, and give understanding to the simple, it will simply expose error by revealing the truth. And when such is the case, the error is gladly renounced, while the truth takes its place.

This blessed work must go on until the believer is completely delivered from error, and the point reached when all he knows will be nothing but the truth; and the last vestige of error being removed, there will be nothing left, but for the Word to continue to open, and through endless ages, truth after truth be revealed.

It is possible for the professed Protestant to stop short and come to a point where, for various reasons, he will refuse to yield up error for truth. But that matters not so far as Protestantism is concerned. It will simply go on and leave him hopelessly in the rear; and he would then become a Protestant only in name.

As we have already seen in previous articles, when Protestantism began there was retained as an article of faith that which was not to be found in the Bible, but which was acknowledged to exist solely by the authority of the (Catholic) church—namely, the Sunday. Stultifying though it was, and a matter much to be regretted, it did not prove the Protestant principle wrong. Not being fully understood then, it could only be a matter of time when it would be understood, and the Sunday institution be repudiated by every true Protestant.

Nor is this all. The reader who has followed us in the investigation of this subject will have seen that when the Protestant principle came up and the General Council of Trent was convoked to meet the "heresy," it was met right on this question of Sunday.

So far as the Catholic Church was concerned, tradition prevailed, resting its claim for recognition solely upon the Sunday institution. Sunday, therefore, was the test.

That being so, and inasmuch as Protestants themselves at the Council of Augsburg had conceded as valid the church's claim with reference to the Sunday, it was clearly a victory for the Catholic Church. But it did not prove, however, that the principle contended for by Protestants was wrong. It must be acknowledged that the Protestants stultified themselves; but the doctrine that the Bible alone is the only standard of faith and morals, is eternally true.

Now as Sunday was the test at the beginning of the Reformation; as the Catholic doctrine of tradition was sustained in the Council of Trent by the fact of the existence of Sunday; as Protestants had stultified themselves by retaining the Sunday, while acknowledging that it existed solely on the authority of the Catholic Church, it follows to an absolute certainty that this question of Sunday must again come up and be the test as between the Catholic principle of tradition and the Protestant principle of the Bible only. The time must eventually come when Protestantism, to be consistent with itself, must utterly repudiate Sunday as the Sabbath of the Lord.

And finally, as the work of Protestantism, or, which is the same thing, the Reformation, expressed in the principle that the Bible only is the standard of faith and morals, was emphatically the work of the Holy Spirit; and as the Protestant principle was stultified by the retention of Sunday, which has no scriptural support, the logic of the whole thing—the sum of the whole matter—is, that with the revival of the Sunday issue, Christians and everybody else will be brought to choose between the Holy Spirit and the Sunday. One or the other must be repudiated. Which shall it be?

Rome Showing Her Intolerance.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

Two months ago we made our way up to the northern part of the province of Santa Fé, denominated "Chaco Santafecino," to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ in the Spanish language. We delayed sometime in Colonia Ocampo making an effort to spread the glorious news of Jesus' soon coming. The Lord blessed our weak effort and a small company of sixteen or seventeen determined to follow the truth as it is in Jesus. Of this number, ten were Roman Catholics.

The news spread like wildfire throughout the whole district, and the people were warned not to come to our meetings, nor even to receive me into their houses. Then began a persecution against the brethren recently converted, but God strengthened them by his grace, and they were able to stand firm in the truth, while the turbulence raged about, and were more than conquerors through Him who hath loved them.

From there we decided to go further north to Las Locas and San Antonio. We immediately began meetings in a house exactly half way between the two villages, and night after night we had the meeting-room filled with hungry souls, who sought to obtain the bread of life to satisfy their hunger.

Soon the power of God was seen to work upon the hearts of the people as we revealed the falsity of human tradition, and of the necessity to build upon something more substantial than the words of weaklings like ourselves. As a consequence, the priest became enraged and went personally from house to house, warning the people against us. In the houses of some he found Bibles and books which had been sold by our colporters upon previous occasions; he immediately gathered together a that he could find, and then burnt the same; telling the people that he would rather see them reading the most indecent books, than reading the "poisonous books" called the Bible, etc.; since such books would eventually lead the possessors of the same to eternal perdition. Some, however, had the courage of their convictions and refused to deliver up their Bibles, one man telling the priest that his eyes were opened by the reading of the Word of God to behold the errors of Rome, for which reason he prized it as his life.

Several began to fully follow the Lord, and keep his commandments, among them one young man, the son of an Austrian Roman Catholic. The father is the right-hand man of the priest, and consequently when he ascertained that his son had united with the Sabbath-keepers, his rage knew no bounds, and acting upon the counsel of the priest, he expelled his son from his house, threatening to kill him should he ever return to his home without having abandoned his "heresy," and at the same time telling him that henceforth he was disowned and disinherited. However, the young man loved God's truth more than earth's treasures, and to-day is rejoicing in the knowledge of the gospel.

The priest is now doing his utmost to incite the population to expel me from the place, and threatenings, etc., are brought to bear against me, to intimidate me, and prevent my preaching the gospel. To one Italian family he said he deplored the lack of fidelity of the members of the mother church, comparing them with the Catholics of the Dark Ages, who would not have countenanced for a single moment the propagation of such heresies as we are disseminating in his district; and concluded by urging them to a fulfillment of their obligation, to eradicate all teachings such as are contrary to the dogmas of Rome.

However, this persecution, instead of doing our work harm, has had a most blessed effect, since it has caused a complete division between the people; and our brethren are now well known as Sabbath-keepers, and although despised are preaching by their lives the importance of a practical Christianity for the human race.

One brother has already offered us a piece of land 100 yards by 100 as a site upon which to build a church in the future upon the principal street of the village.

Let us not be deceived by the false clamorings of some people to-day who say that Rome is more liberal now than before. Such assertions have no foundation; for where the Catholic Church obtains the least power, there we behold what she would do if she only could. The coercive spirit is just as much alive to-day in the Catholic Church as ever; but it is restrained only in such places where she has not the power to accomplish her iniquitous designs.

May the Lord strengthen us by his grace, so that we may stand firm in the coming hour of tribulation, preferring death or suffering to the acceptance of man-made doctrines.

Argentine Republic.

ONE hundred prominent residents of Santiago have sent an urgent appeal to President McKinley asking him to recommend to the Vatican that a certain Cuban priest be appointed to the archbishopric of that city. We have not learned that the President paid any attention to this appeal to offer advice at the Vatican, notwithstanding he has been the recipient of considerable advice from the pope.

CHAPLAIN MCINTYRE, who served in the navy on board the "Oregon" during the latter part of the war, has been court-martialed and dismissed for having uttered statements reflecting upon Admiral Sampson and Captain Evans relative to their actions in the engagement with the Spanish fleet off Santiago. Doubtless this will be a sufficient reminder to other chaplains that the Government does not solicit any activity on their part in the line of critics.

* * *

THE court-martial itself shows that the Government views the office of chaplain as being a military office, like those in any regular branch of the service; otherwise this form of trial would not have been resorted to in dealing with the offense. Government chaplains may now understand, if they have never realized it before, that the religious character of their office in no way exempts them from the discipline to which all secular officials are subject. As chaplains, they will be treated as mere creatures of the Government, to be created, disciplined, and deposed at the pleasure of those in governmental authority.

* * *

AND in this, there is to be seen as plain an example of union of church and state as is furnished in lands where there is an established state church. The General Government might just as properly maintain some church for the welfare of its citizens, and create and depose the officials of the same, as to maintain chaplains for the men in its army and navy. The principle of state maintenance of religion is the same in either case.

* * *

BUT, passing from this feature of the case, it is plain to be noted that an alliance with the state in which the state is the controlling power, will not be satisfactory to the church. For if there is one thing above others in which a clergyman does not want to be curtailed, or to be answerable outside the church of his choice, that point is the exercise of his gift of speech. He is accustomed to speak with a certain authority derived from his office as an ambassador for God, which does not attach to the words of men in secular callings. He desires to have what he says received by the people with a deference begotten of the idea that he is a successor of the ancient prophets. With this view of his office and prerogatives he will not readily fall in with a system which subjects him to the supervision and control of the secular authorities. The church has assumed to speak with the same authority upon affairs of state, as she does upon matters of the soul's welfare. She aims to have here the directing and controlling voice in public affairs, rather than to be bound by an authority making no claim to be endowed by a higher than human wisdom.

HAWAII, it is stated, will not become a Territory like those sections of the United States not admitted to the Union as States, but will be a district under military rule, according to the following proclamation lately issued by General Merriam: "For better administration, and subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, the territory lately constituted the Hawaiian republic is hereby constituted a military district, to be known as the District of Hawaii, to be under the command of Brigadier-General Charles King, United States Volunteers, with headquarters at Honolulu."

* * *

No other territory of the United States was ever in time of peace under military rule, save in case it was the scene of riot demanding suppression by an armed force. There is nothing in the Constitution or in the principles of American Government upon which the Republic was set up, which sanctions military rule over any people in time of peace. Military rule is despotism in its very nature; and it must be resorted to now because the principle of government by the consent of the governed, if applied in Hawaii, would at once throw off the yoke of a foreign power. As well might the Government set up a monarchy in Hawaii, so far as the Constitution and the principles of free government are concerned.

THE war with Spain, it will be remembered, was started with a view to the rescue of the Cuban "reconcentrados." This was the principal plea of those who urged most strongly a resort to arms. But what the war has accomplished for these poor people may be inferred from the following which is published by the New York Christian Advocate:—

"Dr. José Congosto, Secretary General of Cuba and Press Censor under General Blanco, passed through this city on his way to Paris as an attaché of the Spanish

Peace Commission. He says that there are at least six thousand sick Spanish soldiers in Havana. He affirms his belief that the great question how to bring prosperity and happiness for Cuba is primarily not political, but social. His opinion is that if General Torál had not lacked courage and gone into negotiations with the enemy, the end might have been different. Dr. Congosto, before going to Cuba, was special consul at Philadelphia and speaks English fluently. He was asked as to the condition of the reconcentrados. He replied, 'There are none. They are gone.' 'Where?' 'God knows.' 'Do you mean they are dead?' 'That probably explains it better than I can. This is a subject which I prefer not to discuss.'

"Whatever, then, we have done by the war, and it is much, we have not saved the reconcentrados."

That the suffering of this class of the Cubans became more acute upon the outbreak of war is a well-known fact. And it now appears that practically none are left to reap the benefits of freedom.

An individual who wants to be favored in his community because he "keeps the Lord's day," writes thus to The Defender, organ of the "Sabbath Protective League" of New England:—

"I keep the Lord's day. My store is open three hours, while all the other drug stores are open all day. I refuse to take a license to sell liquors, and do not sell even alcohol. On Sundays I am open for the sale of medicine only. Do the temperance and Christian people try to help me by trading with me? No; not over two per cent. They would let me go hungry, so far as they care by substantial assistance. They go to the stores that keep open Sundays, and sell all the liquors that are called for. They make these places respectable by their presence and trade."

All of which only reveals the selfish character of the sentiment which is behind the Sunday crusade.

The Pope Is Glad.

THE commissioners appointed by the United States and Spain to frame a treaty are in session in Paris.

The American commissioners demand that Spain cede to the United States the whole Philippine group of islands. As soon as Pope Leo XIII. heard of this he was glad and expressed his approval of the transfer of the islands to the American Government. At first thought this might be wondered at, but by looking a little closer, it can be seen why he has so expressed himself.

A few years ago when the National Reformers were presenting petitions to Congress in favor of a Sunday law, they represented that 7,200,000 Catholics in this country were in favor of it. Although their claim was untrue, yet let us calculate that there are that number of Catholics in this country at the present time. Now a little sum in addition will not be out of place:—

Number of Catholics in the United States before the war with Spain.....	7,200,000

In Porto Rico.....	300,000
In Cuba.....	1,500,000
In Philippines.....	9,000,000

Total..... 18,000,000

Total number of Catholics under the protection of the Stars and Stripes at the close of the war with Spain, 18,000,000,—a number nearly equal to the total membership of all the Protestant denominations in this country put together.

Is it any wonder then that Pope Leo XIII. is glad when the prospects are that there will be two and a half times as many Catholics belonging to this country at the close of the war as there were before? Rome will not be slow to take advantage of this new power. She knows that she has reasons to be happy, and it is time that the people of this country should be on their guard and know what the purposes of Rome are in regard to this nation.

ONE thing that adds zest to the diplomatic game being played for the supremacy in China is the knowledge of the undeveloped resources of the country. It is not like fighting in the wilds of Africa for land that has only limited commercial prospects. In China is a steady, quiet population, and mineral wealth which has only recently been understood. Speaking of this and of the ignorance of the fact when China began to be opened for trade, a writer says in the Journal of the Colonial Institute:—

"Few people had any idea of the mineral wealth of the south of China. Coal, iron, copper, lead, silver, antimony, and gold were all there close to these waterways, awaiting foreign enterprise and skill. Few people realized how little the resources of the south of China were properly utilized for the support of its people. Within 400 miles of Hong Kong aborigines roamed about over vast tracts of unsettled country. There was no reason why China should send one of her sons to foreign soils, as was done to so considerable an extent. The peasant of Kwangsi planted a few sweet potatoes, and barely existed; hundreds were swept away by the first approach of famine. Yet at their very feet was fabulous wealth. Mr. Wenyon said he had seen a peasant arduously carrying on his back a load of wood for fuel, over a path cut through unexploited coal in the hillside. There was more mining work in China than labor could be found for even in populous China, yet millions were living on two shillings per head, and less, per month."—Oriental Watchman.

God has no use for slaves, except to bestow upon them physical, mental, and moral freedom, through the provisions of divine grace.

The War of Principle.—No. 5.

"THE principle you have so far advocated, Cecil, is the principle of human nature, as I have said before. The natural man runs straight into the one groove that your arguments lead to,—one common mould in government and religion, or rather a government that includes civility and religion, and finally culminates in a one-man power."

"Well, Aleck, if that's the trend of human nature, why not let it develop, bud, blossom, and go to seed?" asked Cecil.

"That is just what it would do if it were allowed to run its natural course. But going to seed would not mean a future harvest. Its seed would be the seed of death and destruction. The love that would save us from ourselves, has devised for us better things, and has introduced another nature that runs to methods infinitely higher. God counts every man a king, and respects individuality. Each soul, if he will receive it, may have a power by which he becomes fully able to govern himself."

"Come, now, Aleck, that's a beautiful theory; but the mass of men are no more capable of governing themselves than are beasts. The history of the world proves it to be so. Take the very time of which we have already spoken. Look at Rome. The time was when it was republican, and every man had right to the franchise, the opportunity of coming to the front. How long did it last? Men sold themselves, not simply because they were compelled to, but because it was in them to do it. I tell you, Aleck, I believe in the survival of the fittest, and think that men are qualified, some to rule and some to serve."

"No doubt, Cecil, men are fitted for different positions; but let us strike into the principle I have spoken of. You say these men sold themselves because it was in them to do so, and that the mass of men are incapable of self-government."

"Yes, that is what I said."

"I hold that the very lowest of these low men would have been equal to the task of self-government, equal to overcoming all that was degrading in the Roman government, if he had taken hold of the power provided by God for him to save him from what he was naturally."

"Whew!" exclaimed Cecil. "Give me an example of such a victory by such power."

"First, let us take a look at Rome. The Patrician class had come to wealth, the 'Plebs' to utter poverty and slavery. The republic had become imperial. The world was under Rome, and he who had most money or most influence took the highest place. Provinces were farmed for taxes, and the whole system was one of oppression. You must acknowledge that the condition of the masses was anything but cheerful or comfortable."

"O, I don't know," said Cecil. "They were reasonably sure of food from the state. They were incapable of procuring it for themselves; so what better could they ask?"

"What, could it be tolerant to men to come to the state granary, as so many pigs to a trough? And this, too, with the hastening conviction that they should come for blood some day instead of bread?"

"O not to men, surely; but these people by their own concessions had degraded themselves out of the image of manhood. We can see this same class growing on us to-day."

"Well, the principle I hold to would have restored to them the image of manhood, and would have freed them from the necessity of going to the trough."

"I am waiting for your example," said Cecil.

"My example is Jesus of Nazareth."

"But, Aleck, is that fair? Christ was not in conflict with Rome."

"Indeed he was."

"But he was always an example to men, at least, so I hear."

"Indeed he was, by virtue of the very principle, or power of which I am speaking. He said, 'Of mine own self I can do nothing.'"

"But was he not independent of the state for a living?"

"Certainly, but it was by virtue of the principle; for in this world's goods he was the very poorest of men, and had not where to lay his head."

"How does your principle provide for a man's temporal wants?"

"By the power of God. In fact, the principle throws the whole being on God. In practice it is God and the soul only. God says, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God [mark you, not the kingdom of Rome] and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.'"

"The Plebs who would have tried your principle would have had a testing time, I think."

"Their faith would not have been disappointed."

"But now tell me how Christ was in conflict with Rome?"

"By this very principle of being sustained from above, of being accountable to God, and to him only."

"But it was the Jews who came in conflict with him."

"Yes, both Jews and Romans; but the principle that brought them in conflict was the principle of divine amenability. He came in conflict with the human principle you have been advocating, that is sensitive over tradition, zealous for established customs, eager for world-wide dominance to one ideal, and that man-made. So actually he stood in opposition to the natural development of human nature."

"Give me proof, Aleck."

"The charge against Jesus was that he paid no heed to tradition. For instance, the Jews had heaped tradition about the commandment of God concerning the Sabbath. They made it unlawful to heal, to do works of mercy, or even of necessity, on the Sabbath. Jesus overturned their traditions, and healed, and helped, and walked, and allowed his disciples to eat, and rub the chaff from the grain on the Sabbath. The Pharisees were enraged, not so much because they cared for the Sabbath, as because they resented his independence of their opinions and traditions."

"But, Aleck, could not Jesus have healed and helped and walked and talked on some other day, and spared the feelings of men?"

"No. He had a commission from heaven to fulfill. He had come to reveal God. The Sabbath day was especially enjoined that men might have a knowledge of the true God, 'that they might know that I am the Lord.' And Jesus must tear away the false environment and let the people see that God was a God of Love. He stood up in the synagogue to read both his mission and to portray to them the character of God, saying, 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek, to heal the broken-hearted, and to open the prison to them that are bound.' This was the object of the Sabbath,—to give men such a knowledge of God that they would rest in his love by faith."

"Why had the Jews so perverted the Sabbath?" asked Cecil.

"Because there is not only a God of heaven, but a god of this world, the devil. The prince of this world knew that by perverting the Sabbath, he would keep men away from God, and that by making its restrictions rigorous he would make them implacable, unmerciful, and unfeeling; in short, transform them into his own image."

"Well, Aleck; there is certainly something to think about in these opposite principles. But I must now say good night."

Studies in French History.—44.

"We are now studying the history of quite modern times, only a little more than 300 years ago," began Professor Carman. "Let us not forget that. The tragic death of King Henry III. occurred in the year 1589."

"You promised to tell us something about it to-day, professor, and as you call it tragic, I presume the particulars will be quite interesting," said Harry Ray.

"You shall hear all that is profitable or necessary. It was dreadful,—in fact the poor king was coolly and deliberately murdered by a young man—a monk—who, it is presumed by some may have been actuated to the terrible deed by motives of revenge. As the Duke of Guise was almost a saint according to the Catholic idea, the misguided monk no doubt thought he was doing a good work to kill his murderer."

"Did he poison or shoot him?" asked practical Jack.

"Neither; he stabbed him while the king was reading a letter which he had brought him. Of course the wicked and foolhardy monk was immediately killed. Thus the three sons of Henry II.,—Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III., have risen to the throne of France and passed away, and with them the last of the Valois branch."

"Then Henry III. didn't leave any sons?" inquired Edna.

"No; so as there was no nearer heir to the throne, Henry of Navarre, brother-in-law of the king, comes forward and receives the crown. He is the first of the Bourbons."

"Let's see; he was a Protestant, wasn't he?" asked Fred Green.

"Why, of course," replied Bert Mathews. "He was the great Protestant leader."

"Perhaps you would better write in your note books:—Family of Valois reigned from 1328 to 1589. They were preceded by the Capetians, who reigned from 987 to 1328, and were succeeded by the Bourbons, who reigned uninterruptedly until 1793."

"Did King Henry of Navarre change his religion after he became king?" asked Julia March.

"I see you are a little suspicious of poor Henry, Julia, because he changed his faith once, thinking thereby to save his life. Yes, he did become a Catholic after he ascended the throne; but not until he expected to lose his kingdom if he refused. Of course it is only natural to suppose that the Catholics were very much disgusted at the idea of having to acknowledge a Protestant king. Among his soldiers were many who were of the opposite religious party, and so very great numbers of them ran away from his army."

"Don't you think, professor, that if he had given them all freedom to worship God as they had a mind to, Catholics and all, it would have been better?" asked Joe Palmeter.

"That is just what he did do, Joseph, and in so doing he proved himself to be a wise ruler, to say the least. But alas! the foolish Huguenots were not satisfied that the ones who differed from them in religious creed should have the liberty which they now enjoyed."

"What did they do about it?" asked Ed Barnaby.

"I am very sorry to tell you that they began fighting their enemies, instead of loving them as Christ bids us do."

"I am quite ashamed of them, really!" exclaimed Jennie.

"Indeed, but they are no worse, my child, than any man to-day who is not perfectly willing that anybody and everybody shall enjoy the same freedom which he himself desires,—and there are many such even now. I assure you the selfish people did not all live in France a few hundred years ago.

"As I said, Henry IV. did profess Catholicism, the second time, this last time in order to save his throne. Of course this was a very blameworthy action, for I am quite sure he could not have been sincere. However, let us remember that the poor king was almost forsaken,—in fact, there were not more than one sixth of his own subjects who were true to him, and he had no friend but the Queen of England, Elizabeth."

"Was that any excuse for him to do wrong, do you think?" asked Julia March.

"None whatever. Still he proved to be a kind and humane king, and so we should not be too harsh in our judgment of him. And though popular opinion would stamp him as a weak-minded turncoat,—and rightly enough too,—yet because of his apparently unselfish love for his people, his memory is revered by them, even after a lapse of 300 years."

"O teacher!" exclaimed Julia March, "Isn't he the French king who used to say that he wanted everybody in France to have a chicken for his Sunday dinner? Aunt Eunice said this morning that this is what a French king said, but she didn't know what his name was, or when he reigned."

"Yes, Julia, said Professor Carman, smiling, "I rather think your aunt referred to an old saying of Henry IV., which has passed into history. The exact thing which he did say was this: 'I want every man in my kingdom to have a fowl in his pot for Sunday.'"

"O, Professor Carman, if you please, Milly Brown has something to read about this king," interrupted Julia March. "She has hidden it away in her desk, but I know she has it!"

"Well, Milly, we have just about time to listen to a short paper before closing; will you kindly favor us?"

"I meant to add more to it, and read it next week, professor; but I will read what I have if you like," and Milly stepped to the desk, by her teacher's side, and began:—

"Henry IV. was first called King of Navarre. He was also called 'The Great' and 'The Good.' He was born in 1553. His mother was a Protestant, and she was so afraid her little boy would be stolen away from her and be brought up a Catholic, that she took him one day and sent him over to the Huguenot army. When he was only nineteen he married the sister of the King of France. He would have been killed even if he was the king's brother-in-law, along with the other poor people at the St. Bartholomew massacre if he had not pretended to be a Catholic. He again became a Protestant and again recanted, to save his throne. But after all he seemed to have a great deal of faith that God would be with him and prosper him in spite of his being so weak and fickle. Once when about to be attacked by a large army, he answered the fellow that told him about it and laughed at Henry's small army, by saying pleasantly: 'You don't see them all. God and the right are always with me.'

"The one thing that made a good many friends for Henry IV. was his good temper; and then, he would not hardly ever punish any of his personal enemies, but would be so kind to them that lots of times they became his best friends.

"King Henry the Fourth never lied to his people. This was such a strange thing, and so different from the way the other kings acted, that every other king and queen in Europe was surprised at him.

"There was a man that wrote a book to prove that it was necessary and just and right for kings to be hypocrites. But Henry did not believe it at all, though even the Protestant English queen Elizabeth was influenced quite a good deal by it."

"Is that all you have, Milly? that was well done. If you will kindly finish your paper this week, we will be glad to hear the remainder at our next study."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

"Push Your Own Wheelbarrow."

A SHORT time ago I was impressed by a remark made concerning an individual who is considered rather eccentric in some respects, but who nevertheless, according to the remark, possesses the very commendable trait of "pushing his own wheelbarrow." It brought to mind the familiar saying of Emerson, "Hitch your wagon to a star."

There is in the human heart a desire to progress, to rise above present conditions and surroundings, no matter what these may be. And this desire springs from the Eternal, having been implanted in the heart of man at the dawn of creation. The fact that before every human soul are great possibilities, appeals to the youthful hearts with especial force; for whether or not these possibilities will ever be realized depends upon the decisions made in the springtime of life.

"Truth belongs to God. The pursuit of truth belongs to man." Yet there are those with seemingly the most favorable surroundings for advancement, who, despite an inward longing for something better which they do not possess, are prone to settle down and be content with present attainments, become a captive to indolence, a slave to inertia, with by far too little energy to push their own wheelbarrow.

Each milestone gained on life's acclivity
Increases the circumference of view.
The broadest fields lie nearest to the sky;
They see the most who highest paths pursue.

No mountain summit was ever reached without effort and the overcoming of great obstacles. But there is an awful grandeur surrounding the grotesque peak which somehow does not reach in all its fullness to the "half-way house" and the winding valley below. So it requires earnest efforts to reach higher attainments in the pursuit of truth. And the nearer we approach to the throne of God, the more we realize his majesty and omnipotence. "The path of the just is as a shining light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

The idler is not reckoned—has no place in God's universe. He has given "to every man his work"—the work of glorifying him in every thought and act of life. One cannot afford to rest his eternal interests on the advice and assistance of others. He must push his own wheelbarrow, so to speak. He must become self-reliant; must learn to think for himself—"to think God's thoughts after him," instead of allowing the thoughts of other men to come in and control the acts of his life.

It is laudable to pay due respect to those of mature judgment. But there are times in the life of every individual when decisions must be made upon which depends his future destiny. One cannot afford to risk such weighty matters with even his dearest friends. There is but One in all the universe who can render him advice at such a time, which he may know positively is not mistaken. "If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally." And when one is thus perplexed, not knowing of himself which way to turn, how precious is the promise which has echoed through all the ages, "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go." The wisdom and instruction which God gives always leads in the right direction; and how precious it is to have him as our counselor in every detail of life's experience.

There are crises in human life—turning points which affect the whole after trend. And he who would pass through these experiences with a consciousness that he has been victorious, that he has chosen the way which leads to a blessed eternity, must follow in the divine footprints although surrounded by loving friends who would fain point him to a different way. "There is a way which seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death." "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord; and he delighteth in his way." There are social questions and religious questions to be decided by every individual. But "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape." "Wine is a mocker." Therefore the divine command is, "Look not upon the wine when it is red." But perhaps our dearest friends are wine-drinkers, and urge us to participate with them in the follies of the social glass, knowing full well that "at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." It is one's God-given right to refuse to follow such dangerous advice. It is his duty at such a time to adhere firmly to what he knows to be right; to "guide his affairs with discretion,"—to push his own wheelbarrow no matter how many kind-hearted friends may offer their assistance. By their being firm to principle, others may be led to abandon the ways of sin.

We read again in unmistakable characters, "The seventh day is the Sabbath." But our dear friends tell us, and perhaps sincerely, too, that the first day is the Sabbath; that the Sabbath has been changed. Great men have said so, and it must be true. If we are not careful at such a time, we shall find it most agreeable to encourage a spirit of indifference, and permit our dear friends to guide our wheelbarrow into some by-path diverging widely from the straight and narrow way.

Ah! when God brings us to these cross-roads in the path of life, it is that he may manifest more fully to us his loving care. When he leads us into difficult places, where of ourselves we cannot tell which road to take, it is that we may learn to trust him more implicitly, while we let self and human wisdom sink from sight. The weary tourist would be at a loss to know which path to take were it not for the advice of his faithful guide who is acquainted with every turn in the way. And every pilgrim in the maze of life may have a trusty Guide who knows at all times just which road to take because he has trodden the way before us. It is said that "all roads lead to London;" but only one road leads to the new Jerusalem. With an infallible Guide to direct us, it is hazardous to follow the advice of even our dearest friends, if that advice is not in harmony with the divine Word. God wants every human soul to stand alone with him. And a soul is "never less alone than when he is alone" with God.

The Prospectus for "The Desire of Ages" is Now Ready.

"THE Desire of Ages" is the title of a forthcoming volume by Mrs. E. G. White. It is intensely interesting and beautifully illustrated, and is devoted to the consideration of the great truth that in Christ the love of the Father is revealed—that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

Although the complete book will not be ready until about October 15th, the Prospectus has been issued thus early to enable our agents to make a Fall delivery.

Our Tract Societies will handle this book in their respective States, therefore all orders for Prospectuses, price of which is $1.25 postpaid, and correspondence concerning terms and territory, should be addressed to them.

Look out for our "SPECIAL OFFER" next week.

THE seeds of intolerance grow naturally everywhere in the soil of human nature. This is why "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

THE cases of arrest at Ford's Store, Md., for Sunday breaking, as noticed in last week's issue, will come up for trial in the Circuit Court, November 7. Interesting developments are expected.

By a recent decision in a London (Eng.) court, it is established that English law holds parents responsible for failure to provide medical aid for their young children in case of sickness. By neglecting to make such provision, even though the motive be that of religious belief, the parents are held responsible under a charge of manslaughter.

A STRONG sentiment is making itself felt in favor of the annexation of Cuba to the United States, notwithstanding the assurance of Cuban independence given by the Government. A reason for this sentiment can be perceived in the light of the fact that holders of Cuban property anticipate an immediate and marked rise in property values in the island in case of annexation. It is money that speaks first and loudest generally, these days.

THE Baltimore Synod of the Presbyterian Church, after a lively discussion over the question of passing resolutions defining their view of the nation's policy of expansion, arrived at the very sensible conclusion that such matters were out of its province of action as a church body. As stated in the published report, "it was agreed that the Synod, being a court of God, had no right to meddle with the questions of statesmen and statecraft; that as these questions were puzzling and perplexing the minds of the country's diplomats, they, as laborers in other spheres, were not competent to judge of them on other than moral grounds."

THE populace of Vienna are reported to be in a state bordering on panic on account of a threatened outbreak of the "bubonic plague" in that city. Through the indiscretion of a physician who was making a study of the germs of the disease, he became inoculated, and with several of his attendants, succumbed to the disease; but not until they had exposed others to the infection. The disease seems to be extraordinarily contagious, and of a nature which baffles medical skill in its attempts at relief. It may be doubted, seemingly, whether science is really able to stand to-day between the human race and a terrible scourge of death such as those which swept over the civilized world in mediæval times.

THE Maine State Sunday school Association, in session recently at Skowhegan, passed resolutions making note of "the appalling increase of Sabbath breaking," and calling for the enforcement of the State Sunday laws. It seems strange that intelligent people will still try to suppress "Sabbath breaking" by legal measures, in the face of the historical fact that such means have always failed to bring about the desired reform. Moral reform by law has never succeeded, for it is impossible that it should succeed. It is useless to erect legal barriers against the impure stream that flows from the evil heart. The stream, dammed up, will still find an outlet or burst its banks and cause worse ruin. The only remedy is in purifying the fountain head; and this cannot be done by the law, but by the gospel.

NOTWITHSTANDING the czar's call and plea for international peace, there is every prospect of an immediate outbreak of war involving three of the most formidable powers in Europe, the czar's own nation being one of them. The cause of all the trouble is that England and France each want possession of a certain tract of land in the Soudan. Rather than give up what each claims as its rights in the matter, they are willing to waste hundreds of millions of dollars and sacrifice countless thousands of human lives, and bring untold suffering upon their people. This shows how much is really to be hoped for from the sentiment to which the czar appeals in behalf of peace. Every nation wants peace, of course; but each wants it not for the sake of peace itself, but because peace under ordinary circumstances is to its monetary or political advantage. When peace no longer subserves these ends the nation is ready to go to war.

MR. CROKER, a well-known character of this city, is acquiring no small notoriety as an honest politician. That is, he had the honesty to frankly state that because Justice Daly, of the State Supreme Court, would not allow "Tammany" to dictate his judicial conduct, "Tammany" would not allow him to retain his official seat. "Justice Daly," Mr. Croker said, "was elected by Tammany Hall, after he was discovered by Tammany Hall, and Tammany Hall had a right to expect proper consideration at his hands."

Of course, every political party expects "proper consideration" at the hands of the person it elects to office, and is ready to "turn down" the individual who would choose to be guided by his own judgment rather than the party's will; but it is not political wisdom to make a frank statement of the fact as applying to one's own party. Mr. Croker is likely to discover the day after election that honesty and machine politics do not go well together.

It is harder to regain liberty than to retain it.

AMERICAN SENTINEL

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 3, 1898.

NUMBER 43.

MERE motion, even in a straight line, is not always progress.

THE man who is careless of the truth is often very particular about error.

THE "old-fashioned" methods of reforming society which some modern preachers have outgrown, have not become antiquated with the Lord.

WHEN the state interferes with conscience, it raises its hand against the only barrier between manhood and knavery.

THERE is something very serious the matter with the eyesight of the government when it cannot distinguish the interests of the individual citizen apart from the mass.

THE hardest place in the world with a clear conscience is more comfortable than the easiest place without it.

THE great trouble with the world to-day is that it has forgotten what it ought to have remembered, and discovered what it ought never to have known.

THE pressure of religious legislation always falls heaviest upon the person who refuses to be a hypocrite.

THE righteousness which is set up by the State, is by that fact dependent upon the state, and therefore lacks the stable and permanent character of true righteousness.

THE foundation of all successful government is individual self-government.

ALL religious legislation is an effort to stagnate the current of religious thought, the flow of which maintains the religious life of society.

THE State can exercise no power for the good of its people beyond that of protecting each individual in the enjoyment of his rights.

IT requires neither education, wealth, nor political influence to be a despot.

THE INDEFINITE SABBATH AND THE DEFINITE SUNDAY.

SPEAKING to his congregation concerning the observance of the fourth commandment, the preacher says it doesn't matter about the particular day of the week; God isn't particular about that, but merely requires that we observe one day in seven, and this we do by observing the first day of the week. But an individual who chose to observe the seventh day of the week instead of the first, in harmony with God's Sabbath law but contrary to man's, discovered that the particular day of the week was really a most important matter in the view of the upholders of the Sunday law. He found himself under arrest for not observing the particular day of the week "commonly called Sunday," and the preacher explained to him very positively that his arrest was altogether proper, because in not observing that particular day he had desecrated the Sabbath.

The Development of Despotism.

TO ANY people seeking to avoid the despotism which in civil government has so often trampled human rights under foot in the past, a knowledge of the source from which it is likely to arise, is of prime importance.

The cry which is heard against the oppression and tyranny that are felt in the land, is directed almost invariably against the man of wealth, the representative of the Trust, the aristocrat. And that he is not innocent of the charges made, for the most part, is not to be denied; but the man of wealth is by no means the only source, or even the chief source, of danger.

It is a significant truth, which should be known by all and forgotten by none, that the despotism of the Roman empire,—that "furious and crushing despotism," the worst probably that ever darkened the civilized world, arose not from the aristocracy at all, but from the people themselves.

The aristocracy were represented by the Roman senate; their purposes were carried into effect by that body. But in the days of Julius Cæsar, before the empire was set up, the power of the Roman senate was broken and dissipated. It remained a part of the Roman government only in name. The shaping of the affairs of government was wholly in the hands of the people, and of their idol Cæsar. "In legislation, the senate was totally ignored; Cæsar acted directly with the assembly of the people, and passed such laws as he pleased."* The people themselves, having lost the power of self-government, set up over themselves a despotism far worse than that which had incited their struggle against the patricians.

Turning now to the American Republic, we cannot shut our eyes to the plentiful evidence of despotism lurking within those organizations and movements directly representing the common people,—despotism which has on occasions boldly avowed itself. In the State of Illinois a few years ago, for example, by the fiat of one of these organizations, railway travel within the State was completely paralyzed, and the governor was obliged to ask of an individual in no office of governmental authority, permission to travel by rail within the boundaries of his own State. And to-day, in this same State, we see owners of mine property debarred by the governor under a threat of armed interference, from the right of operating their mines by such labor as they see fit to hire,—a right which, however obnoxious its exercise may be to some citizens of the State, they undoubtedly possess under the fundamental law of the land.

Let it be remembered, also, that the tyranny which is set up in the name of the common people passes more rapidly than any other form into the despotism of one-man power. It was so in the republic of Rome; it was so in the French Revolution; and it will be so in the Republic of the United States.

The common people are oppressed; that is true. But in most cases the worst oppression which an individual suffers is self imposed. The worst misgovernment is that of the individual who cannot restrain himself. Let the people learn true self-government, let them maintain the principles of manly independence in their own lives, and the despotism of wealth will crumble away. But if they choose to oppose tyranny with more tyranny, only worse tyranny can be the result. If they choose to "fight the devil with fire," they cannot complain if they are the victims of a conflagration.

"The Ruler of America."

THIS is the title of a leaflet which is No. 9 of the "Good Citizenship Series," issued by the League for Social Service. The leaflet sets forth that the people are the ruling power in this country, and is all very good in its teaching until it comes to this:—

"Ques.—Who is above the postmaster?"

"Ans.—The postmaster-general.

"Q.—Who is above him?"

"A.—The President.

"Q.—Who is above the President?"

"A.—The Supreme Court."

This is a plain effort to exaggerate the office of the Supreme Court. A tendency to exaggerate the powers of this body has become manifest in various ways in recent years; there has even been a disposition to accredit it with having the attribute of infallibility. All this is wholly out of harmony with the truth and with the interests of American government.

There are three coördinate branches of the Government,—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The President is the chief executive. He is not answerable to the Supreme Court for any act performed in the discharge of the duties of his office. The Supreme Court is the highest judicial body. It is the head of the courts, and has no power outside the sphere of judicial authority.

The Supreme Court has in recent times given two decisions sustaining the validity of Sunday laws; and there is no question but that the Sunday-law interests will have full support at the hands of this court as now constituted. Possibly this is one reason for an exaggerated idea of the importance of this body in the minds of such persons as the League for Social Service represents.

* "Two Republics," p. 55.

The Supreme Court is all right in its place; and its place is sufficiently exalted to meet the requirements of any legitimate purpose of civil government.

Have you seen our offer on the last page?

"Boss" Rule in the Government.

THE attempt of "boss" Croker to dictate the official conduct of a judge upon the bench of the Supreme Court of this State, has produced no small stir in political circles, and elicited many expressions of condemnation from the various political organs. One of the most forcible of these is the following from the Sun of this city:—

"The attack made in this town upon the independence of the judges is no mere local matter. Croker's judge, elected here, can be sent anywhere in the State. What is of immensely greater importance and concerns the rights of every man who is not a Tammany vassal, in every part of the State, if Croker's man is elected, the judges will thereby have notice that they must obey the boss or that they cannot be renominated, and the people will inevitably, however unjustly, be suspicious of the judges. A sinister element of compulsion will fetter or will be thought to fetter the free will and conscience of the judge. By his side Richard Croker will seem to be sitting, demanding tribute.

"Mr. Croker is now seeking to extend his power over the State; and wherever he extends it, this notion that judges are responsible to him will go with it. Under the name of Van Wyck he will rule at Albany. Under the names of Leventritt, Fitzgerald, and Andrews he will be sitting upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the State. And every judge within the limits of Croker's power will have to be a Crokerized judge or fail of renomination; and every future candidate for a judgeship within those limits will have to subscribe to Crokerism, to accept Croker as a higher law, or not to be nominated.

"Justice is one, and the courts are one great system. You cannot stab the integrity of the courts in New York and not have the wound felt in St. Lawrence and every other county. The arrogance of Richard Croker assailing the freedom of the courts here assails the freedom of the courts in every other part of the State, and touches to the quick the security and the equality of the citizen under the law."

All this is true enough; but it touches only one side of the evil of "boss" rule in the Government. Boss rule in the courts of justice is bad enough, certainly; but we cannot see that it is worse than boss rule in the legislature. We cannot see that it is really worse to have the law construed according to the dictation of a political boss, than to have the law enacted by the same rule. The boss can secure his ends about as readily by the one means as by the other. Of course, it is only natural that he should want to control the judicial branch of the State government along with the others, that nothing may be lacking to his investiture with absolute power.

When the political boss dictates the men to fill the offices of public trust in the executive and legislative departments of the Government, it is no very great step in advance for him to assume the right to control the remaining branch of the Government in the same way.

The legislature and the office of the executive are fountain heads of justice as truly as are the courts of law.

We hope the fight being made against boss rule over the courts in this State may be successful; but to be truly successful it must be extended to boss rule in every sphere of its pernicious work. Wherever such rule exists government of the people, by the people, and for the people, exists only in name.

Church Rule in the State.

SOME months since there was held in Brisbane, Australia, a "Council of Churches," a report of which was printed in the Australian Christian World. A prominent speaker at this gathering made the following declaration:—

"The day has come when the Christian church must be the ruling power in the state. We do not want the control of all the machinery of government, as in the days of Calvin and Geneva, to be in the hands of ecclesiastics, but we think that now the Christian spirit in the churches should be supreme in the making and the administration of the laws of the land. Church and state will be less and less antagonistic as the world becomes more penetrated by the Spirit of Christ, and the church is more devoted to the practical work of turning society to righteousness. The church will ultimately rule in all departments of life, in commerce, the applications of sciences and art, and the education of the young. The dominion will be given to the saints of the Most High. As the wicked are out-populated by the good, so will the executive of a state become dominated by Christian brains and hands. The Council of Churches is working towards this end."

To be the ruling power in the state, is the aim of the church not only in Australia, but in other so-called Christian lands. A prominent ecclesiastic in the United States said, shortly after Congress voted for Sunday closing of the World's Fair, "I have learned that we [the church] hold Congress in our power;" and added that hereafter the voice of the church demanding legislation in support of her views of what was for the public good, would be heard more frequently than it had been before.

The church does not want "the control of all the machinery of government, as in the days of Calvin and Geneva;" for the present, she only asks that "the Christian spirit in the churches should be supreme in the making and the administration of the laws of the land." We fail to see in this a very modest demand, or one which if granted would result in a state of things essentially different from that which prevailed in civil government under Calvin.

The wicked will not be out populated by the good in this present world. That is a delusion which finds support neither in Scripture nor the facts of observation. It is of the nature of the delusive justification which the church accepts in behalf of her movement to control the affairs of the state.

Lord Macaulay On Government.

"Southern Sentinel."

THE answers to the following questions are taken from Macaulay's essays:—

1. For what purpose does civil government exist?

"Government exists for the protection of the persons and property of men."

"It is for the good of mankind in this world to have civil government."

"Government exists for the purpose of keeping the peace, for the purpose of compelling us to settle our disputes by arbitration instead of settling them by blows, for the purpose of compelling us to supply our wants by industry instead of supplying them by rapine."

2. How do even bad governments compare with a state of anarchy?

"Men are probably better off under the worst governments in the world than they would be in a state of anarchy."

"The very worst of them is preferable to anarchy."

3. What logical connection is there between civil governments and religion?

"We see some sort of connection between the very worst of them and the temporal well-being of society. But it passes our understanding to comprehend what connection any one of them has with theological truth."

4. Why should not civil governments teach religion, and punish the irreligious?

"Shall Cæsar punish the robber who has taken one purse, and spare the wretch who has taught millions to rob the Creator of his honor, and to bestow it on the creature? Shall an insult offered to the Cæsarean majesty be expiated by death, and shall there be no penalty for him who degrades to the rank of a creature the Almighty, the infinite Creator? We have a short answer for both: To Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's. Cæsar is appointed for the punishment of robbers and rebels. He is not appointed for the purpose of either propagating or exterminating the doctrine of the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son."

5. Whenever civil governments have been induced to take sides on religious questions, where have they generally stood?

"Have not almost all governments in the world always been in the wrong on religious subjects?"

"For one ruler who has been bound in conscience to use his power for the propagation of truth, a thousand have been bound in conscience to use their power for the propagation of falsehood."

6. What does the history of Christianity show respecting the union of church and state?

"The whole history of Christianity shows that she is in far greater danger of being corrupted by the alliance of power, than of being crushed by its opposition."

7. Because religion is a good thing, does it follow that the state should teach it?

"Many respectable people seem to think that when they have once proved the moral and religious training of the people to be a most important object, it follows, of course, that it is an object which the government ought to pursue. They forget that we have to consider, not merely the goodness of the end, but also the fitness of the means."

8. Does governmental interference in religious questions tend to help or hinder men arriving at the truth?

"Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely. A government can interfere in discussion only by making it less free than it would otherwise be. Men are most likely to form just opinions when they have no other wish than to know the truth."

9. Does a state-established religion prevent the spread of atheism?

"We know that the restraints which exist in Spain and Italy have not prevented atheism from spreading among the educated classes, and especially among those whose office it is to minister at the altars of God. All our readers know how, at the time of the French Revolution, priest after priest came forward to declare that his doctrine, his ministry, his whole life, had been a lie, a mummery during which he could scarcely compose his countenance sufficiently to carry on the imposture."

10. What is a paternal government, and how is it regarded by a free people?

"Nothing is so galling to a people not broken in from the birth as a paternal government, or in other words, a meddling government, a government which tells them what to read, and say, and eat, and drink, and wear. Our fathers could not bear it two hundred years ago; and we are not more patient than they. Mr. Southey thinks that the yoke of the church is dropping off because it is loose. We feel convinced that it is borne only because it is easy, and that, in the instant in which an attempt is made to tighten it, it will be flung away."

11. When do sects which hold to the church and state theory of government, plead for toleration?

"Every sect clamors for toleration when it is down."

12. What is a fundamental doctrine of all bigots?

"The doctrine which, from the very first origin of religious dissensions, has been held by all bigots of all sects, when condensed into few words, and stripped of rhetorical disguise is simply this: I am in the right, and you are in the wrong. When you are the stronger you ought to tolerate me; for it is your duty to tolerate truth. But when I am the stronger I shall persecute you; for it is my duty to persecute error."

*Essays on "Gladstone on Church and State," "Mill's Essay on Government," "Southey's Colloquies," "Sir James Mackintosh," and "Civil Disabilities of the Jews."

Macaulay was a close thinker and a sound reasoner on the province, nature, and object of civil government. His essays bearing on these subjects are worthy of careful reading, not only by statesmen and public instructors, but by clergymen and Christians in general.

Do not fail to read our "special offer" on the last page.

Union of Church and State Condemned by History. —No. 3.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

THE consequence of this union between an irreligious prince and the clergy, who were already much corrupted, was lamentable. At the conclusion of this century there remained no more than a mere shadow of the ancient government of the church. Many of the privileges which had formerly belonged to the presbyters and people were usurped by the bishops; and many of the rights which had been formerly vested in the Universal Church were transferred to the emperors and to subordinate magistrates. The additions made by the emperors and others to the wealth, honors, and advantages of the clergy, were followed with a proportionable augmentation of vices and luxury, particularly among those of that sacred order who lived in great and opulent cities.

The bishops, on the one hand, contended with each other in the most scandalous manner, concerning the extent of their respective jurisdictions; while, on the other, they trampled on the rights of the people, violated the privileges of the inferior ministers, and emulated, in their conduct and in their manner of living, the arrogance, voluptuousness, and luxury of magistrates and princes.

This pernicious example was soon followed by the several ecclesiastical orders. The presbyters, in many places, assumed an equality with the bishops in point of rank and authority. We find also many complaints made of the vanity and effeminacy of the deacons. An enormous train of superstitions was gradually substituted for genuine piety. Frequent pilgrimages were undertaken to Palestine and to the tombs of martyrs. Absurd notions and idle ceremonies multiplied every day; dust and earth brought from Palestine were sold and bought everywhere at enormous prices, as the most powerful remedies against the violence of wicked spirits.

Pagan processions were adopted into Christian worship, and the virtues which had formerly been ascribed by the heathen to their temples, their lustrations, and the statues of their gods, were now attributed by the baptized to their churches, their holy water, and the images of saints. Rumors were spread abroad of prodigies and miracles; robbers were converted into martyrs; many of the monks dealt in fictitious relics, and ludicrous combats with evil spirits were exhibited. "A whole volume would be requisite to contain an enumeration of the various frauds which artful knaves practiced with success to delude the ignorant, when true religion was almost superseded by horrid superstition."—Mosheim.

The number of immoral and unworthy persons bearing the Christian name began so to increase, that examples of real piety became extremely rare. When the terrors of persecution were dispelled, when the churches enjoyed the sweets of prosperity, when most of the bishops exhibited to their flocks the contagious examples of arrogance, luxury, effeminacy, hatred and strife, with other vices too numerous to mention, when the inferior clergy fell into sloth and vain wranglings, and when multitudes were drawn into the profession of Christianity, not by the power of argument, but by the prospect of gain and the fear of punishment, then it was, indeed, no wonder that the churches were contaminated with shoals of profligates, and that the virtuous few were overwhelmed with the numbers of the wicked and licentious. The age was sinking daily from one degree of corruption to another; and the churches were thus prepared for that fatal heresy which at one time seemed to threaten the extermination of evangelical doctrine throughout Christendom.

The Pope's Statement of Papal Claims.

IN these days when so many assertions are made by Roman Catholics and others, setting forth the Roman Church as the champion of religious freedom and the defender of the rights of conscience, it is well to know and bear in mind what claims Rome actually makes for herself on this point. The authoritative statement, against which all contrary assertions are of no weight whatever, is given in the Syllabus of Pius IX., issued December 8, 1864. Of the Catholic Church it is there declared:—

"She has the right to require the state not to leave every man free to profess his own religion.

"She has the right to deprive the civil authority of the entire government of public schools.

"She has the right of perpetuating the union of church and state.

"She has the right to require that the Catholic religion shall be the only religion of the state, to the exclusion of all others.

"She has the right to prevent the state from granting the public exercise of their own worship to persons immigrating into it.

"She has the power of requiring the state not to permit free expression of opinion."

And all this has been approved by the present pontiff, Leo XIII. In a letter to the Bishop of Perigueux, dated July 27, 1884, Leo said:—

"The teaching given in this Apostolic See, whether contained in the Syllabus and other acts of our illustrious predecessor, or in our own Encyclical Letters, has given clear guidance to the faithful as to what should be their thoughts and their conduct in the midst of the difficulties of times and events. There they will find a rule for the direction of their minds and their works."

In an Encyclical dated 1885, the Syllabus is again approved, and the doctrine condemned that "each man should be allowed freely to think on whatever subject he pleases," and the government condemned under which "every one will be allowed to follow the religion he prefers." But it would be superfluous to quote testimony of this kind, since each pope is bound to approve all the doctrines set forth by his "illustrious predecessors," and to maintain that the church, under their guidance, cannot possibly err.

Such are the principles of Rome, by her own statement; and every lover of religious freedom and civil liberty is bound to oppose them everywhere and always to the utmost of his power. But in this he is not opposing Roman Catholic people. It is in the interests of no class more than of Roman Catholics themselves that these evil principles—this religious despotism—which the papal system embodies, should be obliterated from every mind.

"Imperial Power" No Help to the Gospel.

[A London (Eng.) religious journal has the following to say on the subject of imperial power as related to the propagation of the gospel in India, which may be profitable reading for some interested in the problem of gospel work to be done in the new American possessions acquired by the war.]

The power of God, manifested in all creation, is the power in which the gospel is to go as a witness to all people. This was the encouragement with which Christ sent forth his disciples. "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations." Matt. 28: 18, 19. It was in this confidence that the early church bore its testimony. When opposed by earthly rulers their only appeal was to God, "which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is." Acts 4: 24. Paul so taught and labored that the faith of his converts "should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." 1 Cor. 2: 5.

As the churches have failed to rely to the full on the strong arm of God for efficiency, weakness has come in, but instead of returning to the Lord, recourse has too often been had to the world. Protection and favor are sought from earthly governments, but these, while ministering to carnal pride and the desire for worldly standing, are found poor substitutes for "the exceeding greatness" of God's power.

Dr. Fairbairn is about to visit India for the purpose of delivering a series of lectures on the Christian religion, for the Haskell Trust. The duty of the trust is to provide "distinguished men to discuss with representatives of the leading religions their different forms of faith, to show the points in which they agreed and differed, and to enable those who followed each better to understand the feelings of the other." Dr. Fairbairn is considered to be preëminently fitted for such work, and his approaching visit to India was made the occasion of a complimentary dinner at the Holborn Restaurant.

After the company had drunk to the success of his mission, "Dr. Fairbairn, in replying, expressed himself as feeling the responsibility rather than the pleasure associated with his undertaking. It would have been easy to go to learn, but the puzzle was how to go to teach. Religion in a sense was but an incident in the life of our people. We were an imperious race, if not imperial. It was very difficult for a religion of peace to be carried out by a people of dominion; it was very difficult for the people who were ruled to receive the religion of the rulers as a religion that was a religion of peace and humility. Christianity would have a far better chance in India if it came in its own right, to speak in its own name in absolute dissociation from the imperial power."

These words are true. Christ's kingdom is not of this world. Its sole concern with the world is to save out of it all that will be saved, and "imperial power," connected with its work, is only a source of weakness. Those who plead that the church is helped by the money and influence of the world should remember what God said to Amaziah, when he hired a hundred thousand mighty men of valor out of Israel for an hundred talents of silver. "There came a man of God to him, saying, O king, let not the army of Israel go with thee; for the Lord is not with Israel. And Amaziah said to the man of God, But what shall we do for the hundred talents which I have given to the army of Israel? and the man of God answered, The Lord is able to give thee much more than this." 2 Chron. 25.

Man's Benefaction Vs. God's.

"Present Truth." (London, Eng.)

THAT which expresses man's highest idea of benefaction is "the greatest good to the greatest number;" the gospel of God, however, brings the greatest good to everybody. It is itself the highest good,—salvation, complete salvation of body, soul, and spirit,—and it is "to all people." God leaves nobody out of his calculations. The free gift has come upon all men unto justification of life.

Many men think that they do very well if they do not do much evil. If in their great schemes for human advancement only a few people are made to suffer, they count it unto themselves for righteousness. But he who does injustice to a single soul is an enemy of the human race, for humanity is one. This fact may be a great encouragement to the many whose sphere is limited, and whose opportunities are few; for since humanity is one, he who does good to a single soul is a benefactor of mankind. More than this, he is counted a friend of the Lord.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 10.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

In former articles it has been pointed out that the Holy Spirit was the prime mover in the work of the Reformation of the sixteenth century. This cannot be denied without acknowledging that the Catholic Church of that time was really the church of God. But for any Protestant to do this would be to confess that there was absolutely no cause for the existence of Protestantism, and also to prove himself unworthy of the name.

But the Reformation then was only a beginning. It began with the recognition of the principle that the "Bible alone" is the only standard of faith and morals. It could end only when every error, as well as every abuse, should be manifested, and its opposite—the truth—take its place.

We have further pointed out that in their confession of faith at the Council of Augsburg the Protestants made the fatal mistake of retaining the Sunday institution, knowing full well, and confessing it too, that it had no authority for its existence save that of the Catholic Church, which church had been denounced as anti-Christ.

Up to the time of the Reformation the doctrine had been, and still is the doctrine of the Catholic Church, that the Bible and tradition were the standard of faith and morals.

And when the Council of Trent was convoked to meet the "errors" of Protestants, it was found that this could not be done without the council defining the doctrine of the Bible and tradition, as taught previously by the Catholic Church to be the truth revealed from God by the Holy Spirit. Tradition must be upheld or the Catholic Church would fall to pieces—an event indeed which "would please the 'heretics' very much." But in defining this doctrine to be true, the council had to present evidence of the fact so as to confound the "heretics." The only thing by which they could do it was the Sunday institution which, as has already been pointed out, had been previously conceded by the Protestants. Therefore, we repeat, the "pillar and ground" of tradition is the Sunday. And as without tradition, the Catholic Church would have fallen to pieces, and the Sunday being the foundation of tradition, it is perfectly plain that without the Sunday the Catholic Church would have collapsed. Therefore, in the fullest sense of the word, Sunday is the mark of the Catholic Church. See Rev. 13: 15-17; Rev. 19:20.

Now as the principle of the Reformation was the "Bible only," and the Holy Spirit was the prime mover in that work; and as all this was in protest of the Catholic principle of the Bible and tradition; and as the foundation of this principle is the Sunday, it follows, as certainly as that two and two make four, that the Reformation cannot be completed until Sunday is repudiated by all who would stand upon the Protestant principle.

And as the Holy Spirit and the Protestant principle are inseparably connected, so is it undeniably true that all must be brought to the point where they must either reject the Sunday or reject the Holy Spirit. This is not to say, however, that those who now keep Sunday do not have the Holy Spirit, but it is to say that all who possess the Spirit will, by the Spirit, be brought to the knowledge of this question, and then they must decide which they will retain. They cannot retain both.

All this is carefully noted in "the Scripture of truth," and as the Scriptures cannot be broken, it will come to pass. And an important question may be asked just here: Is it now being fulfilled?

In the light of the foregoing, whenever it shall be fulfilled, the times will be no less interesting than those of the sixteenth century; and really, they will be more so, inasmuch as the very gist of the whole question will come up for settlement then, while back there it was overlooked and not understood. The battle will be fierce, but not long, for the Lord will cut short the work in righteousness.

Now if these things are noted in the "Scriptures of truth," as mentioned above, it needs no argument to prove that the Holy Spirit will lead the believer to that portion of the Word wherein they are contained. It could not be otherwise, inasmuch as the Protestant principle is the Bible alone. It can be settled only by the divine Word. And furthermore, when the question does come up, it must, in the very nature of things, introduce the question as to what day is the Sabbath.

But one thing must not be lost sight of. This question cannot come up, excepting in a secondary way, as between the Catholics and the Protestants. The Sunday question is settled for all time, so far as the Catholic Church is concerned. The issue now must be in the first instance between Protestants themselves.

But this will be considered more fully hereafter.

HAS the lust of empire and the passion of conquest made the people so mad that it cannot see the mischiefs and the misery that the imperial policy is destined to entail? Is it true, above all, that the followers of Him who came to teach men how to beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks are eager, instead of striving to abolish the bloody and brutal duello of nations, to reënthrone it? Are "peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety," to prevail among us by cutting one another's throats? For one, I disown so barbarous a conception of our calling in the world as at once a libel upon our civilization and a dishonor to our common Lord and Master.—Bishop Potter.

ACCORDING to the Advance, a Congregationalist journal of Chicago, there are 11,000,000 children in the United States who are not in any Sunday-school, exclusive of infants.

TAKING a "bird's eye view," as it were, of the conspicuous features of political and social activity the world over, a New York daily is moved to comment as follows on the question whether nineteenth century progress is really as great as it seems to be:—

"After all, what progress have we made since the Vandal invasion, or, for that matter, since Cain slew Abel?

"In the Soudan the Briton and Gaul are quarreling over the land that belongs to neither, except by right of invasion and slaughter.

"In the land made holy by the birth of the Son of God a young Teuton is maturing plans to seize lands not his own and to rule peoples that neither know him nor will willingly accept him when they do.

"In China the powers of civilized Europe are already licking their chops in anticipation of dividing the spoil of a dismembered nation.

"In our own country whites and blacks are engaged in homicidal strife.

"It is the same story in all the world; the old story of 'might is right.'

"And yet some poor fools think they can abolish war."

THE Union Signal announces that "the annual convention of the Illinois Free Methodist Church passed resolutions putting the conference on record as unalterably bound to support the prohibition party, thus placing it in the position of the first church to actively enter politics."

This is a case of church activity in politics, certainly; but that is nothing strange or new for these days. Every church which is working to establish righteousness in the earth by legal measures is of necessity actively engaged in politics.

* * *

SENATOR M. S. QUAY, for many years the most conspicuous figure in Pennsylvania politics, is in trouble, being under a charge of having unlawfully appropriated State funds for his own use, for which he seems likely to be brought to trial. And we do not observe that anything is being done to help him by the party who stand for religious legislation. Have these good church people forgotten that it was Senator Quay who bore aloft the standard of Sunday legislation in Congress in 1892,—had the fourth commandment read by the clerk in the United States Senate in support of a proposed Sunday law for closing the World's Fair, and secured the vote of that body in favor of the law? Probably they have not; yet from all appearances it would seem that they are no more ready to stand by Mr. Quay in his trouble than they were to stand by Congressman W. C. P. Breckinridge, another champion of their cause, when he was in trouble some years since. This has an appearance of base ingratitude.

* * *

"EVERY question which affects the welfare of the people," says the Union Signal, "is a religious one. We do not want politics in religion, but we do need religion in politics."

Not "every question which affects the welfare of the people" can be settled by politics; and no religious feature of any question can be settled by that means. "Politics in religion" is confessed to be out of place; but if politics is kept out of religion, how much religion will get into politics? We cannot see a distinction where there is no difference. If politics is kept separate from religion, how can religion at the same time be joined with politics? This is a mystery to us. How can religion joined with politics make a different mixture from politics joined with religion?

Religious Freedom in Colombia.

AN advance step towards the establishment of religious freedom has been gained in Colombia, S. A., in that the circulation of the Bible is no longer to be prohibited by the government. A New York religious journal says:—

"The long contest with regard to the circulation of the Scriptures in the United States of Colombia seems to have been decided at last in favor of the circulation. An official decision has been received from the authorities at Bogota to the effect that the sale of the Scriptures is not prohibited by the laws of the republic; that the articles of law which the Roman Catholic clergy were trying to use give no right to the church to interfere in the commerce of books not prohibited, and that the censorship prohibited is to be invoked only in the case of books for public instruction in government schools.

"The contest carried on by Mr. Norwood, the agent of the American Bible Society, has been long and at times very discouraging. Repeated reports have been made by lawyers and men of education in favor of the circulation, but uniformly overborne by the bishops, and occasionally by civil authorities under the influence of the bishops. At last, through an interchange of communications by Mr. Norwood with the governor of Santander and the American minister in Bogota, this decision has been reached, which it is to be hoped will close the difficulty so far as the government is concerned, although it is not doubted that the priests will continue to oppose wherever they can."

The Civic-Philanthropic Conference.

BY FRANCIS E. BOLTAN.

THE Civic-Philanthropic Conference has just closed its second annual session, at Battle Creek, Mich. A very widespread, intelligent interest has been awakened in the social and economic problems of the day by the able presentations of the prevailing conditions in city, village and rural districts.

The speakers were not only men of ability, culture, and practical experience, but were also of earnest purpose, thoroughly alive to the perils of society, thoroughly possessed with the spirit of doing something to lift the low, to ameliorate the sorrows of the unfortunate, and to carry into the world the salt of practical love and salvation.

Rev. David J. Burrill, D. D., pastor of the Collegiate Reform Church, New York, was general presiding officer. The chair was yielded under special topics to Hon. S. M. Jones, mayor of Toledo, to Wm. E. Quine, M. D., of Chicago, and to others.

The question of the betterment of the World was dealt with under the general heads of Socialism, Sanitation, Education, Christianity, and Law. Under the head of Socialism the discussion covered the following topics: "social settlements," "systematic charities," "the social field," "a socialist's confession of faith," "the co-operative idea," "the wage earner," "social needs of rural districts," "social regeneration," "charity and co-ordination of social forces."

Under Sanitation, fifty prominent physicians discussed "public and personal hygiene," "proper dietetics," "city and country sanitation," "contagious diseases," and related themes.

Under Education, prominent educators discussed "the newer education," "the school of the future," and kindred topics.

Under Christianity, "the church and the masses," "the economics of Christianity," "district nursing," "relation of the Christian ministry to civic questions," "the Christian conscience and socialism," "social reforms of the Bible," "my brother," an "every day church," "the ministry of neighborliness," "Christly personal ministry," were considered.

The legal side was dealt with under the topic that the state of the law is the true test of a nation's progress.

While there was some variance in the theories of reform, there was the utmost unanimity in picturing the state of the world as progressing in sorrow, sin and crime. Not that anyone declared this in so many words, but it was the logic of all the arguments and statistics. While crime, poverty and suffering is growing in our large cities, villages also are becoming degraded, and country districts losing their independence. On the other hand, capital is growing in power; and luxuriance and extravagance make painful the contrast between the rich and the poor. Many predicted an inevitable clash of no small dimensions between the laborer and the capitalist.

The world in the past has suffered from the same causes, and has reaped the results in revolution that are promised in the strife of to-day; but never have the conditions existed that do to-day, making the outcome more bitter and inevitable.

In the past an undersupply has necessitated the underfeeding of the less fortunate; but to-day, because of the increase of commodities through machine power, men are thrown from their positions, and labor has depreciated. The capitalist becomes the hoarder of over-production, and while his granaries are bursting, his factories packed, the unemployed go hungry and unclothed.

The general deduction from the discussion of social conditions, was, a fast onswEEPing revolution. Socialism in the sense of a new division of commodities was bound to come. The need of directing and controlling the movement was painfully apparent, lest in the swiftness of its arrival the suffering of the world would be unbearably intense. How to stay the tide and ease the pressure was a question that ought to concern every intelligent lover of mankind.

The very fact that trusts and corporations were becoming fewer, and more powerful, dictating terms to laborers and consumers, controlling larger interests in civic affairs, while laborers were becoming rebellious and even anarchical, foreboded the coming storm.

While listening to the socialistic presentations, we were forcibly reminded of Edward Bellamy's vision of the 20th century, when from such conditions, he pictures the State as finally becoming the conservator of wealth, with power to deal it out for the use of society. Many of the speakers looked forward hopefully, yet all agreed that the solution would come, unless miraculously hindered, by bitter revolution and social strife, such as marked the downfall of the fabled Atlantis, or the realistic overthrow in the French revolution.

The frightful social conditions described, were substantiated by appalling statistics. Rev. W. E. McClennan, after portraying the slum and criminal districts of Chicago, branded both church and State as culpable because of the most selfish neglect of the poor and oppressed, and declared that the word "neglect" lay at the foundation of all that made the slum.

In the most densely populated districts of this wicked city, sanitation was utterly unknown. The streets and alleys reeked with filth, and no city health board did aught to clear it away, either for the sake of the poor, or for the general health of the city. Thousands of children in these districts were prohibited the advantages of education, because school buildings were not provided, although in richer districts there was more school room than could be utilized. And here where the poor congregated, the church was rarely found. Even missions were few and far between, and a light here and there shone feebly in the midst of crime, poverty, sickness and sorrow.

Prof. G. D. Herron of Grinnell College, presented a powerful appeal to the Christian conscience, pointing out the perils in the industrial systems of the day, that menace not only life but liberty, and seek not only to enslave men for material needs, but to fetter thought, and finally bind conscience. Not only are men becoming victims to the greed of gold, but women and children as well. Thousands of children toil in coal pits, not to speak of the thousands in shops, factories, stores, etc., from the age of six and seven. The almighty dollar stands behind the souls of men with its scourge of cords.

Professor Boone and others spoke of the education demanded by the times as one that would consider the individual, and his adjustment to social needs.

Under sanitation, Doctors Kellogg, Quine, Danforth, and others set forth the need of public sanitation and personal health. While they insisted on the quarantine of consumptives, and the victims of other contagious diseases, they also insisted that it was incumbent on every one to have and cultivate such health as would cope successfully with the germs and microbes of this degenerating age. They discussed pure diet, hygiene and proper training, and landed the conference out of the great general mass of miseries into the home, and set it face to face with the individual.

The discussion under the head of Christianity emphasized still further the need of individual, personal contact and brought us one step onward into the realm of morals. In fact, it was clear that the realm of conscience is the fundamental realm for reform. The question under this head was warmly discussed, and left the conviction firmly fastened upon us that every man owes it to every other to preach to him the gospel of Christ.

While much was said in regard to going to the polls, and the relation of the clergy to politics, the logic of the arguments led rather to persuasion than to law; for it was evident that each man must choose his life for himself. The need of reform brought the conference at this period to the hopelessness of reform without regeneration, and so step by step from the vast social, economic miseries, we were led back to Christ the regenerator of the soul. From out the mass of theories, one command seemed axiomatic—"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

At this stage Doctor Cady and Rev. Brushingham emphasized the principle of neighborliness and Christly ministry. Man to man, heart to heart, the work of reform is to be carried out by the power of God, working with the coöperation of the human will.

W. S. Sadler and Doctor Paulson, of the Star of Hope Mission and the Sanitarium, brought forth examples, proving the value of this method, and urged that Christians scatter the salt of love that is to preserve the world. All other salt is non-preservative.

Doctor Mason (colored) gave an eloquent rehearsal of the progress of the colored race in our midst, also pointing out the Christian element that accounted for the uplifting of the oppressed people, and making it clear that their progress would continue in proportion to the dissemination of the gospel.

Doctor Pierson, the philanthropist; who has already given away millions in building and endowing colleges and in other philanthropies, put the capstone on the proceedings by showing how Christian men and women teachers influenced cultivated talent in the young to give itself to mission work, and to the dissemination of Christian principles. He demonstrated the fact by the success that had attended his own philanthropy, that money had a mission in regenerating society, and in bringing the world to a knowledge of Christ.

Under the head, "The state of the law a test of human progress," it was clearly shown by Hon. Fred. M. Maynard, attorney-general of Michigan, that where law is administered equally for the protection of inalienable human rights, where civic functions are confined to civic affairs, where thought and speech are unfettered, and conscience free, the true test of progress notes the nation as in a high state of civilization and happiness. The paper deprecated any reversal of this policy, and pointed out the duty of repealing laws from our statute books that tended in another direction.

Most of the speakers, in spite of the horrifying conditions they pictured, hoped for the millennium and the speedy reign of Christ on earth. With this conclusion many were obliged to take issue, as all the conditions pictured are signs, not of a millennium of peace, but of the overthrow of human kingdoms, the destruction of earthly governments, the desolation of the world, previous to a thousand years of chaos and silence. Not till the end of the thousand years, when evil will meet its final destruction, when the earth is renewed to Edenic beauty, can we hope for the reign of Christ on earth. Then the glory of the Lord will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. Then the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away. Then the new Jerusalem, the city built by God, will present the type of the ideal city, and the redeemed, immortal beings will fill it with joyful hallelujahs.

Till then it is the Christian's duty to preach the gospel to every creature, and pluck men as brands from the burning, out of the soon-coming general conflagration. The warning of the Word is, "Say ye not, A confederacy;" but "Prepare to meet thy God."

WHEN the church argues the necessity of legislation in the sphere of religion, she argues against the power of godliness.

If the Christian Church cannot serve society better than any other organization, her mission on earth is a failure.

The War of Principle.—No. 6.

"WE were talking of the conflict of Christ with human tradition," said Cecil. "You said, Aleck, that the devil, who is god of this world, had made men pervert God's law to serve his own ends. Were not the Jews sincere in their perversions? And does not God take account of sincerity?"

"Certainly, Cecil. But they were not always sincere; for light came to them. Jesus showed them that they worshiped vainly, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. Their guilt began when they refused to acknowledge truth, against their own convictions. Afterward the conviction passed away, and left them the prey to deception."

"On what charge was Jesus put to death, Aleck?"

"Let me see. A series of charges were brought against him. For three years and a half he preached in Jerusalem, everywhere coming in conflict with established customs, and overturning tradition. He brought men face to face with God, making them understand their accountability to the Judge of all the earth."

"This occasioned great discussion. You remember, Cecil, that they were looking for the Messiah, and according to their false conception, expected a temporal king that would not only free them from the Roman yoke, but make them the sovereigns of the world. At first they looked to Christ as they saw his miracles, as the one who might fulfill their expectations; but his doctrine of lowliness disappointed them, and his cutting truths roused their animosity. The hierarchy especially disapproved of him, and finally in real fear of his influence declared that it was not safe to let him alone any longer. He must be stopped. His doctrine that taught men to rely wholly upon God and not upon arms or temporal power, seemed incompatible with the preservation of the State. With such a power as Rome already had over them, with such power as she could exercise, and with these unearthly teachings taking hold of the people, the men in power were constrained to say, 'If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him, and the Romans will come and take away our place and our nation.'"

"Well, I should think they might well have feared it," said Cecil, "for it does seem that the teaching of Christ would forbid the use of arms, by which civil governments must be sustained."

"Yes, from a natural point of view, it would seem they could not exist. However, if a nation per capita trusted in God, they would see his mighty work. The God of thunder could answer by fire if he chose."

"Well, go on with your story of Christ. I am not as well informed on these lines as I might be."

"The Jews had no power to put Christ to death. They therefore brought him before Pilate, the Roman governor, and accused him of being a malefactor, a criminal. The crime they accused him of was that he made himself the King of the Jews. This would seem to Pilate as if he were trying to overthrow the Roman power in Judea, and put him in bad odor with Cæsar."

"I remember his reply," said Cecil,—"My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered unto the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." Aleck, here is a clear acknowledgment that the kingdom of Christ and the kingdoms of the world cannot harmonize."

"As they are, they could not; but if men were of his kingdom per capita, then,—well then of course it would be the kingdom of Christ, and the kingdoms of the world would not be. His will would be done on earth, as it will be some day, even as it is in heaven."

"But, Aleck, how that answer must have chagrined the Jews. Pilate did not deliver him to death on that charge, did he?"

"No, he did not deliver him to death on any charge. He never believed him guilty of death. The desire for Christ's death originated in selfishness, in a lack of faith in God, for they said, Our nation will be overthrown."

"The next charge they made was, that he made himself the Son of God. In that charge you have the real kernel of their enmity. In the fact that he acknowledged himself dependent on God, he revealed the principle that aroused their antagonism, because it rebuked their practice. He exemplified it. He lived as if God and himself were all. He lived as though he must give an account to God, as though God were all-powerful, all-wise, all love. He believed this principle not as a theory, but as a fact, and exemplified it in his life. This brought him into conflict with those who trusted in themselves, trusted in any thing and everything but God. For adherence to this principle he was consigned to the cross."

"Why, Aleck, it seems to me that I have read that when Pilate heard that he was the Son of God, he tried harder than ever to release him."

"Yes, that is so. I only meant that he was put to death because of this principle. The reason of his deliverance to death is found in the cry, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend. Whosoever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Cæsar.'"

"The weakness of Pilate in going against his convictions, was the weakness of the opposite principle by which his life was controlled. His was the principle of the world,—reliance upon man. It led him to dread the accusation that would come to Cæsar against him, that would probably throw him from his position, and might even cost him his life. He sacrificed Christ rather than himself. As a citizen he could find no fault with him. Like Daniel, no fault could be found with him save concerning the law of his God. Godliness brought him to his death, and this shows that the animosity proceeded from the power behind the throne, from the ruler of the darkness of this world."

"Well, Aleck, it does seem indeed, that there are two warring principles in this world. What a pity it is that either one or the other of them could not have full sway and control the world, so that war and revolution might cease.

"However the study promises to be interesting, and I feel like following up the conflict. Our day does not seem to be greatly afflicted with an energetic display of either of them."

"We'll see, we'll see," said Aleck, as he bade his friend good night.

Studies in French History.—45.

"I THINK before we proceed," began Professor Carman, "that we will hear a little more about Henry IV., if Milly has her paper prepared; because he was a very popular king, and has an interesting history."

"Papa helped me find a few facts, professor," said Milly, or I could not have written a dozen lines, I guess; and then he remembered some things that he learned when he was a boy—papa says that's the time to learn things, if you want to remember them."

Then Milly unfolded her paper and began:—

"When King Henry IV. was first made king, he was very poor in purse, for he had had a real hard time of it. He was so poor that he had to borrow some of the late king's clothes. But I think that he was just as good a man exactly for all of that.

"When the people went to crown him, they could not find any crown to put on his head. The Catholics had destroyed the crown,—and it used to be Charlemagne's too,—they had melted it to get the gold. So they fixed him up a new one, and he was crowned in it.

"Papa told me this little story to illustrate the good nature of King Henry, and to show that he was as full of fun as common people.

"The Duke of Mayenne had given him at one time no end of trouble, but when the time came that he could revenge himself upon him, he only sent for him to come and visit him. This duke was so fat he could hardly walk about. So one day the king invited him to take a walk around in the garden with him; now as the king was quite slim, it was no trouble for him to walk, but it was very hard for the fat duke, whom the mischievous king kept walking just as fast as he could possibly walk, until the fellow was so used up he could go no farther. Then the king laughed at him and told him that was all he intended to punish him for all his misdeeds. The poor duke was so fat he couldn't hardly get down on his knee to thank the king.

"In 1598 Henry sent out a paper which history calls the Edict of Nantes; and in this paper he said that both the religions should be protected. Papa says he thinks this was a good thing, and so do I. The Catholics were very, very angry about it, but the king was bound to have his own way.

"There had been so much war and trouble that the poor people were in an awful state, they did not have any money at all, hardly. The people had been cheated out of a lot of cash, supposing they were paying their taxes, when they were really being robbed by the great rich lords. While the Protestants and the Catholics were having their battles, the country had been going to rack. There were a great many bridges spoiled, the roads needed attention, and the farming country was in a bad state. So Henry had to begin all over again, and build bridges and get the people to drain their lands, and go to sowing and raising food from their farms.

"Finally a bad man stabbed and killed the king, May 14, 1610."

"Thank you, Milly," said her teacher, kindly, "you have brought to light many facts. Yes, the poor king was cruelly assassinated at last, after the cruel deed had been attempted no less than nineteen different times.

"He had placed a faithful man at the head of affairs, whose name was Sully, who says that the people wept and mourned bitterly over the king's death. The theory was that his murderer was half crazy. Though he was tortured in every conceivable manner, he would not own that anybody had hired or asked him to do the dreadful deed."

"I don't believe you have mentioned any real bad faults that King Henry IV. had," said Harry Ray. "Guess he didn't have any, did he?"

"I dislike to mention the faults of so kind a ruler as Henry IV., though he had them—one of which was his fondness for the society of profligate women. You know the Bible says that a little folly in a man who has a reputation that is good is like dead flies in the apothecary's ointment.

"There is one more virtue I must mention in this connection which Henry had, and that is, he was very fond of his children, and was kind and good to them always. Perhaps he spoiled them by over-indulgence, for when his young son Louis XIII. took the throne, it was plain to be seen that he had never been made to obey, which is the first lesson a ruler should learn. He was only nine years old when his father died, but the good man Sully would have done well by the people and managed wisely until Louis was old enough, if he had been allowed to."

"What did they do?" asked Max Smith, "that child wasn't able to govern a kingdom."

"O no; but he would have done nearly as well as the poor fellow whom the foolish queen mother did choose to keep things in order. His name was Concini. The nobles and lords did not like him very well, for he was an Italian; but they didn't say much until the man stopped giving them money out of the treasury. Then they suddenly awoke to the fact that he was a miserable foreigner anyway, and they had no use for him.

"When little Louis was only thirteen years old, it was decided that he was old and wise enough to take the management of a mighty kingdom into his own hands."

"The ideal!" exclaimed Fred Green. "I'm older than that myself, and I think I'd make pretty poor work governing a lot of people. Why I can't even govern myself, sometimes."

"I don't think he could govern himself very well, at least he could not or did not, rather, govern his own evil and jealous temper; for the very first thing he did after he ascended the throne was to conspire against the great marshal Concini, and cause him to be assassinated."

"Horrible! that was dreadful business for such a young chap, I think," said Bert Mathews.

"It was, indeed. Then they took Concini's poor wife and tried her for sorcery, and she was beheaded."

"I suppose then the little king thought he could have his own way, didn't he?" asked Julia March.

"Yes; for his first words were: 'Now I am king!' But the fellow who did the wicked deed now gave poor Louis as much trouble as the man had whom he had murdered. And as for poor, oppressed France, how she suffered! The good work which King Henry IV. had done for the suffering poor was soon spoiled; for the rich nobles did not rest until the poor people were again wholly in their power."

"I presume the poor fellows didn't get chicken for dinner very often any more," sighed Edna Phillips.

"No, Edna; the young king cared for no one's comfort except his own. The words of Solomon, that wisest of all men, were in this case proved to be very true:—'Woe unto thee, O land, when thy king is a child.'"

"We will continue the study of France and her mournful history under Louis XIII. next week; and I would like you all to learn as much and find as many facts as possible about the great Cardinal Richelieu, who played a prominent part in the history of France at this time, so that if I ask you a few questions, you may be ready with the answer."

A Holiday Subscription Book.

A POLITICAL HISTORY

Of the great questions culminating in the CIVIL WAR in the words of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and STEPHEN A. DOUGLASS.

555 Pages.

Cloth $1.75.

The work is entitled "Political Debates and Speeches of Lincoln and Douglas," and contains a complete report of their speeches and debates. The burning words of these great orators are of absorbing interest both to those who have lived through the exciting scenes pictured out, and those who know them merely as history. There can be nothing better placed in the hands of the rising generation than a book presenting, in an attractive way, the principles on which this government is founded. Efforts are now being made to overthrow those principles, hence it is important that we become intelligent regarding them. The work is a great assistance to that end.

HELPS TO THE STUDY OF THE BOOK : OF : GENESIS.

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 14—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

DON'T pass over the report of the Civic-Philanthropic Conference given in this issue; page 685.

IT has cost the Government the lives, of 2,906 citizens to conquer Spain in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. Of this number 2,600 died from disease in the camps.

THE political campaign is on again in full tide, and as usual, it is being fought over the issue of "honest government." The party that has been out of power cries that the dishonesty and corruption shown by the party in power must be stopped; that this is what their platform declares for, and the people have only to elect the nominees of this honesty-in-government party, to bring to an end the waste of public money and stop the tide of political corruption which has disgraced the state, etc. And the people are expected, seemingly, to renew their confidence year after year in these party promises, undismayed by past failures in their performance. There is something about all this that is not very flattering to the intelligence of the common people.

PRESS dispatches state that Kitchener, the English hero-general, immediately upon his return to England from the Soudan, was besieged by agents of two English publishing firms, asking him to write a book, and by an American agent who wanted him to make a lecturing tour in the United States. The characteristic craze of the age is to turn everything, no matter what, into a scheme for money-making, at the first possible opportunity. We may expect soon to see expeditions fitted out and sent to Africa or some other uncivilized land to fight with whatever people they may run across, for the sole purpose of turning up a profitable publication or making the opportunity for a successful lecturing tour, when the heroes of the enterprise get back to civilization.

AFTER having "protected" and "pacified" Egypt for a number of years, England will now annex Egypt and every piece of territory that can be construed into an Egyptian dependency. No one, of course, expected the outcome to be anything else.

IT has been finally decided by the French authorities that Dreyfus, the jealous eye upon whatever portends the extension of German Protestant rule in that field. Probably there is no place where the different "Christian" bodies more cordially hate and oppose each other than at Jerusalem. There is of course no such thing as Christian hate, save hatred against sin.

THE governor of Illinois has threatened to oppose with Gatling guns any attempt of the mine owners at Virden to import into the State negro laborers to operate their mines in the place of the men who are on strike. There is no law which justifies the governor in this action, but there is a very strong sentiment at Virden against the importation of cheap labor to take the place of that which would naturally be supplied by residents of the town. On the other hand, it is a general truth, and as true in the town of Virden as anywhere else, that the owners of property have a right to employ such labor upon it as they see fit. The governor, acting in the name of the State, seeks to enforce a popular sentiment rather than the law and the rights of the people. This is the alleged traitor, who has long been in solitary confinement on "Devil's Island," is to have a new trial. But the secret documents, it is said, which constituted the essential evidence in the case, have been recently destroyed, by persons interested in preserving the "honor" of the army. Seemingly the whole power of the government has been exerted to blockade justice in this case, but without avail.

THE immediate effect of Emperor William's visit to the Orient, appears to be an understanding between Russia, France, and Austria, to prevent any concessions to Germany from the Sultan. The Russian church authorities in Jerusalem look with a most serious feature of the situation; for when individual rights are set aside in the name of the very power that is instituted to preserve those rights, the result can only be to aggravate the evil that is sought to be cured.

It is easy to sympathize with the sentiment of the people of Virden; but mere sentiment, however strong, must never be allowed precedence over natural and inalienable rights. It is to preserve rights, not to enforce sentiment based on personal antipathies, that governments are instituted among men. To set aside this principle is to repudiate the Declaration of Independence.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

NUMBER 44.

NO STATE could be weaker than that whose citizens were unable to support themselves.

NO SABBATH law is needed to uphold the right of the workingman to a day of weekly rest.

THE truth most loudly proclaimed by the church in calling for the aid of state legislation, is that she has lost the support of God.

LAWS are enacted to uphold rights, not the individuals to whom the rights belong.

THE light of the world's highest wisdom has never proved an antidote for moral darkness.

A SUNDAY law can never rise above the character of a religious quarantine.

WORK is not an enemy of the human race, but idleness and stagnation are enemies. A country is never so prosperous as when all its people have plenty of work.

WHEN the church speaks one word for the workingmen on the subject of Sabbath legislation, she speaks two words for herself.

THE night is for physical rest; the Sabbath for spiritual rest.

IT is possible to make a person rest in such a way that it becomes more tiresome to him than work.

TO ADMIT that it is the duty of the state to detect and punish even one sin, as such, is to justify the Inquisition and the persecutions of the Dark Ages.

THE "powers that be" were not ordained of God to support the Christian Church or to be the means for the conversion of sinners.

THE WORKINGMAN DECLINES THE SUPPORT OF RELIGIOUS LEGISLATION.

THE movement which aims to establish religious observances in this land by legal sanction, has long been represented as an effort in behalf of the workingmen, who it is said are compelled to work seven days in the week, and thus lose the day of rest. The falsity of the claim that workingmen are compelled to work on the Sabbath, is demonstrated by the fact that 50,000 people in this country observe the seventh day by abstaining from work, yet who are as much "compelled" to work seven days in the week as are any who observe the first day. The workingmen through their organizations have repudiated the idea that they have not strength enough to take care of themselves, and manhood enough to obey the dictates of conscience on the point of Sabbath observance. He who has faith in God, needs no other support in obeying the divine commands; and he who would not obey God without the support of the legislature, proclaims thereby that he is a moral cripple.

Christianity and Civic Interests.

In the November issue of The Defender, is printed a speech by Rev. J. B. Carruthers, telling how Christianity should be "applied to civic interests." The writer states that at present Christianity is applied only indirectly to such interests, which falls far short of what the church desires. He believes that "the Christian can be a power, according to his ability in the political and social life of the community." In outlining his plan of church work for civic reform, this clergyman says:—

"The church at the present time is utterly ignored by the politician in making up his slate. Must it always be so? The saloon holds both of the leading political parties in its power. Either party, when in power, will protect the saloon against any prosecution that threatens to do it any serious injury.

"It is the duty of the church to teach the masses through good laws, enacted and sustained. A well-regulated community gives the average man a moral uplift. With our old methods of 'letting outside questions alone,' we have reached a condition of things where the New England Sunday is something of the past, and the saloon holds sway in the good old state of Maine. What shall we do? Draw up some strong resolution? We have done that in the past; we have drilled down to the very bed rock of the Sunday and the saloon question. The resolutions, the holes, are all right; what we need now is to charge them with a generous amount of moral, civic dynamite. Let Christians go into the caucus and help to make or break the slate.

"What is the church doing to mould the civic sentiment of the community? Shall the church be 'like a weather cock, that changes with every wind, or like the mountains, that change the course of the winds?' We need some intelligent, united action before the church can make itself felt against the great evils of the day. The Congregational Church, the church of our fathers, is well equipped to lead in this work.

"It certainly is the duty of the church to look after the moral interests of a community, and to aid in removing the causes of immorality and crime, and, as this can be done in no way so well as by the church acting in its civic capacities, we need in New England a non-political organization, so organized, manned, and financially sustained that it can demand that our laws be enforced. The masses are coming to believe, and are encouraged in their belief by corrupt lawyers and corrupt politicians, that the laws are not made to be kept. When the Christian citizens are organized in a civic organization, they will be able to impress the masses, the politician, and the officials with the fact that good laws are made to be respected, and, by so doing, politics will be purified, and we will be able to rid our communities of many evils that now menace their peace and prosperity, and hinder the advance of the kingdom of God."

This is a plain proposition to turn the church into a political organization. Under the present order of things he says, the church cannot "make itself felt against the great evils of the day." What is the remedy? "Let Christians go into the caucus and help to make or break the slate."

Christians are ambassadors for God. As such they proclaim to all men the gospel of salvation through faith in Christ. They do this in fulfillment of the instructions of Him who said, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." But now, in this year A. D. 1898, it has been found by one of these ambassadors—by a certain class of them, rather—that this method of work will not do. God's ambassadors must copy the methods of the politicians. They should have been copying the methods of these worldly men from the first. Evidently the Lord must have made a mistake in his instructions upon this point!

"It is the duty of the church to look after the moral interests of a community," and in no way can this be done "so well as by the church acting in its civic capacities," demanding "that our laws be enforced." The church should do this in order that politics may be purified and serious obstacles be removed which hinder "the advance of the kingdom of God."

What Christians, who are such in deed as well as name, do for the community in which they reside, is plainly stated in the Scripture declaration that they "are the salt of the earth." By them the whole earth is preserved from destruction. But how are they the salt of the earth?—as politicians? as voters? as caucus manipulators? Did Christ himself figure in any of these things, or the Christians of his time? And have Christian methods of work changed between that time and the present? To assert it would be to say that God himself has changed.

"Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick." This states the position and work of the Christian Church. She is the light of the world, and therefore must be above the world. Lighthouse lamps are not fixed on a level with the earth. And when the church descends from her divinely-appointed station, above the world, down to the arena of politics, she puts herself on a level with the world, and her light is no longer seen by souls adrift upon the sea of time and in danger of shipwreck.

When professed ministers of the gospel turn from the gospel and advocate political work as the only effective way of accomplishing the reforms needed in society, they deny the power of godliness, and proclaim that we have reached an age of apostasy in the professedly Christian Church.

Protestantism Following the Flag.

BY W. N. GLENN.

THE Michigan Christian Advocate says:—

"Protestantism will follow the flag into Cuba and Porto Rico, and the Philippines, and to the ends of the earth."

Now Protestantism has lost its way when it begins to follow earthly flags. It started out to follow the Word of God, and any attempt on its part to follow any other ensign than that of King Immanuel is to depart from the principles that gave it its original prestige. Had Protestantism gone forward in the way marked out for it by divine Providence, instead of leaning on the arm of flesh, it would have encompassed the "ends of the earth" long ago, without waiting to follow any earthly flag. Jesus says, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations." "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Again he commands, "Follow Me." What then have Protestants to do with following any other standard, when the God of heaven says, "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward," when he who has "all power" has promised that "the Lord will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your rereward?"

All this dependence upon the governments of earth to go before, and the arm of human flesh to sustain, in the spread of the gospel is just so much catering to Romanism; for it was the entrance and encouragement of that principle in the church that made Romanism and the Roman Church possible.

Real Enjoyment.

SELF-EJOYMENT is the world's idea of happiness. "How are you enjoying yourself?" is one of the most common questions; and "I am enjoying myself very much," is the common term to express perfect satisfaction. If one is enjoying himself, nothing more is thought to be needed.

Ah, how small enjoyment that is! He who has nothing but himself to enjoy, has a very limited range of enjoyment. And very mean enjoyment it is, too. God would have us enjoy something far better, and so he gives us himself. "For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. And not only so, but we joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement." Rom. 5:10, 11.

Here is true enjoyment,—the enjoyment of God: He who enjoys God has an unlimited and eternal field of enjoyment. God gives himself to us in Christ, in whom are all things, and so it is that he "giveth us richly all things to enjoy." 1 Tim. 6:17.

When people learn that "every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights," and that we have no good thing except in him, they will cease asking their friends, "How are you enjoying yourself," and will say, instead, "How are you enjoying the Lord?"—Sel.

Union of Church and State Condemned by History.—No. 4.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

AFTER the death of Constantine, his son Constantius succeeded to the government of the Eastern provinces, and eventually became the sovereign of the whole empire. And as he, his empress, and his whole court, were Arians, he forthwith used all his influence, as the head of the church, to exterminate, as far as possible, evangelical doctrine; and the whole world groaned and wondered, says St. Jerome, to find itself Arian. The tyranny of Theodosius restored the orthodoxy of the churches, but could not revive their piety; and from that time, in union with the state, they continued to be so corrupt, that at length the profligacy, covetousness, fraud, and arrogance of the clergy generally, from the pope to the obscurest monk, so revolted the conscience and the common sense of Europe, that in the sixteenth century it burst from this oppressive and degrading yoke.

"The nature of the relation between the potentate and the priest during this period was frequently illustrated by incidents like the following. Pepin, who was mayor of the palace to Childeric III., king of France, having formed the design of dethroning his sovereign, assembled the states of the realm, A. D. 751, to whom he proposed that violent measure. They voted that the bishop of Rome must be consulted; ambassadors were therefore sent by Pepin to demand from Pope Zachary, "whether the divine law did not allow a warlike people to dethrone a cowardly and indolent monarch, and to substitute in his place one more worthy to rule?"—Mosheim. Zachary's answer was favorable, Childeric was deposed, and Pepin ascended his throne. Pope Stephen II. confirmed the decision of Zachary, and wanting the aid of Pepin against the Lombards, paid him a visit A. D. 754, when he released him from his oath of allegiance to Childeric, anointed him, and crowned him.

But it would have been happy had the union between the secular and ecclesiastical powers been productive only of such occasional specimens of villainy on either side; but alas! for many centuries before the Reformation, it universally and constantly checked the promulgation of the gospel. Had there been no such union in the nations of Europe, then in each kingdom peaceable subjects would have been protected in life and property, whatever their creed might have been; disturbers of the peace would have been repressed; pious and enlightened men might have preached Christ to their contemporaries without molestation; and evangelical churches, formed through their ministry, might have prevented the spiritual slavery, superstition, and demoralization, into which the churches so generally sank.

But through the union, each student of the Bible, with any energy of character, was speedily arrested by the anathemas of the priesthood; and the state was ever ready to give these anathemas effect. It was the church which condemned Lord Cobham in England, John Huss in Bohemia, and Savonarola at Florence; but it was the state which consumed each of them in the flames. Had there been no union, Cobham would still have led on the Lollards to new successes; Huss would have still lived to confirm his disciples in the faith; and Savonarola might have reformed Italy. Devout and resolute men might have defied the malice of the priests if the state had not placed the dungeon and the thumbscrew, the rack and the stake, at their disposal. The union, therefore, is responsible for the religious ignorance and general degradation of manners which disgraced the fourteenth and the fifteenth centuries.

When the reformers of the sixteenth century struggled for the doctrines of the gospel with the hierarchy and the priesthood, the union was still their greatest enemy. Unchecked by the governments of Europe, the Reformation would have been nearly universal. In Scotland the reform conquered the government; but in England the union mutilated the reform; and in France, in parts of Germany, in Spain, and in Italy, overcame and crushed it. The union alone gave teeth and claws to the two Inquisitions of Spain and Italy; and without its aid the powerful confraternity of Loyola would have been baffled. As the union had previously corrupted the churches, so at the Reformation it prevented their restoration to purity of discipline and to spiritual life.

Since that day superstition has maintained its hateful ascendancy in Europe through the union alone; and were it removed, France, Roman Catholic Germany, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, might be pervaded in every direction by zealous evangelists.

On the other hand, it has not been less disastrous in Protestant countries. The reformers, who had a gigantic foe to grapple with, were too happy to secure the aid of their rulers, by investing them with almost all the prerogatives of which they despoiled the pope. Misled by the evangelical zeal of some leading statesmen, they vainly hoped that Protestant governments would, in successive generations, heartily promote the progress of the gospel, and consented to a union which has been productive of endless mischief. Ever since the union of the Church of England with its imperious and profligate head, Henry VIII., who burned alike the friends of the pope and the followers of Zuingli, because he would not endure that men should have any other religious opinions than his own, the state in England, with scarcely the exception of one brief interval, has been steadily opposed to evangelical religion. Queen Mary, though a bigoted Catholic, continued to be the legal head of the Church of England, and availed herself of the supremacy with which she was invested by the union to crush the English Reformation.

Who Shall Teach the Children Religion?

THE following extracts on this important subject are from a speech by Llewelyn D. Bevan, LL. B., D. D., of Australia, spoken during the recent agitation in that country over the question of State support of religion:—

“We all agree that children should have religious teaching. But who shall give it? This is the question at which so many part company. All will consent to the parent of the child teaching religion to his offspring. All will agree that religious teachers, voluntarily chosen by the parent, may do it. But what of that system which, wisely or unwisely, we have adopted, which takes the children by a vast machinery of state and compels them to be submitted to its methods of instruction? Shall that include within its subjects of instruction, religion?—‘No,’ say the Romanists, ‘for we do not believe that the state should teach anything but help our priests and appointed persons to do it and all other teaching, for that is the special care of the church.’ ‘No,’ say the secular educationists (we use the term in no opprobrious sense) ‘for the state cannot teach religion, not being religious, and it would only raise bitter sectarian jealousies if it were to try.’ ‘No,’ say many religious persons, ‘for though we should like the schools to teach religion, yet there are some evils attendant which we fear.’ ‘Yes,’ say some others, ‘for though there are some evils, we must face them; and no evil is so great as that of the children having no religious teaching at all.’

“Thus we are divided, and sometimes are very angry with one another, which is an unfortunate condition, and certainly not very helpful to the education of the children in good manners and good morals, which are a sort of religion in their way.

“We are all, I think, satisfied that it is useless to ask the state to give religious teaching. Its teachers could not do it, seeing that they include persons of all sorts of religious opinions, and many of none. Even if they could it would be hopeless to try to satisfy the people of the fairness or the goodness of teaching thus supplied. We should be soon plunged in inextricable confusion and ceaseless quarreling.

“Let us suppose that the Protestant churches should agree to accept the Bible reading or Bible lessons in schools, it is quite certain that the Roman church would more than ever condemn the state school system. They would refuse to allow their children, even where they attend school, to be present at the classes. And they would justly claim that the Protestant conscience being satisfied by the introduction of the Bible, the state was obliged in all fairness to recognize and support the schools which they conscientiously (one must say with remarkable generosity and devotion) had established. The claim would be reasonable.

"It would be a great gain, undoubtedly, to have the Bible read and known. It would be the best thing, from the merely educational standpoint, that the children would receive at school. But it would not be religion. The fact is, the churches need quickening. They are asleep, careless of their duty, indifferent to the claims of the Lord, the needs of the children, the interests of the country. Some are awakened and are troubled. Bible reading would only be a sop to these to lull them, too, into a fateful satisfaction.

"Therefore I hold that such a system as we possess requires the fresh, free life of a voluntary addition. It needs the impress of parents, and of churches, and of co-operative organizations to give it plasticity and variety to save it from the mechanical formalism into which it must decay. It was never intended to give more than secular instruction, and even that it cannot perfectly give. Religion it cannot give at all. That must be found where only it exists, in the hearts, and lives, and lips of religious men and women."

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. II.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

SUNDAY is the "pillar" of tradition—tradition as understood and taught by the Catholic Church. Tradition itself is the "pillar" of Roman Catholicism. This we have shown in former articles.

As, therefore, the Catholic Church depends upon tradition for its existence, and tradition, in turn, depends upon the Sunday institution, it follows that Sunday is the foundation of the Catholic Church—it is the mark of the papacy.

Further: As Sunday is the foundation of the Catholic Church, and as genuine Protestantism is a protest against the Catholic Church, it not only follows that Protestantism, to be consistent with itself, must protest against the Sunday, but that Sunday is itself the actual dividing line between Roman Catholicism and true Protestantism.

So far as the Catholic Church is concerned, the question of Sunday, as a Christian institution, has been settled for all time. But the question has not been settled so far as Protestantism is concerned.

Just here it might be well to note that when we speak of the settlement of this question in this connection, we mean only so far as it can be settled by man. No man, or body of men, can settle for another his duty to his Maker, although the attempt has been made, and as we see will be made again. Such settlements as these really settle nothing. There is a tribunal before which this matter, with all other matters, must come for final settlement, and when it is settled by that tribunal, it will be settled right, for God himself will be the Judge, and he makes no mistakes.

And so we say, so far as man can settle it, for the Catholic Church the Sunday question has been settled for all time; but not for Protestants.

There are very few people comparatively who do not know that upon this question of Sunday as the Sabbath day, Protestantism is divided.

This perhaps at first would not appear strange, inasmuch as there are other doctrines upon which the Protestant churches are divided. But when it is remembered that the Sabbath, leaving out for the time being the question as to what day is the Sabbath, is set forth as the "test of all religion," so that it is said that "he who does not keep the Sabbath does not worship God, and he who does not worship God is lost"—when this is remembered it will be seen that these other differences sink into comparative insignificance.

Now as Sunday at the beginning of the Reformation was a vital question, and as the Protestants then stood on the wrong side of the question, and as the Reformation cannot be complete until every error is rooted out, this question of Sunday must come up again, not as in this first instance, between the Catholic and the Protestants, but between the Protestants themselves.

But when it shall come up, where will it be settled?

If we turn to the Old World we find that Sunday is, and has been, an integral part of the laws of the various European nations. But if we look at this nation—the United States of America—we find that the matter of the Sabbath, as indeed all other religious matters, are not permitted by the Constitution to come within the purview of the Government; but are left to the individual conscience, the Constitution guaranteeing the recognition of the rights of conscience for all alike, even to the humblest citizen.

Thus in 1830, the Congressional Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom had been referred a matter involving the question of work upon Sunday, reported:—

"We look in vain to that instrument [the Constitution] for authority to say whether the first day, or seventh day, or whether any day, has been made holy by the Almighty.

"The Constitution regards the conscience of the Jew as sacred as that of the Christian, and gives no more authority to adopt a measure affecting the conscience of a solitary individual than of a whole community. That representative who would violate this principle would lose his delegated character, and forfeit the confidence of his constituents. If Congress should declare the first day of the week holy, it would not convince the Jew nor the Sabbatarian. It would dissatisfy both, and consequently convert neither. . . . If a solemn act of legislation shall in one point define the law of God, or point out to the citizen one religious duty, it may with equal propriety define every part of legislation and enforce every religious obligation, even to the forms and ceremonies of worship, the endowments of the church, and the support of the clergy.

"The framers of the Constitution recognized the eternal principle that man's relation to his God is above human legislation, and his right of conscience inalienable. Reasoning was not necessary to establish this truth; we are conscious of it in our own bosoms. It is this consciousness, which, in defiance of human laws, has sustained so many martyrs in tortures and flames. They felt that their duty to God was superior to human enactments, and that man could exercise no authority over their consciences. It is an inborn principle which nothing can eradicate.

"It is also a fact that counter memorials, equally respectable, oppose the interference of Congress, on the ground that it would be legislating upon a religious subject, and therefore unconstitutional." (Italics ours.)

This extract clearly shows the attitude of the Constitution toward all prospective religious legislation, and declares the fact that one's duty to God is superior to human enactments.

It will be proper here to enquire what was the motive governing the framers of the Constitution when by their action the question of the truth or falsity of any religious doctrine, and its decision were taken out of the hands of the law-makers, who, in making the laws, are sworn to uphold the Federal Constitution?

The answer to this question must be reserved for another article.

Religious Zeal Gone Riot.

"New York Journal," November 1.

THE REV. F. M. Foster, preaching in the Third Reformed Presbyterian Church, of this city, startled his congregation last Sunday by the solemn declaration from the pulpit that a Christian cannot consistently vote in this country.

And this remarkable statement he sought to defend thus:—

"The principal reason why it is believed that the elective franchise cannot be consistently used by the Christian is because the Lord God Almighty, whose dominion is throughout the whole earth, is not recognized as the Supreme Ruler and as the source of authority in the Government of the United States, the Constitution of which makes the people the source from which all authority emanates."

The Rev. F. M. Foster may not know it—and we are charitable enough to grant that he does not—but the utterance quoted is as blasphemous a thought as was ever conceived in the brain of the rankest and most irresponsible infidel.

The Constitution of this country, which he undertakes to assail, vests the right of government in the people—the people whom God made after his own image, and to whom he gave the products of his creation.

Does the Rev. F. M. Foster think that the Almighty needs "recognition," when a religious people draw up laws for the government of men?

Is the Omnipotent Creator like an ambitious politician, who needs resolutions of indorsement and approval whenever the conventions meet?

Are we a nation of Pharisees to make ostentation of the most sacred recesses of our hearts?

The Rev. F. M. Foster may be, and we hope he is, a sincere man; but there is more religion in the incantations of the self-starved Oriental than in the screed he preached in New York day before last.

Righteousness Not By Human Law.

By James H. Fairchild, President Oberlin College.

THE positive requirements of government must be, as far as they go, reenactments of the law of obligation. It can never rightfully require what it is wrong for the subject to do, but its requirements may properly fall far short of duty. They are, probably, never complete expressions of duty.

In this respect they differ from the divine laws. The divine law covers all duty; human law only such duty, and so much of it as properly falls within its sphere. Many matters of important obligation are never touched by human law. Indeed, the substance of all duty, the duty of benevolence, is not at all enjoined by human law.

But aside from this, there are multitudes of outward duties which human law does not contemplate. It does not require politeness, or charity, but these are manifest duties. The law does not undertake to express the full obligation, but only so much of it as is essential to the outward regulation of society. God's law, not man's, is the standard of righteousness.

THE following from the Haverhill Gazette, which quotes from a leading Boston daily, expresses public sentiment in Massachusetts relative to the agitation which is being vigorously kept up by the Sabbath Protective League and similar bodies, to secure moral reform by law:—

"The citizens of Boston are very much oppressed by laws passed every session of the legislature to please reformers. The latest trouble experienced is the threatened interference of the Sabbath Protective League to prevent a continuance of the Sunday concerts given to keep the musicians of the municipal band together during the winter, and furnish such music at a low price as will elevate the public taste. Referring to this subject the Boston Transcript very aptly says:—

"While no protests have been officially received, the Sabbath Protective League has made a general objection, moved thereto by the circulars distributed to the schools, in which the purpose of the enterprise was announced and coöperation invited, but we cannot believe that it will be sustained by public opinion. The influence of good music is elevating and refining. Probably even the league would admit that premise; and it will be difficult to convince the average citizen that that which is elevating and refining six days in the week is a desecration of the Sabbath on the seventh. It is entertainment, it is true, but it is entertainment with a larger purpose than mere amusement. The more appeals of this kind to the higher tastes and interests of the individual there are, the less will be the resort to grosser methods of disposing of a day whose hours to many are inevitably tedious.

"The effect of closing the theater Sunday concert was to immediately fill every sham hotel and public house in Boston with men and women who drink liquor. Nor has it been helpful in creating a large attendance at the various church services on Sunday evening. It is to be hoped that the law as it now stands will be amended to permit the rendering of such music as made up the average Sunday concert programme of the lamented Gilmore and Tourjee."

It would seem that Puritan religion looks with suspicion at whatever is calculated to make Sunday anything but a day of gloom and discomfort for the common people.

Apostolic Establishment.

THE church of apostolic days was an Established Church. "And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily." Acts 16:5. There is this difference between the establishment of religion then and now, as the world uses the term. Those churches were established "in the faith," which stood "not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God," and it stood against all the persecutions and efforts of governments to root it out. Now the establishment of religion means a religion established in governmental law, by the wisdom and the power of politicians.—Oriental Watchman.

IN The Examiner, a leading Baptist organ, Rev. E. G. Zwyer gives some observations on the attitude of American Roman Catholics during the war with Spain. He says:—

"The war between the United States and Spain was not a religious war. It was not a war between Catholics and Protestants as such. But those of us who live in sections where the European Catholic population is large have seen some things during the past few months that convince us that Romanism is even more of a menace to the safety of American institutions than we have imagined.

"The anthracite coal region has a very large Catholic population. In many places the Catholics far outnumber the non-Catholics. Just before the war broke out, and during the first few weeks that followed the outbreak of actual hostilities, there was little, if any, attempt on the part of the Catholics to disguise their sympathy for Spain.

"In some churches the priests spoke strongly against the American attitude, and in some cases are said to have given the impression that it would be entirely wrong for the Catholics to fight against their 'Spanish brethren.' At Mount Carmel, a town of about 15,000 inhabitants, an American flag was torn down and trampled under foot; and in another place an American flag was taken down and a Spanish flag substituted. In still another town the flag rope at the armory was cut and many small flags torn down from the homes of citizens.

"By and by the sentiment began to change, and it was evident that some higher authority than the local priests was bringing about the change. It was surprising to see what efforts were made to prove, on public occasions, such as flag raisings, that Catholics are loyal and patriotic. . . . One young priest, in demonstrating the loyalty of his people, declared that 'Before war breaks out, we are all free to hold and express our views, and to show sympathy for the side nearest to our hearts. But when once "the powers that be" have declared war, then it is the duty of every citizen to obey his government, unless the commands of that government are contrary to the will of the "higher authority." 'Catholic theology,' he said, 'teaches that authority must be respected, and that the opinions of the individual can never be used as an argument against such obedience.'

"Another priest argued that Catholics could consistently fight against their 'brother Catholics' on the ground that both brothers in the faith, and natural brothers, as well as fathers and sons, had fought on opposite sides in the Civil War. Toward the close of his oration he expressed the hope that 'when we have a man in the supreme office of the United States, the Protestants will be as loyal and as ready to answer his call for soldiers to fight against some other nation, as we are now to fight against Spain.'"

THE Chicago Israelite prints a report authorized by the "American Missionary Association," of New York, stating that a Congregationalist minister, Rev. J. B. Fletcher, by name, had been shot while organizing a Congregational Church at Smiley, Ga., the guilty parties being colored members of the Methodist Church. The assailants aimed through a window in the church, and Mr. Fletcher was shot down in the pulpit. He was seriously though probably not fatally wounded, and announced that he would prosecute his assailants at any cost. The Israelite adds this comment:—

"Now if Mr. Fletcher had been a German, and the emperor had made this assault a pretext for attempting to annex Florida and making the United States pay a million or two of dollars indemnity, besides demanding privileges not granted the other foreign nations, Germany would have tried to do to us only what she did to China on the same grounds precisely. Of course we should laugh at the threat of such a proceeding and serve Germany as we did Spain if she should make it advisable for us to do so. . . . Public opinion in America is probably no more opposed to murderous violence than it is in China, and that people as a whole is as little to be blamed for isolated lawless acts as ourselves. Let us be just, and, knowing the shortcomings of our own, never condemn a whole people for the wrongdoings of a few individuals."

IN Allegheny County, Pa., the president of a Jewish Republican club is bidding for political support by a promise of working to secure a modification of the Pennsylvania "blue laws." The cause is a worthy one, but the outlook is not bright.

DR. PARKHURST, reformer, has written a letter on the political situation, in which he bitterly laments the unexpected subserviency of the Republican nominee for governor of the State, to the will of the Republican "boss." There was, he says, a few weeks ago, a magnificent opportunity for dealing "boss" politics in the State a crushing blow, which he and his fellow-reformers fondly expected would be improved to the full; but oh, a as! how sadly has their confidence been misplaced! The hero who should have nobly risen to the occasion and given a joyous realization to their hopes, suddenly and without warning went over to the camp of the enemy—made friends with the "boss"—and they are left to lament over the dismal collapse of their expectations.

* * *

A YEAR ago, in the campaign for the mayorship of this city, a candidate was nominated who was not subservient to the "boss." He stood for independence in politics, so far as concerned the rule of the "machine." That candidate was the Hon. Seth Low, the well-known President of Columbia College. In character he had, by reputation at least, all the qualities that could be desired in a candidate by lovers of honesty and integrity. No candidate of more honorable character could have been selected; nor was he at all lacking in the intelligence and tact necessary for the successful conduct of the affairs of public office. So well qualified was he in all these things that his adherents believed he could upon the strength of them successfully defy the will of the party "boss." The election came, and he was defeated; and his defeat was solely due to his independence of the "machine." This was too plain to be denied.

* * *

THE present Republican candidate for governor, Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, is likewise a man of excellent character, and with a reputation for honesty and fearlessness in the execution of the duties of public office. As regards these qualifications, no better candidate could be selected. But Mr. Roosevelt decided not to stand upon a platform of independence of the "boss;" and in making this decision he undoubtedly had in mind the experience of president Low. From that experience he no doubt concluded that it would be very unsafe to risk his hopes of office upon any platform which antagonized the State "machine." He saw that there would be little if any hope of success without becoming the candidate of the "machine," and he acted accordingly. To succeed as the candidate of the "boss," would be better than to fail as the representative of antagonism to "boss" rule. This would not be an unnatural reflection to an individual in his position.

* * *

AND in this history of these two candidates from which so much was hoped for by the adherents of reform in politics and in society, is plainly written the truth that no candidate can be found for a high office of public trust in this State, who can succeed as such in opposition to the will of the State political "boss." Where these two candidates have failed, it is useless to expect that any others can win success.

* * *

AN individual who is never influenced in any action by religious scruples, makes this statement and explanation of his attitude towards politics:—

"I did not register and so shall not vote. I do not comprehend the issues of the campaign with that clearness which would qualify one to exercise the franchise with intelligence. If Croker wins, New York merchants and others will continue to be blackmailed by Tammany men, and state officials will not be in it. If Platt wins, New York City's tribute will go up the State and be stolen by another ring of politicians. Croker calls his system home rule. Platt's is hayseed rule. It is not a question which is the better, but which is the worse; and I don't know."

And yet many persons who claim to know the transformation of the "new birth" and to be strangers and pilgrims in this world, engage with much zest in that which repels a self-respecting atheist.

A BILL has been introduced in the Vermont legislature, providing for free text-books in the Catholic schools of the State; requiring also, that school directors visit all schools and that teaching in the same be from prescribed text-books. It is wrong thus to invade the domain of the private school, and equally wrong to provide text-books for the same from the public funds. This bill is an example of the common effort to correct one wrong by committing another.

THE principal object of Emperor William's pageant to Jerusalem is said to have been the consecration of the Church of the Redeemer, which was accomplished with "impressive ceremony" on the last day of October. Incidentally however—though perhaps not so incidentally as it seemed—the emperor took occasion to show that a very friendly understanding exists between himself and the sultan. The sultan presented him with a piece of ground which tradition marked as having been the site of the abode of the Virgin Mary. And this the emperor in turn, through the pope, presented to the German Catholics.

THE emperor sent a telegram to the pope, as follows: "I am happy to be able to inform your holiness that, thanks to the benevolent intervention of his majesty the sultan, who has not hesitated to give me this proof of his personal friendship, I have been able to acquire at Jerusalem the abode of the Holy Virgin. I decided to place this ground, consecrated by so many pious memories, at the disposal of my Catholic subjects. It rejoices my heart to be able thus to prove how dear to me are the religious interests of the Catholics whom Divine Providence has placed in my care. I beg your holiness to accept the assurance of my sincere attachment."

* * *

In reply, the pope expressed his deep satisfaction at the gift, for which he was sure the German Catholics would be deeply grateful. And as the gift of the traditional abode of the Virgin Mary is a matter of interest to all Catholics the world over, it may be safely assumed that Catholics in all countries will share in the emotions of gratitude felt by their co-religionists in Germany; and as the gift came in the first place from the sultan, and no doubt with a knowledge of what disposition Emperor William wished to make of it, it may be also assumed that Catholics the world over will entertain a friendly feeling for the sultan. The emperor's oriental tour has vastly strengthened the throne of the sultan. There is something significant in this drawing together of Turk, Protestant emperor, and Roman Catholics at this most noted of historical and prophetic sites.

* * *

AMONG the "impressive ceremonies" which marked the "consecration" of the Church of the Redeemer, was an address by the emperor, in which he said: "From Jerusalem there came the light, in the splendor of which the German nation became great and glorious. What the Germanic peoples have become they became under the banner of the cross, the emblem of self-sacrificing Christian charity. As nearly 2,000 years ago, so there shall to-day ring out from Jerusalem the cry voicing the ardent hope of all for 'peace on earth.'"

* * *

BEARING in mind that it was Sadowa and Sedan which lifted the Germans to their present eminence as a nation, and that the German army marched to these great victories under quite another standard than the "banner of the cross," the necessity will be evident of making a very liberal discount upon this part of the emperor's speech. Nor can a less discount be placed upon the "ardent hope" for peace on earth, in view of the unusual preparations England is now making for a great struggle for supremacy in the far East.

SOPHISTRY is most often used as the opiate of conscience

Notes on the Civic-Philanthropic Conference.

BY JOHN D. BRADLEY.

THE only thing that calls for mention in the proceedings before Friday—Civic Day—was this: F. D. Kelsey, pastor of the Central Congregational Church, Toledo, Ohio, in the course of his address on Wednesday, said that "the people are listening to an immense number of vagaries which will ultimately end in a French Revolution, unless the ministers of the country impartially educate and enlighten them with reference to these things." Further on he said: "We are on the eve of a great reformation or a great revolution. I hope for reformation, but fear revolution. One must come, or the other is inevitable."

On Wednesday the subject of the churches and the masses was discussed, and the fact was pointed out that there is almost a total separation between them. A man, who declared himself to have been a member of the committee of fifteen that formed that "magnificent organization, the Municipal Voters' League, which has done more for Chicago than any other organization," obtained the floor and declared that whatever might be the case with other churches, there was one church that the masses had not deserted, one church that knew how to reach them: that it was to the honor and glory of the Catholic Church that all its members were treated alike, that they met in worship on a common footing; that the priest at the altar treated alike the millionaire and the pauper. This man afterwards proved to be J. P. Brushingham, D.D., pastor of the First Methodist Church of Chicago.

On Civic Day the discussions took on a warmth and interest beyond any that had preceded them, and it became evident that on the subjects discussed there was a wide difference of opinion. Dr. Burrell, of New York, on surrendering the chair to Mr. Jones, mayor of Toledo, Ohio, took occasion to remark that "reformers' day had arrived," and that he was to deliver the gavel of authority to one of them. But he was glad to say that while Mr. Jones was a reformer, from his knowledge of him, he knew that he was a reformer with some common sense, which was saying a great deal for most of them. He wished to say before resigning the chair that the motto that should be inscribed on the banner of those who take up the subject of capital and labor and allied questions with the intention of improving the condition of affairs, should be, "Be ye angry and sin not." This they should never forget. It was easy enough to get up, as most of these would-be reformers did, and denounce capitalists and monopolists; and rave about aristocrats and grinding combinations of wealth, but that kind of reform would never help things a particle. A reformer might become angry, and it was sometimes necessary that he should; but he should not sin at the same time.

The mayor made a brief speech in which he said that he knew of but one thing that would ultimately cure these difficulties—the force of love. We must recognize that all men are our brothers, and have rights and claims equal to our own. He did not think it was necessary to get mad at all. What was necessary was that we should become inspired by that spirit of love and sacrifice for our fellow men shown in the text, “For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life.” The mayor was dressed very plainly and spoke in a quiet, unassuming manner.

The mayor had said that in politics he was a Republican, but that no one would get that impression if they got next to the Republican machine in Toledo. But, nevertheless, he was a William Lloyd Garrison—Abraham Lincoln Republican, and expected to remain such. Others who spoke mentioned their politics.

When Mr. Walter Thomas Mills, of Chicago, arose, he said that as it seemed to be in order he would first state his political faith. He said that he was a Thomas Jefferson—Andrew Jackson—Wendell Phillips—William Lloyd Garrison—Charles Sumner—Abraham Lincoln—dyed-in-the-wool Republican, and that therefore he voted the straight Democratic ticket. He declared that the industrial and economical condition of things was becoming intolerable; that he wanted to see a system in which when a man died he would be obliged to turn the world loose instead of being able to hold on to his ill-gotten gains, as is done under the present legal system. He wanted the living to have some show. He declared the devil owned the controlling interest in the commerce of this country. He pointed out, as illustrating the success of the coöperative system, that one or two small colonies near Chicago had gotten some land and property and used it for the common good of all, and that one of them would soon be able to purchase enough land for another colony, the privileges of which would be free to all those who would enter the arrangement—“as free as God had made the land at first,” he declared.

In the afternoon Dr. Bayard Holmes, of Chicago, spoke from a Socialist’s standpoint. It was noticeable, too, that he was dressed very plainly, and spoke earnestly and without any of the flourishes and gymnastics that marked some of the speeches. He showed that society industrially was in a lamentable condition, and laid down some propositions, the practice of which he thought would cure the evils. He said that according to the statistics of Carroll D. Wright, commissioner of labor, there were not less than four million able-bodied, unemployed men in this country to-day, turned out to starve or to prey upon the rest of society. He also made the statement that there were more poor in the world to-day than ever before. He wanted a system in which there would be no capitalist, in which it would be a crime to attempt to become one; in which there would be no private property except what each needed for personal use. If a person needed a tooth brush he could have it, if he did not need it, he would not have it. He said that all men were equal and that they should all receive equal remuneration for their work—namely, what they needed.

He had scarcely finished before several were on their feet ready to attack his propositions. Before recognizing anyone the mayor asked if anyone present had ever stopped to think that when the Lord told Adam to eat bread in the sweat of his face, that there was no employer to whom he could sell his labor, no boss to whom he could go for a job. He said that he was in hopes that that condition of affairs would become more general nowadays.

Doctor Burrell, the general president, first obtained the floor. With more than his usual warmth he declared that this socialistic conception of society was exactly the condition he had found on the reservation of the Sioux Indians in Minnesota a few years ago. There everything was held in common, they were on a dead level; there they had no private property, not even tooth brushes. As nearly as he could tell this condition of society was nothing more nor less than original and unregenerate barbarism. He declared that he took direct and unequivocal issue with the statement that there were more poor in the world to-day than ever before. The condition of the Roman world at the birth of Christ was infinitely worse. In the age of the Cæsars there were ten thousand knights who owned all the wealth and property, and there were millions and millions of slaves in the most degraded condition, sleeping without shelter, murdering each other for the amusement of their masters, and having not the semblance of a right before the law. It was a shame to say that since the introduction of Christianity into the world that any such condition has ever been repeated or approached in any degree. He exclaimed, turning to Dr. Holmes, “If I should see stretched before me in rags the shivering, wasted, and starving bodies of those four million unemployed, even then, sir, with that exhibition, I would never admit but that the condition of this country was ten thousand times better than was Rome in the age of the Cæsars.” “Why is it,” he exclaimed, “that we can assemble here and discuss these matters? Is it because we are all slaves? Is that the cause of our lamentations and dismay at the sight of three or four million ragged and starving people? Do we assemble here in this city and discuss these matters because there are here 19,950 slaves and the rest tyrants? May such slavery continue!”

(Concluded next week.)

“If parents would do for their children what God in his Word has commanded them to do,—teach them his law when they go out and when they come in, and bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord,—we would hear no more of this demand that the state must teach religion. And which should ministers do, teach parents to do their duty, or demand that the state shall do something that is not its duty?”

Studies in French History.—46.

"CARDINAL RICHELIEU," began the professor, "was what men call a very great man. In fact, he had much more real ability than the king, and was far more competent to rule over the country than was young Louis. Jennie Jacobs, can you tell me whether this man had any influence over the king, and if so, how far that influence extended?"

"I think he did; from all I could learn of him I thought he did pretty much as he wanted to with the king and everybody else," replied Julia.

"Yes. What were his religious views, Max?"

"I don't know; but I rather guess he was a Catholic."

"Bert Mathews, do you agree with him?"

"Why, yes, professor, I guess Max nor anyone else ever saw a Protestant cardinal."

Max blushed a little and replied that he had not thought of that.

"This cardinal was also a great statesman. His executive ability was something wonderful. And for about twenty years he governed France as completely as if he wore the crown himself. As he was a devoted Catholic, of course he set vigorously about depriving Huguenots of all political power."

"What did they want of political power, anyway, is what I can't see," said Joe Palmeter.

"What use has any religious party, as a religious party, for politics, or political influence? Julia March, what do you think about it?" asked the teacher, with a smile.

"I don't suppose they should have very much to do with politics—I mean as a means of protecting their own religion, or of tormenting and bothering other people who don't happen to believe as they do."

"You have given a fair answer, my girl; but people in all ages of the world find this a very knotty question, though I see nothing troublesome about it. Christ says the servant should not seek to be above his Lord, so as long as the Lord and Master of Christians said very plainly that his kingdom was not of this world, why, surely, his humble followers ought not to think of invoking the power of the world, in order to set up a kingdom here.

"When the mother of King Louis had great influence in France,—and that was only a short time,—she was very anxious to do all she could to keep Spain good natured, because that country was Catholic. So she gave her daughter Elizabeth to a son of the king of Spain, and her royal son, young Louis XIII., was to take the Spanish princess, Anne. But now it is the policy of Richelieu to do all he can to humble Spain."

"I thought he was a devoted Catholic, and of course Spain was Catholic too; so I can't see what he wanted to keep Spain under for," said Will Barnaby, with a puzzled look.

"It does seem strange, at first thought, but Richelieu was a patriot as well as a Catholic, and he did not mean that any country should stand in the way of the prosperity of his own. He said to the pope, because he did not like some of Richelieu's ways, that of course he was a Catholic, but that he was a Frenchman first. So he proposed that the English prince, Charles, who was to have married the Infanta of Spain, should give this up, and marry Louis' sister. This the crafty fellow brought about very easily, for matrimonial bargains were transacted then in about the same manner that real estate is bought and sold,—purely as a matter of business. And I am sorry to say people have not yet entirely outgrown this custom.

"Edna, you may tell us something about the siege of La Rochelle, if you will.

"It was a terrible siege which Richelieu contrived against the Huguenots."

"Where is the city of La Rochelle?"

"On the southwest shore of France."

"Was the cardinal successful?"

"O yes, sir," replied Edna, "if you call it success to starve ever and ever so many poor people to death. I wonder they did not come out and surrender. I would, rather than live on horse flesh as they did, and not have half enough of that."

"A great many of the people would have been glad to surrender before they did, but their mayor was a very stubborn man, and he kept them all in the city until there were only 150 from the many thousands left alive and able to leave the city. Edward, you may mention the terms of their final surrender to the Catholics."

"I believe they were to have religious freedom, and that they should worship where they pleased and when they chose to do so."

"Yes," said Milly Brown, "and they were to march out with their flags flying and drums beating."

"What does a religious body want to do with flags and drums?" asked Edward Barnaby.

"They ought not to want very much to do with them certainly, but these people did; so the king only just smiled, and agreed to the proposal."

"Why didn't the English people keep them?" asked practical Jack. "They could have come right down with their ships and given them food, and I should have thought they would, seeing they belonged to the same church."

"They did undertake it, but the wise cardinal had caused a solid wall of stone to be built out in the ocean a long way, and although the English people could just as well have broken it down, they did not even try, why I do not know."

"Does the city of La Rochelle show any of the marks of the awful siege yet, Fred?"

"I think so; for my grandpa was there once and he said it did then."

"Yes, it will never again be the same proud, beautiful city, I think. Did the cardinal do as he had promised about letting the Huguenots have liberty to worship God in their own way, Joseph?"

"Yes, sir; and the Catholics were very indignant indeed about it, and at last coaxed the king to send him into exile, and he only just barely escaped going."

"But escape he did, though, through his great influence with the king, and the come out of it was," said Professor Carman, sadly, "that Louis sent his own mother away from him, and finally, because she had held some communication with her Spanish friends, he would never let her return. So I presume her son never saw her again. She died at last far from France, a poor woman financially, but let us hope, a better one than she had lived."

"Before we separate, I must tell you that Mrs. White told me this morning that her husband and Charlie, Mr. Billings and Robert were expecting to be home from Paris in three or four days, so we will likely see them next week."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

The War of Principle.—No. 7.

"WELL, Aleck, since our last talk, I have been reading up Jewish history. The Jews did not avert the calamity they feared, by putting Christ to death. The Romans did come and take away their place and their nation."

"Yes, so they did. What a commentary is the destruction of Jerusalem on the inefficiency of human defense! When Titus and his armies entered the flaming city, he looked with amazement on the strong defenses, and declared that God must have given the city into his hand. After all, Cecil, the battle is the Lord's. God hath his way in the storm."

"O, but Aleck, I did not think of attributing the fearful destruction of Jerusalem to God. It seems to me the Jews simply reaped their own sowing."

"You are right, Cecil. They had abandoned the protection of the Infinite, and thereby fell a prey to satanic fiends. They sowed the cross of Calvary on Golgotha, and little dreamed of the harvest. Thousands of crosses covered the hills, whereon hung the Jews who had cried 'crucify him,' and furnished feasts for kites and vultures. The siege and overthrow of Jerusalem presents one of the most fearful retributions of history."

"Retribution;—why do you call it that?"

"Because it is the retribution of following a false principle. It is the revenge of revering tradition, of upholding established customs, of reverencing a sanctuary from which the Shekinah had fled. The old wrath of error made them furious antagonists against the Romans, and brought upon them the fulfillment of the desolation foretold in the days of Moses."

"What had Moses foretold, Aleck?"

"He had said that if they refused to depend on God, and broke his commandments, that they should be destroyed. Here, let me read it to you, said Aleck, taking his Bible from his pocket. You'll find the prophecy in Deut. 28:49-53: 'The Lord shall bring a nation against thee as swift as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand; a nation of fierce countenance. . . . And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land until he have destroyed thee, and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trusted . . . And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and daughters, which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the siege.'

There is another prophecy in Dan. 9:24-26, that brings out the events to be fulfilled in the city from the rebuilding of Jerusalem after the captivity in Babylon to its final destruction in A. D. 70."

"Is that so, Aleck? Do let us read them."

"In the previous chapter," said Aleck, "Daniel is shown a period of 2,300 years. In the 9th chapter the angel is sent to further explain to him the meaning of this period. He asks him to recall the vision, and then says, 'Seventy weeks are determined [or better, "cut off," from this long period] upon thy people [the Jews] and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most holy.'

"Seventy weeks would be 490 days, and as each day represents a year in prophecy, it would be 490 years. The angel then tells Daniel when this period would begin,—at the commandment to build and to restore Jerusalem. This commandment was issued by Artaxerxes in A. D. 457 (See Ezra 7). From that year until Christ should appear as the Messiah or the Anointed One, it would be 69 weeks or 483 days or years. Reckoning this time brings us to A. D. 27 when Jesus was baptized in the Jordan at the beginning of his ministry as the Messiah. He was there anointed with the Holy Ghost, and to this time the prophecy was fulfilled."

"But what does this mean, Aleck, that the 69 weeks are first divided into 7 weeks and then into threescore and two? And what does it mean by saying the street shall be built again and the wall, even in troublous times?"

"It took 7 weeks or 49 years to rebuild the city. The nations around were angry, and tried to prevent it. You may read of their opposition in Nehemiah. Then come the 62 weeks of which we have already spoken. After its fulfillment the prophecy says, 'Messiah shall be cut off, but not for himself.' Thus Daniel foretold the death of Christ for all men over 500 years before his advent to earth. We have now seen how the 69 weeks were fulfilled; but 70 were cut off on the Jews, so that one more week still waits to which to fit the historical fulfillment to the prophet's specifications."

"The 27th verse says, 'And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease.' For the last seven years of the time, the gospel was preached by Christ and his disciples among the Jews. At the end of that time the nation by an act of the Sanhedrim rejected the truth, and the disciples went out to the Gentiles."

"What is the meaning of making the sacrifice cease in the midst of the week?"

"How long did Christ minister in person to the Jews?"

"Three years and a half, I think," said Cecil.

"Yes. By comparing the gospels this conclusion is evident. It is generally agreed that this was the time of his earthly ministry. He was crucified in the spring of 31, and by the sacrifice of himself put away sacrifice and oblation forever; for he is our passover, sacrificed for us. This was in the midst of this prophetic week. The seventy weeks ended in A. D. 34. The Jews rejected the gospel, and the disciples went to the Gentiles. Now what is to follow? They would not rely on God, but on themselves. They would not exchange tradition for truth, they insisted on custom rather than Christ. God foretold the result. Read the sequel in Dan. 9:26.

"And the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, unto the end of the war desolations shall be determined."

"Over a million people perished in the overthrow of Jerusalem. Those who remained were dragged away as slaves to Rome. The suffering was indescribable. The temple was devastated, and it is said that every stone in it was overturned in order to secure the gold that in the heat had melted and run between the crevices. Thus was the word of Christ fulfilled. The site of the city was plowed as a field. No more tragic picture arises in the fields of history than the history of Jerusalem, from Christ's advent to the final overthrow in A. D. 70.

"I wonder if any of the doomed people recalled the tender words of Christ as he wept in anticipation of their destruction, saying, 'How oft would I have gathered you even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. Behold, your house is left unto you desolate.'"

"It is very impressive," said Cecil. "And you think it was the result of the outworking of the principle of human reliance, instead of reliance on God."

"Indeed I do. But the destruction of Jerusalem is a picture of the fate of every soul who depends on man.

'Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm.' The yearning love of Christ's words reaches out to every soul, saying, 'Come under my wing, let me be your refuge and defense, lest your house be left unto you desolate.'"

Cecil gave Aleck no word of reply, but wrung his hand, and walked away thoughtfully.

HELPS TO THE STUDY OF THE BOOK : OF : GENESIS.

THE following publications are invaluable as HELPS to the STUDY of the BOOK OF GENESIS, and should be in the library of every home:—

International Sabbath School Quarterly No. 14—Lessons on the Book of Genesis. Price 5 cents.

Patriarchs and Prophets; or the Great Conflict between Good and Evil, as illustrated in the Lives of Holy Men of Old. By Mrs. E. G. White. This book treats upon the themes of Bible history—themes not in themselves new, but so presented here as to give them a new significance. Beginning with the rebellion in heaven, the author shows why sin was permitted, why Satan was not destroyed, and why man was tested, gives a thrilling description of man's temptation and fall, and rehearses the plan of redemption devised for his salvation. The life of each of the patriarchs, from Adam to King David is carefully scanned, and from each a lesson is drawn.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 10, 1898.

A LITTLE internal expansion would be far better for the United States than much annexation of outside territory.

THE nation which gives itself up to the pursuit of glory, is very apt to become dazzled by its brightness and make a fatal misstep.

A CENTURY ago our forefathers fought Great Britain because of antagonism to the principle of "taxation without representation." Now the nation is about to impose this same thing upon the territory it has conquered from Spain.

You may think there is no danger of a revival of intolerance in this "free country." But the very fact that you and so many other people think this way, constitutes one of the chief causes for fearing that such a calamity may be realized.

ONE great evil of "moral reform by law" is that the spasmodic effort to enforce the laws enacted for the purpose, and which often overstep the bounds of justice, is invariably followed by a reaction in which the wave of immorality sweeps over the city and the state to a worse degree than before. The rule of "Tammany" in New York City, for example, is even worse to day than it was before the famous Parkhurst crusade. If the principles of good government are not more openly disregarded now than then, the confidence of the people in them has been weakened by the failure of that crusade to produce permanent results. A few failures turn the mass of the adherents of a reform movement over to the other side, and the cause of good government suffers to the extent that it was confounded in the public mind with the reform crusade; and this is often to no inconsiderable degree. Let laws be enacted solely to protect individual rights, and let immorality, as such, be combatted by Christian teaching and example. This will promote the welfare of the individual and of the state as well as it is possible for human wisdom to do.

A CALL has been issued for a national "Christian Citizenship" conference, to be held in Washington, December 13-15 next. The topics to be discussed are: the limitation of the right of suffrage, civil service reform, national laws forbidding prize-fighting, restricting divorce, and forbidding polygamy; the "American civil Sabbath;" the army canteen; and the prohibition policy as related to Alaska and the Indian Territory. The call is signed by Rev. Josiah Strong, president of the League for Social Service; Anthony Comstock, Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Vice; Mrs. Mary H. Hunt; and Mrs. M. D. Ellis, of the W. C. T. U., and others.

THERE can be no such thing as liberalizing a bad law. A thing that is bad ought to be cast out; a bad principle ought to be repudiated altogether. To dress a bad principle in the garb of liberality is only to disguise its evil; and evil in disguise is worse than evil in all its ugliness. Let the bad principle be replaced by a good one. This will apply directly to the matter of Sunday legislation. A "bad" Sunday law is really less dangerous than the so-called good ones.

THERE have been rumors of a military plot in the French army in Paris, aiming at the overthrow of the civil government; and more evidence has been found to substantiate them than usually exists behind mere rumor. A sudden revolution in France—a coup d'etat, as the French themselves call it—must be counted as among the probabilities of the near future. In the Roman republic the army finally took the affairs of state into its own hands, and the same thing may occur in the French republic. In a republic, a great military power does not balance well with the civil government. Militarism is suited only to a monarchy.

FROM a circular sent out by Mr. Geo. B. Knapp, Secretary of the National Armenian Relief Committee, it appears that time has by no means ameliorated the condition of the Armenian refugees since the massacres by the Kurds and Turks. The condition of these wretched people, who wander about from one district to another, and are welcome in none, is described as touching the extreme limit of desperateness, and they have no prospect of relief. A few months ago representative men in civilized lands talked long and loud about the duty of "Christian nations" toward Armenia; but the war in Cuba, famine and plague in India, the reconquest of the Soudan and the prospects of war between England and one or more of the Powers of Europe, has turned public attention in these lands away from the Armenians, and they have been forgotten. Thus their situation appears to have become more hopeless than before.

A REPORT comes from Berlin that one result of Emperor William's visit to Palestine is an agreement between the emperor and the sultan, by which Germany will guarantee the integrity of the sultan's possessions in Asia, receiving in return special commercial and industrial privileges.

THE best government is not that which does most to "help" an individual in his own affairs, but which leaves him most at liberty to help himself and develop the traits of true manhood.

"WAR," says the Christian Witness, "is always demoralizing to a nation," and "always a school of immorality for the rising generation."

LIBERTY

TRUTH

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 17, 1898.

NUMBER 45.

THE Divine Word is not only truth, but eternal truth; it alone is the sure foundation.

THERE is no real preserving power in human legislation or in tradition.

WHAT God preserves, he preserves alive, by the "power of an endless life." God has no use for dead things. And a religious institution that is "preserved" only by tradition and legislative enactment is of no more value to the world than an embalmed mummy.

THE seventh day being the Sabbath, the Sabbath must come to all men as often as the seventh day comes; and any man can have it by taking it when it comes to him.

FINAL DOWNFALL OF THE "AMERICAN CIVIL SABBATH."

THE two supporting pillars upon which the "civil Sabbath" structure rests, are Tradition and Legislation. Tradition asserts that Sunday is the Christian Sabbath—contrary to the testimony of Scripture—and Legislation has always been resorted to in support of the day as such. But neither of these can afford it any real and permanent support, being themselves of human origin, and partaking of the weakness of all merely human things. Tradition will be swept away by truth, and all human Sabbath laws by the divine Sabbath law, which speaks nothing in support of the first-day Sabbath, but declares the true Sabbath to be the seventh day, "the Sabbath of the Lord." As Sampson, under the power of the divine Spirit, overthrew the Philistine temple of old, so must this modern temple of error fall by the agency of the same Spirit, and involve in its ruin those who have thought to take refuge in it.

"EVERY plant which my Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." So declared the author of the Christian religion; and it is useless to water and tend any plant in the garden of the spiritual world which has been planted by the hand of man.

"THE Sabbath of the Lord" is the Lord's property; and he is competent to take care of it.

WHEN men try to uphold a divine institution by a human law, they are trying to set up an inverted pyramid.

THERE can be no right to observe a weekly day of rest, without a right also to work on that day; and a just law must recognize both.

The Prosecutions in Maryland.

THE cases of Messrs. John Curlett and John H. Rhodes, of Ford's Store, Maryland, charged with having violated the Sunday law of that State, were tried in the circuit court at Centreville, Nov. 9, 10, the result being a sentence against each of the defendants of thirty days in jail. A remarkable and very significant phase of legal opposition to observers of the seventh day Sabbath developed at this trial.

The circumstances leading up to this result are as follows.

Ford's Store is a small town situated on Chesapeake Bay, the residents being almost exclusively oystermen. These oystermen generally own each a plot of a few acres of ground, on which they raise corn and garden products. By the law of the State oyster fishing is forbidden on Sunday, and in this respect the Sunday law is generally observed. During the oyster season, which begins early in the fall, the men are busy at their trade from early morning till night every day on which it can be legally followed, and Sunday being their one day of leisure, becomes the natural time for attending to incidental work which may be necessary about their premises, mending their apparatus for fishing, etc.

The men who are now in jail at Centreville were arrested for having worked on Sunday at cutting corn. This corn is cut for fodder, and must be cut at a certain time in order to save it from becoming useless. As such it falls, when the time for cutting it arrives, within the class of goods known as "perishable," which goods are allowed by the Sunday law to be handled on Sunday in any way necessary to prevent pecuniary loss. The men were at work on Mr. Curlett's premises, their position being such as to make it necessary to spy them out in order to know that any work was being done.

The man who caused their arrest, Mr. Linwood Lane, had on the same Sunday been sailing for pleasure on the bay, and was returning when he spied the men at work. Taking his horse and carriage he then drove first to one church and then to another to find the sheriff, and finally to his house, where he found him, and then, with the sheriff, to the field, where the men were working.

It was necessary for the prosecution, at the trial, in order to sustain its case, to prove that the work done was not work of necessity; this work being permissible under the law. As cutting corn for stock on Sunday is usually allowed to be a work of necessity, and as it could not be charged that the work had disturbed or interfered with any person, since no one claimed to have been disturbed or even to object to the work, in itself; and as the constitution of the State allowed them to freely follow the religious practices dictated by conscience, provided only that such practices were not immoral or in violation of the rights of others, it did not seem that any case could possibly be made out against them.

But this view did not count upon the position that was to be taken in these cases by the prosecuting attorney,—a position that has never been taken before in any similar case in this country. Boldly stepping out from under the cover of such excuses or reasons as are usually alleged for the Sunday laws upon civil grounds, the State's attorney declared, and reiterated and emphasized the statement, that the offense for which the men were being tried was that of having violated the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath, which had become established by custom and by the law. It was not the work that these men had done on Sunday, or that others in the community usually did on that day, he said, that constituted the offense. That was not what they were being tried for; but, he said, when men belong to a religious sect which hold to the disregard of Sunday as a principle of religious belief, and violate the Sunday law on that ground, it is necessary to interfere to prevent the spread of such moral contamination! The State wanted good citizens, he said, and these men were not good citizens.

Mark what is contained in this position which has now been taken in the courts against observers of the seventh day. All civil grounds which have been alleged in support of Sunday observance were ignored, and the offense was charged flatly upon the ground of religion. It was not the Sunday work that the men had done that was objectionable. Others did work on that day; in fact the great majority were wholly careless of the law as regards such work as the defendants were charged with doing. But these men belonged to a religious body which did not believe in the sanctity claimed for Sunday, while others who worked on Sunday did believe in it, or at least professed to. Or if they did not profess to believe in Sunday as the Sabbath, they did not express any opinion to the contrary. They simply did not care whether Sunday was or was not the "Christian Sabbath" or whether any day was the Christian Sabbath. Therefore they were to be exempt from prosecution, while the others were people to be arrested and punished.

The one class were conscientious in the matter, and the other class were not; and the conscientious people were the ones to be punished, and they were to be punished because they were conscientious; while the others were to be exempt because they were not conscientious about the Sabbath one way or another. People who disregarded the law entirely, by violating it merely for their own pleasure, and had no conscience about Sabbath observance, were good citizens such as the State wanted; especially when they took pains to see that conscientious Sabbath-keepers were prosecuted for doing only what was allowed by the law on Sunday as a work of necessity or mercy!

But the point above all others to be noted in the case, is that the men were prosecuted because they belonged to a religious denomination—"small and obscure," the prosecuting attorney put it—which objected to Sunday observance on religious grounds; that no pretense was made by the prosecution that the case rested upon civil grounds, but on the contrary, it was boldly avowed to rest upon the purely religious offense of a violation of "the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath;" and, still further than all this, that all law, even the Sunday law itself, was entirely ignored, and proceedings were taken, without law, against these observers of the seventh day, because they had violated a mere religious sentiment. And to-day, these two men are in Centreville jail without having been convicted of any legal offense even under the Sunday law of the State; but for the offense of belonging to a people who observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath!

Of course, in putting the case upon this ground, the prosecuting attorney of Maryland was really trying the denomination to which the defendants belonged,—a fact of which he was reminded by the counsel for the defense. But apparently it mattered not to the prosecution whether it was conducting a trial of two individuals for a civil offense, or of a denomination for a religious offense, so long as it secured a conviction of the prisoners and thus vindicated the "sanctity of the Christian Sabbath."

This is the first time in the history of the prosecutions of seventh-day observers under the Sunday laws, that it has been openly avowed that the prosecution was for a religious offense. Now this stand has been boldly taken by the Sunday element in this State, and this new and bold stand taken in behalf of the sanctity of Sunday in this latter part of 1898 coincides very well with the new activity that has taken hold of the religious organizations which are sowing the land with their "reform" leaflets and literature in behalf of the same thing, and organizing for an active campaign in politics. From this the reader can make his own deductions with reference to what developments are to be expected in the near future.

It should be stated in explanation of the situation at Centreville, that in Maryland a jury is judge both of the fact and the law; hence in a case of prosecution for Sunday breaking it only needs that the prosecuting attorney shall work upon the religious prejudices of the jury to secure a perversion of law which would hardly be possible were the jury instructed in the law by the judge, as is usual in jury trials.

ARE there not those among our readers who feel that the SENTINEL ought to be in the hands of thinking men and women in their neighborhood?

Rome is Getting in Her Work.

THE following portion of a letter from the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Daily American, printed in that paper Oct. 15, 1898, reveals a scheme of downright lawlessness being carried on by the Catholic Church and the Government of the United States:—

"Archbishop Chappelle, who is to go to Cuba as the legate of the church, will find himself confronted with a serious problem. The Catholic Church and its clergy in Cuba, as in every state where the church of Rome is officially acknowledged as the state church, is supported almost entirely by the government. The annual budget of Spain includes appropriations for the pay of the Catholic clergy and the support of the Catholic churches in the Spanish dominions, and the revenues for this purpose are raised by taxation. Hence, with the surrender of its authority to collect taxes in Cuba, the Spanish government is necessarily compelled to withdraw all support from the Catholic churches and priests on the island.

"The question of providing for the priests thus deprived of their sustenance is one of no little difficulty, and President McKinley has held numerous conferences with Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland on the subject. The people of Cuba have never been taught to support their church and clergy by direct, voluntary contribution. Indeed, so dire is the poverty on the island at present that it is doubtful if the Cubans could by any possibility raise sufficient money to keep their churches open and their priests from starving. On the other hand it is manifestly impossible that the Government of the United States can undertake to support the Catholic Church in Cuba.

"It is true that General Wood has ordered all the schools in Santiago reopened, and as the school teachers are presumably the local priests, the situation in that city, at least, has been met by paying the priests who are employed in the schools. But this expedient will serve only in a small number of cases, and would not, of course, apply to the vast number of priests and high church dignitaries on the entire island.

"It is the determination of President McKinley that the Catholic churches shall be kept open, and that public worship shall be amply provided for. To this end sufficient money will be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church. But this will only be a temporary loan, and when law and order are fully established on the distracted island, the Catholic Church will be expected to maintain itself like every other church."

The church of Rome has robbed and peeled Cuba for four hundred years: and now that she cannot do it any more, she puts up the plea that her priests and high church dignitaries there "are deprived of their sustenance," and the people of the United States must be put to grind at Rome's mill to support this "vast number" of her good for nothing priests and high church dignitaries.

That these priests and high church dignitaries are good-for-nothing is evident from the testimony in this very article that begs for sympathy and support for them:—

1. Rome alone has had the teaching of the people of Cuba for four hundred years.

2. Yet, though there is "a vast number of priests and high church dignitaries," there, "the people of Cuba have never been taught to support their church and clergy by direct voluntary contribution."

3. "The Catholic Church and its clergy in Cuba . . . is [has been] supported almost entirely by the government, . . . and the revenues for this purpose are raised by taxation."

4. "So dire is the poverty on the island at present that it is doubtful if the Cubans could by any possibility raise sufficient money to keep their churches open and their priests from starving."

5. "It is the determination of President McKinley that the Catholic churches shall be kept open, and that public worship shall be amply provided for. To this end sufficient money will be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church."

That is to say that while, for four hundred years, the Catholic Church has had the sole teaching authority in Cuba, she has never taught the people to support the church and the clergy; yet those same people have all this time been taxed to support the church and clergy; and now, when, by this everlasting taxation, with its consequences, the people are reduced to such poverty that they cannot support in customary affluence the priests and high church dignitaries who are unwilling to share with the poor people the poverty which this same "vast number of priests and high church dignitaries have been most instrumental in bringing upon them—now, through President McKinley—coached by Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, this same Catholic Church begins the taxation of the people of the United States to support these priests and high church dignitaries in Cuba!

And how long shall the people of the United States be taxed to support this "vast number" of Catholic "priests and high church dignitaries" in Cuba? Since Catholic priests have had the teaching(?) of the Cubans for four hundred years, and yet "the people of Cuba have never been taught to support their church and clergy by direct, voluntary contribution," because the priests were supported by the Spanish government, is it likely that these same priests, in less than another four hundred years, will teach the people of Cuba to support their church and clergy by direct, voluntary contribution," while they are supported by the United States Government?

But even though it should not take another four hundred years, even though it should take only a week, or only a single day, what right has President McKinley to take the money of all the people of the United States, and have it "advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church"? Where has such power as this been delegated to the President of the United States? The men who made the Government of the United States said that to compel a person "to furnish contributions of money for the propagations of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical." Therefore they separated the Government of the United States from all connection with religion or recognition of it.

By this scheme, Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, through President McKinley, are putting upon the Government and people of the United States the identical system that has worked by Spain and Rome all these ages. This sympathetic correspondent says:—

"The annual budget of Spain, including appropriations for the pay of the Catholic clergy, and the support of Catholic churches in the Spanish dominions, and the revenues for this purpose, are raised by taxation."

This correspondent also says:—

"It is the determination of President McKinley that the Catholic churches shall be kept open, and that public worship shall be provided for. To this end sufficient money will be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church."

The only money that this Government can advance for any purpose, is money raised by taxation. For the Government to advance this money, it must be appropriated by somebody. These two statements of the correspondent show the same thing precisely. Therefore it is as plain as A B C that Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, through President McKinley, are playing off upon the Government of the United States the same old Roman and Spanish system of governmental support of the Catholic Church and clergy. Are the American people ready to let this scheme be carried through?

It is true that the last sentence in the portion of the letter quoted, says that this is promised to be only temporary; but the rest of the letter, which we have not space now to review, shows that this "temporary" expedient can be perpetuated indefinitely.

When Archbishop Ireland was making himself so conspicuous at the National Capitol last spring, we said that the United States Government would not get out of this Cuban matter without being entrapped by Rome. And so it has come to pass. And there is yet more of it.

Bartholdi's Statue.

BY FRANCES E. BOLTON.

ALONE the sculptor sat and silent yet,
 Wide was his vision, though hills barred him round.
 The scenes of ages his wide gazing met,
 And truth to truth linked as a chain new found.
 As doth clear lightning smite an electric path
 Through clouds of blackness in one vivid flash,
 So through the clouds of Time's historic wrath,
 He saw truth's meaning in a statue mask.

As in a wide, unseen kaleidoscope,
 Shifting from scene to scene, there met his view
 Age upon age, where flickering rays of hope,
 Now darkened, burst again in radiance through
 In light of liberty, and springing up,
 As one inspired, he smote the shapeless block,
 Cleaving away superfluous scales, that hope
 Might take new form, and spring forth from the rock.

As swift he wrought, he saw the ages move
 From Calvary's hill to the last martyr slain,
 And felt how hell's malignity 'gainst love
 Had filled the centuries with unjust pain.
 Yet light fell o'er his brow; for far and near
 The Sun of Liberty had burst and shone.
 His statue springing up with gleaming star
 Would tell the history in its speaking stone.

High at our Eastern harbor, lo, it stands,
 Bartholdi's statue, outlined in the bar,
 Holding a torch mould in its outreached hands;
 But where has fled its world-wide gleaming star?
 Has Freedom's land no light? Why seems it dim?
 Why gleams no more its glory from afar?
 Ah, sentinel, up! 'tis time to fill and trim,
 And light up Freedom's beacon at the bar.

Union of Church and State Condemned by History.—No. 5.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

THE effects of the union have been so palpably and universally bad as to render positive evidence on the side of freedom unnecessary; still, as there are some persons to whom unknown possibilities of evil seem worse than any amount of existing evil, and who think that the union could not have been so general, unless there had been a real necessity for its existence, let us briefly notice the experience of some free churches.

The churches of the first three centuries were free. Unsalaries by the state, they could determine their creed, organize their discipline, and choose their pastors, according to their pleasure; each church, supporting its ministers, was entirely independent of external control. And in this state of poverty and freedom they so proclaimed the truth, and so recommended it by their lives, that their numbers and influence continued to increase, till the Emperor Constantine found it expedient, for the establishment of his throne, to profess himself a Christian.

During the ages of defection from truth and duty, which followed the union between the church and state, effected by that monarch, one community alone, which has preserved the appropriate motto, "Lux in tenebris," held forth the word of life to the population around it. In the valleys which lie between Mont Cenis and Mont Viso, in the southeastern declivities of the Cottian Alps, a few Christians, refusing to wear the yoke of the church of Rome, were also happily saved from union with the state. The churches formed by these peasants of the Alps were almost the only ones which, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, retained sound doctrine, simplicity of worship, and spiritual life. And to this day, notwithstanding the periods of declension to which every church, alas! is prone under every system, they remain the only evangelical churches in Italy.

While they were preserving the doctrine of the gospel in Italy, another free church rose on the eastern frontier of Saxony. At the close of the seventeenth century, when the Christians of Austrian Silesia were cruelly harassed by the church in union with the state, a few of the persecuted peasants sought refuge in Saxony, under the protection of Count Zinzendorf. June 17, 1722, they cut down the first tree in a forest on the road between Zittau and Lobau, where they raised the first wood house of the village of Herrnhut. Eighteen other immigrants soon joined them; and for ten years these emigrations for liberty of conscience continued till some hundreds of these poor and persecuted followers of Christ had built for themselves the village of Herrnhut. In 1731, when their numbers amounted to only six hundred, they were visited by Anthony, a negro, who described to them the melancholy state of his fellow-slaves in the West Indies. Moved by that recital, two of the brethren offered to go as missionaries to the island of St. Thomas; and the church having approved of their design, they left Herrnhut Aug. 21, 1732; and October 8, they embarked at Copenhagen for that island.

The zeal which was thus excited in the church continued to increase, and within ten years did those poor exiles send missionaries to St. Thomas, to St. Croix, to Greenland, to Surinam, to Berbice, to several Indian tribes in North America, to the negroes in South Carolina, to Lapland, to Tartary, to Algiers, to Guinea, to the Cape of Good Hope, and to Ceylon.

Great as are the services which have been rendered to the cause of the Redeemer by that simple and fervent community, they have in one respect, at least, been surpassed by the free Protestant churches of France. I do not reckon it as the higher glory of these churches that they could count upon their members Sully, Coligni, and Andelot, D'Aubigné, and Duplessis Mornay, a band of companions more distinguished for virtue and for valor than any equal number of contemporary soldiers and statesmen in any period of French history; I will not dwell on the piety and talent of their ministers, Du Moulin, Du Bosc, Morus, Daillé, Drelincourt, Claude, Jurieu, Saurin, Abbadie, etc., whose writings have enriched our Protestant literature; but I allude to their sufferings for the sake of Christ.

The following are some among the numerous edicts by which Louis XIV., the licentious slave of a Jesuit confessor and abandoned mistresses, sought, as the head of the union between church and state, to exterminate the Protestantism of his kingdom. In 1669 his subjects were forbidden to quit the kingdom, on pain of confiscation of goods, etc. In 1680 Protestant children of seven years old were allowed, on abjuring their religion against the wishes of their parents, to leave them, and to demand from them a legal maintenance. In 1683 the reformed worship was forbidden in all the episcopal cities of the empire, and all books against the Roman Catholic religion were likewise prohibited.

At length, October, 1685, appeared the Edict of Revocation, by which Protestant temples were demolished, Protestant worship was forbidden, Protestant ministers were banished the kingdom; no other Protestant might leave the kingdom on pain of condemnation to the galleys; the children of Protestants were to be brought up as Catholics; and the goods of those who did not conform within four months were confiscated. Next year was added a decree, addressed to the king's attorneys (procureurs royaux), to seize Protestant children above five years of age, and to place them under the care of Catholics.

May, 1686, the king decreed that every Protestant minister apprehended in France should be executed; those who assisted a minister should be sent to the galleys, or imprisoned for life; 5,500 livres were to be given to each informer; and all persons detected and taken in the act of assembling for Protestant worship were to suffer death. Multitudes of Protestants conformed to the established religion; many more contrived to leave the kingdom; and at length, the worn-out debauchee coined a medal to celebrate his triumph as head of church and state over "the extinct heresy." But the same year in which the edict of Nantes was thus savagely revoked, the churches of the desert began to assemble in the mountains of Languedoc.

The same month in which the temple at Charenton was demolished, the religious assemblies of the Cevenols met under the vault of heaven; and the same year in which Louis the debauchee expired, glorying in his abolition of the Protestant worship, did a noble peasant youth collect a few preachers in the caverns of the Cevennes, and there undertake, in the name of God, the revival of the crushed and bleeding churches of France. . . .

Generally, their precautions enabled them to elude the vigilance of their oppressors; the place of meeting was announced to the brethren by faithful men, who visited them in their dwellings, and brave and prudent guides escorted the pastor to the spot by night along concealed paths. The brethren in the country communicated with the brethren in the towns. Every night, on these occasions, the pastor changed his lodging; and his brethren counted it an honor to welcome him at the risk of their own lives. When they were assembled, scouts on the neighboring heights warned them of the approach of the enemy, and thus often they escaped discovery. But if persecution raged too severely, the meetings were discontinued, and the churches seemed to have vanished, while every family, by reading of the Scriptures and by domestic worship, cherished its faith and piety for a happier day. Thus their constancy triumphed over the savage efforts of the church and state during half a century to destroy their property, their religion, and their existence.

Worship Governmentally Enforced at Annapolis.

"Truth Seeker."

If advices from Annapolis are reliable, church attendance by the naval cadets has been made compulsory. The regulations of the naval academy recite:—

"Cadets will not be excused from religious service at the chapel on Sunday, except upon their declaration in writing, with the written approval of their parents or guardians, when living, that they cannot conscientiously attend, or that they prefer, on the ground of their religious faith, to attend the services at some other place of worship in town."

A reason assigned for the order is that it is calculated "to maintain a loyal support of the religious services that the government has provided."

It is useless to inquire with what consistency a government which proclaims its separation from the church provides religious services for its citizens; we know that not consistency but corruption is responsible for the fact; but a remark of Admiral McNair in defense of the regulation is worthy of notice. He is quoted as saying: "This rule was laid down in the English navy as far back as Charles II. We have copied it and have not changed the language as much as the English have."

Now Charles II. was a depraved monarch who occupied the throne of England one hundred years before the American Revolution, at which time monarchy and the union of church and state were both repudiated. The regulation quoted by Admiral McNair is wholly congruous with the institutions of a country which maintains an established church, but the admiral seems to be too dull to see that it is no more applicable to American affairs than the regulations concerning the maintenance of a throne are to the office of a president of a republic.

If Admiral McNair can find no authority for his rule in the Constitution of the United States—which he certainly cannot, for that instrument prohibits everything of the kind—his first duty is to see that it is repealed. Treachery to our fundamental law in time of peace is as infamous as betrayal of the nation's cause when the country is at war.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 12.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

In this article it is our purpose to enquire what the motive was that inspired the founders of this nation to so frame the Constitution that in all this country's future history Congress, to whom is entrusted the duty of making laws, should be debarred from legislating in favor of or against religion.

It is true that the framers of the Constitution recognized the eternal principle that man's relation to his God is above human legislation, and his right of conscience inalienable.

But to stimulate them in the recognition of this "eternal principle" they had before them, in the Eastern Hemisphere, a system that, existing for over a thousand years, had embodied the very reverse of this principle—a system that claimed the right to govern the consciences of men; to say what he should or should not believe and practice in matters of religion; hesitating not to enforce its dogmas by means of the most varied and cruel tortures; stopping not until it had pried into and wrested from the innermost recesses of the soul, the secret thoughts of the heart; or failing this, leave the poor victim a mangled corpse, or doomed to spend a miserable existence in dark and loathsome dungeons. That system was the papacy.

Nor was this all. Even in the New World the Puritans had given some striking lessons in the disregard of the "eternal principle" referred to.

Knowing the horrors resultant from religious despotisms, the founders of this Government determined that matters of religion should be left to the individual conscience; that religion and the state should be kept separate.

Consequently it was provided in the Constitution (Article 6) that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." But there were many who felt that religious liberty was not sufficiently safeguarded by this provision. Accordingly the Constitution was amended so that that document now reads: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

That all this was done with the papacy in view can be clearly shown. In the memorial of the Presbytery of Hanover to the General Assembly of Virginia, and which subsequently had a bearing upon the formation of the Constitution, are found these words, "It is . . . impossible for the magistrate to adjudge the right of preference among the various sects that profess the Christian faith without erecting a claim to infallibility which would lead us back to the church of Rome."

And in another memorial by the same body, is found the following: "The duty we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can only be directed by reason and conviction, and is nowhere cognizable but at the tribunal of the universal Judge. . . . To judge for ourselves and our own consciences is an inalienable right, which, upon the principles on which the gospel was first propagated and the Reformation from popery carried on, can never be transferred to another."

From this it will be seen that the founders of our Government sought to guard this country from the evils of popery; and this could not be done without recognizing the "eternal principle" that man's relation to his God is above human legislation; hence at the beginning it was determined that no religion of whatsoever kind, should be meddled with, for or against, by the United States Government.

As the Reformers made their protest against popery in the sixteenth century, so in the eighteenth century the United States of America in the Constitution made its protest against it. And this is the only country that ever did it. Therefore it is true that the United States is the only Government that was essentially and truly Protestant.

What better place then could there be for Protestantism to be thoroughly tested than in this country? Unfettered by any governmental regulations in religious matters, this nation offered the fairest field for this purpose; the conditions could not be better.

More than this. Protestantism—true Protestantism—is biblical. Its principle is in perfect accord with the teachings of Jesus Christ. And the United States being Protestant, in the only way that a nation as a nation can be Protestant, viz., by leaving the question of religion entirely to the individual conscience—the United States from its beginning was in perfect accord with the teachings of Jesus Christ concerning the duties of nations with reference to religion.

Hence, Bancroft (History of the Formation of the Constitution) says: "Vindicating the right of individuality even in religion, and in religion above all, the new nation dared to set the example of accepting in its relation to God the principle first divinely ordained in Judea. It left the management of temporal things to the temporal power; but the American Constitution, in harmony with the people of the several states, withheld from the Federal Government the power to invade the home of reason, the citadel of conscience, the sanctuary of the soul; and not from indifference, but that the infinite spirit of eternal truth might move in its freedom and purity and power."

Thus did the United States espouse Protestantism pure and simple. When put to the test will it remain firm and true to the principle it recognized? Or will it abandon this position and step over on to papal ground? This is an important, as well as interesting, question. Who is watching this thing? We know of at least one; and that one is the man across the way—in the Vatican at Rome, and his name is Leo XIII.

THE advent of America as a military power upon the scene of European complications in the far East, said Lord Salisbury, the English premier, at a recent speech, "is a grave and serious event, which may not conduce to the interests of peace; though," he added, "I think in any event it is likely to conduce to the interests of Great Britain." These are weighty words, spoken by one who occupies the position of a competent observer and judge.

IN the same speech Lord Salisbury made this reference to the czar's proposition for international peace: "The czar has invited a congress to provide for the disarmament of the world; but while we offer our heartiest tribute to his motives and are willing to assist and sympathize in every way until the happy day when his aspirations are crowned with success, we must still provide precautions needful to counteract the dangers surrounding us." In this statement the English premier has outlined the position not only of Great Britain, but of all the leading powers of Europe. They all "sympathize" with the proposition in an abstract way, and are willing to lend it such assistance as is compatible with a continual extension of their own possessions and power in the earth, and increase of their military forces to counteract the surrounding dangers. But how long will it take at that rate to reach the sought-for condition of general and lasting peace?

WHETHER it is pessimistic or not to speak of the darker side of national or international affairs, it is always best to look facts in the face. That is the only way to be prepared for emergencies and avoid being compelled to face still worse conditions. The outlook would be hopelessly dark under all circumstances were it not for the hope of the gospel, and to him who has that hope no circumstances can make the outlook less than bright. The Christian is an optimist, always; and not to be such is to deny the Christian faith.

SOME time ago it was announced that the French government had decided to strike off the words "Dieu protege la France" from all French gold and silver coins. It appears that no definite action has been taken on the point up to the present, but now the intention is to be carried into effect. A Paris paper, the Gaulois, in making note of the fact, intimates that Frenchmen no longer have faith in Providence, but view God as being too high and far away, and that the republic needs protection nearer by. It is but natural, of course, that in view of the calamities that have fallen upon France in recent years, the idea of God as the national protection should have waned in the minds of the people. The false conception that the nation is Christian, and therefore bound to be under the divine protection, leads naturally, under adverse conditions, to the equally false idea that God is too high and too far off to pay much attention to human affairs, especially the comparatively small affairs of a single individual; and thus it leads naturally to loss of faith in God.

THE words stricken off from the French coinage were about equally significant with the words "In God We Trust," upon gold and silver coins of the United States. They in fact mean nothing, and hence are only superfluous. No nation—not even the most professedly Christian one—trusts in God; their trust is in their armies and navies; and to stamp the name of God upon its currency—which itself represents the god of most people—is only to take that name in vain.

RECENTLY the Rev. Dr. Burrell, a clergyman well known in this city, preached a discourse on the subject of "The Citizenship of the Christian." In stating some of the duties of this citizenship, he said:—

"Third, cast your ballot. Jesus Christ could not do it. He belonged to a subjugated race, but if he stood here to-day he would say, 'Vote, and vote right.' This is a duty that no Christian man should think of neglecting."

WHETHER Jesus Christ would or would not say what the Rev. Dr. Burrell says he would on this subject, it is certain that if he gave an admonition to vote, he would tell how that vote ought to be cast. He would not merely say, "Vote right," but he would state what the right vote is. Jesus Christ never left his followers in the dark on any point of Christian duty. He always stated to them clearly what duty was. This was his mission while he walked and taught throughout Judea.

OF course, if voting be a Christian duty, the duty is to "vote right." But at this point we get into difficulty. What is the right vote? There are plenty of people ready to tell us, including clergymen; but, they do not all tell the same story. If we follow their instructions on the subject we shall be voting several different tickets; and not being allowed to vote more than one ticket, we can not be sure that we are casting this "right" vote. And when we appeal to the Scripture to settle this point of Christian duty, we find no instruction on the point at all. To say nothing of instructions as to how a Christian should vote, we cannot even find any declaration that he should vote at all.

* * *

BUT it is certain, nevertheless, that the inspired Word gives a complete statement of Christian duty, not only for the time in which it was written, but for Christian people and all others to-day. To say less than this would be to impeach the wisdom or deny the power of God. And therefore it is certainly true that whatever so-called Christian duty cannot be found stated in that Word to-day, is not a Christian duty at all.

* * *

It is not enough for clergymen to say, "Vote, and vote right." It is not enough for them to say, on their own authority and by their own wisdom, what vote is right. Christian duty rests on no such basis. Let them point out that duty resting on the basis of the plain words of Scripture; and if they cannot do this, let them cease to talk further of it as "Christian."

Notes on the Civic-Philanthropic Conference.

BY JOHN D. BRADLEY.

(Concluded.)

THE Rev. P. J. McVeety, presiding elder Albion District, Mich., told how he had at one time, when threatened and cursed by certain men who were trying to establish a gambling house in town, and which he was trying to prevent by calling on the officials and prominent citizens of the place, shook his fist under their noses—and he went through the performance on the platform—and told them to do their worst but that they would find out who would get the worst in such an affair.

When Dr. Holmes had a chance to speak again, he said that however strange, impracticable and extreme might seem his propositions, he never expected to advocate and proclaim any such method as had been advocated and proclaimed there by a preacher and a missionary. That even though men might be seeking his life, he could not but regard it as morally wrong for him to retaliate by taking their lives. He would offer no resistance. As to Roman slavery being worse than the present, he pointed to particular trades and instances that he knew of in which men were driven so hard that they could last only a few years and then were turned out physical wrecks to starve. No such state of things had ever existed in any previous system of slavery, because the slave was property and it did not pay to abuse him. Strong objection had been made to his proposition that all men were of equal value and that they should all receive equal—namely, what they need. It was declared that all men are not of equal value—that some were worthless; that those who were industrious and frugal in early life would be comfortable in old age, but that those who were improvident and wasteful would not be comfortable in old age, and that no system could be devised that would make them comfortable. Some men had more talents and abilities than others and were therefore worth more to society. He replied that he remembered that a great teacher had once given a parable in which the truth of his proposition was illustrated, that in this parable some labored all day long, and others labored only one hour, but "he gave to every man a penny."

President Blanchard, of Wheaton College, gave a most impartial and judicial exposition of the question. He said that the time had arrived when it was almost impossible to consider this question from anything but a partisan standpoint, if one expected to be listened to with approval, or indeed heard at all. He carefully and at length stated all the grievances that are brought forward by the average wage-earner against capital. Then he stated the case of the wage earners as made out by themselves. It was easy to see that there was justice and injustice on both sides. It was true that labor was not getting its fair reward, that it was in many instances defrauded by capital. But equally true were the statements by the wage-payers that many of those who make the loudest complaints are worthless and that it is a loss in most instances to employ them, that they are improvident and spend their money recklessly; that those persons who are sober, industrious and frugal get along all right. That a mining town in which it was necessary to distribute food to the needy inhabitants, and yet in which fifty-one saloons did a thriving business, could not be made comfortable at any wages or by any sum of money. Each side insists that the fault is entirely on the other side, and they have no use for a person who takes any other view of the matter.

President Blanchard thought that the great mistake that was made by socialists and other reformers, and also by rich men who had attempted to help their employes, was the ignoring of the fact that man is more than so many pounds of flesh and bone; that he has a spiritual nature, and that the remedy which only ministers to and comforts his body can never supply his needs. He did not believe that any system that simply made the bodies of men comfortable would be able to maintain even that comfort long. Owing to the constitution of man, he could not believe that any system would ever come in which all would be equally comfortable and well cared for. It seemed to him a law of nature and a law of God that industry and frugality had their reward, and that idleness and improvidence had their penalty. That those who were saving and industrious in youth would be comfortable in old age, and that those who were not, who would not deny themselves at present for future needs, would not be comfortable, and could not be made so under any system. That a system that made all men comfortable and provided equally for all their wants regardless of these things would be a turning aside of what the Creator of men had ordained, and a putting a premium on things upon which he had placed his curse."

In the evening, Labor Commissioner Cox, of Michigan, was present and made the opening speech. He thought this was a grand and glorious country. He would rather be a citizen here, however mean his position, than the most exalted person in any other country. This is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Never mind who or what party is in power, things will come out all right. If those in power do not do what they should, the people speak and they are no more. Naturally enough he drifted into the Spanish war, and told how, since the birth of the present year, this great country had fought a glorious war in behalf of liberty and humanity. The workingman and the millionaire and the sons of millionaires fought side by side in this war for God. An iniquitous despotism had been crushed by them and millions of people set free with a loss of only seven men. "God carried the banner," he exclaimed, "for it was a war in behalf of humanity and God. I call it a holy war."

When he was through the mayor arose and quietly made the following remarks: "Let those who wish take what comfort and satisfaction they can from the Spanish war. The governor of Michigan told me the other day, and it is evident to everyone, that it would have been vastly cheaper to have bought the Island of Cuba outright at any price that might have been named. The most exorbitant price could not have equalled the cost of this war. So much for it as a matter of dollars and cents. The governor also said that there were in Michigan alone two hundred families in mourning as a result of that war. As to the war itself, I believe with Benjamin Franklin, that there never was a good war nor a bad peace. War is hell, and to say that there is or can be a Christian war, is to say that there is or can be a Christian hell. It is a contradiction in terms and cannot be."

The audience manifested its approval by hearty hand-clapping.

The mayor next introduced Prof. George D. Herron, of Iowa College, Grinnell, Iowa, from whom he said he had learned more than from any other man of his duty to his brother out of a job. Professor Herron gave an address which indicated deep earnestness and thought. He took more radical positions than any previous speaker. Some of the things he said were:—

The economic system under which we live enslaves not only the bodies but the souls of men. The system must be changed in order that both body and soul may be made free. That the present economic system, the corner-stone of which is supreme selfishness, is the root of nearly all the moral evils that afflict society, and that as long as this system continues no headway can be made against these other evils.

That the saloon and other evils were actually supplying a need, a social want, for millions of people. That here only could they meet and in obedience to the cravings of their natures, associate with and open their hearts to one another. The saloon was therefore supplying a human need which the churches did not supply. That was the secret of the saloon power.

That under the present system our supreme virtues were our supreme immoralities. That greed, the worst of all sins, for it was covetousness, was the supreme virtue of the American people. If he should stand before a representative religious congregation in this country and ask them to practice, just as they were spoken, the principles of the sermon on the mount, he would be looked upon as mentally unbalanced. But if the head of some great combination that had overridden the law and robbed the people, should stand before them with an endowment in his hand, their applause would be tremendous, and they would be ready to fall prostrate before him.

He said that what was wanted was not that the corrupt should be turned out and the "good" people put in. The very worst enemies of the liberation of the people were, as had been in all history, the "good" people. That there was a certain manliness in the magnate of wealth utterly foreign and beyond those "good" people who fawned before him and excused his methods. The very worst difficulty to be met to-day in liberating the people was the pious subterfuge that if the heart of the individual was set right things would be all right. He declared that under the present system the heart of the individual could not be set right; that this was not only a slavery of the body but a slavery of the soul as well; that when the time came for the children of Israel to worship God and understand his law, Moses did not go among them distributing tracts and telling them to set their hearts right as individuals. No, he did not waste his time in that way. He went to the despotic ruler of the country, who had oppressed them so that they were in slavery both soul and body, and said, "Let my people go!" That is what is demanded to-day—that the people shall first be liberated from the present economic slavery so that they may indeed become all right as individuals.

He declared that profit was a moral evil. That any man who worked for wages, no matter how kind his employer or how high his wages, was a slave. That the present system of wages was but an evolution of the slave system. He did not blame anybody any more than he blamed himself. That it was time to repent of our industrial sins, or it might be that we should be called upon to repent with barricaded streets flowing with blood.

On Saturday evening, Attorney-General Maynard, of Michigan, gave an address in which he showed that the progress of a people was indicated not by art, sculpture, architecture, literature, etc., but by the state of the law. If they had truly made progress they would know that all men were equal and that equality would be recognized and guaranteed by their laws. Justice would be impartially administered. All progress that had been made in the world had been made by the humble and the lowly who have always had to push onward and break the crust that is being continually formed by those who are at the top who are satisfied, and therefore want no change. He hoped that progress would continue until every unjust law would be abolished; when every law would be based upon the great principle, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Only then could there be perfect liberty.

Far-Seeing Leo.

A NEW YORK paper of October 27, announces the appointment, by the pope, of Archbishop Chapelle, of New Orleans, as Apostolic Delegate to Cuba and Porto Rico; also of the Philippines, in the event of those islands coming into the possession of the United States.

It is said that the archbishop is a warm, personal friend of President McKinley, and "as the question of church and state is one of the most serious problems facing the government in the new territories, the importance of Monsignor Chapelle's opinion, derived directly from the pope [italics ours] can hardly be exaggerated. That is so. The importance of such opinions, coming as they will, directly from the pope, cannot possibly be exaggerated. They bode no good for this country; although it is highly probable that those for whose benefit such opinions are to be formulated will not regard them in that light.

He who has the least knowledge of the papacy knows perfectly well that the pope's first consideration is always "the church." Whatever movement the pope makes, political or otherwise, is always for the good of "the church," that the Catholic religion may become a force in public as well as in private life. Thus in a speech a few years ago, to the pontifical household, among other things, he said, "It is of great importance that all work together to make religion a force in public as well as in private life. It is the duty of rulers to lend their support to religious creeds." And not a great while ago he charged the "faithful" that they should do all that lies in their power to the end that the nation should be molded after the papal idea of government.

The pope's solicitude for the United States is well known. In 1892 (July 11), the New York Sun published a letter from the Vatican in which are found these words: "He [the pope] wants America to be powerful, in order that Europe may regain strength from borrowing a rejuvenated type."

Now that Porto Rico has come into the possession of the American Government, and the possibility of the same being true of Cuba and the Philippines, the ever watchful Leo, recognizing the serious religious problems the United States must face in dealing with these territories, has promptly appointed a territorial "apostolic delegate," so that the President might get the benefit of the pope's opinion upon this question. That an intimate friend of the President should be chosen to fill this office is perfectly natural. To do otherwise would be worse than useless.

As apostolic delegate, Archbishop Chapelle feels very confident that in these church and state problems he can help our Government. Thus he says: "As a thoroughly loyal American I may be able to help our Government in the work of reconstruction. The political and social welfare of the people of the islands will greatly depend upon proper reorganization. The United States will readily understand that its political and economical interests, as well as the honor of the country among nations, require that this work of reorganization should be carried out with justice and equity to all. My duty will be to look after the liberty of conscience and the protection of person and property."

While much is expected to be gained from the close friendship existing between the President and the archbishop, there is danger of the papal scheme being recognized as such. The pope therefore must be made to appear as in thorough harmony with the United States on the question of religious liberty.

Later this will be made still more plain.

C. H. K.

DEAR reader, do you not think that the SENTINEL should have a wider circulation in your community? Are there not honest souls near you who need to know the things of Cæsar and the things of God? Think of it—children suspended from the public schools in Ashland, Ore., because they will not violate principle nor surrender conscience by saluting the flag; and men in Maryland undergoing imprisonment because of their faithfulness to God! Is it not time to arouse and set these things before the people?

Note our special offer on last page, and see what you can do in your neighborhood.

"It is money that talks, these days;" but its talk is not of the most edifying character.

It is superfluous to inquire whether this or that religious institution will be lost or preserved. The gospel concerns itself only with the question of the loss or salvation of souls. To the soul that is not lost, no divine institution will be lost; and to the soul that is lost, all divine institutions are of no benefit.

WHEN the church boasts of her political strength, she proclaims her spiritual weakness.

INTELLECTUAL conviction, not physical coercion, is the power upon which reliance must be put for the maintenance of free government.

Be Careful.

IN speaking of a person's faults,
Pray don't forget your own;
Remember those with homes of glass
Should never throw a stone;
If we have nothing else to do
But talk of those who sin,
'Tis better we commence at home,
And from that point begin.

We have no right to judge a man,
Until he's fairly tried;
Should we not like his company,
We know the world is wide.
Some may have faults, and who have not?
The old as well as young;
Perhaps we may, for all we know,
Have fifty to their one.

I'll tell you of a better plan,
And find it works full well,
To try our own defects to cure,
Before of others tell.
And though I sometimes hope to be
Not worse than some I know,
My own shortcomings bid me let
The faults of others go.

Then let us all when we commence
To slander friend or foe,
Think of the harm one word may be
To those who little know.
Remember, curses frequently,
Like chickens, roost at home;
Don't speak of others' faults until You've tried to see your own.

Studies in French History.—47.

"WELL, boys, I am very much rejoiced to see you once more," said Professor Carman, as Charlie and Rob took their old places with the others in the French History class.

After the hearty greetings were over, Charlie White said: "I suppose, professor, that you are getting along pretty fast with the studies. I'm afraid Rob and I can't catch up very soon."

"But I suppose you have learned far more while you have been gone than we who have been obliged to stay at home; for I saw by the letter you wrote us that you were visiting many places of historical interest; perhaps you would be willing to tell us of something you saw which impressed you the most," said Professor Carman.

"Well, I will mention one thing which had a sort of horrible interest about it, for us, boys, and that was, that on the 24th day of August last, Rob and I walked up and down the very streets where the poor Huguenots were mowed down like grass in that awful St. Bartholomew affair."

"Yes," said Rob, "we thought more about it on that day than on any other while we were in Paris, because that is the anniversary. Every time we heard a bell ring all that day it made us start."

"The next day after we wrote you the letter, we went over to Rheims, from Paris," said Charlie, "it isn't more than 100 miles, I think, by rail. Rob and I remembered that this is the town where almost all the French kings were crowned."

"Fie, Charlie," interrupted Rob, "I don't believe we would either of us have remembered a thing about it, if our interesting old Miguel hadn't told us,—he went with us, you know."

"I guess Rob is right," smiled Charlie; "for I remember how much Miguel had to say about Joan of Arc, and how she finally managed to get Charles the Victorious over there to be crowned."

"We took old Miguel with us because we had got so we could understand him quite well, and he was good and honest. When we first walked through the city gates he said in his funny brogue that 'dis vas de gate' where the English came out and handed the keys of the city to the French king. Miguel used to tell us her sad story over and over."

"Did you learn about how large the city of Rheims is at the present time?" asked Professor Carman.

"I think father said this morning that it was said to contain about 90,000 people or more," replied Rob. "It is very pleasant just outside the city, for it is real hilly, and on almost all the hills there are pretty vineyards growing."

"Well," said the teacher, "perhaps it would be best to go on with our regular studies now. Of whom were we speaking in our last lesson, Edna?"

"I think Cardinal Richelieu was the character we were talking about; he seemed to be a greater man even than King Louis XIII. himself."

"He was; for the king was almost constantly under his influence. It was through him that France was placed, as history states, 'at the head of all European nations.' And he did a still better deed for his people than that. He made a very vigorous protest against dueling, which in his time—the 17th century—was getting to be horribly common; the cardinal made it a law that any one who was caught fighting a duel should be executed just like any other murderer; and the seconds on both sides should share the same fate."

"I should not think it would have been very fashionable to fight duels after that," smiled Milly Brown.

"Indeed it was not. But though this man did some good deeds, his record is marred by acts of folly. He was a very vain man, and dearly loved to make a show. Once when he had occasion to go to Lyons, he had a regular house built for himself to ride in; of course there was only one room in it, but he had it furnished just as elegantly and expensively as a palace. This little house he had carried on men's shoulders—with himself inside of it;—there were eighteen men chosen for this work, and he could walk about or lie down at any time he chose."

"I don't see how he could get through the city gates with such a big concern," said practical Jack, with a puzzled look.

"I'll tell you how they did it," smiled his teacher, "they just went to work and tore the walls down to make a gate big enough for the big gentleman to pass through! and if they came to any ditches, they either had to fill them up or build a bridge over them."

"How grand! exclaimed Milly Brown. He must have felt just like a fairy prince. I tell you, I wish I could ride around that way!"

Professor Carman smiled as he said:

"Well, but Milly, remember that the cardinal was getting to be an old man now, and he was sick at the time; this is the only excuse for his vanity that I can make. I will venture to say that he did not look at all like a fairy prince; age and gray hairs and wrinkles do not become fairies, Milly.

"At last," continued the teacher, "this great man died. He was great indeed, as the world esteems greatness."

"I don't see how King Louis ever did without him," said Harry Ray.

"Poor Louis died in a few short months afterward. I dare say he found the burdens he had to bear too much to carry alone. Though he only said coolly, when told of his friend's death, 'There is a great politician gone!'"

King Louis died at the age of forty-two, in the year 1643—just thirty-three years to a day after the death of his father, Henry of Navarre.

"Next week," said Professor Carman, as he dismissed the class, "we will take up the history of France under King Louis XIV."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

In the Army.

JACK thought he would like to be a soldier. He had read about great wars, and men who were called great because they had led great armies to fight and kill their fellowmen.

The sound of a drum always set Jack's feet to stepping off the music, and made him wish he was big enough to be a soldier. He was always ready to run after a procession that had a band of music.

Jack's mother was sorry that he had such notions. She thought war was an awful thing. She said men ought to help one another, and that it was a great sin for them to spend their time trying to kill each other.

One day Jack was thinking over his favorite dream about war, and about being great, and at last he exclaimed, "Mother, I do wish I could soon be old enough to be a soldier."

"Why, Jack, you are old enough to be a soldier," said his mother, seriously.

"Yes, I suppose I might be a drummer boy," said Jack dryly. "I have read of drummer boys being only twelve years old. But I want to carry a gun or a sword."

"We are now at peace with the world," replied Mrs. Stark, "but there is a war that goes on all the time, with an enemy that none of us can see. I do wish you would become a good soldier in that war."

"What war is that, mother?" asked Jack, and he seemed to be very much interested all at once. "I didn't know there was any war now."

"I mean the war against sin,—bad thoughts, naughty words, and ugly acts. The enemy that carries on this wicked war against us is Satan. We cannot see him, and for this reason he beats us many times. The worst of it is that we too often help him to fight against ourselves, when we ought to be always against him. It is a poor soldier who turns against himself and against the army to which he belongs."

"But I don't quite understand how we help the enemy," said Jack.

"Well, I will tell you," replied his mother. "Satan knows that as long as he can get us to tell lies, or quarrel with each other, or steal, or cheat, even in little things, he can defeat us. As long as any of us do selfish things, we cannot have eternal life, and that is what our enemy wants to keep from us."

Jack became more and more interested as his mother told him that he could now be a soldier in God's army, which is fighting a much greater battle than the greatest man could fight. God wants little boys and girls for soldiers just as much as he wants men and women; and they can win just as great victories.

Who will be a soldier for Christ? It is much better to fight to save men than to fight to kill them. The boy or girl who, by Christ's help, keeps from doing wrong, is greater than the captain that takes a city.—Selected.

A POLITICAL HISTORY

Of the great questions culminating in the CIVIL WAR in the words of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and STEPHEN A. DOUGLASS.

555 Pages. Cloth $1.75.

The work is entitled "Political Debates and Speeches of Lincoln and Douglas," and contains a complete report of their speeches and debates. The burning words of these great orators are of absorbing interest both to those who have lived through the exciting scenes pictured out, and those who know them merely as history. There can be nothing better placed in the hands of the rising generation than a book presenting, in an attractive way, the principles on which this government is founded. Efforts are now being made to overthrow those principles, hence it is important that we become intelligent regarding them. The work is a great assistance to that end.

Our Combination Bible

Is undoubtedly the BEST BIBLE offered with a periodical. Please note that it is a

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

The "Self-Pronouncing" means that the long hard names are divided into syllables and can be pronounced with ease.

The "Combination" gives both the King James and the revised readings at a glance.

The "Teachers'" signifies that the Bible contains full Teachers' Helps, Illustrations, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of Proper Names with their meaning, Maps, etc.

The "Reference" says that it has complete references just as all first-class Bibles have.

The type is Bourgeois—large and clear, similar to that in which this paper is set —and is much prized by all who use it.

It is bound in Tampico morocco, divinity circuit, leather lined to edge, round corners, red under gold edges, silk headband silk marker, etc.

Those desiring a thinner book can order the Bible without "helps," or with the Concordance only.

Send for a circular giving directions how to read the Combination, showing a full-sized cut of the Bible, specimen of type, etc.

Since we have received so many words of commendation for this Bible from those who are using it, we really feel that we are offering something well worth more than the price when we say—

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

 For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 17, 1898.

THE trial of two of the three cases of arrest for Sunday labor at Ford's Store, Md., with the result, is given on page 710. The other case—that of Mr. Plevenger—was thrown out of court, on account of the fact that he had not been tried before a justice of the peace, as the others had. Mr. Plevenger demanded a jury trial, and his case was allowed to go to the circuit court, which by the judge's statement, had no original jurisdiction in such cases, and therefore refused to consider it.

THE "flag salute" is in evidence again, this time on the Pacific Coast, at Ashland, Ore. The salute has been made compulsory in the public schools of that place, the result being that four children have been suspended for refusing to participate in it, and more like cases are expected to follow.

The salute requires that the pupils shall stand and repeat the words, "We give our heads and our hearts to God and our country." As no person can be rightfully compelled to give either his head or his heart to either God or his country, there are some who naturally refuse to comply with the demand, and the consequence is they are punished by being suspended from the schools. Of course, these individuals are those who adhere most to the dictates of conscience. They are really punished for being conscientious.

Parents of these children have appealed to the principal of the schools and to the board of directors for relief, but they are told that there is no harm in the salute, and that they are taking an extreme position; also that they ought to be willing to strain their consciences if necessary for the sake of patriotism and discipline in the schools.

The public schools are established to instruct the children in the rudiments of scientific knowledge. With patriotism, or any other sentiment, they have rightfully nothing to do. Every person, whether child or adult, has a right not to be patriotic if he so chooses, and he cannot be molested in this or in the exercise of any other sentiment so long as he does no injury to the rights of others. This is true even conceding that the flag salute is an exhibition of true patriotism.

But as a matter of fact, it is nothing of the kind. True patriotism is spontaneous, never forced. The children may be taught to repeat certain patriotic phrases, but this is very much like trying to make a patriot out of a parrot. Patriots are not made in that way.

SPECIAL OFFER.

The price of the "Sentinel" is $1 per year, but the publishers have decided to extend to every subscriber now on the list an agency for the paper, and receive new subscriptions from them at the regular agent's rate; namely, 75 cents per year.

In addition to this, we will date the expiration of the subscriptions January 1, 1900, thus giving the remaining weeks of this year FREE.

Teach the children to respect the rights of one another and of all people; and teach them this by respecting their own rights. This will develop in them the principles of true manliness, and only as these principles are developed can there be any development of the patriotism that is of real worth to the state.

WE greatly appreciate the aid of our friends everywhere who have sent us newspaper clippings giving interesting items of news that have fallen under their notice. We have not found room in the paper for all of these, nor time even to acknowledge all of them by personal letter; but we assure our friends that we appreciate their efforts and interest just as much as though we had told them so individually by a long letter.

VERY serious race conflicts are reported from Wilmington, N. C., and Greenwood, S. C., resulting in the death of twenty-two men, mostly negroes. At the latter place an election riot precipitated the trouble, a party of negroes going armed to the polls, with a view of enforcing their right to vote as they pleased; this by the ill advice of one or two white men. The effort to suppress the negro vote in the South, while it may be successful for a time, can never bring any permanent condition of peace, but on the contrary, must result in continual and ever increasing friction. For the negroes have a right to vote,—a right upheld by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution—and they are aware of this right, and the more they become uplifted in the social scale by education, the more intelligently and persistently will they contend for their political freedom. Either every movement in the direction of intellectual freedom for these people must be stopped, or the white people of the South must be prepared for the eventual rise of the colored race to the plane of political equality.

It is very natural that white people should prefer people of their own race for public office; but to deny to any people the political rights guaranteed by the highest law of the land only produces an unnatural state of things which can but be a constant menace to the peace and prosperity of the State.

PERFECT individual self-government is the condition prerequisite to perfect republican government; and the only government in which this condition has been or will be realized is the government of God.

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 24, 1898.

NUMBER 46.

THE man-made Sabbath is upheld from beneath; the Lord's Sabbath is sustained from above.

ALL immorality is sin; and the remedy for sin is not law, but the gospel.

IT is no more sinful to openly work on the Sabbath than to obey the law in the letter, while hating the spirit of it. No Sabbath keeping is truly such which is not prompted by love to its Author.

CHURCH history is largely a warning to the church against going into politics.

THEOLOGICAL dogmas are not made any more truthful, stable, or valuable by being embodied in the law of the land.

IT is the business of Christians in this world to let their light shine by their good works, not to try to compel people to shine whose works are evil.

"In union there is strength," does not apply to a union of church and state. An unhappy marriage is a source of great weakness to both parties.

PEOPLE who attend properly to their own morals will have all they can do without trying to supervise the morals of their neighbors.

SINNERS cannot be driven out of the pathway of sin. They must be led.

RELIGIOUS error is always frantically calling for a law to support it, since it has no strength in itself.

WHEN the church goes into politics, it is only to be expected that politicians will go into the church.

THE sanctity of any Christian institution cannot be lost because people disregard it, or preserved by arresting and punishing people who refuse to observe it.

THE political compass is altogether too changeable to be a safe instrument by which to steer the ship of Zion.

THE CHURCH IN POLITICS—AS IT MUST RESULT TO THE CHURCH.

THE church is seemingly bent upon entering into politics, thinking that thus she can most surely and quickly attain to the long-sought goal of her desires, where righteousness will be established in the earth, and those conditions of peace and prosperity prevail which in fancy she has associated with the setting up of the kingdom of God. But it is the old deception by which the church of former times was lured upon the rocks of worldliness and utterly wrecked; and only the same result can follow now. Union with the civil power means disunion from the spiritual power of her Lord, and the consequent paralysis of her spiritual strength. Once caught in the currents of worldliness which flow so strongly toward the goal of political ambition, she will find herself powerless to stem the tide, and spiritual shipwreck will be the inevitable result.

Predictions vs. History.

TERRIBLE things will happen, say the advocates of "Christian citizenship," if Christians keep aloof from politics. To this the answer is that terrible things have happened—the worst that ever darkened human history—because "Christians" went into politics.

For it was a religio-political union between Christianity (as represented by the church of Constantine's day) and the state, in the person of the emperor, that set in motion the hideous machinery of religious persecution,—that ushered in the long and terrible period of massacre and torture worse than death, done in the name of religion; that spread a pall of blackness over all that was bright in human life, turned loose the worst passions of human depravity, and deluged the earth with human blood, regardless of age or sex. All this actually took place upon the earth, and continued for centuries, because "Christians" did not keep aloof from politics; because, in other words, they entered into the business of conducting the affairs of the state.

Constantine and the church both felt themselves in need of power. So Constantine gave his power as emperor to the church, in return for the power exercised by the church upon men through religion. A partnership was formed for the control of the affairs both of church and state,—a partnership in which ere long the church became the directing and controlling head. This was the church in politics; but the church could never have gone into politics if its members, as individuals, had refused to do so.

And all this was done by the church—by "Christians"—from a very pious motive. It was done in order that society might be reformed and elevated,—and more than this. It was done to usher in the kingdom of God. It was believed that this was accomplished, or speedily to be so, after Constantine had professed conversion to Christianity. When his mother sent him from Jerusalem some "nails of the true cross," to be used as bridle bits for his war horse, it was counted a fulfillment of Zachariah's prophecy that "what is upon the bridles of the horses shall be holiness unto the Lord." And his act of appointing his sons and nephews to be sharers in the authority of the government, was associated with the fulfillment of the prophecy of Daniel 7:16, "The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom."

The church in her political measures has never lost sight of this vision of the setting up of the kingdom of God. From that day down to the present her efforts to shape the affairs and wield the authority of the civil government, have been with a view of advancing the fulfillment of the prophecies relating to this event. And this same idea and purpose crop out in much that is said to-day upon the necessity of active political work by members of the Christian church. The motive of such activity to-day is not a new one, but is in fact identical with that which inspired the "Christian" church in all the ages of her union with the state.

With this very good and very pious motive, Christians—in the early days of the church—went into politics, and history has recorded the terrible result. Then let the church—let Christians—keep out of politics. Then whatever disasters may come, if they will do this, there can be no possibility of a repetition of the worst calamity that ever brought ruin on church and state.

What Will the Protestants Do?

LAST week we gave the first half of the remarkable letter of the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Daily American, as printed in that paper, October 15, 1898, declaring and justifying the fact that as the result of "numerous conferences with Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland" on the subject, "It is the determination of President McKinley that the Catholic churches [in Cuba] shall be kept open, and that public worship shall be amply provided for," and "To this end sufficient money will be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church."

It was stated by this correspondent that "this will only be regarded as a temporary loan and when law and order are fully reestablished on the distracted island, the Catholic Church will be expected to maintain itself like every other church."

Do you notice the trickery in this sentence last quoted?—It is said that this Governmental money "will be only a temporary loan." Now the natural complement of that expression would be that "when law and order are fully reestablished on the distracted island, the Catholic Church will be expected to pay back this money. But instead of that we find only the elusive statement that while this money "will be only a temporary loan" "till law and order can be reestablished," yet "when law and order are fully reestablished" instead of paying back this "temporary loan" it is only that "the Catholic Church will be expected to maintain itself like every other church."

Then whereabouts does the "temporary loan" come in? When the money is never to be paid back, how can there be about it any of the character of a loan either temporary or otherwise? The truth is of course that it is not, and is not expected to be, a temporary loan at all; but an eternal gift.

The correspondent next makes an open bid for all the other denominations in Cuba to sanction this unlawful course of the Catholic Church and President McKinley, by themselves doing the same thing. He says:—

“Such free Protestant churches as exist in Cuba are supported either by contributions of their congregations or by the mission funds of their respective denominations. At the same time, if a demand were made on this Government that the same favors be extended to Protestant churches and clergymen in Cuba that it is intended to extend towards the Catholics, that is to say, undertake the entire responsibility for their support, it is assumed that this Government could not consistently refuse to do so.”

This is an attempt to play again upon the Protestant churches, the identical trick that was played upon them by the Catholic Church, in connection with the Indian schools, in the first year of Mr. Cleveland's presidency, by which fourteen “Protestant” churches and the United States Government were entrapped; and from which the Government has not yet been able to free itself.

It is true that if this demand were made by the Protestants the “Government could not consistently refuse,” since the Government is doing all this for the Catholic Church. And more than this, the Government cannot consistently do this for the Catholic Church without doing the same for all the Protestant churches. The Catholic managers of this scheme know this full well, and therefore this shrewd suggestion is made to the Protestants, that they may again be entrapped and so hide the inconsistency of governmental support of the Catholic Church. Will the Protestants of the land repudiate this designing suggestion, expose this evil scheme, and demand that the United States Government shall maintain the only lawful as well as the only consistent attitude—that of absolutely refusing to furnish a single cent or cent's worth of support to the Catholic Church, or any other church; or to the “priests and high church dignitaries” of the Catholic Church, or the ministers of any other church, in Cuba or anywhere else? If the Protestants of the land will not do this, why will they not?

That correspondent suggests that the Protestant churches and clergymen in Cuba “demand” that the United States Government extend to them “the same favors that it is intended to extend toward the Catholics.” This is also intensely suggestive that the Catholics got these favors upon “demand.” The rest of this remarkable letter shows the basis of this demand of the Catholics. We have not space for it this week, and must therefore postpone the analysis of that till next week. However, from a careful study of it, we are prepared to say that for cool, essential deviltry it must bear the palm.

Meantime let all bear in mind that so far this Washington correspondent makes plain, that “It is the determination of President McKinley that the Catholic churches [in Cuba] shall be kept open, and that public worship shall be amply provided for;” that “To this end sufficient money will be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church;” and that this means that the Government “undertakes the entire responsibility” for its support.

Union of Church and State Condemned by History.—No. 6.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

IN vain, then, do Mr. Burke and Mr. Gladstone appeal on behalf of the principle of establishments to the general practice of mankind. That general practice, pagan and papal but not Christian, has ever been employed to sustain tyranny and priestcraft, to crush liberty and to repress truth; and can ill be pleaded on behalf of a principle which it illustrates only to brand with eternal infamy.

Throughout the preceding sketch of church history we see the state churches, like the imperial harlot in the seventeenth chapter of the Apocalypse, committing fornication with the kings of the earth, by disloyally transferring to them Christ's right of governing his churches, receiving from them their golden hire in return; and the free churches, like the woman of the twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse, persecuted by the dragon, and driven into the desert.

We see the state churches, like the harlot, clothed with purple, and adorned with gems, Rev. 17:4; and the free churches, like the woman clothed with the sun, radiant with the glory of divine grace, Rev. 12:1.

We see the state churches, like the harlot who was seated on the symbolic beast, sustained by superstitious and ungodly majorities, Rev. 17:3; and the free churches, like the sun-bright woman, who was solitary in the wilderness, long deserted and proscribed by them, Rev. 12:6.

We see the state churches, like the harlot, persecuting the saints of God, Rev. 17:6; and the free churches, like the sun-bright woman, sustained by God under persecution, Rev. 12:6.

We see the state churches, like the harlot, exulting in their numerous adherents, power, and wealth, and exclaiming, “I sit a queen, and shall see no sorrow,” Rev. 18:7; and the free churches, at length helped by the earth, because at length the world began to favor entire liberty of conscience, and respect justice between man and man, Rev. 12:16.

In the state churches we see too much approximation to the great apostasy; and in the free churches no less conformity to the predicted condition of the church of Christ.

All history proclaims that the union, tried through long centuries of misrule, and found everywhere to be only potent for evil, should at length give place to Christ's own law of spiritual liberty, through which alone his churches can accomplish their beneficial mission, to bring the nations of the earth into the service of the Redeemer, and to make all intellects and all hearts tributary to his glory.

Christian Unity.

BY GEO. B. WHEELER.

ONE of the unmistakable movements of the day amongst ecclesiastical bodies is that toward Christian unity. It has long been looked upon by these religious bodies as something so very desirable that it ought by some means to be attained. Cardinal Gibbons, in a sermon at St. Patrick's Church, in this city, recently voiced this sentiment. He said: "A yearning cry for Christian unity has gone forth. It is echoed from every portion of the Christian world. All of us share in this holy desire. We would be willing to surrender all that is dear to us, even life itself, for this happy consummation. If Americans enjoyed united Christian belief as they possess commercial and political unity, then, indeed, the universal reign of Jesus Christ on earth would be accelerated. But there is one basis of this unity, and that is the basis established by Christ and his apostles."

It is evident that the only true basis of Christian unity is harmony of belief and purpose, in accordance with the Word of God; and as this can only be brought about by the Spirit of God in the hearts of the unbelievers, it follows that any external pressure applied to the multitude of conflicting creeds of Christendom would be futile. An appearance of unity might be attained under the pressure of fear, but it would be only concealed hypocrisy; the disunion would all be there.

The strife in the efforts to attain Christian unity will be seen in the fact that each sect of Christians will desire to have all other Christian sects unite on its own belief. This of course is natural, as each one believes it is right. At the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, recently held in this city, a church unity amendment was discussed in which some of the speakers expressed the opinion that Protestant denominations of the country will ultimately unite one and all as the church of the American people. Cardinal Gibbons, in the sermon referred to before, said: "Now where shall we find that unity and concord which Christ so earnestly demands? We shall find it only in the Catholic Church. The Church of God contains about 250,000,000 adherents, scattered throughout the globe. They have all one Lord, one baptism, one faith, one creed. They receive the same sacraments, they worship at the same altar, they pay allegiance to the same spiritual head. No matter how learned or popular a man may be, as soon as he contumaciously denies a single article of faith, or withdraws from the union of his legitimate pastor, he is cut off like a withered branch from the vine of the church." And that church has always used the power of the state, whenever she has had the power, to keep her people from doing so wicked a thing as that.

It is evident that the religious bodies who are so earnestly seeking unity, are not doing it by seeking the power of the Spirit of God to bring them into harmony, but by seeking the power of the state to compel religious conformity by law. And the common ground upon which they are working now is the observance of Sunday enforced by law. This recognizes the principle as right, and the only logical outcome of it will be a state church with no tolerance for heretics.

Washington, D. C.

Religion vs. Rights.

THE view which some good people take of their moral responsibilities in connection with the affairs of their neighbors, is well illustrated by the following which appears in the correspondence column of the Defender. This journal is the organ of Sunday enforcement in New England, and has been sending out through that section extracts from the Sunday laws of the New England states; and in reply one recipient writes:—

"I received your extracts from the Sunday laws. We have a grocer and provision dealer, who persists in keeping open his store on the Sabbath. The day passes very rarely when he does not have from three to six customers, and often more. Some of the children from ten to fifteen years old, I have seen repeatedly come from the store with groceries or meat. Sometimes on returning from prayer-meeting I have counted four or five young boys purchasing candy and cigars.

"I have placed a copy of the Sunday laws where he could not fail to see it; but the Sabbath following, the store was opened as before.

"I have no ill-feeling against the man. He is my neighbor, I would not injure him. But I do not think it is right or consistent for me as a Christian to allow him to injure the minds of his own children and mine."

The last sentence contains the kernel of the argument. The writer, being a Christian, feels that it would be wrong for him to allow the minds of the children and the morals of the community to be injured by non-Christian practices. Whether keeping open store on Sunday is an injury to any person or not, is purely a religious question; and he views it in the affirmative not because he is a man asserting the rights of created beings as such, but because he is a professor of religion. Because he has chosen to profess religion, other people are to be restricted in their actions by the law of the land. This is what his view, simply analyzed, amounts to.

But human liberties rest on no such narrow basis; they cannot thus be subjected to the human will. They rest upon the broad ground of the common inalienable rights shared by all mankind alike, irrespective of religious belief or variations of personal condition. And this is the only proper ground of civil legislation. Based upon narrower ground, as the believers in Sunday sacredness would have it, legislation can only invade the rights which it ought to protect. The field of religious belief is properly the field of moral suasion, and of that only.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 13.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

THE United States is the only nation that ever espoused, in the fullest sense, the governmental principle of Protestantism. It was the first that ever "dared to set the example of accepting in its relation to God the principle first divinely ordained in Judea," and it was the first to leave the management of temporal things to the temporal power.

From the Federal Government was withheld by the Constitution the "power to invade the home of reason, the citadel of conscience, the sanctuary of the soul." And Bancroft is careful to say that all this was in order that the "Infinite Spirit of eternal truth might move in its freedom and power."

Nor does the historian give this as his own deduction. He had abundant evidence from the writings of those who took part in the formation of the Constitution to show that it was because they respected the Author of the Christian religion and the Holy Spirit—the Infinite Spirit of eternal truth—the only true representative of Christ in the earth.

Could such a position taken by this nation at its beginning fail to have an influence upon the nations of the Old World? Could such a wide departure from the practices of the older nations fail to incite the wonder and astonishment of those governments? It certainly could not.

Hence we find a writer in La Liberte (1868) saying, "The population of America, not thinned by any conscription, multiplies with prodigious rapidity, and the day may before long be seen, when they will number sixty to eighty millions of souls. This parvenu [one recently risen to notice] is aware of his importance and destiny. Hear him proudly exclaim, "America for Americans!" See him promising his alliance to Russia; and we see that power, which well knows what force is, grasp the hand of this giant of yesterday. In view of his unparalleled progress and combination, what are the little toys with which we vex ourselves in Europe. . . . Had we not better take from America the principle of liberty she embodies, out of which have come her citizen pride, her gigantic industry, and her formidable loyalty to the destinies of her Republican land?"—"Marvel of Nations," p. 22.

Says another, "America is certainly the observed of all observers. The eyes of nations are upon her. This free government, this 'experiment at free government,' as European absolutists have sneeringly termed it, fixes the gaze of the whole world."

It is needless here to multiply statements of this kind, when it is such a well-known fact.

Embodying, as we have seen, in its fundamental law—the Constitution—the principle of religious liberty; and and by its Protestant principles furnishing the fairest field for the settlement of the question that we have seen must eventually come up, viz., the Sunday question—it might well be asked, Is this Government pointed out in the "Scripture of truth" and its work noted therein?

There is every antecedent probability that such is the case. Nations less wonderful, less mighty, of less influence, have been mentioned in the prophetic Word; why not this Government? Certainly if reasons can be offered why other nations should be thus spoken of, more numerous, more weighty reasons could be given in favor of the United States.

Granting the possibility of this Government being mentioned in the prophetic Scriptures, where shall we turn in our search for it? We think that a careful study of the symbol mentioned in Rev. 13:11-17 will convince one that the prophet is describing this nation, with particular reference to the question of Sunday.

But of this much we may be certain: either the beast with two horns brought to view in the Scripture referred to is a symbol of the United States, or else this country has no place in the prophecies; and, further, that no nation has ever arisen which could possibly answer to the symbol. But it is impossible for this last to be true, for the "Scripture cannot be broken;" and it is equally impossible to suppose that our nation is not a subject of prophecy, when we bear in mind that nations of less prominence and influence have been.

Without going into an extended study of the symbols with which that of Rev. 13:11 is associated, and which would strengthen the position that the two-horned beast is a symbol of the United States, an examination of the symbol itself will be sufficient to prove the correctness of this view.

It is well known that beasts, when spoken of symbolically, represent earthly governments. Dan. 7:1-7, 17, 23. And also, that a lamb is frequently spoken of as a symbol of Christ. John 1:29, 36; Rev. 5:6.

From this the conclusion is irresistible that the beast with the two-horns like a lamb, is a government founded upon principles, lamb-like in their nature, and which are in accordance with the teachings of Jesus Christ concerning the duties of nations in their relations to their own subjects, and to all other nations.

It is not too much to say that the nation which would approach the nearest to the principles taught by Christ or by his Spirit through the apostles would come the nearest—so far as it is possible for earthly nations to do so—to being like the nation which should have Christ to rule over it.

Christ was no politician, and he sought no political preferment. All his utterances were expressions of deep underlying principles, which, if recognized, could not fail to enhance the happiness and peace of all God's creatures no matter under what government they might live, and to make the nation itself at peace with all other nations, and all other nations at peace with it.

This being true, it would be utterly impossible for Christ to do differently, were he a ruler of an earthly government, to that which he taught as man's duty to his fellowman.

"The Same Yesterday and To-day."

BY A. R. BELL.

"To Abraham and his seed were the promises made."

"And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."

The Lord said to Abraham, "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great." He also said, "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever."

Paul, speaking of Abraham, says the promise was "that he should be the heir of the world." But the same inspired writer tells us "he became a sojourner in the land of promise, as in a land not his own, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise: for he looked for the city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God." (R. V.) Also speaking of his seed, Paul says they "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth;" and speaking of himself and his brethren (and that includes us down here in 1898) he says, "We have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come."

Jesus Christ, the one through whom by faith the promises are made "yea and amen" to all that believe, is the heir of God. The Scripture also says, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ." We are with Christ "heirs of the kingdom;" and yet he has told us in no uncertain words, "My kingdom is not of this world."

Not here in this sin-cursed, iniquity-steeped earth are the heirs of God to receive the fulness of the promises of God. "Kept in store, reserved unto fire" with all "the works that are therein," this "present evil world" will stand till the "day of God." Then "the elements shall melt with fervent heat;" but we according to the promise of God "look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

This is the fulfillment of the promise of God made to Abraham nearly four thousand years ago. This is what we are admonished to look forward to and to hasten. Why will not those who to-day profess to be Abraham's seed know that the things which were written aforetime were written for their learning, for their admonition?

Why will they not learn that it is the mind of God that they "shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations"? Why will they not recognize the fact that He is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever;" that what his purpose was, it is now; and profiting by the mistakes of Israel of old (which have been recorded for that very purpose), "determine not to know anything . . . save Jesus Christ and him crucified"? Why will they not, like their brethren of old, be persuaded of the promises made to "Abraham and his seed," embrace them, confess that they are "strangers and pilgrims on the earth," and by their life "make it manifest that they are seeking after a country of their own"? (R. V.)

But how far short they come! Blindly following the leadings of the natural heart, they are to-day making flesh their arm, and trusting in man. The legislature and not the throne of God is their place of pleading. The commandments and traditions of men instead of the commandments of God are their standard. Says the prophet Isaiah, speaking of these very things, "They look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord," but "go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses" (Isa. 30:1); adding in the same scripture, "Now the Egyptians are men, and not God; and their horses flesh, and not Spirit." And yet God, in spite of all this, long-suffering, not willing that any should perish, with outstretched arms still pleads with his erring children, "Come out . . . be ye separate . . . and I will receive you and be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty;" and obeying by faith as did Abraham, they can with confidence look forward to the time when "the righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever."

A Few Questions for National Reformers.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

If this is a Christian nation—

How is it that the number of the poor increase annually, while the rich double their wealth in the same period?

The Bible says the primitive Christians shared their wealth with the poor. Acts 4:34, 35; Acts 2:45; 1 John 3:17.

How is it that thousands of preachers absolutely deny that Jesus is the Son of God?

The Bible says such as do this are "antichrists." 1 John 2:22.

How is it that the great army of drunkards augments yearly?

The Bible says "drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Gal. 5:21.

How is it that the whole nation is energetically seeking for worldly pleasure, in preference to the power of God?

The Bible says they who do this have a form of godliness, but deny its power. 2 Tim. 3:4, 5.

How is it that the whole nation is so lukewarm in following Jesus?

The Bible says that the Saviour will spue such out of his mouth. Rev. 3:16.

How is it that the missionary societies are impeded from extending their evangelistic operations through lack of financial support?

The Bible says a tenth of all received should be given to support the house of God. Mal. 3:7-12.

How is it that the pastors complain so bitterly of the poor church attendance?

The Bible says the true Christian loves to go to God's house. Psal. 122:1.

How is it that the spirit of hatred enters into even the sacred precincts of the church?

The Bible says, he that says he loves God and hates his brother, is a liar. 1 John 4:20. And liars cannot enter the kingdom of God. Rev. 21:8.

How is it that some aspire to regenerate our land by legislation?

The Bible says the blood of Jesus Christ alone can cleanse from sin. Zech. 13:1; 1 John 1:7.

How is it that National Reformers would employ force to compel others who dissent from them to embrace their opinions?

The Bible says, "God is love;" Christ draws, but never compels. Songs of Solomon 2:4; Hosea 11:4; John 12:32.

Now if this state of things exists, and no honest man can deny that it does, how can our friends who pose as National Reformers, still persist in denominating this a Christian nation? To be a Christian one has to experience in his own life the regenerating influence of the Spirit of God. And when that Spirit is in the man it will soon demonstrate itself and prove the person possessing it to be a new creature in Christ Jesus; since the fruits of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance—will reveal themselves in lives of good Christians.

It is a great error to think God will save a nation collectively. Only as the individuals composing that nation call upon the name of the Lord can they hope to be saved; and not until every individual in the country has personally applied to Jesus for pardon can the nation be classified as Christian.

If we call the United States a Christian nation do we not stigmatize with the most lasting reproach the name of Christ? Compare our own Christian nation with any so-called heathen nations and you will find in a great many respects the balance is in favor of the heathen, as against the "Christians." They steal not, neither participate in "sharp" commercial enterprises or speculation, neither do they blaspheme, nor use alcoholic drinks; and not only this, but they are ten times as fervent in following their religion as are the vast, vast majority of "Christians" in pursuing theirs.

When we seek to change and regenerate our nation by human laws, do we not seek to convert people by human righteousness? When we seek to uproot evil by any other means than the preaching of Jesus Christ, it is because we are ignorant of God's righteousness, and we go about to establish our own righteousness, having not submitted ourselves to the righteousness of God. Rom. 10:3. And since we know that "our righteousness" is as "filthy rags," valueless; so, too, we know that any legislative effort to change the lives of men is not only valueless, but opprobrious and repugnant to all men of ordinary intelligence and understanding.

May we then receive the divine righteousness into our hearts, and show what it is to be Christians in truth, since only then shall we be able to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, and in this present generation "to be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, to shine as lights in the world." In this way only can God be glorified, and the reproach taken away from his cause.

BISHOP DOANE, of the Episcopal Church, has added his voice to the many that have already spoken for American ecclesiasticism in favor of imperialism. In his annual address to the priests of his diocese, recently, he said:—

"I am not frightened by the alarming sound of this new-coined word 'imperialism,' which may mean much of good or much of evil. The brave and honest, and it seems to me the sensible and the only attitude is that of waiting upon God, to learn and get from him the wisdom and the grace to work out his will, which has carved out with sword and cannon and musket, by fleets and armies, a new place for this people among the nations of the world. We have won, not a victory over a brave but feeble foe, but we have won unity among ourselves, the knitting together of the English-speaking race, the deliverance of an oppressed people, an open way among the nations for a purer faith, a truer liberty, a finer civilization."

This expresses that "enchantment to the view" which is lent by distance. When we get closer to the actual facts and circumstances of that life and government with which the American nation is to bless subjected races, we see little indeed of "a purer faith, a truer liberty, a finer civilization." Republican government has become corrupted at its fountain head; faith is dying out of the churches; and liberty is becoming lost amidst the upheavals in social and industrial life. Yet now, as ever, Christianity stands as the sure refuge of individual freedom.

THE "Lord's Day Alliance" of Canada reports that it has in progress a number of lawsuits instituted to enforce Sunday observance upon corporations and individuals, and is waiting for a final decision to be given by the courts which will serve as a rule for such cases. It has succeeded in drawing from the attorney-general the statement that in the opinion of the government "the Lord's day should be preserved inviolate from labor." It is expected, further, that the Ontario government will submit a special case to the Court of Appeal for the purpose of ascertaining the real meaning of the Lord's Day Act. All this reveals the present activity of these Sunday organizations.

THE reform-by-law experiment is being tried in Streator, Ill. The Times-Herald (Chicago) reports that a "good citizenship" league, with a roll of nearly a thousand voters, has been organized, and that "many merchants who hitherto have kept their places of business open on Sunday, have promised to close them. "Prosecution," it is added, "will be commenced at once against all who refuse to obey the law." It is further stated that "This uprising for civic purity is the chief result of one of the most wonderful revivals and reform meetings ever held in Streator."

THE fundamental principle of government laid down in the Declaration of Independence, is that governments are instituted to preserve the unalienable rights of the individual; but this principle is lost sight of in almost every instance of "civic reform." A revival which leads people to go beyond this and attempt to suppress immorality as such by the civil law, is certain to work more harm than good.

THE Seventy-first New York Regiment, over which much ado has been made in this city, were mustered out of the service on the 15th inst., and took occasion on their release from army discipline to express their opinion of army chaplains, with special reference to the chaplain of the Seventy-first Regiment. Him they represented by a straw-stuffed effigy, which they pelted with old shoes, bits of wood, and other missiles; afterwards, it is said, greeting the chaplain himself with a shower of pie pans and various culinary articles. The men declared that the chaplain had performed only three services between June 23 and August 8; that he had failed to attend to their mail after having undertaken to do it; and that he had kept the best food and delicacies for himself and the other officers of the command. There may have been good grounds for these complaints, and on the other hand, the chaplain may have done the best he could under the circumstances. But in either case a very discreditable reflection is cast upon the office as regards its usefulness in promoting piety among the troops.

MINISTERS of Charlotte, Mich., have prevailed upon the town council to pass a Sunday-closing ordinance, and are making a vigorous effort to have it enforced. One clergyman of the place advocated a boycott against every place of business which should be kept open on Sundays thereafter. A boycott and a Sunday law go well together.

THE statesmen of Europe, says the London Spectator, "universally fear the advent of the United States in European politics." And the particular thing which they fear about it is the prospective Anglo Saxon Alliance. The "line of cleavage" which is showing itself through the civilized peoples of the earth, puts the Anglo-Saxon nations against the Latin nations, and makes an Anglo-Saxon alliance in some form almost inevitable.

MARTINELLI, the "apostolic delegate" of the pope to this country, has received two decrees from Rome to be enforced upon the Catholic Church in the United States, one of which places under the ban a book entitled "Monks and Their Decline," written by a priest of Buffalo, N. Y. The book has been placed upon the "Index," and all the "faithful" are forbidden to read it. The book attributes the decadence of Spain and all Latin countries to the influence and power of the monks, and intimates that the United States would do well to suppress all orders of monks in its newly-acquired possessions.

THE Rev. Edward Everitt Hale, a well-known clergyman of Boston, says that the Philippine archipelago should not be restored to Spain, for the reason, among others, that Spain never had any title to their possession. All the claim Spain ever had on them was by virtue of the pope's bull issued some centuries ago dividing up all the undiscovered earth between Spain and Portugal; Spain taking all that portion lying west of a line of longitude drawn near the Azores. When Magellan discovered the islands he supposed that they were to the west of the pope's line; but as they actually lie to the eastward of it, in the domain given by the pope's bull to Portugal, they are really the property of that country and never belonged to Spain, if that authority which Spain has so long and faithfully recognized amounts to anything.

A GENERAL meeting of Indiana clergymen is announced, says the Louisville Courier-Journal, for November 27, 28, at which various topics relating to public morals will be considered. The subject of denominational union, also, will be made prominent. On this point the Courier-Journal says:—

"An effort will be made to combine all Protestant churches in one great church. This is the first step in the Central States in this direction. All the churches will retain their denominational character; coöperation in parish work will be provided; the minister of one church will preach for another and assist in evangelistic work, even though the churches be of different denominations; a division of territory for canvass as to church tendencies and for spiritual work will be made, and for many other things new to Protestant churches."

Church confederation is quite possible for the sundered Protestant sects; but that is another and very different thing from Christian union.

MAYOR HOOS, of Jersey City, has declared himself in favor of open theaters on Sunday. He does not believe in giving the sanction of law to Puritanical ideas of religion. On this point he has expressed himself thus: "God made the rose to give out its perfume on Sundays as well as week days, and there is no reason why man should not get all the legitimate enjoyment there is in life on Sundays as well as on week days. Open theaters on Sundays would keep many young men from going to haunts of vice in New York, and would benefit Jersey City. I shall do all I can to have the theaters opened on the Sabbath, and to make Sunday performances permissible."

Sunday is not the Sabbath; but if a person prefers going to the theater on the Sabbath, it is of no benefit either to him or to others to prohibit him from going by law.

IN making note of the death of the well-known newspaper writer, Mr. Harold Frederic, after having been treated by "Christian Science," the Independent, of this city, adds this appropriate comment:—

"Harold Frederic died of Christian science. It is a most curious question why this silly delusion has such a vogue, even among men, and especially women, of fair culture. The name partly explains it. It pretends to be science. Everybody nowadays believes in science, puts faith in it; but comparatively few people have any real scientific training or are competent to tell science from charlatanry. Here we might find an argument for much more careful training in science. We do not hesitate to say that neither Harold Frederic nor any other of the dupes of this delusion has ever taken a real course in any science, chemistry, physics, biology, which required a careful consideration of what constitutes the proof of a proposition. They have never learned to ask Nature questions and await her answer."

To which it might be added that they are also in ignorance of the real science of Christianity.

* * *

THE New York Sun tells this story illustrating how Christianity is shorn of its independence and degraded to the level of subjection to human authority, under the system of state maintenance of religion. It is this system which provides the army chaplains. The Sun refers to the incident as an example of "clerical intolerance," though the real intolerance was all on the other side:—

"The occasion was the memorable ceremony which took place at Khartoum when the triumphant Anglo-Egyptian army crowned their campaign of vengeance by celebrating the rights of Gordon's funeral. By common consent the various chaplains attached to Kitchener's forces—Anglican, Methodist, Romanist, and so forth—had agreed, with one exception, to recite a specially compiled prayer during the service at the tomb. The one exception was a strangely obstinate cleric. Kitchener, hearing that the reverend gentleman in question had refused to join in reciting the prayer, promptly sent for him and asked if the rumor which had reached him were true. 'Certainly,' was the cleric's uncompromising reply. 'Very well, then,' said Lord Kitchener, taking out his watch, 'I give you just five minutes to consider whether you will join in reciting this prayer or not, and if you don't I shall march you down to Cairo under arrest.' Before the five minutes were up, the Rev. Mr. ——— had decided that to obey was better than sacrifice, when a man like the Sirdar was concerned, and it is satisfactory to know that at Gordon's tomb, at all events, the representatives of normally warring sects were absolutely unanimous in their petitions to heaven."

Wrong Ideas of Intolerance.

THE Altoona Mirror (Pa.) reports that several men have been discharged by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for refusing to work on Sunday, the work being such as the men deemed unnecessary on that day. The Mirror says that if the report is true, "the company is taking a step dangerous to one of the cardinal principles of the American Constitution—freedom to follow the dictates of conscience; and some method of halting such interference with the right of the individual to do what he believes is right, should be sought at once."

This expresses a common idea of religious intolerance, which people who are themselves religiously intolerant are more apt to hold than any others. The idea is, in short, that a business firm or corporation is intolerant if it does not make it easy for its employes to practice the principles of their religion. If it does anything to make the pathway of obedience to conscience less smooth than could be desired, it is said to be interfering with freedom of conscience, and opposing a fundamental principle of the Constitution.

At the same time it would be said by these people that a law which would compel observers of the seventh day to make a Sabbath day of Sunday, was not in any way intolerant, or opposed to the principles of free government.

A Sunday law lays the hand of force upon individuals of whatever occupation, and there is no escaping from it except by moving out of the country. There is nothing optional, or in the nature of a contract, about the operation of the law of the land. But work for a business corporation is an optional matter entirely. No person is compelled to work for a firm that will not accommodate its business regulations to the requirements of his religion. There is no involuntary servitude in this country outside of its penal institutions. Such a thing is expressly forbidden by the Constitution.

There is all the difference in the world between turning the power of the government against an individual to compel him to a certain line of conduct, and the enforcing of a business regulation which causes inconvenience to an individual on account of his religion, by a corporation which has no authority over him whatever outside of his relation to it as an employé. He may of course be thrown out of a job; but that is no interference with his rights as a individual of society. No individual has an inalienable right to a job.

People who turn from the observance of the first day of the week to the seventh day, are almost always, if employés, thrown out of work in their former positions; but they never think of complaining that their rights have been infringed thereby.

The Constitution does not undertake to say how corporations or any parties shall run their business; if it did it would be the laughing-stock of the nations, instead of commanding their respect. It deals only with the business of government; and its principles are violated by governmental interference with conscience and by nothing less.

Far-Seeing Leo.

In order that the scheme of the papacy shall not be recognized in its true light, it is necessary for the pope to appear as though he was in perfect accord with the United States with reference to the question of religious liberty.

Consequently, Archbishop Chapelle hastened to tell the correspondent of the New York paper from which we quoted last week, that the "pope was absolutely in accord with the conditions of religious liberty existing in the United States, and would heartily welcome the same relation of church and state in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines should events establish our flag there permanently. . . . He believes in religious liberty before all things."

How is this? How does it happen that the pope is "absolutely in accord with the conditions of religious liberty" as it exists in this country? Is this the "absolute" truth? Or is "His Holiness" lying—doing evil that good may come? Or have the conditions of religious liberty in this country so changed that there is in this respect perfect agreement between this Government and the papacy? For it is certain that the papacy is opposed to religious liberty—other than that which is based upon a "right conscience" (as Cardinal Gibbons artfully expresses it),—the only "right conscience" being the Catholic conscience. Only a few weeks ago there was published in a New York paper an interview had by W. T. Stead with a Belgian statesman of prominence, of pronounced liberal views, with direct reference to the question of religious liberty in the Philippines. Asked if the pope shared his views on the question, the answer was: "You cannot expect the pope to make any declaration in that sense. He could not do so without repudiating doctrines affirmed by his predecessors. . . . As a matter of principle, no pope can declare in favor of any refusal to enforce religious uniformity."

But the principles of religious liberty that were adopted by the founders of this Government, and which are supposed to exist here to-day, were in direct opposition to the papacy. And the papacy knows it.

Thus a Catholic organ—the Catholic World—no longer ago than 1871 said: "Speaking of the Constitution: As it is interpreted by the liberal and sectarian journals that are doing their best to revolutionize it, and is beginning to be interpreted by no small portion of the American people, or is interpreted by the Protestant principle so widely diffused among us, . . . we do not accept it, or hold it to be any government at all, or as capable of performing any of the proper functions of government; and if it continues to be interpreted by the revolutionary principles of Protestantism, it is sure to fail. . . . Hence it is we so often say that if the American republic is to be sustained and preserved at all, it must be by the rejection of the principle of the Reformation, and the acceptance of the Catholic principle by the American people."

It therefore follows that when the pope expresses himself as being "absolutely in accord with the conditions of religious liberty existing in the United States" we are left to conclude that either the pope is lying or that he has "repudiated the doctrines affirmed by his predecessors" (in which case he will have ceased to be a Catholic, and therefore, in common fairness to the Catholic people, ought to vacate the pontifical chair); or that the "conditions of religious liberty existing in the United States" to-day are entirely different to what they were formerly.

And far-seeing Leo knows perfectly well that this last is true; while at the same time the American people are ignorant of it. And this very ignorance will enable the pope to more effectually "pull the wool" over the eyes of the American people.

Leo XIII. knows perfectly well what he is about; would that the American people—and especially those at the head of the Government—knew it too.

The War of Principle.—No. 8.

"ALECK, you said that Christ overcame the whole Roman power. I do not see how. Did he not die under Roman law,—and that administered on a false charge? It seems to me Rome triumphed over him."

"That depends, Cecil, on what you regard as a triumph. Christ preserved his honor, his manhood, his principles. He asserted his complete independence of human power, and gave Pilate to understand that even the rulers of the state could have no power except it were allowed them from above."

"But why was it allowed?"

"To make manifest to men and angels the character of good and evil,—the difference between Christ and Satan. Jesus said that he could call for twelve legions of angels, and banish the Roman power or any other power he pleased, did he choose to use the power of force."

"Why did he not do it then?"

"Because, by so doing, he would have defeated himself in his plan of restoring men to allegiance to divine love, and of preserving the dominions of heaven in loyalty to God. It was in the plan to trust implicitly in God's love, even in the darkest possible hour, in all the human weakness of sorrow and death, and hold to utter independence of man, and utter dependence in God, in defiance of all that man and devils might do unto him."

"It certainly was marvelous self-denial to submit to death on a false accusation, when it might have been prevented by a word."

"Yes, from the self point of view, it was marvelous. On the other hand, what stupendous consequences made the scale balance on the side of the suffering of Calvary. 'The destiny of a world trembled in the balance,' and how much more we know not. More centered in that hour of destiny than we can fathom. At times we catch glimpses. The loyal angels had not utterly given Satan up, or seen the full malignity of his evil principle of self-dependence, until he came in personal contact with Christ and then the antagonism of his principle warred against the principle of dependence on God. The root of the matter was his determination to be God, and have Christ's angels and men yield him homage."

"How do you know that he was still cherished by the angels?"

"I gather it from the words of Christ, when he says, 'Now is the prince of this world cast out.' 'The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me.' Up to that time he had not been utterly cast out from the regard of the heavenly host; in that he still held some place, until he cast himself utterly out by murdering the Prince of Love."

"It was a strange way of overcoming," said Cecil, slowly.

"Yes, he conquered though he died, and his enemies themselves were forced to acknowledge his victory."

"How, Aleck?"

"In the first place, they had to find false witnesses. Pilate washed his hands of his innocent blood, the women wept as he went to the cross, the centurion declared him the Son of God, the thief recognized his divinity, the Jews had a Roman guard placed at his tomb. Men were convicted of his Godlikeness, of his high integrity, and knew he was the victor though he appeared the victim. That is why I said he overcame the Roman power; for the Roman power is simply the power of the world."

"Now what do you mean, Aleck?"

"I mean that Rome and the world are one and the same thing, and that if the world is not cast out, Rome is in us, and Rome crucifies the Christ in all ages to save herself."

"You grow more and more mystical. What do you mean by the world being in us, and the world being Rome?"

"The Word of God says, 'All that is in the world, the lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life, are not of the Father, but are of the world; and the world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever.'"

"Then do you think that it is 'the lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life,' that constitutes the world?"

"Yes, Cecil. Think of it carefully, and you will find that that is all that is in the world. All the rest is simply its manifestation, and this world originated and is sustained by the principle of human dependence. Utter reliance on God will cast the world and the lust thereof out, and give God room to will and to do in us according to his own good pleasure."

"Yes, said Cecil, slowly. The lust of the eyes leads to all outside show, the lust of the flesh to all self-gratification, the pride of life to all strife for supremacy,—yes, the world is in it; but how is the death of Christ in it?"

"Can you not see? Because that is the devil, and always was, and always will be. He was a murderer from the beginning. These lusts mount up as raging flames to consume God at last, and to enthrone self. The only way to be found guiltless of the blood of Christ and his people, is to have the world cast out; for the world is Rome, and Rome is in us if the world is there, and Rome crucified the Lord."

"Yes, Aleck. That's easy to talk; but how is it to be done? Love of appearance, self-gratification and pride are as natural as the breath we breath."

"True. That's why there is need of divine power to overcome. Christ overcame Rome because he had overcome the world. We shall do it the same way."

"How? This looks a puzzle to me."

"This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.' It brings us back to our principle, Cecil. Give up self, yield, rely on God in simple trust, and as he works in you to will and to do, work out your own salvation with reverence, and with consciousness of your own weakness; but with implicit trust in heaven."

Studies in French History.—48.

"I BELIEVE we were going to learn something to-day about Louis XIV.," said Professor Carman. "Who can tell me how old or about how old he was when his father Louis XIII. died?"

"I think he was only a little boy, but I can't tell his age," said Edna Philips.

"Yes; he was a very little boy, only four years old, and yet he had to be brought in to the Parliament, and placed in a great large chair, and repeat the words that had been taught him. He begun his reign in 1643, and he had the remarkable privilege, if it can be so called, of reigning over his people for 72 years. The little king's father appointed a great council to look after affairs, but the king's mother at last managed to gain the control, and she took for her adviser a man named Cardinal Mazarin. He was a very smooth spoken fellow, who seemed to want to please everybody."

"He couldn't have been very much like Richelieu then," remarked Max Smith.

"No, indeed; and the queen—Anne of Austria—was very much like her adviser, so they promised the people so many things which they could not or did not do for them, that it made a great deal of trouble.

"In 1648, when little Louis XIV. was only nine years old, the River Rhine became the eastern boundary of France, and the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine were annexed to France.

"Why, the River Rhine is in Germany now," said Charlie White.

"Yes; but Alsace-Lorraine was conquered from France in the late war of 1870. Now, some of the people speak German and some French."

"Was there war with Spain at this time, professor?"

"O yes, and there was for quite a period after this, but the trouble which was in unhappy France itself, caused by the unreasonable taxes, was much greater than any outside trouble. The war expenses were enormous, and it all fell upon the poor people."

"Why, I don't see what they did with all the money that Richelieu saved. You know you said he had left plenty of money in the French treasury at his death," said practical Jack.

"I know I did. But although this was true, the money did not last long with Mazarin at the head. Finally, because the people refused to endure the tax on the very food they ate, and were beginning to rise in open rebellion, Queen Anne, who had at first been so nice and kind, apparently to everybody, got angry and took the young king and his little brother and went down to St. Germain, where they exiled themselves for some time, while the people of Paris were having a very exciting experience."

"Rob and I spent about a day in that city," said Charlie White,—“it's on the Seine, right east of Paris, about thirteen miles."

"Meanwhile, all these troubles culminated in a civil war, in which I am glad to say there was not as much blood shed as is usual in wars, and lasted only five years"

"Did the little king come back home then with his mother?" asked Milly Brown.

"Yes, and peace reigned once more; but this war had fallen very heavily, as usual, upon the poor. The soldiers had torn up their fields and gardens, and the pleasant homes of many of them had been ruthlessly burned. We can form but a little idea of the misery caused by war, unless we experience it ourselves. We have learned of so many wars and have studied about so many of the troubles of unhappy France, that I fear we will become careless and fail to realize what all these things meant to the miserable inhabitants."

"How old was the young king before he really began to reign?" asked Fred Green.

"Only thirteen; just the same age that his father was accounted able to govern his kingdom. Finally, when he was twenty one, Spain and France concluded to be peaceable once more, and the young French king chose his cousin, the daughter of Philip of Spain, as his bride. You see it was first the alarm of war, and then wedding bells. So Louis kissed his royal uncle Philip, and presented his mother,—Philip's sister,—whom he had not seen for forty-five years, or since they were children. The bride's name was Maria Theresa. She was a good queen and Louis felt very badly when she died, although he did not treat her at all as he should have done."

"Was not the Cardinal Mazarin some way connected in making this peace?" asked Harry Ray, who did not very readily forget what he read.

"Yes; I think he should have the credit of bringing it about, though he did not live very long afterward. He had collected great stores of treasures and valuables, and he very much dreaded leaving it all. You remember the Bible says that where our treasure is, our hearts will be also. He died in 1661, but not until he had founded the French Academy, the Mazarine Library, and the College of Four Nations. But when he died, the royal treasury was quite empty—quite a contrast to his own.”

“When he died, who took his place?” I hope it was some one who would use his influence to help the poor people,” said Milly Brown, who was a tender-hearted little maiden, and the continued woes of the suffering Frenchmen had deeply affected her sympathies.

“A man who was made Superintendent of Finance, named Fouquet—”

“Was he a good man?” eagerly asked Milly.

“Not unless you call a very dishonest man a good one, Milly; he loved dearly to live in the greatest luxury. One day he made a royal feast, and invited the king. Louis was astonished at the wealth and magnificence displayed. There were gold and silver dishes in so much greater abundance than anything the king himself could afford, that Louis would have had the vain fellow arrested and given over to justice at once,—knowing that he had gained all these things dishonestly,—if it had not been for the advice of his mother, Queen Anne.”

“Was he ever punished, I wonder?” asked Max Smith.

“Yes, and very severely. His property was confiscated, and he was shut in a dreary dungeon where he stayed until his death.”

“Wasn't this rather hard punishment?” asked Jennie Jacobs.

“It seems so; although he certainly deserved to be punished. But he had gained the ill-will of a sovereign who boasted that he was the state, and of course the man could expect no mercy.

“We will continue the study of Louis XIV. next week.”

Invaluable to Bible and History Students,

THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 24, 1898.

WE are promised a report of the international W. C. T. U. convention for our next issue.

Do NOT miss the articles we are now printing on the subject of the proposed support of the Catholic Church in Cuba by the United States Government. You want to know what is being proposed in this line, and what it means; and your neighbors ought to know this too.

ANOTHER arrest has been made in connection with the effort to "preserve the sanctity of the American Sabbath" at Ford's Store, Md. The victim in this case is Mr. Neal, he being like the others an observer of the seventh day. The charge against him was that of keeping open store on Sunday. The arrest was made on the day Mr. Neal observes as the Sabbath. He was however released after being kept a short time in custody; for what reason we have not yet learned.

THE Rev. Dr. Mutchler, who is secretary of the Philadelphia Sabbath Association (the Philadelphia association for Sunday enforcement) is stirring things up along that line in Pennsylvania. Recently, says the Philadelphia Inquirer, he appeared at the session of the United Labor League of that State, and urged upon the representatives of labor that they should urge upon the legislature the necessity of looking more closely after the enforcement of Sunday rest. The league, it is stated, "heartily applauded the address of the secretary of the Sabbath Association, and the delegate from the Barbers' Union stated that they were reaching a point in their preparations where they were about ready to begin the Sunday-closing movement by vigorous action."

For years the clergy represented in the Sunday-law movement have been urging the labor organizations to urge the necessity of Sunday rest by law; and their efforts are beginning to bear fruit. But there is something strange about a physical necessity that is not felt by the ones deprived of it until it is pointed out to them by a body of clergymen.

THE new governor-elect of this State, Mr. Roosevelt, is reported as having promised an era of "reform" in the State when he shall have assumed the duties of his office. "Rethe young lady who was to do the christening. Let us talk softly about the foolish ceremonies of the heathen in other lands, in view of such heathen folly at home.

THE Turkish government has decided to put an end to the "Zionist" movement by prohibiting any further immigration of Jews into Palestine.

PROFESSOR EATON, well known in Methodist circles of the West, created a sensation at the Layman's Congress of the M. E. Church at Philadelphia, the 16th inst., by declaring that the churches had largely become old-fogy organizations, which instead of pulling in the contest for the supremacy of truth and righteousness in the earth, were dragged along by the force of moral sentiment which was working in the world without; that the church to-day does not exist for the people, but seems to imagine that the people exist for it. Whether Professor Eaton's charges are warranted in whole or only in part, it is significant that they are made at a time when the church is manifesting much activity in the arena of politics.

ACCORDING to statistics, Christianity is declining in the earth at the rate of about one per cent. of the population every seven years; that is, an additional one per cent. of the inhabitants become non-Christians in that period. This of course is mainly due to the increase of population in heathen lands. It should be borne in mind that only nominal Christianity can be measured by statistics.

WHAT a man ought to be, and what he can righteously be forced to be, are conditions which have no necessary relation to each other.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN CUBA, TO MAINTAIN WHICH THE U. S. GOVERNMENT MAKES A "TEMPORARY" LOAN.

THE United States Government proposes to see that the Catholic churches in Cuba are kept open as they have been under the rule of Spain, and to this end will appropriate whatever funds may be necessary for the maintenance of priests and other essentials of Roman Catholic worship. This will be a "temporary loan" for such a time as may be necessary before the church in Cuba shall be able to support herself,—so say the Catholic prelates which the Government has consulted in the matter. It is a support which may be kept up indefinitely, without any compensation in return, besides being in flagrant violation of the fundamental principles of free government. What do the American people think, and what will they do, about it? See articles on next page.

IMPERIALISM for the peoples of foreign lands to-day means imperialism at home to-morrow.

THE size of an act makes no difference in the size of the principle which it involves.

THE Government cannot support both the Catholic Church in Cuba and the principles of republican government in the United States at the same time.

THE principles of despotism are wont to masquerade in the garb of philanthropy or of piety.

The Government Supporting the Church in Cuba.

It is proposed by the United States Government—after due consultation with several distinguished Catholic prelates—to make a “temporary loan” of the people’s money for the maintenance of the Catholic Church in Cuba. It would be too bad for this church to be obliged to suspend operations in the island, or to be seriously crippled in her work, even temporarily, for lack of funds. So, as this Government has undertaken to supervise affairs in Cuba, and there is no appearance of funds forthcoming from any other source, they will be supplied from the United States treasury. Such is evidently the conception upon which this remarkable proposal rests.

This proceeding is of course a gross violation of the trust reposed in the officials responsible therefor, as the representatives and servants of the people, sworn to uphold the Constitution and the fundamental principles of republican government. But aside from this, the query naturally arises, What is the Catholic Church in Cuba, that it should be essential to maintain her even at the sacrifice of American principles? What great benefits for the Cuban people depend upon the continuance of her rule? What dire calamities would follow from the lessening, even temporarily, of her efficiency?

Happily the moment is opportune for finding a satisfactory answer. The evidences in the case are plain to every Protestant mind, but we do not need to apply to any Protestant source of information. A notable and trustworthy Catholic authority has spoken on the point, —even no less a person than the Spanish general, Weyler. Elsewhere in this issue we print some references to a letter written by General Weyler to the Queen Regent of Spain on the subject of what the Catholic Church has done for Spain. In this letter he states that she has done nothing at all, but on the contrary has stood in the way of all reform and progress, and has been the robber of both the government and the people. The letter is, in short, “the most frightful arraignment ever made of a religious denomination.” And coming from General Weyler, it must be accepted as a reliable statement on the subject of which it speaks. That leading citizen of Spain has had abundant opportunity to know whereof he speaks, both with reference to the Spanish government and country, and the Roman Catholic Church.

This is a statement of what the Catholic Church has done for Spain. And what is true of Spain in this respect, is true of Cuba to an equal and even greater degree. For in Cuba the Catholic Church has had full sway, without serious opposition from any source, for centuries.

And now, when General Weyler, himself an eminent Spaniard and a Catholic, denounces the Catholic Church in almost unmeasured terms as the robber of the people and an incubus upon the country,—behold! professed Protestants who stand at the head of this American Government propose to give money from the public treasury to the Catholic Church in Cuba, in violation of fundamental American law, because it is so essential that this church in Cuba shall continue on in her career unchecked!

To a true Protestant, it should be evident that the very reason why Spanish dominion in the island has been broken, is that, the bars of intolerance being let down, the people, so long robbed in purse and bound in superstition and ignorance, may have a favorable opportunity to free themselves from the yoke of a religious despotism.

And what business has the Government to make a “temporary loan” of the people’s money to any church, or for any purpose not authorized by the Constitution? That is setting a very bad example, to say the least. The principle of that proceeding has been sufficiently tested in numerous cases of “temporary loans” made to themselves by trusted employees of banks and other institutions. It is a principle which the courts and all experience have pronounced to be bad in the extreme.

What Will the People Say?

THE remaining portion of that remarkable letter of the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Daily American—October 15, 1898, is as follows:—

“The administration fully realizes the objections that will arise in this country, from certain sources, against even a temporary sustenance of the Catholic Church in Cuba. But it has been given ample assurance by the Catholic authorities that the church shall be placed on a self-supporting basis as soon as it is possible to establish the new order that has been brought about by the Spanish evacuation.

“Archbishop Chappelle will be entrusted with liberal powers to institute such of the reforms as demand immediate introduction. It is likely that the responsibility of supporting the church in Cuba will eventually be assumed by the Catholics in this country.

“In determining to support the Catholic priests in Cuba until their church can take care of them, President McKinley has acted wisely from other points of view than mere humanity. The Cuban priests, as in all countries whose population is densely ignorant, exercise complete control over their parishioners. Apart from the cruelty of withdrawing all aid from these priests, it is easy to believe that the new American government in Cuba would have at its very inception built up a dangerous set of enemies if the priesthood of Cuba were given reason to regret the presence of the American flag on the island. The Spanish government at Madrid could easily give the American government some dearly-bought information as to the malign influence that is in the power of a hostile clergy to exercise. Ever since the first Carlist uprising in 1833, every movement directed against the government of Spain has found its principal support in the clergy of Spain, who almost to a man are Carlists."

Is it true that objection will arise only "from certain sources" against governmental "sustenance of the Catholic Church" and "the vast number of priests and high church dignitaries" in Cuba? Is it true that the whole people of the United States have so far forgotten the fundamental principles of the nation, or else have so far fallen under the influence of the Catholic Church, that against the Government undertaking "the entire responsibility" for the support of the Catholic Church in Cuba, objection will arise only "from certain sources"? Why will not objection arise from the whole people everywhere?

All money given by the United States Government for keeping open the Catholic churches, and providing for public worship in those churches in Cuba; all money paid by the United States Government to "the vast number of Catholic priests and high church dignitaries" in Cuba; must be obtained by taxation, must be raised in revenue, laid upon all the people. Of the money now being paid by all the people for revenue—stamps on drafts, deeds, mortgages, and what not, a portion must go to the "support of the Catholic Church," and "the vast number of priests and high church dignitaries" in Cuba. For is it not published by this Washington correspondent that "it is the determination of President McKinley," coached by Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, that "sufficient money shall be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church" in Cuba? Will all the people of the United States allow this thing to be carried on at their expense without protest? Our fathers who made this nation, said that "to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical." They therefore abolished the practice and repudiated the principle. Will the people now sanction the revival of the practice and the reestablishment of the principle?

The second time in this letter we are told that assurance is given "by the Catholic authorities that the church shall be placed on a self-supporting basis as soon as it is possible to establish the new order." And again we inquire, What confidence can be placed in any such assurance in presence of the fact that this governmental support is of the same identical priests and high church dignitaries, and the same identical system, that, though having had "complete control over their parishioners" for four hundred years, yet, have never taught them to support their church and clergy, but have kept them "densely ignorant" as this correspondent declares them to be to-day? When this is the record for four hundred years of governmental support, what is the value of "ample assurance by the Catholic authorities that the church shall be placed on a self-supporting basis" while governmental support is continued? In view of such a record, no assurance, by the Catholic authorities nor by anybody else, can be ample, that the church shall be placed on a self-supporting basis, while governmental support is continued.

Another, and the final consideration, which shows that no such thing as the self-support of the Catholic Church in Cuba can ever be expected, is, that while it is promised by the Catholic authorities that "when law and order are fully re-established on the distracted island the Catholic Church will be expected to support itself," yet, at the same time, there is presented the abominable fact, which amounts in effect to a threat, that "the Cuban priests exercise complete control over their parishioners," who are "densely ignorant," and would prove "a dangerous set of enemies if the priesthood of Cuba were given reason to regret the presence of the American flag on the island"!!

That is to say: The government of Spain has always supported the Catholic clergy and the Catholic churches in Cuba. And now, the United States having supplanted the government of Spain in Cuba, if this Government does not "undertake the entire responsibility for their support" "the priesthood of Cuba" will be "given reason to regret the presence of the American flag on the island." Then, having such "reason to regret the presence of the American flag on the island;" and having "complete control" of their "densely ignorant" parishioners, "the new American Government in Cuba would have at its very inception built up a dangerous set of enemies." Therefore, to placate this "dangerous set of enemies" the Government of the United States must "undertake the entire responsibility for their support." And accordingly "President McKinley has acted wisely" in determining that "sufficient money" shall "be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church!" And if anybody does not believe that it is wise thus to placate these "dangerous enemies" then "the Spanish government at Madrid could easily give" him pointers in "some dearly-bought information as the malign influence that is in the power of a hostile clergy to exercise"!!!

Then with "the vast number of priests and high church dignitaries" composing a clergy of such a "dangerous" and "malign" disposition as that, having "complete control" of their "densely ignorant" parishioners, and, upon such considerations as this, demanding governmental support until "law and order are fully re-established," what prospect can there be that governmental support would ever cease? because what prospect can there be that law and order would ever be fully re-established while the cessation of the governmental support of such a priesthood must be the sure consequence of the full re-establishment of law and order, and the prevention of the full re-establishment of law and order rests completely with the "dangerous" and "malign" priesthood who receive the governmental support which is to continue only until law and order are fully re-established?

Again we must remark that this argument in behalf of governmental support of the Catholic priesthood of Cuba, based upon the "dangerous" and "malign" disposition of that same priesthood, is, for cool and essential iniquity, surely entitled to the palm.

But are the people of the United States ready for all this? Will they all bear it all without protest?

Thanksgiving in Colonial Days.

AMONG the papers of the late ex-State Senator Guy C. Stoddard, of Massachusetts, an old newspaper clipping was found containing a quaint account of an old colonial Thanksgiving church service and dinner. It was written in the year 1714 by the Rev. Lawrence Conant, of the old South Parish in Danvers, Mass. It contains an illusion to the religious sentiments of the people of those days, and believing it will be read with interest by SENTINEL readers, it is given herewith:—

"Ye Governor was in ye house and Her Majesty's commissioners of ye customs, and they sat together in a high seat of ye pulpit stairs. Ye Governor appears very devout and attentive, although he favors Episcopacy and tolerates ye Quakers and Baptists.

"He was dressed in a black velvet coat, bordered with gold lace and buff breeches with gold buckles at ye knees, and white silk stockings.

"There was a disturbance in ye galleries, where it was filled with divers negroes, mulattoes, and Indians, and a negro called Pomp Shorter, belonging to Mr. Gardiner, was called forth and put in ye broad isle, where he was reprov'd with great carefulness and solemnity.

"He was then put in ye deacons' seat between two deacons, in view of ye whole congregation, but ye sexton was ordered by Mr. Prescott to take him out, because of his levity and strange contortion of countenance (giving grave scandal to ye grave deacons), and put him in ye lobby under ye staire; some children and a mulatto woman were reprimanded for laughing at Pomp Shorter.

"When ye services at ye meeting house were ended, ye council and other dignitaries were entertained at ye house of Mr. Epes, on ye hill near by, and we had a bountiful Thanksgiving dinner with bear's meat and venison, the last of which was a fine buck, shot in ye woods near by. Ye bear was killed in Lynn woods near Reading.

"After ye blessing was craved by Mr. Garrich of Wrentham, word came that ye buck was shot on ye Lord's day by Pequot, an Indian, who came to Mr. Epes with a lye in his mouth like Ananias of old.

"Ye council therefore refused to eat ye venison, but it was afterward decided that Pequot should receive forty stripes save one for lying and profaning ye Lord's day, restore Mr. Epes ye cost of ye deer, and considering this a just and righteous sentence on ye sinful heathen, and that a blessing had been craved on ye meat, ye council all partook of it but Mr. Shepard, whose conscience was tender on ye point of ye venison."

Imperialism Against the Declaration of Independence.

NOW THAT the United States Government has started in on a policy of imperialism, the upholders of this policy are conscious of the necessity of justifying it in the face of the fundamental principles of republican government to which such a policy is squarely opposed. And this, accordingly, they are attempting by various means to do. And naturally, the arguments which they put forward for the purpose are both novel and startling. Here, for example, is one by the Hon. Hosea Knowlton, Attorney-General of Massachusetts, which is quoted approvingly by the New York Sun. The Sun boldly declares that there is no natural right of suffrage; that the idea that government without the consent of the governed is un-American, is wholly erroneous; and then quotes this statement by the Hon. Mr. Knowlton of Massachusetts as very "neatly" showing this fact:—

"The Declaration of Independence has nothing to do with political rights. It has always been true that a majority of our people have not had anything to say about the Government. The people of the territories have no right to vote. Until recently no colored man was allowed to vote in the South. You may say this last fact was settled by the war, but that was not what the war settled.

"The war decided that the negro should be free, and nothing more. No descendant of the Chinese nation can vote. No Indian can vote. And the largest and best-behaved portion of our population has never had the right to suffrage in any considerable part of the country.

"In other words, the great principle on which this Government was founded did not concede the natural right of suffrage. The Declaration of Independence declares for 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness,' which, being freely translated, means the right to acquire property.

"When any one, therefore, says that there is danger that the whole body of the inhabitants of Hawaii will be precipitated upon us as voters, or that the Malays of Luzon will soon be running Congress, he does not know what he is talking about. Forty-five States manage the Government of this country, and no one else can exercise the right of suffrage until they give him permission."

We confess that we never knew before that our patriotic forefathers of Washington's time wrote and signed the Declaration of Independence and fought through the Revolutionary war to vindicate their "right to acquire property"! No American history that we have yet seen intimates that they were not at the time freely acquiring property in proportion to their business ability to do so, or that Great Britain ever attempted to interfere with them in this pursuit. What history does affirm in this matter is that Great Britain proposed to tax the American colonies without allowing them political representation in parliament; which meant that she proposed to govern her American colonies without their consent. The colonies stood for the principle of government by the consent of the governed; and to affirm this principle before the world they put forth the Declaration of Independence, declaring in it, as self-evident truths, that all men are created equal, endowed by creation with certain inalienable rights, and that to preserve these rights is the only legitimate purpose of civil government. To say that all this, and the long struggle which followed, were for the purpose of vindicating their "right to acquire property," is not only to set aside plain historical facts, but to cast contempt upon the Declaration of Independence and its signers, and to rob that document of all the meaning which has made it glorious in American history, and marvelous in the estimation of the world.

If the Declaration of Independence does not affirm the consent of the governed to be a primary requisite of just government, it does not affirm anything, and might as well be cast aside as a hypocritical play upon words.

This bulwark of American rights and liberties is now boldly attacked by the champions of imperialism for the sake of new possessions abroad; and in doing this, they of necessity sweep away the safeguards of liberty and justice at home.

"God Not for the Catholics."

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

AN article with the above heading appeared in a very important Spanish journal, El Diluvio, published in the great Iberian educational center, Barcelona. It reads:—

"It is a great truth, manifested hundreds of times over, that God is not for the Catholics. If anyone should doubt this, the reverses which Spain is suffering in war with the great Protestant American Republic, prove in the most eloquent manner that God has abandoned us to our own fortune; which is the fortune of a dog.

"It happens then, that in the war with the United States, we have come off defeated, because God has so ordained; and in good orthodoxy there is no need to point to this one or that as being responsible for the catastrophe. God has so wished it; and he has his reasons for subjecting us to this new trial.

"Nevertheless we are forced to recognize that the Catholic nations are very unfortunate, and carry upon their shoulders the worst shadow of the world. During the past 100 years all has been lamentations and heart-breaks, sorrow and bitterness for the Roman Catholic nations; while on the contrary prosperity, good fortune, and well-being has followed the Protestants and heretics.

"Spain fights against Protestant England, and Spain comes out of the conflict defeated. She fights against Catholic France with an allied army, composed of nearly all Protestants, and Napoleon is conquered upon the fields of Waterloo. A war is declared between Catholic Mexico and the Protestant United States, and but little lacked for preventing the entire disappearance from the map of the world of that new and growing Mexican nation.

"War is again decreed, this time between Catholic France and Protestant Prussia, and the Protestant army besieges Paris. Again the war hounds are let loose, this time between heretical Turkey and the Catholic schismatic Greece, and the Turks come triumphant even unto the historic pass of Thermopylæ. And ultimately the very Catholic Spain essays to fight the Protestant American Republic, and already the reader knows what she has done to us.

"It is in vain that our archbishops and bishops have blessed the Spanish flags and armies; it is in vain that they have offered public devotion to the virgin. God has not heard us; all, all has been for the enemy; fatal doom! doleful gate!

"It is, I repeat the evil shadow that follows the Catholic nations. For the Protestants everything is felicity and prosperity; and notice that even the rebellion against ancient ideals is a cause of success.

"To the religious Reformation of the 16th century England owes the growth of its power and its progress in the days of modern civilization. The same causes produced analogous effects in Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and other northern countries.

"Italy realized its national unity, thanks to the anti-Catholic spirit of its cities; delivered as they had been for so long to the foreign yoke, because of the selfish interests of the "popes;" and if Catholic Austria has saved itself up till the present, she owes it to the great effort by which she broke the concordat which bound her to Rome, and gave in time religious liberty to the Austrians, recovering at the same time for the state attributes, until then hidden away beneath the cloak of the papish ecclesiastical court. And France is the second nation of the world since it has turned heretic.

"In exchange, the very Catholic Spain is almost at the point of passing the pantheon of extinguished nations: The Catholic Stuarts lost their crowns in England and Scotland. Ireland and Poland lost their independence; while the Bourbons have lost nearly all their thrones:—viz., that of France, and of Naples, of Parma, and of Modena. Only that of Spain remains to them.

"I have said, the evil shadow is girthed about the Catholic nations. It is like the shadow of the manchineil; which permits not to enjoy the sun's ray, but kills instead.

"We have to die, that pleases me; still, nevertheless, it is not good to precipitate events. It is better to die of apoplexy than to die of Anæmia.

"So as not to die of anæmia, one has to give much iron to the body; and thus debilitate the enemy, inasmuch as the weaker the enemy is, the less influence is he-able to exercise upon us the evil shadow which follows us.

"Then since God is not with us, let us remain with God!"

The above is a sad yet true picture expressed by a heart full of bitterness, almost on the verge of desperation, a soul tired of being imprisoned in the trammels of Rome. His keen eye has penetrated the superficiality of the papish system; he sees the mercenary motives which impel the many blasphemous ceremonies of Catholicism; and he sees also the judgment of God being poured out upon Spain because of her having left the true and living God, by turning her face to the altars of Baal.

It is a fact that almost every expedition in times past that has received the papal benediction, has met with defeat and disaster. Thus the people are beginning to open their eyes to the emptiness of both Romish blessings and cursings.

Oh, that poor Spain would open her doors to receive the message of salvation; open her heart to admit of the rays of the Sun of righteousness. This is the only balm for the afflicted soul of Spain. This is the only way by which Spain or any other land can be elevated from the low and immoral plain of this degenerate world.

How long, oh, Spain, will you close your eyes to the glorious truth hidden in God's Word? How long will you remain in your priest-ridden servitude, when God wants you to step into the light and liberty of the gospel?

Turn your eyes Zionward, leave all superstition, and human tradition; then shall you receive the blessing—not from the Vatican—but from the divine Creator,—a blessing that will bring victory here in the present life, and a crown of life hereafter.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 14.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

JESUS CHRIST is the author of religious liberty for all men. In him originates this principle, eternal in its nature, and broad as the universe.

Christ's mission to earth was for the purpose of setting men free. At the beginning of his ministry he exclaimed, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance [to proclaim liberty] to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised; to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Isa. 61:1, 2; Luke 4:18, 19.

This proclamation strikes at the bondage of sin. This will be seen from the language of Christ in John 8:31-36: "Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him; If ye continue in my words, then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. . . . Whosoever committeth sin is the servant [lit. bondsman] of sin. And the servant abideth not in the house forever. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

Why was this liberty proclaimed to every captive son and daughter of Adam? The answer is: "That we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life." Luke 1:74, 75.

This is liberty indeed—liberty so complete that all who choose to do so, may serve the Lord, and serve him in holiness and righteousness all their life long. It is liberty to do right—to do righteousness. Without this liberty it would be utterly impossible to render acceptable service to the Author of our being. Service pleasing to him is that where the heart is yielded up unservedly to God—service which alone is prompted by love and wrought in faith. Rom. 6:13; Gal. 5:6.

So sacred is this principle of liberty, so important is it that it shall be left untrammelled, that even God will let a man go wrong—will even let him commit sin rather than compel him by brute force to do right. Nay, such a thing as forcing a man to do right is an absolute impossibility—even with Deity. Could this have been done, there would have been no necessity for Christ to have given himself for sinners. The only force that God can possibly use to lead a soul to serve him is love, and love does not coerce; it does not make a man do a thing against his will; it simply makes him willing, and being willing, the service then rendered is a delightful one.

It follows, therefore, that no one can of right interpose himself between the individual and his God, and by force compel him to render one single duty to God. The man or body of men who would do this—whether in legislative halls, or in church capacity, even though it is done professedly in the name of Christ—any or all such, in that thing, would thereby declare themselves the enemies of both God and man.

The logic therefore is that no man can justly judge another because of his religious belief, or even of his unbelief.

Nor do we need to depend upon mere human deductions, plain though they be. We have the highest authority and example possible in this matter, even that of Christ himself. This is what he says: "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world." John 12:47.

All that Jesus Christ taught was the truth, for he is "the Truth." In not a single instance did he speak of himself. Thus he testified: "But the Father which sent me, he gave me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak. And I know that his commandment is life everlasting; whatsoever I speak, therefore, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak." John 12:49, 50. And all this was in order that souls might be saved, and only that souls might be saved. Even Christ could not judge and save at the same time. And if it is true of Christ, it is equally true of his representatives.

Now as Jesus taught that souls might be saved, there was salvation in all that he taught for all those who would believe it. Yet how few, comparatively, accepted his teachings. But notwithstanding there was salvation in every word he uttered, Christ did not even so much, as it were, turn his hand over to compel people to accept them. He made no appeal to any earthly power. And the reason for all this is plain enough. The Word of God needs no human props. It itself is "living and powerful." Heb. 4:12, R. V. It can best do its work when untrammelled by the devices of men. But the truth is, the Word of God cannot be bound (2 Tim. 2:9); and whenever any attempt is made to enforce any doctrine professedly based upon the Word of God, such attempt is in itself good evidence that it is not the truth, and is therefore to be rejected.

No one can sit in judgment upon another on account of his religious belief without claiming to be infallible. He must be able to judge to a hair's breadth the truth or falsity of a doctrine. Christ could have done this, and been infallibly correct; for, as stated above, he is the Truth. John 14:6. But as before stated, he could not have done this, and been the Saviour of mankind. The most therefore that the followers of Christ can be while in this world is to be laborers for the salvation of men. This is possible (Acts 13:46, 47), while the other is not.

This, the founders of our Government recognized, and they determined that, so far as lay in their power to do, the principle should prevail in this country which Jesus taught—"If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not." Hence, religious liberty in the fullest sense was provided for in the Constitution. This was Christlike; this was lamblike. And we repeat again, that no other nation ever did it, and therefore no other nation but the United States can be the one symbolized by the beast with the two horns like a lamb, of Rev. 13:11.

Opposing Principles in the Office of Army Chaplain.

THE action of members of the Seventy-first New York Regiment taken in their armory recently, expressive of their opinion of the regimental chaplain, as mentioned in the SENTINEL of last week, has occasioned much discussion. The affair seems to be generally regarded as one of sufficient importance to call for investigation, to ascertain whether or not it was based on justifying grounds. Among many utterances that have been published on the subject, the following editorial from the New York Sun is worthy of note, because it points out the real root of the difficulty as arising from the nature of the office itself—from the difficulty of trying to harmonize the duties of two positions so opposite in nature as are those of military official and Christian servant. The Sun says:—

"It must be remembered, however, that the place of the chaplain in the military system is peculiarly difficult. In the community of the parish all must be equal in the eye of the pastor, except in moral and spiritual excellence. In the military system the line of division between the enlisted man and the commissioned officer is broad and impassable. The chaplain is a commissioned officer; he ranks with a captain, and the army regulations prescribe that 'an appropriate set of quarters, equal to those of a captain, be set apart permanently for the chaplain' at a military post, and 'he shall not be displaced, except by a reduction when the quarters are insufficient for the garrison, and he will not then be entirely displaced nor allowed to choose others.' Chaplains are 'not required to turn out with troops on occasions of ceremony, but will be inspected at post chapels, schoolrooms, or libraries, as may be designated by post commanders.'

"The chaplain, consequently, being a commissioned officer, messes with the officers, and is separated from the enlisted men by the broad gulf of distinction to which we have referred. He lives in a different atmosphere, and militia troops like those of the Seventy-first may resent the separation, made compulsory by the regulations, and attribute to the chaplain motives and indulgences because of it, with which he is not chargeable justly. He goes to them both as a commissioned officer and a spiritual guide, counsellor, and consoler. The functions are distinct radically. He must preserve the dignity and prerogatives of his military rank, yet he must minister to them as a servant of the Lord, as the servant of servants.

"The chaplain's duties too, are largely undefinable except by his own sense of obligation, and they impose on him in their exercise a delicacy of conduct which may render him peculiarly liable to misunderstanding and unjust criticism. He cannot throw down the barriers set up by his commission, yet as a minister of the Lord he must bear to the men an affectionate and confidential relation. It is a very trying place. Abstract Christianity and concrete war run counter to each other; and this opposition goes far to explain the accusations against Chaplain Vandewater as they are made by our correspondents. They seem to have expected impossibilities of him and to have misconceived conduct made compulsory on him because of his position as a commissioned officer."

The simple truth is, as this statement of the facts makes clear, that the chaplain can be a success from a spiritual standpoint only by making himself a failure as a government official. No man can carry out principles which "run counter to each other" at one and the same time. And as he is bound to carry out the principles of Christianity, it is plain enough that he should refuse to be bound by the opposing principles of "concrete war," made "compulsory on him because of his position as a commissioned officer;" and that any effort to make such conduct compulsory on him is both unjust and foolish. It is plain, in short, that the office of army chaplain is a logical absurdity and a practical failure, and ought to be abolished.

This is the lesson which ought to be learned from such events by the American people.

"No man can serve two masters."

A CRUSADE for legislation to enforce the observance of Sunday has been started in California. A public meeting was called in Oakland for the purpose of organizing a permanent association, whose purpose shall be to besiege the legislature until such legislation as they demand in support of Sunday as a religious day shall be granted. It is by the clergy and church people, of course, that the movement is being pushed.

MAYOR HOOS, of Jersey City, who recently declared in favor of open theaters on Sunday, thereby brought upon himself such a storm of clerical indignation that his political friends have thought it necessary to come to his relief,—one of them, a Democratic leader, giving out a statement in which he defends Sunday ball playing and sacred concerts. The mayor had previously explained to the irate clergymen that his utterance in behalf of Sunday theatres was only meant to refer to Sunday “sacred” concerts.

SEVERAL members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church were put on trial before the Presbytery of New York, at Newburg, for voting at a political election. The Reformed Presbyterians advocate that the national Constitution should be amended so as to “recognize God,” and that moral obligations should be made compulsory upon all citizens by the law of the land. Until this shall be done they refuse to vote, on the ground that this would be an act of participation in a “godless” government; but they urge that other people ought to vote these changes into existence, and after the Government shall have been thus modeled upon their ideas the Reformed Presbyterians will be willing to take hold and run it. The trial resulted in the acquittal of the accused parties, owing to the absence of any positive proof that they had committed the offense charged against them.

WHILE in Jerusalem on his recent tour, Emperor William delivered a discourse in the Church of the Nativity, at the conclusion of which he took occasion to sharply reprove the assembled clergy of the various sects, for conduct which was at variance with the principles of the religion they professed. The Kaiser said:—

“During my visit to the holy places and to the Protestant and Catholic institutions of Palestine I meet with one disappointment after another. Here, in the Church of the Nativity, which ought to serve as an example of pious charity and pure Christian life, I meet the very reverse of charity and Christianity.

“I am not surprised that Christianity remains unpopular in the Orient, and that Mohammedanism, with its fallacious teachings, still holds sway. How can it be otherwise when you clergymen are everlastingly quarrelling over dogmatic questions, neglecting to teach true Christian charity and a pure life in emulation of Jesus Christ?”

While such reproof may have come with poor grace from the lips of the German autocrat, no one familiar with the facts to which the emperor alluded can doubt that it was well deserved.

MR. KEELY, of motor fame, is dead. He was the inventor of the “Keely motor,” which purported to be operated by a new and mysterious force, the nature of which for some reason could not be disclosed. He discovered this mysterious force about thirty years ago, and has been busy in utilizing it in a very practical way so far as his own interests were concerned, ever since. He found plenty of men with money who were waiting for the advent of a new motor which would revolutionize everything in the motor line previously made, and had little difficulty in getting the tidy sum of $100,000 subscribed with which to prosecute experiments. Mr. Keely constructed a model of his motor, which was exhibited on various occasions, but which he carefully guarded from the inspection of mechanical experts. On these occasions he would take pains to enlighten his audience concerning the nature of his discovery, by talking about “triune currents of a polar flow of force,” the “reflex action of gravity,” “chords of mass,” and “sympathetic outreaches of distance,” in a way which implied that he was on familiar terms with these things. The charm worked, and many persons including even some of repute for scientific attainments, became convinced that Mr. Keely really had hold of some wonderful occult force which could be dragged forth from its hiding-place and put in harness for the benefit of mankind, if only sufficient funds were put at the inventor’s disposal for that purpose.

* * *

A STOCK company was formed, in which a credulous public subscribed liberally, paying at times several hundred dollars a share. And when shares of stock were low, individuals whose confidence remained unshaken kept up the supply of funds; so that in all the sum of $500,000 was put into the inventor’s hands between the date of his great discovery and that of his death. With this supply of cash at his disposal he managed to secure a fairly comfortable living. Meanwhile, as an evidence of good faith and of progress toward practical results, Mr. Keely occupied himself in manufacturing models of his motor; none of which however seemed exactly adapted to the mysterious force which it was designed to display. Of these he constructed and discarded in all one hundred and twenty-nine; and yet the mysterious force refused to yield itself up as the revolutionizer of motive power. But those who have fallen heir to Mr. Keely's wonderful discovery announce that it will not be lost to the world by his death, but that the work will be continued the same as before. A discovery which has proved itself so potent as a magnet for drawing cash from the pockets of credulous people, is too good a thing to be let drop simply because the original beneficiary under it no longer lives to reap its harvests.

* * *

On the whole, it must be said that Mr. Keely's wonderful discovery, hovering for thirty years on the border line between the realm of occult mysteries and that of tangible and practicable things, and all this time drawing funds from the pockets of apparently intelligent and sensible people, to the amount in all of $500,000, throws the late Mr. Jernegan and his gold-from-sea-water scheme quite into the shade. Whether it will survive its ingenious originator or collapse with his demise remains to be seen.

General Weyler Tells What the Catholic Church Has Done for Spain.

WHATEVER doubts may be entertained regarding the late Spanish general Weyler as a worthy character, there can be no question of his competency to tell the truth on the subject of Spain's union with the Catholic Church, and its resulting effects upon that country; and this, according to press dispatches, he has recently done in a letter to the Queen Regent. We have not seen the letter, but find the following reference made to it by the Christian Advocate, St. Louis, Mo.:—

"With a force of logic impossible to answer, he [Weyler] tells the queen that Spain's lamentable condition at present is due to the clericals, and in support of his proposition he cites facts hitherto almost unknown outside of Spain, but familiar to Spaniards acquainted with their own social and political condition.

"Weyler declares that while Spain is poor, the church in Spain is richer than in any other country in Europe; not even in priest-ridden Italy does the church possess so much. 'Many of the richest corporations in the kingdom belong to the church, notably the Transatlantic Española, the leading steamship company. The clerics also have large landed estates, both in the peninsula and in the colonies. Nearly all the land of any value in the Philippines belongs to the religious orders and is rented to the islanders by them.'

"In return for the benefits conferred upon it by the state and people, Weyler asks what the church has done for the country, and answers his own question by the statement that not only has it done nothing, but that in crises like the present its influence has always been against the court and government, and while the bishops have ostensibly favored the priests, whose power among the common people is unlimited, have invariably opposed the few measures of reform that the government has had the courage to suggest. This is the way the church has returned thanks for the benefits conferred upon it, for the privileges enjoyed by its clergy, for the immense wealth it has wheedled and cajoled from the government and people of Spain. The letter is the most frightful arraignment ever made of a religious denomination, and is all the more remarkable coming from the man it does.

"Weyler states plainly that the cordial support of himself and his followers depends upon a change of attitude by the government toward the church."

Such words from one in the position of this leading Spaniard, far outweigh all that can be said by short-sighted and weak-kneed Protestants on the subject of the danger which threatens civil government in any land from the machinations of the papal church.

The "Flag Salute" in Oregon.

As a result of the introduction of the "flag salute" in the public schools of Ashland, Oregon, seven children who refused to give the salute have been expelled from the schools. The "salute," as we have before stated, requires the children to say that they give their hearts to God, which of course is requiring them to profess conversion,—a profession which on the part of some at least must be a downright lie. Some people—even some children—object to being compelled to utter a lie, and others object to being required to profess conversion; and these—naturally the most conscientious of the lot—are cast out of the schools. To be patriotic, after this standard of patriotism, conscience is only in the way and should be dispensed with. Some perhaps are of such a peculiar turn of mind as to think that the object of the public schools is to teach the young the rudiments of scientific knowledge, and not to teach the ideas of patriotism entertained by the "Woman's Relief Corps;" but evidently the school board of Ashland do not belong to this class.

The affair has caused some stir in the town, and some at least who are not religiously identified with the parents of the expelled children, are outspoken in denunciation of such violation of American fundamental principles. We give, in part, what one of these writes for publication to an Ashland paper, the Valley Record:—

"Now, Mr. Editor, if for conscience' sake these children were debarred from receiving a free education, then may God pity the one that debarred them. Jesus came to 'redeem us from all iniquity;' but how long will it take if those who claim to be his followers commit such iniquitous acts. The few who try to defend the other side, say that the object was to teach patriotism. Well, if patriotism can be forced into the rising generation at the point of a birch rod, this might be some color of an excuse, but how long will it be before such people will be justifying the forcing of patriotism into our people at the point of a bayonet? Not long, Mr. Editor; not long!

"I have lately been told that one of the pastors of this town said from the pulpit that he hoped 'that Christianity would be forced on the heathen nations at the mouth of the cannon!' This is not Christianity; it is Mohammedanism. I have thought that education would rid the world of bigotry and persecution, but from the acts of our educators I am forced to say education may do so, but book learning will not.

"Mr. Editor, I had hoped that the days of Roger Williams and William Penn were past and that we, as a people, were at that place where we did not demand adoration or worship of anything, but that a man's or child's conscience was respected at all times and places. We think it a great wrong or injustice that the Quakers were driven out of England because they would not salute the lords and nobles of that country by raising their hat when they passed by. We build monuments to the dead martyrs and persecute their children, when for conscience' sake they decline to salute our national emblem (or image) by expelling them from the public school. Jesus would say of such as he did of the leading men of his day: 'Woe unto ye scribes and pharisees, hypocrites, for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward but within are full of dead men's bones and of all uncleanness.' 'Even so, ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity.' Matt. 23:27, 28.

"We have always had a great respect for the public schools of this nation, and much pride for our local schools, but when men use their position to do an injustice to innocent, God-fearing children, whose only crime consisted in refusing to do that which their conscience tells them is wrong, no words of ours can convey even a little bit of our pity coupled with contempt for them; and we cannot help but believe that it was a mistake on their part and that those who occupy the high places on our school board will 'cease to do evil and learn to do well' by reinstating those children to their places where justice says they should occupy, giving them equal chances to learn with others, teaching all children that liberty of conscience is as necessary to a free country as patriotism.

Dr. Parkhurst on Imperialism.

NEW YORK's noted reform clergyman, Dr. Parkhurst, in a Thanksgiving day sermon, discussed the policy of imperialism in the light of American history and principles of government, and said some things on the subject that will bear repeating. We quote the following:—

"The proposition is that we turn our backs on traditions of the past and sing out the anthem of our national future in a key distinct from that which has been sounding for a century or more. I am no stickler for tradition, but I am concerned that the rank and file of our population should in all soberness of thought realize what abandonment of such traditions means and what weight of import the adoption of the new suggested lines involves.

"No one can recognize more confidently than myself the mission which it belongs to us as a nation to render to the world at large. The principles, civil and religious, which we nationally embody are given to us for our use in order that they may be extended to the world for its use. It is what our nation is, in the first instance, that is going to determine its power to make the world great along civil and religious lines. Hence the pertinence of the expression recently used by James Bryce when he said: 'The United States will render a far greater service to humanity by developing a high type of industrial civilization on her own continent than by foreign conquests.' And the words of Bryce are peculiarly significant from the fact that, as shown in his masterly work, 'The American Commonwealth,' he grasps with so firm a hand the strength, the weakness and the opportunities of the great American people."

"There is not to-day respect enough for the authority of the general Government to secure to the negro the rights that belong to him as a citizen, although such rights were nominally conferred upon him a third of a century ago. Aside from the question of the negro, heterogeneous populations are pouring in upon us from all parts of the globe, and we cannot keep up with them, great, undigested masses of foreign stuff here that are no more American in their appreciations and sympathies than the day they were born in Italy, Ireland, Poland, Russia, or out in the great East.

"What are our labor people thinking about that they are not rising up in protest from one end of the land to the other against swinging wide open the flood gates of cheap immigration? These things are not understood yet by the masses of our population, and the masses of our population have a right to understand them. You shut out the Chinese because you don't want cheap labor and bad morals, but send cards of invitation to the Malays. Are you going to treat them as captives, shoot them down if they undertake to leave the islands on a visit to the home government? Then what becomes of the vaunted spirit of American institutions and of such principles so dear for one hundred years to the American heart as that all men are created free and equal, or that little apothegm of ours that governments shall derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; or did Dewey's guns that knocked the Spanish flag to pieces blow up also the Declaration of Independence?"

"When a nation takes what is not its own, we call it enlarging the sphere of its influence. When an individual does that we call him a thief. Perhaps the two are essentially different, but there is an unwholesome impression left upon the public mind, as in the instance of the Franco-Prussian war. The world felt that Germany took Alsace and Lorraine because knowing that France was so utterly undone she could not help herself, and having knocked France prostrate, took advantage of her helplessness to seize her jewels and rifle her pocket."

"It is simply a question whether the Government is going to keep its word to its own people and to the world, or whether it is not. It is simply a question whether we have become so intoxicated by our military success, as to have unlearned the simple principles of transparent honesty that we started out with."

"I do not wonder that those islanders do not want to be governed from America, and they will probably want it less after they have had it awhile. Our policy of dealing with semi-civilized folk and with savages is not just what you would call reassuring. I would rather be a Malay, subject to Spain, than be an American Indian, subject to the Indian Bureau.

"So long as it is an understood thing that office is spoils, we may well pray to be delivered from the responsibility of governing dependencies."

The War of Principle.—No. 9.

"At any rate, Aleck, the death of Christ had the appearance of defeat. In the first place, Peter, one of his most zealous followers, denied him. In the second, Judas betrayed him; and in the third, all his disciples forsook him and fled. When his own disciples left him, it was little wonder that the priests and pharisees taunted him on the cross."

"Yes. I grant you it did look like defeat. It had that appearance; but Satan and men both knew that it was victory. 'Himself he cannot save,' said the Pharisees; but they felt in their hearts that he would save others, and that the Father into whose care he committed his Spirit, would save him."

"The appearance of defeat was a delusion; yet it did have the look of reality," said Cecil.

"Indeed it did," replied Aleck. "So much so that his own disciples were thrown into consternation and despair."

"How terribly they must have felt! What a disappointment when they confidently looked for his temporal sovereignty!"

"There was one who saw through the delusion, Cecil."

"Who was that, Aleck?"

"The thief on the cross. In that awful hour of utter humiliation, and, as it looked, loss and despair, his eyes saw Christ's future triumph and kingdom, and he cried, 'Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom.'"

"Why, Aleck, what sublime faith and superhuman intuition!"

"So it was. But it is still the kind of faith and intuition that will bring to us the answer he received, 'Thou shalt be with me in paradise.' The true Christian's cause in every age has always looked in the eyes of the world as a losing cause; but the time of its greatest apparent defeat is the hour of its real triumph. Happy the soul who looks through faith's telescope, and sees, when earth fails, the eternal world, the everlasting kingdom."

"Aleck, there's one thing that puzzles me all through the story of Christ. Why didn't he give the people an indubitable proof of his divinity?"

"Why, Cecil, he did. What greater proof could be than his resurrection?"

"But it was only known to his disciples. The Jews to this day believe that his followers came and stole his body, and spread the report that he had risen."

"Where did that story originate?"

"Well, I believe it originated with the priests and pharisees, who heard the story of the guards, and feared its influence on the people."

"Yes, Cecil. That story itself is a proof of the weakness that comes from trusting in and depending on man. The guards knew Christ had risen, the priests knew it; but rather than sacrifice themselves, they sacrificed truth, because they feared the people. How much better to fear God! What upright manliness, what heroism, comes from utter reliance upon infinite power!"

"Yes, Aleck! I begin to see the force of your principle; but I also see that it means the utter casting away of self and self's interests. I see a new meaning in the words of Jesus, 'If any man will come after, let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow me.'"

"Yes, Cecil, it means the casting away of self, surely; but it means more,—it means the reception of divine power."

"Why was it, Aleck, that Christ's disciples then did manifest the weakness they manifested? They had taken up their cross, and followed him, they had believed that he came forth from God."

"Yes, they had been illuminated with the divine Spirit. When Peter said, 'Thou art the Son of God,' Christ had said, 'Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto you; but my Father which is in heaven;' and yet this conviction that Christ was the Son of God, was not sufficient then, and is not to-day sufficient, to keep us true to the true principle."

"Then what is, Aleck?"

"Nothing short of the indwelling Spirit of God. The very strength of Christ's own manliness, must be in us,—'Strengthened with all might by this Spirit in the inner man.' But come, Cecil, let us follow the history of the disciples after Christ's resurrection. When he meets the two on their way to Emmaus; how did he find them?"

"Very sorrowful, unbelieving, and hopeless."

"What did Christ do to revive their hope that he was the one who would redeem Israel?"

"Let's see. He quoted from Moses and the prophets, showing that the experience Christ had passed through had been pretold, and proved his claim to the Messiahship."

"True, Cecil. Then their hearts burned within them, and they became prepared for the after revelation of Christ at their table. Their unbelief in his resurrection was swept away. Finally the eleven believed he had risen. Then he showed himself alive, and proved his resurrection by many infallible proofs, and at one time appeared to five hundred brethren at once. One would have thought that such evidence would have been sufficient to have equipped them for any future trial."

"I should think so," said Cecil. "What more could have been necessary? It seems to me that could I have witnessed such proofs, no further doubt would have beset me, and that I should have been able to go to prison or death for his sake, so sure would I have been that divine power would have sustained me."

"And yet, Cecil, they had still more to sustain them in this outside way; for where did Christ take them for a last interview?"

"I don't remember, Aleck."

"To the Mount of Olives. You have your Bible, or here is mine. Now read in Acts 1:9-11."

"And when he had spoken these things, while they yet beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.' They had the privilege of seeing Christ ascend in the clouds. They had the assurance of the angels of his return, and yet they were to wait for that which would qualify them to stand true to God in the face of the world's opposition."

"For what were they to wait, Aleck."

"You may read the fourth verse of Acts 1."

"And being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which saith he, ye have heard of me."

"Now, Cecil, what was that promise? Read the next verse."

"For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence."

"Now what would this endow them with? Read the 8th verse."

"And ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and in Samaria and unto the uttermost parts of the earth."

"There you have it, Cecil. The greatest outward manifestation, the convincing of the head, is not sufficient to keep us true to the principle of utter reliance on God. But 'ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you.' In the history of the apostles we will see the results of this power." F. E. B.

Taking a Drop.

COME in, Patrick, and take a drop of something," said one Irishman to another. "No, Mike; I'm afraid of drops ever since Tim Flaherty died." "Well, what about Tim?" "He was one of the liveliest fellows in these parts. But he began the drop business in Barney Shannon's saloon. It was a drop of something out of a bottle at first. But in a little while Tim took a few drops too much, and then he dropped into the gutter. He dropped his place, he dropped his coat and hat, he dropped his money; he dropped everything but his thirst for strong drink. Poor Tim! But the worst is to come. He got crazy with drink one day and killed a man. And the last time I saw him he was taking his last drop with a slipping noose around his neck. I have quit the dropping business, Mike. I have seen too many good fellows when whiskey had the drop on them. They took just a drop from the bottle, then they dropped into the gutter, and they dropped into the grave. No rum seller can get a drop in me any more, and if you don't drop him, Mike, he will drop you."—Selected.

Studies in French History.—49.

"TO-DAY, we will learn a little about a great man named Colbert, in connection with the reign of Louis XIV., whose minister and adviser he became after the vain Fouquet was banished."

"Excuse me, professor," said Milly Brown, blushing, "but I don't remember that you have told us how King Louis looked. I'd like to know, if you please."

"Well, Milly, I think it is a good plan to form a mental picture of those people whose history we are studying; so I will mention that this king who, by the way, reigned longer than any of the kings of France, was a short man in stature, and because of this fact he always wore a large wig having very stiff curls, which would stand up on his royal head and so make him seem taller; for the same reason he wore boots with heels that were four inches high."

"Why," smiled Milly, "he must have felt as if he were walking on stilts."

"I suppose he was as vain as he was ignorant. History says that he could neither read nor write, and yet on account of the victories which he gained over the surrounding countries, he was called Louis the Great."

"Whatever the king did was the fashion at once; so it soon became the style to wear high heels and pompous-looking wigs. It also became stylish,—not because it was right, but because the king did so,—to be very polite. But the bad part of it was that this smooth way of talking covered up a great deal of deceit and hypocrisy."

"When the great and good man Colbert became minister, or chief adviser of the king, he found that the country was in a most deplorable condition. The working people were paying enormous taxes, while the rich did not pay any at all. This so impoverished the poor people that they were actually forced to eat grass and roots to keep alive."

"I don't see why they didn't raise food in their gardens," said Maggie Palmeter. "Seems to me it would have been just the thing."

"Without doubt it would have, but they were all so weak and starved that they had no strength, and the oxen which they might have used to help them, had all gone for taxes. Well, Colbert changed all this, and that so quickly that it seemed almost magical. He levied a tax upon the rich instead of the poor, so that no one was distressed. Indeed, he did a great deal to better the condition of the country. At last, France having made peace with Spain, and won many victories by the skill and valor of the great warriors, Condi and Turenne, England, Holland, and Sweden bound themselves by a Triple Alliance to stand by each other, in case France threatened either themselves or any other weaker nation."

"Did they keep their promise very long, I wonder?" asked Harry Ray.

"No; at least the king of England did not, for King Louis actually bribed him to break league with Holland and Sweden, if he would pay him a pension yearly; this the shameless king of England did, though I don't see how he could have enjoyed his pension very much. Then Louis proceeded at once to invade Holland."

"O, I wonder if that is the time when the people cut the dykes down, and let the North Sea flood the country?" asked Edna Philips.

"It is the very time when they did it; and so Louis was obliged to go back home to keep out of the water. But not being satisfied with this experience, the exasperated king determined to fight with Germany."

"I did not know that Germany was having any trouble with France," said practical Jack.

"It was not, and in this war Germany made no resistance. The French troops simply devastated the country and brutally killed the unarmed people. At last after a great deal more trouble and bloodshed, the details of which it is not needful to learn, the Peace of Nimeguen was signed by the conflicting powers, and quiet reigned for a little while."

"France must have been quite a powerful country now, wasn't it?" asked Charlie White.

"Yes, in the days of Louis XIV. it was the most important country in all Europe; and now that peace had come, the improvements brought about by the wise Colbert, in changing the tax system were at once apparent. Industries sprung up everywhere and France began to prosper. A great canal across Southern France was made to facilitate navigation. Superb carpets and magnificent dress goods were woven, and the finest of plate glass made."

"It does me good to hear about peace and prosperity once more," said Julia March.

"It does me good to tell about it, Julia, and the poor war-stricken and tax-tormented people must have enjoyed it immensely. But prosperity did not reign after the death of the wise Colbert. In fact, before his death, Louis did some very foolish and extravagant things, one of which was to build a magnificent palace at Versailles, which cost almost $200,000,000."

"Why, he already had a splendid one at St. Germain, didn't he?" asked Rob Billings.

"Yes, but he didn't like to live in it at all, because from it he could see the towers of the cathedral where he knew he must one day lie down and sleep the sleep of death."

"But still," said romantic Milly Brown, "it must have been grand to have lived in such a fine palace. Please tell us more about it."

"The paintings and sculpture in and about this fairy land were alone worth fortunes. The grounds surrounding it were sixty miles around them, and water was brought from a river which, at an original distance of ninety miles away, was turned from its natural bed. But when we think that all this came from the pockets of the poor, it does not seem half so beautiful."

"Why didn't Colbert talk to the king about such extravagance?" asked practical Jack.

"He did, Jack; but the king would not heed him, though he wrote and told Louis that these things caused him 'incredible pain'; the king treated him very badly, indeed, though at last just before the good man died, Louis wrote him a very kind letter."

"That must have done Colbert good," remarked Charlie.

"It might have, but he did not open it, thinking the king had only sent it to reproach him still more. But the saddest thing of all is that the very people whom this great man had so served, now turned against him, and cursed him, declaring he had robbed them. So he was buried secretly, for fear of them. But Colbert had not long been dead before the peasants were forced to dig up their lands with their hands, because they could not plough, not having any oxen."

"I suppose the king didn't mind this state of things," remarked Julia March.

"O no; he still strutted about with his high heels and his curly wig, which a servant handed him on the end of a long cane every morning. Next week we will continue our studies till the death of King Louis, for his long, long reign came to an end at length."

Invaluable to Bible and History Students. THE EMPIRES OF THE BIBLE

FROM THE TIME OF THE FLOOD
TO THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

By ALONZO T. JONES.

Recent research in Babylon and Egypt has brought to light many valuable historical records that were inscribed in stone by the very men living in those ancient times. These records and the Bible history of the same time are woven together in one connected story. Another important feature of the book is the tracing in a series of twenty-one maps, the course of those empires. The design of the book is unique, and every student either of Bible or history will find it invaluable.

Our Combination Bible

Is undoubtedly the BEST BIBLE offered with a periodical. Please note that it is a

Self-pronouncing Combination TEACHERS' REFERENCE BIBLE.

The "Self-Pronouncing" means that the long hard names are divided into syllables and can be pronounced with ease.

The "Combination" gives both the King James and the revised readings at a glance.

The "Teachers'" signifies that the Bible contains full Teachers' Helps, Illustrations, Concordance, Subject Index, Vocabulary of Proper Names with their meaning, Maps, etc.

The "Reference" says that it has complete references just as all first-class Bibles have.

The type is Bourgeois—large and clear, similar to that in which this paper is set—and is much prized by all who use it.

It is bound in Tampico morocco, divinity circuit, leather lined to edge, round corners, red under gold edges, silk headband silk marker, etc.

Those desiring a thinner book can order the Bible without "helps," or with the Concordance only.

Send for a circular giving directions how to read the Combination, showing a full-sized cut of the Bible, specimen of type, etc.

Since we have received so many words of commendation for this Bible from those who are using it, we really feel that we are offering something well worth more than the price when we say—

We will send this fine Bible, postpaid, and the AMERICAN SENTINEL one year for $3.50.

The Bible may be sent to one address, the "SENTINEL" to another.

For 25 cents extra we will mark on the Bible in gold letters any name desired.

American Sentinel.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 1, 1898.

"I WOULD rather be a Malay, subject to Spain," says Dr. Parkhurst, "than an American Indian subject to the Indian Bureau." This states his view of imperialism, and it contains a vast amount of truth on this subject.

THE world's need of Christianity was never more strikingly demonstrated in every place than it is today, at the close of the nineteenth century. Civilization and the triumphs of science have not sufficed to bring prosperity and happiness to the people; they have not solved the problems which confront and perplex statesmen in every civilized land. Christianity alone can solve those problems to the satisfaction of all parties. Christianity breaks down every barrier between a man and his fellowmen; its working is unhindered by differences of race, color, or social or financial conditions. It teaches every person self government and self-support, eliminates covetousness and substitutes in its place brotherly love, and puts the desire to serve in the place of the natural disposition to rule. When men will exemplify these principles in their lives, every problem of good government will be effectually solved.

THE only disarmament which will ever bring universal peace to the world is the disarming of the mind that is filled with the carnal elements of hatred, envy, and strife. And this must be an individual work, performed through the agency of divine grace.

THE Russian Government is negotiating with the Krupp and Vulcan iron works of Germany for the construction of new ship yards in Russia, and for the employment of German engineers and workmen, in contemplation of a great increase of the Russian navy. The Berlin papers refer to this as being "an interesting satire on the Czar's appeal for international disarmament and universal peace."

It is beginning to be boldly advocated by men of influence in American affairs, that there is in this country no natural right of suffrage,—that no such right is asserted by the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution. This is said in the North to justify imperialism, and in the South to justify the disfranchisement of the negro. It means, when carried put negroes in public office sooner than vote for the men who stand at the head of the combinations of wealth; and many of the latter, on the other hand, look upon the mass of the poor as being no more than so much cattle, and no more qualified to participate in government than are the negroes in the estimation of the Southern whites. When therefore a person is disfranchised because he is an inferior socially or physiologically, or is looked down upon, or violently disliked by his neighbors, every essential feature of republican government is set aside, and the right of suffrage is asserted only for those who have the power to enforce it. This can result only in the establishment of class rule, which is as essentially a despotism as is the rule of the autocrat of the Russias.

Any negro, or Malay, or Hawaiian, who is able to govern himself—to control his own conduct so as to show respect for the rights of his neighbors—is qualified to participate in the Government of the United States; and any white man who can not govern himself—who oversteps the rights of his neighbors because he does not respect them—is not qualified to participate in that Government, no matter what his wealth or influence, or station in society.

It is startling to see these fundamental principles of free government denied as they now are both in word and deed in this country. Such signs portend a revolution in government from republicanism to a monarchy, as surely as though accompanied by the clash of armies on the field of battle.

THE worst people in the world—the farthest removed from God in character—are those in whom selfishness is most fully developed, whether in rags or silks.

A PERSON who does not care about his neighbor's rights, is in a fair way to be defrauded of his own.

into effect, class rule, which is but one form of despotism. Its meaning cannot be limited to the negro or the inhabitant of Porto Rico, Hawaii, or the Philippines; for if it is admitted that a person has no right to vote or hold office because he is a negro, or a semi-civilized native of new American territory, by the same principle it can be asserted and justified that no objectionable person of whatever race or color has any right of suffrage; that is, that no people for whom other people in the majority or in power have a very strong dislike, or consider beneath themselves, have any right to participation in the Government. There are classes of white people who have quite as strong an aversion for each other as the white people of the South have for the negroes. Many of the poor hate the rich, and would others; free government means that each individual shall rule himself.

It has always been the tendency of nations to out-grow the principles of liberty and equality with which they started out, —to become intoxicated with the sense of great power and wealth, and to imagine they are still progressing when in reality they are going rapidly to decay.

EXPANSION may be due to a healthy growth, or it may be only a bloating which indicates that the system is diseased.

THAT which threatens the welfare of the individual, threatensequally the prosperity of the nation.

THE devil is not much disturbed by the spectacle of sinners "rebuking sin" at the ballot box.

Right principles are stronger than armies and navies, and the latter cannot support a nation when the former are abandoned.

NATIONAL duty is not best perceived through the smoke and haze of the battle field, nor the voice of wisdom most clearly heard amidst the exultant shouts of victory.

THE politician is concerned for the success of his party; the true statesman desires only the prosperity of the nation.

THERE can be no more un-American form of government than that which would abolish the distinction between sin and crime.

IS THIS TYPE OF STATESMAN HENCEFORTH TO SHAPE THE DESTINY OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC?

UNDER the guidance of the men who now stand at the nation's head, the policy of government by the consent of the governed, which the nation has followed since its birth, has been exchanged for the policy of imperialism, which means government of people not by themselves but by others and against their will. The inhabitants of Hawaii are now ruled under the military authority of the United States, although they are not now, nor were ever, at war with this nation; and the inhabitants of the Philippines are to be brought under the same rule. But the Declaration of Independence expressly asserts that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; and the national Constitution was made the embodiment of this principle of government. Hence they are squarely opposed to the imperial policy upon which the nation is now launched, and are by that policy relegated, virtually if not literally, to the political junk-shop. And this means a complete revolution, and the downfall of free government in the Western world.

DESPOTISM means that one individual shall rule

Nor legal but spiritual power, must elevate society.

Free Government a Divine Institution.

FREE government is a divine institution. It did not originate among men, but is the very government of heaven itself. It came down to earth as a gift from God.

The government of God has the appearance of a monarchy; yet it is not a monarchy, as monarchies are understood here. It is in reality "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Lincoln's famous definition describes no government more perfectly than the divine government, and only in the divine government is his definition fully realized.

The incontrovertible proof of this is seen in the fact that the kingdom of God will include no individual who is not able perfectly to govern himself. Every individual who fails in this respect will be shut out of that kingdom, and solely for that reason. This power of perfect self-government being then a necessary qualification for each individual under the government of God, it can only be that each individual is to exercise this power, and so perfectly to govern himself, in that kingdom.

So thoroughly unlike God is everything that is arbitrary and despotic,—so far is he from desiring to be an autocratic ruler over his creatures—that he will tolerate nothing of this character in his universe. He will shut out of it everything that is contrary to free thought, free speech, and free action.

"Government of the people, by the people, and for the people" on this earth, is little more than a theory; it has never been realized in the past, and is not to-day. The Republic of the United States is based upon this theory of government; but in it the theory falls very far short of realization. The Republic is permeated with despotism in every part. The trouble is that so few of the people are able to govern themselves. No individual who cannot govern himself is fit to govern other people; and his participation in the government tends rather to infringe the rights and liberties of the people than to preserve them. Every slave of passion or ambition is a natural despot.

The purpose of the gospel in the earth is to restore, to all who will receive it, the power of self-government which was lost by the fall in Eden, and thus to prepare subjects for that real "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," which the Creator is ere long to set up.

A Revolutionary Procedure.

REFERRING further to the scheme for the governmental support of the Catholic Church and the priests and high church dignitaries in Cuba, which is being fastened upon the Government of the United States by Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland through President McKinley, it is worth while to consider the principles that are involved according to the views of the men who made this nation.

The contest which developed and established the governmental principle of total separation from religion, and from any recognition of it, as finally reflected in the Constitution of the United States, was focalized in "A Bill Establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion," which was brought before the General Assembly of Virginia in 1777 or 1778.

That bill proposed for that State the identical thing that is now being worked upon the national Government—the support of the clergy from the public treasury.

The men who made this nation as it was made declared that that "bill exceeds the functions of civil authority;" that "the enforced support of the Christian religion dishonors Christianity;" and that "to compel a person to furnish contributions of money in the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves is sinful and tyrannical."

These views prevailed throughout the whole country, and the principle was embodied in the national Constitution and the supreme law, in [the provisions] refusing governmental recognition of religion. And now when President McKinley has "determined that the Catholic churches [in Cuba] shall be kept open and that public worship shall be provided for; and that to this end sufficient money will be advanced by this Government to support the Catholic Church: it is perfectly plain that in this "determination" he is proceeding directly contrary to the fundamental and constitutional principle of the nation.

Again: Of that bill they said that "The same authority which can force a citizen to contribute threepence only, of his property, for the support of one establishment, may force him to conform to any other establishment in all cases whatsoever;" and that "Distant as it may be in its present form from the Inquisition, it differs from it only in degree. The one is the first step, the other is the last, in the career of intolerance."

Now the difference between levying a direct tax for the support of religion, and the appropriation to the support of religion of funds already raised by taxation, is a difference only in form and not at all in principle; is merely a difference in method and not at all in fact. It is hardly possible that the President would determine to levy a direct tax for the support of the Catholic Church and clergy in Cuba: certainly he would say that such a thing would be unconstitutional. But whatever is forbidden to be done directly is equally forbidden to be done indirectly. And as certainly as the levying of a direct tax for such a purpose would be unconstitutional and subversive of fundamental national principle, so certainly the advancing for such a purpose, of money already raised by the Government, is equally unconstitutional and subversive of fundamental national principle.

If the President can advance for the support of the Catholic Church threepence only of the money of all the people and oblige the people to submit to it, he can with equal right and authority oblige the people to conform to the wishes of that church in all cases whatsoever. Thus this thing that has been "determined" "differs from the Inquisition only in degree. "The one is the first step, the other is the last, in the career of intolerance."

The Washington correspondent reported that this thing of the national Government supporting the Catholic Church in Cuba, is done in order that the Catholic clergy there may not be made "a dangerous set of enemies" by having "reason to regret the presence of the American flag on the island;" it is to avoid "the malign influence that is in the power of a hostile clergy to exercise." This is nothing else than the employing of religion as an engine of civil policy.

The men who made this nation, said of that "Bill Establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion," that it implied "either that the civil magistrate is a competent judge of religious truths, or that he may employ religion as an engine of civil policy." And upon this they declared that "the first is an arrogant pretension, falsified by the contradictory opinions of rulers in all ages and throughout the world; the second [is] an unhallowed perversion of the means of salvation."

They declared that the "fruits" of this thing, upon a trial of "almost fifteen centuries" had been "more or less, in all places, pride and indolence in the clergy; ignorance and servility in the laity; in both superstition, bigotry and persecution." And that such has been precisely its fruits in the remaining one hundred and twenty years, unto this time, in Cuba is certain from the statement of this same Washington correspondent that though there is in Cuba a "vast number of priests and high church dignitaries" who "exercise complete control over their parishioners," yet the "population is densely ignorant," and "have never been taught to support their church and clergy by direct voluntary contributions;" and that this same clergy is of such a dangerous and malign disposition that unless the Government of the United States shall now continue the support that the Spanish government always gave, "it is easy to believe that the new American government in Cuba would have at its very inception built up a dangerous set of enemies" in this priesthood.

And to continue the old system of things which the makers of the nation repudiated, but which has been continued by Spain, is the very thing that this Washington correspondent says President McKinley has determined to do, as the consequence of "numerous conferences with Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland." In other words, the President has espoused, and is committing the national Government to the very principles in toto, which the makers of the nation distinctly and in fullest detail repudiated, and fixed their repudiation of those principles in the national Constitution and the supreme law as they intended and supposed forever.

This is a complete revolution: silent it is true, but none the less a revolution; and a revolution backward at that.

A. T. J.

In Jail for Conscience' Sake.

THE following appeared recently in the Times, Alexandria, Va., and gives some information which will be of interest to those who have made note of the arrest and imprisonment of two seventh-day observers at Ford's Store, Maryland, for non-observance of Sunday:—

"MEN IN JAIL ON ACCOUNT OF THEIR RELIGION.

"An old citizen having seen in the TIMES, some weeks ago, that two Adventists, Rhodes and Curlett, were held in jail at Centreville, Queen Anne County, Md., for cutting corn on Sunday, wrote to them regretting that such a state of things could exist in Maryland and urging agitation to induce the voters there to secure an amendment of the Sunday law similar to that in the Code of Virginia which declares that no penalty shall be incurred for work on Sundays by any one who conscientiously believes that the seventh day of the week should be observed as a Sabbath, and does in fact refrain from secular labor or business on that day. To this the following reply was received yesterday:—

"CENTREVILLE JAIL, Nov. 20, '98.

"DEAR FRIEND: We received a kind and welcome letter from you the other day which encourages us very much. We appreciate kindness and sympathetic words that we may receive from any one. We can see by the tone of your letter that you are not in harmony with the persecuting spirit which prevails in Queen Anne County, Md. We keep the seventh day of the week in accordance with the commandments of God, and work on Sunday, which we are persecuted for. But we rejoice that we are accounted worthy to suffer for His sake who suffered for us. The servant is not greater than his Lord. He has promised in his precious Word that he will never leave us, nor forsake us. And praise to his most holy name we are getting an experience here that we could never get any otherwise. We remain,

"Yours respectfully,

J. H. RHODES.
J. F. CURLETT.

Alas! For The Town.

BY FRANCES E. BOLTON.

ONE day hell's ambassador came to a town,
He looked round about with a sinister frown;
For the jails were all empty, there were scarce any traces Of drinking, or betting, or even horse races.
There were schools and libraries, and many a steeple,
And the order and peace told the manner of people.
He called on the mayor, and asked, if 'twas law
That made all the righteousness round him he saw?
But the mayor laughed loudly, then pointed above,
And said, "Nay, my good sir, it is heaven-sent love.
Come down to our church the next meeting, and see If with such gospel preaching we different could be."

"So I will," said the demon. "If there's preaching 'gainst sin,

'Twill be just the first place where I ought to start in."
So when the good people came into the meeting,
They gave to the demon unknown a kind greeting.
"Alas!" said the demon, "this warmth in the church
"Is just what is leaving our cause in the lurch."
"Grim coldness must come here. I must not speak loud,
"But where love runs so freely, there's always a crowd."
The singing was hearty, the prayer was sincere,
The preaching the kind that a demon might fear.
He wriggled and twisted, and then said, "I'll plan
"To get in this pulpit a different man."

"I'll send Fashion down here to trim up the people,
"I'll get them to building a far higher steeple;
"For 'twill help our cause better to have them in poles
"Be more interested than in these lost souls.
"I'll send Folly into the town with her graces,
"We'll soon have saloons here, and plenty of races;
"But the first thing I'll do, if I possibly can,
"Will be to get rid of that gospel-hot man."

The demon went slowly on a well-defined mission.
He set the good people to longing and wishing;
And Fashion came after, and after came Folly,
And took hold of Peter and Patience and Polly,
And old Mrs. Grundy stepped up to the pastor,
And said, "If he kept up, he'd have to move faster."

And when pride and vanity grew very bold,
The people in Christ-Church were haughty and cold.
But the pastor, long tempted, unyielding, stood true,
And he gave them the gospel, and he bade them adieu;
For the demon had worked all the length of his plan,
And got them to send for a new-fashioned man.

The new-fashioned preacher had sermons a pile.
He made the folks wonder and clap hands and smile;
But in spite of his rhetoric, 'twas patent to all
That his audience somehow was growing quite small.
'Twas choice as the choicest; but still far too thin
For the kind of a hearing his talent should win.

He passed with the crowd, and he saw many faces,
That once were at church, going off to the races.
And all the saloons were in prosperous order,
He noted statistics as if a recorder.

Just then as he pondered o'er what he would do,
His old friend came up. "What!" you look very blue.

"What's the trouble?" said he. "Oh, the trouble is sore;
"For I can't get the folks out to church any more.
"Horse-racing, and betting, saloons, Sunday papers "Are making them play up most unloving capers.
"Good preaching and culture and ethics all passes
"As so much wind blown o'er the heads of the masses."

"Hal! hal!" said the demon. "That's hard. Let me see.
"I think I can help you. Come walk on with me.
"Get a law to forbid all this racing; for say,
"The people ought surely to keep the blest day.
"Shut up the saloons, sir, and don't get out papers,
"And see if you can't change the people's bad capers."

"If when all that now tempts them is out of the way,
"And then they won't come to the church on one day,
"We can make the law straighter, though now it half shocks,
"('Yet they did it some years since), and get out the stocks!

"If the people still haggle, and still do refuse,
"Why, then, there's the rack and 'ye olden thumbscrews;
"And if we keep at it, I say it with awe,
"We can bring them to time, when love's gone, with hard law."

"I've been looking for this for some time, for you see,
"No souls are so useful to mine and to me,
"As those who turn hypocrites, sinister knaves,
"Who'll toil in the law-chains as if they were slaves.
"And I tell you your church will become a delight
"To us demons who'll fairly split sides at the sight."

"We will set men as spies to hunt out the delinquent,
"And put the police star on some hardened old skinflint.
"You could rule as a king then, and have, don't you see?
"The reverence that should mark a true laity.
"In fact all you wanted to you would be given:
"For couldn't your word open hell, or shut heaven?"

The parson walked on, and he longed to be great.
He thought on the wonderful chances of fate,
And went to the caucuses, pulled every wire,
Where he couldn't persuade, he got some one to hire.
He talked to the people, till many grew bold
In welding their own chains in which to be sold.
They rolled in petitions till all Congress saw
There was no other way than to give him the law.

Ah me! and alas! the Dark Ages came down
And settled and killed out all love from the town.

Say, have you heard men who are preaching this way,
Take down the old Bible, and read it, and pray?
Didn't God send the preachers to seek for lost souls?
What business have they to be wiring the polls?
For the old-time religion that springs up from love,
Is the only religion that's mentioned above.

THE Journal, of this city, has been publishing some pictures of the pope, taken by the "biograph," which represents him in action as he appears in the Vatican. Among other things the pictures show the papal benediction; so that by this bit of journalistic enterprise the papal benediction can be not only seen but actually received by people in this country; for Archbishop Martelli, asserts the Journal, "in a telegram to the editor, says that the benediction will give the same benefits to those who see it in the Mutoscope as if they actually received it from the holy father in person." And no doubt they will, every bit!

Notes from the W. C. T. U. Convention.

THE proceedings of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which closed November 16, in St. Paul, Minn., reveals the fact that this organization is composed of a band of women gathered from every state in the Union, and from almost every nation upon earth, who have not only set their faces as a flint against wrong, but who know the nature of the wrong against which they are battling, and whose tender hearts, and loving hands reach out to every human life.

The past year has been an eventful one for several reasons. The death of Miss Willard, February 17, caused a shock and gloom to fall on the organization such as it has never before realized, but each woman soon rallied to the support of the vice-president, and, as was often expressed, instead of Miss Willard's mantle falling upon any one person, each individual feels a new sense of responsibility to follow her as she followed Christ, and strive to make the work she loved a greater power for the good of humanity.

The retiring of the Temple Trust bonds was another event which caused considerable excitement, and will distinguish the past year from all others. The noble woman who was the builder of the temple, and who has stood so bravely for its interests through the bitter opposition of the past few years, is by no means discouraged even if the W. C. T. U. have dropped the temple as an affiliated interest, and determines to continue her work until the building is free of debt, and seems confident of success.

The reports from the different states showed quite an increase in membership during the past year. Indiana excelled all the other states in this respect, having gained one thousand new members. The finances of the organization are in a prosperous condition.

The reports from the various departments in the organization were full of interesting incidents, and show that a systematic work is going on for soldiers, sailors, and railroad officials. A vigorous effort is being made in behalf of purity in art and literature, and also to secure a law for the protection of Sunday observance. The national superintendent of the "Sabbath Observance" Department said, "There is no hope of destroying the Christian religion so long as the Christian Sabbath is acknowledged and kept by men as a sacred day. Hereafter the week following Easter week will be known as the week of prayer for the preservation and better observance of the Sabbath. This year we sent out 18,000 of our Lord's day leaflets—5,000 more than have ever been used before."

Dr. W. F. Crafts, who is quite prominent in W. C. T. U. ranks and conventions, stated that the reason he was present was because he could get more coöperation from them in his work than from any other organization in this country; for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the most aggressive body in making laws, and in getting them enforced, in the world. He said: "We are threatened, as a nation, by many evils, and not the least among these is the increased consumption of liquor, which is increasing at twice the rate of increase in population murders, lynchings, and municipal corruption. Sabbath-breaking, impurity and corrupt journalism are threatening evils. There are three necessities of life in a republic—intelligence, conscientiousness and a spirit of equality. In order to develop these the relation of master and servant must be broken every week by general observance of the Sabbath; and the day must also be protected from dissipation, that there may be opportunity for the mental and moral improvement of the masses. The Sabbath, as observed in Great Britain and the really American parts of America, makes men; while the holiday Sunday keeps the people that have it in childhood, forever at play."

It is a great cause of regret to the women that they are not yet permitted to wield the ballot, but they determined to persevere in their efforts to obtain this privilege.

Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens, of Maine, was elected president of the organization, and Miss Anna A. Gordon, of Illinois, vice-president, this being in harmony with the choice indicated by Miss Willard before her death.

The Church and State System in Utah.

THE Mormon system has been from the first a system which united church and state; like the papacy, it has made the church supreme in both religious and civil affairs. And in this respect Mormonism remains to-day what it was in the days of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young.

Under the control of this system, the territory of Utah was received into the Union as a sovereign state. The nation refused to receive polygamy, and compelled this (as it thought) to be thrown out; but it took in a union of church and state. And now it is discovering that this church-and-state system was the real evil of Mormonism, and the real argument against receiving the territory controlled by it into the Union. For it is now seen that the Mormon Church rules in Utah, and that under its rule the baneful branch of polygamy which was lopped off from the parent tree by the sword of the civil power, is budding into new life, and bids fair to develop again as of old. Upon this point the New York Independent, under the heading "Mormonism Again a Foe," speaks the following:—

"There has been a disposition among the Christian people of the nation not to judge the Mormon people too harshly since they professed humility and promised that they would abandon polygamy out of respect for American opinion and would never again countenance the union of church and state. Reports from Utah that they were breaking these pledges and that it was never intended to keep them have been received from time to time, but all have felt that the proof must be of the strongest before the nation would be justified in believing it must bring pressure to bear to compel good faith. The time seems to have come, however, when forbearance is no longer a virtue and when the Mormon problem must be faced without compromise and the Mormon people taught that Americans will not tolerate plural marriage within their country.

"The Mormons themselves have given us the convincing proof by sending to Congress an ardent polygamist, one who is thoroughly identified with Mormon interests, and who was elected after fair warning had been given that his triumph would be considered a notice that polygamy was to be forced 'down the throats of Congress and the American people.' He says he has taken no wives since the anti-polygamy manifesto, but was justified in maintaining his relations with those to whom he had been united before; and that the law against such association adopted by the Mormon legislature—like some Connecticut blue laws—is not enforced because there is no sentiment behind it. This contention, however, cannot be admitted, as the Mormon leaders and representatives pledged themselves again and again that the last vestige of the system had been wiped out before statehood was granted and that it should never rise again to plague the nation.

"What guaranty have we that the Mormons will obey one part of a statute more than another? If there is no public sentiment requiring the enforcement of a law against cohabitation with polygamous wives what sentiment will enforce one against the taking of more wives? When Mormon authorities and even the governor of Utah are engaged in flaunting the divinity of the 'celestial marriage' system, is it probable that they will long refrain from putting it into execution once more?

"It would be an affront to the American people and the Christian churches for Congress to allow Mr. Roberts to hold his seat in the House of Representatives in the face of his plain defiance of the national demands. It seems impossible that some means should not be found of unseating him without trouble under the former anti-polygamy laws, the amnesty proclamation of President Harrison and the enabling act of Utah, and this means should be taken without hesitation. The Mormon people should be shown that no polygamist will be seated in either house of Congress, as a warning that the nation is prepared to take stern measures against such a practice. Measures should be devised to punish those who do not heed the warning."

Mormonism is not "again" a foe; it has been such all the time; and the mistake of the American people was in not recognizing it as such, without polygamy the same as with it. For that mistake they may yet pay dearly. Mistakes made upon such a point are always costly.

The nation required the Mormon Church to discontinue polygamy and promise that it would never be revived. But the promise of a church that maintains a union with the state is not to be trusted. The American people apparently begin to realize that the promise of discarding polygamy is not to be kept, and it will be well if they discern the real reason why Mormonism has proved itself irreconcilable with American government.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 15.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

WE have seen that Jesus Christ is the Author of religious liberty; that he promulgated this principle, and practiced it himself, thus setting the example to his followers for all time. And we have seen that people cannot depart from this principle without being arrayed in that thing at least, against God and man.

The recognition of this principle means the recognition of the doctrine of separation of the church and the state. It is impossible to unite these two latter without subverting the former. Hence, in clearly-defined language, we find Christ teaching that church and state should be kept separate. This is found in Matt. 22:21. The facts that led up to the declaration of Christ in this scripture are these: Certain of the pharisees, having counselled how they might entangle Christ in his talk, sent their disciples and the Herodians with the question, "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar?" Their purpose of course was to get him to answer in the affirmative or negative. It mattered not to them which it should be. If he should say "Yes," then he would be denounced as a friend of the Roman Government—at the head of which was Cæsar, and the yoke of which the Jews hated—and therefore an enemy of the Jewish nation. If on the other hand Christ should answer "No," then he would be denounced as the enemy of the Roman Government. In either case the position of Christ would be punishable with death, and to bring this about was the very thing that the pharisees had planned and hoped for. "But Jesus perceived their wickedness and said, Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Show me the tribute money. And they brought him a penny. And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's."

Thus the Saviour exposed their hypocrisy and made them acknowledge that there were certain things belonging to Cæsar which common honesty demanded should be rendered to Cæsar. At the same time Christ told them that they should render to God the things that were God's.

What was true then is true now. The things of God and Cæsar cannot be mixed. Confusion would inevitably be the result, the climax being that neither God nor Cæsar would get that which was respectively theirs. Not only is this gospel truth, but common sense teaches it, and history proves it.

It requires no argument to prove that Cæsar represents the civil government. At the time of Christ, Cæsar was the representative of the civil government of Rome. The one stands for the other; hence their names are used synonymously. Therefore the only things that belong to Cæsar or to the civil government are the things which are purely civil. With civil things only can civil governments have rightfully anything to do. The things that are religious are to be rendered direct to God. It is clear therefore that when the civil government demands that which belongs to God, it puts itself in the place of God; and demanding the things that belong to God it is only a question of time when it will lose even the things which belong to itself. In other words, the time would come when a religious hierarchy would get the ascendancy, and control even those things that are civil, for its own ends.

In asserting the doctrine of separation of church and state, the Saviour also taught the doctrine that all men are equal—that the natural rights of all men are equal and inviolable. It could not be otherwise. The civil government is the “minister of God to thee for good.” In its proper place human government can be nothing else but good—no matter what the form of government might be. But they can be what they were intended to be only as they recognize the equality of all men. And the government that comes the nearest to recognizing this principle comes the nearest to the mind of Christ with reference to earthly governments; and so far as it is possible, would come the nearest to that divine government over which Christ is to rule when all earthly governments shall be no more. And the more the equal rights of all men are recognized by any government, the less tyrannical will that government be.

As in the matter of religious liberty, so of these things—they are the teachings of Jesus Christ. Both were denied by the papacy. But they were recognized by the founders of this Government, and incorporated into the fundamental law of the land; and this too with the express object of keeping out from governmental affairs the papacy or anything like the papacy, no matter what name it might go under.

Thus in the immortal Declaration of Independence we have the words, “We hold these truths to be self evident: that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.” And when the Constitution was framed, these principles, as stated above, were incorporated into it.

This is Christ-like. This is lamb-like. And, as we said last week, with reference to the question of religious liberty, so we now say with reference to the foregoing: the United States is the only Government in all history from the days of Christ down, that ever followed the example of Christ. And Bancroft spoke the truth when he said, “Vindicating the right of individuality even in religion, and in religion above all, the new nation dared to set the example of accepting in its relation to God the principle first divinely ordained in Judea.”

Thus it is proven conclusively that the United States is the government symbolized by the beast having the two horns like a lamb. Rev. 13:11.

The Sacred Right of Conscience.

IN “Legal Maxims,” compiled and published by Herbert Broom, LL. D., a London barrister, the right of conscience is upheld in the following words:—

“Summa ratio est quæ pro religione facit,—That rule of conduct is to be deemed binding which religion dictates.

“The maxim above cited from the commentaries of Sir E. Coke is in truth, derived from the Digest; where Papinian, after remarking that certain religious observances were favored by the Roman law, gives as a reason, Summan esse rationem quæ pro religione facit.

“It may, however, safely be affirmed that, if ever the laws of God and man are at variance, the former are to obeyed in derogation of the latter; that the law of God is, under all circumstances, superior in obligation to that of man; and that, consequently, if any general custom were opposed to the divine law, or if any statute were passed directly contrary thereto,—as if it were enacted generally, that no one should give alms to any object in ever so necessitous a condition,—such a custom, or such an Act, would be void.

“It may further be observed, that, upon these two foundations, the law of nature and the law of revelation, depend all human laws; that is to say, no human laws can be suffered to contradict these. For instance, in the case of murder: this is expressly forbidden by the divine, and demonstrably by the natural law, and if any human law should allow or enjoin us to commit it, we are bound to transgress that human law, or else we must offend both the natural and the divine. ‘Neither are positive laws, even in matters seemingly indifferent, any further binding than they are agreeable with the laws of God and nature.’

“It cannot, however, be doubted that obedience to the laws of our country, provided such laws are not opposed to the law of God, is a moral duty; and, therefore, although disobedience is justifiable in the one case supposed, of a contradiction between divine and human laws, yet this is not so either when the human law affirms the divine* in a matter not indifferent in itself,—as when it forbids theft, or when the human law commands or prohibits in a matter purely indifferent; and in both these cases it becomes a moral duty on the part of the subject to obey.”

These legal maxims constitute what may be called the classics of Anglo-Saxon law—the foundation principles established centuries ago, affirmed by the most celebrated legal authorities, and which have come down unchallenged to the present time. As such they are justly to be regarded as unquestionable authority.

*This is true as the authors meant it, but not as affirming that human law can rightfully affirm the law of God, as such.

ONE would almost think, from reading what is said by "patriotic" clergymen and others in reference to the late war, that the Almighty is enrolled in the military and naval forces of the nation. And all civilized nations appear to be equally sure that the Almighty is on their side. But the Omnipotent never joins any side. He only invites all men to join his side.

THE mistake that is made by modern reformers, said the Rev. W. M. Lawrence (Baptist) at a meeting of Chicago ministers, is that "they create great agitations regarding rum-selling and gambling, and endeavor to have laws made and enforced against these evils, without in reality making one man or woman better or more able to withstand temptation than he would be if there were no such laws enforced. The place to begin is with the individual. When you have made a sufficient number of individuals better you have removed just that number from the evil influences which are so loudly decried."

This is sound doctrine. The remedy, if it is to be effective, must be applied where the evil begins, which is in the individual heart.

ALTHOUGH but a few months ago no one in America dreamed that the United States would occupy the position as a world power that it does to-day, it is coming to be counted as an offense but little short of treason to advocate a continuance of the national policy that has been followed up to the time of the war with Spain. The Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, for uttering the words printed by us last week, warning against a departure from the principles of Government advocated in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, provoked a storm of hostile criticism from his brother clergymen, one of them going so far as to say that "If Dr. Parkhurst and Professor Norton talked in any other nation during a war as they had in this, they would have been tried for high treason." All this smacks of the despotic systems of the Old World, and is very significant.

THE editor of a Seventh-day Baptist paper reports that "A conversation with the secretary of the Philadelphia 'Sabbath Association,' after the public meeting, revealed the fact that he 'is hoping' to find three men in each of certain districts of the city who will unite, thus securing a hundred or more men who will push the work of compelling the city authorities to execute the Sunday laws against 'laundries,' Jewish clothing stores, and similar 'small fry.' Nothing appeared in his plans touching the agitation of the fundamental issues of the Sabbath question." There is renewed activity all over the country in agitating for a more rigid enforcement of laws for the observance of Sunday.

THE Evening Star, Washington, D. C., reports that a Catholic monastery is in process of erection in a suburb of that city,—the first of its kind to be erected in this country. It will be an imposing structure, and will have a chapel or church in close connection with it. It will be under the control of the "Franciscan Fathers of the Holy Land." The church is described as being remarkable for its "underground shrines and passages." The underground portion of Catholic churches and other edifices are usually well filled with rooms which are intended for uses that will not bear the test of public inspection.

ONE hundred pounds of earth from Jerusalem, gathered in the Garden of Gethsemane, recently came into the Chicago customs house, says the Chicago Times-Herald, brought in by an "eminent commander" of a Chicago Masonic order. The purpose of this remarkable importation is that members of this Order may have "holy dust" sprinkled on their biers after they are dead. The idea, it is said, "is destined to receive much attention all over the country and to be looked upon with great favor." This is all very fitting for a society which lives upon forms and ceremonies, and for such only. There is no holiness apart from God, and no ground was ever holy save as it was made so by his presence.

PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH, Toronto, gives his view of American imperialism, as exemplified in the trans-action relating to the Philippines, in the following:—

"It is edifying to mark how frankly the Spanish colonies are treated by the American jingoes as prizes captured in war, with which they are at liberty to deal just as they think fit, without the smallest regard for the rights or wishes of the native populations. The eight millions of Filipinos, who have been in arms for their own liberation, are regarded as part of the booty, to be kept, sold or transferred, just as the interest of the captor may dictate; yet the war was commenced with the most solemn disavowals of aggrandizement."

THE Chicago Times-Herald says that "the United States Government has still a large missionary work to perform in Cuba, and that is to teach the Cuban army first, and the Cuban people afterward, that a military government is not an acceptable substitute for republican government. We went to war because Spanish oppression and cruelty in Cuba had become intolerable. We do not propose that they shall be succeeded by Cuban oppression and cruelty." The meaning of which is that the American army must remain in Cuba until the Cubans give satisfactory evidence that they are able to govern themselves. Meanwhile American enterprises will obtain such a hold upon the island that it will be very difficult to convince a large class of enterprising and wealthy American citizens that Cuba ought ever to be released from Anglo-Saxon control.

THE following was printed, editorially, in the Pittsburg Catholic, of November 16:—

"A striking sermon on purgatory was within this month preached in the Catholic church. The Catholic doctrine on this subject was laid down in clear and explicit terms. They who were privileged to be present could not but realize the important duty devolving upon them, to be generous in their prayers, to storm heaven, as it were, by masses said and supplications for the souls in purgatory. By so doing the faithful people of God will find rest for themselves as well as for the suffering souls."

This is the precise doctrine, the preaching of which by Tetzels aroused the first active opposition of Martin Luther. To-day the Catholic Church uses this scheme to draw money from the pockets of the people without any particular protest being heard.

At a meeting called by colored people of Chicago to express their sentiments relative to the situation which has developed in the Carolinas, the following resolutions were passed, which, aside from the sentiment of regard for right and justice which they express, constitute a most forcible comment on the present pose of the nation as being divinely commissioned to propagate the principles of free and just government among the peoples of foreign lands:—

"WHEREAS, The campaign of crime and bloodshed prosecuted by the white people of North and South Carolina against colored citizens has resulted in the butchery of more than a score of unoffending men, women and children; and—

"WHEREAS, The openly avowed purpose of the white people to disfranchise colored voters and to drive colored men from positions in the public service has been successfully accomplished through arson, mob law, and murder; be it—

"Resolved, That the colored citizens of Chicago, in mass meeting assembled, respectfully appeal to the President of the United States to give the cause of these oppressed people the benefit of some recommendation in his next annual message to Congress, and we appeal to Congress to prosecute an investigation into the revolution in the Carolinas, and for the enactment of a statute which shall make representation in Congress dependent upon the number of qualified voters in the several states.

"Resolved, That we express ourselves as unalterably opposed to the acquisition of foreign territory until the nation shows its purpose and power to govern its people at home. A government which cannot protect its citizens under the shadow of the capitol ought not to assume to protect 10,000,000 of foreigners 8,000 miles away. (Italics ours.)

"Resolved, That we appeal to all fair-minded people for a patient consideration of the questions which agitate the nation, and, believing that the permanence and security of every nation must rest in the supremacy of the law, we earnestly bespeak for our race the support of public sentiment in our contest against mob law everywhere, whether assailing our right to vote in North Carolina or denying us the right to work in Illinois.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, properly engrossed, be sent to the President of the United States, a copy to each member of the Illinois delegation in Congress, and copies to the Chicago press."

The Crime of Picking Apples on Sunday.

"New York Journal," December 1.

HAS a man the right to pick apples on Sunday on his own farm? That is the question which will engage the attention of the Westchester County Grand Jury next Monday.

Mrs. Winifred Horton, an aged and pious resident of Sing Sing, says that such conduct is unlawful, and makes a specific accusation against her former neighbor, Andrew Eck. She charges that on Sunday, September 18, she was walking in her garden when she saw Farmer Eck come out of his house, go to his orchard and then and there pick several ripe apples from an overhanging limb.

Mrs. Horton knew that Farmer Eck was doing wrong, so she went to the office of Justice Stuart Baker, in Sing Sing, and informed him of the culpable act. Justice Baker, also esteemed for his piety, carefully considered the merits of the case and concluded to sustain the charge.

He issued a warrant for the arrest of Farmer Eck, and when it was served the old gentleman nearly collapsed. He appeared with the constable before the Justice, who, puzzled as to what sentence to impose, released the prisoner on $20 bail.

County Judge Smith Lent, of Westchester County, a resident of Sing Sing, finally heard of the case and ordered that the Grand Jury investigate it.

The action of Judge Lent was highly pleasing to Farmer Eck, who did not want the charge hanging over him, and who is confident that he will not be indicted for taking his own fruit from his own tree, even on a Sunday, in the presence of a pious woman.

Mrs. Horton will go to White Plains to tell her side and sustain the charge. Since it was made there has not been the best of neighborly feeling between the farmer and Mrs. Horton; in fact, they have ceased to speak as they pass by.

The War of Principle.—No. 10.

"ALECK, do you really believe that men to-day must have the experience of the apostles in order to be true to truth? Do you not think that there is in noble men the innate self-control and power to stand for principle without a conscious endowment of heavenly power? Hasn't education and civilization, by bringing before the world noble ideals, wrought a change in men, so that they not only can be true to truth, but would scorn to be otherwise?"

"Well, Cecil, you have asked me three questions all at once. First, do I think it necessary to have the apostolic experience to be true to truth? Yes, I do. For the second question, I believe that all the nobleness men possess is given by the Holy Spirit; and third, that the very idea of education and civilization are results of its working. When men scorn to be untrue, they have been conscious or unconscious recipients of divine power; and that in this day, as well as long ago, the hope of nobility is found alone in a heavenly endowment.

"Now, Cecil, let us follow the disciples in their experience. We have seen their cowardice, their fear of man, their weakness, duplicity, selfish meanness, their desertion of Christ in the hour of his greatest need."

"Aleck, a new thought has come to me. Do you think that all men would show the same weakness of character, were they tried as the disciples were?"

"No doubt, Cecil. Put to the test, we should find out the truth about ourselves, and self-trust, self love, self-sufficiency, would be mightily shaken."

"I can see that their experience must have wrought deep humility in them, and a feeling of need for a better support than they had in themselves."

"Cecil, that is the only object of the trials that come to men. The loving Father knows we are deceived in ourselves, and has to permit these trials to come in order that we may be convinced of the truth. It is not to give us a painful sense of our weakness and to sink us in despair; but rather, that knowing our insufficiency, we may make connection with him, and be divinely sustained. Love invites us to his heart. It is beautiful to think of."

"Aleck, I never thought I should want to be divinely sustained. I supposed I was strong in myself; but now I begin to feel a desire to find out if I am weak, and if so, to be in conscious touch with God."

"Dear friend, I knew you would come to this desire. Are you willing to be tested? Can you sing,

"Nearer my God, to thee, nearer to thee, E'en though it be a cross that raiseth me?"

"I do not know, Aleck; I tremble at the cost of the experience. But I am willing to pray to be made willing."

"Ask, and ye shall receive," said Aleck, "that's what the disciples did."

"Yes; but they came with a full knowledge of their weakness, while I am only beginning to suspect mine."

"Never mind, Cecil. As you are able to bear the revelation, God will let you see the truth.

"Now let us turn to Acts and see how the disciples obtained the promise of power. Perhaps it is essential for you to have a knowledge of the power that may be yours before your test comes, that you may know a way from despair. When the disciples went back from Olivet, how did they feel?"

"They went back rejoicing," said Cecil. "How puzzling their appearance must have been to those who thought their cause lost, their King crucified, and their kingdom a myth."

"Indeed it must have been so, especially as they had not yet received the power to be witnesses of what they knew was truth.

"What did they do, Cecil? Read Acts 1:14."

"And they continued in prayer and supplication. Why did they need to pray, Aleck?"

"To realize their own need that they might appreciate the blessing, and know that its source was God. For ten days they prayed together with one accord. No jealousy, no envy, no evil surmising kept them apart. And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, what happened? Read Acts 2:2."

"And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a mighty rushing wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting . . . and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost." What a strange experience!"

"Yes; it was wonderful. But its results were more wonderful. The Spirit is a strengthener of the inner man,—of the character. It renews us into the image of Him who created us. Christ said that the Spirit would lead into all truth; that it would glorify him, take his things and shew them unto us, bring gifts by which our ministry would be increased and made effectual.

"Now let us notice the change in these once wavering disciples. They were no longer afraid to witness for Christ. They began to speak with tongues, and men of every nation came to hear their testimony."

"The Jews didn't stop them after all, not even by crucifying Christ," said Cecil.

"Stop them? No. How much better for them if they had taken the advice of Gamaliel, who said, Let them alone. If this is of God, it cannot be overthrown.' You have here another illustration of the inefficiency of human power, the fatality of trusting in it. Of what avail was the execution of the human law? A power greater than man's natural fear of power in man took possession of Christ's followers, and men flocked to hear their witness. The fearful Peter who had denied his Lord, boldly tells the truth, declaring them the malefactors in putting to death the Prince of life and glory. He had overcome the fear of man and of devils by the power of the Holy Ghost."

"It was a grand exhibition. I wish I had been there," said Cecil. "More than that, Aleck, I wish I had been Peter himself. I glory in such courage, such truth and zeal."

"Well, Cecil, it is all for us. The promise is to us, and to as many as the Lord our God shall call, and it is, I am convinced, the only power by which feeble, fallen man may be a victor over the power of the world, the flesh and the devil. This is the power that is for those who will cast aside human dependence, and who will rely wholly on the power of God."

"Yes," said Cecil, "and that is to be strengthened with all power by the Spirit in the inner man. I wish it were mine; for indeed, Aleck, I do want to be true to truth."

Studies in French History.—50.

"NOW THAT the great Colbert was dead," began the professor, "the king—Louis XIV., remember—appointed a man named Louvois, as minister of war, and to this man he listened, and to him gave his confidence, just the same as to Colbert."

"I hope he was wise and kind," remarked Milly.

"Well, Milly, when I tell you that it was partly through his influence that the king did the terrible thing of revoking the Edict of Nantes,—a deed which made the nations of Europe tremble,—you will, I suppose, decide, and that justly, that he was neither kind nor wise."

"I've forgotten about the Edict of Nantes," said Joe Palmeter, "will you please tell us something about it?"

"Perhaps Joseph remembers who issued this edict, and for what purpose. Will you tell us what you may remember about it, Joseph?"

"I believe Henry of Navarre first issued it," replied Joe, "so that Protestants might have the freedom of worshipping God as they chose."

"Yes; you remember that he favored the Protestants and part of the time professed that religion. So he made a decree that they should have religious liberty. And this, people considered a very great liberty—a very great privilege indeed. Nevertheless this edict had stood and was binding from the time of its being given until after the death of Colbert."

"I suppose Louvois must have been a very devoted Catholic, and may be he thought he was doing right to influence the king against the Protestants," suggested Julia March.

"It is well to be as charitable as possible toward all men, Julia; but it is a fact, however, that this man did not care for any religion at all. He was a quarrelsome, impulsive, ambitious man, who loved to fight better than he loved peace. His influence added to that of Madam de Maintenon was that which induced the king to again begin the miserable business of persecuting people who did not agree with him in points of religious belief. Although the king's measures were at first quite mild, they continued to grow more and more intolerant. At last the king wrote an order like this: 'All women, not noble, found at such assemblies [Protestant meetings], shall be whipped and branded with the fleur-de-lis.'"

"Why, I thought King Louis XIV. was such a polite man; I supposed he was very chivalrous," said Maggie Palmeter.

"He was, indeed; so much so that he would always take off his hat to a servant girl, and yet he so far forgot himself as to persecute women as well as men most cruelly."

"Did they succeed, finally, professor, in their object, of crushing out the religion of the Huguenots?"

"O no; but still, after a long time of the most cruel persecution and torture, thousands of people renounced the religion of their fathers, and professed Catholicism,—not because they were convinced of its righteousness, but only because they felt that they could endure torture no longer."

"I don't see why people could not always be contented to convert men as the apostle did. You know professor, he said he didn't believe in forcing people, but in coaxing or convincing them. There's a verse in the Bible that is right to the point, only I can't think of it," said Julia March.

"I presume the verse to which you refer is this one: 'Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men,' answered the teacher. "But after the revocation of this famous Edict of Nantes, which occurred in 1685, and which was really about the same as signing the death warrant of all Huguenots who would not recant, it was decided by the foolish king and his cruel advisers that they could improve upon the apostle's manner of making conversions; so they went about compelling men instead of persuading them. The ministers of the offending denomination were given only two weeks to leave the country. But because they so dreaded to leave their poor people, some of them refused to go, so they were tortured and hanged and put upon the wheel and broken—which was a mode of punishment only meted out to criminals."

"O!" exclaimed Milly Brown. "Why didn't they run away out of the country?"

"Thousands of them did, though they were even forbidden to do that. Finally, some of the countries of Europe formed a grand alliance against Louis. But he, anticipating an attack, sent soldiers over into Germany, and literally destroyed the district of Palatinate, leaving 100,000 people homeless wanderers."

"I suppose the poorer classes in France felt the horrors of war about as much as the ones whom their soldiers were fighting, after all, didn't they?" asked practical Jack.

"Almost, Jack; for after peace was declared in 1697 the country was in such a low condition that the highest wages paid a laborer was only about eight cents a day."

"What could they have had to eat? I don't see how they could have bought themselves food at all."

"They lived mostly upon rye porridge. But even though they could not afford meat for themselves, they were obliged to furnish it for the soldiers."

"Dear me! I am really weary of hearing about war. I did hope France settled down at last, and didn't need any more soldiers," said Julia March.

"It is sad, indeed, Julia, that the pages of history must be so marred. But, O no; the war of the 'Spanish Succession' was soon begun, between France and Germany,—Louis determining that his grandson Philip, should sit upon the Spanish throne, and the emperor of Germany determining that this honor belonged to his son."

"What a foolish thing to fight over!" exclaimed Charlie White.

"Foolish indeed to fight over for ten years; after some years of fighting, Louis was obliged to endure the humiliation, because England and Germany were both against her,—of seeing the son of the German emperor take the Spanish throne. The year 1708-9 was noted as being the most terribly cold winter that France had known in many years. Charlie and Rob can understand, because they have seen the River Rhine, and know what a rushing, rapidly flowing river it is, that the weather must have been very cold to lock its surging waters with a key of frost."

"I don't see how it could be cold enough for that, professor," said Rob Billings. "It did not look as if it could ever hold still long enough to be frozen."

"But the cold weather was not the only trouble. This was a year of horrible famine. Even the king sacrificed his silver and gold dishes to be made into money, to buy food for the poor. So let us credit him with doing this good deed."

"Finally, although at first the fortunes of war turned in favor of Germany, Louis was at last successful, and so his grandson, Philip the Fifth, was seated upon the throne of Spain, and the war of the Spanish Succession came to an end in 1713.

"Next week I will ask Julia March to tell us something about the death of Louis XIV."

Mrs. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Satellites and Suns.

"MARY shined at school to-day 'cause I telled her how," would fittingly express the position which many people occupy in the world. They seem to shine, but they borrow all their brilliancy from those more luminous than themselves. They go through life just as the indolent student goes through college—never quite able to stand upon their own merits, wrestling with each difficult problem until it is mastered, but always depending upon somebody else to light up the dark corners of their inactive minds, and thus help them to "shine."

A satellite is never radiant only as the light from some luminous body shines upon it; all the brilliancy which it seems to possess is a mere reflection. When we behold the "moon's full orb" at night, we say it shines; but further investigation proves that all its radiance is borrowed from the sun. There are people in the world who, upon first acquaintance, seem to shine, but their radiance will not bear the test of investigation. These human satellites revolve about, making many good pretensions, and are eager to be among the first to set before the public philanthropic plans, etc., which some star of the first magnitude has perseveringly devised. Such people are to church and society what the drone is to the hive: they occupy space, do a great deal of buzzing, and carefully avoid work. They do not know just what attitude to assume in regard to questions which arise from time to time, which pertain to personal or public good, although weighty consequences may hang upon their decision;—these human satellites are decidedly opaque until some influential soul "tell's them how" to shine. They love to be popular, to go with the masses, and to abide by the opinions and decisions of those whom the world recognizes as leaders.

And how easy it is to become a satellite,—to do as others do, simply because others do that way, thus casting our influence whichever way will insure to us the greatest social standing. If a temperance or religious question confronts us, instead of searching carefully and prayerfully for ourselves to know what the Word of God, the only criterion, really teaches, how much more agreeable to the human heart to trace an interlinear wrought out by some popular religious teacher, and thus place ourselves where we may easily be "carried about by every wind of doctrine." Instead of seeking earnestly for God's solution of every problem which comes to us in life's experience, it is so much easier to consult the key of some mortal man, and accept his solution as authority.

Ah! the human satellite is the heart unrenewed by the grace of God; it is the abode of darkness. It is like the arc lamp which has no connection with the source of power, but which, the moment the connection is made, sends forth its precious gleams in every direction. The convict in the dungeon cell, wholly shut away from the sunlight which causes the flowers to bloom and flourish just outside the wall, is so near the light, yet knows only darkness. And there is just as really a wall of sin separating the unbelieving soul from the divine rays of the Sun of righteousness, which cause the Christian to grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. It is only a step from the darkness to the light: "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The moment we reach the exit of a tunnel we are in the light. The moment we confess our sins, that moment we are cleansed—we are called "out of darkness into His marvelous light." The arc lamp receives its illumination from within, and radiates its light to the outer world. So it is with the human heart when it is emptied of self and filled with the Holy Spirit: it must shine, for the power of God is there; and "in him is no darkness at all." The influence of such a soul constantly tends to lead others to forsake the ways of sin. Of such, Jesus says, "Ye are the light of the world." The Holy Spirit abiding in the heart makes it luminous, as a light upon a candlestick, which "giveth light unto all that are in the house."

"Only a step to Jesus"—but how contrary to human pride to take it; and yet how many in the whirl of society to-day realize that the pleasures of the world are empty—bubbles upon the rough sea of life, which fail to satisfy the longings of the soul. How many a youth inwardly admires the character of the follower of Christ, and really covets the sweet peace which he daily enjoys. But how many, instead of surrendering self, seek to ease conscience by good works, and continue to dwell in darkness, knowing nothing of the inward illumination of the heart, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. They may even put forth efforts to rescue souls from sin; but some way their efforts prove fruitless. They fail to dispel the shadows of evil from the inmost soul.

Ah! selfishness shines only outwardly. All its good works are but imitations of the fruits of the Spirit. But how hard it is to cut loose from the world, to exchange the life of sin for one of righteousness. But those who choose the "pleasures of sin for a season," who shine merely outwardly, will never participate in the joys of eternity. There will be no satellites in the galaxy of heaven. Every soul that shall help constitute that company of immortal beings, to shine "as the stars forever and ever," will have known what it was to be emptied of self and filled with the Holy Spirit. They will have done good works because the Spirit impelled them to do so. They will have won souls to Christ because the Christ Spirit dwelling within drew them by the "cords of love."

Christ could reach forth a rescuing hand to the poorest of the poor; and he who has the Spirit of Christ dwelling within, can reach down to the lowest depths of iniquity and point the vilest sinner to a seat reserved for him at God's right hand—if he will only take it. And there is more real joy in rescuing one sinner than there is in all the pleasures of the world. The sweet singer of ancient Israel appreciated the superior joys of the Christian when he said: "I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

There are many satellites in the world to-day whose seeming radiance will soon go out in oblivion. But, precious thought, there are many suns in the human constellation whose brilliancy is destined to "shine more and more unto the perfect day." The all important decision rests with each soul whether he will be a satellite or a sun.

—An Ideal Book of Travel.—

BY LAND AND SEA

A JOURNEY THROUGH FIVE CONTINENTS.

STARTING from the interior of the United States, the reader quickly finds himself transported, as it were, to the scenes of the journey, the several stopping places being California, Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, India, Egypt, Palestine, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Denmark, England, and Holland. The aim of the narrative, which has been written almost wholly from original notes and observations, has been especially directed to the object of presenting the life and nature of those regions, apart from the mental instruction and its inherent features of intellectual entertainment. The author has happily found, in the object lessons of life under its various phases and conditions, illustrations of moral truths, which are portrayed in a manner at once instructive and attractive. The book contains 392 pages, embellished with over 100 original, full-page engravings designed especially for this work, and numerous part-page illustrations, and is furnished in the following bindings:—

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 8, 1898.

READ carefully the article, "A Revolutionary Proceedure," p. 758.

It is in order now for some one to suggest an appropriate name for the new "world power" which has taken Spain's colonies in the West Indies and the far East, and Hawaii. "The United States of America" is now an outgrown designation. A new title for the chief executive will also be in place.

THE United States Government gives to Spain $20,000,000 for the Philippine group of islands, with all that is on them. For this sum, besides the land and its natural wealth, eight million human beings have been transferred from the rule of Spain to that of the United States, with as much deference to their own wish in the matter as if they had been "the cattle upon a thousand hills." Yet it had been supposed that the days of buying and selling beings made in the image of God, under the authority of the United States of America, had forever passed away.

THE effort to force Sunday observance upon the seventh-day people and others of Ford's Store, Md., appears to be growing in intensity and bitterness. The intolerant ones now say that they will petition the next legislature to enact a law by which people who are religiously opposed to the dogma that Sunday is the Christian Sabbath, and refuse to observe it as such, will be sent to the workhouse, there to work out the amount of their fines and costs at hard labor.

Another incident which illustrates the spirit that is behind this effort to maintain the "sanctity of the Christian Sabbath," is that Mr. Neal, whose trial and conviction for Sunday work we have already noted, was not tried under the Sunday law, but under a law for regulating the sale of goods, he being a storekeeper.

Under this law a heavier penalty could be secured than under the Sunday law, his fine amounting to twenty dollars, while the maximum fine under the Sunday law, for the first offense, is but five dollars. Mr. Neal's offense was that of selling goods on Sunday, and his prosecutors found some means of convicting him under this law which provided the heavier penalty. His fine, however, was paid by some one whose identity remains unknown; consequently Mr. Neal was released.

WHETHER the church in Cuba, or the Philippines, or anywhere else, prospers or goes down, is not a question with which the United States Government, or any government, has rightfully any concern. Whether or not it would be for the benefit of the Cubans to maintain the Catholic Church in the island, is a religious question, depending altogether upon the truth or falsity of religious doctrine; and when the Government undertakes to uphold the church in Cuba it assumes as true that which can be demonstrated as true or false only by the divine Spirit of truth. It has no shadow of right to meddle in such matters. It has no business whatever to consult with Catholic church officials, or any other church officials, concerning the affairs of the Catholic or any other church in Cuba or the Philippines, or anywhere else. The maintenance of a church is purely a church affair, and the Government is undertaking to do in Cuba that which devolves upon the Catholic Church alone. What business has it to make itself the servant of the Catholic Church? What business has it to compel Protestants to support the Catholic Church in Cuba, by taxing them for its maintenance, under the plea of a "temporary loan"? Reader, what do you think of these things?

News from France is of the gravest character,—the republic is liable at any time to be swept away by the military power. The London Spectator, of December 3, declared, "It is our sincere belief that a great event is immediately at hand in France." And the French premier, M. Dupuy, is quoted thus: "We have been living for twenty-eight years upon a pious misunderstanding, and it is surprising that it can have lasted so long. We have placed side by side an army and a democracy. Now it is only too true that these two institutions have as their foundation contradictory principles." The acuteness of the present situation lies in the fact that the military, under the lead of General Zurlinden, is determined that Colonel Picquart, under arrest for complicity in the Dreyfus affair, shall be tried by court-martial December 12, and the Government wishes to postpone the trial but does not dare to do so.

MR. W. T. STEAD, the well-known English journalist, has been making a general tour of Europe, and tells what he found the general sentiment of Europe to be with reference to the new American policy of "expansion." He says:—

"Outside of England I have not met a single non-American who was not opposed to the expansion of America. Nor through my whole tour of Europe have I met a European who did not receive the protestations of the genuine sincerity with which the Americans entered upon the war with more or less mock incredulity."

And, adds the Times-Herald (Chicago), which published the above, "Mr. Stead reports that the bitterest hostility of all was found at the Vatican." That the Vatican should be hostile to the policy of despoiling the most faithful Catholic nation of her colonies, is altogether natural, and taken in connection with Mr. Stead's positive affirmation, may be regarded as conclusive evidence of the fact, notwithstanding representations made by Catholic authorities in this country. And now that American government is being extended to Catholic lands, Rome will work with redoubled energy to remodel that government upon the principles of the papal church.

AMERICAN SENTINEL

"IF ANY MAN HEAR MY WORDS, AND BELIEVE NOT, I JUDGE HIM NOT."—Jesus Christ.

VOLUME 13.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 15, 1898.

NUMBER 49.

THE only Christian nation recognized in Scripture is "the righteous nation, which keepeth the truth."

THE best patriotism is that which covers the widest territory.

THE Supreme Court decision that "this is a Christian nation," will scarcely serve as a passport into the Christian's final abode.

THE Christian principle which debars Christians from participation in politics, is the only safeguard of the nation to-day against a religious despotism.

THE national drink of a truly Christian nation is not beer nor whiskey, but the water of the "river of life."

A GOD of love cannot be harnessed to a government of force.

THE Supreme Court for the decision of matters pertaining to Christianity is located not on this earth, but above.

NO GOVERNMENT can be perfect in which love is not recognized as law.

THE person who counts it a crime for another person to differ from his views in regard to moral duty, is not a safe person to entrust with the responsibilities of public office.

man conscience, guided by the Word and Spirit of truth; and with that conscience, so guided, the civil power can interfere only at the expense of that which it is instituted to preserve.

THE side of right will long outlast the side of the majority.

A CHRISTIAN NATION IN NAME, BUT NOT IN FACT.

THE Supreme Court of the United States has declared that "this is a Christian nation," and this pronouncement is quoted by advocates of religious legislation as being a statement of truth, which all are bound to recognize as such. But it is well known that the nation spends hundreds of millions of dollars every year for whiskey and tobacco; that it seeks after the pleasures of the world far more than after the things of God; and that it follows the fashions of the world rather than the simplicity and humility that were in Christ. If this "Christian nation" were to come up to the gates of the city of God, as depicted in the illustration, it would find itself debarred by its own practices from entering the abode prepared of God for Christians. Their own love of the pleasures and fashions of the world, and of unsanctified indulgences, would turn such people back from the holy city, and demonstrate the emptiness of a Supreme Court decision upon such a point.

THE idea of a God who is omniscient and omnipotent cannot be reconciled with the idea that he has left his will to be enforced by such bodies as human legislatures.

ENFORCED Sabbath observance is a tribute only to the god of force.

THE greatest conservator of justice in the world is not civil law, but the hu-

Some Pertinent Questions.

IN view of the expressed purpose of the United States Government, to support the Catholic Church in Cuba, by a "temporary loan" from the public treasury, it is in order for American citizens to ask the following questions:—

1. Have the Cubans themselves expressed any desire for the support of the Catholic Church? or is this to be done only in deference to the wish of Catholic prelates in the United States?
2. What evidence is there that the Catholic Church in Cuba is not rich enough to support herself?
3. If the Catholic Church in Cuba cannot support herself, does not the burden of her maintenance properly fall upon the Catholic Church outside of Cuba?
4. If the Government ought to support the Catholic Church in Cuba, because she is poor, ought it not to support poor Catholic churches in the United States?
5. Why should the Government support only the Catholic Church in Cuba, and not the Methodist, the Baptist, Episcopal, and all other churches in the same land?
6. To what benefits can the Government point as certain to result from its support of the Catholic Church?
7. Since no government maintains any other than the established church, is not the Roman Catholic Church virtually made by this support the established church of the United States?
8. If "this is a Christian nation," is it not a Catholic Christian nation when it supports the Catholic Church and no other?
9. By what clause of the Constitution is the Government authorized to give or loan money to the Catholic Church?
10. Has the Government any right to tax the people for the maintenance of any church?
11. Is it still an approved principle of American government that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed?
12. If the government can compel people to pay taxes for the support of the Catholic Church in Cuba, can it not by the same authority and right compel them to perform any other religious act?

These are pertinent questions. They apply to a real situation which now confronts the American people. The germ of despotism which is being nourished in this proposition to support the Catholic Church, will surely grow to full development if the people allow it. To nip despotism in the bud is far easier and better than to cut it down after it has become a giant tree.

The Necessity of "Imperialism."

OF the zeal for the spread of slavery, in his day, Abraham Lincoln said:—

"I hate it because of the monstrous injustice of slavery itself. I hate it because it deprives our republican example of its just influence in the world; . . . and especially because it forces so many really good men among ourselves into an open war with the very fundamental principles of civil liberty, criticising the Declaration of Independence."

This exactly describes the new American policy of imperialism. This also is causing many to "criticise the Declaration of Independence." Leading men and leading papers, of the country, who would naturally be thought ready to keep silent when the Declaration speaks, actually criticise it, and in fact repudiate it.

The statement that is now so glibly and superciliously made that the people of the newly-acquired territory "are not fit for self government" and must therefore be held in subjection and governed by force "until they shall become qualified for self-government," plainly cannot stand a moment in the presence of the great principles of the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal, and are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." And simply because such views cannot stand in the presence of the Declaration, the Declaration is criticised and set aside.

But who is it that decides for the people of the new island possessions, that they "are not fit for self-government"?—Not themselves; for they have been fighting and struggling for years against that very claim put forth by Spain and others. Has the statement any more truth when put forth by Americans, contrary to their own Declaration and fundamental principles? What right have Americans, any more than Spaniards or Russians, to decide for other people that they are not fit for self-government? Wherein is America different from Russia or Spain when she decides for these people that they are not fit for self-government, and then counts them rebels, and fights them and oppresses them, when they do not accept the decision?

Plainly enough this whole thing, being in open disre-garg of the Declaration of Independence, is an "open war with the fundamental principles of civil liberty," and positively "deprives republican example of its just influence in the world." And as that which did all this in Lincoln's day was hated by that great lover of liberty, why should not this which does the same things in our day be hated by every lover of liberty now?

In his day Lincoln said that the Declaration of Independence was "assailed and sneered at, and construed and hawked at, and torn, till if its framers could rise from their graves they could not at all recognize it." That thing is being done again. At that time it was done in the interests of the spread of slavery; now it is done, and has to be done, in the interests of imperialism. At that time Lincoln said, "If that Declaration is not the truth, let us get the statute book, in which we find it, and tear it out! Who is so bold as to do it? If it is not true, let us tear it out!" And when, at such a suggestion, his audience cried out, "No, no!" Lincoln answered, "Let us stick to it then; let us stand firmly by it then." And so it is time to say again.

For ten years it has been written that the United States would yet "repudiate every principle of a republican government." If we are not just now in the time when this thing is being done, how much further will things have to be carried in this direction before we shall be in the time of the doing of that thing?

A. T. J.

Imperialism a Menace to American Women.

"Union Signal."

It is to be noted that not only are our statesmen discussing the merits and demerits of that new issue in American politics, the "expansion" policy, and its consequence, an increased standing army, but that the brain which is behind the hand that rocks the cradle and—we are told—rules the world, is giving considerable thought to the subject also. And it is a question quite within the legitimate sphere of womankind, even though that sphere may be regarded as bounded by the four walls of home. Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, considering the subject of imperialism in a pertinent article entitled, "The Manifest Destiny of Women," published in a New York paper, points out that colonial interests would mean to America, as it means to England, a loss of balance between the sexes at home, and that the resultant economic conditions are such as to draft women into the industrial army to fill the gaps made by a large standing army and a big navy. Women do not weep and wait while men go a-soldiering, but they go forth to fight the battle of life in field and factory. Mrs. Blatch concludes with these words: "Do the women of America wish to outnumber the men of their country; do they wish prostitution to increase; do they wish to be pushed out of their work of home-building into that of field and factory? If not, the time has come, especially for the women of the working classes, to make their voices heard, and tell their men-folk that it is not the nation's destiny to raise the Philipinos and lower their own women to the level of Continental Europe."

THE ship of state of the American Republic seems about to be made over into a man-of-war.

Christian Martyrdom in Russia.

"Bible Echo," Melbourne, Aus.

A BOOK, bearing the above title, has come to the editor's table. It gives an account of a people in Russia, numbering over 20,000, and known by the name of Doukhobortski, or spirit-wrestlers. Bitter persecution has fallen upon them of late, owing to the fact that they refuse to serve as soldiers in the Russian army. They appear to be a simple-minded people who regard the human family in the light of a brotherhood. They are sober and industrious, and take no part in the amusements of worldly people. They use no flesh as food, drink no wine, and refrain from all that leads to a dissipated life. They worship no images, pay all state taxes, but refuse to obey when called to take up arms. Because of this, many of them have been imprisoned, and the treatment they have received from Russian officials, if the statements are true, is horrifying and inhuman. Their condition at present is most distressing, and they are seeking opportunity to emigrate to some other country. The following extract from the book, page 43, will illustrate their position before the law:—

"What are you?"

"We are Christians."

"What sort of Christians?"

"Do you not know what Christians are? A Christian is one who believes in Christ Jesus and fulfills the commandments of God."

"Whose subjects are you, the Turkish Sultan's or the Emperor of Russia's?"

"As a matter of form we pay tribute to the Czar of Russia, but we are the subjects of Jesus Christ."

"And on whose land do you live?"

"We live on God's earth."

"And whom do you obey?"

"We obey Him on whose land we live."

"As you live on God's earth and obey him, I suppose you do not acknowledge the emperor?"

"We do not take the emperor's title from him; as he has been emperor in the past, so let him be in the future. But God created the earth and all that live on the earth."

"Then as you do not refuse to recognize the emperor, why do you renounce your duties as soldiers?"

"It is not in our power to serve as soldiers, because we are Christians, and a Christian ought not to do violence to his enemies, but to give full liberty to every living being, and not to kill his brother."

"Where did you get this from? Did some one teach you so?"

"We got it from the commandments of God; for the sixth commandment says, 'Thou shalt not kill.' As Christians are not allowed under any circumstances to kill a man, we consider it wicked. To us all men are brothers."

"LORD, LORD," exclaimed the moral-reform-by law advocate as he stood before the closed door of the Master's wedding feast, "I have not only kept Sunday myself, but I have made other people keep it too!" But his Lord replied, "I never knew you, your Sabbath, nor your gospel of force. Depart from me."

Education and Good Government.

THE Minneapolis (Minn.) Times, discussing the question of patriotism in the public schools, says that "every child should be taught that the chief mission of the public schools is to educate American citizens to an intelligent discharge of their grave and responsible duties, and adds:—

"But if the public schools are to do this—and we see there is no other reason for their existence—they must do more than raise flags. They must make the duties of citizenship the chief feature of their curriculum for all pupils who have advanced beyond the acquirement of the merest rudiments of an English education. The children should not only be taught something of our history but a good deal about our system of government. They should be taught the distinction between federal and state governments, where the power of the one ends and the other begins; they should be given an intelligent notion of municipal government, including the township, county, and city, and they should be given practical lessons in depositing the ballot, so that when at the age of twenty-one they graduate into citizenship they may be able to at least deposit their own ballots without requiring the assistance of a ward heeler."

But why not go back to the beginning and teach the children something about the foundation principles of free government? Why not teach them that they—and all others—possess certain unalienable rights; that to preserve these is the only proper purpose of government; and that respect for the rights of those around them constitutes the best evidence of their fitness to be entrusted with the duties of citizenship.

There are "educated" men in all parties,—men who understand "the distinction between federal and state governments," and know all about municipal government and how to deposit their ballots without assistance; but bad government prevails in spite of it all. In all parties the educated man and the ignorant man vote the same ticket; in each one intelligence and ignorance go side by side, and often hand in hand. The state political boss is always a man of education and "intelligence." But he is not a man who has respect for the principles of free government. In his practice he repudiates the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence.

The intelligence that counts for good government is that which comprehends the proper purpose of civil government and prizes civil and religious freedom; and that not only for one's self, but for all others. But such an education is beyond the power of mere secular teaching to supply. It demands that love of right and justice which can be supplied only from above.

The principles of free government are gospel principles; and only through the gospel is the ideal of such government to be attained.

Echoes from the Southern Hemisphere.

BY JOHN MCCARTHY.

THE City of Rosario, Provincia Santa Fé, Argentine Republic, was visited on the 9th of this month (October) by the Roman Catholic bishop, Dr. Bones. The streets were splendidly adorned in honor of his visit, and bands of music were waiting his arrival at the station. Among the many written mottoes, and inscriptions stretched from one side of the street to the other, was one which said, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Thus we see the propensity of the human heart is to exalt man, even unto the place which should be occupied by the Saviour of mankind only.

UPON the 21st of August last, the first Evangelical meeting was held in Puerto Rico. Many attempts had previously been made to establish Protestant worship there; but up till now these had never met with success. We believe the day is dawning for Puerto Rico, and that soon the gospel rays of truth will illuminate many precious souls there, who are now in error's night.

ABOUT fifteen years ago, when General Roca occupied the presidential chair in Buenos Aires, he was compelled by force of circumstances to return to the papal nuncio, Bishop Mattera, his credentials and passports. The latter had made himself obnoxious to the country by continually throwing impediments in the way of every reform that was introduced; and by threatenings of excommunication, sought to intimidate the members of congress and prevent the enactment of liberal laws in opposition to the will of the Catholic Church. Since that time General Roca has been looked upon as a very disobedient child, by the pope of Rome, and by some it is said he has been cursed in Rome by the bell, book, and candle. However, for the space of fourteen or fifteen years, no papal nuncio has taken up residence here to represent the pope before this government. Nevertheless it is now well known that much communication is taking place between the Argentine Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Vatican, with the object of again establishing diplomatic relations with the pope.

RECENTLY the Church of England Missionary Society has sent a medical missionary, with several medical students, in their third and fourth year, and three evan-gelsists, to evangelize the Gran Chaco. So far their efforts have been crowned with success, since they have gained access to several semi-Indian tribes. In this way the Bible is finding its way even to the uttermost parts of the earth; preparing the heathen for the reception of the message of truth which is also agitating the so-called "Christian nations."

DURING the past month here, in the different provinces, complaints have been made against the brutality of the so-called "Sisters of Charity," who hold the office of nurses in the government hospital. Clear evidence has been produced to prove that persons of Protestant profession entering aforesaid hospitals receive neither care nor attention upon their refusing to confess to a priest of the Catholic Church. The Rev. Mr. Tallon, presiding elder of the Methodist Church in Santa Fé, after having investigated some cases, denounces in strong terms the cruelty practiced by these "charitable sisters" to those of a contrary faith. Oh, how contrary to the action of the Master they profess to serve! Could they imagine Jesus doing such cruel things to convert a man from the error of his ways? God is a God of love, and not of coercion or force; and they who follow him must use the methods he would employ, and them only.

NEVER before during the whole history of the Argentine Republic was there so much talk as now of introducing laws for the stricter observance of Sunday. When a lottery is drawn on Sunday, the Protestant paper immediately cries out against "Sabbath desecration." When the city authorities adorn the streets on Sunday to receive a bishop, again wails and cries ascend to the heavens against the imagined transgression of the fourth commandment. All the Protestant pastors are seeking union with the church of Rome, to compel all to keep Sunday in a religious manner.

SUPPOSE those our friends were in Arabia or Turkey, where the vast majority keep Friday as a holy day, would they be content if the Mohammedans there introduced laws to enforce all to conform to their opinion, by keeping Friday as a holy day? Let them then follow the Golden Rule, by doing unto others as they would like others to do unto them. Let them produce their arguments, their reasons for Sunday keeping, and if they bear the divine credentials, they can never be withstood. But the very fact of their seeking to coerce others, and force their views upon them, goes to prove that they are opposing truth, and hence are ignorant of the method by which truth can be best advanced.

Now is the time when a stand must be made to hold aloft truth's standard. Now if ever is the time to disseminate the glorious principles of religious liberty, and bring them before the people in all their beauty; losing the present opportunity, such an occasion may never again present itself to us. Let us be up and doing.

Argentine Republic.

Doubtful Consistency.

THE New York Journal makes note of the prayer of Chaplain Milburn at the opening of Congress, in which he invoked the divine favor upon Spain, and says:—

"There is no occasion to criticise Chaplain Milburn for remembering the Queen Regent of Spain, the boy king, and the Spanish people in his prayer in the Senate. After returning thanks for our victories and commending the President of the United States to the Divine favor, the chaplain said:—

"We pray that thy blessing may be with the Queen Regent of Spain and her young son, and upon her nation. May Thy heavenly grace come to succor and uplift and uphold the stricken people."

"We do not know how the Spaniards will enjoy the idea of being prayed for by the people that have just knocked their teeth down their throats; but certainly no American need object to the blind chaplain's kindly attention."

Knocking a man's teeth down his throat is certainly a curious prelude to a prayer in his behalf.

The Poor Church in Cuba!

THE Cuban general, Calixto Garcia, in speaking of expected reforms in Cuba, in a recent interview, said:—

"Another source of revenue from which we hope to get funds for schools will follow the readjustment of the church lands and properties. We are not going to wage a war against religion or the church; in fact, I am not sure that the church will be disestablished in Cuba, but we are determined that the church shall not collect such a vast amount annually as it does now and become thereby an incubus on the people. In Havana, for example, there are not only a great many more churches than the population would warrant, but altogether too much land and property around them goes to swell the revenues of the bishop. We shall also completely do away with the 'capellanias,' a complicated and burdensome system of mortgages, interest upon which is collected by the church from all families whose sons are educated for the priesthood."

And yet with all this wealth, according to this statement of General Garcia, who is certainly good authority on the subject, it has been represented to the Government of the United States, by the papal prelates whom the Government has consulted, that the Catholic Church in Cuba is so poor that it will have to be supported by the United States in order to be kept alive and in condition to confer its benefits(?) upon the Cuban people.

And the worst of it is that the President has fallen into the trap and agreed that this monstrous proposition shall be carried into effect, and the Catholic Church in Cuba be duly supported with money taken from the pockets of the American people!

FOR over sixty years Queen Victoria has held the official rank of Prebendary of St. David's Cathedral. She is in fact the oldest official of the Established Church.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 16.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

NOTWITHSTANDING that the United States Government adopted into its Constitution the principles of religious and civil liberty, as taught by Christ, with the intention of assuring to all under its jurisdiction these God-given rights, this feature being set forth in the two lamb-like horns of the beast of Rev. 13:11, the sure word of prophecy shows that its acts are to belie its profession, for when it speaks it is as a dragon. In other words, instead of leaving religious matters to the individual conscience, where they belong, and as provided for in the Constitution, it is to enter upon a course which will finally invade these rights of conscience, and will enforce upon all religious worship.

Let it ever be remembered that the principles of religious and civil liberty were incorporated into the Constitution for the express purpose of keeping out of governmental affairs Romanism or anything like it, that the "Spirit of eternal truth might move in its freedom and purity and power."

In invading the rights of conscience and enforcing religion it could not, in the very nature of things, be any thing else than that Romanism would be recognized in a governmental way, even though it might not be under that particular name. Thus in the prophecy it says: "And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast [papacy] whose deadly wound was healed." Verse 12.

How this is to be accomplished is shown in verse 14 which says that he (the two horned beast) says "to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword and did live."

An image is a likeness or representation of anything. From this it will be seen there is to be made in this country that which will be a living—a speaking—likeness of the papacy. This work cannot be the work of the papacy itself, for it itself, in the symbol, is "the beast." The conclusion therefore is inevitable that the image is a work to be accomplished through Protestantism.

When this is accomplished, then will be enforced the worship of the beast and his image. How many will worship the beast? "And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world!" Rev. 13:8.

Just here it must not be overlooked that with the worship of the beast is associated the dragon power of verses 2, 4.

There can be no worship without service (Matt. 4:10), and no service without obedience. Rom. 6:16.

Now we inquire, What act of service will be demanded in this country that will constitute the worship of the beast and his image? Here it is: "And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads." Rev. 13:16. This mark is the mark of the beast. Rev. 19:20.

Against the worship of the beast and his image, and the reception of this mark, God gives a solemn warning. Rev. 14:9-11. It is therefore of the utmost importance that we know what the mark of the beast (papacy) is.

In seeking to find out what this mark is we shall be helped greatly if we bear in mind that there is a trinity to be worshiped; viz., the dragon, the beast, and the image of the beast. This will be seen by comparing verses 2, 4, 8, 15, 16. These three symbols represent respectively, paganism, Catholicism, and apostate Protestantism. Then it follows that the mark, whatever it is, must be something that is taught by Protestants, claimed by Catholics, and derived from paganism. Furthermore, as the two-horned beast (the United States) is to enforce the worship of the beast and his image, by compelling the reception of the mark, and as the act of worship is a religious act, it follows that the mark when sought to be enforced must be set forth plainly as such. In other words, there will be in this country a religious institution sought to be enforced which will plainly be called, by those seeking to enforce it, a mark. Now we ask, Is there a work going on in this country that has for its object the enforcing of a certain religious institution which is plainly called a mark—an institution taught by Protestantism, claimed by Catholicism and derived from paganism? We answer there is—just one, and only one, and that one is Sunday. And this institution is positively the only one that will fill all the specifications of the prophecy.

Let us see. (1) It is taught by Protestants, and by them regarded as a necessary part of Christianity. So much is this so that they say that Sunday is "set apart for divine worship and preparation for another life. It is the test of all religion." So that it is further claimed that "he who does not keep the Sabbath (Sunday) does not worship God; and he who does not worship God is lost." And in being set forth thus it is called "the mark of American religion," the "mark of the nation whose God is Jehovah," a "sign between God and man," etc., etc. (2) It is claimed by Catholicism. Let the reader consult any Catholic catechism and he will find that the Catholic Church acknowledges having been the power that attempted the change of the Sabbath, substituting Sunday in its place. And (3) it is derived from paganism. This can easily be seen from its name Sunday, or day of the sun. It is recognized as the "wild solar holiday of all pagan times," and was devoted to the worship of the sun, which is "the oldest, the most widespread, and the most enduring of all forms of idolatry known to man."

These are facts that can be easily proven, and concerning which there is complete unanimity on the part of scholars; and so generally known that extended proof here would be wholly superfluous.

The Prospective Burden of Militarism.

A NEW YORK daily gives the following figures and observations on the subject of the prospective increase of the military forces of the United States:—

"A Republican contemporary offers the sage observation: 'A standing army of 100,000 men will mean one soldier to 750 inhabitants. That can scarcely be deemed a crushing load of militarism.'

"No; if the load of militarism were borne by having the one soldier stand on the heads of the 750 inhabitants. It happens, however, that the pressure of the load is financial. An expenditure of $166,000,000 a year for a standing army, according to Secretary Alger's proposition, means a tax of about $11 on every family in the United States.

"Ask the hod-carrier who supports his wife and six children on $1.25 a day how he likes that.

"And a total expenditure of $366,000,000 a year for military purposes—army, navy, and pensions—means a tax of $24.40 on every family in the United States.

"Ask the hod-carrier how he likes that."

And the hod-carrier is not the only American who will not like it.

Volcanic Europe.

"Cleveland Press."

ONE cannon shot, fired in hostility, would almost certainly set Europe in a blaze of war.

Of the powers among which the continent is divided, most of those of importance are close to the verge of a conflict over some internal, continental, colonial, or foreign question. The others have either just been beaten at war, are too poor to afford a quarrel of greater proportions than civil riot, or else are either so small as to be beneath notice, or so closely allied to one of the great nations as to have their quarrels swallowed up in those of their allies or masters.

In France is the most serious aspect. That uncertain republic is beset by anarchistic mobs, endangered by a corrupt and scheming army, threatened by plotting royalists who hope to regain supremacy, browbeaten by England, and overawed by Germany.

England has no serious internal or colonial difficulties, but she is not many steps from trouble with France over Fashodia, or with Russia over the multifarious Chinese question.

Germany, aside from her old quarrel with France, has further reason for keeping her fleet in sailing shape and her army in marching order in the new troubles that beset France, and which threaten in several ways to draw the kaiser into the quarrel.

Russia's ruler, although he has formally invited all the other nations to join him in a peace conference, has not ceased to equip his armies and to improve his fleets, while he yields no jot of anything he has, nor to any of the claims made by England. He has also, according to late advices, found cause for anger in the friendly attitude of Germany towards England. He evidently resents any action along the lines of his peace proposition which does not include Russia as a beneficiary.

Italy would probably be on the verge of war with some nation larger than little Colombia, were it not that her poverty is too great. As it is, she must content herself with an occasional riot, of little present magnitude, but important as an indication of existing civil conditions.

Spain is more interested in efforts to escape from some of the results of her last disastrous adventure in war than in seeking fresh troubles abroad; but her Carlists and other insurrectionists are threatening revolution which may not only overthrow that government, but drag into the conflict half a dozen other powers.

In addition to these national troubles, the huge international pest of anarchism threatens to take advantage of the prevailing unsettled conditions to actively develop itself. Every monarch or president in Europe fears more than ever for his personal safety; every one finds hope or fear in frequent speculation as to the developments that would follow the assassination or overthrow of a brother ruler, the possibilities of disruption or reorganization of the fallen ruler's nation, and the advantages or disadvantages that might result to himself thereby. And it is safe to say that a large part of the constant military vigilance of European nations is for the purpose of developing or resisting any favorable or unfavorable conditions which might arise as the result of anarchy.

Nearly all of the European nations have consented to send representatives to the disarmament congress proposed by the czar; but it is nevertheless probable that there will not be even a temporary suspension in the work of enlarging and equipping the armies and in increasing and strengthening the navies. The indications are stronger than ever that the great European war that has so long been prophesied, may yet thunder a terrible farewell to the old century and greet the new one with a crimson baptism.

FROM far off Nevada we have just received a list of eleven names,—ten for one year, and one for six months,—accompanied with $10.50, full price for each subscription.

"Please send me a few sample copies. I may send you more soon," is the way he finished his letter.

This, dear reader, reveals the true missionary spirit. Does it touch a chord in your heart? What are you doing? Time is fast passing.

IN 1851 there were only 17 monasteries and 53 convents in England and Wales; now, according to statistics, there are 243 religious houses for men and 493 for women.

AN opinion filed by the Supreme Court of Michigan, December 6, holds that reading from the Bible without comment as a part of public school exercises, is constitutional, especially where the pupils are not required to listen. The court did not say whether the King James or the Douay translations should be used, but the decision will amount to nothing until Protestants and Catholics have settled the controversy which lies between them on this point.

THE pope, says a London despatch, has sent a nuncio to Madrid, to impress upon the Spanish clergy that it is their duty to oppose the movement for the restoration of the Carlist monarchy. The pope does not hesitate to dictate the politics of his adherents in Spain, and there is nothing in logic or the principles of papal belief which binds him to take a different course towards his adherents in any other country, not excepting the United States.

THE President's message to Congress conspicuously omits any reference to the race problem which recent events in the South have impressed so painfully upon the public attention, or to the labor problem as it has developed recently in Illinois. Congress might certainly do worse than concern itself earnestly and patiently with the question of the elimination or amelioration of these difficulties which so vitally concern the welfare of millions of American citizens and the stability of government at home.

It is reported that Japan has made a bid of $200,000,000 for the possession of the Philippine Islands. The paper which publishes this statement says:—

"It is known that an influential senator recently had along talk with the President, at which the disposition of the Philippines was the main topic of conversation. The argument of the senator was that while he was opposed to the holding of the Philippines, he had now become convinced that it would be necessary to hold the island of Luzon.

"He told the President that it would be to the advantage of the Government to dispose of all of the group except Luzon, and that it would be the better plan to have several purchasers for the group. In other words, he would avoid all possible complications by letting Germany, England, France, Japan, and Russia into the gigantic auction sale."

And the same paper adds: "The positive statement is made that the President signified his assent to this elaborate scheme."

It appears from this that the Government is not only willing to buy the eight millions of Filipinos from Spain, but also to sell the greater part of them to the highest bidder, be that bidder a heathen nation like Japan, or a despotism as utterly opposed to free government as is Russia.

It is to be hoped that the United States will not make itself a party to what would be the most gigantic slave deal on record.

"In countries where the Sabbath is most profaned, like Spain, France, Italy, and Bavaria," said a clergyman, recently, in a discourse on patriotism, "society is grossly immoral." But all these countries are Roman Catholic countries, in all which countries there has long been a union between religion and the state. All these countries have maintained religion by state laws, and yet they are the countries in which "the Sabbath is most profaned;" and so, to guard against profanation of the "Sabbath" in America, it is said that Sabbath observance must be enforced by state law! State support of religion is the very essence of the papal system; and this system will not bear different fruit now as regards Sabbath observance than it has always borne in the past.

Clerical Assumption.

EDITOR SENTINEL:—The quiet little city of Moncton has been stirred from center to circumference during the past few days by the clergymen composing the Ministerial Alliancesending a protest to the city council, against the "Robinson Opera Company" singing a sacred concert in the opera house belonging to the city, and leased by A. E. Holstead. This is their letter:—

"We, the undersigned, pastors of the city of Moncton, beg respectfully to call attention of the mayor and council to the proposed concert in the opera house in the city building on Sunday evening next.

"We beg to suggest that the sale of tickets as advertised is contrary to law, and that the holding of such a concert by a comic opera company is a desecration of the Lord's day:

"We, therefore, request you as custodians of the true interests of the city to stop the holding of such a concert, which, if held, could only prove the entering wedge of wholesale desecration of our Christian Sabbath.

"Signed (by seven clergymen)."

On the strength of this, the mayor called together the aldermen in council to consider the matter. After a few minutes talk, Alderman Masters moved, seconded by Alderman Wall, that the request of the clergymen, as set forth in the petition, be complied with, and that the concert be not allowed to proceed, and that the lessee of the opera house be notified of the action of the council.

The chief of police was accordingly ordered to stop Mr. Holstead and the people from entering the building, who, after consultation with the city solicitor, decided to disobey the mandate. But as is almost sure to be the result of the first wrong step, everything went wrong. The chairman of the police committee knew nothing of the change in the chief's intentions until Sunday evening, when a messenger was sent to him notifying him of the fact. He immediately repaired to the police station, after calling the force together, and forthwith suspended the chief, appointing one of the police in his stead.

The performance was allowed to proceed without interruption, the large building being crowded.

Probably in no other way could the citizens of Moncton administer such a rebuke to the clericals as by attending the concert in such large numbers.

Notice, these seven men claim to be the "pastors of the city of Moncton." What assumption! When were these men made pastors of the city? If they had placed themselves in their true attitude, they would write something like this: We, the undersigned ministers, hired by the people to dictate to them just when they shall go anywhere—having control of, and answerable for, the morals of the community, do hereby ask, etc., etc.

No; these men are simply what other men are before the law—citizens—good citizens if they do their duty.

Next; these ministers insinuate that for opera singers to sing sacred music is a "desecration of the Lord's day." Notice; these people sing the same music that is sung every Sunday in their churches, but the church choirs, I suppose, are all sanctified singers. But even so, why should it be wrong on Sunday to sing sacred music any more than on any other day?

Again, these clerical gentlemen advise the fathers of the city to take unlawful steps to prevent a lawful gathering. Just think of it! These men who pretend to be living on a plane elevated above the ordinary class, advising a breach of the law in order to protect what they conceive to be a "desecration of the Lord's day."

But after all, this is just what we ought to expect. When unjust laws are framed, such as our Sunday law is, there is no knowing where the mischief is going to stop. It places a power in the hands of such men as these to persecute and annoy the best citizens. Wherein were these men's rights trampled upon? If they did not want to attend, their chance to stay away was excellent. It was the same spirit, manifested by these clergymen, that made the Inquisition possible, and the class that prefer a Sunday evening in the opera to an evening in the churches, have reason to feel gratified at the result.

We await with interest the next development of this tangle.

Yours truly,

D. G. SCOTT.

Moncton, N. B., Dec. 5, 1898.

Notes from the National Purity Conference.

BY H. F. PHELPS.

THIS conference was held at St. Paul, Minn., Nov. 9, 10, 1898. Although it was the fifth conference of the purity department of the W. C. T. U., it was the first National Purity Conference. There were two hundred and fifty delegates from all parts of the United States. Of these a daily paper said: "They are women who have truly the courage of their convictions. For they have been called upon to demonstrate that a certain sort of ignorance is an unblissful illusion, that to ignore vice is far from destroying it. To these women also is given the evangelistic task of imitating practically the charity of Christ under conditions where most religious women take pharisaic pride, setting an example to their Saviour."

The presiding officer was a maid of twenty years, Miss Rose Wood-Allen, supported by Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, national evangelist of the purity department. That the presiding officer was a girl, and that the most powerful appeal in behalf of purity in the marriage relations came from the lips of a girl, was, to say the least, an impressive propriety.

Miss Allen, with persuasive simplicity, urged that young women should band together to maintain the single moral standard for both sexes; and that they should receive instructions as to the reason, that it was a necessity in the interests of posterity. She urged that the standard of purity should be so high in the young women themselves that they should, and very properly too, refuse the attentions of any man who used intoxicating drinks and tobacco.

Mrs. Upham pleaded for the coöperation of parents and teachers for purity education in the public schools, asserting that "If the angel Gabriel were a superintendent of schools, and his corps of teachers were the angels nearest the throne of God, they could not counteract the immorality that prevails in the public schools unless they secured the coöperation of parents." Mrs. Isabel Wing-Lake urged as a remedial agent the Bible in the public schools.

A prominent figure in the convention, and one that added much to the interest of the occasion, was the presence of "Mother" Prindle, as she is called by the many unfortunate girls who were described in her paper as "poor, stray children, unpitied, unloved, unmothered." "I shall never forget," said Mother Prindle, "the simple, honest confession of a Swiss girl on Bleecker street, New York. 'I only do wrong when I am very hungry.' But how can the street girl best be reached? Surrounded by a group of these children of misfortune last week, I said: 'My dear girls, tell me the best method of reaching the heart of the street girl, drunk or sober. With one accord some dozen of voices responded, 'Speak kind words to her, mother, speak kind words to her.'"

Mrs. Prindle has given twenty years of her life to rescue work in London, New York and elsewhere, with success. She has recently resuscitated a languishing rescue home in Minneapolis, Minn. In explaining why she was a rescue worker she said that her Master was such; and that he had rescued her from the depths of hell just as verily as though she had been a drunken or an immoral woman.

Mrs. Isabel Wing-Lake gave an interesting outline of her work during the past ten months, during which time she had traveled 15,000 miles, had spoken in one hundred and ninety-eight cities and nineteen states. She claimed that present existing moral conditions are an evidence that men are blind; that they are unable to see God's thought for the birth of children; nor what the world, the flesh, and the devil are doing to destroy children; that men do not see the suffering that is about them, nor what might be done to alter present conditions. And, more than all this, men do not see God's offer of power and his willingness to supply funds in this service when his conditions are met. As means by which reforms could be brought about, she mentioned the scattering of literature among the suffering classes, by visiting the poor in their homes and doing their work while they are at purity conferences, by befriending factory girls and instructing them in regard to proper dressing, food, and hygiene in general; by visiting city officials and praying in their offices; by organizing rescue homes and "life-saving" stations. She said that small efforts were sometimes greatly blessed for good. Some Christian women sang in one town beneath the window of a sinning sister, and that single song saved her. A call of fifteen minutes at another place by some ladies had resulted in closing the place and releasing and reclaiming to virtue four inmates.

Miss Bell Mix repeated her address on "Purity's Greatest Foe," at one of the churches during the W. C. T. U. convention. There were three addresses upon this occasion, Elder A. T. Jones, of Battle Creek, Mich., giving one of them, speaking from the standpoint of the man. He repudiated the common idea that the woman was the greater sinner, and that she was the leader in sin. He declared that man could, if only he would, restrain his vile passions; and that if he would do so, the results would be immediate in the complete transformation of society; that before midnight there would be no more rescue work to be done for all would be rescued. He supported Miss Mix in her declaration that the procreative powers should only be brought into exercise when there was a desire for children; that this and this alone was the purpose of our Creator.

But time will not permit to tell of all the good things that were said at this conference. It was a notable meeting, and its influence will be far-reaching. Personally, I will say that in the line for which the conference was held, it was the most remarkable meeting in my experience. May the blessing of God go with these earnest workers.

The War of Principle.—No. II.

"ALECK, I have been studying the Book of Acts to see the results of power from on high upon the disciples. It really is marvelous, and completely upsets my theories in regard to character building. The gift of God's Spirit and its unseen operation did more for these wavering, weak men, than years of education could have done."

"Yes, that is so, Cecil. The plan of salvation was devised because men in themselves are helpless. 'There is none that doeth good, no, not one.' 'In me . . . dwelleth no good thing.' 'Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?' 'Without me,' said Jesus, 'ye can do nothing.' That is, without an indwelling Christ, no good is from us."

"Right there, Aleck, I am puzzled again. How is it, then, that good does appear in men who make no profession of Christ, and have not even heard of him?"

"It means that they have the experience of Cyrus, of whom it is said, 'I have girded thee, though thou hast not known me?' This is accounted for on the ground of the text, that Christ is the light that 'lighteth every man that cometh into the world.'"

"Then if every man is lighted, why is not every man saved?"

"Because the light is not cherished, but rejected. 'This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light.' The responsibility of our salvation or condemnation will rest wholly on us. Abundant provision has been made for our transformation, even to the bestowing of the heavenly Spirit to operate our brain and control, with our consent, every motion and emotion."

"Such a plan, with such provisions, is utterly out of harmony with the idea of legislative reform so much talked of to day. I am more and more astonished at the irreconcilable character of the two principles we have started to discuss and illustrate."

"From the remotest ages there has been war between them. Let us notice how this war was manifested in the early history of Christianity. What kind of a reception did the world give the witness of the Holy Spirit through the disciples?"

"At first there was a great turning to God. Three thousand were converted at once, and souls were added daily to the church."

"This was the springing up of the seed sown during Christ's ministry. How did the priests and rulers look on the movement?"

"With jealousy and hate. The old fear beset them as to its outcome,—as to its effect on their selfish interests."

"What did they do?"

"They called a council; they were filled with indignation, and laid hands on the apostles and thrust them into prison."

"All this stands for human power. Force is the utmost appeal. Jesus had told them what would come. The servant was not to be greater than his lord. Bonds and imprisonment awaited them."

"Aleck, how do you account for the peace and prosperity of the church to day? There does not seem to be the antagonism between the church and the world that there was then."

"I account for it on the ground of the lack of Holy Ghost testimony. When the church is baptized with power from on high, the kingdom of the world and the devil will manifest all the old enmity. But Cecil, how much power had the priests and rulers over the apostles? Were they silenced?"

"No. It says, 'The angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth, and said, Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life.' It seems to me, Aleck, that ought to have strengthened the disciples, and made them ready for any thing."

"No, Cecil; the mere fact of an angel appearing was not enough. It was the Holy Spirit in them that strengthened with all might. Were the rulers and priests then convinced?"

"No; they set them before the council, and the high priest said 'Did we not straightly command you that ye should not teach in this name? and, behold, ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood on us?'"

"You can see that self-interest was behind all their opposition. Even when the officers went after the silenced prisoners, they took them, it says, without violence, because they feared the people. Surely the fear of man is a snare. It makes men hypocrites."

"Surely, Cecil. Then how essential it is not to fear man, but God only. What excuse did the apostles give for continuing their witness?"

One that is in perfect harmony with their faith, and the only answer consistent with the principle of reliance on God,—'We ought to obey God rather than man.'"

"Was that all they said?"

"O no. They went on and boldly charged them with putting to death the Saviour of the world; but I noticed that in their testimony they also held out the privilege of repentance for Israel."

"Beside this they boldly asserted the witness of the Holy Spirit, men were cut to the heart, and yet though convicted of the truth,—for the Holy Spirit convicts of truth,—they took sides against it, opposed themselves in their conviction, and for the saving of self, took up stones to kill the apostles. What prevented the carrying out of their purpose?"

"The sensible talk of Gamaliel. He told them of various efforts that had originated in man and had failed, and declared that if this was of man, it would come to naught; but if of God, it would not be overthrown. For a time his good advice was respected. What a pity it is that this advice is not always respected! Persecution would not have much chance if it were followed."

"The prince of this world counts such advice as the worst of treason."

Studies in French History.—51.

"WELL, Julia, are you prepared this afternoon to tell us something concerning the last hours of Louis XIV.," asked Professor Carman.

"I have learned a few things, professor—only a few," replied Julia, as she rose and stepped to the desk beside her teacher, and began:—

"King Louis XIV. reigned much longer than any of the kings of France. His reign began in 1643, and he died in 1715; as he was four years old when he took the throne, this would bring him to the good old age of seventy-six years. But he had to die at last, even though he always had so dreaded death that he would not even look out of his window to see the church of St. Denis, where he must be buried. He had a very great deal of trouble, poor man, along at last. In the first place his son died,—the only real lawful son he had,—of small-pox; next his grandson's wife died of measles. She was a real sweet, nice lady, and the old king loved her very much, and used to get her to sit on the arm of his large chair and visit with him; so of course he must have felt very bad when she died. The young princess' husband died of grief in a week after her death. Then the eldest son of this 'ill-fated couple,' as Aunt Eunice called them, died too."

"Dear me!" exclaimed Florence Ray. "I don't see as there was any one left at all to take the throne. I hope nobody else died after this."

"But there did," continued Julia, "another grandson died two years after this."

"At last a poor, feeble little chap four years old was the only one left to take the throne. He was the old king's great grandson, and became Louis XV."

"When the old monarch was on his death-bed, he called this little boy to him and gave him some very good advice, which the young king did not live up to at all, though he had it nicely framed. He advised the child king to be more saying than he had been, and more peaceable, too; and then he called him 'darling,' and blessed him before he died."

"Aunt Eunice said it was such a pity that the old king didn't live long enough afterward to illustrate his good advice by his own works. As it was, the French people, generally, were only glad when he died."

"You have done well, Julia. This little king, Louis XV., was taken out of the palace so that the populace could see him. He was then five years old, but the little fellow did not have any near relatives, and so he had to walk out alone—though he was held by two ladies who each took an end of his little sash in their hands, but were not permitted to lead his august kingship! The duke of Orleans acted as regent, and although he was a very bad man he did the kindly act of opening the cachots or miserable places where many innocent people had been kept for years. One man had been confined for thirty five years who was an honest traveler. Very many times it was entirely forgotten why they were imprisoned at first. It was under the rule of this man that the horrible 'Chamber of Justice' was instituted."

"Please tell us about it, professor," said Max Smith.

"If a man was unfortunate enough to be rich, if he didn't belong to the court, he was likely to be brought up before this unjust tribunal, and tortured until he would acknowledge some imaginary crime which he never committed and surrender his money. In fact, some people were so afraid of this Chamber of Justice that the poor fellows killed themselves to avoid it. At last, because the country was so reduced for lack of money, the miserable expediency was adopted of debasing coin; that is, of mixing some other metal with the gold and silver, until it was only really worth four-fifths as much as before. Finally, a man named John Law thought he had a nice scheme for making money. So he coaxed the regent—the duke of Orleans—to agree that France should issue a great lot of paper money, in hopes that they could send expeditions over here to America and bring back ship loads of gold and silver, which, it was said, were to be found on the shores of the Mississippi."

"Well, I guess they felt pretty bad when they failed to find it," smiled practical Jack.

"The poor fellows who had gone into the hair-brained enterprise lost all they had and were beggars. But the city of New Orleans was founded at this time, and named after the duke."

"What became of the man Law?" asked Charley.

"He died after a while in beggary, but he honestly thought his scheme was all right, to the very end."

"Finally, when the little king was thirteen, he was given the royal reins to manage, and the bad Duke Orleans died the same year. I suppose Milly will be quite glad to know that young Louis XV. was a very royal looking handsome king, but I dare say she will be sorry to learn that he was utterly selfish and low minded, with no care whatever for his people or their comfort. Nor did he love to study at all. Of course he had his teachers, but as he did not try to learn his lessons, they had much trouble with him."

"I don't see what they could do; of course they did not dare to whip the king," smiled Jack.

"No, Jack, that would never do; but they were determined to punish somebody, so his teacher actually hired a poor boy to stand and be whipped whenever the king deserved it himself—certainly a very ingenious device."

"At last, when the young king was not much more than sixteen, the duke of Bourbon arranged for him to get married. But when the young princess Maria who was living in Germany at that time came to Paris, the home of her royal spouse, the roads were in such a fearful condition,—partly caused by the severe rains which fell in France that summer,—that she was nearly drowned and had to be rescued many times from her carriage by her attendants."

"It doesn't seem possible, hardly!" exclaimed Rob Billings, "the roads were in a very good state when we were there."

"O yes, Robert; but this was a century and a half ago."

"Finally, Cardinal Fleury was raised to the head of the affairs of state, and although he was seventy-three years of age at the time, he succeeded in bettering the condition of the country to quite an extent."

"Next week we will learn how he accomplished this."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

Half an Hour With Grandpa.

"WELL, boys, now for our evening story," said grandpa, as books were laid aside and the time for retiring was fast approaching. This was their grandfather's usual treat if the boys would have their lessons learned early enough to admit of half an hour spent thus pleasantly. Harry and Fred were eager to hear what grandpa had for them, for they always enjoyed his quaint stories and the pleasing manner in which he told them. He had on this occasion a small box on his knee, which the boys were very anxious to look into, but this treat was forbidden for the present.

"Well," said grandpa, "a long while ago there was a great king who ruled what was known as the Babylonian Empire, which really embraced the whole known world at that time. This king had a very long name—N e b u c h a d n e z z a r."

"Well, I should say so," said Harry. "That is worse than Methuselah."

"This king made a huge golden image, about 110 feet high, and set it up in the plain which lies between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, where it might easily be approached from every direction."

"What did he make the image for?" said Fred.

"This famous king was a worshiper of idols, and he made this great image of gold as an object of worship. He sent all over his kingdom to gather together the great men of his realm, governors, captains, judges, rulers of provinces, etc., and proclaimed that the dedication of the great image should be held upon a certain day. When the time arrived a great crowd of people assembled in response to the king's request, and we can well imagine there was great excitement and a general big time."

"What did they do at such a dedication as that, grandpa?"

"Well, I was just going to tell you that the program included a great deal of instrumental music upon many kinds of instruments,—a great orchestra we would call it. And a decree went forth that when the people should hear the sounds of instrumental music peal forth, they must all fall down and worship the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. It was also proclaimed, 'Whoso falleth not down and worshipeth the golden image, shall the same hour be cast into the burning fiery furnace:'"

"What did they say that for, grandpa?" said Harry. "I should think that would have spoiled all the pleasure of the celebration."

"Well, yes, one would think so; but sometimes the heart is so hard and selfish that it takes delight even in murder, as was the case in this instance."

"Why, was any one really killed, grandpa?" said Fred.

"There were only three in all that vast throng who refused to obey the command of the king. These worshipped the true God, and knew it would be wicked for them to pay any homage to idols; and God miraculously delivered them."

"What good did the king hope to accomplish by trying to compel people to worship the golden image when they did not believe in idolatry of any sort?"

"Well, Harry, it is the same principle as is seen in all our religious laws of the present day. Many people believe that everybody should be compelled to keep Sunday, whether they think so or not."

"The true God does not compel any one to worship him, does he, grandpa?"

"No, Harry, simply because forced service is worse than no service at all, in that it makes of one a hypocrite."

Here grandpa removed the lid from the box on his knee, and holding up to view some ripe fruit, he said, "What is that, Fred?"

"A bunch of grapes," said both boys in a breath.

"How funny they look," said Harry.

"Why," said Fred, "they are growing on the limb of a thornbush."

"O-ho," said Harry, "they are tied on!"

"Yes," said grandpa; "that is just the point—they are tied on. That aptly represents the evil results of all decrees compelling religious observance of any kind. If one is religious merely in outward acts, while true heart service is wanting, he is simply tying the fruit on,—pretending to be what he is not. And if one observes a command which in his heart he knows is not right, he is doing great injustice to his loving Father in heaven."

"I'd never want any religious fruit tied onto me," said Fred.

"Nor I," said Harry.

"No," said grandpa. "Nobody ever ought to display religious fruit in that manner. But there goes nine o'clock; so good night and pleasant dreams. Perhaps I may have another story for you the next time you get your lessons so promptly."

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 15, 1898.

PUBLIC school statistics in Germany show that 407 schoolchildren, all under 15 years of age, committed suicide between the years 1887 and 1896. A Berlin paper calls attention to this record with the remark that it is to "be regarded as one of the saddest and most startling of the phenomena of modern life."

AND now it is a boxing class which is put forward by the enterprising and up-to-date clergyman as one of the aids to the development of Christian character! The Rev. Mr. Stoddard, of St. John's Episcopal Church, Jersey City—says the New York World—has announced that such a class will be conducted at his church hereafter on Friday evenings. This startling innovation is justified, it is said, upon the theory that boxing develops manliness, manliness goodness, and goodness faith. This plan of Christian development, needless to say, has been overlooked in the Scripture.

Now that the Government has acquired possession of the Philippines, the next question will be that of safely holding them against the grasp of the land-hungry nations of Europe. To do this will require a tremendous increase in the military forces of the nation. A large standing army and a formidable navy—formidable from the standpoint of a great military power, is the price of the possession of colonies. And this means a tremendous impetus to the development of militarism in this country. Already Secretary of the Navy Long has asked for fifteen new warships, to cost from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000, mainly for the protection of the new American possessions in the Eastern Hemisphere.

THE Mormon Church is in politics again, or rather, never went out of politics, and the issue of polygamy is again to the front in Utah. If the Mormon Church had gone out of politics, the sovereign State of Utah would not now be under Mormon control; but the Mormon Church did not go out of politics. Having the example of the popular churches in the United States before her, and remembering the arguments made by representatives of those churches, to the effect that Christians above all others ought to take an active part in politics, she felt that it was her duty to remain in politics; not however, that the church as such assumed any part in politics—not at all; but each member of the church as a professed believer in the Christian religion and therefore in duty bound to participate in conducting the affairs of state, made himself active in politics; and somehow, the politics of the State took on an essentially Mormon aspect!

If this appears to any one like the Mormon Church being in politics, let him remember that it is the duty of Christians, as such—a duty especially impressed upon Catholic Christians by the pope, and upon Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopal, Baptist, and other Christians by clergymen of their respective denominations, to see that the state is modeled upon Christian principles; and it was with this plain duty before them that the Mormon Christians of Utah went to the polls to cast their votes. That persons were elected to office (the Mormons being largely in the majority) who believed in and practiced the doctrines of the Mormon religion, and even that a congressman should have been chosen whose existing household includes three wives, is only what was naturally to be expected. Will not a Catholic naturally vote for a Catholic, a Methodist for a Methodist, or other Christian voter for one of his own denomination, as being the candidate who will administer his office most nearly in harmony with the principles of the true religion? How then can it be expected that Mormon voters will do anything else?

The Mormon Church has the same right to go into politics that any other church has; and she is justified in doing so by the same logic.

But by the principle that Christians should keep out of politics, as being citizens of a government which is not of force but of love, the Mormon Church would be debarred from politics in Utah, and a Mormon State would not to-day be a thorn in the side of the American Federal Union. And every other church professing to be Christian would be debarred from politics in every other state; and the dark cloud of impending calamity in the form of church and state despotism, would not to-day be hanging over the American people.

That principle, and that alone, stands to-day between this nation and people, and the worst form of despotism that has ever cursed mankind.

NUMBER 50.

THE "NATIONAL REFORM" IDEA OF GOVERNMENT—AN INVERTED PYRAMID.

It is impossible to fully depict by any illustration the absurdity of trying to uphold the law of God, with Christian institutions and precepts, by human enactments, as the National Reform theory of government demands. The divine law is infinitely higher and broader than human law, and the institutions and precepts of Christianity are the work of Him who has declared that His ways and thoughts are as much higher than man's as the heavens are higher than the earth. Isa. 55:8, 9. Of course anything so unstable as this inverted pyramid of government cannot long stand, and is continually calling for props to support it, in the form of new enactments and regulations. As the law of God applies to the secret thoughts of the heart, to enforce the divine by a human law calls logically for the erection of the Inquisition, that the secret thoughts of the heart may be forced from transgressors by torture of the body. This logic was literally carried into effect under former efforts to establish this idea of government, as history abundantly shows. To-day it is thought that what is needed to establish Christianity upon a legal basis in this country is to get God into the Constitution; and to this end Congress is annually besieged by church parties and religious organizations. And if these succeed, the end of it all can only be such a wreck of civil government as other nations have exhibited for the warning of mankind, under a similar regime in the past.

CIVILIZATION has never proved itself an efficient guardian of civil and religious liberty.

HUMAN law is powerless to deal with sin, as such.

No PERSON is in favor of legislation which restricts his own liberty in religious practices.

"FOR as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and My thoughts than your thoughts."—The Almighty.

Expansion or Contraction.

THE founders of the American Republic doubtless believed in expansion. They were no more opposed to such a thing than are the most ardent imperialists who are to-day trying to explain away the Constitution and Declaration of Independence in defense of their views.

But what is the thing to be expanded? That is the vital question in the whole discussion.

Is it the American army and navy? Is it the incubus of militarism? Is it military government, or any other form of arbitrary rule? Are these the things which need expansion for the fulfillment of the national purpose? We think not.

Our forefathers expanded the truths which underlie free government. They did this in the Declaration of Independence and the national Constitution. They proclaimed to all the world the truths which till then they had harbored in their own minds, that all men are by creation equally endowed with certain unalienable rights, and that to preserve these rights is the one legitimate purpose of governments among men. They asserted these as self-evident truths; and they asserted them as much for the inhabitants of the countries of Europe, as for themselves.

Upon these principles, the American Republic was founded; and under the influence of this example the application of these principles in the governments of the world gradually expanded, and all mankind were the gainers. That they were not at once carried fully into effect by the American Government, and that the history of the nation down to the present time has been marked by various denials of these principles in American institutions and laws, are not facts which invalidate the principles, or which constitute an argument for repudiating them to-day.

The founders of this Republic believed in the expansion of free government. That was the kind of government they set up for themselves and advocated for all the world; and that is the only kind of government which it can in reason be supposed they would wish to see extended beyond the shores of the American continent.

But is it such government that it is now proposed by the advocates of "expansion" to extend? No; it is not claimed that there is to be any "expansion" of free government. It is not pretended that "government of the people, by the people, for the people," is to be set up in any of the newly-acquired territory. The "expansion" is to be simply an extension of the authority of the United States Government. No pretense of anything else is possible, for it is well known that the people of all these territories, with the possible exception of Porto Rico, do not want to be ruled by the United States, but want to govern themselves. They are to be governed without their consent, and the government which has actually been set up, so far, in those territories, is the autocratic government of military rule.

It is explained that this government will be continued until the people shall have become fitted for self-government. But how long will it take for a people under the despotism of military rule to learn self-government? How long time will be required to establish the principles and institutions of free government under a régime which denies and suppresses them? About as long, evidently, as would be required for a person to learn to swim without going in the water.

It is not necessary that the inhabitants of Porto Rico, Hawaii, or the Philippines should be "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" to know how to govern themselves. It is not necessary that they should know all the tricks of the politicians and be stamped with such other marks of "civilization" as usually come to the surface in a political campaign, in order to have good government. It is not the politicians, and the diplomats, and the bosses, however well educated they may be, that make good government in the United States. In fact, they do nothing to promote good government at all, and much to hinder it. If all such eminent representatives of our modern civilization could be transported to the Philippines, and their places here taken by native Filipinos, American government would be a good deal better than it is.

Here, we have the church in politics; the State and national "bosses" in politics; the "diplomats" who care everything about policy and nothing about principle; the buyer and seller of public office; and the buyer and seller of votes; and between all these, American government comes a long way from being the free and just government which the signers of the Declaration of Independence and the framers of the national Constitution meant it to be.

Good government is not necessarily such a complicated affair as might be thought from a study of the political machinery now employed in the government of the United States. The prime essential of good government is a disposition to behave one's self and not meddle with the business of others; and this disposition is about as frequently met with in the Islands of the Sea as in lands that boast most highly of their civilization. One great trouble with the uncivilized "heathen" is that they have come in too close contact with the heathen of civilized lands, and learned from the latter a vast amount of immorality that they did not know before.

Good government is simple government, and simple government is a thing not beyond the comprehension of simple people.

The extension of good government—of free government—is one thing; and the extension of the military power and authority of the United States is quite another thing. It is the latter, and that only, which the imperialist party are seeking to bring about.

There is room for free government to expand at home; of late years the politicians and bosses and religio-political parties have succeeded in greatly narrowing its scope in this country. And when the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and other bulwarks of popular rights and liberties are set aside by the Government itself, to justify the new policy, the result can only be a great contraction of free government in America itself.

This fact is what makes this new national policy a matter of serious concern for the American people. It is a policy which seriously endangers their own rights, as individuals.

We have no objection to the expansion of good government; but we do object to the expansion of any government, even American government, at the expense of good government. The American Government can never promote free government abroad by ceasing to be a free Government at home.

"The Sheet Anchor of American Republicanism."

In these times, when self government is denied to the people of the new accessions of the United States, and even the principle is being abandoned by American Republicanism, it is well to revert to original principles.

No American ever understood this better than did Abraham Lincoln; and no one ever made it plainer nor proclaimed it more fully. He hoped that "government of the people, by the people, for the people," should not perish from the earth. And now that it is really being abandoned by the leading men of the United States and the mass is following, it is well to recall the attention of the American people to what Abraham Lincoln declared to be "The Sheet Anchor of American Republicanism."

He was speaking at Peoria, Ill., October 16, 1854, and said:—

"I trust I understand and truly estimate the right of self-government. My faith in the proposition that each man should do precisely as he pleases with all which is exclusively his own, lies at the foundation of the sense of justice there is in me. I extend the principle to communities of men, as well as to individuals. I so extend it because it is politically wise as well as naturally just—politically wise in saving us from broils about matters which do not concern us.

"The doctrine of self-government is right—absolutely and eternally right. . . . If the negro is a man, is it not to that extent a total destruction of self-government to say that he too shall not govern himself? When the white man governs himself, that is self-government; but when he governs himself, and also another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism. . . .

"No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent. I say this is the leading principle, the sheet anchor of American Republicanism. Our Declaration of Independence says:—

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, DERIVING THEIR JUST POWERS FROM THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED."

"I have quoted so much at this time merely to show our ancient faith: the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed. . . . Allow all the governed an equal voice in the government; and that, and that only, is self-government."

Abraham Lincoln understood perfectly what American Republicanism is. And since he has here so clearly defined it, what is this thing now being advocated by the expansionists who must needs deny to whole peoples the exercise of self-government? This is the distinct abandonment of every principle of republican government.

Doing Business Again at the Old Stand.

ENCOURAGED by the promise of governmental support for the church in Cuba, Rome has returned to the attack upon American principles through appropriations to sectarian schools. Nothing else, of course, was to be expected. A special dispatch from Washington to the Chicago Times-Herald, dated Dec. 9, says:—

"Archbishop Ireland, of St. Paul, and Bishop Thomas J. O'Brien, of Sioux Falls, are in the city in the interest of the movement, headed by Cardinal Gibbons, who seeks to have Congress reverse itself and make appropriations for the education of Indian children in sectarian schools. There are intimations that this is intended as the entering wedge for a proposition to have native children in the Philippines sent to Roman Catholic schools in those islands." (Italics ours.)

Some years ago the Government was entrapped into the business of maintaining Roman Catholic Indian schools in the United States, by a yearly appropriation of funds from the public treasury. These appropriations, naturally, grew larger year by year. Several Protestant denominations followed suit, but they were unable to keep pace with Rome in securing the patronage of the Government. Seeing this, they turned about and repudiated the principle of government aid to sectarian schools, and finally secured a reversal of the policy by the Government. But meanwhile Rome had secured from the Government, under this policy, no less a sum than $2,366,416. This is the amount stated by Senator Gallinger on the floor of Congress as having been paid to the Catholic Church in this country during the eight years ending in 1894.

Now, Rome has returned to the attack, and aims not only to secure all that she had lost before, but a great deal more. And the prospect is favorable that she will get all this in the end, if not at once. The Government has shown itself entirely too ready to help the Catholic Church in the territory acquired from Spain, and in this has logically committed itself to the position which Rome desires it to maintain. Government support of Catholic schools for the children among the 8,000,000 Filipinos, means a larger sum in the papal coffers than the Government has ever put there before. The papal church is no doubt quite willing to exchange the support of Spain for that of the United States. Spain has not been rich for many years past, and has been growing poorer and poorer, until she has come to the verge of bankruptcy; while the United States, on the other hand, has become the wealthiest nation on the globe.

The United States cannot afford to pay to Rome or any other church a single principle of the free government which it is its honor to represent. To give away republican principles is a far dearer sacrifice than any amount of money; and this sacrifice Rome always demands. It will be immeasurably cheaper for the United States to build and support a system of public schools in the Philippines, than merely to support the so-called schools already built or that may be built by Rome.

What It Cost to Burn a Heretic.

A WRITER in the Windsor Magazine, who was sketching the history of some of the first archbishops of Canterbury, quoted an old account which shows how much it cost to burn a heretic three centuries ago and more. He says:—

"To defy the authority of the church meant in those days certain excommunication, which in turn entailed that the culprit should be dealt with by the laws of the state. That my readers may realize what this course implied, I give the following significant extract which appears in the municipal records of Canterbury, dated 1535:—

"For the expenses of bringing a heretic from London,.....	14s. 8d.
"For 1½ loads of wood to burn him,.....	2s. 0d.
"For gunpowder,.....	1d.
"A stake and staple,.....	8d."

EIGHTEEN names,—seventeen for three months, and one for six months,—with $4.75 to pay for the same, was received a few days ago from one individual in Oregon.

Who says the missionary spirit is dead? Reader, what do you say? If you are receiving your paper in a wrapper it means that you are the only one at your post office receiving the SENTINEL. Will you not try to change this order of things?

Tremendous Assumption.

THE attitude taken recently by Mayor Hoos, of Jersey City, toward the question of enforced Sunday observance, has called forth a manifesto from the American Sabbath Union. This manifesto declares that—"It is the sacred, not the civil, Sabbath upon which the American institutions are builded.

"It is the sacred, not the holiday, Sabbath that is the palladium of our liberties and the bulwark of private and public virtues.

"A secularized Sabbath always has been, is and ever will be, the doorway through which sweeps a flood of immorality, destructive of the home, the peace and good order of society, and the national life."

This is said in connection with a call for the enforcement of Sunday observance by law; and therefore it is plain that the enforcement desired is that of a religious observance of Sunday, and not the enforcement of a "civil" Sabbath. This is an undisguised statement of the case, like that made recently by the prosecuting attorney at Centerville, Md., where he stated that two prisoners on trial for working on Sunday, were being tried for the offense of violating "the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath." The call for religious legislation, and the enforcement of existing religious laws, is now being made with a boldness which is very significant.

There is one thing lacking in this statement by the American Sabbath Union, and the omission is one of importance. American institutions, it says, are builded upon a sacred Sabbath, and a sacred Sabbath is the palladium of American liberties. But what is this "sacred Sabbath" to which they refer, built on? The "Sabbath" to which they refer is Sunday; and that day, as a "sacred Sabbath," rests wholly on their opinions. Many people do not believe Sunday is a sacred day at all; but it is the opinion of the members of the American Sabbath Union that Sunday is the "sacred Sabbath." That is their religious belief, and a dogma of the church creeds.

Their opinions, therefore,—their belief, as members of a church holding to the dogma of Sunday sacredness—lie at the foundation of American institutions and American liberty! This is what their manifesto plainly implies. American institutions are builded on the "sacred Sabbath" (Sunday), and Sunday as a sacred day is builded upon their opinion in regard to which day is the Sabbath. Plainly, then, their opinions lie at the foundation of the whole structure; and what would become of American institutions and liberties if their opinions should give way!

These manifestations of religious bodies who demand that their religious views and practices be forced upon other people by law, are never complete without an amazing amount of assumption.

The Union of Church and State Condemned by Christ.

By B. W. Noel, M. A.

THE intimations in the New Testament, that God requires the separation of the Christian churches from the state are unequivocal.

Let us first examine our Lord's statement to Pilate of the nature of his kingdom, contained in the two narratives of Luke and John. "The whole multitude of them arose and led him to Pilate. And they began to accuse him, saying, We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a king. And Pilate asked him, saying, Art thou the king of the Jews? And he answered him and said, Thou sayest it. Then said Pilate to the chief priests and to the people, I find no fault in this man."

Our Lord was charged with claiming to be king of the Jews, and therefore, as king, claiming tribute from them, and forbidding that the Jews should pay tribute to the Roman emperor, Tiberius. Pilate, therefore, as governor, asked him whether the accusation was true; that he did claim to be king of the Jews. Jesus acknowledged its truth, and yet so explained the character of his claim, that Pilate saw it to be compatible with the reign of the emperor, and declared, in consequence, that he found him guilty of no crime against the Roman law.

By this account of St. Luke it is plain, first, that Jesus did claim to be king of the Jews, according to the charge brought against him by his enemies; but, secondly, that it was such a dominion as was compatible with the dominion of the emperor. Now a secular dominion would not have been compatible with it. The dominion of the emperor, obtained by conquest, and consolidated by imperial laws, was supported by taxation, and rested ultimately upon force. If Jesus had claimed to be king of the Jews in the same sense in which Tiberius was their king, then his laws must be substituted for those of Rome, his right to tax the nation for the expenditure of his government must destroy the emperor's right, and that right must be enforced by his army. In this case Pilate must necessarily have pronounced him to be the enemy of Cæsar; and when, instead, the governor declared that he found in him no fault at all, it is clear that in the opinion of the governor he claimed no right of enacting a new code of civil and of criminal law; he did not mean to maintain his government by taxation; nor would he collect a revenue by force.

The narrative of St. John places these facts in a still clearer light: "Then Pilate entered into the judgment-hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him, Art thou the king of the Jews? Jesus answered him, Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me? Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? Thine own nation and chief priests have delivered thee unto me: what hast thou done? Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence. Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a king then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice. Pilate saith unto him, What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and saith unto them, I find in him no fault at all."

Jesus was charged with claiming to be king. Pilate, therefore, having asked whether he was the king of the Jews, Jesus, before answering that question, demanded whether he had asked this from anything which he had himself observed, apparently intending to direct the attention of Pilate and of others to the fact, that the malice of the priests, and not any public misconduct of his, had occasioned his arrest. Pilate, answering that he was no Jew, but that the priests had brought him before that tribunal, asked him what his offense was. Jesus now replied to the original question, whether he was the king of the Jews, thus: "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence."

The object of his answer was to clear himself of the charge of rebellion. Now, this might be done in either of three ways. He might have denied his claim to be king, and then the whole accusation would fall; or, asserting his divine supremacy, he might have declared that he was the spiritual and the secular king of the Jews, to whom the emperor was bound to submit, in which case Pilate must either have become his disciple, or he must have declared him guilty of rebellion; or, thirdly, he might have maintained that he was king of the Jews, and yet admit the imperial authority of Tiberius, by explaining that his kingdom was spiritual, not secular: that between the spiritual dominion and the secular there was so complete a separation that the one could not interfere with the other; and that, in consequence, he could be no rival of the emperor.

And this was, in fact, the substance of his answer: "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence." It is clear that Pilate was permitted by our Lord so to understand it; because, when Pilate further asked, whether, then, he claimed to be a king, he answered, "Thou sayest (right) that I am a king." While he stood there, charged with rebellion, because he declared himself to be king of the Jews, he freely admitted that he did advance that claim, and yet Pilate pronounced him to be wholly innocent, which he could not have done except on the understanding that his dominion was exclusively spiritual.

The accusation by the priests was, "We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a king." The answer of Jesus is "My kingdom is not of this world; I claim no tribute, and I forbid no tribute to Cæsar." Their charge was, "He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry." His answer was, "My kingdom is not of this world. I raise no armies to maintain my rights." Their allegation was, "Whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar." His answer was, "My kingdom is not of this world, and therefore I can be no enemy to the reign of Cæsar."

If the kingdom of Christ were to be maintained by taxation and by force, like all secular powers, then his throne must subvert that of Cæsar; and therefore, when he satisfied Pilate that he was no enemy of Cæsar, by asserting that his kingdom was not of this world, it is plain that it should not be maintained by taxation and by force.

Further, Pilate understood our Lord to mean that his kingdom would never be so maintained; for if our Lord had said, My kingdom is not now of this world, not now maintained by taxation and by force, Pilate would at once have seen that it might shortly be strong enough to become a secular kingdom, maintained by force. And as it would then subvert the throne of Cæsar, he would have felt bound to condemn our Lord.

To defend himself from the charge of rivalry to the Roman emperor, it was necessary to inform Pilate that his dominion would be so entirely spiritual that it never could interfere with the rights of the emperor. And of this he did convince Pilate by saying, "My kingdom is not of this world." This was therefore the legitimate meaning of his words; and in them he has solemnly taught us, that his dominion is entirely and forever distinct from secular dominion; that he rules over men's hearts and consciences; that he will ever establish and maintain his rule without the aid of the tax-gatherer and the soldier; that he employs no coercion, and will never resort to military force.

CARDINAL GIBBONS has written a letter in which he says the trouble with the negroes which causes the race conflicts is this:—

"The education they are generally receiving is calculated to sharpen their mental faculties at the expense of their religious and moral sense. It feeds the head while the heart is starved."

Will he not now tell us what is the trouble with the education of the Filipinos who have been killing and torturing the friars?—N. Y. Independent.

The Holy Spirit and Sunday.—No. 17.

BY C. H. KESLAKE.

WE must now ask the reader to recall a few points set forth in previous articles, that he may be able to grasp more readily the present situation existing in the religious world.

Going back to the time of the Reformation, we found that the principle for which the Protestants contended was that the Bible is the only true rule in faith and morals, while up to that time it had been taught by the Catholic Church that the Bible and tradition—with tradition the more clear and safe authority, was the rule. We also found that when the Catholic Council of Trent met it was for the purpose of meeting the "errors" of the Reformers. In doing this the question of tradition had to be decided. Should the council define that tradition was not a part of the revelation of God, and of equal value with the Bible, it would be at once to acknowledge that the Protestants were right. And in that case every doctrine based upon tradition would have to be thrown out. In fact, it would have meant the collapse of the Catholic Church. But such an acknowledgment, it was decided, must not be made: the "heretics" must be confounded. But how should it be done? The way out was finally found.

Notwithstanding the Protestants had contended that the Bible should be recognized as the only rule in faith and morals, they, later at the Council of Augsburg, conceded that Sunday should be observed, and, too, that it existed solely by the authority of the Catholic Church. This was at once to concede the Catholic principle of tradition and to deny the Protestant principle of the "Bible only." This the Council of Trent saw, and seeing it, was quick to use it. Hence, Sunday was recognized as the pillar of tradition, while in turn tradition was necessary to the existence of the Catholic Church. And that being so, anyone can see that Sunday is the very foundation—the pillar of the Catholic Church. And all this meant a triumph for the Catholic Church.

Now as Sunday was the vital point between true Protestantism and Roman Catholicism, and as Protestantism at that time missed this very point, it was logically necessary that the whole question of Protestantism as against Catholicism must come up again, with Sunday as the issue. And we found, too, that the United States was the most favorable place for it to come up.

In our study of the symbols of Rev. 13, we have found that the two-horned beast is a symbol of the United States, and that consequently this country is to enforce the mark of the papacy, which we have seen is the Sunday. And further, it has been pointed out that the movement having in view the enforcing of Sunday is now on foot, and is making rapid progress.

The reader will pardon us for making such a lengthy review, but the points herein set forth are too important to be lightly passed by, and they now serve to impress upon our minds the fact that now—at this very time we are standing just where the Reformers stood three hundred years ago.

For in the demand that Sunday be kept as the Sabbath day, we are asked to accept the papal principle of tradition, and all that is involved in it,—for even the leaders in this movement for Sunday observance confess that there is no scriptural warrant for the observance of the first day of the week, and for one to recognize this papal principle is to recognize the authority of the Catholic Church.

Now that we are brought face to face with the principle of the Reformation, with the vital point—Sunday—at issue, we may well ask the question, On what side of the issue will the Holy Spirit be manifested? Nor is the answer hard to find. The Holy Spirit is bound to be on the side of the Protestant principle as He was at the beginning of the Reformation. It is therefore as plain as anything can be that those who are trying to enforce Sunday, with those who shall accept it, will be arrayed against the Holy Spirit.

Let no one think that it is a matter in which only men are concerned, and the question one merely of days. Luther in his day protested that it was not a work of his own doing; that an unseen power was urging him on; that he was only an instrument. And so it is to-day. In this matter of the Sabbath and of Sunday, men engaged in this question are merely the instruments.

We have reached a point when it must be determined once for all whether one will worship God in the fullest sense of the word, and acknowledge his authority and the supremacy of his Word; or whether on the other hand, he will worship the papacy (and the dragon) by accepting his mark, and so recognize his authority.

Back at the beginning of the Reformation, and for that matter, ever since, the Reformers were denounced by the Catholics as being moved upon by the devil, although in reality it was the Holy Spirit.

It will be noticed that this was exactly the charge that the Pharisees brought against Christ. See Matt. 12:24–32. And Christ said that this was the sin against the Holy Ghost.

Is the sin against the Holy Ghost involved in this question of Sunday? We shall see.

SPIRITUAL evils can be remedied only by spiritual power.

“We are anxious to do all we can for the spread of the truth, although we are very poor, and my husband is an invalid,” writes a friend from California, enclosing a list of twelve names, with money to pay for the same, for the SENTINEL, six months to each.

Friend, this is the spirit to pattern after. Are you anxious?

A “New Religion” Coming.

THE latest issue of Our Day prints this quotation from the Rev. Stephen Merritt, who is widely known as an advocate of “faith healing:”—

“A new religion is coming to the front. First, God is going to heal man, body as well as soul, and soul as well as body. The Church has taken this work out of his hands, has emasculated his work and weakened and lost his power, and is in consequence to-day, a spectacle to angels and men—a giant shorn of strength and grinding in the mills of the gods of the idolators. Pity 'tis true. But the Holy Spirit is dissatisfied with this state of things, and now has re-opened and re-asserted the gospel of Healing, and as in the days of the beginning, frankly and fully accepts the test. The God that answereth by healing, let him be God. The Holy Spirit demands that we ask for the old paths to walk therein and throws down the challenge: ‘If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not.’ The time has come when divine healing is to be proclaimed, and an unanswerable argument given in favor of Holy Ghost religion as it was commenced in the days of Jesus and continued and developed in the days of the apostles, and is now reopened and restored in these last.”

While it is true that God only can heal disease, and therefore that every case of genuine healing is from God, it is also true, and is a truth to be well noted, that the Scripture does not present this as an absolute test of the character of the agency concerned in it. The power to heal disease is not presented as a test of the truth or falsity of spiritual doctrine. The scriptural test is: “To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them.” Isa. 8:20.

So that if it be true that “a new religion is coming to the front,” which shall proclaim, “The God that answereth by healing, let him be God,” the way is being prepared for people to be caught in a deception. When Moses by the power of God worked miracles before pharaoh and his court, the magicians also “did so with their enchantments” for a time; the work of God was counterfeited by demoniac agencies; and the same agencies are at work in this age, and in the same way. There has been, and will be, counterfeit healing, or healing of counterfeit disease. This is a question of practical importance and its importance will augment as future developments unfold upon us.

TWENTY yearly subscriptions to the SENTINEL and a copy of our premium “Combination Bible” with each one, is the result of an effort recently on the part of one of our friends in Colorado. In closing his last letter he says, “I am going to do all I can for the SENTINEL.”

Dear reader, have you a copy of this Bible? If you haven't, you ought to have. If you have one, see that your neighbor gets a copy also, and the SENTINEL with it.

THE Actors' Society of America has petitioned the clergymen of New York for assistance in suppressing Sunday performances at the theatres. The president of the society is quoted as basing this appeal on the fact, among others, that the Sunday theatrical performance is "demoralizing not alone to the actors, but to the community in which the performance is given." The actors do not want to demoralize themselves, and they ask the clergymen of New York for the aid of their law-making influence, that they may be prevented from doing so. Besides this, they want one day in the week in which to appear natural. Whether they promised to attend church every Sunday in return for this ministerial aid is not stated.

THE citizens of Danville, Ill., have recently been much stirred up over the operation of a Sunday-closing law secured not long since by the Barbers' Union. One barber, the report states, kept open shop on Sunday and was arrested; whereupon he at once had warrants sworn out for the arrest of about thirty business men of the place—clothing merchants, druggists, restaurant keepers, newsdealers, etc.,—who were like himself, keeping their places of business open. It is said these cases will be appealed to the supreme court of the State.

Bigotry, envy, and the spirit of retaliation are the natural avenues through which the Sunday laws are put into operation.

OF the care of the Government for its wards, the Indians, the New York Independent, in a late issue, says:—

"We are more and more dissatisfied that the Department of the Interior takes no interest in the welfare of the Indians. Of course, the Indian Bureau is not responsible, as it cannot appoint an agent or an inspector. Admirable men for the very important position of inspector of schools, which requires technical knowledge, are suggested purely on their own merit, and they are passed over for men who have no qualifications except personal or political influence. But what can we expect when a tried man like Dr. Hailman was dropped as superintendent of schools, to the sad loss of the service, purely for political reasons?"

This is the way the Government cares for the uncivilized races under its authority right at home. It illustrates the remark made by Dr. Parkhurst in late discourse that "our policy of dealing with semi-civilized folks and with savages is not just what you would call reassuring." And this being the way it cares for such people here on its own shores, what can reasonably be expected as regards the care it will exercise over savage races thousands of miles away?

A PRESS dispatch dated "Topeka, Kans., Dec. 13," says:—

"C. W. Walters, a Populist member of the Kansas House, wishes to transform the State by law into a modern Canaan. If an extra session is called, he will again seek to have the ten commandments enacted as statutes. Walters is a well-to-do farmer of forty, residing in Labette County. He is deeply religious. In 1897 he made his campaign and won on the platform of the Mosaic law."

This is an example of the idea of government illustrated on the front page of this issue. It is the idea which the National Reformers are trying to set up, in which they are being aided by the largest religious organizations of the land, and which is involved in every religious law and every effort to secure legislation in behalf of a religious institution.

RELIGION in politics is stirring the people of Centra-lia, Wash. A dispatch from that place to the Seattle Daily Times, dated Dec. 5, says:—

"This city is in the throes of a most intensely interesting municipal fight. Heretofore in city elections but little or no interest has been taken, but this year the people are all aroused. The cause of this is an attempt to enforce the state law requiring saloons and business houses to close and remain closed on Sunday. A mass convention of citizens was held at McNitt's Hall Friday evening to place a ticket in nomination. A resolution was read pledging all candidates of the citizens' ticket to enforce the state law to the letter. A long debate followed, and a vote taken on the resolution, resulting in its being carried by 68 to 36. . . . To-day the general impression is in favor of closing, but the result may be a surprise either way. All the candidates are men of competency and reliability, and there is only one issue—that of Sunday closing."

There is nothing like religion in politics to stir up the dormant activities of a community and add bitterness to political controversy. And there is nothing like politics to drag the mantle of religion through the mire.

AT a recent meeting of the National Christian Citizenship League, held in Washington, D. C., the question was raised whether the churches in the islands taken from Spain are rightfully the property of the Catholic Church; and it was contended that the United States Government should take possession of all church property, and submit the question of its disposition to the people in whose midst it is located.

The Catholic Church, as is well known, has for centuries been in close union with the Spanish government; and churches built in the islands under Spanish rule, were largely the property of the state. And as such property has now passed to the control of the United States, the point is made, and quite logically, that the Catholic Church has no right to assume control of such church property now.

Neither this Government however, nor any other government, has rightfully any business with church property as such, save to hold it subject, like other property, to taxation.

An Experiment In "Christian Communism."

NEAR Columbus, Ga., says The Outlook, there is being conducted an experiment in "Christian communism;" that is, an experiment in applying the principles of Christianity to industrial life, in accordance with the views of such advocates of the system as Prof. Herron, of Grinnell, Iowa. The community is known as "The Christian Commonwealth," and numbers about seventy souls. It is thus described:—

"The practices of the outside world are exactly reversed in this Christian community. The bond which holds the association together is not self-interest, but brotherly love; instead of competing with one another, they cooperate; the strongest and ablest regard their gifts, not as a means of self-aggrandizement, but as an opportunity for service. Every new member is expected to give to the association all that he has, but poor men are received without admission fee of any kind. All that is necessary is assent to the following statement of faith: 'I accept as the law of my life Christ's law that I shall love my neighbor as myself. I will use, hold, or dispose of all my property, my labor, and my income according to the dictates of love for the happiness of all who need. I will not withhold for any selfish ends aught that I have from the fullest service that love inspires.' The system is one of complete communism. Private property is limited to personal effects; all land and capital are owned by the community collectively. There is absolute equality within the association. Every member is asked to do his share in the necessary work, and receives in return all that is needful for his daily life. The colonists have several hundred acres of land, which are being rapidly brought under cultivation. There is an orchard, a nursery garden, a sawmill, a blacksmith shop, and a dairy. Commonwealth has its own post-office, and a printing press from which is issued the monthly organ of the association, The Social Gospel, edited by George Howard Gibson and the Rev. Ralph Albertson."

The only trouble with this system, from the standpoint of Christianity, is that it puts the cart before the horse. It is an effort to get the results of the spirit of Christianity by establishing the forms. The spirit must come first, and the forms follow as a natural result. Men must get the spirit of Christianity in order to carry out its principles in their relations with one another; not attempt to do the works of Christianity in order to get its spirit. True Christian communism must begin with a spiritual mind. A promise to accept Christ's law as the law of one's life amounts to nothing. It is a promise that no person has of himself any power to fulfill.

There is really nothing that can take the place of old-fashioned gospel work as a means of hastening the dawn of a brighter day for the suffering and the oppressed.

In the Philippines, where Rome has so long ruled, the church holidays average about three days out of every week, and are generally observed by those under Rome's control.

Rome Favors Annexation.

A PRESS dispatch from Washington, dated December 11, gives some very interesting information touching the attitude of the papacy toward the question of Cuban annexation. While any intention of annexing the island was expressly disclaimed by the Government when it intervened between Cuba and Spain, the question of annexation has nevertheless remained a live question, and promises to remain such for a long time. For, as this dispatch states, the whole influence of the papacy is cast in favor of settling the Cuban question in this way. Nor is the purpose of Rome in this hard to discover.

The dispatch says that "Archbishop Ireland is urging annexation, and it is believed he is voicing the sentiments of the pope. The St. Paul prelate has been in Washington several days, and he has talked with a number of influential senators and representatives on this subject. He explains that he speaks for the majority of Cubans, who want a stable government that will permit the development of the resources of the island in peace. He represents the Cubans of property as being in dread of a native government, because of the frequent revolutions peculiar to the republics of Latin America. This is a delicate subject, about which the archbishop naturally refuses to talk freely for publication, but Roman Catholics close to him understand that he has the sanction of the pope in this propaganda."

"There is corroborative evidence that the pope is using his influence for annexation. Most of the Roman Catholic members of the hierarchy of the United States are warm advocates of annexation. It is said at the Catholic University in this city that Count Camillo Pecci, a nephew of Leo XIII., is coming to this country soon, and it is asserted he will be charged by the vatican with the mission of working for annexation. Archbishop Ireland is an ardent advocate of territorial expansion, and he frankly expressed the hope and belief that Cuba will be taken into the United States. If it prove true that Pope Leo is taking an active part to bring about annexation, his influence in that direction will be a powerful agency. It is the general belief, in Washington that Cuba will ultimately be added to the United States. While the President and the people of the United States are pledged to the independence of the island if the Cubans prove themselves capable of maintaining a stable government, it is expected they will never demonstrate that ability, and that this Government will never be able to withdraw from the island. Roman Catholics in the confidence of Archbishop Ireland and Monsignore Martinelli declare with positiveness that the pope has authorized the movement to hasten the union."

It is expected that the Cubans will never be able to demonstrate their capacity for self-government, says this dispatch. And whether peace and order are restored in the island or not, we are told, depends very largely upon the priests who exercise so great an influence over the population. This was one of the reasons advanced for securing the support of the United States Government for the church in Cuba. It would be very bad policy, it was said, by refusing this support to offend these priests who are able to sway the populace either in the direction of peace and order, or against it. Rome understands that she has the power to determine whether the Cuban people shall ever demonstrate their fitness for self-government or not; and hence she can speak confidently on the side of the view that they never will do this, and hence should be brought under the rule of the United States in order that stable government may be secured.

Rome has much to gain by bringing the late Spanish colonies under the authority of so friendly and strong a Government as the United States. Other Spanish colonies which have broken away from Spanish rule—such as Mexico and the states of South America—have shown a decided tendency to break away from the rule of Rome, to confiscate the overgrown church property, and in various ways to curtail the church's encroachment upon the liberties and rights of the people. In the Philippines, were the people left to act on their own judgment, this course would undoubtedly be taken at the present time; and it is by no means certain that the same thing would not be done by the Cubans, ultimately at least, were they to become an independent nation. Hence Rome greatly desires that they shall be held in check by a strong hand friendly to herself, and will use all her influence to this end.

It is a great pity that when a long-oppressed people succeed in throwing off the yoke of Spain, they should not be left free to cast off that spiritual yoke which has made the Spanish yoke the intolerable thing that it is. While the yoke of the papacy remains, the liberty for which the Cubans and Filipinos have so long fought will remain an elusive dream.

IN reply to a query by one of its readers whether or not the Government has promised to pay priests employed on the lands taken from Spain, the Toledo Blade says:—

"If you had thought a moment, you would not have sent that question, for you would have considered that, had it been true, the Blade and all other newspapers would have had an account of it in their news columns. Furthermore, if you had considered the matter a little further, you would have remembered that no public money can be used in the United States to maintain any church or religious teachers, and that therefore it cannot be so used in any of the island; coming under the authority of the United States.

"Now, do you understand that the story is simply a stupid lie, or must we assure you of that fact still further?"

The Blade needs sharpening. Appropriations of public funds for sectarian uses have been going on in this country for years in plain view of reading and observing people. Only recently the Government paid $288,000 to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and within recent years it has given millions of dollars to various churches, notably the Catholic Church, for sectarian uses.

The Blade ought to know this; but the people ought to know that the average newspaper is not a reliable source of information upon such questions.

A SAMPLE of the way in which Roman Catholic propagandists are doing "missionary" work among ignorant Protestants comes to us from California, in a newspaper clipping, which says:—

"The Rev. Father Hopper delivered an able lecture Thanksgiving night upon 'The Blessed Virgin the Mother of God.'

"The audience was carried away with the force and unction of his words.

"As he drew his lecture to a close he took a text of Holy Scripture saying, 'It is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead that they may be saved from their sins.'

This "text of Holy Scripture" will be found next to the text which says that the first day of the week is the Sabbath.

The real student of Scripture will not be carried away with the "force and unction" of glaring religious fraud.

CHRISTIANITY can control the nation only by first entering the hearts of the individual constituents of the nation; and it can enter there only by invitation, not by force.

TO TRY to uphold the law of God by a civil statute is like a man trying to uphold a mountain. Let the law of God uphold you.

TO ANY person outside of Christ the law of God speaks nothing but condemnation; and this condition cannot be changed by embodying the law of God in the law of the land.

Studies in French History.—52.

"ABOUT the first thing that wise old man, Cardinal Fleury, did, was to raise the standard of the coin, again. This was a very sensible thing to do,—in fact, no people or country can prosper when its gold and silver money is debased. He very much desired to put a tax upon the lands of the rich, but he was so anxious to keep on friendly terms with his neighbors that he dared not do this; but he was very economical in the management of public affairs, and even in 'the king's own household.' This was some time before the middle of the eighteenth century.

"Can you tell me of anything else," continued the teacher,—“any other enterprise which was being conducted about this time by France, Edna?”

"Do you mean the colonies which were sent over here to America, professor?"

"Yes; and to India as well. I love to dwell upon the quiet, prosperous part of the stormy history of this country, because it is much pleasanter to think about."

"The people called Louis XV. the 'Well-Beloved,' didn't they?" asked Milly Brown, "though papa said this morning that he didn't know why."

"I do not think they had any sensible reason for it, Milly, because he did scarcely anything but oppress them day and night. But after winning some victories over the English, he was taken very sick, and the people feared he would die. Then he pretended to be very sorry for all his misdeeds, and while the people were rejoicing over the victories he had gained for France, they gave him this name. But I am thinking it would have been far better for the people if he had not recovered; for his subsequent acts prove that his repentance was not at all genuine."

"Don't you think that is apt to be the case when any one professes to be converted under the influence of fear—either of death—or of the civil law?" asked Joe Pal-meter.

"It is very apt to be so; yes, Joseph. Well, finally, the king got well, and the people were very glad,—but it was the last time they were glad, till he died.

"Meantime the nation was engaged in a mighty struggle with the English, over in India, when the renowned general Dupleix was so successful that he gave France the victory."

"When was peace declared?" asked Max Smith.

"In 1748; but still the poorer classes of victorious France were in as great a strait as ever. Even the old Cardinal Fleury, generally so wise and prudent, did the unjust thing of forcing them—the peasants—I mean, to see that the roads were kept in good order; this obligation was called the corvée."

"But if he had obliged the rich people to do this, I think it would have been a very sensible thing, for the roads must have been pretty bad, according to the last lesson," said practical Jack.

"Certainly; but you see the poor peasants were already taxed shamefully, and it was only just to require that those who used the roads most, which was the richer classes, should keep them in repair. But all these unjust and iniquitous proceedings only hastened the horrors of that awful baptism of blood called the French Revolution.

"Between 1748 and 1756 there was a period of sweet peace. It was as though the country would take a short breath before the beginning of the next trouble—the French and Indian war, as Americans call it."

"Now we are getting quite near home," remarked Charlie.

"Yes; but meantime the silly king, instead of making the most of the little time of peace, did nothing at all for his impoverished country; but paid all of his attention to a wicked and vain woman named Madame Pompadour."

"What did poor Queen Maria do then?" asked Milly Brown.

"She could do nothing. The will of the king was law; and so that worthless woman almost entirely ruled the country, through her unbounded influence with Louis. She even appointed her favorites as bishops of the church—whether they were fit or in any way qualified for that position mattered little.

"I should almost think the people would be glad for such a king to die," said Rob Billings.

"There are many who would certainly have rejoiced at it. In fact, a man tried to kill him with a penknife about this time, which put the wicked king into a great fright, for though the wound was trifling, he feared the knife was poisoned. Then again did the insincere king profess to be much concerned about his soul; but when the doctor pronounced the wound not dangerous, the king had no further use for the priest whom he had sent for post haste."

"What did they do with the fellow who tried to kill him? and what was the man's name, please, professor?" asked Harry.

"They hitched him to four horses in such a way that he was pulled into as many parts,—it was horrible! His name was Damiens. This awful torture was witnessed by many people, even ladies,—or those calling themselves such, came in crowds to witness it.

"In the French and Indian war, Louis was coaxed into taking the part which he did, by Madam Pompadour, who had no other motive than to gratify her flatterers. From this we can see how silly are the reasons which have influenced kings to go to war, one with another. This war resulted most disastrously for France, until finally the poor discouraged people had not the remotest feeling of loyalty in their hearts."

"Could none of the French ministers bring about a better condition of affairs?" asked Charlie White.

"They did not seem to be very capable men, Charlie, or else they were very selfish; that is, with the somewhat notable exception of the Duke de Choiseul. This man evidently managed the very best he knew how for the good of his people. It was while he was minister that the little island of Corsica came into French possession."

"Why, this is the place where Napoleon Bonaparte was born!" exclaimed Florence Ray, enthusiastically.

"Yes, he was born about three months after the island was conquered by France.

"In the year 1773 the Duke de Choiseul was the means of banishing from the country those people belonging to the Order of the Jesuits,—that is, 'their property was taken away,' and their society broken entirely up."

"Well, I don't believe in the Jesuits' religion," said Joe Palmeter, "but I think that deed was a wicked and unjust thing."

"It was unjust, Joseph, and it was no way to bring them into a right way of thinking.

"The eldest son of King Louis XV., the good dauphin, had died, together with his wife and his mother, before these events occurred. They died at about the same time, reminding one very much of the fatalities of like nature which befell the family of Louis XIV. This man, had he not died, would probably have prevented much of the miseries which fell to the lot of unhappy France, for he was an excellent and virtuous man. It was during the reign of the oldest of his sons, Louis XVI., that the dark period of the French Revolution was ushered in.

"In our next study we will learn something about a document called a 'lettre de cachet,' by which the minister Choiseul was dismissed from office."

MRS. L. D. AVERY-STUTTLE.

The War of Principle.—No. 12.

"You spoke, Cecil, of the good advice of Gamaliel, and regretted that it was not always followed when the cause of truth or even of error is being promulgated. There is plenty of room in the world for free thought, free speech, and free action, in so far as they do not come in conflict with natural rights. When they do come in conflict with such rights, we have a fine protection in civil law. For the protection of men in the exercise of inalienable natural rights, civil government is ordained of God."

"The trouble is, Aleck, that men have perverted the unctions of civil government, and history proves over and over that civil government, instead of protecting men in the use of their natural rights, has restricted and prohibited them even by the penalty often of prison and death."

"Why, Cecil, you certainly have changed your mind since we began this discussion."

"Yes; because whereas I was once blind, now I see. My intellect at any rate is thoroughly convinced that your positions are right. But I am also conscious that it will take more than my intellectual conviction to make me the advocate and upholder of principle in the face of opposition and persecution."

"Convinced of your need, is half the way to power. I cannot think, Cecil, that having the light you now have, you would consent to the meanness involved in opposing truth, or in even being neutral."

"No, Aleck; my very blood boils at the methods I see were used against truth. The weakness of dependence on human power is most obnoxiously apparent in the contemptible methods used to convict a true man of unrighteousness. How men made once in the image of God, can look upon themselves as men, and do so abominably, is still a mystery to me."

"What particular case has stirred you up so, Cecil?"

"O, the very next case in the Book of Acts—the case of Stephen. He certainly showed himself a man in every sense of the word. He was full of faith—believed in your principle of utter reliance on God, and consequently was full of power. I suppose the world and the devils both became jealous of such a character."

"Certainly. The prince of this world looks with suspicion and hatred on a man who relies on God: for Satan is a declared rebel against God and his government. Such faith is not mere human belief, but an evidence of an indwelling Saviour. It is the faith of Christ. That faith the devil knows is invulnerable. He tried by every temptation in his power to overcome it in Jesus. Think, then, how he dreads its manifestation in his followers. Every weapon of hell is formed to rid the world of him who has victorious faith."

"The weapons of hell are most contemptible then. Take Stephen's case. He came in conflict with persons from a certain synagogue who disputed with him. They were not able to resist the wisdom and spirit by which he spoke. They had no argument to oppose to his. They knew he had the truth. Instead of acknowledging it, as men should, they sneaked round till they found some unprincipled villains they could bribe to bear false witness. By this means they influenced the elders, scribes and people, rousing an unjust indignation against a good man. They were not ashamed of any calumny they could invent. O how I detest such methods! Finally, they caught Stephen, brought him before their prejudiced council, and gave all possible show to their false witnesses."

"But, Cecil, God did not leave him without vindication.' His very face testified to his truth that hour."

"Yes. So it says that it shone like the face of an angel. If ever such an opportunity is ours, may we too have such a face."

"We need not wait for such a time. Christians will always wear a face that tells the right story—if they are Christians."

"Besides his face, he had a testimony of wonderful power. I have been amazed in studying Stephen's defense of Christ. With the most subtle tact he begins at the history of Abraham, leading them over familiar ground, showing them that in the rejection of the former prophets and patriarchs, had been foreshadowed the tragedy of Calvary. When they saw the logic of the out-come, and where it placed them, instead of bursting forth in a wail of sorrow, repentance, and supplication, they gnashed on him with their teeth. When God opened heaven to him, and he gave his last testimony, declaring he saw Jesus on the right hand of God, they cast him out of the city, stoned him to death, with hearts harder than stones, for his prayers that their sin should not be laid to their charge, was unnoticed by them."

"Aleck, if such an exhibition is the result of reliance on self, on man, on human power, my prayer shall ever be, 'O God, deliver thou me.'"

THIS issue of the SENTINEL, being No. 50, completes the volume. The next issue will be dated January 5, 1899.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY, says the London Chronicle, is understood to have given assurance to the Vatican that Catholics in the islands lately taken from Spain would enjoy the same liberty as Catholics in the United States. Whereat the pope is much rejoiced, and has sent the President his warm thanks.

What the pope and other Catholics were worrying about, was of course the Catholic Church property in these islands. There was no danger that Catholics themselves would be interfered with under American rule, but it was not improbable, judging from the history of Mexico and other Spanish-American countries, that much of the enormous church property might be confiscated for civil uses. To prevent this the papal party have importuned the authority of the United States, making it appear, of course, that such confiscation would be a sacrilegious robbery which the American Government was in duty bound to prevent. This church property was of course acquired in the usual way in which the papacy has acquired property in all lands where she has had absolute sway; which is to say that the people have been robbed and peeled by the priests until the church became immensely rich and the people correspondingly poor; and all this in order that the church might overawe the people by a display of wealth and magnificence, and make more secure her hold upon them in civil as well as spiritual affairs. And now, having robbed the country for centuries, she wants the United States to guarantee that she shall not be obliged to give up any part of the spoils. And this, it appears, she has persuaded the Government to do.

HAVE you seen the great bargain that is being offered for the holidays? "What bargain?"—Why, the quarto-centennial edition of the Signs of the Times, 32 pages, illuminated cover, and profusely illustrated, for ten cents! But it is not the size of the paper, nor the illustrations, that constitute its real value, but the truths which it sets before the reader. These are just the truths that are most essential to your welfare,—the genuine diamonds and pearls from the hidden mine of wisdom and knowledge. No space or energy is wasted in an effort merely to please or amuse; but while the aim is to please it is also, first and foremost, to impart information the value of which cannot be measured in dollars and cents. Send for a copy, and if you don't find it the best bargain you ever got for ten cents, you need never believe anything that we say again. Address Pacific Press Publishing Co., Oakland, Cal.

DEFERENCE for days of human appointment always grows in a nation in proportion to the decrease among the people of deference for the day set apart by the Lord. The development of this sentiment is illustrated in the following paragraph from an article contributed to the Sunday-School Times, by Prof. A. B. Garner, of York, Pa., on the "duty" of a better observance of Thanksgiving:—

"It is our Christian duty. This day is not set aside by the church, to be sure, nor is it specifically appointed in God's Word; but it is the one day of all the year in which we are called upon, as a people, by our chief executive, to perform a distinctively Christian duty, and to ignore it or to slight it is to turn our backs upon this proclamation that we are a religious, a God-fearing, people. It is the one opportunity given for us to show to the world that we are Christian. Only atheists and infidels refuse to give thanks, and, when we make our nation thus refuse, we brand ourselves an atheistic or infidel people."

The Lord gave the Sabbath to be a sign between his people and himself, that they might show that they were not an atheist or heathen people, but worshipers of the true God, the Creator. But to observe a day of human appointment, in deference to the command of an earthly power, is a proceeding which savors only of the human, and is therefore atheistic in its very nature.

If you are supplied with a good Bible yourself, why not make a present to your friend of one of our beautiful Self-Pronouncing Combination Bibles, who will certainly very highly appreciate it and be agreeably surprised to find his or her name in fine gold letters on the cover.
